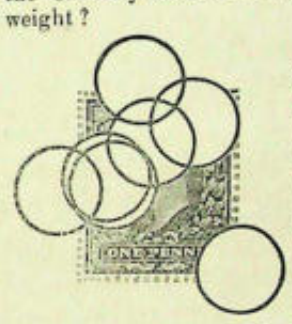
In accordance with anticipations expressed in these columns, the manufacturers of Express rifles in England have lost no time in providing substitutes for the ·450 and ·303 calibres, the importation of which is now prohibited. Furthermore, the new rifles, distinguished from the old to meet the requirements notified under the Arms Act by Government, embody distinct improvements from the sporting point of view. These improvements are the result of experiment and observation extending back over months or even years. It thus befalls that the necessity for abandoning the ·450 and the ·303 has the effect of hastening developments which in any event would ultimately have manifested themselves in the introductoin of improved Express. The military magazine rifle and the suportingExpress have developed on parallel lines, the military rifle maker and the sporting gunmaker each adopting an identical principle to the end that with moderate pressure a high velocity may be obtained. In the military arms long range is a desideratum, and flatness of trajectory an incidental advantage. The use of a sporting Express regards the flat trajectory as of importance almost paramount, because if a misleading term may be admitted for the sake of the idea it conveys, the velocity does really produce something very like a long "point blank" range. To get that, the excess of penetration, which a fully enveloped bullet from a high velocity rifle must necessarily produce, has been condoned, and various forms of expanding projectiles have been adopted to simulate the smashing effect of the heavier missiles used in the old types of Expresses.

Messrs. Holland and Holland have just introduced a series of rifles of calibres conforming with the requirements of the Indian Arms Act, in which a new bullet, designed by the firm, is employed. The object in view is to make the high velocity higher than before, the flat trajectory consequently flatter, and at the same time to keep the pressures at a level well within those limits of safety so necessary in a hot climate.

The new bullet is adapted for use in various cartridges, and two rifles, one of ·465 bore as a substitute for the ·450, the other a magazine rifle of ·375 bore, have been submitted for consideration. The bullet, as will be seenfrom the illustration, is of that essentially modern type in which the external dimensions approved by experience are adhered to, while the weight is reduced. The lead core is not continued up to the nose of the bullet, but the front third, or thereabouts, consists of some light material over which the nickel nose extends. The nose may beopen for purposes of expansion or may be closed if preferred. The light material used, in the examples under consideration, is ot wood, but other fibrous substances are employed and give equally good results. Bullets so constructed are named "Velopex," and their invariable characteristic is that, in relation to diameter and length, the weight is reduced. That is, in shape and appearance, the bullets conform to established conditions, but by the substitution of a lighter substance at the front of the core, their ballistic properties are materially improved.



Three weights of bullet have been designed for the ·465 cartridge. The heaviest is 480 grains, this being a projectile with full leaden core. Then comes a 365 grain bullet, precisely the same in dimensions, but of "Velopex" pattern with the wooden fronted core and finally there is another, lighter still for use on soft skinned animals. The cartridges, as the woodcut shows, are of the bottle-necked pattern, and resemble closely the well-known Holland 50·500-4 the case being modified for the ·465 bullet. The charge of cordite used is 75 grains, and with the two weights of projectile specified the ballistics compare thus :—

480 grain bullet 12·14 tons pressure, 2,141 f.s. muzzle velocity.

360 grain bullet 10·71 „ „ 2,282 f.s. muzzle velocity.

It is thus seen that the effect of lightening the projectile without altering its dimensions is very materially to reduce the chamber pressure for the same charge of powder and at the same time to increase the velocity to a marked extent. While these results are what might be expected in view of comparatively recent investigations concerning the effect of reducing the weight of bullets to obtain increased velocity and that flatness of trajectory so particularly valuable for sporting purposes, there is of course another essential point for consideration. To get this flat trajectory, which nullifies misjudgments of distances within reasonable limits; this low chamber pressure which makes the rifle so suitable for use under fluctuating conditions of temperature ; this high velocity with the advantage of low recoil, has anything been sacrificed in the way of accuracy? Will the ·465 bore shoot as well with the "Velopex" bullet as it does with the ordinary lead-cored ickel-coated projectile of normal weight?

The answer is that it will shoot better. Many diagrams have already been made and might be reproduced, but the group made when the rifle was shot in the presence of the Editor of the Field in London is so excellent that it is unlikely to be improved upon. In our illustration, the 7 shots, fired at a range of 100 yards, grouped themselves so that they can be shown, six breaking one into the other, and the seventh just below the main group, all actually upon an ordinary postage stamp. This diagram was made at the first attempt, using open sights, and it constitutes a really remarkable indication of the wonderful accuracy of the Holland ·465 rifle in combination with the new "Velopex" bullet. The groups made with the rifle and cartridge have been consistently good, but, having regard to human imperfections, it is not to be expected that the performance here illustrated will be often repeated. To fully realise its merit a postage stamp on a target 100 yards away might be examined. One is then led to the conclusion that the shooting qualities of the new rifle are limited only by the ability of its users, and that the fallibility of the human factor in the combination must be held accountable for any falling off from a standard of absolute accuracy within sporting distances.

It is on this question of accuracy that the new "Velopex" bullet seems most signally to have succeeded, and it is probably due to the fact that, with the lighter substance well forward at the nose, the projectile maintains, and even improves upon, the steadiness of flight obtained with a full weight bullet of corresponding dimensions. It may be observed also that, comparing the ·465 with the old ·450, both burning the same charge of cordite, the former bullet, having a greater diameter at the base, presents a larger surface upon which the powder gas may act. Being reduced in weight without any corresponding reduction in length, the bullet gains in velocity without producing any corresponding increase in recoil, so that there appears to be no disadvantage of any kind to set against the improvements Messrs. Holland and Holland have so succes-fully effected.

In applying the same system to rifles of smaller bores, in which heavy chamber pressures are normally provided for, further advantages are revealed. In connection with the ·375 rifle already mentioned these may on a future occasion be discussed. Messrs. Holland and Holland are, in this calibre, producing double-barrelled and single falling block rifles as well as the magazine pattern for the "Velopex" cartridge. Meanwhile, the eminently satisfactory performances of the "Velopex "bullet in the Holland ·465 single and double rifles made especially for use in India is a matter upon which the makers of the arms and their prospective users are alike to be felicitated.

VARIOUS INFORMATION WANTED.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

Sir,—Will you or any of your readers kindly give me information on the following points :—

Isa Tweed, in his book on Poultry, gives two medicines for chicken-pox. Chircheri or chorchora are the native names for these roots, also the jokha or joga bailta root. What is the botanical name of these roots?

Which shimal thorn should be pounded; there are several varieties.

I have been told that you can cut down trees with gun-cotton. That they are cut down straight across as though sawn. Can really large trees be dealt with in this way, say one of ten feet diameter or thirty feet circumference? How much gun-cotton would it take, and its cost with fuse? How is it done? Would lesser trees take the same quantity in ratio of size? Is gun-cotton dangerous to handle or store?

What are the latest and cheapest modes of felling trees in the larger lumber camps of Canada and America?

Thanking you very much in anticipation.

REWARDS FOR THE DESTRUCTION OF DANGEROUS ANIMALS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—A short time ago I wrote a letter to your paper on the above subject and I am returning to the charge again.

A few months ago I shot two bears in an adjoining Madras district and applied for the reward in the usual manner, sending my shikari with the skins for inspection. The reward was paid by the Assistant Collector without demur and the shikari's heart was rejoiced, as he was allowed to pocket the whole amount, less two rupees deducted by the Assistant Collector for the value of the skins. I may add that the bears were not much more than halfgrown and had never injured anyone.

Now comes the instructive part of the tale. Last month I shot two panthers which had been doing considerable damage in the same division, and I applied, as usual, for the reward, to the Sub-Collector who was then in charge of the division and received an answer from him to the effect that he considered European sportsmen ineligible for such rewards.

Now the orders of the Board of Revenue are that the rewards are to be paid to Europeans, but these orders are of no effect because the divisional officers can either refuse to pay the rewards, and, if their decisions are appealed against, can say that the value of the skins retained by the sportsman is equal to, or in excess of the amount of the reward.

That the rewards are paid in an arbitrary manner is clear enough from the case given above.

I fail to see anything infra dig, applying for the reward. In this district the rewards are paid to Europeans, without any fancy value being deducted for the skins retained and the civilians draw the rewards for the beasts shot by them just the same as anyone else.

It is rather farcical when Government offers a reward of say, Rs. 35 for a tiger, that a divisional officer can say that the value of the skin is Rs. 50 and ask the sportsman to pay up Rs. 15. I do not say that this has happened, but there is no reason why such a thing should be impossible.

Here is a problem for those interested in the subject: Supposing that a man-eater accounted for a civilian or two and a reward of Rs. 500 was offered for its destruction would European sportsmen be eligible for the reward? I expect the contents of the tiger would be so valuable that if one wished to retain the skin as a trophy, one might at once retire to the workhouse!

IS SNIPE SHOOTING EASIER IN INDIA THAN IN ENGLAND?

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—As there has been some discussion regarding the difference there is in snipe shooting here and at Home, I shall feel much obliged by your opening your columns to correspondence on the following question: Is snipe shooting easier at home or in India?

RAOUL.

MOORSHEDABAD, 2nd March 1907.

[We have never shot snipe in England but from what we hear the surrounding conditions heat, glare, walking, etc., are harder in this country than at Home. Whether the birds are more difficult to shoot at Home we do not know. Obviously strong birds on a cold morning in England are quicker than birds put up after tiffin on a blazing September afternoon in Lower Bengal! Our personal experience of snipe shooting in India is that it is beyond question the very hardest form of shikar (it beats gaur stalking easily) and none but the fittest can hope to become first class at it. Perhaps Mr. W. K. Dods and other "top-hole" snipe shooters will give us their opinions.—ED.]

Second Day, Wednesday, 27th February 1907.

In cool weather, with a steady breeze, apparently turned on for our special benefit, we discussed an interesting card to-day. There was some good racing, notably in the Horse Chase, which Mr. Bromilow won handsomely on Battleaxe. In the Pony Chase we had an accident and some unrehearsed effects that were both humorous and interesting. The accident befel Mr. Heseltine, of the Carabiniers, whose mount Flight fell and hurt him badly. Meanwhile the most fancied K. C., after going well enough over three jumps, flatly declined to do any more and till Flight fell it looked a good thing for him. When he came down, however, things got a bit mixed—there were only two in it—till Major Nickalls in tennis flannels descended on the situation as a veritable Deus ex machina, caught Flight, rode him in, and won. Quite an exceptional incident in Indian hurdle racing. Details:—

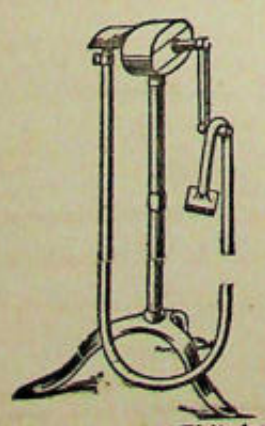
Hunting.

THE MADRAS HUNT.

THIS week, owing to Sunday being the day after the Hunt Races, and also after the Hunt Dinner, the usual meet was postponed until Monday. The meet was at St. Thomas's Mount and there was a fairly large field out, in spite of the very small contingent from Madras, for the gunners at the Mount are always keen sportsmen and as they had only just got back from the camp at Bisandra, they turned out in full force. At this time of the year, when the day grows hot so soon, an early find is essential if we are to have any sport at all, and so Sheepshead Covert had been baited a little for the previous day or two. This precaution met with full success, for hardly had hounds been put into the covert than they opened on a line and a big grey jack went away up the river bank, without keeping us waiting a minute. He ran as far as the prickly-pear patch about half a mile up the bank and then swung round and went back into Sheepshead, but he was a staunch beast and showed no desire to stay there. After a ring round the covert he crossed the river and ran over the open country, making in the direction of the Poonamallee Road. He kept handing, however, a little to the right and after giving us a most enjoyable gallop over somewhat hard but otherwise perfect country he crossed the river again and went into Scavenger Covert. From there he went down as far as the Poonamallee Road, back again towards the Mount, over the river and back by nearly the same line as he had come into Sheepshead. Here he went through most of his manœuvres all over again, recrossing the river and going back to Scavenger. Hounds were running very fast up to this, but scent was now growing bad and in Scavenger Covert they were frequently at fault. After a great deal of slow hunting they were still sticking to the jack and he again crossed the river and retraced his way to Sheepshead. The ground between these two coverts is dry and gravelly and on this, the fourth journey across it, there was ample evidence that scent was failing as the sun got higher and at last hounds were brought to their noses. They hunted splendidly, however, carrying the line right through Sheepshead Covert out at the Pallavaram end and then, very slowly, across the open ground to the Pallavaram Road. They held the line across the road, but could only speak to it now and then and at last left it for good at the railway line.



The jack had proved himself an unusually good one and fairly beat hounds, running them clean out of scent. The run lasted for an hour and a quarter and every hound worked well. The weather is now getting hot for hunting and the last meet of the season will take place on Sunday next, last Thursday's meet having been abandoned on account of the hard day hounds had had on Monday.

MADRAS HUNT RACES.

This is the first time in the long history of the Madras Hunt that there have been cross country races for hunters at the end of this season. Three cups were offered for competition and the races were held on Saturday, proving a great success. The country round the city is excellent for real point to point racing, as there is generally ample room for difference of opinion as to the shortest way between any two points, and though the country is rough and often cramped it is very sporting and to get over any long stretch of it at a fast pace is a real test of both horse and rider. This was all very well for the competitors on Saturday, and they had a good time all round, but the spectators had great difficulty in seeing anything of the races, the finish on the south bank of the Adyar being particularly bad in this respect. It was fixed at a spot opposite the Adyar Club and for half a mile in any direction the country was very difficult. Practically all that the spectators could see of the finish was the final scramble through heavy sand to the flags. The courses for the Masters Cup for horses and the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Miller's Cup for ponies were laid the Master and Mr. H. A. B. Vernon, the Hunt Secretary, laid it for the Ladies Cup. All three were sporting and fair specimens of Madras hunting country.

Two out of the three races resulted in complete surprises, Mr. Spinks, riding over country completely strange to him, winning the Master's Cup on Major Thomas' Narraghmore, and the Zemindar of Kavalpara, a minor of the Court of Wards, coming in first in the Pony Cup. This latter race was a curious one. All the riders went at least a mile, and probably much more further round than they need have done and crossed the Adyar river twice, when there was no necessity to cross it at all! The winner thoroughly deserved his victory. The Ladies' Race was won by Mr. Horne, on Black Prince, but was marred by an unfortunate accident to Mrs. Giffard, whose horse came a cropper over a bund. She was severely bruised and shaken, but it is understood that no bones were broken and that she is doing well.

After the races, Mrs. Horne, wife of the popular Master, was "At Home" at the Adyar Club, and the cups were presented to the winners by Mrs. Yorke. The annual Hunt Dinner was held in the evening.

THE KARACHI HUNT.

The heavy rain we have experienced during the month has interfered a good deal with the hunting of late and several meets have in consequence been cancelled. The hounds, however, have shown capital sport, and the going, though a bit heavy in places, has been good. We had a magnificent run of just over an hour on 7th February, when the hounds killed in the open near Noonan's Ruck. The hounds met near the Hunter's Pool on the Schwan Road. Mrs. Graham, Mrs. Travers, Mrs. Northen and Miss Bayley were out, and going well over some very difficult country we had to negotiate. Drawing along the Pinjrapol Bund the hounds owned to a scent in the scrub, just beyond the ploughed fields and raced through the Pinjrapol gap on to the Supura Pass. Here they got rather scattered, owing to the field pressing on to them too closely, but a slight check brought them together again. The hounds after hunting magnificently and maintaining the scent over very difficult rocky country, eventually pushed their jack out on to the Supura Plain. A fresh fox jumped up and crossed the line but the hounds held on, and eventually killed in the open near Noonan's Ruck, a point of roughly 8 miles from the meet.

On 12th February the hounds met at the Garden Crossing at 5 o'clock afternoon. A large field, including Mrs. Graham, Mrs. Travers, Mrs. Northen, Mrs. Anderson, the Commissioner, General Smith Dorrien, Mr. Lucas and others turned out to participate in tea and other light refreshments kindly provided by Mrs. Graham, before undertaking the more arduous duties of being photographed and hunting.

The Master took the hounds beyond Sher Ali's village before drawing. We found in one of the newly-planted coverts, and the hounds ran strongly towards Rai Singh's Well. Here we crossed the Maggir Pir Road and went on through the khets beyond to the Bund country. On nearing the Ruined Cottage the jack turned sharp left and we lost him eventually in the Long Bund after a run of 30 minutes. It was very hot and it was a marvel to every one that the hounds did so well.

On 17th February we met near the Pinjrapol (as the going over Lyari was too heavy) in hopes of finding a hill jack. The Master had 10½ couples out looking the picture of health and keenness. Mrs. Graham and Mrs. Travers were the only ladies out, but we were glad to see the Commissioner out, and also Mr. Lucas, who led the field throughout in great style over good bit of rather difficult hunting country. The hounds found near the bund and with a breast high scent ran a tremendous pace towards Oomer Dosal's Khete. But before reaching it they swung to the left towards the river and we found ourselves with endless nullahs to cross and some very heavy going to negotiate. The jack got down to the river bed and tried to cross, but he thought better of it, and turning he ran back towards the Pinjrapol fields. The hounds pulled him down on the Schwan Road after a fast run of just over 30 minutes He was a fine old dog jack. Drawing again, we hit off a line near Oomer Dosal's Khets. After a sharp burst of 10 minutes, the hounds ran into a jack, who was trying to take cover in a nullah. It was a nice cool morning, and so the Master determined to draw the Thull Nullah, but owing to the recent rains, there was too much water about and it was too damp. We found again near Hyona Hill on our way back and had a short run, but without killing.

On 21st February the hounds met at the Bunnia's Crossing at 7-15 A.M. It promised to be a good scenting morning, and so it proved to be. After drawing blank the Orchards on the far bank and the Guavas the Master cast along Rai Singh's Bund. There the hounds owned to a line and we had a capital run, lasting about 35 minutes, before the hounds run their quarry to ground in the Maggir Pir Hills. But it was only a shallow earth and the Master soon had him out. On the way home we drew along the Long Bund and got away on a nice scent. But on nearing Graham's Spinney, the hounds overran the line and were at fault. A short cast in the direction of the White House apparently put them right, but they were at fault again at once. Mr. Graham was taking them back to draw the Spinney again, when our jack was viewed away on the far side. The hounds, running from scent to view, were soon on terms with him and accounted for him near the nullah.

The Pony Cup.

The course for the Pony Cup was laid from a start on the Red Road by the Old Man's Crossing to a finish close to the Ladies' Wall. The going was cramped for the greater part of the distance, but a splendid gallop over the last mile of the course should have been enough to satisfy those who like open courses. Messrs. Deakin and Bell-Irving laid the paper and after the seven competitors had been weighed out a start was made. The list of weights and riders was as follows:—

Mr. C. W. Ritson on Geebung	14 0½	10st. 13lbs.
Mr. D. Forster on Josephus	14 1	11st. 2lbs.
Mr. C. G. Maude on Mist	14 1	11st. 2lbs.
Capt. Holden on Pathfinder II.	14 1½	11st. 11lbs.
Mr. F. Buckland on Blazes	14 1	11st. 2lbs.
Mr. N. Macdonell on Zig Zag	14	lbs.
Mr. R. Pugh on Mistlebird	14 0½	10st. 7lbs.

Geebung led out with Pathfinder next. Mistlebird hit the first wall very hard and never seemed to get going again throughout the race. Before the Mulla Hât Road was reached both Mist and, Blazes had lost their riders, and Pathfinder soon after went to the head of affairs. Captain Holden negotiated all the awkward turnings of the next mile successfully, followed by Geebung, Mistlebird, Zig Zag and Josephus. Coming up to the Ladies Wall Geebung made his effort and actually led for some distance, but when the finish hove in sight Captain Holden set his pony going in earnest and the issue was never for a moment in doubt. Going on he won comfortably from Geebung, who nearly dislodged his rider at the last hurdle, and Mistlebird was a bad third.

Next came the Horse Chase, for which the field was sadly depleted owing to the Hunters' Race in the afternoon. Messrs. Evers and Rees had a final duel however, and raced each other all the way followed at a respectful distance by Mr. Pauntley on a new bay horse and Captain Fitzgerald on Fermoy and Mr. Pierson on Lady Fox. After a great finish Mr. Rees managed to beat Cain, and the rest followed at intervals in the following order:—

1. Mr. Rees on Turk
2. Mr. Evers on Cain
3. Mr. Pauntley on Ledbury
4. Capt. Fitzgerald on Fermoy
5. Mr. Pierson on Lady Fox
6. Mr. Webber on Bijli followed by Mr. Dudley Myers on Sir Walter, Mr. Gresson on Kildare, Capt Holden on Lord Harry, etc.

The Paperchase Cup.

The big meet was held in the fields at the foot of the Bund Country where a shamiana had been pitched in which the Viceroy's Staff dispensed Chota Haziri after the race to all subscribers and their friends. Mr. Pauntley had laid a gallery course, bringing in the Bund Country early in the chase and running past the high bund on which the spectators gathered no less than three times before finally bringing it back again to finish alongside. Fourteen started seven light and seven heavy, and all completed the course, except two light weights, a fine performance over a five mile point with some fifteen or sixteen fences through rough and heavy going.

There was plenty of galloping country, but the jungle turns were mostly difficult in that they varied a trifle from the old and well known tracks. The leaders were off the paper three or four times during the chase, Mr. Ballantyne most unfortunately at the final and critical turn into the straight. Mr. Pauntley on Ledbery and Mr. Holmes on Nevermore laid the paper and Mr. Apostolides acted as Judge with Mr. Squire Walker at the Scales.

In the chase Mr. Evers led out from Corydon, Lord Harry, Jorrocks, Fairy and Trilby, and they ran in this order until Mr. Evers and Fairy got off the line by the new tank close to the Garia Hat Road. They were soon in position again, however, and running up to the Ladies' Wall for the last phase of the race Fairy went to the front while Lord Harry, Cain and Corydon lay handy. Fairy was still going great guns at the Tollygunge Lane when Mr. Ballantyne lost the paper and his saddle in a desperate effort to regain the trail through the trees. Coming into the open for the run home Lord Harry held a good lead of Cain and Captain Holden sat down to ride for home without more ado.

It was well he did so, for although Cain could only struggle in behind him that fine horse Corydon was still full of running and would have been a dangerous customer to tackle had the winner not slipped him as he did coming out of the last piece of jungle. Trilby ran fourth and Fairy remounted next, Ruddigore led the procession of very tired horses that followed. Lady Gold (Dr. Hossack) and Queen of Hearts (Mr. Pearson) did not finish, but the remaining twelve came along in this order:—

Lord Harry, Capt. Holden; Corydon Cr. Forsyth, Cain, Mr. Evers, Trilby Mr. Deakin, Fairy Mr. Ballantyne Ruddigore Mr. Halliday, Fermoy Fitzerald, Jorrocks Mr. Levetus, Toastrack Mr. Radmore, Bijli Capt. Webber, Sir Walter Mr. Myers, Ruby Mr. Tanner, Myrene Mr. Antram, Dona Mr. Ralli.

The Paperchase Dinner was held at the Saturday Club on Saturday evening when some seventy covers were laid. Dr. Forsyth in the Chair, was in great form and proposed the usual toasts with witty brevity. Mrs. Lamond Walker replied and was followed by Mr. Ballantyne, whose neat little speech was clearly heard. Capt. Holden spoke at some length and was very entertaining. Messrs. Myers, Stokes and Norman McLeod were the other speakers. It was announced from the Chair that Capt. Holden, and Dr. Forsyth, Mr. Robertson an Mr. Deakin had offered to present Cups for next season. All were agreed that the past season had been one of the pleasantest and most successful in the annals of Calcutta Paperchasing.

MURRAY FOOTBALL TOURNAMENT

THIRD ROUND.

SOUTH STAFFORD NORTHAMPTONS.—Owing to a number of other engagements interveving, it was not possible to commence the third round of the Murray Football Tournament at Lucknow until Monday afternoon, the 4th March, when the tie between the Northamptons and the South Staffordshire Regiment was played off on the ground of the Oxford Light Infantry. The teams were fairly evenly matched, and play ruled fast, but both sides were at fault in not keeping the ball down. The Northamptons kicked off and their opponents shortly afterwards ran up the ball and obtained a corner, but without result. A foul was next given against the Staffords near the mouth of their goal, but the ball was cleared. Several corner kicks were conceded by both teams, and both kicked over the goal more than once. In the second half of the game, the Northampton's goal-keeper had saved a shot at goal, and returned the ball into play, when it was headed by the Staffords' left wing. It was the only score of the match the South Staffords thus winning by one goal to nil.

SOMERSET L. I. THE CARABINIERS.—On Tuesday afternoon, the 5th instant, the sumerset Light Infantry played the Carabinier on the Durham Light Infantry ground. The game was a fast one, but at the call of time nothing had been scored and an extra twenty was played each way, but still without result. The tie was replayed the following morning, when the somerset Light Infantry defeated the Carabiniers by two goals to one.

DURHAM LIGHT INFANTRY vs "A" TEAM ROYAL IRISH RIFLES.—On the same day on the ground of the Oxfordshire Light Infantry the Durhams met "A" Team Royal Irish Rifles and after a very closely contested game the Durhams won by two goals to one. The Royal Irish scored first, and the Durhams equalised within a few minutes of time. An extra ten minutes' play each way was ordered, and in the last few minutes the Durhams got the wining goal

THE SEMI-FINALS.

ROYAL WELSH FUSILERS vs. SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE REGIMENT.—The first of the semi-final matches was played on the afternoon of the 6th instant between the above teams on the ground of the Oxfordshire Light Infantry. In the first half of the game the Staffords obtained the first goal, but near half time the Welshmen equalised. nothin gwas scored e in thsecond half, an extra ten minutes was played each way, and about three minutes from time the Staffords scored, winning by two goals to one.

DURHAM LIGHT INFANTRY vs. THE CARABINIERS.—The above remaining tie in the semi-finals of the murray Cup was played on Thursday afternoon, the 7th instant, before a large number of spectators. The tie was most closely contested, and proved to be the best game yet witnessed in the competition. Half time arrived with nothing scored, but subsequently both teams put up a goal apiece. An extra ten minutes, play each way was ordered, but without result.

The tie was replayed the following morning, with the result that another draw resulted, the score at the close being two goals all.

CLUB GOLD MEDAL.

This competition for the principals cratch prize of the club's year last took place over the Maidan links on Friday and Saturday last. It is a pity that it was fixed for the same day as the Presidency Athletic Meeting, and the entries and interest doubtlessly suffered thereby still there was a good outturn of players, and with the course in fair order, though very hard and keen, some better scoring might have been anticipated. The winner eventually turned up in Mr. F. H Stewart, who, in spite of want of practice, put in a creditable card of 83, though his golf was rather enelven. Mr. H. W. Dick was second a single stroke behind and this was lost by bad luck on one of the earlier putting greens. Mr. Stewart also won this medal in 1900, after a tie with Messrs. T. Drimmie and D.S. Murray and in 1901.

The best scores sent in were as follows :—

Hockey.

THE BANGALORE TOURNAMENT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

In continuation of my notes on the hockey tournament the following brief descriptions of the games may perhaps be of interest:—

BANGALORE RIFLE VOLUNTEERS (HOLDERS) vs. KOLAR GOLD FIELDS.—An excellent and interesting match. Up to half time there was not a great deal to choose between the teams, although the Volunteer forwards were distinctly cleverer in front of goal. At this point the B. R. V. were only a goal to the good, but they subsequently ran all round Kolar, and scored two more goals. "Joe" Pereira, much aided by Hubert Pereira and Hay-Green on the right wing, was responsible for all the goals, and he netted the ball a fourth time, but "sticks" caused the point to be disallowed.

SEMI-FINALS.

ROYAL ENGINEERS vs. BANGALORE GYMKHANA.—A most exciting game. The hockey was not perhaps of the very highest type, as there was a certain amount of wild, hard hitting. But there were good men on both sides, notably Pemberton for the R. E. and Boyce for the Gymkhana. The last named managed to dislocate his shoulder, but had it put in on the ground and continued to play, amidst applause. Before the interval nothing was scored, but shortly after play was resumed, Sleater scored a beautiful goal for the Gymkhana, the point being the outcome of a fine run and centre by Morris on the left wing. From now to the finish the Sappers pressed, and Pemberton several times had hard lines in not scoring. Three minutes before time, White equalised amidst frantic applause, and by mutual consent an extra five minutes each way was played. Nothing of note occured during the first moiety of this time, but in the second, Pemberton's yeoman service on the right wing was at last rewarded. He dribbled very prettily, and passing across to Bamberger, that player added the winning point amidst shrieks of delight from the Sappers' supporters. The R. E. accordingly won by two goals to one.

SEMI-FINALS.

BANGALORE RIFLE VOLUNTEERS (HOLDERS) vs. 14TH (KING'S) HUSSARS.—This match was played on the 1st March and needs no description, for the holders were simply practising at goal throughout. They scored three goals in the first half, ("Joe" Pereira one and Hubert Pereira two), and no less than six during the second period of play. Hubert Pereira netted the ball thrice, Joe Pereira twice, and C. D'Cruz once. The Volunteers, accordingly, won a runaway match by nine goals to love. It was plucky of the Hussars to enter for they have had no chance whatever of practice owing to manœvres.

THE FINAL.

The final between the Royal Engineers and the Bangalore Rifle Volunteers was played on Saturday, the 2nd March, and the holders won by four goals to two. It was a real good game without a suspicion of roughness, and both teams deserve every credit. Before half-time the holders scored two goals and shortly afterwards added a third, W. Pereira having scored twice and "Joe" Pereira once at this point.

Subsequently the Sappers improved tremendously, and goals by Dolan and Pemberton (the latter a beauty) caused some excitement. However the Bangalore Rifle Volunteers then returned to the attack and a beautiful goal by "Joe" Pereira put the issue beyond doubt.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

A little more interest appears to be taken in the League since my last notes were published, and some fairly satisfactory games have been played. Some of the clubs have not yet, however, settled down and it is therefore difficult to judge their relative strength.

Calcutta have got off with the pistol and so far have done well. After a drawn game with the Rangers of two goals all, they easily disposed of the Y.M.C.A. by 5 goals to 1. They will have much the same team available as did service for them last season. V. C. Cooper will play in goal. Graham, who I am glad to notice has returned from furlough, will partner McCaw at back and they should prove a formidable pair. The half-back line will in all probability not be so strong as usual. Mackenzie will be leaving Calcutta shortly, while Pierson will not always be available. The Club have, however, obtained an efficient substitute in E. Studd, who has played in good hockey at Home and is already shaping well. Powell, who is a much improved player, will probably find a place at half. Of the forwards, Sherman, Simson, Martin and Badham will be playing, while Heilgers, the "ruggerite," will be given a trial at outside left. He is full of dash and with a little practice should be a decided acquisition. The inside men appear to have already got into their stride and are passing with accuracy and precision. Martin at inside right passes extremely well to his outside man, but his passes to the centre appear to be too hard. It is the "push stroke" that is required more than the actual hit. Badham played a tip-top game against the Y.M.C.A., but is weak in fielding and should use his hands more. Capable substitutes are, I understand, available, and I anticipate the Club will hold a good position on the League table at the finish.

Ballygunge are experiencing some difficulty on getting together a side, but I was glad to see that they were able to place a fairly representative team in the field against the Caledonians on Monday last, and were unlucky to lose by the odd goal of three, scored in the last few minutes of the game. Coulthard played in goal and there are few his equal in this department of the game, and with Warwick Smith, McCrea, Graves, Gould, Horncastle, Braithwaite and Martin they should yet give a good account of themselves. Ballygunge are always handicapped as a number of their members are also members of Calcutta and in some cases prefer to don the red and white shirt.

The United Services team, I understand, prefer to withdraw from the League altogether than be played in the second division. This seems a pity, as now they have no hope of being played in the senior division next season, under the new qualifying rules. One can, however, quite understand in a way, their prefering to play friendly games instead of going through the more serious business of a league, and after all when the team changes so considerably yearly, it is apt to lack that united support that is so necessary.

The Rangers have as usual a very strong defence, and it is this that saved them from defeat at the hands of Calcutta. Gasper, Lees and Margaret are about as sound a combination as is at present playing, and it is to be hoped that the lastnamed player's rather nasty accident will not prevent him from taking the field for any length of time. Warden is as good at centre half as usual, but it was surely a mistake playing Schumacher forward. He is a first class half, but a poor forward. The attack as it at present stands is decidedly weak, but I understand it will shortly be strengthened by the inclusion of the brothers Lawton, which will make a deal of difference.

The Y.M.C.A. have not had a very auspicious beginning, and the side as played against Calcutta is distinctly ragged. Reynolds at back was as usual a tower of strength, but his partner, M. Remfry, was too slow for words and is better suited at half. Dyer is probably their best half and of the forwards the only two worth mentioning are Price and Vanspall, the latter being extremely nippy on the left wing.

The two college combinations, St. Xavier's and the Medicals are as good as ever and are probably the smartest teams playing at present; but Seebpore will not be so strong as usual, having lost several of their best players. They have, owing to their absence at the Allahabad show, lost several points in the League, but can always be counted upon to show up prominently in the Belghton Cup Competition.

THE GRAMOPHONE CO.

GENTLEMEN,

The Gramophone of to-day I find is such an improved instrument for recording the human voice to the older machines with which so many of us are familiar, that my hitherto objection to allow the thousands who cannot hear me sing personally to listen to the reproduction of my voice through the instrumentality of your Gramophone is now quite removed, and the Records which you have lately made for me I think are natural reproductions of my voice.

Yours truly,
ADELINA PATTI (Baroness Cederström.)

SIX ROUND CONTEST FOR A PURSE OF Rs. 100.—Pte. Christie, Royal Fusiliers, vs. Pte Cooper, Manchester Regiment.

First Round.—This was an excellent round both, boxing in capital style; it ended, if anything, in favour of Cooper.

Second Round.—Cooper went for his man, giving him some heavy jabs on the face, which evidently nettled him considerably, but he could not retaliate. Christie's tactics in the other rounds were to keep his man in the corner, and having more staying power, try to put him out; but Cooper was not to be had in that way and stuck to his man gamely though he was severely punished. Christie won.

Second Round.—Powell led off effectually, but Harris put in a very lucky right swing, which sent Powell heavily to the boards, but rising to time, exceedingly dazed, Harris forebore inflicting punishment, Powell being hopelessly done. The Referee awarded the fight to Harris. Time—1. min. 24secs

Walster won fairly easily in the second round.

Shows.

MADRAS GYMKHANA HORSE SHOW.

THE annual Madras Gymkhana Horse Show was held on the island last week and proved in every way a great success. The show extended over three days, instead of two as in former years, and the entries, both in numbers and general quality, were quite up to the average. The Hunters and Polo Ponies were both spoken very highly of by the Judges, but in the former classes the entries were not so numerous as usual, while a very large number of Hacks were shown, but their quality was not as high, with the exception of the winning animals, as it might have been. A special feature of the show this year was the jumping. There were two classes—for horses and ponies—and in both the judges said that the performances witnessed had seldom been equalled. Their Excellencies the Governor D Lady Lawley were present every day, with a large party from Government House. The prize for the best Hunter in the show was won by the Rajah of Pittapore's splendid Diplomat, and that for the best pony in the show went to Mr. A F Symonds' Australian mare Cleopata II, and both His Excellency and Miss Lawley won several prizes. The Cups were presented to the winners on Saturday by Sir Arthur Lawley, who congratulated the promoters of the show on the success of their efforts for both in number and quality of exhibits it had broken all records. He mentioned specially the fact that in the jumping classes most of the owners of competitors had ridden their own animals. This, he said, was what he liked to see, as it encouraged true sport—was, in fact the mainspring of such sport. He thanked Major K. H. Elliot, I. M. S, the Honorary Secretary of the show, for his untiring energy, which had done much to ensure its success. Details.—

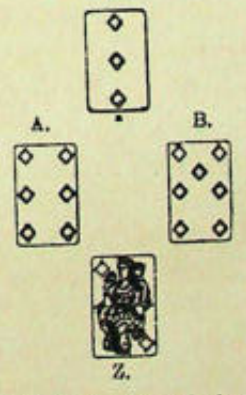
Cards.

BRIDGE.

Solution to Problem No. 24.

THE dealer should lead the 9 or 10 of clubs from Y's hand, as he has no card of entry, in the other suits, and cannot afford to play on the chance of the adverse clubs being evenly divided. If both opponents follow suit, Z, on regaining the lead, puts Y in, makes all his remaining clubs, and goes game without taking the finesse in spades. If A is void of clubs Z can only make two tricks in the suit; but if B is void he will make three, or six if A does not pass the first round. The object of leading the 9 or 10 of clubs instead of a small one is to leave the lead with Dummy for the finesse in spades in case A has all four clubs and holds up the queen and knave to block Y's suit. If led through in diamonds, Dummy will, of course, play an honor.

Problem No. 25.



Score : A B, 0 ; Y Z, 0. Z deals and declares no trumps. Y's and Z's hands are as follows :—

Y's Hand (Dummy).
Hearts—Q.
Diamonds—A, J, 9, 4, 3.
Clubs—K, 7, 6, 5, 3.
Spades—8, 7.

Z's Hand (Dealer).
Hearts—K, J, 8, 2.
Diamonds—Q, 2.
Clubs—A, J, 4.
Spades—A, Q, 9, 3.

The first trick is as follows :—

Trick 1.

How ought the dealer to go on with the hand, and why ?

Scene : Mr. Justice Darling's Court.

Trial of action, Bisman vs. England, 13, 2, 05.

Mr. McCall, K.C., for plaintiff, Mr. Lush, K.C., for defendant.

Mr. Lush (on defendant's case) : "We have heard a lot during the course of this action of a Mr. Virgo, but I notice that my learned friend has neglected to call him."

Mr. McCall : "Not likely my lord when Mr. Lush's clients have got a proof from him."

Mr. J. Darling : "Do you intend to call him, Mr. Lush ?"

Mr. Lush : "No, my lord."

Mr. J. Darling : "As neither of you gentlemen propose to call him, he remains a 'virgo intacta.'"

A question of descent. A Yorkshire nobleman, who was fond of boasting of Norman descent, said to one of his tenants the other day, whom he thought was not addressing him with proper respect : "Do you know, fellow, that my ancestors came over with William the Conqueror ?" "And perhaps," retorted the sturdy Saxon, "they found mine here when they comed."

DR. WARRE ON ROWING AND COACHING.

AS we stated in our last issue Dr. Warre, the late Head Master of Eton, has been giving a lecture on rowing and coaching to the College boat clubs of Oxford, a subject which would appeal with special force to boating men at the time when the Varsity eights have begun their home practice for the race to be rowed on the 16th of this month. Dr. Warre is a man who can speak with authority on the subject. Fifty years ago he was among the best oarsmen at Oxford and later he became president of the O. U. B. C. He has always taken the keenest interest in rowing and has watched the development of the modern style of oarsmanship from its beginning. Dr. Warre's rowing career and the modern racing ship are indeed about the same age. Clasper had invented outriggers ten or eleven years before—1845—and had thus given greater speed: but the outrigger did not bring about any change in the style of rowing then in vogue. The change of style was brought about after 1856 when Mr. Littledale and Mat Taylor, a ship's carpenter, who had adopted boat building as a calling, evolved the smooth-skinned keelless boat which was first used at Henley in that year by the Royal Chester Rowing Club crew for the Grand Challenge Cup, which they won thanks, largely as was generally allowed, to the superiority of the new build of boat. The Littledale-Taylor boat revolutionised boat building for racing purposes, and it did more; it revolutionised the style of rowing. Dr. Warre is one of the few men living who has had practical acquaintance with the old style of race rowing and the modern; and is certainly the best authority on the two. The removal of the keel and the adoption of a shallower ship compelled the change in style; the old boat was not easily upset; the keelless craft would turn over so readily that the first care of the crew was to keep their ship balanced; steadier work was entailed; and a new style of using the oar, it was soon realised, was necessary in order to get the best pace out of the boat. It says much for the discernment and practical knowledge of the designers of the 1856 boat that the shell of today remains, in all essential particulars, unchanged. The sliding seat which came into use in 1872 threw more work upon the legs, but that in effect meant that the work was more generally distributed over the whole frame of the rower; it did little or nothing to alter the style of rowing or to increase the speed. This latter assertion we are aware is opposed to popular belief; but comparison of the "times" of the University Boat Race—the most accessible rowing records—for a series of say five years before and after 1873, the year in which sliding seats were first used by the crews, will show that there is nothing to choose between the times made in the boats with fixed and boats with sliding seats ; though, by a curious coincidence the race in 1873, was rowed in the fastest time known to that date, namely 19 minutes 35 secs. This "record" remained unbroken until 1892 when Oxford won in 19 mins. 21secs.

Dr. Warre, as we all rowing men know, has views of his own on the subject of boat building, but he does not appear to have touched upon these in his lecture. It will be remembered that his convictions in favour of a boat shorter than the accepted length, 62 feet or thereabout, by five or six feet prevailed with the O. U. B. C. in 1901 when the Dark Blues rowed in a "short boat" and won a very severe race in rough waters by two fifths of a length : also that a short boat of Dr. Warre's design was used in 1902 when Oxford was badly beaten in smooth water by five lengths. It is, we need hardly say impossible to decide how much of the success of 1901 was due to the boat and how much of the defeat in the following year. Of course there was a section of rowing opinion which gave the boat all the credit in 1901 : and equally there was a section of opinion which laid upon it all the blame in 1902. More dispassionate judges seemed to be of opinion that the Oxford crew won on their own merits in the former year and were beaten on their merits in 1902. On the whole the concensus of opinion was against the shorter boat : it was observed by those who watched the race carefully that the Cambridge craft was always travelling whereas the Oxford ship wanted "punching along"; and gave the men none of the assistance they derive from a boat of the orthodox length : further it was thought that the shortened craft was not big enough for a heavy crew. Whether the boat deserved the credit for the win in rough water or the blame for defeat in smooth is one of those things nobody can pretend to decide : the facts remains that the shortend boat was discarded and has not again been used. It would be too much to say that Dr. Warre's boat has been condemned as a failure, but it may fairly be said that it did not confer such conspicuous advantage on the users as to justify them in renouncing a well proved type of craft for one which must still be regarded as experimental.

Dr. Warre, so far as the somewhat meagre reports of his lecture at our disposal show, is fully alive to the necessity of having a boat to fit the crew. He dwelt at some length, we are told, on the initial duty of the coach, which is to see that everything in the boat is properly adjusted, seats at the right height, stretchers at the right length for each man, and so forth. As a coach Dr. Warre has no equal, and much of his address was directed to those who undertake to teach the young idea how to row. There are few coaches who do not by instinct adopt the right main lines of proceeding with an onerous and difficult task ; where the majority fail, comparatively speaking, is in attempting too much at once : nobody can doubt that it arises from anxiety to do well by their charge, but the fact remains that many coaches seek to correct too many faults at the same time. The ideal coach is like the ideal Master of Hounds; at once an archangel and intensely human he must be endued with infinite tact, patience, good humour and firmness : he must have intimate practical knowledge of his subject and a reputation as an oarsman to give weight to his instruction, and that is only the foundation course of his acquirements and qualities ; he must, above all things, be able to teach ; in rowng as in other matters, whether trigonometry or shooting the art of teaching for it is an art, is indispensable. Some are born with it, and if born with it, they can acquire the rest, others have all the rest, but were not born with the teacher's peculiar gift, and these latter, if they cannot acquire it were best advised to refrain from attempting to coach. The position of the rowing coach is particularly important because each man of the eight probably has his own little peculiarities which must be softened down in order that he may fit into his place as one of a coordinated whole. It is not difficult to teach one man to row in tolerable style, it is difficult to mould him into the form of the rest of the crew ; he is dependent on the coach to a much greater extent than other pupils: he cannot see what others are doing and model his style upon, or correct his faults by observation of their methods. Hence the great necessity for the coach to be able to make his directions, often necessarily somewhat loose by reason of the deficiencies of our language, which does not enable us to express fine shades of meaning, perfectly clear and understanded of his pupils.

Sporting Notes.

IT is perhaps not yet too late to comment on the past paperchasing season, as its principal events are at any rate fresh in the minds of Calcutta readers. Captain Holden carried on the traditions of the Bodyguard by winning the big Cup and his success was doubly popular, since the Bodyguard, and indeed the Viceroy's Staff generally, have for many years passed been good and valued friends to Calcutta paperchasers. Captain Holden is himself a genuine paperchaser, by which is understood that he rides his horses regularly and fairly week by week and takes his chances with the rest in addition to supporting the Hunter Races which have done so much to revive and sustain the interest taken in paperchasing.

His horse Lord Harry has now shewn himself to be the best chaser in the town and fully deserved his long succession of victories ; furthermore he has been at no disadvantage in respect of his rider as Captain Holden has to be reckoned with nowadays as an experienced and fine horseman, who has profited by the opportunities that have crowded upon him during the past two or three years.

Another fine hunter is Dr. Forsyth's Corydon and it is rather a pity that he was not set to race against Lord Harry over the Tollygunge Course, but the Doctor natuarlly likes to have the riding of his hunters himself and is content with his annual race for the Cup. The runners up in both the Light and Heavy divisions this year may congratulate themselves on knowing that they have been beaten by exceptional horses and that in an average year they could have defeated all comers.

The Light Horse Paperchase Cup brought out a very sporting field of which Fairy disposed in summary fashion. Without grudging Mr. Ballantyne his double victory, we may perhaps suggest that the conditions of this chase should always exclude Paperchase Cup winners in order to give the beginners some sort of a chance. The chase on Friday last proved more or less of a fiasco simply because Fairy went to the front about half a mile from the start and cut out a pace which simply throttled the chargers behind her. The result was wild jumping, falls and refusals at every fence until nothing was left but Jorrocks and a very small tail of beaten, but quite undisgraced horses and riders. With a more level field the majority would probably have succeed in negotiating the course in company.

The Sardinia took away from Calcutta two very useful and popular members of the Calcutta Turf Club in Messrs. J. Stewart and A. G. Macpherson. With so many racing men on leave this summer their places on the Executive will not be very easy to fill, but so long as Messrs. Apcar, Dickson, Deakin, Bates and Paris remain in town we have a working nucleus which can be very confidently relied upon to carry on the work successfully.

R. Morison, the Jockey, has got into trouble in Rangoon. Last Saturday his riding of Mr. W. B. Green's Flo in the Tharawaddy Handicap caused his suspension for the day and an enquiry which is to be referred to Calcutta. Flo is said to have been pulled.

To be gored by a gaur was the fate of Mr. J. T. Lewis, Chief Engineer of the S. I. Railway, shooting in the Cochin Forest, on the 13th instant, he shot a big gaur which fell, but, recovering, he charged the shikari, severely goring him in the stomach. Mr. Lewis is now in hospital in a critical condition.

The Punjab Infantry Polo Tournament resulted in the victory of the 53rd Sikhs who beat the Guides Infantry by 2 goals and 3 subsidiaries to 2 goals and 2 subsidiaries.

The teams were composed as follows:—53rd Sikhs—Mr. Prescot, Major Davis, Captain Milward and Major Ferguson Davie. Guides Infantry—Mr. Hensley, Mr. Banks, Major Codrington and Mr. Kirkpatrick.

At the conclusion of the game General Sir Edward Barrow congratulated the Sikhs on their success and on keeping the Cup in the Peshawar Division. He remarked that out of the ten occasions that the

Some "simple villagers" Jubbulpore way have, we hope, struck a snag this time. A Jubbulpore correspondent reports that while Colonel Pennyquick Lloyd, P.M.O., was out shooting in the district he accidently shot a native woman in the leg, none of the pellets, however, breaking the skin. He was surrounded by people of the village who took away his gun, but on the headman appearing the gun was returned. The villagers refused to allow him to proceed until he gave up his watch, to be returned when he sent the compensation demanded. Money was accordingly sent to the village, but marked. The place was surrounded by the police who arrested 25 men in possession of marked money and brought them into Jubbulpore charging them with being dacoits. Most excellent!

A Nuwara Eliya correspondent wrote to the Ceylon Observer on the 7th March:—Up to date 14,000 young fry have been hatched out of the 20,000 brown trout ova brought out by the Moldavia, 50 to 60 ova go bad daily and it is expected to hatch out 19,000 fry from the consignment. This constitutes a record and is the best result ever known since ova was first imported.

In connection with the Shooting Rules for the United Provinces, "Soldier" writes to our Allahabad contemporary:—

"I notice you are having further correspondence on the above subject. May I ask your readers to peruse the excellent letter signed 'U. P' in the Indian Field of 3rd January last? So exhaustive and so clear and sound that it might well be copied into every newspaper in India. I may make a confession and say that, before reading it, I thought some services had been unduly favoured before to the detriment of soldiers and other non-officials, but have now changed my opinion. The whole thing is now impossible. Even when marching with a regiment if the halting ground is close to a reserved forest, you cannot enter it to shoot a pheasant or a kaka unless you have first procured a permit. Let all the forests be free as before. What is wanted is a game licence and not ridiculous rules full of every kind of restriction. If absolutely necessary make sanctuaries, but nothing else. The real offenders are the native shikaries, and the new rules do not get at these gentlemen at all. Leave the Forest Officers to perform their legitimate duties instead of turning them into game-keepers."

Many old Calcutta men will have read with pleasure the announcement in the Statesman that Mr. L. C. Baines is returning to Calcutta. An all round sportsman and muscle-merchant was the redoubtable "Jimmy" what time he tasted tea in this city and filled in his leisure with boxing, swimming, football, rowing and volunteering, at all of which he was a front ranker. On the concert platform he was a great success at times, and he used to play the banjo more than ordinarily well.

Mr. W. S. Burke's Scottish Terrier Charnock Lassie on the 5th instant, threw four pups—three dogs and a bitch—to his Charnock Wee Macgregor who so distinguished himself at the recent Championship Show of the Calcutta Kennel Club. Lassie is a fashionably bred one. On her sire's side she comes of the famous Clydeford Rebel stock, her grandsire being Clydeford Tonic. Clydeford Rebel was by Regent—Charybdis, by Heather Prince and was bought for £150 by Mr. J. Smith. Through her dam (Cairntable Fanny) Lassie claims descent from the Warrender's Tibb family which produced such good stud dogs as Ch. Gair and Geyser II. her grandsire on the dam's side.

The Inter-Regimental Polo Tournament was won by the 10th Hussars, who beat the 15th Hussars by 5 goals to 4 goals and 3 subsidiaries. Details further on.

A result of the recent strike at our press was our utter inability to publish last week the usual "Form at a Glance" of the past season's racing in Calcutta. It was set up, but with the paucity of hands could not be corrected in time. We offer it now with apologies and regrets.

The latest fish story is the following:—While obtaining stone from the Clunch Pit, Pirton, Herts, a party of parishioners who are engaged in restoring the parish church, under the leadership of the vicar (the Rev. E. W. Langmore), made a remarkable discovery. On splitting a huge block of stone, they found embedded in it a fish about 12 inches long. Though it has, obviously, been encased for many hundreds of years, the fish is perfect in form, and its scales are still silvery and natural in appearance. The body is as hard as flint.

Someone was asking, "Where are they,
Those Kings of Sport of yesterday?
Simple their tastes; their wishes few;
Steady their aim; their eyesight true.
A brace of dogs, and a single gun,
Were all they asked to share their fun.
Under the trees,
A pleasant breeze,
A sandwich or some bread and cheese.
Have they gone with the years that are far away,
Those Kings of Sport of yesterday?"

And someone answered, "See, I pray,
The pampered sportsman of to-day.
Conceit and swagger; a jealous shot,
Creeping near where the corner's hot.
Two guns, a loader, a cosy butt;
A sumptuous feast in a rainproof hut.
Fizz and old port.
This is his sport!
Scarcely enjoyed and dearly bought."
A third voice murmured in real dismay,
"Then no true sportsman lives to-day!"

Recently there have been complaints from dog owners in Calcutta regarding the indiscriminate dog poisoning which has resulted in the destruction of valuable and harmless pets. Of course the authorities will point to the public notice regarding "Dogs Found Straying" but what is "straying?" Can an obviously owned, dog with a collar, be rightly considered to be straying if found within a few yards of his owner's gate when he is, perchance, attending to such legitimate business as may require his presence on the public highway? We should say not. But whatever may be the rights of the question it is evident that the destruction of dogs is not entrusted to the right class of person; also it is apparent that the operations are conducted at the wrong time of day. We have seen European policemen and domes at their fell work of offering poisoned sweetmeats to pariahs before 8 A.M. Now this is a time when the pariah is peculiarly alert and wary and we have witnessed the rejection of the tempting morsel by the intended victim. True we have seen the bait retrieved by the dome, to be reserved for the next likely pi; but a crow or kite might swoop down on it and drop it into any compounded or terrace where any domestic pet, or even child, might be sacrificed! It seems to us that the dog killers might with the minimum of effort, and with a vast saving of time, make really big "bags" if they conducted operations say at noon when the weary pi is slumbering in the shade. Almost any day, at any time beween midday and 2 P.M. three or four stray pariahs are to be seen asleep on the steps of the Holwell monument; half a dozen more are similarly employed on the shady side of Bankshall Street near the Small Cause Court, as many more near the High Court, the Town Hall, and under the big trees on the maidan. We have observed them and marked them down for weeks. We do not profess to be expert at the game, but in an amateur way we would guarantee in a couple of hours—between noon and 2 o'clock—to rid the city of twenty-five of these dangerous pests. We respectifully offer the tip to Mr. Halliday and his merry band of exterminators.

The Subalterns' Polo Tournament brought together in the finals, the 10th Hussars and the 12th Lancers, the Hussars winning by 2 goals and 2 subsidiaries to 1 goal and 1 subsidiary. Details in our Polo column.

A correspondent writes from the Native State of Karauli:—"We bagged a tigress yesterday and the day's sport was interesting, if only for the manner in which a pack of dogs assisted us in attaining our end. The tigress was wounded and had taken refuge in a ravine affording a fair amount of cover. The beaters failed to dislodge her, and she was in such an unpleasant temper that they were withdrawn and the pack turned in. I could see the whole proceeding from the bank of the ravine. The pack were just a miscellaneous lot of pies, no Banjaras or other dogs of any sort of breed, but they were big, powerful animals, and not without gameness as the sequel shows. They were all dogs in sex, no bitches. I was told that bitches do not answer the purpose so well, are less staunch and more uncertain. The Maharajah uses the pack for tiger and pig, and says he loses more dogs from boars than from tigers. Just before they are loosed, they are given some masala, probably bhang, it is possible this may tend to render them more indifferent to their fate. They don't give tongue, but hunt silently and only growl and bay when the quarry is found. On this occasion one of the dogs first scented the tigress, who was lying up under a bush, and then the whole pack surrounded the position. One large, black pie, more venturesome than the rest, then went into attack at close quarters and was instantly killed. Still, though worried or nipped at from all sides, she refused to bolt, and eventually, catching sight of her as she made a dash to punish one of her assailants, I was able to put a couple of bullets into her from a distance of twenty yards. She was an old tigress and measured 8ft. 7th. As long as she was alive, the dogs exercised a certain amount of caution, but the instant my bullets laid her out they closed and worried to their hearts' content. I must say the pack of mongrels, or whatever you like to call them, did useful service and saved us what otherwise might have been a very nasty job. Excepting the one dog mentioned as having been killed outright at the first onset, the rest suffered no serious injuries of any kind, the pack appeared to be just game enough and not too game for their business, and I can imagine that employed in this way they may be often useful in bringing a wounded tiger to bag. I think you may be interested in the incident as showing how dogs are used in a Native State for following up dangerous game."

We note with satisfaction that powers have been conferred on the Customs authorities to examine parcels suspected of containing feathers and skins of such birds, the trade in which is prohibited, it having leaked out that in spite of the law large consignments still go forward. We are inclined to go a step further and suggest that district officers should be empowered to cancel the gun licenses of those engaged in the feather trade. Dyeing has now attained such perfection that milliners can easily meet the wants of those who seek to deck themselves out in emulation of Cherowkee Indians with headgear formed from from the feathers of domestic poultry, without demanding a continuance of practices which, unless checked, will render birds of bright hue as extinct as the dodo.

Brown had returned from a fishing expedition and, after partaking of a most welcome dinner, was relating some of his experiences.

"Last year," said he, "while fishing for pike, I dropped half a sovereign. I went to the same place this year, and after my line had been cast a few minutes I felt a terrific pull. Eventually I landed a fine pike, which had swallowed the hook, and on cutting it open to release the hook, to my amazement——"

"Ah," said his friend, "you found a half-sovereign."

"Oh, no," replied Brown; "I found nine shilling and sixpence in silver and threepence in coppers."

"Well, what became of the other threepence?" queried his friends.

"I suppose the pike paid to go through the lock with it," answered Brown.

Our Bombay correspondent writes:—For the eleventh extra, there were nine events on the card with some huge fields, and some good finishes were seen.

In the first of the Strangers' Selling Plates, Glass jumped away with a nice lead which he made into a fairly substantial one, but there was no shaking the favourite off when he came. He is a very racy looking grey, suggesting staying ability and should turn out another Lamond in time. There was no bidding however, in fact throughout the selling races there seemed no anxiety to buy on the part of owners. There was no getting away from Spearmint in the first New Comers' Handicap despite the 9-10 he had to carry. Once more Madrid quite failed to stay, but is useful over just a furlong shorter, whereas Spearmint settled Salanic's hash and had practically won his race when express put in his late run.

The uncertainty of the 14-2s has been as upsetting as the new ponies, but such a strong run was there on Comback that this was thought to be another such as Russley Rose won the time before. From the raising of the barrier Filbert and Russley Rose were out of it and little Achievement cut out the pace. When the favourite cut in between her and Welsh Love it was thought to be all over, but a disturbing element propped up in Koko whom Heeroo steered nicely into the berth on the rails. At the distance the result was apparent and Koko romped in again to land outsiders' odds.

The new pony races that followed were a contrast to the first two, being of a most disastrous nature. After a great deal of uncertainty, Kawakib was made favourite for the second New Comers' Handicap with Poseidon and Meerjan fancied. With Robert Macaire hopelessly left, Rabliss made the pace till the half mile where the 20 to 1 chance, Gopal, came out and going on won absolutely any how with Meerjan beating two more outsiders in Zir and Dhamas; the race was run in the remarkably smart time, for any Arab, of 1min. 21⅗ secs.

The Lingfield Plate was where punters really scored when they made Chassepot a warm favourite in a field of half a dozen, though I may say he was lucky to win. The time, 1min. 56secs., was our-fifths of a second faster than Ballark's time in the Grand Wstern.

From now onwards it was a case of outsiders and, in a field of seventeen, Highborn was favourite and nowhere for the Thannah Plate. Tachreet was also backed, but he fell away at the bend from where we saw one of the most open races possible. Some eight at least were in a dead line at the distance where Little Joker showed out only to fall away to Young Gazelle but he also was passed and that almost on the post by Sir Jamal who came on the extreme outside of the line and landed odds of twenties.

In the Callian Plate of a mile, so fast did Monsoon make the pace that Commander's time in the Second Dealer's was broken by a fifth of a second by a new pony after a desperate finish.

Only five went out for the Auction Plate with Epitome a warm favourite from old Blue Blood, who does not look the picture she was three years ago. Epitome and Frelance got badly away and Blue Blood made the running from the rank outsider Rossi who came away in the run home in very easy manner to win in the classy time of 1min. 15secs.—a further proof of the fast track at Mahaluxmi.

The Jackal Club Point-to-Point Meeting took place at Marole on Saturday when there was a very fair attendance though the day was unfortunately a race day. During the evening Lord Lamington put in an appearance and altogether a very pleasant time was passed.

As usual, the two Jumping Competitions came first and the one for horses was won by Lieut.-Col. Forbes on his bay, Khala, who made such a good impression in the Horse Show, beating Mr. Armstrong's Blarney. The Pony event was also won by one of those who scored in the Horse Show, Mr. W. E. Palmer's Inspiration, who once more gave his rider trouble only to clear beautifully once his mind was made up.

The Hunt Cup for horses over a 4 mile course was the first of the races and this was eventually won by an old warrior in Kingfisher ridden by that game sportsman, Mr. Symons, who came in for quite an ovation. He got away very badly, but making up his ground in grand style and, passing Mr. Turnbull on Tomtit and Captain Fellows on Chorister, won a good race.

Several old favourites were seen at the start for the Pony Hunt Cup in which Mr. Stewart had a very nasty fall. It was a pretty easy win for that well-known performer, Akbar Khan, steered by his owner.

Lastly came the open Point-to-Point for horses in which Mr. Moore, again secured a win on Sir Brian, a big, shapely bay belonging to Mr. T. L. Roberts beating Mr. Tournbull on Tomtit. Mrs. Donald Graham presented the prizes after a good day's sport.

The annual Hunters flat race at the Twelfth Extra was exceptionally interesting and ended in quite a good race. Good Luck was sent out from Lady Jenkins' Hoaxer, the former made no sort of a show at any part of the journey. Capt. Meynell could not have ridden a better judged race and amongst the first four at the bend came up and won by half a length, with plenty in hand.

A very hot thing went down in the big race, the Goodwood Plate in which, Projective was backed as though the race was over, not long after the start, however, Rustile assumed command and was never headed. In a field such as this, the 1min 2 secs in which it was done was surprisingly slow and had Vocalist not got off in the ruck I think he might have given them a further jar.

The Lanowli Plate was a very open betting race fives the field being on offer with Berlin, King Cobweb and Egypt most in demand. Alf Hoyt rode a very nice race and after allowing Egypt and Panala to make the pace, only had Ajax to beat which he did comfortably. The Selling Handicap looked very open: though after Freelance and Rossi had made the pace, Shotover came away in the easiest of manners and gave his stable a very nice win.

The Little Arab Plate gave full confirmation, about the honesty of Vedas. Receiving five pounds from him, Mudlool was made a shade better favourits, but was badly beaten at the finish; Vedas lay third till the three furlongs where he came into the lead and literally wore Mudlool down.

The second division was an upset; after Highborn and Vasco had been well backed, Sahoon jumped away at a great pace and took a commanding lead but when Highborn came up at the bend he looked a winner. And so he would have been had he kept straight, but he finished nearly on the tan whereas Sahoon gamely struggled on near the rails and secured a half length verdict. All the three nursery handicaps were in favour of punters.

A further step has an last been made in the Amateur, championship at Pyrke's Saloon and the final of the eliminating rounds has at last been reached. The first of the semi-finals was between Messrs. P. Fischer and Avery on Wednesday when one cannot say the form was too good or the game either. The former is by no means in form and after losing the lead from the start was always playing an up hill game. To be fair, it must be acknowledged Avery had all the best of the luck, but made far less use of it than one might expect from a man, who has gained quite a reputation. On nearing the fourth century he began to go away and led by 100 when within fifty of game. Now however, Fischer brought off some nice shots, especially cannons, and in the end was by no means disgraced, the final scores being Avery 500, Fischer 442.

The best game seen to date, and the best likely to be seen, was that between Messrs Louth and Hargreaves the former a brilliant player in want of practise and the latter a rare sticker who seems to score whenever he goes to the table. With fortune favouring him, Hargeaves went away from the first and reached 100 with his opponent at half that Then, however, Louth showed a bit of his form with a delightful 45 which included a variety of shots, as he never really got them together to his liking. Shortly after he took the lead and the next moment went clear away with a brilliant compilation of 67 which ended, as these breaks usually do, with an absurdly easy in off at the top pocket. During this his in offs at the middle pockets were delightfully clean and with well judged strength; the concluding portion being at the top where his finessing was a treat to watch. From now however he did nothing and with dogged perseverence Hagreaves gradually decreased the gap till the game was in a tremendously exciting condition, the score was 483-476 against Louth when he went to the table for what turned out to be the last time. In going in off he at once lost the white, but with the red nicely placed for the middle right pocket, he played it which such perfect strength that going in off seven times, he ran out with a break of 25 unfinished. The final scores were Louth 500 Hargreaves 483. Louth's best efforts were:—67, 25 (unfinished) 21 and 20 (twice). Hargreaves:—25, 22 and 21 three times.

If Louth can only play a little more consistently the cup may be his. He and Avery meet on Monday, the winner to play the holder, Pyrke.

FULL details of the Bengal Lawn Tennis Championships are published in another place. Mr. E. M. Atkinson won the singles and he and Captain B. O. Roe were successful in the Doubles.

The final match in the Punjab Commission Cup Tournament was won by the Jat Sikh Regiments. In the course of a short speech, before Lady Clark presented the Cup, Mr. Justice Robertson said:—

"I think the history of this Cup is now well known to you all. It was presented eight years ago to the Panjab Army, first as a token of the good will of the members of the Punjab Commission to their military brethren, and secondly to encourage cricket throughout that body. Our desire has always been that every member of the Panjab Army, of whatever branch or rank or nationality, should have a chance of playing for the Cup and forming one of a winning team. We took a British Infantry Battalion as our unit of strength and endeavoured to form other branches, corps and departments into groups which should have as far as possible equal chance of success. For seven years however the Cup went to the hitherto unconquerable British Infantry, but this year it has gone elsewhere and we are sure that our friends the British Infantry will not misunderstand us when we say that we are glad to see another branch getting a turn after all these years. We want to see the Cup go round, and while we hope that the British Infantry will have their fair share of success we shall be very glad to see teams from the Gurkhas, Indian Cavalry, R. A. M. C. and other groups successful in their turn. The winners and the runners up are both to be congratulated on having put good teams into the field in a most sporting manner under great difficulties and we heartily congratulate the "Fighting Sikhs" on their well earned success."

As an example of churlishness the following is pretty fair. At the recent B. P. A. A. A. sports a boy belonging to the—no we will not mention the school—won a medal in one of the races; he did not appear when his name was called at the prize giving, and a day or two afterwards the Hon. Sec. notified the Principal of the fact that he had a medal for one of his boys. Up to date no sign has been made either by pedagogue or pupil! This is the sort of thing that prompts the consideration whether it is really worth while including the Schools events in the programme of these sports. Everything is done to encourage a taste for outdoor sport that the Association can well do. Three races are framed, a magnificent shield is put up, silver and bronze medals are awarded, the competitors pay no entrance fees and all schools in charge of masters are admitted free to see the sports. There have not been wanting occasions during the period of training, when certain young ruffians have disgraced themselves and their schools by exhibitions of malicious destructiveness and other misdeeds. One has, of course, to make allowance for the lower code of schoolboy morality prevailing out here, but surely discourtesy of the kind here indicated does not meet with general approval among those who teach and are taught at our Calcutta schools?

Corpl. G. Smith of the Devonshire Regiment and Sam Newman boxed to a draw in the Jubilee Hall, Rangoon last Saturday. The talent displayed was pretty fair, Smith was leading on points up to the tenth round after which Newman got in much good work and drew level at the finish.

The final tie in the Laver Hockey Cup Tournament was played at Secunderabad on the 14th instant when the Manchesters met and defeated the Gymkhana by a goal to nil.

General Hamilton, before presenting the cup, said there had been a very keen competition for Mr. Laver's cup. Twelve teams as against nine last year had entered. The game between the Rajputs and Pioneers, combined officers' team against the Lincolns was the best ever seen in Secunderabad. He regretted very much that the Lincolns lost possession of the cup in this match by a penalty goal, but that was the fortune of war and the fault was their own. They would have all been more satisfied, however, had the Lincolns been beaten in the ordinary way. The greatest credit was due to the Rajputs and Pioneers for putting in such a strong team of officers. He congratulated the Manchesters on their win. Undoubtedly they had the best of the game all through and deserved the prize.

The Murray Football Tournament ended in a win for the Carabiniers who beat the Royal Welsh Regiment in the final (after a draw) by 2 goals to 1. Details are given in the usual place.

In connection with the final in the Panjab Commision Cup Cricket Tournament, which ended on the 6th instant in a win for the Jat and Sikh Regiments by 111 runs, it is interesting to record that a bowling performance quite out of the common was accomplished by Mr. E. H. Lancaster, of the Supply and Transport Corps team, who in the second innings of the winning team captured all ten wickets.

The directors of the City of Glasgow Life Assurance Company have issued their sixty-eighth annual report. During 1906, 975 policies assuring £367,885 with premiums of £17,553 were issued. £5,904 was received in respect of annuities granted for £730. The claims which arose by the death of 264 policyholders amounted, with bonus additions, to £171,683. £25,251 became payable under endowment assurance policies which matured in the lifetime of the assured. After writing £15,319 off the values of investment the accumulated funds increased during the year by £66,703, and amounted at the end of the year to £2,966,207. The average annual rate of interest earned on the funds, including uninvested balances was £4 1s 6d. per cent., and the ratio of expenses to premium income was 15 per cent. The liabilities of the company under life assurance and annuity contracts were again valued by the Om and Oa tables with 3 per cent. interest. The life assurance fund exceeded the total of these liabilities by £71,550, of which it is recommended that £43,723 be divided and £27,827 carried forward.

London Week by Week.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

Friday, 1st March 1907.

WRITING on the eve of what we are assured in season and out of season is the most momentous election of recent years, one's predominant feeling is one of pious thankfulness that at last the end is in sight, and another twenty-four hours will see the contest at an end; the fate of the London rate-payer decided for good or evil; and last, though by no means least, that we cannot in the nature of things, have another L.C.C. election before 1910. For weeks past this election has been an obsession, from which escape has been impossible. Report says the noble army of canvassers — of both sexes, and of all classes who have been impressed into the service is far larger, on both sides, than has ever been known before, even at a General Election. Signs are not lacking that the small shop keeper, and even the British workman who has anything to lose, are becoming alive to the socialist danger.

One would fain hope that the tactics which impelled the Socialistic hooligans in their attempt to break up the meeting in Trafalgar Square on Saturday were those of despair but that comfortable theory scarcely holds water in face of the fact that the same tactics were ressorted to by the same honourable party at the General Election, when their position cannot, with truth, be described as having been a desperate one. Their chief hope undoubtly lies in preventing certain stern, unpleasant, facts being effectually brought home to the great mass of the rate-payers; and the appearance of the Khaki-coloured dummy steam boat distinctly damaged by collisions with many piers; of the dummy house, built of London County Council bricks, and falling into ruins; of the banners made of the now famous L. C. C. blankets; and hods full of the no less famous Norbury bricks, was distinctly inopportune and inconvenient. By the way a certain mystery attached to the fate of the unfortunates hod men with the bricks or rather to that of their remains. A daily paper, describing the row, is responsible for the following appalling statement: "The men with the blankets banners were hustled and the blanket torn to pieces. The same fate befell the hodmen with the bricks.

While Mr. Haldane is taking considerable trouble to divest himself of any surviving particle of confidence that Unionists may have had in him, he is gaining the questianoble reputation of being the most long-winded of ministers. He broke the record on Monday night when he spoke for over three hours in explanation of his plans for again throwing Militia and Volunteers into the melting pot. All that he had to say could have been more clearly said in half the time, and he paid the penalty of talking too long by finishing his speech to half empty benches.

One sentence in his speech—inserted probably with an eye to Mr. Keir Hardie and the other gentlemen of the Labour party—should be noted as showing the spirit of the War Minister with whom we are blessed; "we do not wish to encourage anything like the military spirit" says Mr. Haldane.

Sirs,—In reply to your enquiry as to whether I have derived satisfaction from your Alterative Horse Powders, I beg to say I should not have sent for other lots had I not found them beneficial for their intended purpose. I don't approve of physicing horses, but these Powders seem to possess a harmless and special virtue. The object of your enquiry being to use my reply as a testimonial, you are at liberty to do so for what anybody may think my opinion worth.

I am, yours faithfully,

A lurid imagination is hardly necessary to picture the smug approval of the Nonconformist Conscience at the pronouncement, and the varied feelings with which it will be received in Japan and Germany.

The Adelphi has returned to its old love and Mr. Hall Caine provides the necessary melodrama. On Tuesday evening a large and enthusiastic audience welcomed the revival of "The Prodigal Son," which had such a successful run at Drury Lane about eighteen months ago. The revival does not at all points resemble the Drury Lane production. A few changes have been made in the cast; Mr. Walter Hampden taking Mr. George Alexander's place in the part of Oscar Stephenson, and Miss Florence Wood replacing Mrs. John Wood as Margaret Neilson. Miss Cecil Cromwell plays Helga Neilson formerly taken by Miss Nancy Price. Mr. Frank Cooper is again Magnus and plays with his usual power, carrying the action along with vigour and sincerity, Miss Lily Hall Caine, who has immensely improved since she was seen in the part at Drury Lane, is agained Thora and Elin. On Tuesday night her acting was really admirable and she spoke her lines, with a few exceptions finely. The piece is improved by sundry curtailments which might, perhaps, have been carried further with advantage The only tableau retained is that in which Magnus finds Oscar praying by the bedside of his dead wife. The carnival disappears from the third act, and in fact the whole act might be suppressed without serious loss of interest, so diffuse is the play. The piece is well mounted, and is evidently in for a new lease of life.

The New Royalty which was new many, many years ago— is just now a proof that, given what they want, the public are quite willing to make the journey to a theatre a little off the beaten, track. M. de Ferandy's French company which is playing here for a week, is attracting large audiences. M. D. Ferandy opened his short season on Monday night with "Les affaires sont les Affaires," in which he made such a marked success about a year ago. M. de Ferandy was the original player of the part of Isidore Lechat, and on Monday night his personation of the unscrupulous, vulgar, hard-headed, vainglorious financeir was as astonishingly real as ever. Mdlle. Van Doren, who has the advantage of an extremely graceful and striking appearance, played the part of Germaine with much distinction, and the Mdme Lechat of Mdme Marie Laure was excellent. On Wednesday M. de Ferandy presented "L' Age Difficile" and last night "L' Avare with an extremely good cast. M. de Ferandy, good throughout, was especially strong in the great scene where Harpagon finds he has been robbed; the fall of the curtain being followed by a storm of applause. Moliere's comedy was preceded by "Monseigneur en Vacances" a pretty little sentimental comedy in one act, by' M. Joles Claretie, which gave M. de Ferandy, an opportunity of which he made good use of showing his remarkable gift of playing with subtlety and delicacy. "Blanchette," a new play by M. Brieux, is to be a given this evening.

Mr. Oscar Asche opened a week's visit to the Kennington Theatre on Monday night with "The Taming of the Shrew." The performance was full of vigour, and was received with delight by a large audience. Mr. Asche is physically well suited to the methods he adopts as Petruchie, and Miss Lily Brayton played up to him admirably. Miss Agnes Brayton made a charming Bianca, the parts of her two suitors Gremio and Hortensio, being played with all due humour by Mr. Caleb Porter and Mr. Reginald Penny. Yesterday afternoon, Mr. Asche presented "Othello," appearing himself in the title role. His version of the play differed from most of those to which we are accustomed, but nevertheless it is a good working one, and illustrates more vividly than do most others, the truth that there are unions against which nature sets her face. The "Othello" of Mr. Asche, with his gigantic frame his black face with flashing teeth, and his uncouth, curious gestures, never for a moment allows the audience to forget the revolting unnatural character of the marriage, and the interest of the play gains enormously thereby. Mr. Asche was specially good in the third act It is a long time since Miss Lily Brayton has had a character so well suited to her powers as is that of Desdemona. Her rendering of the part is almost ideal—tender, innocent, altogether pretty,—and also altogether ineffectual. Mr. Braydone, as Tago, shared honours with Mr. Asche. The play, which had an enthusiastic reception from a crowded house, will be repeated to night. Next week, "His House in Order" will be the attraction at Kennington, it having been withdrawn from the St. James's on Wednesday.

Miss's Gladys Unger's play "Mr. Sheridan," with Mr. Bourchier in the title role, is promised at the Garrick next Wednesday. It is in four acts: the first two taking place in the library of Sheridan's house at Wanstead, the third at a ball, and the fourth at "The Happy Hymen" Inn at Gretna Green. Report says that Mr. Bourchier intends to make up for the part on the lines of the well-known portrait of Sheridan in the National Portrait Gallery; his Sheridan will therefore be Sheridan at about forty years of age.

The cast of "The Great Conspiracy" which Mr. Charles Frohman produces at the Duke of York's on Monday, is a remarkable one, for both quality and quantity. Exactly thirty names appear in it, which should satisfy the most exacting of playgers: while as regards quality, they have Mr. John Hare as Napoleon Bonaparte (Emperor of the French), Miss Irene Vanbrugh as Jeanne de Briantes (La Belle Marseillaise), the herione of the story; Miss Madge McIntosh as Josephine, Miss Janet Alexander as Hortense Beauparnais, and Miss Jane May and Miss Elso Sinclair as Napolean's sisters, Mr. Aubrey Smith will be the Marquis de Tallemont, known as Lacanssa le, while Mr. Henry Ainley and Mr. Lyall Swete will play the parts of A. D. Cs. to Napoleon. The play, which is in three acts, is by Pierre Berton, and has been adapted by Madeleine Lucette Ryley.

An unusually large number of actors have been incapacitated by illness lately. Mr. Welch has been obliged to discontinue the Wednesday matinees of that most amusing piece, "When Knights were Bold." Mr. Hawtrey's illness necessitated the postponement of Mr. Locke's new comedy, "the Palace of Puck," and arrangements have been made to stage "Peter's Mother" at the Haymarket on Saturday. The career of Mr. de la Pasture's comedy has been somewhat akin to that of the Wandering Jew, but the play is still popular, and as it is to have the advantage of the same cast as won favour on its first appearance it should meet with continued success. Owing to illness Mr. Rutland Barrington was unable to play the part of Pharaoh in "Amasis" last week at the Kennington Theatre, his place being taken by Mr. Michael Faraday, the composer of the opera, with signal success. Mr. du Maurier, just recovered from influenza, is again playing the part of the amateur cracksman in "Raffles" which has now been running over 300 nights. Mr. Edmund Payne, who has been out of the cast of "The New Alladin" at the Gaiety, has been able to resume his amusing role of Tiffin, the office boy.

The most noteworthy productions in the immediate future are Mr. Alfred Sutro's new play "John Gladye's Honour," which Mr. Alexander promises for 8th March, at the St. James's. "Hedda Gabler" on several afternoons in this month at the Court, with Mr. Patrick Camphell in the part of Hedda. Mr. Cyril Maude proposes to give a series of matinées at the Playhouse, which, without interfering with the evening bill, will afford opportunity for the production of new plays, of which the first is to be "Her Son," by Mr. Horace Annesley Vachell, which Miss Winifred Emery took for a preliminary canter in the country a short time ago, since then the piece is said to have been subjected to drastic treatment with beneficial results. In its early state something like twenty years were supposed to elapse between the acts, now the play runs to a close with but a brief interval, Mr. Maude is to appear in the part formerly played by Mr. E. Norwood, Miss Emery, and Miss Mina Bouicicault, Miss Florence Haydon, and Mr. Alfred Bishop are also included in the cast. At the Alhambra, on Monday night, a new ballet was produced with marked success. It takes its name "The Queen of Spades," from the card by which in the first scene,' L'Etaile, a dancer fleeces a young sculptor of all he possesses. Infatuated with L'Etaile, the sculptor deserts his betrothed, quarrels with the Marquess, the dancer's lover, and finally, "seeking consolation in wine," falls into a heavy slumber. A magnificent dream or vision follows. The sculptor's statue turns into L'Etaile, dressed as the Queen of Spades, who becomes his evil genius, while his former fiancée now appears as his good spirit. Among the many incidents of the vision is a gorgeous dance of Harlequins, and a fascinating ballet of liqueurs-Chatreuse, Benedictine, Curacoa, etc.; but the crowning triumph of the evening was the ballet of the cards, in which the effects of light and colouring are simply marvellous. The final scene, which passes beneath the water, with water-nymphs, grottoes, and caves, will also be a triumph when it goes a little more smoothly than it did on Monday night. The dancing of Mdlle. Alexia was more astounding than graceful, and created a sensation. Signorina Marino, who dances in a quieter style, is exceedingly graceful; and both were warmly applauded. The ballet is written by Signor Carte, and the pretty, if somewhat commonplace, music is composed by Signor Mario Costa.

On Saturday afternoon the Palace scored two records. The opening of the South African Products Exhibition by the King and Queen was shown on the bioscope within three hours of its occurrence, and we saw what probably has never been photographed before, the ceremony of knighthood, Captain Bain kneels, the King touches him with a sword, and Sir Peter rises. The pictures of the exhibition are wonderfully clear.

The wreck of the Berlin is shown in a series of pictures which were evidently taken from the prow of a vessel following the life-boat, and they enable one to form a fairly acurate idea of the position of affairs and of the difficulties attending the rescue: we are shown the rescuers setting out, and later, the fierce see breaking over the wreck. The pictures which are by no means sensational, show few of the more distressing painful incidents.

The twenty-nine suffragist martyrs who were released from Holloway on Wednesday morning were welcomed by their friends and admirers with the usual procession, waving of banners, and singing of war songs, and were entertained at a breakfast at the Eustace Miles Restaurant in Chandos Street. At the meeting which followed this festive function the heartiest maledictions of the assembled ladies were bestowed on Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, M. P. who had ventured to say in a letter to one of them, that he "really did not think they were doing any good to their cause." This expression of opinion from one of their former backers was received with jeers and hisses.

On Saturday, while the King and Queen were opening the South African Exhibition at Westminster, Mr. Botha, was being elected to the post Premier of the new Transvall Constitution, and Mr. Smuts, his late companion in arms against the British, to the office of Colonial Secretary. In such a position of affairs it is hardly possible to "view with confidence" the future—at least the immediate future—of that portion of His Majesty's dominions, though it may perhaps be said that Mr. Botha is at least as sincerely attached to the British Empire as is our own "C. B."

The verdict given on Monday in the King's Bench Division in the action of Beresford vs. Accident Insurance Company is satisfactory to all of us who insure against theft and loss. The action was brought by Capt. Horsley-Beresford, and his wife, an actress known professionally "as Miss Kitty Gordon," for the loss of a sable coat valued at a thousand guineas, which was taken from a trunk in transit from America to England. The defence chiefly consisted of an attempt to discredit the statement that the coat was packed in the box before it left America, but Mr. Justice Bray held that the insurance covered not only the transit but also the time in America: judgment was given for the plaintiff for £1,000 and costs.

In these bad times, which may become worse. some of us may like to know how to live on sixpence a day. If so, Professor Landouzy, of Paris, can tell us all about it, and he is no amateur. He says it is possible to live on sixpence a day, and moreover he guarantees us three meals for our money. The first meal consists of milk, three pieces of sugar, bread and butter. At midday you may have bread, ham, vegetables, or in summer, fruit, and a cup of coffee, with three pieces of sugar; and for dinner your fare is soup, with lard and bread, haricots or lentils, chestnuts and wine. How long you would survive to spend your daily sixpence the Professor sayeth not.

"Why" asked Pat, one day, "was Balaam a first-class astronomer?" The other man gave it up, of course. "Shure," said Pat, "'twas because he had no trouble in finding an ass to roid."

A bridegroom, on returning thanks, blundered through a speech, and, hardly knowing what he was saying, brought blushes to the cheek of the bride by trusting "that in future her troubles would be little ones."

"No truer words were ever spoken than these: 'A fool and his money are soon parted,' "said the lecturer. "That's so," said a voice from the rear of the hall, "we all paid sixpence each to get in here."

TWO IBEX IN SPITI.

I

A VERY slow and hot journey brought myself and friend from Mussoorie whence we started on the 1st May, to Rampur, the Capital of the Basahir State on the 16th. There were pleasant stretches of country however, here and there which tempted us to linger. The road to Chakrata is most uninteresting ; but from Deoban above the Cantonment to Triuni on the Tons we had a pleasant time, marching slowly through the Jaunsar Bawar forests. The scenery from Deoban to Mandali is really splendid—and just the reverse in some. The northern slopes are generally clothed in magnificent hanging forests, while on the south the hillsides are bare and steep. This contrast made the good bits the more enjoyable. These forests are carefully preserved and are the favourite resort of tourists and sportsmen during the "fall." From Triuni bridge to Roru we marched up the Tons valley along the banks of the stream. The most uncomfortable stages we had yet had. The rays of the sun, as soon as he topped the mountain crests, were scorching, and that concentrated essence of insect poison the "Tons fly" added to our discomfort by unceasing attacks in every exposed portion of our bodies. The amount of discomfort that this minute pest inflicts on the human being is in inverse proportion to his size ; he is almost invisible but the results of his attacks are just the reverse. From Roru to Sungri, the next stage, we ascended several thousand feet and entered the Basahir State. The change in the climate was magical. The two next marches also were very pleasant across the huge spur from the Himalayan buttresses which separate the waters of the Sutlej from those of the Jumna. We then descended to Rampur, the capital of the State on the left bank of the Sutlej, when the heat and want of space in and about the town gave us a bad time.

During these two stages we were in that portion of Basahir where a "gadr" or rebellion was going on, mention of which was made at the time in Indian newspapers. As we passed through the discontented villages we could not help hearing tales of oppression and highhandedness which had culminated in this mild demonstration of revolt. It seems that a few years ago Government appointed a Superintendent to look after the affairs of the State owing to the incapacity, through old age, of the present Rajah ; on all sides we heard complaints of the zulum practised by this official who was addressed by the high sounding title of "Wizir-i-Azam." As complaint was not listened to by the authorities at Simla, the people took the law into their own hands and expelled the official with the high title, who fled to Simla. The people have now assembled in large numbers and have subscribed Rs. 90,000 among themselves to fight their case. The old Rajah seems a non-entity. His powers have been taken away and a British official reigns in his stead. His Highness has no son who can succeed him, the rightful heir died a few years ago. He will not nominate a successor but is said to desire the annexation of his State, after his death. Complaints against the Forest Department were also frequent, not only in this part of Basahir but along the whole route we travelled where their jurisdiction extended. The two charges brought against them are that they impound cattle, etc., by the hundred, for no reason whatever and levy large sums as fines ; also that the zemindar, the owner of the land, cannot fell a tree on his own property without permission. It is also stated that the Basahir forests have been taken over by Government for 99 years on an annual payment of Rs. 10,000 to the Rajah, while the Forest Department make a profit of a lakh every year ! The people contend that the forests belong to them and not to the Rajah, who had no right to make such a onesided bargain. The above is the gossip of the way side which we picked up as we went along and is given here for what it is worth. It shows at any rate that there are grievances which have excited the feelings of the people of this country to a very unusual extent. The discontent is very general ; though only a few villages have come to the front, the population in general are in sympathy with them. What may be the real causes of such general discontent cannot be discovered by casual travellers like ourselves.

Rampur town is a miserable hole and is at present a mass of crumbling ruins. The great earthquake more than a year ago levelled many buildings, the Rajah's, palace was cracked from top to bottom in many places. Attempts were made to rebuild ; but shocks have been so frequent since and the roughly built houses have such light foundations that they collapse again, so the inhabitants are making the most of the ruins as shelters and new houses do not seen to be springing up. An energetic ruler would no doubt find a more desirable sight for the capital of his kingdom and remove his subjects there at little cost, but under the present regime "stagnation" is the word. In cases like this it is a pity that the British Government does not exercise its paternal authority and use sufficient pressure to effect obvious improvements. The present old Rajah is reputed to be a miser and is said to have a full treasury. When he departs in the natural course and is gathered to his ancestors a good opportunity will occur for a general remodelling of this ancient hill state.

We reached Nachar in four marches. The first stage to Gaora is a very steep ascent almost all the way, 8½ miles. We joined the great Hindustan and Tibet road, built by Lord Dalhousie many years ago, a few miles below Rampur and our going ever since has been easy and pleasant with the exception of the uphill work as far as Gaora. The forest scenery is splendid in the left bank of the Sutlej in the higher slopes above this road. Between the road and the river, which is several thousand feet below, the hillsides are covered with terraced fields and villages are numerous all the way to Nachar. Above the road splendid forests of Deodar stretch all the way for the whole four stages and travellers pass through them for long distances at a time while extensive stretches of cultivation are spread below him, the stages were short and we enjoyed them immensely. The approach to Nachar from the Rampur side is a most pleasant bit of road through fine deodar forest, a walk through which early in a May morning was most pleasant. From Nachar to Chini it is two marches. Three miles from the former is the well-known Wangtu bridge reached by a steep descent all the way, a fine iron suspension bridge now spans the river : in years gone by I have crossed it here over a shaky old wooden one with a good slant on one side, a slip along which would give easy access to the depths below. The road after crossing winds along the right bank of Sutlej with a very stiff ascent almost up to Urni forest bungalow. This was a most trying march though we started unusually early. The sun blazed on the steep hillside with terrific effect and there was no shade along the road to protect us from the scorchingsun. The forest buildings across the river at Kilba are just opposite Urni bungalow. These were the headquarters of the Divisional Forest Officer in former years ; they are now at Kotgarh near Simla, much nearer civilization. Next morning we walked to Roghi, where are the well-known cliffs of that name, across the face of which for some distance the Hindustan and Tibet road is scouped out of the solid rock. It is difficut to imagine how the workmen could have got along when blasting had to be done at every yard, only the local hill-men, who are born cragsmen, would have accomplished such a slow, tedious and most dangerous job. Chini is only three miles from Roghi and is not a haltingplace at all : but it is the headquarters of the State official (Naib Tahsildar) who is in charge of the Kunawar district of Busahir. It is also the last post office on this road. The two miles into Chini are shaded by fine deodars and orchards on either side ends, a very pleasant walk from Roghi. We sent back our mounts from this place to Nachar to await our return, as the made road ends a few miles further on and even grass for horses is scarce ! At Nachar supplies are easily obtained. We dismissed our coolies also with the exception of four who are useful as camp servants. These men from the lower hills are not fitted for carrying loads at this elevation and in such a climate—10,000 feet and upwards. They are always miserably clad, always fed on starvation allowance, and are entirely dependent on huge wood fires at night for the necessary warmth. As soon as the limit of forest is reached they collapse. The supply difficulty now began to give us trouble. Villages are few and far between ahead of us and cultivation is scanty. The Forest Officer in charge of this division has kindly allowed us to buy ten maunds of flour from his "shop" at Pangi, our next haltingplace. Should we run short, this supply will come in handy to keep us and our men from starvation. Numbers of sawyers and others are employed in these forests during the working season ; they generally come from the Punjab. To feed these men the Forest Department have to keep a bania's shop open to supply them with the articles necessary for their daily fare ; this indispensible establishment is kept at Pangi. As all the supplies have to be carried up from the plains and lower hills during several months of the year, the Department has to do a considerable business in the retail shopkeeper's line as well as in the carrying trade, which is mostly done on bullocks. But for these arrangements the workmen from the plains would find it impossible to do the felling and sawing in these forests. The above details will give some idea of the country ahead of us.

On our return journey we met a traveller near Pangi whose enthusism regarding scenery round Chini could with difficulty be restrained. He was a great traveller, and had seen most of the scenic show places in the world, it was his opinion that the combination of earth, air and sky about Chini could not be equalled even in Switzerland. Our admiration lagged not far behind his. There is a considerable extent of level, or comparatively level, ground, about the village and the water-supply is abundant. There are apricot orchards and green fields below with dark deodar and fir forests enclosing and dominating them on the steep slopes rising westwards, whence comes the stream that irrigates the land. Facing this valley, across the Sutlej, on the east, are the stupendous mountains, rugged and bare at the higher elevations, and overtopped by the precipitous Raldhang 21,250 feet in height. Stretches of snow and glacier are in full view below, while lower down are forests with a green field let in here and there. Not even Switzerland can boast a panorama of such extent and grandeur which can be taken in by the tourist's eye at a range of five miles or less. Chini struck us as being an ideal place for a British Cantonment, though the elevation is 9,000 feet and the journey from the plains would be an arduous one. But who knows what may be in its future. A railway running up the valley of the Sutlej to accommodate the great trade expected by this route from Tibet, would open out hundreds of miles of mountainous country and make access easy to many sites from Rampur to Chini, where thousands of British soldiers could find refuge from the heat of the plains. Here is a hint for K. of K.

COGSWELL & HARRISON'S GUNS AND CARTRIDGES.

MESSRS. COGSWELL and Harrison, Limited., have sent for consideration samples of sporting cartridges manufactured throughout in their factories. That they have the very fullest possible justification for designating themselves "gun, cartridge manufacturers" is thus made abundantly evident. The user, let us say of a "Victoroid" cartridge, charged with "Vicmos" powder, fired from a "Victor" ejector, has his gun and his ammunition all made by the same firm, and may thus rest assured that the combination so correlated will give perfectly satisfactory results. Ammunition manufacture, explosive manufacture, and gunmaking are of course three perfectly distinct branches, each requiring an absolutely different plant, and each carried on under totally dissimilar conditions. All gunmakers who exercise skill and judgment in loading up cartridge cases, are entitled to describe themselves as cartridge makers, for they make cartridges. But so far as we are aware, Messrs. Cogswell and Harrison are at present alone amongst English gunmakers in possessing plants of their own for the production of ammunition components. They do not make shot and they do not make wadding, but they are able to rely upon their own factories for supplies of powder and cases. At the same time, they continue to load all the well-known English powders, and to use cases of makes other than their own, so that the individual preferences of their patrons may be adequately met.

The firm's new powder factory is at Colnbrook, Middlesex, adjoining their shooting school. Here they make three kinds of sporting nitro-compound. 'Vicmos" is a smokeless power made in two varieties, one loading 42 grains to the 12-bore charge, and the other 33 grains. The third powder "Exceltor" is a 42-grain compound, and it is used in a case corresponding to the ordinary unlined "nitro" case. At Colnbrook also cap charging and foiling is carried on, so that here the manufacture of explosive substances is concentrated. The cartridge case making is conducted in a special department of the gun factory near Victoria Station, London, where a plant has been laid down for the production of sporting cases. Here also the cap blanks are stamped out in readiness for charging in the danger buildings at Colnbrook. In the processes of manufacture of cartridge cases, approved methods are adopted, and the ordinary procedure of the most modern factories has been followed. It is claimed that in the prodution of the rolled paper tubes an improvement has been effected. In the three grades of cases under consideration, the pasted paper of the tubes seems to be practically homogeneous, and the cases throughout are well made and finished. The best quality case is called "Victoroid", and is made with waterproof tube, metal lined. The next case is the "Victor" which is the gastight quality, it has the brass extended from the head up to the tube to the same extent as the "Victoroid" and is of primrose colour. The third case, with brass not so deep and caulk built up inside to support the tube is the "Exceltor" coloured brick red. This is the "nitro" quality. All these cases are supplied loaded with the Cogswell and Harrison powders, wadded with the standard one-twelfth cards over and under the felt and one-sixteen card over the shot. Caps and powder are standardised to produce the velocity and pattern approved by modern practice, with quick ignition and moderate recoil. The cartridges are supplied in card boxes of 25, a very convenient packing, which is much liked. Altogether this latest innovation of the firm bids fair to produce very satisfactory results, as well for the manufactures of the new cartridges as for the users of them.

In their gun factory Messrs. Cogswell and Harrison have recently laid down a new plant for barrel boring, applying to the process the principles disclosed by scientific investigations on the subject of patterns. They thus produce tubes upon which the operation of regulating is not complicated by the rectification of initial faults in boring, and so secure the standard choke, modified choke, improved cylinder or cylinder patterns desired, with celerity and a satisfactory degree of certainty. These barrels are made of a special steel, and are designated "Arcus." It may be mentioned also that special precautions are taken to insure that each tube is bored concentrically, so that the inside and the outside walls run together without one side of the barrel being thinner than the other at any part. Of the guns made in this extensive factory, there is no necessity to speak in great detail, for they have for years, running into generations, been well known. The "Victor" ejector, priced at 60 guineas, is the Cogswell and Harrison best gun. Then there are the "Avant Tout" ejectors in "Crown" and "Sandhurst" models with side locks, and "Rex" and "Ideal" models with body locks, the last named being a wonderfully inexpensive hammerless ejector of plain quality priced at 15 guineas. Then there is a hammerless non-ejector at 10 guineas, a "General Purpose" gun made at various prices and chambered for 2½in., 2¾in., or 3in. paper cases, or 3in. brass Perfects, and various other models. The "Cosmos" ball-and-shot gun, taking ordinary 12-bore shot cartridges, or ball, in the form of the solid lead bullet or open fronted Express bullet, is another useful and widely known weapon made by the firm.

In regard to Express rifles, Messrs Cogswell and Harrison have hitherto specialised in ·375 and ·400 and ·450 bores, both double and single, and they also produce a magazine big game rifle in the three calibres. They have now in consequence of the change in the Arms Act regulations debarring the ·450 in India, produced new rifles of ·475 calibre taking a ·480 grain bullet with powder charge of Cordite M. D. This new cartridge seems likely to be extensively used in the future, as it will provide a substitute for the ·450 giving greater power, but admirably adapted for the same class of work. A miniature rifle, with bolt action, made by the firm in London for target shooting, and other purposes of a low power arm, is another weapon that must be mentioned. It is bored either for the various ·22 cartridges or for the ·297-230 short and long Morris tube ammunition, has military pattern sights, and is a beautifully made little rifle at a very moderate cost.

Messrs. Cogswell and Harrison are also one of the firms authorised by the Army Council to manufacture the War Office Miniature rifle, and their model, in course of production, is so far advanced that it will almost immediately be introduced.

100 ACES AT BRIDGE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR —Can you or any of your numerous readers give me some idea of what is considered the record for the number of times a player has turned up four aces in no trumps in 100 rubbers? I send you a scoring book showing one individual to have had this good fortune sixteen times in 94 rubs. We were in the hills and played one or two rubs. every night. The fortunate lady appeared to be turning up four aces so often that I kept a record and from 8th June to 26th July this was her average. In most instances it was also a case of bara or chota slam so she was a considerable winner. The average of the other players in the same time and number of rubbers was three and four. Once in less than six rubbers sounds tall and I should much like to know if there are many players who can come up to or over it. I enclose my card and remain

RIFLE NOTES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDIAN FIELD.

Sir,—In your issue of the 24th January I suggest reboring rifles of the prohibited .303 and .450 bores to take ammunition of larger calibre. This would be a comparatively cheep procedure, but probably would not be approved of by some gun-makers as of course it would pay them better to fit new barrels, and they might object to reboring on the score of danger from the reduction of thickness of metal in the chamber and barrel. I think in the case of a 450 rebored to one of the slightly larger calibres adopted by various makers, the .450 .465 .470 .475 or .476 there would be but very slight risk judging from experiments a few years ago recorded in the Kynoch Journal of October-November, 1902, which I quote "An old Mannlicher barrel, (the calibre is not mentioned but I presume it was of the usual .206-bore) was turned down "to .875 inch over the chamber and chambered and rifled "to take the .450 .400 cartridge. The internal diameter "of the chamber where bulging was first observed was ".525 inch so that the thickness of the walls at the point "was .175 inch, or about half the usual thickness. A series "of charges was fired from the barrel increasing by "5 grains at a time from 50 grains to 50 grains of cordite "and a 400 grain bullet, and subsequently with 72 grains "and 80 grains of cordite and a 533 grain bullet. As "those were insufficient to cause a burst the bullet was "increased to 700 grains and the charge of 80 grains of "cordite was successfully withstood. A charge of 90 grains of cordite was required to burst the barrel."—

"Up to 70 grains with the 400 grain bullet no bulging "occurred either internally on externally. At 75 grains "a bulge having a maximum increase of diameter to 10 thousandth "of an inch appeared about half way down the chamber. "A second charge of 75 grains produced no further bulging. A "charge of 80 grains increased the diameter to. 906, but a "second charge of 80 grains produced no further effect. The "ordinary proof charge of 72 grains with 533 grain bullet produced no increase of bulge. 80 grains of cordite with a 533 "grain bullet increased the external diameter to 919—There "were still no signs of bursting and the front part of the "chamber and the bore of the barrel were practically unaffected.

I have quoted enough to show that it requireda charge enormously in excess of the service charge to bulge or burs a barrel rebored and rechambered from a smal to a comparitively large bore and that with chamber walls of only half the proper thickness, so that it ought to be safe, judging from these experiments, to rebore the 303's and 450's especially so for ammunition loaded with the improved low pressure axite.

MESSRS. COOPER AND CO.
AN UP-TO-DATE SODA FACTORY.

An interesting little ceremony was witnessed last week by a few private and business friends of the enterprising firm of Messrs. Cooper and Company. Chemists and Aerated Water Manufacturers of 56, Bentinck Street, Calcutta. The event was the opening of an extension and most modern installation of aerating machinery which the firm has just imported from England. The machinery was set in motion for the first time by Mrs. Kotwal, the aged mother of Mr. Kotwal, the proprietor of Cooper and Company. This firm were the pioneers in introducing into Calcutta electrically driven soda machinery. This was in 1902, and the plant then laid down was of the most approved type available at that time, and of no mean capacity. But the rapid expansion of their business, due to the excellence of their products, taxed the capacity of the machinery to such an extent that it was necessary to keep working far into the night or keep abreast of orders. The firm has lately acquired further commodious, well-lighted and ventilated premises, and have placed therein a new Riley soda-machine and generator. This up-to date installation has a guaranteed capacity of 150 dozen large bottles per hour, and is identically the same type of machine as that used by Messrs. Schweppe, the world-renowned sērators. An interesting point for consumers is that the water used is carefully filtered through a new slate tank filter, and the premises throughout are noticeable for spick-and-span cleanliness, excellent light and ventilation being open on all four sides. The several filling machines which extend the whole length of the building, are also of the newest and most approved pattern. And we may mention that the entire bottle washing is done by machinery and permanganate of potash is used in this process. The whole plant is run by a modern Crompton electric motor of large horse-power. The superiority of electric power machinery for manufacturing soda water must be evident to all on account of its cleanliness and compactness, which places it far ahead of gas or steam with their defects of oil, smell and smoke. The firm cordially invite customers and consumers generally to inspect their up-to-date factory at any time.

The installation has been very creditably carried out by Messrs. Incell and Silk, who have just won the gold medal at the Indian Industrial Exhibition for their septic hospital fittings.

THE TURF.

FOOTBALL.

Association Rules.

Ireland vs. Wales.—For the twenty-sixth time representativ teams of the "distressful" country and the Principality tried conclusions, the venue of Saturday's match being Cliftonville's fine grounds at Belfast. The bay turned out fine, but bitterly cold, and notwithstanding the heavy rains of the earlier part of the week, the pitch was in fairly good order. The vistors' team underwent a series of changes, which it was understood considerably weakened the side. But, on the other hand, the substitution of Seymour, a young Cliftonville player, for McCracken (Newcastle United), who as an Anglo-Irishman had originally been selected for right back, greatly weakened the home defence.

Wales, winning the toss, took advantage of a slight breeze. Sloan kicked off, and Ireland's left wing darted away, meeting with strong resistance from Lathom and Williams. In a couple of minutes the Irish forwards were close in, and a golden opportunity presented itself, but Roose saved at the expense of a corner, Harris making a big effort to score. The visitors now took up the running, and Meredith and W. L. Jones, supported by Lathom, forced a passage well into Irish territory. McClure and McCartney, however, allowed them no opening, and they were quick y repulsed.

Kirwan and O'Hagan transferred play to the other end without result. The next feature of interest was a dashing run by Jones, whose work produced an abortive corner. The game was only nine minutes old when Ireland opened one scoring. A spirited run on the home right wing culminated in a grand centre from Blair. Roberts failed to clear, and O'Hagan nipping in, sent the ball into the corner of the net. There was great enthusiasm among the spectators, who by this time must have number close upon 14,000.

The Irish, thus, encouraged, played up with even greater spirit, but the Welshmen showed in intention of allowing their opponents to have matters all their own way, and pressed with vigour. McClartney and Seymour exhibited a fine defence and the visiting forwards were allowed little opportunity of effecting any useful combined play. The crowd were now entertained by an exhilarating run by O'Hagan and Kirwan. the inside man, when well up, passing to his partner, who directed a raemendous cross-shot towards the goal-mouth wher the ball was smartly picked up by Boose.

Once again Ireland was within an ace of acoring when a fine centre was sent in from the right wing but O' Hagan was off side. Meredith, for Wales, indulged in a pretty run, which was nipped in the by McCartney. After twenty minutes play, and when the Irishmen were undoubtedly having all the better of the game, a grand cross-shot from Meredith was converted by Morris. Pressure by Ireland produced a corner, the ball being headed away in time by Roberts. Then Kirwan took possession, and gave Roose a warm handful, but the Welsh goalkeeper was in capital form.

The Irish forwards continued to bombard the Welsh goal, and twice the hopes of Ireland were reposed in Harris, and twice they were dashed to the ground. The game now became somewhat tame, Wales pressed, but there was no cohesion in their attack. The Irish halves on the occasion neatly checkmated the opposing forwards, and bearing down the field, O'Hogan and Kirwan broke, completly nonplussing the Welsh defence. Here the Chelsea man lifted over a delightful centre to Sloon, who however, hopelessly missed a splendid chance, as did also the Shelbourne inside right. It was one of the best chances of the game, but it simply went a-begging.

Morris a moment after being off side during a period of attack by Wales, struck the crossbar. Seymour was hurt, but was able to continue. Interval:—Ireland, 1; Wales 1.

In the second half from a free kick the Irish forwards dashed away briskly. Blair placing a capital centre at Sloan's foot, who with practically an open goal in front of him, kicked obliquely towards the corner flag. Yet again Ireland's prospects rose high and once more they were dashed to the ground. Clever manipulation of the ball by McClure and Crothers led to Kirwan making a bolt for goal and a good centre he passed over was taken up by Blair, but the latter was pressed by Davies, and as a result his shot went wide.

Ireland were having the attack almost completely to themselves at this stage, and twice in rapid succession they narrowly missed scoring. Considerable roughness now characterised the game, especially when Wales took up the attack, which, however was short-lived, and the Irishman dashing boldly down caused much anxiety to the visitors' defence.

It was Ireland's game practically throughout this half, but the much sought-for goals did not seem ever likely to come. Sloan retrieved his previous failures by a really dazzling effort, putting in strongly and dangerously from a pass by Harris, but Roose cleared magnificently. Roose saved from O'Hagan after good play by Blair, and later it was only by spirited work on the part of the visitors' defence that the clever play of Blair and Harris did not materialise.

At length Sloan being well placed, was able to head in from a flag kick. Play now became lively, and after Wales had obtained two corners Jones again equalised, and scarcely a minute later the same player added the third. Ireland now worked hard to draw the game, but the equaliser did not come, although O'Hagan shot an offside point. Thus Wales won a game which could not by any means be described as an exhibition of scientific football. Result:—Wales, 3; Ireland, 2.

RUGBY RULES.

Scotland vs Ireland.—The weather was almost perfect for the game, the sky being clear blue, with not a cloud in it, but he air was cold, and there was a keen bite in the north wind which blew right down the field. The edge in the wind was tempered a little by the bright sun. The crowd appeared as large as at the Welsh International, and possibly 20,000 were present when the Irishmen stepped blithely into the arena. They received a rousing reception. They had been accompanied by considerable followers, and these were reinforced by the large contingent of Irishmen studying at the Edinburgh University and the Veterinary Colleges. When the Scots turned out they did not look so athletic as the Hibernian brigade, but the bright green jerseys of the Irishmen have a tendency to drown the quieter dark blue of Scotland.

Scott started for the Scotsmen against the wind, the Irishmen having the sun in their eyes. From the opening moment the game plunged into a most enthralling state. Play opened on the touch line well inside Irish ground, Munro having put in a clever kick. With a loose, fierce rush, the Irish forwards made ground, but they only reached the centre when the Scotch pack, wheeling the scrum, carried the ball away in an almost solid phalanx. Admidst the yells of their countrymen, they kept the ball moving until ten yards from the Irish lines. The Hibernians were harassed for a momont or two until Parke picked up cleverly and went away, immdiately changiug the aspect of affairs, but scarcely had the Irishmen fairly encouced themselves in Scottish territory ere Macleod got possession, and went down the edge ot the touch line like a greyhound. It was an altogether startling opening, and the initial moments were but a prelude to still greater things.

The early indication that it was to be a Titanic struggle were all realised The Caledonian pack did not improve, for Macleod's run, and a brilliant dash by the wearears of the green, led by Allen brought about a complete transformation in the scene of operations. A decided opening was secured by Caddell, and Greaves was just going in when he missed his footing in his last dodge and Schulze tackled successfully. The play veered back to the neutral line, and with Munro kicking justly into the straw lined touch, the Scots were again pressing towards the Irish lines. A quick recovery was made by the Hibernian backs and a great punt by Caddell sent the game right down in the Scottish lines. The tacklingof furious onslaughts was tremendous. Time after time the Irish forwards banged at it with sheer force, but they met equally determined opposition, and throughithe Scottish lines they could not break. On several occasions the Irishmen wereheld outside, and no more.

In one of the numerous mêlées—Scotland were penalised right in front of their posts, and from the very easy place Parke opened the scoring for Ireland. The Irish play had been quite value for points at this time, and the Hibernians present greeted the success with deafening cheers. From the centre the Scotts were the aggressors. The excitement attending a burst by McGregor and Macleod was fully justified, so well did the Cantab dart along. Scrummaging in the Irish half was the order for some time, and then Parke and Macleod gave dashing displays of speed. Anything might have attended these efforts. Then Thrift had a mighty run, and although he slipped when rounding Schulze his effort put Ireland completely on the aggressive. Basil McLear tried to force himself through by sheer strength, but numbers over-powered him. The home lines were seriously menaced, and Sivright was laid out with a kick in the face. He was quite dazed, but it took two players to drag him off the field, and even when sitting in the straw with a rug round him he evinced desperate anxiety to get back into the thick of the battle. The spectators cheered the plucky Scot as he sat eyeing wistfully every movement with a handkerchief pressed to his face. To the interval the game was fought in the Scottish territory, but nothing came of a succes sion of exciting incedents.

Half-time sounded with the score :—

Ireland	(1 penalty goal)	...	3 points.
Scotland	... ...	...	nil.

The game was resumed without Sivright. Ireland pressed from the kick-off, and in a few minutes the eager Sivright was allowed to take the field again. As he bounded down the pitch, the crowd cheered again and again. The best combination of the day was shown in the succeeding minutes, when Macleod got under way, and the ball went right along the line to Purves. Scotland made much ground thereby, and all the advantage now lay with the Thistle. Schulze nearly dropped a goal, and shortly afterwards Simson made his mark, but the kick fell short.

The Scots were making a desperate onslaught—an onslaught of equal merit to that of Ireland in the latter stages of the first half Sivright Monteith, Geddes, and Sanderson were each in turn, all but in, and then, headed by Allen and Tedford, the Irish pack made off in magnificent style. Schulze saved daringly, and soon the Scots were on the aggressive. Basil McLear served his side excellently in defence, and on one occasion he was impartially cheered for a superb tackle the took one Scot by the waist and another by the leg and dragged them with the ball into touch. Scotland, however, were bound to score at the rate they were going, and Sanderson romped across between the posts. Geddes completed the effort with a goal from an easy place, giving Scotland the lead.

This in no way diminished the Irish courage, and Jack was as good as his Master, and rush and counter rush were the order. Thrice Thrift made magnificent single-banded runs, but McLear was singularly badly served with the ball. The match was in a most interesting condition with five minutes to go, when the Scottish forwards made a combined assault. Purves eventually got a clear opening; and grounded between the posts, Geddes converting.

Only a minute or two remained, but there was something akin to an Irish debacle. Scotland had a commanding hold on the game, and from a mêlée Frew got over at the post, and Geddes kicked an easy goal. From the centre Walter came away, and ran almost half the length of the field. Another Scottish score looked inevitable when McLear tracked down his man. Immediately some infringement drew up another Scot as he was crossing the line. The change in the last minutes was extraordinary, the Irishmen clearly being out of the picture, and the Scots had risen to one great height of supreme effort. The whistle sounded with the result :—

Scotland (3 goals)	—	...	15 points.
Ireland (1 penalty goal)		...	3 "

BOXING.

THE HEAVY WEIGHT CHAMPIONSHIP.—When Gunner Moir, who had very justly laid claim to the title of Heavy-weight Champion of England by defeating Jack Palmer (Newcastle) resolved to defer his meeting with Philadelphia Jack O'Brien until he had satisfied the claims of the aspirants to his title in the Old Country, his fiat was received by all fair-minded sportsmen in England as an action not only honourable, but just.

Without doubt the inducement held out for Gunner Moir to travel over the seas would have been considered had there been no prospect of a match in this country, but about that time the ex-Hussar, "Tiger" Smith, returned home from India after an absence of ten years; and by defeating Seaman Kelly in less than a round, the "Tiger" was able to secure backing to the extent of a "monkey" to meet the Gunner. It mayl be interesting to know that each receives his financial support from well-known members at headquarters, and consequently it was only in the right order of affairs that the contest should be decided in the historical theatre of the club premises. Consequently, after a considerable amount of paper warfare, the men met in the strangers' room, and appended their signatures to articles of agreement which called for a twenty rounds contest for £500 a side and a purse of £350 given by the club, while each was to receive a certain percentage of the profits accruing from the pictures taken of the encounter.

To say that the meeting evoked considerable interest only expresses the state of affairs in a mild manner. For within a few days after articles were signed half the seats were disposed of, and during the last week the theatre could have been bought two or three times over. The betting had also fluctuated considerably, for while Moir's partisans declared that the "Tiger" would not be able to concede the weight and height, the ex-Hussar's supporters, on the other hand, contended that their man's style of attack would nonplus his adversary, and that he would also beat him for speed. Consequently a deal of money changed hands and neither could claim to be much of a favourite.

Smith was the first to enter the ring, being esquired by Bill Whalley, Tom Burrows, Staff-Sergt. Dont, and Tom Davis, his trainer. Moir quickly followed, having for his attendants side Grumley, Steve Butler, Arthur Gutteridge, and H. Williams. On the gloves being adjusted, and the men receiving a caution by the referee, the gong sounded for.—

Round 1 and last.—When the men faced each other Moir looked quite a giant against the ex-Hussar. After a brief spar, Smith, upon getting within measurable distance, swung his right, which landed rather too high on the head. Moir quickly responded, and with a straigh left-hand jab smashed the left on the face. This led up to some fast exchanges, in which Smith rapped his man on the jaw, which for a moment steadied Moir. Quickly shaking off the effects of this visitation. Moir shot out his dexter hand, and sent Smith down flat on his back. Although Smith rose quickly, Moir gave him no rest, and, working him into a neutral corner, banged away with both hands on the body and Smith dropped to the ground. Standing back in a perfectly fair manner, Moir allowed his antagonist to rise, and upon coming again together each reached the head with the right. It was now apparent that the Gunner's superior weight was beginning to tell. Smith, however, continued to make a plucky effort, until Moir again fought him on to the ropes, and he went down. Bravely he tried to rise, but he was quite beaten, and Moir won a sensational battle, which lasted exactly 2mins. 49secs.

COURSING.

WATERLOO CUP.—It was under the pleasantest of surroundings that the final stages of the great coursing event of the year were brought off. It often occurs that the finals are marred by disparity in the length of the trials, thereby reducing the actual final to a question of which of the two competitiors has got off the lighter, but on this occasion the hares that were slipped on the last day were all good ones, and although the winner had a far shorter course in the semi-final than Glenbridge, this was not the result of a week hare against a strong one, but the brevity was brought about by the superiorityof the dogs behind it.

With no representative from the North of England left in the cup overnight, the opposition to the Scottish and Irish cracks devolved upon two puppies owned and trained in the South. Of these Platonic made a great effort against the favourite; in fact, so well was he going with his hare after Long Span had lost his position that he had just equalised matters when he lost his legs and it is just possible that this misfortune cost him the course, for he had no sooner faltered than Long Span dashed up to kill, which landed Sir Robert Jardine's dog a decided winner.

Glenbridge, who had been going in a fine form all through the stake, qualified for the final with another brilliant performance in his defeat of Such a Mark; indeed, well as he had run all his other courses, perhaps this was the best display of all, and strong hopes were raised among the Irish division that the Cup would go over the water. The course, however, was the whole length of the Withins, and decidedly a stiffish one, and with only half an hour's interval before the final it was asking such a big dog as Glenbridge a very serious question to come again in so short a time. This proved to be the case, for he could make no show against Long Span in the final, and I can never remember a final course in the great event having been won in such a decided manner. Long Span has proved himself by his running this week, with perhaps the exception of his first course on Wednesday, to be everything that his warmest admirer had painted him.

Hunting.

KARACHI HUNT.

On 24th February.—The hounds met at Alladad. A good field, including the Commissioner and Mr. Lucas, turned out; Mrs. Graham and Mrs. Travers representing the fair sex. After drawing the Mango Tope blank the hounds picked up a line at the edge of the plough, and ran fast for a few minutes—and then, as apparently the jack had run in a ring, were at fault, and could make nothing further of it. The Master lifted them back—and they worked out the line slowly through the scrub, until getting into the open again, with an improving scent, they began to move fast. Shouts and yells and a waving of sticks on the part of the villagers near the Masjid showed us clearly which way our jack had gone. Fortunately he had got well away, and the hostile demonstration, going on near the Masjid, did not worry him in the slightest. We ran him over the hill, and through the valley beyond, killing him near the sea—after a run lasting about 40 minutes. A feature in the run was the sight of the hounds swimming across a large pond the result of the recent rains. The Master then took the hounds off to draw the Subadar's Khêt. We got a brisk run of 15 minutes or so on the way. Three jacks broke covert from the Subadar's Khet. The hounds were soon laid on to one, who gave us a capital 30 minutes, when we lost him in the thick lye bush. It was a good morning's sport—though dreadfully hot—which was hard on horses and hounds.

On 28th February.—The hounds met at Rai Singh's well at 7-15 A.M., when a fair field turned out. Finding in Rai Singh's Khet, the hounds ran a nice line across the Maggur Pir Road, through Moosa's Bunds—and right through the Long Bund—finally losing on the far side of the One Tree Bund, after a run of 30 minutes. It was a very hot morning—and as soon as the sun came out, the scent was gone, so we made our way homewards, without drawing again.

3rd March.—Those who met the hounds at the Hunt Camp, Landhi, at 7 A.M., were rewarded with as good a morning's sport as we have ever had. Mrs. Graham was the only lady out—but the riding talent of Karachi was well represented otherwise. Finding in Parker's Covert, we ran straight across The Common, with the jack in view most of the way and killed in the cover near Rabu's Khet after a glorious gallop of 25 minutes over turf. We then went across to the Hill Farm, where the Sugar cane Khets provided another stout jack who gave us a clinking good run across the Temple Hills. We lost him somewhat unaccountably after running nearly 40 minutes. As we were making our way homewards, we found again and had a brisk little run, after a jack who got into thick covert with the hounds close behind him—and so saved his brush. It was nice and cool, and we did not get back to the Hunt Camp till past eleven. The going was excellent, the scent was good, and the hounds hunted grandly.

On 7th March.—The hounds met at the Bunnia's Crossing at 7. A.M. The Master commenced by drawing the orchards. A touch of scent in Alli Karim's Khet was all the hounds could find—but after leaving the cultivation, we picked up the line of a traveller, who gave us a nice spin towards the Ruined Cottage. Here, he must have been turned, as he "slunk" away down wind, and the hounds found it very difficult to work out the line. After a slow ringing run, the Master gave it up—and lifting the hounds trotted off towards the Long Bund. After drawing the scrub along the edge of the Bund a jack was viewed away by Alli Karim, who was out on his stout little pony. The hounds were soon laid on to the line, and we killed after a good gallop near the ruined cottage.

THE SUBALTERNS' TOURNAMENT.

FIRST ROUND.

15TH HUSSARS vs. 17TH LANCERS.—The tournament opened at Umballa with this game on the 12th instant. The rain on the day before had made the going just right and the ground was in splendid condition. It was of little interest, for the Hussars did pretty much as they pleased and won by the overwhelming margin of 11 goals and 7 subsidiaries to 1 goal. Teams :—

15TH HUSSARS.	17TH LANCERS.
1 Mr. R. Barry.	1 Mr. H. F. Parbury.
2 Mr. P. P. Curtis.	2 Mr. G. H. Rhodes.
3 Mr. S. H. Charrington.	3 T. S. M. A. H. Lyne—Evans.
Back—Hon. Mr. D. Bingham.	Back—Mr. V. N. Locket.

Umpires—Majors Clifton-Brown and Lecky.

10TH HUSSARS vs. 12TH LANCERS, "B."—This was another runaway affair. The Lancers were outplayed and outridden, they offered a stubborn resistance and Ollivant, their back, played with pluck and brilliance throughout; but in the event they were defeated by 7 goals and 2 subsidiaries to 1 subsidiary. Teams :—

10ST ROYAL HUSSARS.	12TH LANCERS, "B."
1. Hon. Mr. A. A. Annesley.	1. Mr. V. L. C. Manning.
2. Mr. E. W. E. Palmer.	2. Mr. C. E. Bryant.
3. Mr. W. L. Palmer.	3. Mr. H. C. Maydon.
Back—Mr. H. P. Chaplin.	Back Mr. G. B. Ollivant.

Umpires—Majors Clifton-Brown and Lecky.

3RD HUSSARS vs. R. H. A.—Here we saw a really good and closely contested game, there being little difference in their form. The backs were conspicuous and the scoring was kept down to 1 goal and 3 subsidiaries to 1 goal by which margin the Hussars won. Teams:—

3RD HUSSARS.	R. H. A.
1. Mr. R. R. de C. Grubb.	1. Mr. J. A. Scarlett.
2. Mr. J. J. Dobie.	2. Mr. I. C. Usher.
3. Mr. H. Leney	3. Mr. W. Roberts.
Back—Mr. M Burge.	Back—Mr. B. H. Lascelles.

Umpires—Colonel Rivett-Carnac and Major Hobson.

12th LANCERS "A." vs. THE CARABINIERS.—In the first half of the game the Carabiniers had rather the better of the argument and it was not till the third period that the Lancers seemed able to get into their stride. From this point they went away and run out winners by 3 goals and 2 subsidiaries to 1 goal and 2 subsidiaries. Teams :—

12TH LANCERS "A"	THE CARABINIERS.
1 Mr. T. R. Badger.	1 Mr. S. W. Webster.
2 Mr. R. B. Wood.	2 Mr. J. N. Kidd.

Back—Mr. C. M. Truman.	Back—Mr. A. G. Gwyer.

THE SEMI-FINALS.

10TH HUSSARS vs. 15TH HUSSARS.—On the 13th instant the meeting of these teams brought out a large number of onlookers and they were rewarded by seeing a really well contested game The 10th were far and away the more experienced team, yet the 15th, with two men, who are practically recruits, gave them a fine game and were constantly conspicuous for good combination and individual brilliance.

The 15th got a subsidiary early in the first chukker, and in the second the 10th had two runs to the 15th's flags, but scoring was averted. Both these chukkers witnessed very sticky play. The character of the game improved in the third chukker, when there was more free hitting and galloping, and the 10th got two goals in quick succession. The fourth chukker witnessed equally animated play, the 15th scoring a goal and also adding two minor points to their score. The fifth chukker was a very hotly contested, but distinguished for repeated scrimmages in various parts of the ground, and at the close the 10th scored their third subsidiary. Then in the brief time left for the last chukker the 15th got a subsidiary, and on the call of time the 10th Hussars were left winners by 2 goals 3 subsidiaries to 1 goal 2 subsidaries. Teams as before. Umpires Major's Lecky and Hobson.

12TH ROYAL LANCERS "A" vs. 3rd Hussars.—A most unfortunate accident brought this game to an end before it had been going a minute. Mr. Burge, the Hussars' back was thrown heavily when his pony came down and carried off to hospital with concussion of the brain. His team, having no waiting men present, were obliged to scratch—a very regrettable termination to what promised to be a good game. Teams as before.

THE FINAL.

10TH HUSSARS vs. 12TH LANCERS.—This meeting was productive of as good an exhibition as any one could wish to see The Lancers were the first to score and put up 2 subsidiaries early. Then there was a blank period, after which the Hussars notched 2 subsidiaries and the game continued level without any score till very close upon its close when the Hussars scored a goal. When it wanted but three seconds for full time the Lancers again equalised and an extra four minutes had to be played, but with no result. Another extra period was started when the Lancers nearly scored and the Hussars relieving the pressure ran the ball to the opposite end and scored a goal, the game thus ending in a win for the 10th Hussars by 2 goals and 2 subsidiaries to 1 goal and 1 subsidiary. Teams as before. The Cup was presented to the winners by General Clements.

He wrote a graphic description of the race, which he wound up by saying that "the favourite was beaten by a head on the post." But his feelings may more easily be imagined than described when he found it next morning in the paper: "The favourite was beaten on the head by a post."

"God helps the man who helps himself, but God help the man caught helping himself here," is a notice posted up behind the counter of a jeweller in the Strand. A double-barrelled gun hangs near the notice.

The fielding too has much improved, and Messrs. Eddis, Guise and Bartholomew being particularly good in this respect.

THE Y. M. C. A.

The Y.M.C.A. cricket fixtures have just closed after a very successful season. In all 22 matches were played, of which 7 were won and 2 lost. Victories were gained over Dalhousie (twice) the Olympians, 5th Northumberland Fusiliers, Caledonians, Old Xavierians and City Athletic Club. The defeats were sustained at the hands of the Caledonians and Customs. The unsatisfactory feature about the season was the large number of unfinished matches, the majority of which were drawn very much in the Club's favour. On several occasions a few minutes longer would have given them the victory. On the other hand, three times time saved the Y.M.C.A. from almost certain defeat.

The Captain and A. M. Price head the batting averages and the same two men in the reverse order top the bowling.

In spite of the loss of players such as H. J. Clark, H. G. Reaks, F.P. Linsell and C. Rayneau, the batting strength has been maintained,—Pooler, Dyer and Grant making creditable substitutes. The highest score throughout the season was 77, three men reaching that figure.

The matches being played on Saturdays only, often rendered it necessary to force the game in order to attempt to pull off a win, but while this necessitated taking extra risks it increased the attractiveness of the games. The bowling as a whole has been weak, and variety of style has been lacking. At times there was a tendency to become slack in the field.

MURRAY FOOTBALL TOURNAMENT

THE FINAL

CARABINIERS vs. ROYAL WELSH FUSILIERS.—The above teams again met in the final tie of the Murray Cup Tournament on the ground of the Oxfordshire Light Infantry on Monday afternoon the 11th instant., the game ending in favour of the Carabiniers by two goals to one. There was no score until a few minutes to half time, when the ball was deftly centred by the Welsh right wing and shot swiftly into goal. This put the Carabiniers on their mettle and resuming after the interval their forward division pressed. Later from a neat pass from, the right, their centre-forward obtained the ball, and registered their first goal, amid much applause. The Carabiniers continued their exertions and a few minutes later, from another fortunate pass. the centre secured the ball, and shot it just under the bar. The Welshmen endeavoured to equalize, but without success, the Carabiniers winning the Tournament by the best of three goals.

General Sir E. Locke Elliot presented the cup and medals to the winning team, and medals to the runners-up. The General complimented the teams on the spirited contest for the trophy, and alluded to the excellent form showed by the Durham Light Infantry in the simi—final round. He stated that the competition was inaugurated in 1896, the Second Battalion, Oxford Light Infantry being the first winners of the Cup. It was subsequently won out right by the Highland Light Infantry, who complied with the condition of winning the Cup three years running. The East Lancashires were the holders in 1900, the Somersents the following year, the Yorkshire Regiment in 1902, the second Battalion, the Black watch, in 1903 and 1095, the 1st Battalion, the Royal Irish Rifles in 1904, while last year the Cup fell to the Cavalry, the 12th Lancers, as this year to the Carabiniers.

The General also alluded to the services rendered by the Committee, consisting of Mr. R. Houston, of the Royal Dragoons R. F. A. Mr. R. V. Simpson, of the Oxfordshire Regiment, and Mr. W. H. Greenwell, of the Durham Light Infantry, in ensuring the success of the Tournament, and to the labour of Mr R. P Miles, of the 85th K. L. I., the Station Staff officer, as Honorary Secretary. The proceedings terminated with cheers for the Committee and the respective team, and for General Locke Elliot.

GOLF IN THE BRITISH ISLES.

February, 22nd 1907.

Looking at the Fixture Lists for the next four months there is apparently and not unnaturally more congestion than there as ever been before, it will be a very difficult task for the man with Pot-hunting proclivities to decide which green to honour with his presence, the match-maker will not find it easy to promise his valuable services to any special club of the many to which he belongs, when he is notified that 2 or 3 all equally interesting are to take place on the same day. May is undoubtedly the most popular golfing month, and already in most of the papers one can count quite 50 events advertised and these by no means small or uninteresting, including the Doyal and ancient Spring Meeting, the Professional Inter-national Match between Ireland and Scotland, etc., etc.

To judge by the amount of advertising and also by the large staff of ground men and by the Balance Sheet issued by the Bournemouth Corporation there is no possible probable shadow of doubt "that Municipal golf is a huge success. There are now two really good 18 hole courses at this fashionable Seaside resort the older of the twain. Meyrick Park has been established some years and in 1906. the income was £1.755. whilst the expenses amounted only to £983. a most encouraging state of affairs.

The younger course at Queen's Park, does not, of course, owing to its youth enjoy so much prosperity or popularity but the Corporation have already spent between £3,000 and £4 000 on the course, and about the same amount on a very fine Pavilion and doubtless as the year roll on Queen's Park will and posibly outshine Meyrich Park; for there is distinctly rival increased tendency towards Municipal golf or rather shall we say democratising this Royal Game, but at present the entrance fees and subscriptions as well as the limited Membership of Clubs in th vicinity of the great Citeis, are quite excluding many hundreds of would-be-golfers, who would benefit considerably should more Municipal Courses be opened and greater ficilities for membership be given.

A very surprising result in the second round of the Cricketers inter-county tournament, was the defeat of Devonshire by Bucks on the Maidenhead Course. The two brothers the Hon'bles Osmund and Denys Scott representing Devonshire stalwarts, 1st favourite not only for thi round, but for the Final stage of the Tournament and their defeat by 4 up and 2 to go at the hands of Messrs. W. H. Lunnon and G. B. Greaves came as a great surprise or would have done had the contest been in any game but golf.

It is an age of advertisement, each firm naturally vaunts its own productions as immeasureably superior to all others, balls, clubs, boots, grips, bats what not. Then too buyers of any of these articles, get accustomed to one special sort and feel a sort of pleasure in boasting like users of Pears' Soap "since then I have used no other." But have many people in India tried "the Colonel" Ball—this is no mushroom sphere—it has been played out for quite a long time now, and has won many championships—in 1905 alone it enabled 9 players to become Champions—or Runners up. It is of course Rubber-cored, and the St. Mungo Manufacturing Company who turn it out by the thousand justly claim for it that it outdistances all rivals, that it is steadiness and reliability exemplified, that as regards durability it is unapproached: and that it is the best ball in the world!—with all these recommendations surely on would feel inclined to try a "Colonel" and once given a proof of its excellence by personal experience one will of a certainty "try, try, try again!"

Among comparatively young Clubs the North Surrey is in a very flourishing condition, its Annual General Meeting was held quite recently and the report showed a membership of 579 (included in which number are 60 ladies,) and the balance sheet showed a profit of £470 on the years working. Mr. A. E. Rowarth was unanimously elected Captain for the ensuing year.

The two Universities as usual, at this time of the year are very busy. On Saturday, 16th February, Oxford journeyed to Woking to play their Annual Match against that Club, Oxford invariably decides its matches by the number of holes up. Whereas Cambridge plays them by Matches. The Intervarsity Match is played by holes too, so that even after the actual match is won the policy of the defeated one is to try and retrieve some of his lost holes, and of the victor to still further add to his advantage. Now we must go back to Oxford and Woking and give a list of players with results:—

One sees a lot of new names in the Oxford team many more than amongt the Light Blues selection in the match vs. Sunningdale on the same day, which also resulted in the defeat of the 'Varsity. There were 10 players aside in this, whereas the match alone recorded had a dozen. Of course, the Sunningdale Club is immensely strong with the brothers Scott, the Hon. Evan Charteris, Messrs. The Inter-'Varsity Match will be played at Haylake on Wednesday, 17th April Cambridge are favourites so far but "you never can tell."

Most of the great Pros. are just now over in the Sunny South or rather are leaving for those delightful sun spots, while these lines are being penned—(would that I were !) the idea of the Professional Tournament at Cannes was conceived by that ardent upholder and supporter of the Royal and Ancient Game the Grand Duke Michael. Next week I hope to give a short account of the play—but for the nonce must hold my peace. The Course is, I hear, in first class order, and all those engaged to take part are in fine form. So some good golf should result—new records be made, etc., etc.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

THE League is now nearly half way through completion, and the result of the matches played show Calcutta and the Rangers at the head of the table with an equal number of points, the former having the advantage on a better goal average. Neither side have so far lost a game, and the final issue appears to be between them. Great interest therefore will be taken by their respective supporters right up to the finish. Both clubs have yet to meet Dalhousie and the Hornets, who are capable of taking their numbers down. It should be a great fight, but I give my vote to Calcutta on the strength of their superior attack. Calcutta, if I am not very much mistaken, have so far never yet come out on top of either the League or Beighton Cup Competition, and they now appear to have the chance of a life time. They are playing in splendid form just now and have done exceptionally well in their last few engagements. The goal average of 25 for to 4 against, shows them to be capable of both attack and defence.

Manders, who will assist the premier club this year the would either strengthen the attack or defence. but he will in all probability be played in the back division with McCaw. Heilgers' change of place to half-back for outside left appears to be a judicious one, and Oldfield, a new member, is being given a trial in the former position. Playing a very fair game indeed, he is weak in centering and must learn to centre harder to his forwards and not in the direction of the goal-keeper.

The Fort team are learning the game, but have a distinctly useful and hard-working centre half-back in Lieutenant Selby. He is streets above the rest of them and under his tuition the team should certainly soon be able to give a better account of themselves.

The Rovers undoubtedly the best of the native combinations should certainly win more matches than they do: against Calcutta they had the better of the first half, but could not owing to in decision and dilatoriness in front of goal, get in a shot. Time after time they appeared to be in a dangerous position just outside the shooting circle, but could never put the finishing touch to their efforts. They have some very nippy players, one or two of whom give one the idea of having hailed from Ranchi and to be of the famous Ratchi combination.

The Rangers I have already spoken of, and they manage to win their games by narrow margins, the nomadic Templeton being on the spot to do the needful when required. He has practically no one to assist him and all the more credit is due him for the way he gets through the opposition. He is one of the best centre forwards at present playing.

Dalhousie are doing better than they have done for some seasons past and with Prike in the forward line they have someone who can keep them going, while Holley at back is very safe. They are sure to be well up at the finish.

One hears very little of Ballygunge and it appears as if the Suburban Club are experiencing more difficulty than even in getting together a side. The playground at Ballygunge has been voted too far out of Calcutta, and although this is probably the case for midweek matches, surely Saturday games could have been played there. It is without doubt the best field in Calcutta and it seems a pity it should not be utilized. It may be the fact of not being to play any house matches that is disorganising the ranks of this hitherto excellent and ably managed suburban hockey club.

Surely the proposition to arrange a Civil vs. Military Charity match is unfounded. Nothing could be more absurd. The Military cannot boast of an XI as strong as they were able to put into the field last year, when the game was voted an utter fiasco. The occasion of the final of the Beighton Cup should be sufficient for a charity match, but if other was wanted, why not a English vs. Indian Schools encounter. Two very good and even sides could be got together and the Match Elicit more interest than a one-sided Civil on Military one.

It is regrettable that one or two instances of rather strenuous play have been apparent and one team in particular seems to have had a lot of nasty things said about it, which I understand is not without cause. Their conduct has been brought to the notice of the Referees' Association, and it now only remains for that body to place referees in the matches in which this particular team participate, who will have, shall I say, the courage to enforce the rules of the game. It seems disgraceful that this state of things should be allowed to continue and it would be advisable for a member or two of the hockey committee to be on the spot to see what actually does take place. With regard to refereeing in itself, from what I have recently seen it has been more satisfactory than not, but with only, I think I may safely say, two exceptions, have any but players been known to supervise the game. Their competency may be unquestionable, but it is too much to hope that the majority of them can be expected to continue to do duty for weeks together. The average player as a rule finds it difficult to leave his office at 5 two days during the week, and to be asked to referee a further couple of days is really too much. The non-player is not coming forward as he might do which is all the more regrettable as there are several amongst them who have played the game in Calcutta in the past and are certainly capable of directing the younger generation, and teaching them, thereby, how to play the game.

FOX-TERRIER'S AT THE LATE CALCUTTA K.C. SHOW.

(BY A CORRESPONDENT.)

TO any old lover of the breed, who no longer exhibits, the fox-terriers at the recent Calcutta Show were most interesting classes, in quality beyond anything I was led to expect, and it seems to me that Mr. Hood Wright judged them with much circumspection. It is true I was unable to see eye to eye with him in all his awards, but that does not necessarily mean that he was wrong, the mere onlooker of the ring side allowing his vision to roam at random over the exhibits is not in the position of a judge who is judging and utilising every second of his time in making his comparisons There is the difference between them as between the man who reads a book as recreation and him who is studying it for a set purpose, the former may allow much to escape him which is impressed on the mind of the latter. A judge once remarked that he found his opinions as a judge often differed so substantially from those formed by seeing the dogs concerned in an ordinary way that his judgments frequently surprised himself.

In the open Smooth Dogs, I suppose three of the exhibits must, to all knowledgeable people, have at once been conspicuous. The award of Indigo, who was first over Induna, has, I believe, been severely criticised, but I am not at all satisfied that these criticisms were just. Induna is a very high-class terrier, a dog of nice size whom one likes the better the more one looks at him, but I must confess my attention would have wandered from him had his merits not been called prominently to my notice. He was not showing himself very smartly, and a low carriage of head and neck detracted from his appearance. Indigo, with his extraordinary heavy markings, was bound to make himself observed; but far too heavily marked for beauty, and with a black head unrelieved by white blaze or tan muzzle, he was handicapped by his colour. Nevertheless I think, Mr. Hood Wright was correct in his placings on the day, another day may be another affair, the same dog may appear a different creature on a subsequent occasion. On the 6th February last, he won by virtue of his style and carriage in the ring. Raby Huntsman, a very quality-like terrier, will not now bear scrutiny, his class carried him rightly into the third place, but he can no longer compete with youth accompanied by any pretensions to form.

Hardwick Shacabac falls short of first-rate quality, but is a good useful terrier likely to be there or thereabouts when the cracks are about. He followed Indigo in the Limit and Novice Classes and won in Puppies. Clumber Dark Blue has much to recommend him. Only he fails in character, still he might have been among the V. H. C's Dictator, third in Puppies, I would have cast for size; he is far too large at the present time and bids fair to be a giant. He showed the most quality in the Puppy Class and should have been first or nowhere, in my opinion the latter would have met his deserts.

The Open Bitches were difficult to judge. In quality Delberta at once caught the eye, her style was very attractive, but I did not like her feet nor her elbows, and it was difficult to understand how a bitch of her home pretensions could have fallen off in these particulars at her time of life. She is no longer a first-class bitch. In Philippa, the judge was possibly attracted by her size, he favoured the little ones, and Philippa is about perfect in size. She is, moreover, neat and well put together, a nice trim little terrier but common, a grisette as compared with a Vere de Vere. I preferred Donna Philippa and Infanta to both. Infanta bears a deal of pulling to pieces, she is full in size, her head is not tip-top, her ears a trifle large, it is possible she may grow too cloddy, but her legs and feet and coone were splendid, and she only reached the Reserve award when I think many judges would have placed her first. The order of the first four might easily be reversed on another occasion, though the contest would always be close and the issue a matter of doubt.

In the Open Wire Dogs, Corney Grain from the moment he entered the ring stood out an undoubted winner. With great bone, deep ribs, and strong quarters, his style and carriage of neck and stern, his beautifully placed shoulders, and liberty of movement save him from cloddiness. He is by no means a perfect dog, but he will always be very hard to beat, you can pick a number of faults, by you can't help the attraction of certain superlative merits. Sherbrook Vanguard was correctly second and won in Novice; he possesses many of the best characteristics of the Dorsington; his best point is perhaps his jacket, but even there he could not defeat Corney Grain, whose coat was just as bristly and in better trim, still he is a good one and in better condition will have to be reckoned with. A nice puppy, Rex Crumpet, was third. Jind Don't Hit Hard is very bad in coat, and Wellingboro' Ben is one of the "has beens."

In Open Bitches, the judgements were disturbing. When Norfolk Venus entered the ring, I thought she was the winner. but followed by the three littles ones to contest the honours with her, she looked enormous. She would be very full in size for a dog, as a bitch she was certainly oversize and was no doubt thrown out for this reason. Dusky Gleaner, who won, is now no longer a show terrier. She is a home champion, but won her honours hardly, at a time when conspicuously good wire bitches were few and far between and the little ones were beginning to be recognised. She was never, at her best, a flyer, her head was always poor and has greatly deteriorated, her coat was always difficult and is now impossible. She would never have won had such bitches as Dusky Siren, or even Dusky Peri, been around at the time, and at the present time hardly deserves a commendation card. She was followed in the awards by her daughter Jind Glory and Dil Pasand and both might well have beaten her. Of these two, Dil Pasand showed higher quality of carriage and outline, but she was a puppy and was shedding her puppy coat. Glory is a very taking little bitch, better in head than her dam, far better in jacket, equally good in legs and feet. Her coat is full and may give trouble later, and she may prove too cloddy with age. On the day she beat Dil Pasand, but the puppy is of the improving, lasting sort and may easily turn the tables on a future occasion. Dil Pasand won in Limit and Novice, but was placed second in Puppies, the Dog and Bitch Puppy Classes being amalgamated. With any sort of bitch allowance, she might have won in Puppies also. Rex Crumpet is quite a good one in shape, but singularly deficient in fire and go, points in which the little bitch was remarkable.

Good as they were, the fox-terriers—with the sole exception of Corney Grain, who annexed the cup for the Best Dog in Show, and the Cup for the Best Wire Terrier—did not come to the front in the Specials. Their merits appeared to me to entitle them to a higher position.

The Horse.

HORSES' NAMES.

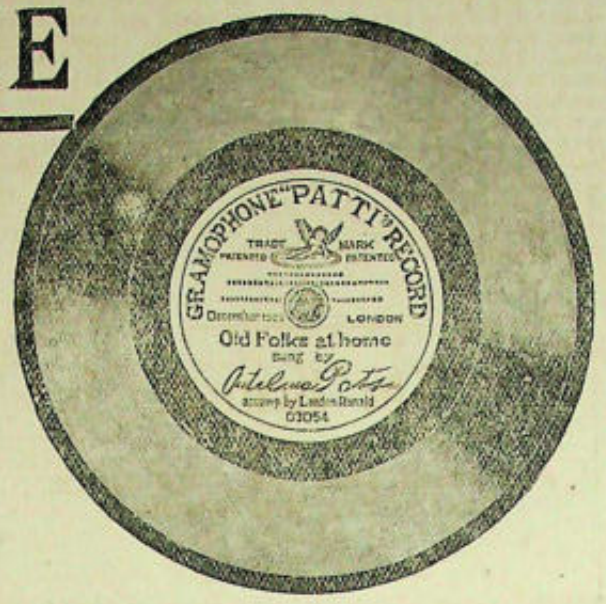
MUCH of one's recollections of racing and turf matters may be associated with the names of horses; an apt or a quaint name somehow sticks in the memory and serves as the connecting link to bring back to one's mind events, animals and persons which, but for some such simple means of association, would probably be irretrievably lost. For instance, glancing through an old Ruff's Guide, years ago, my eye caught the strange name of Hook'em Snivey, and I found that he was a colt belonging to Sir R. Bulkeley, and ran third to Newminster in the St. Leger of 1851, Sir Joseph Hawley's Aphrodite being second; and ever since then, if anything connected with Newminster this year his breeding, his performances, or what not, needs to be called to mind, I have but to think of Hook'em Snivey and immediately I have hold of a thread which, it may be slowly but nevertheless surely, leads me to the proper tablets of memory to supply the facts or information wanted. So, too, all my recollections of the famous Doncaster, his victory at Epsom in 1873. his sensational defeat in the St. Leger by his stable companion Marie Stuart, the main outlines of the turf life of his owner, Mr. Merry, the dispute as to who was the dam of his son Bend Or, and a hundred and one other matters, many perhaps perfectly trivial, all will flow, if memory is let to work at its own sweet will, from the one never forgotten fact that originally Doncaster was burdened with the terrible name of "All Heart and no Peel."

It is, of course, all a matter of association: some quite minor recollection serving as the key to unlock the storehouse of the mind, wherein is stored all that was ever heard or seen or read—as Browning says.

"A sunset touch,
A fancy from a flower-bell, some one's death,
A chorus ending from Euripides"

is enough to set the brain hard at work, recalling vividly to mind events and persons and scenes of the long ago. I remember once surprising a friend by interjecting in an ordinary conversation with regard to the weather, "Talking of snow-drifts, that reminds me of a girl I was very sweet on as a boy. Her people used to live in an old country house, ten miles from a railway station; and her old grandfather, who died five and twenty years ago as a nonagenarian, used to repeat to himself, or to anyone who would listen, a hundred times a day, 'She looked up at me and winked her black eye; says I to myself, I will be with you 'bymbye'" My friend, of course, could trace no connection between snow-drifts and the garrulous old country squire or a schoolboy's love, but to me there was a very direct association, because the thought of snow-drifts loosed the taut chords of memory and set them vibrating.

To come back to our horses and their names. For the last two seasons an animal named Cyclops Too has frequently raced in England, and indeed he won several of his races in his first season. The story of his name is that his owner (Lord Londonderry, I think) intended to name him Cyclops, being by Cyllene out of Cock Eye, but it was pointed out to him that a few years ago there was a well-known racehorse of that name, whereupon Lord Londonderry said, "Well, I will have a Cyclops Too," and down he went in the Burlington Gardens register as Cyclops Too.



Delaunay, who was sold to France a year or so ago, was originally named Lucky Dog, which was not at all a bad selection on his parentage, being the son of Fortunio and Pet; but when he proved to be one of the "top sawyers" of his year, it was felt he deserved something more refined as a cognomen, and he was accordingly renamed Delaunay; his change of name, however, was not followed by any change in his ability, and he was eventually sold to France for 7,500 guineas. It will be remembered too that uncle Mac, who won the Chester Cup in 1889, had formerly run under the name of Northallerton, and had won many races under his original name, though none of the distinction of a Chester Cup. Only this very last season in England there was a gelding by Ladas out of Aziola who ran under three different names: first as Diagoras; then he won a small selling plate at an out-of-the-way little meeting; then he was renamed I'm His Daisy, which effectually prevented him from catching the Judge's eye; but eventually this terrible name was dropped, and as Ladiola he won another selling plate in the last days of the season. He could do something as Diagoras and as Ladiola, but with the awful I'm His Daisy he evidently felt so ashamed of himself that he was not capable of any real effort.

Some sires and dams names, of course, lend themselves very readily as suggestions for the nomenclature of their progeny, as, for instance, Carbine, whence we have Carabine and Pistol, and, when coupled with the dams names, Powder Puff from Lady Frivoles and Spearmint out of Queen of the Mint. So too, Gallinule gives us game Chick, Dying Duck, Galentine and Pretty Polly, to name only a few; while to go further back into history, Sweetmeat suggested Parmesan, Macaroni and Plum Pudding. In all these the association is very pronounced, but sometimes there is just as great an association though it lies a little deeper beneath the surface, as in the case of a colt belonging to Lord Carnarvon named, Enfant de Miracle, the son of St. Simon and Cymbaline for Cymbeline of course was King of Britain and not a lady; and, to take another example, Storm Jack by Jaquemart out of Lightning Flash and the latter instance is surely a very ingenious invention almost on a par with Rising Glass, who was by Isinglass out of Hautesse, and You Go Off, a son of Sir Hugo and Fuse.

But however ingenious or apt may be the name of a horse, it is frequently terribly mutilated by the raucous voices in the ring, and in this connection many who read these lines will at once think of L'Abbesse de Jouare, the Oaks Winner of 1889, who was generally known to the bookmakers and quoted by them as Abscess on the Jaw; and perhaps too of Rayon d'Or, who became Rainy de Ore to the pencillers. Names such as Hymenaeus or Kladeradatsch of course are hopeless with the uneducated, who never seem able to pronounce a name of several syllables, especially when vowels are particularly numerous. The veteran owner and bookmaker, George Hodgman, always gave his horses names beginning with a V, such as Victorious, Virago, Vixen, Vestminster, etc., and when asked the reason for this peculiarity, and whether it was due to his being a great admirer of Sam Weller, he replied, Sam Weller be bothered! I always name with a V, because they are so easy to find in the Index when I want to look up their form.

THE GRAMOPHONE CO.

GENTLEMEN,

The Gramophone of to-day I find is such an improved instrument for recording the human voice to the older machines with which so many of us are familiar, that my hitherto objection to allow the thousands who cannot hear me sing personally to listen to the reproduction of my voice through the instrumentality of your Gramophone is now quite removed, and the Records which you have lately made for me I think are natural reproductions of my voice.

Yours truly,

THE BENGAL CHAMPIONSHIP.

An excellently arranged and most successfully carried out tournament, supported by record entries, splendid "gates" and a keen and sustained interest by the public. What more would you, my masters? We deplore the fact that the difficulties under which we are struggling as a sequel to the recent printers' strike and the necessity that exists for avoiding the overcrowding of new hands with work prevents us from commenting on the play. The fight in the singles final between Warden and Atkinson was indeed a great one and the spectators were madly interested. For a man to be 2 sets down to nil and then win the next 3, shows great pluck and Atkinson's win, therefore was deservedly popular and will earned. The doubles final between Atkinson and Roe and Gtsson and Jackson was not good, the latter were swamped, not getreing a look in against their opponents who were much stonger and decidedly better class players. Appended are results. –

STRAY NOTES.

SOME years ago an experiment was made by Sir John Richardson to discover how animals changed colour from brown to white when winter approached. He obtained an Arctic lemming, which habitually turns white in winter, although dark-coloured in summer. The little animal was kept in a comparatively warm room till winter was well advanced' when it was suddenly exposed to a temperature of 30deg below zero. In consequence of the conditions under which it had been kept, this lemming was still brown in mid-winter, when it ought to have been white. As the result of its first night's exposure, the fur on the cheeks and a patch on each shoulder became completely white, and by the end of the first week the whole coat had turned white. In the third week the animal died. On examination it was found that only the tips of the hairs had become blanched, and that if these tips were cut off, the animal was restored to its original brown condition. This does not happen under ordinary conditions, as it is now well known that the change. from brown to white in the case of the mountain hare is really due to a change of coat, and not to blanching. Instances are known in which variable hares transported from Scotland and from Irish mountains to southern and low-lying regions continued to appear for some seasons in snowy coats, and then change to brown permanently.

A mole's life is by no means a gentlemanly sinecure. His whole existence is spent in perpetually raising and removing large piles of earth by sheer force of muscle. In order to sustain such constant toil, and to replace and repair the used-up tissue, the mole requires to be always eating. His appettrse jis voracious. He works like a horse and eats l like an elephant. Throughout his working hours he is engaged in pushing aside earth and scurrying after worms in all his galleries and tunnels with great deligence. Such ceaseless activity can only be kept up by equally ceaseless feeding, and so the mole's existence is one of long, savage alternations of labour and banqueting. His heart, lungs, and muscles are working at such a rate that if he goes without food for half a day he starves and dies of inanition. His drinking is like eating ; he must have his liquor much and often ; so he digs many pits in his tunnelled ground and catches water in them to supply his need at frequent intervals. Day and night alike he drinks every few hours, for day and night are alike to him ; he works and rests by turns.

An experiment was recently tried to determine the combativeness of birds. A mirror was placed in an aviary containing thirty or forty birds. The smaller birds were alarmed and flew away; the love-birds did their best to climb with beaks and claws up the glass. All gave it up except a couple of cardinals. These batted and pecked and clawed and fluttered at the glass, and when another inspection was made an hour later, the two birds were still fighting their reflections. The floor in front of the glass had been worn bare of sand, the glass was smothered, and the birds had kept up the fight so eagerly that they were now exhausted, and l hardly able to raise a pipe of defiance.

It is still a common belief that the upas is "deadly," and that birds flying over it are poisoned, and men and beasts resting beneath it are killed by its odours. The real facts are that the tree emits a volatile substance, which effects people with very sensitive skins. From the sap, the Dyaks of Borneo get the poison for their arrows. To obtain it, the bark of the tree is cut, and the milky juice collected on a palm-leaf. It is first of all dried in the sun, and then over the fire, when it becomes a thick brown mass. In this state it keeps a long time. When required for use, it is made into a thin paste with the juice of the "tuba" root, or with, tobacco or lemon-juice The arrows are made of the middle stem of the palm-leaf, and are from 6 in. to 8 in. long, and of the thickness of a knitting needle. These being tipped with the poison are shot from a wooden blowpipe known as a sumpitan. This is 7ft. or 8ft. long, and a quarter of an inch in diameter. A bird hit with a poisoned arrow is killed instantly, and pig dies in 20 minutes. Mr. M. Pelletier and Caventon issolated and active principle from the upas poison, which they named antiarin. Another species, upas tiente, a climbing plant, furnishes an arrow poison even more effective than the ordinary upas tree. Borneo and the islands of the East Indies are the native country of the upas. The first-named upas belongs to the section of the great nettle order.

The green hair of the sloth has long been a subject of interest among naturalists. The Quarterly Journal of Microscopical Science contains an interesting study of the hair of the sloth by Dr. W. G. Ridewood. The hair of the three-toed sloths consists of a central core, or medulla, with an outer layer, or cortex. Outside this, again is an extra layer, which develops transverse cracks or fissures. In these grow single-celled green algae. In the warm moist climate of Brazil these little plants grow luxuriantly, and give the sloth its characteristic green coat. And in its green surroundings its green hair throws over it the garment of invisibility. In captivity in this country the hair of the sloth losses its green colour.

A correspondent of the Outlook writing on the subject of eels, mentions a rather peculiar fact. He says: "Perhaps your readers are not aware of a very interesting fact, namely, that in Europe there are no eels in the rivers flowing east, such as the Denube, etc, and in South Africa there are no eels in the rivers flowing west, such as the Orange River. I have lived many years in Hungary, and that is how I came to know about this curious fact. It would be interesting to know about other parts of the world."

Blackbirds, it is known, will do many things; but the following story of a fight with a cat may be worth recording. The clerk and sexton at the Beckenham Parish Church found two young blackbirds in the churchyard. He placed these in a cage outside his house, where the old birds found them. They used to feed them, starting sometimes at three o'clock in the morning. One morning whilst engaged in his work, the hen bird was seized by a cat, whereupon the cock attacked it furiously, and with such a commotion as to attract an attendant in the churchyard, with the result that the hen was rescued.

Red will annoy a turkey cock as much as a bull; but a sparrow will not let it disturb its mind. But if one shakes a blue rag in front of a caged sparrow's eyes he will go frantic with disgust. Sparrows and linnets, too, will refuse food offered them on a piece of blue paper, and dislike the appearance of anyone wearing a blue dress. Medium light blue affects them most, but blue serge they scarcely mind at all. Thrushes and blackbirds object to yellow, but will use red or blue dried grasses left about their haunts to build the outer layers of their nests. Yellow grasses they will not use.

An African thumbless monkey is among the recent additions to the London "Zoo." The monkeys of the genus Colobos differ from the rest of the African monkeys in having uniformly coloured fur. In the present species the body is clothed with moderately long jet-black hair; the head and shoulders are ornamented with long grey hair, and the long tail is white. A curious thing about these monkeys is the entire absence of thumbs. In this they resemble the sacred monkeys of India, in which the thumbs, if present at all, are in a very rudimentary condition. From this we may suppose that the thumb would not be of much use in climbing. The American spider monkeys have no thumbs; but they have what no old world monkeys possess, perfectly prehensile tails. The tail of the Colobus monkey—long, white, and often ending in a large turf—is distinctly an ornament though it would seem to be of very little use to its owner.

The use and significance of the "saw" of the saw-fish is discussed in a German natural history periodical. The author points out that the few observers who have seen the animal living have not, apparently, noticed the real use of the saw. A study of the cotnents of the stomach of the saw-fish, and the peculiar articulation of the skull with the vertebral column, leads to the conclusion that the saw is used primarily for rapid grubbing and burrowing in the mud and gravel. A secondary use may be protective, but there is no evidence that the saw is used as a weapon for ramming. Albert Gunther, in an article on the Rays, to which group the saw-fish belong, says: "The saw is a most formidable weapon of offence, by means of which the fish tears pieces of flesh off the body of its victim, or rips open its abdomen, to feed on the protruding intestines." "Saws," 6ft. long and 1ft. bread at the base are of comman occurrence.

Cormorants, as it is well known, are most destructive to fish, and, as they are extremely wary birds, they are exceedingly difficult to approach and destroy. A lessee of a Scottish loch some time ago inquired, through the Fishing Gazette what could be done to destroy a colony of cormorants which frequented a tiny rocky island in the centre of the loch, and from their stronghold made depredations in the surrounding waters. Various remedies were suggested, but the most practical is one we subjoin, as we think that it is a capital idea, and the hint may be useful to some of our readers who desire to destroy obnoxious birds. Here is the suggestion of the Vicomte de Poncins:—If the birds are usually coming to a small island of about five square yards, it ought to be possible to destroy them by putting some glue on the rocks. To make a good glue, lasting a good long time without getting hard, and not spoilt by rain or water, take about a gallon of "huile de lin," or linseed oil, set fire to it until about one-half of the whole lot is burnt, them put the fire out and let it cool. It will be easy to bring it down to a proper consistency by setting it on fire again if too liquid, but one has to remember that as long as it is hot it keeps more fluid than when it is cold. It will be right when in a sort of jelly. A few hints to make it: Take an old pail to burn it in, as it will be ruined for good and ever; to set fire to the oil, warm it up on a fire before, or take a spoonful of it and when on the fire throw it in the pail: do it outside, as the smoke and smell are most offensive; have a large piece of wet cloth to throw over the burning pail to put the fire out, as nothing will stop it but that. Now to use it: Cut a few twigs about fifteen inches long, perfectly clean and pliant, about the size of a knitting-needle, cover them over with the glue and stick them in every place on the rocks—they must be standing on end and closely fixed, so as to stick to the bird touching them—then cover the rocks with glue and watch a cormorant coming. If things are well prepared, he will never fly again, but get hopelessly glued.

An Australian has been timing the motions of an ant. The little creature was three-sixteenths of an inch long, and the observer found that he travelled at the rate of about 250 yards in an hour, or a mile in seven hours two minutes. Comparing his length with that of a horse, the latter should, if his locomotive power were in proportion to his length, be able to travel fifty-four miles per hour. This comparison is, however, unfair to the horse. Powers of locomotion, of leaping, of flight, and so forth are not, and cannot conceivably be, proportioned to dimensions A horse twice as bulky as another may have twice the muscular force, but he has also twice the weight to carry. Moreover, the energy varies as the square of the velocity, and a body moving twice as fast as another will require the expenditure of four times the energy. In all problems concerning the running, leaping, or flying powers of animals, questions arise not only of mass, but of anatomical and physiological construction, which defy numerical computation.

We have all of us heard of skunk fur, and those of us who possess it know that it retains its peculiar odour to the very last. But that there is an oil of commercial value derived from this animal is news to us. Official returns from Augusta, the capital of the State of Maine, tell us that that State produces this oil to the value of thirty thousand dollars annually. The oil is said to possess great curative properties, especially in cases of asthma, and is worth two dollars the gallon. The malodorous secretion which has gained for this little animal its unenviable reputation is contained in a highly developed pair of perineal glands placed near the base of the tail. This secretion it is able to eject to the distance of eight or ten feet, and it is stated that the large banner-like tail is carried aloft as a warning to its foes. The skunk is found all over the North American continent, from Hudson Bay to Guatemala. According to Dr. Merriam, it is the invaluable friend of the farmer, as it destroys innumerable insects of all kinds, and vast numbers of mice. Strangley, perhaps, it has not died out before civilisation, but easily holds its own. If the glands are removed, the flesh is very edible, and is eaten not only by Indians, but by whites also.

One of the members of a surveying expedition to the High Andes of Quito, Ecuador, has discovered a new species of Bush-dog. Two skins and skulls have been sent to Paris, and are described in a recent number of the Comptes Rendus by Dr. E. L. Trouessart. Hitherto only one species of this remarkable genus of dogs has been known. This is the Speothos venaticus, a native of Guiana and Brazil, until within the last few years one of the rarest of mammals in our museums. The remarkable point about the bush-dog is that though undoubtedly belonging to the dog family, Canidae, it is outwardly more like a badger, or marten. The new species has been named Speothos Rivetí, after its discoverer. With short, close, woolly fur of a mouse grey colour, it is so like a badger that it is difficult to realise that it belongs to the Canidae. On the back and tail are a number of longer white-tipped black hairs, while the tail itself is curiously flattened with a vane of elongated hairs on each side, and a terminal tuft of black. The Brazilian bush-dog, it may be noted, was formerly placed by zoologists in the marten family, the Mustelidae while the old generic name Icticyon means marten-dog. In renaming the genus Speothos that is, cave-jackal, its true position in the dog family is recognised.

The Story Teller.

AN ALL-ROUND SPORTSMAN.

SOME years ago, in fact rather more than I care to remember, I made one of a party invited to dine with Sir John——, then Master of the—— hounds. It was in an out-of-the-way country and, at the period of which I write, far from any railway. Being a stranger to those parts, I was not a little surprised when the friend who drove me pulled up before a low thatched cottage. "Not a very grand habitation for a M. F. H.," said my friend; "but you will find every comfort within, and a welcome such as is not every day met with."

"Walk in please, gentlemen; Master is dressing, and will be down directly," said Will, who was whip in the field and butler in the house and we were shown into a low-pitched room that at once indicated the habits of the owner. On either side of the wood fire burning brightly on the hearth was a large easychair covered with the skin of a favourite hunter, which having borne its Master safely and well whilst alive, still in a way contributed to his comfort. Around the walls hung portraits of favourite horses and hounds. On an easel was an unfinished picture of Sir John himself, his men, and hounds at a favourite fixture. On a side table littered with books was a flute and violin. One side of the room was covered entirely with bookshelves filled with the choicest authors. Guns, rods, cricket bats, racing whips, hunting crops, and spurs seemed to be indiscriminately scattered over the whole room.

The living occupants of this single apartment were almost as curious; for on one easy chair lay a small fox-terrier nursing a litter of pups; on the other was a large rough-coated tortoiseshell cat with a tail much resembling the brush of a fox; whilst on the hearth-rug snored a black and tan-terrier, and curled up in the circle of his legs, and using his body for a pillow, lay a mite of a toy terrier of the same colour, and hardly to be distinguished from his aristocratic friend.

"You can judge of the man from his surrounding," said my friend, looking round: "painter and musician, but possessing therewith as strong a love of sport of every description, from rat catching upwards. Here he comes to answer for himself."

"You must take things in the rough at a bachelor's crib," said Sir John, extending his hand. "I hope you are none the worse for the gallop yesterday."

"On the contrary, I was delighted to witness such a splendid run, and to see the way in which your hounds did their work."

"They are steady," replied Sir John; "we breed them to hunt. It is no use if they won't put their heads down in this country; but here is the dinner, so let us discuss that first and the merits of the pack afterwards."

Small as was Sir John's establishment, and also his income, he was far too good a judge to keep either a bad cook or bad liquor, so the meal passed off perhaps better than a more elaborate affair would have done, and as we drew our chairs to the fire the conversation once more turned on sport.

"I have been admiring that fox-terrier of yours," exclaimed.

"Yes, she is very handsome, and a good bred one," remarked our host, taking up the terrier by one ear and holding her at arm's length. "Would you like to see what she can do in the way of rat killing?"

"Indeed I should," I replied; "but have you a rat p here?"

"Don't trouble about a pit, but just touch that bell on your right, and we will see how Will is off for rats." "Now Will," said he, as that factotum appeared to answer the summons, "what rats have you on hand, these gantlemen are anxious to see how Nell performs."

"Well, sir, there is a couple of score old Sid brought yesterday, and over thirty we caught the other day in Hayloft's barn, all fresh and lively as ever.

"That will do; catch a score and bring them in."

"Yes, sir," and away went Will

"Hi! here, take Tiny, Twinkle, and the cat out of the way."

"Yes sir," again replied the whip, touching his forelock, as he removed the animals. He soon returned with a sack on his back, out of which he shook a score of old grey rats on the floor greatly to the amusement of my friend and myself.

"You keep time G——," said the Master, as he let the bitch slip from his knee.

In an instant she was at work amongst them. In all directions scattered the rats, but calm and collected, her attention was not to be divided: one rat she settled on pursued and killed, then took the next that came to hand, occasionally doing for two at a time when she caught them in a corner; and despite a little chasing about the room, in a very few minutes not a rat was alive.

"The time?" said Sir John.

"Five minutes and a half," replied G—: "by no mean bad under the conditions; this is very different from a pit."

"Yes," I exclaimed, "it's certainly the first time I ever saw ratting carried on in a dining-room."

"So I expect," replied Sir John; "but we do things in a strange way in this outlandish place. That large cat you saw is far from a despicable ratter, I can assure you, and can dispose of a dozen or so in very reasonable time. But what amusement are you on for now? Will you see some of my fellows take a turn with the gloves, or if you like it better we can set a cock or two, with muffled spurs, for your amusement."

"Oh! the gloves by all means," said my friend who was no mean athlete himself.

"Then I think we can show you such a treat that you will scarcely see out of London or Birmingham, or at any rate amongst the fancy, light your pipe and let us go into the hall."

No sooner were we comfortably settled then Will the whip and Joe the stableman made their appearance, and having donned the gloves, shook hands, and put themselves into position. Both fine men in the prime of life, lithe and active there they stood watching each other's movements, ready to advance or retire, as needful. Will was rather the heaviest, but Joe had all the advantage of length and reach, and as they feinted and reached towards each other, many an attitude was assumed, graceful in its pose as that of a Grecian statue. Then came the rally lightning-like blows and returns delivered so quickly that the eye could scarcely follow the movement of the arm, slinging hits avoided by a turn of the head, or a slight step on one side or the other, in fact, all that facility of avoiding danger was manifested that only practice can give. At length, after a sharp rally, the Master called a halt, and they dropped their hands each flushed with the exertion, but smiling and unruffled as when they began.

Then, when they had been dismissed to get some ale in the kitchen, and we had shown our appreciation of the performance by a douceur, my friend would in no ways be satisfied without a trial of strength with our host, but found to his astonishment that good as he was allowed to be amongst the men of his college the fox-hunter, though older by some fifteen summers, was more than his match in quickness of eye and freedom of limb. So he learnt that a man may be painter, poet, and musician without becoming effeminate, and also possess the deepest love of sport and the frame of the athlete without despising the arts and refinements of life. This was the more impressed on us when Sir John sang us some songs of his own composing in a clear deep voice that seemed to rouse his soul like a trumpet or accompanied himself with such exquisite feeling on the violin to some mournful ditty that he almost brought tears into the eyes of his listeners.

"A fine fellow that," said I as we were on our homeward journey.

"Yes," returned my friend. "You would not suspect that he had taken orders."

"Indeed I should not."

"Such is the case," howeveer. He stood very high in his college, and could he have made up his mind to stick to the Church, its most tempting prizes would have been open to him. But the love of sport was too strong, and he preferred freedom, and a scanty income to placing himself in a situation uncongenial to his tastes.

THE WEARING OF THE BREEKS.

Now where on earth we're coming to
Is very hard to know,
And whether things are better now
Than they were long ago.
But 'tisn't good that woman should Get everything she seeks,
And gain a shameless victory
By wearing of the breeks.
She can't at all unsex herself
By showing how to teach,
A sermon or a lecture even
Is not beyond her reach.
But soon some other point is reached,
When out her husband speaks
And says; "na! na! this winna do,
She shanna wear the breeks."

She first began with doctoring
Until she got M. D.
Then nothing else would please her
But the male M. A degree.
Then comes a taste for toddy eeks
And stealthy cigarettes,
The next will be fishwifies' pipes
For these bold suffragettes.
Her rank as schoolboard member men
Are not disposad to grudge;
Of sewing, knitting, cookery
She's a most efficient judge.
But with these she's not content,
And earnestly she seeks To deal with matters masculine
And claims to wear the breeks.

Then if she got her heart's desire
And leave to give her vote
For politicians I'd advise
You carefully to note;
Herself would be M.P. and doff
The skirt of graceful Greeks
And don the kilt and sporran
Or dowdy lowland breeks.
Nor stops she there, she'll read up law
And come to plead in court,
In cases of adultery,
Divorce, and all that sort.
Then mount the bench and as "My Lord"
Bring blushes to the cheeks
Of young and modest advocates
And all who wear the breeks.

If once a woman gets an inch
She fain would take an ell,
And in some certain cases this Might all be very well.
But there are others into which
Too curiously she keeks,
And makes her douce gudeman cry out
"Na! faith, I'll wear the breeks,
"Just keep", says he, "to visiting,
To gossiping, and teas,
And teach the bairnies to behave
With mensefuness and ease;
But pullets should an craw like cocks,
Nor girls try mannish freaks
For womon's noblest work is done
Without the aid of breeks

A NEGLECTED HUNTING-FIELD.

Of few countries lying hard by the great ocean trade routes in the big game fauna so little known to the sporting and scientific world or in that of Palestine and Syria, Arabia, it is true, stands in this respect on much the same footing; but with the difference that the greater part of it at any rate is more or less completely closed to Europeans, while there is little or no difficulty in regard to access to Palestine and a considerable portion of Syria, special arrangements would, no doubt, have to be made if a long trip into the heart of the Syrian desert were contemplated, but the difficulties connected with such an excursion ought not to be greater than those which are successfully overcome by sportsmen and travellers in similar districts in other parts of the world. The greater portion of the little we know with regard to the big game animals of Palestine and Syria is embodied in a little work by the late Canon H. B. Tristram published so long ago as the year 1907 under the title of the "Natural History of the Bible;—a work unfortunately marred from the fact that the illustrations include a considerable number of trade woodcuts depicting species other than those they purport to represent. Although the author, who was a good all-round naturalist of the old-fashioned type, spent a considerable amount of time travelling about the country, a very large proportion of the information he acquired regarding big game was obtained from native sources, and is therefore far less trustworthy than is desirable, while in some cases it appears to rest solely on mere rumour. In all these doubtful cases authentic information, accompanied if possible by actual spoils of the animals referred to, is most urgently required, so that we may be enabled to say definitely once for all whether or no they really are denizens of the country.

From the fact that Palestine and Syria form the connecting link, both geographically and zoologically, between Africa and the mainland of the Asiatic Continent, the area is one of more than ordinary interest to the students of the geographical distribution of animals, so that there is a special reason why the present state of ignorance with regard to its mammal fauna should not be suffered to continue.

As regards of carnivora of the country, it appears that the larger species include the lion, the leopard, the hunting leopard or chita, the lynx, perhaps the caracal, and the Syrian race of the brown bear, together with wolves, hyænas, and jackals. For a long period the lion has been scarce, and exact information is required with regard to its present distribution, and also whether the Syrian representative of the species comes nearest to the Indian and Persian or to the North African race. Much the same may be said with regard to the leopard, which in Tristram's time was stated to be still fairly common in the wooded districts of Gilead; these also apparently being the chief haunts of the hunting leopard. Skins of all these three species from Palestine or Syria would be most acceptable for the purposes of study and comparison at the British Museaum.

Greater interest and more important problems attach to the hoofed mammals of these countries, which form the main subject of the present article. The Sinaitic peninsula is the home of a race of the African ibex, or bedin (Capra Nubiana) apparently differing from the typical Nubian representative of the species by the sharper and less boldly knotted front ridge of its horns. In this respect it seems to make an approximation to the pasang or wild goat (Capra nircus oegagrus of the mountains of Armenia and Persia; and it would be of the greatest interest to asscertain whether there are any indications of a transition between the two species to the northward of Damascus. According to Canon Tristram, the bedin is (or was) comparatively common in several parts of Palestine, especially in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea. Great interest attaches to the fact that in the Bible there are two Hebrew words which are translated "wild goat"; and it has been suggested that while one of these indicates the bedin, the other refers to the passang. Tristram indeed considers it probable that the latter formerly extended into Palestine, although he was unable to state anything definite with regard to this point, which is one concerning which any authentic information would be of the greatest interest.

As regards wild sheep, we are in a state of absolute ignorance. Tristram suggested that the Hebrew word zemer, translated chamois in our version of the Bible, may be the Barbary sheep, or udad, and that the species may inhabit the mountains of Arabia Petræa. On the other hand, he was of opinion that the wild sheep now known as the Armenian muflon (Civis gmelini) may also be found in Palestine or Syria. Both suggestions are quite within the bounds of probability, although at present there seems no tangible evidence by which they can be supported.

Turning to antelopes, we have just to mention the dorcas gazelle (Gazella dorcas) as by far the most abundant of the big game animals of Palestine. It appears to be the species referred to in our version of the Bible as the roe. That the bubal hartebrest (Bubalis boselaphus) of North Africa ranges into Palestine, is definitely admitted by Tristram, although the evidence might well be more decisive. "It lives," he writes "in small herds. I never myself found it in Palestine, but the Jehalin Arabs knew it well by its North African name Vekk'r el-wash=wild cow), and assured me they often obtained it when it came to drink at the streams on the east side of the Dead Sea." Much more unsatisfactory is the evidence with regard to the occurrence in this part of Asia of the addax antelope (Addax nasomaculatus), which is likewise typically a denizen of the North African deserts. Dr. Tristram, who believes it to be the animal designated "pygarg" in the Bible, states that "the addax has a wide range, being found rather commonly, but not in large herds, in the Sahara, Nubia, Egypt, and Arabia. I never obtained it, but have b en near enough to identify it by its horns, on the Arabah, to the south of the Dead Sea, where it is well known to the Bedouin." So far as we are aware, there is no evidence, beyond reports and "shap-shots" of this nature to show that the addax exists anywhere in Asia, although there is not the slightest reason why it should not.

As regards the reputed occurrences of the white or scimitar-horned (oryx (Oryx leucoryx) in the country Canon Tristram writes as follows:—"The oryx is still found on the confines of the Holy Land, though strictly an inhabtant of the deserts, and, although I never obtained it, I have been quite near enough to it to identify it by the shape of its horns. They are frequently to be purchased in the bazaar of Damascus." The last sentence affords strong testimony in favour of the occurrence of this antelope, as its horns are scarcely likely to be imported. The existence of the smaller Beatrix (O. beatrix) in Southern Arabia is also in favour of the occurrence of this species in the country.

As regards deer, it seems certain that the roebuck of the Bible refers, as already mentioned, to the gazelle or some other antelope. There is, however, the Hebrew word ayyal, translated hart in our Bible, which appears to refer undoubtedly to the deer tribe. "What species of deer," writes Canon Tristram, "intended by ayyal is not clear." Unless the term be general, it must be either the fallow deer, or the red deer. The former is a native of Persia. and was probably common in the more wooded and fertile parts of the country - but it is now all but extinct in Palestine. Hasselquist met with it on mount Tabor, where we were told it is still to be found, as well as in the woods between that mountain and the gorge of the Litany River. We ourselves only met with a single animal in an open glade about ten miles west of the Sea of Galilee.

"Though no red deer is now found in Egypt, yet we find it depicted in the temples, and a race still lives in Morocco, Algeria, and Tunis, and probably, in ancient times, extended right across North Africa. The Syrian deer may very possibly have been the same in the south, while the European red deer may have extended from the Caucasus through Taurus to the Lebanon."

The existence of any form of red deer, during historical times, in Palestine and Syria is thus purely hypothetical. As regards the fallow deer, Canon Tristram was unaware that the fallow deer of the Luristan Province of Persia is a species (Cervus mesopotamicus) quite distinct from the European C. dama. If any fallow deer still linges in the Tabor district, it remains to prove if they agree with the former or the latter, or if they form a connecting link between the two.

The gist of the foregoing observations is to show that although a sportsman is not likely to make a big bag in the country, there is a grand opportunity for him to do an important service to zoology by ascertaining what species of big game ruminants really do inhabit Syria and Palestine, and in what districts they are to be found. We believe that one gentleman, well known as a big game hunter in all the four quarters of the globe, is making a trip into the country during the present season, but he is scarcely likely to exhaust all that is known about its fauna It may be added that skins and skulls of the Syrian wild ass would be most acceptable to the national collection.

Sporting Notes.

THE Annual General Meeting of the Calcutta Turf Club was held last Friday evening, and the following gentlemen were elected Stewards for the ensuing year: Messrs. A. A. Apcar, W. Garth, J. G. Dickson, J. G. West, and G. B. Deakin.

THE addition to the lists of Stewards of Mr. Deakin will give general satisfaction because he has practical experience of the executive work as also of the art of race riding. In other respects too, which it would be superflous to enumerate, he is eminently fitted for the post which every year increases in responsibility.

FORTUNE has been swift to reward Mr. Apcar for his bold purchase of Auber, as the colt has already won him a stake of £1,000. Having regard to his heavy list of engagements in England and also to the overpowering strength of Watson's present string in India, it seems quite possible that his voyage to India will be deferred. Great Scot is in strong training and is, it is said, to be let go once more in the Spring Handicaps.

MOST of the horses in Mr. Charles' stable have changed hands, but Steinhager is summering at Bangalore and will have to be reckoned with in all calculations for next year's Viceroy's Cup. Mr. Bell Irving is not expected out next cold weather and will no doubt have a good season's hunting instead, a complaint from which most of us in India would like to suffer!

THE third Stand on the Calcutta course will soon be on its way up as work has already begun on the foundations. The appearance and form of this Stand will be very similar to those of the Members' Stand and will provide almost perfect accommodation for the public as measured by the past season's attendances. It is expected that the additional space available in the Members' Stand will be required for the new "Stand" Members of the Turf Club. There are a considerable number of names ready to place on the ballot boxes, but no one seems anxious to give a lead and so far no candidates are reported to have appeared. On the number of these elections will depend the future arrangement of the Members' Stand. The splendid seats on the second storey are not likely to be much patronized by Members so long as there is sufficient accommodation lower down and a row of boxes may be placed here to attract people up the extra flight of steps or that part of the Stand may be thrown open to the public who would appreciate its proximity to the Paddock and might be counted upon to use it extensively.

DRAINAGE operations in the Calcutta Monsoon course are still progressing and the latest attempt is being directed to clear the big hollow inside the hospital opening. The new idea, judging from the nature of the excavations, appears to comprise an underground pipe leading from the culvert at the lower end of the big moat alongside the riding track to the jail tank. It is evident that some improvement is necessary at this point which will be a most important one on the new Monsoon course. It would be nice to see a start made on the lengthening of the culvert on the Ellenborough side of the Hurdle course, but no doubt this much discussed improvement is not being forgotten by the Executive. The new alignment of the Hurdle Race course, necessitated by the change of the winning post to a point opposite the New Stand, will be awaited with much interest. A peculiar feature of the old course was the close proximity of the last two flights to the finish and the shortness of the run in by reason of which many a race has been lost and won. This may or may not be reproduced on the new course, but there seems to be space for one flight only and a fair run in unless the winning flags are to be placed so far past the stand as to spoil the racing from a spectacular point of view. Probably the flights will be placed as far as possible in the old positions, but it would perhaps be better to plan out an entirely fresh arrangement.

THE programme for the Poona Races for next September is out. The First Day is fixed for Saturday, September 7th, and there will be racing every Wednesday and Saturday following until Saturday, the 28th. In all there will be seven meetings. The Poona Plate and Poona Derby are down for the Second Day, Wednesday, the 11th; and on Saturday, the 14th, will be decided the Aga Khan's Cup which is of the value of £100, the winner to receive also Rs. 5,700. The Western India Stakes (Rs. 10,000) will be run on the Fifth Day, Saturday, the 21st.

WE have to acknowledge receipt of a complimentary copy of Vol. XXIII of that indispensable turf guide The Australian Racing Chronicle. It can be obtained of Messrs. Thacker Spink and Co., Calcutta.

MUSSOORIE is beginning to fill with its hot weather visitors and pleasure or health seekers. The races are fixed for the 16th and 18th proximo and the Polo Tournament is to begin on the 6th idem.

AFTER a good trial of a dog-food recently submitted to us for opinion we were inclined to exclaim with Archimedes of old—"Eureka." We refer to the meat and vegetable biscuits, and the dog-bread made by Messrs. Swallow and Ariell, the Australian biscuit makers whose special delicacies for humans already enjoy a wide popularity in India. Thirty years' experience of keeping dogs in this country convinced us that most of the patent preparations designed to replace the natural food of our canine friend fell more or less short of the mark; as a matter of fact, tired of the struggle against mustiness, mould, and weevil, we had long since given them up as unsuitable. Thus it was a surprise to find that close at hand was to be had the very thing we had given up as unobtainable. These meat and vegetable cakes are put up in attractive form and handy size, are packed in 14-lb. tins, are not only nourishing, but distinctly helpful in preparing a dog for show or getting him quickly into condition, while they are so palatable that dogs take to them readily. They require to be merely soaked in water or may be given dry. The "dog-bread" is also excellent; if used as a whole food it would need the addition of broth. We had some success at the recent C. K. C. show and received the compliments of one of the judges on the condition of our exhibits; it is only fair to say that during their preparation for the show, these dog cakes and bread figured prominently in their dietary scale. Any of our dog-owning readers desirous of further particulars may have them of Messrs. G. Knowles and Co. of Calcutta who represent the manufacturers.

THE Mysore Birthday Polo Tournament begins on Monday, 24th June; it is open to teams (ponies limited to 18 each) representing any regiment, depot or battery and members of any gymkhana or club. Entries close on the 10th June.

"WHY will so many people cling to the idea that chloroforming is the most merciful means of death possible for dumb animals?" asked a veterinarian recently. "Only the other day I was called upon to perform the trying and almost impossible task of killing an old horse in this way.

"The horse, it seems, had been the pet of a wealthy woman who left provision for him in her will and decreed that if ever the family to whose care she intrusted him should deem it necessary to end his life this should be done with cholroform, so that he might be assured a painless death. Then the horse became blind and otherwise disabled, and the family decided that death would be a mercy.

"Of course, the provision of the will had to be carried out, but no greater case of mistaken kindness could have been possible. It is impossible to administer sufficient chloroform at one time to kill an animal the size of a horse, so dose after dose had to be given, the poor brute slowly and painfully smothering to death.

"Chloroform is all right for cats or dogs, but for larger animals it is a positive cruelty, whereas a pistol, well aimed at the head of any beast, will send it out of life so quickly that it has not time to feel the shot or realize what has happened."

NEWS reaches us of the good sport being had by the Maharajah of Cooch Behar's shooting party. A week's driving produced a bag of four tigers, two leopards, four bears, and the usual miscellaneous items of deer, pig etc.

IT seems strange that, considering the number of experiments that are made in introducing new birds and animals into the British Isles, the chamois has never been tried in Scotland. In the days of William I. we believe the Duke of Fife obtained five chamois from Switzerland, with the view of turning them out in Mar Forest. The animals safely reached England; but the King, hearing of their arrival, expressed a wish to have them, and they were sent to Windsor, where they appeared to thrive, and produced several young ones. Unfortunately, the whole lot suddenly died, poisoned, it is supposed, by some herb that they had eaten. Experiments in introducing chamois into various parts of Europe prove that they soon become acclimatised, and, as a rule, do very well; so there does not appear any reason why they should not succeed in Scotland.

SOME instances of the voracity of the eel have reached us from New Zealand. A Maori recently caught an eel weighing 10lb. in the Maungatarera, not a very notable circumstance; but when it was opened it was found to contain two trout, one 10in. and the other 6in. in length. The eel was so distended after this meal that it was unable to move sufficiently fast to escape capture. Another New Zealander caught an eel which yielded up a small gosling when disembowelled. The resident had lost a number of young ducks and goslings, and was watching the pond one day when he saw a duckling disappear, and further investigation revealed a bloated eel making frantic efforts to swallow the web feet of its victim, which were the only parts visible. The eel's skin was hanging on an adjoining fence fifteen minutes later.

Two remarkably fine specimens of Lammergeyers or Bearded Vultures have lately been added to the collection of the Calcutta Zoological Garden. It is perhaps not generally known that the Lammergeyer is intermediate between the vultures and the eagles.

The Mick, while in South Africa during the Boer war, wrote home to his mother: "I would have written to you months ago, but I wasn't sure you would get the letter, as they are very often captured by the Boers. Now I am making a shift for Ladysmith, and expect to be confined there for some time." When the old lady got the letter, she showed it to some friends, and said, "When my boy, Mick, was at home, he wouldn't sew a button on his coat, and now, see, he's making shifts for Lady Smith."

One result of the new English Act requiring every dog to wear a collar with its owner's name and address seems to be a promise of a great increase in the number of the lost dogs which find their way to the Battersea Home. More than 6,000 dogs had been admitted to the Home up to the middle of February, a number greatly in excess of the usual figure, and it seems probable that, with the penalties of the new Act before their eyes as well as the ordinary payment for a dog license, a large number of unworthy dog-owners have preferred to "loose" their dogs at the beginning of the present year. As a similar order was enforced last year by the London County Council within the boundaries of its jurisdiction, this determination on the part of the people of London ought perhaps to be rather ascribed to experience of the past than pure anticipation for the future; but the effect is the same.

The same depressing influences in the dog world may also be responsible for the fact that many fewer people have lately called at the Battersea Dogs' Home to choose a pet from those otherwise destined for the chamber of painless extinction. The dogs which can be bought there for a few shillings are not, as a rule, of the purest breeding—well-bred dogs astray in the London streets are generally "found" by somebody—but they are often among the most intelligent and affectionate of their race. It is certainly sad to hear that the lethal chamber is claiming such a largely increased number of dogs who might be the idols and ornaments of so many appreciative homes.

We see that Mr. P. R. Butler, of the Royal Irish, Rawalpindi, has sold his fine racing pony The Butler. This pony has won nine races out of twelve starts this year: it is believed he will next be heard of in Burma.

In the course of some kindly comments on the dog show held in the Minto Fete, a correspondent of the Indian Kennel Gazette writes: "In all respects, the first Calcutta Kennel Club Show was a very successful one; it has, at a bound, assumed a remarkable prominence as one of the best kennel exhibitions in this country; and if as the Management believe they will greatly improve on it next year, they will no doubt attract up-country owners to it in still greater numbers, and the competition, keen as it was on this occasion, is likely to be still more pronounced."

Though advocates for the accomplishment of ambidexterity, in writing on the subject a year or so back we dwelt on the necessity of its being taught from infancy, ere the left limb had acquired the comparative clumsiness which distinguishes it in most people—at least among civilised nations. Dr. Lyttleton, the headmaster of Eton, appears to think otherwise, as he has recently decreed that impositions are in future to be written with the left hand. The intentions of the worthy Canon are no doubt influenced by the worthiest motives, but from all accounts do not meet with the approval of the peccant youngsters under his charge, for enforcing this laborious penalty will make sad inroads on their hours of recreation and, according to a home paper, the majority of the scions of the upper classes who are consigned to that time-honored seat of learning for rudimentary education, have expressed the opinion that a return to the "swishing block" of the renowned Dr. Keates would be preferable. Should however other schoolmasters adopt the innovation parents and guardians will have forced upon them the necessity of inculcating the equal use of both limbs from infancy; the advantages of which are too obvious to be questioned.

Another matter we wrote about is being ventilated; this was alternately changing the seat in the side saddle. Those at home, however, go further, insisting on the abolition of the side saddle altogether; eminent medical men giving it as their opinion that adoption of the male seat on horseback is attended with no more physical drawbacks than biking and that the use of the present rather cumbersome apparatus is apt, among young riders of the softer sex, to set up spinal troubles, in after life. Since initiation of the controversy, letters from our colonies and other countries, in which the chief means of getting about is on horseback, have poured in in favor of the change.

Our Bombay correspondent writes:—We have had a busy time this week, but neither of the race days was favourable to punters as on Thursday one absolute favourite and an equal favourite only came in. The Little Consolation Plate saw a run on Advocate-General who was known to have run Calcutta to a head at a stone difference. He was only giving away a pound now and being unable to keep with his field at the start only began to gallop on warming up. Ariff, a young grey, was said to have done even time outside but once Calcutta came up it was all over. Another good thing went wrong in the New Arab Race when, on his running behind Spearmint, Express was reasonably expected to win. After getting away with the front batch Heeroo allowed himself to be passed and drop back with the result that the effort of catching his field again was too much and a place was all he could get.

After being scratched from the first race, Gaucho was palpably thrown into the Losers' Plate and won very easily. Emir, who has been "dicky" till recently, ran a game pony in front but was easily passed and, the finish was a procession. In the Horse Consolation there was again a run on Epitome and Blue Blood when at the last moment Virballa was the order and made equal favourite. This pony early went ahead and Melsom keeping a nice hold, stayed out very comfortably.

Scarlet's game finish when he came up to dead-heat with Gladiator over six furlongs was enough to suggest his getting an extra ufrlong, but punters preferred Hadhur who had made the pace so hot over nine furlongs in the Tenth Extra, though now he had two stone five pounds more to carry. Weight told and Scarlet came away nicely after lying handy. This was the beginning of another series of upsets, the next being in the second New Arab Race, when Basheer was made a very warm favourite. Romance and the favourito were in front at the bend, the latter going rather the better when he ran across Bradshaw on the former and both lost any chance they may have had. Heeroo took advantage of this and won with something to spare from the unknown Ariel and the Barb who had cut out the pace in the early stages. Strained tendon and all, Asad was a steady favourite in a field of three for the Selling Plate but, to put in briefly, he was six lengths behind Greylock at the finish, the latter barely making Canter keep out of a walk. This led up to the upset of the day when Scipio was made favourite and, running out at the bend, let in Jalmood who was passed by Jubbulpore on the post before the favourite could be got on his legs again.

The Thirteenth Extra brought out another Saturday crowd. In the opening event, the New Pony Selling Plate, Jalmood after numerous scratchings, was the only one to have shown any sort of form over more than half a mile, and that only a second in the poor time of 1·10 2/5. He was made a strong favourite from Glass who seems to be running on now. As expected, Glass early came in front, but instead of coming back to Jalmood, these being the only two in it, be stayed on and won after an exciting chase. A terrible upset followed in the Small Arab Consolation for which Young Gazelle was thought a "cert" with Musket and Little Joker to fight out the one place. Engine jumped away, but instead of stopping, stuck gamely to his guns and a desperate finish ensued, Little Joker inside and Young Gazelle outside, joined in the hunt at the bend with the leader and Musket and the result was in doubt till the numbers went up; not more than a length dividing the first four and, with a better run, the favourite should have won.

First of two stylish wins by Vining came next in the Verar Plate when, in a very open betting race, Hermit was better fancied than Zurriff, Antica, Mint, and False Start. The first of these had shot his bolt at the bend, but the favourite and tne other three with Sir Jamal leading were in a line at the distance. Sir Jamal stuck finely to his guns, but Vining sat down to work on Hermit drove him along on the outside to win by a mere head. Mint dashed in between Antica and False Start and just scraped home half a length behind—not more than a length and a quarter separating the first and fifth.

The Consolation Plate for Horses followed and was won cleverly by Vocalist. The Arab Consolation resulted in another magnificent finish. Considering he had already run a seven furlongs, Antica in this mile race ran extraordinarily well after making all the running. He held this till well into the straight when Vining came up handling Nooman nicely into a gap he found on the rails. He led at the distance but, with Antica still hanging on, only got home by a head.

The Pony Hunters' Flat promised an interesting race with Akbar Khan an acknowledged stayer always a good favourite from Khurdie with Mr. Owen Symous and Captain Meynell up respectively. This resulted in an absolute procession as going clean away, Akbar Khan won cantering by twenty lengths.

Last was the Selling Plate when, after a run on Court Martial, money came to make Canter favourite. He looked a certain winner at the bend and had Hoyt made sure by going away he would probably have won. As it was, Court Martial answered the whip gamely and, catching the favourite, won a great race by a length.

Athletic Notes.

Mr. T. Barton will be remembered by many people in Calcutta as the smart high-jumper who came up from Rangoon in 1905, and cleared 5ft. 10in. at the B. P. A. A. A. sports. His record, made at the Burma A. A. Meeting the same year was 5ft 11¼; this he has now beaten. At the Toungoo Police School Sports, Burma, held last week, he cleared 6ft. 2in., a really remarkable performance seeing that the World's record is 6ft. 5⅝. At the A. A. A. Championship in England, 6ft. has only once been exceeded since 1866, that was in 1883 when J. W. Parsons cleared 6ft. 0¼in. at the 'Varsities 5ft. 8in. is considered a good jump; at most of the big athletic meetings at Home the average is 5ft. 7in., while only once last year was Barton's record approached, viz. when Con. Leahy jumped 6ft. 0¼in. at the Irish International meeting held at Dublin in June.

Probably certain Calcutta golfers will be attracted to the new links at Frasergunge where, during Easter, arrangements have been made for a competition over nine holes. The only thing that will make Frasergunge a really popular holiday resort is the provision of facilities for outdoor recreation—golf, tennis, shooting, sea-bathing, fishing and boat sailing—we note with pleasure the "thin end of the wedge."

According to what one reads and hears the recent boxing match in Rangoon between Sam Newman and Sergeant Smith of the Devons, was remarkable for some unique refereeing and judging. Our contemporary The Rangoon Times expresses itself thus:—Judging and refereeing in Rangoon—according to the "result" of the Newman-Smith contest—is about as dependable as the tossing of a coin. The verdict was ridiculously improper. There was not the slightest justification for according a draw on form alone. Smith had no comparison with his opponent. We regard Smith as a clever pugilist, but he is no match for Newman, and a fight to the finish with three-minute rounds would decide matters. Smith made a fine stand, but Newman obviously held himself back through the first dozen rounds and missed several easy opportunities. At the conclusion of the fifteenth round Newman appeared fit for another half dozen and in spite of the disgraceful show of partisanship which uninformed occupants of the gallery maintained throughout the contest. Newman kept his temper and fought a clean, strictly honourable battle. It is really surprising that professional pugilists should risk a visit to Rangoon when they know what to expect from irresponsible and over-enthusiatic soldiers in the gallery. The remarkable feature of the contest is that no effort was made by the officials to check disquieting interpolations and applause. We do not suggest that they had not the moral courage to do so or to give a victory to the better man. But we would very much prefer that in public exhibitions of the kind judgment should be left to officials who are acknowledged as authorities, or at all events who are competent to give not only their decisions but their reasons for them. There is no justification whatever for the verdict of a drawn match. As we have said Smith fought a highly praise-worthy battle — though he looked more than his weight; but Newman—despite the combined decision of the judges and referee—was the better man and fairly won the fight. In future matches it would be well for officials to study points and not rely upon mere memory. We do not think any one of the officials could fully describe one single round of the whole fifteen, yet the professional visitor is compelled to accept their hurried and perfunctory decision.

From our exchanges we learn that an enormous crowd witnessed the race for the World's Sculling Chamionship between Towns and Durnan on the Nepean River. Towns started favourite at 2 to 1 on. At the quarter-mile Durnan led by half a length, but at half a mile (3 min. 9 sec.) Towns was half a length to the good. At a mile and a half (9 min. 49 sec.) he was three lengths ahead, and led by the same margin at two miles (13 min. 45 sec.). The same order was maintained to the finish, Towns winning by three lengths in 22 min. 27 sec.

The European Amateur Billiard Championship at Pyrke's Saloon has at last been decided after a tremendous amount of enthusiasm which led to the room being packed both for the final of the eliminating round on Monday and the actual final on Thursday. Mr. C. Louth has come out victorious and on the form he has shown throughout thoroughly merits it. Neither of the games can be said to have been very good or exciting as, steady as steel, the winner had both Mr. Avery and then Mr. Pyrke beat soon after the start.

Avery struck me as having an attack of nerves and missed the most ridiculously easy shots, breaking down after going well whenever the balls ran for him. Louth on the other hand gave a most finished exhibition, though he too broke down frequently at very easy shots and made no breaks to speak of. With a lead of a hundred on reaching the fourth century he eventually ran out with a pretty 2+; his best were 31,30,26,24 incomplete, 21 and 20. Avery, 24 and 23 twice and the final scores, 500 to 374.

On Thursday he found Pyrke in very bad form and unable to get going at all. Louth continued in great form, bringing off with admirable execution the most difficult shots and playing to leave with the nicest accuracy and strength. To cut the story of the game short, Louth led by a hundred before the third century and at the fourth by an extra fifty; eventually going out 175 ahead with the following breaks to his credit: 41,29,26 and 24, and Pyrke 26,23 and 22. Final scores: Louth 500 to 325.

After a few well-chosen words, Mr. Spencer presented the winner with the handsome Cup and gold medal given by the Endolithic Co., makers of Crystalate balls and expressed the sympathy so many felt with last year's holder. Mr. Pyrke presented a gold medal for the runner up which goes to Mr. Avery as, of course, Mr. Pyrke will not take his own prize.

In London Town.

Friday, 8th March 1907.

Never even during the most days of the South African war, have the Sunday newspapers had such a harvest as they enjoyed last Sunday. It was known that the L. C. C. election would produce a stiff fight and the majority were sanguine as to the results: but the most sanguine never anticipated the magnitude of the smash in store for the extravagants. Even Battersea returned a Reformer! The defeated party scream about "money and mendacity:" but the elemental fact I take it, is that the tradespeople all over London had taken alarm at the spread of municipal trading under the socialist regime and that the apathetic rate-payer had been at last shaken out of his lethargy. The "progressive" vote shows some increase over that of 1904, to wit 195,558 against 173,660: but the Reform vote on Saturday was 240,846 against 143,863 in 1904: which latter seems to bear out the view expressed above—that the rate-payers have been worked up: and high time too.

Lord Rosebery seized the occasion to publish the correspondence which has passed between the leading residents of Epsom and the defunct L. C. C. Epsom, during the last twenty years, has been made the place of abode for half the lunatics of London: since the L. C. C. bought the Horton Estate one lunatic asylum after another has been erected, and now there are over 5,400 lunatics housed there with 1,000 attendants: and Epsom thinks it has got its full share of London lunacy. It is impossible now, says the lord of Durdans, to walk in the Epsom country lanes without encountering droves of lunatics in charge of a warder or two; and Epsom as a residental place for the sane is becoming impossible. Few Londoners know Epsom save as it appeareth on Derby Day: knowing it as it is on 364 days in the year I can sympathise with the 10,000 inhabitants of that so recently old world country town.

Sir Alexander Swettenham's retirement from the Governorship of Jamaica is announced. Comparison of dates shows that he "applied for permission to retire on the ground of age,"—(vide Mr. Churchill's reply to a question) two days after Sir E. Grey telegraphed to America disclaiming the Governor's action in the matter of that unfortunate letter to Admiral Davic. Sir Alexander was offered the opportunity to retain his post, but—not having the hide of a politician—adhered to his request that he may be relieved. When the papers relating to the resignation are complete, the Secretary for the Colonies will decide what may be published without injury to the public interest. "Public interest" in this case I conceive means Radical party interest. There is very general agreement that Whitehall showed itself in much too great a hurry over the business, and threw over its own servant in unnecessary eagerness to soothe American susceptibilities.

Mr. Haldane's Army Bill continues to be the principal topic of discusion, sharing honours with the route of the progressives, or extravagants, at the L. C. C. elections on Saturday. Nothing could better demonstrate the fitness of the present Parliament to conduct the affairs of the Empire than the attendance during his speech: granted it was long and something prosy: but ere it was an hour old the benches were vacated and between thirty and forty members only, nearly all of the opposition, were sufficiently interested to hear it out! Opinions of course are much divided on the merits of the scheme: the volunteer enthusiasts think well of it but foresee difficulties in getting their men to do that 8 to 15 days training without adequate pay; they think there will be less difficulty about the four years engagement. On all hands it is acknowledged that this is the last word for the voluntary system—in fact the Haldane proposition cuts away the voluntary principle: we will cheerfully dispense with that if the scheme proves workable. By the way, Haldane economics are giving acute dissatisfaction among soldiers in charge of defence works and the like: they say that the retrenchments they are called upon to make render efficient work and supervision perfectly impracticable.

Sir Henry C. B.'s remarkable contribution to the new radical journal the Nation (which has absorbed the old Speaker) must have given that not very wise old gentleman food for regret. Taken in conjunction with his spoken remarks we are irresistibly reminded of Punch's cartoon of afore time and are puzzled to know which is Campbell's opinion and which Bannerman's. One audience is assured that the Government is keeping down the naval estimates with the view of economy and furthering the cause of eternal peace in conformity with dreams to be dreamed at the Hague: the other is assured that the navy is being, and will be, kept up to the two power standard. The French criticism of the Nation article strikes one as distinctly good: "where facts do not contradict the English Prime Minister, he contradicts them himself." Meantime the rads have found it desirable to postpone their attack on the Upper House.

The proposed enquiry into the Edalji case will not come off: at all events on the lines Mr. Gladstone proposed. Sir R. Romer objected to presiding over an enquiry held in camera at which those conducting it would have no power to call witnesses nor examine anyone upon oath: and he writes through the Home Secretary that he is "not willing to undertake" an enquiry which ought to be conducted "according to the ordinary rules of procedure governing a criminal trial." Sir Robert's colleagues entirely concur with him; and Mr. Gladstone has now accepted their offer to examine the material in possession of the Home Office and give their advice upon it. The inevitable inference is that "someone has blundered" and that the Home Secretary is unwilling to admit the light of day upon official mistakes.

The Lord Mayor is displaying magnificent energy in collecting money for his proposed home for crippled children. There was a matinee in support of the scheme at Drury Lane on Tuesday afternoon, with a perfectly gigantic programme. If began at half past one, and when the curtain shut off the stage from an un-exhausted house it was quarter past six: and then the end had only been reached by cutting out "turns." Selections from plays and pantomimes, songs, dances, recitations, spectacles and romps. Never was such an afternoon. The programme itself was a work of art, the frontispiece being a portrait of the Lord Mayor garbed as the Pied Piper, leading the crippled children. Over £1,000 was taken at the doors and other donations were given in the theatre.

It has been a busy week so far as theatres are concerned, though I cannot say that any of the pieces produced are to be described as spoch making. Shavian drama at the Court has been interrupted by Hedda Gabler with Mrs. Patrick Campbell in the name part. Mr. Laurence Irving at Eilert bore away the honours: Mrs. Campbell failed to rise to the height of passion and intensity required by Ibsen's heroine. I hear, by the way, that a Norwegian Company will appear soon in London to play Ibsen's plays in the Norsk. I fear me the houses will be small, for Norwegians in London are not many and English who speak Norsk very few.

Nelly Neil reached her 50th performance on Tuesday and celebrated the occasion by adding new turns. Two American actresses, Miss Flossie Hope and Miss Carrie Bowman sing and dance and Messrs. Coyne and F. Wright have new topical songs, which have neither more nor less connection with the play than usual.

They say that musical comedy is on the wane, but evidently "they" do not think so at the Hicks Theatre. There, on Satudray night was produced "My Darling," by Messrs. Seymour Hicks and E. Haines, Lyrics by C. H. Taylor and P. E. Wodehouse and additional members by Evelyn Baker. There is hardly any pretence of plot: we gathered that Jack Hylton was masquerading as his friend Maurice Le Blanc to the extent of making love on his account, but the proceeding did not lead to anything so far as I could discover. Sir Henry Heldon (Mr. McArale) was a middle aged roue who runs off to Paris to amuse himself and flirts accordingly. Mr. Cyril Clensy and Miss Gladys Marsden gave some uncommonly good imitations of various well known actors and actress, and there are many good songs which were well sung, Mr. Hylton having the lion's share. Miss Marie Studholme has a song "Little Glowworm" which caught the fancy of the house and twelve Butterfly Girls have as much to do with the play as a pretty chorus can contrive. Much music and little comedy distinguish "My Darling" in which neither Mr. Seymour Hicks nor Mrs. Seymour Hicks have part.

Miss Ryley's adaptation of Pierre Breton's play was produced on Monday at the Duke of York's as "The Great Conspiracy." It is chiefly remarkable for Mr. John Hare's reading of the part of Napolean and a fine and finished performance it is. The play itself is not a good one. Napolean has got an inkling of the Royalist conspiracy engineered by the Marquis de Tallemont (Mr. Aubrey Smith) who is supposed to have been killed: and he resolves to bully the truth out of Jeanne the wife, supposed widow, of the Marquis. Jeanne (Miss Irene Vanburgh) resolutely adheres to her statement that she is a widow, whereupon the Emperor declares she shall marry Captain Crisenoy (Mr. Henry Amley) this same night. The sentence is not wholly disagreeable to the Marquise as she has long been in love with Crisenoy: and the Imperial command furnishes the keystone of the plot. Jeanne must marry the man she loves in order to save her husband, who, as Lacaussade, is passing as an innkeeper. She goes to Crisenoy and confesses that Lacaussade is her husband: that the man with whom he changed coats and who was blown up by the bomb is some conspirator of no account. Napolean overhears enough to intensify his suspicions and cross-examines Crisenoy who refuses to be "drawn" and is put under arrest. Meantime the Marquis de Tallemont, otherwise Lacaussade is busy: masquerading as servant to the Minister of Justice he contrives to substitute a box of poisoned snuff for Napolean's own and the attempt is frustrated by Jeanne who wheedles it out of the Imperial hand. Eventually complications are cut by fixing up—I use the expression advisedly—a duel between the Marquis and a Colonel Rapp in which the former is killed.

The story is much more complicated than the bald sketch given above conveys: and we could despense with some complications to the advantage of the play: they befog the story needlessly and it is not a very convincing story at best. Mr. Hare carries the thing through: he is a little too much the polished gentleman but apart from that an admirable Napolean, sarcastic and dry, coolly amorous and bullying by turns. Miss Vanburgh has opportunities as Jeanne and makes the best of them, showing power as an actress and a pretty scene of humour on occasion. It cannot be said there is much for the others to do; Mr. Amley's part as Crisenoy is slight, so is Mr. Aubrey Smith's as de Tallemont and Mr. Robertshaw's as Fouche. The piece is beautifully put on the stage and the explosion which was to have killed Napolean in Act I was the best stage explosion I can remember. The setting of the 3rd Act "The Chatean of St. Cloud" is very beautiful.

It is not very easy to discover why Mrs., or Miss, Unger calls the play produced at the Garrick on Wednesday "Mr. Sheridan." When a playwright uses the name of an historical character we are entitled to expect some attempt to reproduce the individual. Richard Brinsley Sheridan may have been as sober as Mrs. Unger's conception: he may have been as profoundly, lugubriously in love with the memory of his wife: and he may have been as ardent an advocate for marriage as the Garrick Sheridan declares himself to be. History, it is admitted, has distorted R. B. Sheridan's character and methods, but I cannot think Mrs. Unger does much to set history right. Much talk and little else makes "Mr. Sheridan." Mr. Sheridan, who spends much of his time gazing at his late wife's portrait, wants his son Tom to marry Miss Ogle: but Tom is unwilling: has other views: and tells his father that Miss Ogle would like to be his step-mother. Mr. Sheridan would never have discovered this, but for some wholly inadequate reason he is about to fight a duel with a comparative stranger at 3 o'clock in the morning in her own hall, when Miss Ogle rushes in to separate the duellists and betrays her feelings in her agitation.

The play is a poor piece of work on the whole but there is some good dialogue: Mrs. Unger's strong suit is indubitably dialogue and she puts some clever things into Sheridan's mouth. Mr. Bourchier plays the title role adopting a Dublin jarvey's brogue for the occasion: and to his liberal reading of the part the play owes much of its success. Miss Ogle too was in particularly capable hands: Miss Alexandra Carlisle has made her mark and she certainly cut it deeper as Miss Ogle.

Miss Rosina Brandram's death at Southend on Thursday night last week was not unexpected: she had been ill with some chest complaint for several weeks and her recovery was regarded as more than doubtful. With Miss Brandram we lose one of the links with original Savoy Opera: and what a pillar of strength she was even in the strong companies selected by Mr. D'Oyly Carte! My own first recollection of Miss Brandram is as Buttercup in Pinafore in the late seventies: my last as the Fairy Queen in the Iolanthe revival of a season or two ago. She kept her beautiful voice to the end, and it seems now impossible to believe that the singer of "Oh Captain Shaw!" was much nearer 60 than 55, when last heard. She was a true actress and had a sense of humour which peculiarly fitted her to interpret Mr. Gilbert. It was a revelation to us to learn that she was 61 when she died.

The Hippodrome has a new trick cyclist, certainly the most astonishing performer of the many trick cyclists I have seen. Mr. Bud Snyder rides his machine up a flight of stairs over a man lying prostrate on each alternate step, and reaching a platform twenty feet above the stage, goes through various amazing evolutions on tables: his control over his machine is positively uncanny: I had never suspected such remarkable jumping powers in a bicycle.

Business at the Tivoli is brisk, Cinquevalli, the cleverest of equilibrists is there, and Mr. Harry Lauder has made a great hit with a new song in which he explains why, cold though it is, he always wears a kilt—because his wife could not be prevented from ransacking the pockets of his trousers when he went to bed at night. Mr. Lauder was not designed by nature to wear a kilt and is a sufficiently comical spectacle as he shivers on the stage.

As the Empire the Misses May and Florence Hengles have re-appeared to sing and dance as of old—more particularly to dance, for to say truth their singing is not very remarkable. They look pretty, dress prettily and dance charmingly, so vocal shortcomings are readily condoned. Another new turn is that of Miss Marquis who directs the proceedings of six cleverly trained ponies and a couple of performing dogs. Middle. Genie is there of course, very much there: she has long been an institution at the Empire.

THE MANNERS AND CUSTOMS OF THE TODAS.*

THE publication of this elaborate and comprehensive work may be taken, we think, as a healthy sign of the great revival of interest in the anthropology of India which has been very noticeable during the last few years;—a revival largely due to the labours and enthusiasm of Mr Edgar Thurston, Director of the Madras Museum, to whom the author in his preface expresses his personal indebtedness. That the manners and customs of all the more important and interesting of the indigenous tribes of India should be described in the thorough-going manner distinctive of the volume before us, is a matter in regard to which there cannot be two opinions; and now that such an excellent commencement has been made, it is perhaps not too much to hope that we may ere long have the pleasure of welcoming other volumes cast in the same mould. Possibly the author may have had some idea of this sort in his mind, for in the first lines of his preface he especially emphasizes the fact that his volume is to be regarded not merely as a record of the customs and beliefs of a particular people or nationality, but that it should be looked up as a model of the methods of modern anthropological investigation.

As Mr. Rivers very truly hints, we have enough and to spare of the ordinary traveller's accounts of jungle tribes, but the crying need of the present day is for more exact method, not only in collecting material, but in the manner of recording anthropological data, so that readers may be enabled to decide for themselves as to the value to be attached to statements and the evidence by which they are supported. In every case where investigations have once been conducted and recorded on this sure basis, we shall have accounts of the primitive nationalities of the world which will be of permanent and priceless value for all time. In many instances, unhappily, such investigations have been postponed till it has become too late; and in all cases with the steady advance of civilisation, aided as it now undoubtedly is by the motor-car, there is no time to be lost in the matter of undertakings of this nature. All honour and praise therefore to the author of this invaluable work, who has carried his investigations of an unusually interesting people to such a complete and successful conclusion.

If we were penning a notice of the book before us for readers in England, we should probably feel it incumbent to refer in some detail to the country inhabited by the Todas, but as we presume every reader of the Indian Field is familiar with the fact that Todaland is situated in the heart of the Nilgris, it will be perfectly unnecessary to dwell upon this part of our subject.

That a nationality of so interesting and unique type as the Todas should have attracted a large amount of attention on the part of anthropologists, and consequently forms the subject of a voluminous literature, goes without saying.

Indeed, before undertaking his investigations the author was solemnly warned that every thing worth knowing about the Todas was already known and that such observations as he might make would be merely duplicating those of his predecessors in this line of research. Nothing daunted, Mr. Rivers felt however, sure that there was still much to be learnt about the social organisation of this peculiar people; and the result of his investigation has been to fully demonstrate the truth of his surmise.

Even, however, if the volume contained little or nothing in the way of novelty, it would obviously be a great advantage to have a full and complete digest of all that is known about the Todas from the pen of a professed and competent modern anthropologist who has studied them and their ways on the spot; so that even from this lower point of view the volume before us has a great value of its own.

The one matter for regret we find in connection with the work is that the author has not seen his way to make it an absolutely complete account of the people to which it is devoted. The one great omission is the physical anthropology of the Todas, for which Mr. Rivers refers his readers to a paper by Mr. Thurston. As this paper is by no means easy of access to the general reader, we cannot but regard the omission as a serious defect in the book, and one which ought to have been remedied, if necessary, by cutting down some other part of the text, in order to afford the required space.

Good illustrations are given of the physiognomy of the Todas and likewise of their remarkable and characteristic dwellings; but of some of the reproductions from photographers later on in the volume, perhaps the less said the better.

The buffalo and its milk (which form the chief food of the race) loom very large in the life of the Todas, the cult of the dairy being to a great extent a semi-sacred institution. Mr. Rivers has, of course, a great deal to tell us about Toda classics and the ceremonies connected therewith and likewise of the ceremonies connected with birth, marriage and death—the three great events in savage or semi-savage life, if not indeed also among people of a higher grade of civilisation.

To refer to any of these, even cursorily, would, however, occupy far more space than is at our disposal; and we must therefore be content with mentioning the singular fact that while, except ceremonially, the flesh of all other animals is forbidden to them, Todas are at liberty to eat sambar meat to their hearts' content. In explanation of this peculiarity it has been suggested that in their original home there were totemic restrictions on animal food; and that in this ancient fatherland the sambar was unknown.

"Consequently, when they came to the Nilgiris, they would have found there an animal on the eating of the flesh of which there were no restrictions, and the absence of restriction would, on this hypothesis, have continued to the present day." The author thinks, however, that the fact of the Todas having no weapon with which to slay sambar may be an element in the case.

"If this animal," he writes," is ever killed by Kotas or Kurumbas, the mere fact that it had been killed by these people would probably be a sufficient reason why the Todas should not eat its flesh.

"It is possible that it is only since the advent of Europeans in the Nilgiris that the Todas have thought of eating the flesh of this animal, and as no prohibition against this has been handed down to them, they have no reluctance in satisfying in this way the liking for animal food which one of these ceremonies keeps in existence, if it does not actually stimulate.

With this we must reluctantly take leave of a most valuable if (and necessarily so) somewhat abstruse, contribution to the anthropology of the Indian Empire

TWO IBEX IN SPITI.

We left Chini on the 25th May. Pangi, our next stage was only 7 miles distant. Pleasant forests and shady road favoured us all the way. The forest bania's shop is just over the stream whence the road ascends to the road bangalow. We paid it a visit and got supplies. The P. W. bangalow at Pangi is a capacious and most comfortable structure—the largest on the road. A little garden is attached to it which lacked care. Apricot trees are plentiful, but the fruit was not yet ripe; we had our share on our return journey. There is a curiosity in this bangalow in the shape of an old table kept in the verandah. On its flat surface are carved the names of travellers who have been up here since the year 1870. The face of the table is now so covered with names that no space is left for further entries. My friend managed to put his name on record on the only available blank bit left. He took a photo of the table which brings out the names distinctly and they can be easily read.

Our next stage was Jangi. We had trouble about coolies in this march. It is the custom to change carriers along this road at each village passed and the wage due for the whole march is divided accordingly. To-day we had two changes and the delay was considerable. Fine forests all the way which sheltered the road for long distances. The going was fairly level and the walking pleasant, 14 miles in all. The Sutlej makes a right angled turn, beyond Akpa village and the road, hundreds, of feet higher up, also takes a bend about 5 miles before reaching Jangi. The river comes straight down from the north and the road goes straight up in the same direction—hitherto our course has been almost from west to east, Jangi is quite concealed among apricot gardens and is a green pleasant spot but the bangalow is small and stuffy. The atmosphere at this elevation is extraordinarily clear, and dry—the absence of moisture is evident in every thing. This condition indicates that the country is beyond the influence of the envious. There are no heavy and continuous rainfalls in Kunawar as is the case in the lower ranges. The region of excessive rain ends, I should say at the Wangtu bridge. By coming up at this season we have escaped that depressing time of wet and damp which closes down in all hill stations for four months of every year. This circumstance of itself should recommend these mountain slopes for European Sanitaria—in preference to the lower ranges. As a matter of fact we had no rain whatever during our tramp till we got back to Naihar that is from the 1st of May to the 18th of August. The road from Jangi slopes down gradually to the Asrang or Lippi stream, when, at the bridge, the great Hindustan and Tibet road comes to an end. After crossing we came to a very rough path and our lot was very rough paths indeed till we recrossed this same bridge on the 4th of August. The path turns back towards the Sutlej and gradually ascends the spur running down to the Sutlej that river, and with a gradual course descends again through the cultivated lands of Kano and Labrang to Kanam stream, half a mile beyond where is the village itself. On the map this march appears but a short one if the Lippe bridge is overlooked; but in reality it is a good 12 miles, caused by the immense loop which the road makes up and down the Asrang stream. Kanam is a very large and flourishing village pleasantly situated and smothered in greenery at this season. There is not a spot of ground vacant for pitching even a small tent. We had to make camp under the walls of a small monastery between which and the fields we found a narrow strip of unoccupied ground.

The next march to Sungnam was a most trying one, though only 12 miles. We left the regular roads or rather path to Shipki after about 3 miles and ascended the Benang pass (13,400 feet); then down to the Sungnam stream by a very rough and steep descent, most trying to every one as the Sun played on us with terrific force. The usual route is along the Shipki path over the Sungnam stream to the village of Shaso whence a path leadsup to the village along the left bank; but this would have entailed an extra march. We were tempted to take this short cut over the Benang because there was a snow bridge on the Sungnam stream which saved us the round by Shaso. But we had, a bad time, doing the 12 miles in 12 hours! We had to remain with the coolies as they attempted to abandon our baggage being reluctant to cross the pass and the snow bridge which was certainly a very shaky structure and very near the end of its short life. It was cracked across in several places when pieces of drift wood had to be used to negotiate the gaps which could not be jumped. The Asrang and Ropa valleys are the only two places in Kunawar where steep are found.

We intended spending a couple of weeks here to do some shooting and thus make a pleasant break in our rather monotonous journey. For this purpose we obtained permits from the Simla authorities to shoot a couple of ibex. We were a good deal surprised to find, when the licenses arrived, that these two particular shooting ground (the only ibex valleys in the district) were specially closed and that we could not shoot the game we were permitted to shoot! We were a good deal more than surprised to find, when we reached this part of the country, that these closed sporting grounds were already occupied by a gentleman who had shot two ibex and a bear in the Asrang and was now in the Ropa valley a few miles above Sungnam! From our permit it would appear that these ibex grounds are permanently closed to all sportsmen: such certainly was not the case this year. It is difficult to understand why one sportsman should be allowed within protected grounds and others excluded. Either the man in possession was favoured by the permit granted, or he was on the forbidden ground without leave. From inquiries we made it was clear that these valleys were shot yearly by any one coming up this way who cared to do so. The local authorities have no knowledge of the orders closing these shooting grounds and the inhabitants offered no objection and gave us no warning. We wrote to the gentleman who was shooting above Ropa and he was good enough to offer the ground to us. As a matter of fact he cleared out a couple of days after. The ibex in these valleys are certainly not numerous. They frequent the range dividing Kunawar from Spiti if they, are too much molested in one slope they go over to the other. So that protecting them on the Kunawar side and not in Spiti (where there is no protection) is not of much use. These two valleys (Asrang and Ropa) are the extreme limits of ibex in the East; they are found nowhere beyond the Sutlej.

Sungnam is a large village on the left bank of the stream of that name. The country around is very fertile and crops are grown on every patch of ground to which water can be led. Green fields were visible on all sides and as before, we could not find a place for our camp. We pitched our tents in a bare stony spot on the left edge of a deep gorge, all the village being on the right side of it. The gorge was level at the bottom and was crammed with cultivation every drop of which came down the small stream being used for irrigation. The bare bit of ground we occupied was exposed to a cold cutting wind blowing along the valley which added much to our discomfort. The cold at night too made itself felt and we were disagreeably reminded that we had reached colder regions—though it was the end of May. We crossed the Hangrang pass (14,500 feet) in the next march. The ascent was a trying one and the cold and wind most disagreeable. When we got to the crest we unpacked our tea basket and tried to boil the tea over a spirit lamp. It was a long and tedious operation. Though we were in a hollow and somewhat protected, the temperature and wind were entirely against us and the water took a long time, to babble. My friend undertook the operation, but he did not succeed till we had covered him up with waterproofs and all the spare warm things available. His bulky form crouched on hands and knees with the tea-basket almost in his bosom smothered in clothes was a quaint spectacle but we had our tea and his indomitable determination to make the blessed thing boil was rewarded. This was his first experience in boiling water on a high mountain. It took us four hours to get to the crest and another four hours to descend to Hango our camping place. We started in a slight snow storm next morning but it soon cleared off. It was a cool cloudy windy day—no rain.After some easy going the path winds round the spur of a bare black mountain from which the first glimpse of the Spiti now is obtained entering through a narrow gorge with perpendicular sides. We then came to a very rough track along rocky bare ground which descends very abruptly for nearly two miles to the village of Lio—a very trying walk for knees and calves. The village lies in a flat plain in the angle formed by the junction of the Lipak stream with Spiti river. Every bit of ground is covered with green fields dotted with apricot trees of great age and girth—now laden with green fruit concealed in dense foliage. The village fields are a perfect gem set in the midst of most savage and forbidding mountains. It was delightfully refreshing to come on it suddenly after staring at ugly mountains for hours. This is the general aspect of this part of the world and such were our feelings at the end of every almost every march we now made. There are long stretches of desolation through which we tramped wearily—to be suddenly refreshed at the end by the sight of a gren spot in utter contrast with its surrounding.

Wearied with monotonous marching we determined to have a shoot, so left the beaten track, went up a steep mountain and down an awful zigzag path to the Yalung stream above which we pitched our Camp. Burhel were said to be plentiful a little further in and we were going for them. We rode up the ascent from Lio on Yaks. My friend is a horseman first and many things afterward—so he rides on principle when there is an inch of rideable ground. In this country the only rideable animal is the yak, or jobo, a cross between the lowland cow and highland yak. He is slow and surefooted taking more after his male progenitor than his mother. Even the hill pony is impossible in these mountain tracks so this awkward animal is generally used for riding purposes. Our progress was very slow and trying and I was forced to dismount half way up the slope; my mount also showed such signs of distress with my weight on his back so that I had not the heart to burden him any longer. He was the most comical looking beast, even in the yak line, that I ever saw—quite a Gilbert and Sullivan creation. There is nothing in the present animal kingdom, comparable to him. He struck one as being the only flesh and blood survivor from the age of the heavy mammoth. He was shaped like a bull yak but on a much smaller scale, his hair was the exact colour of the brown snow bear, long, shaggy and hanging down below his sides exactly like that wild beast's coat. His head was broad and massive, covered with long hair surmounted by a fine pair of horns. He gave me the idea of a cross between the Himalayan brown bear and the yak, if such a combination is possible in nature. My friend's mount was the usual beast of the plebald pattern. We spent three days after bunhel but were not successful, my companion getting only one with a small head.

We came down to Shalkar in one march. The village is surrounded by high mountains with clay hills in the immediate neighbourhood of the cultivated country. A small mud hut, in a ruinous condition occupies the centre of the village. Shalkar seems to be in a well—it took us several hours to descend into it and we had a good climb again to get out of it. The map gives one the impression that this is an important place, but we found it a miserable hole shut in all round by ugly mountain's a God forsaken part of His creation. In ancient times no doubt it served its purpose of a watch tower on the frontiers of Tibet now it is only a landmark. There is a shaky wooden bridge across the Spiti river below the village across which is taken a good portion of the trade belonging to the Shipki route. This diversion has been caused by the destruction of the bridge over the Sutlej below Spuch. Traders complained a good deal about the great round they had to make to reach Gartok by coming this way. The Tibetan frontier is a march beyond Shalkar at Churi (Kuri on the map). From this point traders take a sharp turn eastwards, cross a pass and travel through the Chamurti district to Gartok, an extra journey of sevral marches which they are obliged to undertake for the want of a single wooden bridge on the direct route. No wonder the trade languishes owing to this neglect on the part of the authorities.

From Shalkar we crossed, a low passe (Lepcha.ghat, 13,628 feet, in the map, but not known by that name locally) and reached the village of Sumra in two marches—it can be done in one. This is a short cut into Spiti and saved us, four miles by the regular route via Chuni and Jangsam Sumra is the last village in Basahar—our next stage brought us into Spiti. Though we saved some shoe leather by coming this way we were faced by an obstacle which barred our further progress very effectually. To get on to the regular route again, on the left bank of the river, we had, at this village, to cross over in one of those nerve shaking contrivances a "rope bridge"! When we arrived it was not in existence so we had to halt for a day to build it, the materials being collected from villages on both sides of the river. This was effected after several hours shouting and loud talk across the roaring waters. Early next morning I went down to the river to hurry on the construction which required a good expenditure of energy. The first difficulty was to effect communication between the two banks. This was ingeniously contrived. The river, along the left bank flowed at the foot of the range Several feet above the level of the stream, on that side, was the butress and poles on a huge jutting rock, for the ropes; on our side, the right bank, the ground was level where the other butress stood. Two men with long ropes, to the ends of which stones were attached, stood on either bank. The stones were flung simultaneously to be entangled in mid-stream two attempts failed but the third was successful. The man in the left bank then pulled the joined ropes to his side and connection was effected. Other ropes were pulled across and there were soon enough strands to be twisted ino stout cable. To be exact these were seven ropes from the "bridge" and two detached ones for runners by which passengers were pulled across. There was an impression among the builders that there were not enough strands in the cable, but no more could to procured and the verdict was that the bridge was strong enough. Over the cable was adjusted a smooth well—worn piece of wood in the shape of a fowl's breast bone. The angle was placed over the cable and the two lower ends of the triangle lashed firmly together. This "cradle" suspended below the cable and the running ropes attached completed the "bridge which was ready for the passenger who was firmly lashed to the triangle and hung suspended below during his aerial journey. But long before any of our party crossed young men had scrambled over the cable, grasping with hands and feet and pulling themselves along in the most agile manner. The building of the 'bridge' was completed in less than three hours. Thirty loads and eight men had to be passed over this airy construction and it seemed to me that there was a big job before us. Three loads had been sent over, and my bearer, a small wiry man, had effected the passage also when my friend arrived in the scene. He had been on the river bank some distance below us very much interested in the funeral cermonies of a woman who had died in the village. He had taken several photos, but was somewhat disappointed, as the corpse, instead of being carved and the pieces thrown to dogs and vultures, according to the Tibetan Buddhist custom, had been simply tied into a bundle and thrown into the river. He eyed my "bridge" long and earnestly and then delivered his decisions in a few words: "I am fully 2½ maunds in weight and I am not going to cross on that rope"! This was addressed in solemn fashion to the surrounding bridge—builders who seemed well satisfied with their work and were standing around in bakshiish—expectant attitude. At this critical moment, when I thought my persuations were having some effect, the fourth load of our baggage was in mid air and half way across, when one of the strands of the cable, frayed by the function, gave way and hung below swinging in the breeze! my imperturbable friend gazed at the rope fixedly and, again informing us if his exact bodily weight said "I am not going," That was the end of it. The loads and my bearer had to be swung back and we returned to Sumra, accompanied by the smiles of the assembled villagers, to repitch our camp. Writing in cold blood now, six months after this fiasco, I think my friend was right, prudent at any rate, but at the moment I was disappointed as our failure to cross here wrecked the plans we had formed for our further journey.

Another misfortune overtook us now. My friends cook, a weakly stunted looking musalman, collapsed here entirely and had to be sent back to the plains. He had chronic asthma and suffered intensely when crossing the passes. We thought it advisable to send him back before anything serious happened to him: this mishap crippled us seriously as there was only one man, my servant, left for the important business of cooking. We could not now take different directions when we came to our shooting grounds and had to divide our camp to get at the game. We would be bound to remain together and be probably in each others way. And there was always the contingency of my man also falling sick and placing us in a most awkward situation. As the river had baffled us we had to choose between two courses: continue our journey along the right bank to the next "bridge" and hope for better things or return ignominiously the way we had come! We chose the former. We divided our camp things, most we sent across my "bridge" with my bearer to meet us again at the next crossing place, 20 miles further up the river at Pokhto (Po on the map). We had a frightful time. It took us four days to do this distance, but one we spent trying unsuccessfully for burhel. There was not even a path and for many hundreds of yards at a time holes had to be cut in the steep hill sides to prevent us from rolling over precipices. When we were not crawling along these holes we were slithering down steep slopes which, of the two modes of progression was the most trying. The biggest trial, however, was the easy and well beaten track within plain view of us, sometimes not a quarter, of a mile distant—across the river! Over this road most of our baggage had gone and over it we also should have travelled. My servant with the things reached Pokhto two days before us and was camped on one side of the river across the rope bridge and received us smilingly. We had few smiles to spare when we arrived after our rough and terrible journey. Next morning we went into the large village of Mani, 5 miles further up the river as no supplies could be procured at the bridge. We rode of course as the path was ridable for yaks—and I had the pleasure of a pip from my animal who bolted with me over rocky ground at his best pace! No damage was done. We reached Mani on the 15th of June and made a long halt there.

Fishing.

A HUGE TURTLE.

At the end of last December I was fishing from a small jolly boat off the coast of Kathiawar, opposite a place called Shil, in six fathoms of water and about half a mile from the beach. Being after a species of rock cod, plentiful thereabout, I was fishing on the bottom with a heavy bonita line and large hook.

I was enjoying quite good sport as I had ten nice fish in the boat ranging from 2½ lbs. to 12 lbs.; when I felt a more than usual heavy pull at my line, and found that whatever I had hooked was something much beyond an ordinary rock god. I soon found I should never do much good at anchor as the boat was being pulled all over the place; so I had the anchor got up and a few minutes after, to my great surprise, a huge turtle came to the surface with a rush, which was the first idea I had of what I had hooked.

For an hour and a half we were towed all over the place eventually getting about two and a half miles from land by which time the turtle had been conquered and made fast alongside the boat, and was towed back like that for about four miles to the ship at anchor that I was commanding and hoisted on board where it turned the scale at 325 lbs.

The curious part of the whole thing is that the turtle was hooked under the left fore flipper, so he must have crawled over my bait when it was lying on the rocks at the bottom.

I might mention also in case of any of your readers having the same experience, the way in which he was finally mastered as it is easy to realize the tremendous power a turtle of that size has in the water with only an ordinary fishing line and hook to check him.

I had been towed about by the animal for an hour or so and came to the conclusion that it might go on for ever unless something else was done, so my device was to run another big fishing line with a loop and piece of lead down the line the turtle was fast to with the idea that by keeping it slack the turtle would eventually get his flippers entangled in the loose line during his frantic efforts to escape, which eventually happened in about half an hour; so with the two lines fast to him we were able to drag him to the boat's side and get a rope round his flippers and so secured him.

OBSERVATIONS, ORIGINAL AND OTHERWISE.

Fancy Flies.

When anglers meet together by the trout stream for lunch or in the ingle-nook on the happy winter evenings few subjects are more frequently wrangled over in the amiable manner, however, common to all good fishermen, than the claims of fancy flies and their values. People obstinately cling to one side or the other of the question. It is seldom an angler can be found who is indifferent and uses fancy flies or not as happens best to suit his convenience. And yet the truth seems to lie half-way between the two contestants. Like Sir Roger de Coverly's celebrated decision on the double-faced sign board, a good deal can be said on both sides of the question. With regard to salmon and sea trout there can be no controversy. These two fish confessedly take fancy lures like nothing else in earth, sky or water. Indeed, the best authorities suppose that salmon and sea trout take those gorgeous creations of feather and silk and tinsel for shrimps or other small crustaceans and do not at all regard them as flies. No one can fathom the consciousness of the salmon, but the effect of using fancy flies when attempting to catch it certainly looks as if it were so. The earliest mention of artificial flies in the annals of fishing shows that originally some idea of exact imitation was attached to fly-making. The Macedonians, who employed this device, endeavoured to make their fly resemble the hippurus, a kind of fly like the hornet, and this was effected by means of scarlet wool for bodies, and hackles from the cock's neck for wings. This primitive fly must have resembled a glorified red hackle fly rather than the insect which they intended it to portray. Here again the advocates for and against fancy flies can find arguments.

Fancy flies would have found no favor with Plato had that philosopher been an angler. The keystone of his system of ideas was that perfect and glorified ideals of everything existed in heaven. Everything on earth below was better or worse according as it approximated or was divergent from that type. A fancy fly is as far as possible removed from even any perfect insect here below. It arises from the fly-dresser working on some generally received lines, traditionally supposed to represent some kind of fly. Gradually this passes from the type itself so imperfect. Then a customer suggests that a blue or red body be given to the fly. Another wishes teal wings instead of starling or the like, because he thinks that in this form it will be more attractive to the fish. Then by a brilliant stroke of business fervour the manufacturer of this marvellous creature, which like the Alexandra fly resembles nothing in creation, being compounded of silver tinsel, white hackle and the curled fibres of the peacock tail feather, gives it a telling name and then, presto! the fly's fortune is made. It becomes the Blue Jumbo, the Boycotter, or the like. Such is the genesis of many fancy flies. Others are evolved from some celebrated angler's intuition. Thus Professor John Wilson ("Christopher North") was quite of the opinion that fancy flies were the right thing and ordered gross after gross of nameless flies. And no doubt a great many of these flies became famous. A legend runs that on one occasion when on a tour of the Highlands of Scotland with his wife, the professor having exhausted his supply of flies was reduced to fastening the petals of buttercups on hooks with scraps of grass or leaves to imitate legs and wings. How these were retained on the hooks is not stated, but the result was so satisfactory that it led to the fashioning with yellow silk body the far-famed Professor fly.

A Home-Made Hook.

Select any pattern of hook that may be suitable for the purpose required, whether it be O'Shaughnessy, Pennell, Sproat, Limerick or Sneck and before you go outdoors sit down in the house with a pair of lock-spring pliers or a jeweler's vise and a fine flat file. Fasten your hook and go to filing from just below the barb towards and to the point, making it a four-sided and four-angled tapering needle. In making the inner facet file away two-thirds of that barbarous barb; reduce the size of hook at the barb from one-quarter to one-half. Do not file the taper round; let it remain four-sided. Now take a jeweler's eye-glass magnifying two and a half times and look at your hook. What a beauty! She will go in now and will not slip nor linger. She is no longer a toy; she is a tool, a mechanical instrument that will do duty at a moment's notice. Do you doubt? Put your glass on an unfiled hook, with all its asperities of Japan and coarse finish, and your eyes will see; you will have a revelation you will never forget, and the fish will answer your stroke. That is the chief end of fishing.

The reason why the ordinary make of hook is of too large barb and comparatively blunt point, which enters the fish with a round point, is due to the defects in manufacture. The wire is at first straight and it is then cut a certain length, passed on to a machine which by means of sharp knife cuts the barb. This straight barbed wire is sharpened and then passed on to a boy or girl operative, who, taking the wire in a pair of tweezers, hooks the barb round a mould fixed in the end of a metal tool, and turns the wire into the shape of the mould which is of any of the aforesaid makes. This is the hook in its soft state. The next process is a heating in a sort of frying pan to a certain heat over a charcoal fire, and when a color of the right kind is reached, which the practiced eye of the temperer determines, the pan of hooks are cast into a bath of oil which cools and hardens the steel. This is the process of hook making and as a rule suffices for the wants of the average angler; but it is evident that as these hooks are made chiefly by boy and girl labour, except in the very highest grades, the pointing of the hook and its outset of the barb is likely to be imperfect. Hence the necessity for refiling and the carrying of a file whenever one goes fishing to improve the keenness of the weapon which is sure to become dull on wear and tear unless sharpened as directed.

Flying Fishes' Habits and Manners.

The habits and manner of flight of the flying fish have been a matter of investigation which is interesting, but I have received only limited notice from writers on this mysterious fish. A voyager whose name is not given by the Biological Society of Washington, to which he reported, appears to have had peculiar and exact opportunities for observation, and his record is as follows: An excellent opportunity for observing how flying fish fly, was afforded me during six days' calm, lately passing over the Bay of Bengal. I watched day by day some hundreds passing under the bow of the ship. The water surface was glassy calm. As each fish rose it spread its wings, apparently beating the surface with them with two or three strokes before they steadied out. I say apparently, for it was not so much a definite beat as a struggle to rise. The tail, which of course under water was in rapid motion to escape from the ship, now gave ten or a dozen rapid beats which could be counted by the ripples on the still surface, and the fish was off in aerial flight. As each fish lost the inpetus of the first rise, which generally happened at about forty yards, the binocular showed us the anal fins, which had till now been fully extended, drooping to feel the water. As soon as the surface was felt the tail was introduced, and five or six smart strokes, also indicated by riples, brought the impetus up again and carried the fish about another thirty yards, when another droop sent it on again and so forth, some of the older fish travelling in this way 400 or 500 yards. The younger fish frequently fell awkwardly in this attempt to regain impetus. When the waves are running it requiries a clever fish to gain impetus on the crest of a wave, and many a fish tumbles back in the water again in the attempt.

MANGE IN DOGS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

Sir,—Could you recommend me a good cure for red mange in dogs? One of my terriers is very bad with it and has been so for some time. I have tried several remedies to no effect. The extraordinary part of the thing is, that it does not seen to be contagious as none of my other dogs are a whit affected.

18th March 1907. R. C.

Have you tried the following?

Liquor Soda B. P.	... 2 oz.	Mix and rub in well daily
Creoscte	... ½ oz.
Ointment of Olete of Mercury	... 1½ oz.
Almond Oil	... ½ oz.

But here is an excellent and easily obtainable dressing, one we have often used with good results when treating red mange and other skin affections. Take 2 chittaks each of Cocoanut, Castor and Kerosine oil, add 2½ oz. of Flowers of Sulphur (common bazar gundruk pounded and finely strained) mix, and shake well before applying. First wash the dog well; then apply the mixture and be liberal with it. Rub in and wash off after two days when repeat, and so on till benefit results.—Ed.]

VARIOUS NOTES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

Sir,—Naturalists recognise six local races of African Elephants.—Generally speaking these are distinguished from are another by the size and shape of ear. In the dwarf elephants of the Congo, small size is the predominating characteristic; while another race from the South Cameroons are noticeably different in colour to other African Elephants. These six provincial varieties are as follows:—

1. The South African race—Elephas Africanus. Capensis.

These have enormous ears. A female only 8 feet 8 inches in height, had ears 4 feet 5 inches long by 4 feet broad.

2. The West African Elephant—E. A. Cyclotis. Found in the West Cameroons. Has large oval shaped ears. The skin is mosaic like in texture, and of a paler grey than that of other elephants.

3. The Soudan Elephant—E. A. oxyotis.

The ears of this race are smaller, and semi circular in shape.

4. The East African Elephant—E. A. Knechenhauer.

Found in German East Africa. Its ears are still smaller, and triangular in shape. A specimen 11 feet 4 inches high, now set up in the South Kensington Museum, has ears 4 feet 2½ inches long by 3 feet 5 inches broad.

5. The Dwarf Elephant of the Congo.—E. A. Pumilio.

The height of this race very probably does not exceed 7 feet.

6. The Albert Nyanza Elephant—E. A. Albertensis.

This variety has a very broad short skull.

The fine specimen of the East African race now set up in the South Kensington Museum is a recent addition to the collection. This elephant is 11 feet 4 inches in height at the top of the back, and stands in a most life like attitude with its trunk extended, in the central hall of the building. Being raised on a platform some 15 inches above the floor of the hall, the great bull looke even more imposing than nature intended, The tusks of this specmen are models of a very fine pair, taken from another elephant killed in East Africa. The Museum Elephant's own skull and tusks are shown separately, close to.

Another recent addition is a fine specimen of the Alaskan Moose. Alces machlis gigas, or Alces Alces gigas. This like the elephant is set up complete. It stands 6 feet 4 inches at the shoulder, and the width of the horn span is 4 feet 11½ inches.

NEW ·465 BORE VELOPEX SYSTEM (PATENT)

EXPRESS 'INDIA' RIFLE.

MESSRS. HOLLAND & HOLLAND beg to introduce to the notice of Sportsmen their New ·465 Bore "India" Model Rifle. This weapon has been specially designed to replace the ·450 bore, the importation of which into India having been prohibited. The New Rifle retains all the features of their well-known ·450, and has the same balance, handiness, and lightness of recoil, with the advantage of increased velocity resulting from the use of their New Patent Velopex Cartridge.

Record Target made before the Editor of 'The Field.'

"VELOPEX" BULLETS!

AFTER BEING FIRED.

Extract from "THE FIELD" Newspaper,

19th January, 1907.

As sporting rifle Makers Messrs. Holland & Holland attach very great importance to achieving a high standard of accuracy in target results. A notice in this journal of a new rifle and cartridge has by long custom, included shooting results at 100 yards, firing from the table rest, and year by year for a long time past the closeness of grouping has shown a marked tendency towards improvement.

"The group illustrated was made with the 365-grain bullet as fired from the ·465 cartridge. It was produced at the very first attempt, and it constitutes what seems likely to stand for some time to come as a record amongst properly authenticated targets. The centres of the whole seven shots lie within a space practically 1 in. square (actually 1·00 in. by 1·05 in.), and the reader may satisfy himself from the reproduction of part of the actual target that all the shots would have hit a postage stamp. It is interesting to know that the sights used were of the open variety, and that orthoptic spectacles were not employed.

GREATEST ACCURACY and HIGHEST VELOCITY yet obtained (2282 feet per second).

PRICES: DOUBLE BARRELLED RIFLE, best quality and finish, Royal Hammerless. 70 Guineas. B. Grade, 55 Guineas.

SANDOWN PARK.

EARLY on the morning of the 1st instant, the outlook was almost as unpromising as on Thursday, the white mist extending further afield, but more speedily beginning to feel the influence of the sun. Fortune was, after all, kind to the gratification of a vast company from all parts that intended attending the soldiers' meeting. Such weather as prevailed on the open all, kind to the gratification of a vast company but earnest of brighter skies was given by the clearer vista obtained down the Waterloo platforms, and but little outlying fog was left in the Lambeth and Clapham Junction districts, which had previously been its strongholds. It was hoped that the King would put the seal of Royal approval on the meeting, but sometime before proceedings opened it became generally known that His Majesty would be unable to be present to see Flaxman run. A brilliant attendance filled the members' enclosure and paddock. Better going could not have been desired. The feature of the afternoon was the success of Mr. C. Bewicke on two of his own and one of Mr. Fitzgerald's while he looked once like making his score up to four on Heroine. Details of the principal races:—

Saturday, the 2nd instant, wound up a most successful soldiers' meeting, Sunny Sandown sustaining its soubriquet, and the glorious weather on both days materially conduced to such satisfactory results. The brilliant attendence was pretty much on a par on both days, and included the same assemblage of rank and fashion, the crowded members' enclosure presenting a pretty picture, thanks to the tasty toilettes of the fair sex. Notabilities of the senate, the law, the sister services, music, art, and the drama were to be met at every turn, and the new big public enclosures were packed. It was a glorious day for motoring, and pedestrians between Surbiton and Sandown had a dusty journey. Several drags were in the carriage enclosure, lending a sporting air to the scene. The racing was excellent, but not so appreciable to backers, as by the defeat of every favourite the ring got back some of their previous day's losses. Details of the principal races:—

FOOTBALL.

ASSOCIATION RULES.

Scotland is doing remarkably well in International and representative fixtures this season in football. She has a splendid series of Rugby successes to her credit, and on Saturday a most auspicious beginning was made in her Association programme at Ibrox Park, where the Scottish League side played the powerful Football League team to a draw. Accounts to hand show that luck was on the side of the home eleven, whose goal at times was submitted to a fierce bombardment, but it was never captured, and for the first time since this series of games was instituted in 1902, there was no scoring. It was largely a struggle between the English forwards and the Scottish defence, and the players forming the latter are to be highly congratulated on their dogged determination and skill. The match emphasises in unmistakable fashion that England must make radical changes in her forward line if she intends to win her remaining international engagements. When Scotland meets Wales, the latter should at least manage to draw.

The home clubs in the Southern League games on Saturday did not have a rosy time. The most dramatic result was Millwall's triumph at Swindon. For six months the railway men had successfully defied on their own ground the efforts of the various S. L. teams, and now their untarnished record has gone. It is not altogether a surprise to me that the Dockers won, for I made the suggestion in my Saturday's notes that they would probably succeed where all others had failed. Brighton and Hove continue to win matches, but I hardly gave them credit for sufficient ability to beat Queen's Park Rangers by two clear goals at Park Royal. The Rangers are the great disappointment of the season, and now that they are down on their luck nothing seems to shape well for them. Tottenham Hotspur had an unfamiliar team out on their own ground against Leyton, and the Essex men, playing a hard, resolute game did much better than was expected by dividing the spoils in a game that was not particularly thrilling. Norwich City were not able to do better at Newmarket-road against Brentford than in the corresponding game last season, when the points were divided, and Southampton found New Brompton such tough opponents that they had to be content with a single point. Reading's win at Northampton provided the Biscuiteers with a couple of priceless points and Watford's draw at Bristol, against the Rovers, is excellent testimony to the striking advance made of late by the Herts team.

Fulham's chances of retaining the championship are better than for several months past. There was no question as to their superiority over Plymouth Argyle, and the Cottagers with a four points' lead, will now hold tenaciously to the topmost rung of the League ladder. They have only to reproduce their November form in away games, and their retention of the shield would then be a certainty, but since the New Year came in Fulham have not done anything on foreign soil to enthuse over. Portsmouth, their most dangerous rivals at present, although Tottenham may yet have to be reckoned with, have had a sorry time of late. Their last four games have provided them with one point, and they have given nine goals away. West Ham were merciless on Saturday, and by scoring a trio of goals they brought their bag for the season against Pompey to a half-dozen, while the two games in the Western League have also yielded six. In the four engagements between these teams the United have twice won, lost one, and drawn the fourth. The Crystal Palace go from bad to worse in their southern League engagement, and they occupy the unenviable position of nineteenth on the list. Luton, who were successful when at the Palace in October, got the better of an interesting struggle on their own ground, and thus took four points from the Glaziers, who reserve all their best efforts for Cup ties. The S. L. table to date is appended:—

The Arsenal were well below full strength at Plumstead on Saturday in their game with Sheffield United, who lost by a big margin when they last were down in the district where the big guns are made. The Reds had to pay the penalty for taking the field without such stalwarts as Sharp, whom they were considerately resting in view of the International—Scotland vs. Wales—Coleman who was in the English League vs Scottish League team, and Garbutt, who was not fit. The early stages were of the lifeless order, but movements became more brisk, and therewas subsequently plenty to interest onlookers. Each goal had narrow escapes, but the exchanges were in favour of the Gunners, who deserved the lead when the interval arrived. There was not much to choose between the teams in the closing half, but Bluff, the ex-Southampton player, found the net for the United, who won by a goal to love. The result is not an index of the game, but the home team were once more unable to snap up chances, and that is the full explanation for their defeat—their fourth in succession in the League. Bristol City, the other Southern club in the First Divison, are showing wonderful consistency, and they must finish very high up in the table if they maintain their present form.

In the First Division of the League on Saturday home teams did not loom so large on the horizon as usual. Reference has been made to the Sheffield United and Bristol successes, and an examination of the complete results reveals that Blackburn Rovers repeated history by accomplishing the overthrow of Derby County at the baseball grounds, the County having provided the Lancastrians with eight goals and four points this season. Sheffield Wednesday may be lying low in view of Cup tie engagements, but their reputation is not enhanced by the defeat at Owlerton by Notts County who may yet compel Derby to accompany Stoke to the lower division. The Wednesday have not won a League match at home since 1st December Three teams halve the points with their opponents on Saturday, and the best performance was that of Manchester United, who compelled Birmingham to yield up half the spoils. Newcastle United, who appear to be walking away with the championship, could not do better than avert defeat at Preston, where the Proud Men made a tremendous effort to take revenge for their defeat in the far North in October. Middlesbrough reversed the result of the 1905-6 game at Ayresome Park when the Villa provided the opposition, the latter then winning 2—1, but on Saturday the Ironopolis team scored the only goal of the match, and as they eat the Villans at Aston in the first half of the season, they have taken four points from the Midlanders, instead of losing four, as last season. Sunderland did not show any mercy to Stoke, and the Potters must now be resigned to their apparently inevitable fate. The narrow win of Manchester City over Liverpool gave great satisfaction to the supporters of the Hyde-road men, and Everton's win over Bolton Wanderers was a repetition of their Cup tie victory, except that the margin was much less pronounced. The results table to date is as follows :—

Chelsea cannot afford to drop points at Grimsby or anywhere else, with Nottingham Forest coming along in such great style and West Bromwich only four points behind with a game in hand Last year at Grimsby Chelsea divided the points, but they fell short of this on Saturday, the Fishermen gaining the verdict by the odd goal in three. The visitors loudly appealed against Grimsby's second goal, and the referee was so doubtful about the matter that he consulted a linesman before deciding Burnett was not offside when he received the ball. The pensioners are very sore about the decision, but it is best to accept these things with philosophic calm, and trust to matters being evened up, as they certainly will be, ere the season closes. This was Chelsea's first loss away from home since 3rd November when they went down at Burslem by two goals to love. The win by the Forest over Gainsborough was their sixth successive victory, and West Bromwich cantered home against Hull City. There were one or two surprises, the most emphatic being the defeat of Burnly, at Turf Moor by Leeds City, who had not done anything recently to suggest that they would succeed where stronger teams had failed. Chesterfield lost two points on their own ground they could ill spare Blackpool being their conquerors, and Wolverhampton Wanderers were worsted in drastic fashion at Burton by the United. Barnsley were not able to do more than draw at Burselem, and Clapton Orient maintained their unenviable reputation for inability to put up a good fight away from Homerton by a 8—0 defeat at Lincol. The other games do not require comment.

INTER-LEAGUE MATCH.

Scotland vs. England.—The sixteenth encounter on the 2nd instant Scotland and England under League auspices took place at Ibrox Park, Glasgow, before about 50,000 spectators the drawings amounting to about £1,600. Unfortunately, the teams as originally selected were unable to take the field, owing to injuries. The substitutes in each case, if not quite the popular fancy, proved capable players, and in no way materially affected the strength of either side. The weather was fine, brilliant sunshine prevailing. The turf was on the slow side, thus helping to establish an equality between two teams built on very different principles, the one of the fast acting order, and the other of the solid and slower type.

Losing the toss, Scotland kicked off against what wind there was and after some opening manœuvres Smith shot past. A foul against England let Scotland in, only to be brought up through May fouling Coleman Offside drew up England after some clever play on the right wing, and from the kick Scotland made some progress.

At this stage England were pressing persistently, but a sound defence kept them safe. A corner for England looked very dangerous, and after another Scotland had relief through the ball going over. Two more corners in quick succession for England looked like materialising, but again Scotland through her defence cleared. Some open play ensued, and thereafter England were drawn up for offside. Thornley had a grand try, which luckily for Scotland hit the post, and Hall immediately after mulled a chance of a lifetime by shooting high over the bar from a few yards out with no one to beat.

A grand run by Scotland on the right looked dangerous, but England's defence cleared. Maxwell for Scotland spoiled a clever piece of play through fouling Crompton, and let England in again, only to be brought up by Stewart. Scotland pressing on the right, forced Pennington to kick out. A foul against Scotland was the beginning of some clever mid-field play, from which England, pressing home on the left, had a grand try through Hall. Another shot from Bache showed Scotland's goalkeeper at his best, and yet another hard drive by Robert was cleverly saved by Muir.

The English halves were playing a sterling game, and being ably assisted by a pack of clever forwards, were beating Scotland pointless. A corner for Scotland resulted in England getting away on a likely run, only to be hauled up by Young. A corner for England was put past, and Scotland opening out had for a time as much of the play as their opponents. Scotland now pressing once or twice looked dangerous, but the same perfect understanding did not exist among their players as it did in the camp of the visitors. Half—time :—

The second half opened with some good exchanges, and A Smith, for Scotland, had hard lines in not getting through on the run, being just beaten by a fast travelling ball. Young, from three-quarters, had a shot which just missed by inches. Scotland at this stage were more dangerous than they had been in the first half, and almost scored, forcing Robinson to run for the ball and concede a corner, which Young put past. Some grand open play now ensued, and Scotland pressing keenly were brought up through Smith fouling Crompton.

A grand shot by Stokes, and another by Warren, again gave Muir a chance to show his value to Scotland. Some exciting play around the English goal followed, but the ball was put past. At this stage Scotland were showing to advantage in attack, and were having some hard luck, and only by the good luck of England did their goal escape, as the ball from Smith ran right across the goalmouth and just beat Maxwell to reach it. The game was then stopped for a few minutes owing to Pennington receiving a bad knock, but he was able to continue. A grand piece of left-wing play for Scotland terminated in Stark shooting hard at Robinson who cleverly saved.

England pressing hard were outwitting the Scottish halves, but they in their turn stuck to their guns, and after some lively exchanges the defence ultimately prevailed. The game was stubbornly contested, neither side giving much away, Scotland pressing through McTavish and Maxwell all but scored. The Scottish goal was then besieged, and escaped once or twice marvellously.

The English forwards, led by Thornley, Bache, and Hall, towards the close gave the Scottish back division a hard time of it and the defence, which came in for some severe criticism during the week came out with flying colours, keeping the Englishmen at bay till the whistle blew, the game ending—

Wales vs. Scotland.—Wales has at length succeeded in performing the "hat trick" in her international engagements with Scotland, after a series of defeats, with a drawn game at irregular intervals. The Principality gained a well merited victory at Wrexham in 1905, followed by an even more brilliant win at Edinburgh last year. Yesterday's match was therefore looked forward to with more than usual interest.

When it became necessary to make two alterations in the Welsh team, which appeared to weaken it, there was great disappointment on the part of Welsh enthusiasts. Both the newcomers, however, played a fair game; in fact, the only weak spot was at centre-forward, Morgan Owen being distinctly off colour. The weather was fine, and a crowd of 8,000 was attracted to Wrexham racecourse, where the game was played.

The Scotsmen were the first to become dangerous, and the Welsh defence was severely tested. Two or three free-kicks greatly assisted the visitors. Corners fell to both teams, but none of them were improved upon, Roose and Mc Bride being on the alert. Half time :—

After the interval play became even more exciting, and quite as fast as in the first half. Wales certainly gave a much better exhibition, and two corners were conceded them in quick succession, but no score followed. Meredith got in a good shot, but McBride cleared in grand style, and Roose was called upon at the other end, but was equal to the occasion. Play was now going in the Welshmen's favour, and the Scottish defence was frequently called up, but was not pierced. Both teams were now exerting themselves to obtain a lead, but without avail until the last minute, when from a pass by Meredith, Gordon Jones shot into goal, and from McBride's clearance Grenville Morris got possession, and scored with a warm shot. The visitors played pluckily, but they failed to equalise. Result :—

CROSS-COUNTRY RUNNING.

The National Championship.—If the National C.C.U. had arranged for the weather, they could scarcely have had a more brilliant day than Saturday. The venue for the thirty first annual championship was Colwall Park, Great Malvern, a delightful spot, and thanks to the energy of the G. W. Railway Company, easily accessible from all parts. The South were favoured by a fast special which performed the journey in three hours, while too much praise can hardly be given to the company's officials for the manner in which they catered both for competitors and pleasure seekers. The course selected was a very trying one, and would have delighted those old stagers who so frequently declaim against our present championship courses. A spur of the Malvern Hills had to be ascended in each of the three laps of the country, and it may safely be said that, though the course was obviously short of the full ten miles, it was a thoroughly satisfactory test of stamina. It soon found out the weak spots of those who were short of training. From a spectators' point of view the race could not have been beaten, yet the gate was somewhat disappointing; but thanks to the fine entry of twenty clubs, financial success is assured. Those who were urging that the severe course tended to upset public form found the result a stumbling-block, for on the whole the running was just what we were led to expect. Birchfield once again took the honours, and they run a very fine team indeed, the accession of Underwood and Green making their victory secure at an early stage, and at half distance they had ten men in the first thirty-seven. Such running put the other clubs out of the hunt. Highgate lamented the breakdown of A. G. Horne, J. Woolley, and J. G. Coughlin, but they never flattered their supporters. Hallamshire ran a sound team, and might have troubled our Southern champions more had they not made such hard running in the first mile. Much regret was expressed at the absence of the Haddington Harriers, who scratched, thus leaving nineteen teams in the field, of whom sixteen finished the course, the non-stayers being Derby, Worcester and the Godiva, the latter only finishing one man—Arthur Ashby, the Midland Junior champion. The Polytechnic, true to their traditions, finished their complete twelve, and in the proportion of finishers to starters, the Southern came out well ahead of the other divisions.

Individual honours fell to a worthy athlete in George Pearce, who has now gained an honour for which he has striven for some years, and he will be hard to beat in the "International." Joe Deakin was an excellent second, notwithstanding a fall which lost him much ground, and shook him up so severely that at five miles he looked like being beaten both by Dunkley and Underwood, who made up quite seventy yards on the racecourse. But it turned out that Deakin had wisely reserved his energies over the light going so as to recover fully from his mishape, and up the hill he went right away again, and was never afterwards approached. A. Underwood beat Dunkley over the last mile or so. In the foremost positions Midlanders were well represented principally because they were running nearly all the leading men in their district race, while from the South the race was scarcely as well supported as had been expected. In club placings they had five in the first eleven, however, Polytechnic proving themselves a fine team, and closing in fourth—a long way behind the placed clubs.

ATHLETICS.

Cambridge University Sports.—More genial weather for the concluding day of the University Trials could not have prevailed and some grand performances were recorded. Kenneth Powell followed up his fine showing in the Hurdles of Monday by winning the final in 15¼ sec., while a well-known timekeeper in Mr. J. E. Dixon made it a fifth faster. This was not the only Fenner's record put up, as R. H. Lindsay-Watson hurled the hammer 131ft. 2in., and afterwards in an exhibition throw reached 134ft. 6in.—the best throw at Cambridge. Another fine performance was Kenneth Macleod's win in the Hundred inside 10½ sec. Considering this was the first event he has competed in since winning the Inter-Varsity sprint last spring, the showing is exceptionally meritorious. In the Long Jump, R. P. Frankyn was seen to great advantage, and, jumping most consistently landed 22ft. 2in. The three previous best efforts at these sports were:—H. A. Jones 22ft. 5¾in., E. Baddeley 22ft. 4¾in., and R. J. Leakey 22ft. 4in. In the Quarter-mile, E. H. Ryle scored his third victory and when extended will accomplish better time. The Mile was always at the mercy of H. G. Weber the most improved of long-distance runners in residence, who, while doing nothing brilliant in the way of time, is to be congratulated on his strong and sound running.

Officials :—Judges, K. Powell (King's) and A. B. Welsh (Trinity); referee Rev. J. H. Gray (Queens'); starter, W. M. Fletcher; timekeeper, J. Newton Digby. Details :—

100 Yards (Final).—K. G. Macleod (Fettes and Pembroke) 1, A. E. D. Anderson (Eton and Trinity) 2, W. Brass (Eton and Trinity) 3, C. C. G. Wright (Tonbridge and Pembroke) 4. This is Macleod's second win, he having been successful as a "Fresher." Getting away smartly, he was soon going along in fine style, and won by a good three yards; Anderson beat Brass in the last few yards, and obtained second place by half a yard. Time—10½secs. (inside).

Hurdles (Final).—K. Powell (Rugby and King's) 1, R. T. Gladstone (Uppingham and Trinity) 2, C. R. Grace (University College School and Clare.) 3. The Blue tied with F. H. Teall as a Freshman, and could not compete twelve months ago. Yesterday he showed increased pace. From the first hurdle he was ahead, and moved in brilliant style, but over the last hurdle he seemed to stumble and lost some yards, but finishing strongly, he won by half a dozen yards in 15⅘ sec.

Quarter-mile.—E. H. Ryle (Eton and Trinity) 1, A. E. D. Anderson (Eton and Trinity) 2, W. H. Pelham (Eton and Trinity) 3. Ryle cut out his own work, and experienced no difficulty in winning by fifteen yards; three yards. Time, 51¼ sec.

Long Jump.—R. P. Frankland (St. Paul's and Pembroke). 22ft. 2in., 1, C. H. Williams (South-Eastern College and Emmanuel), 21ft., 2, K. G. Macleod (Fettes and Pembroke), 20ft. 11¼in., 3. Frankland got grandly off the board each time, clearing 21.5, 21.3¾, 21.5, and 22.2.

BILLIARDS.

REECE v. INMAN.—When Lovejoy's cannon became public property, all eyes turned towards perhaps the finest nursery cannon player in the whole ranks of the profession. "Let Reece once get this stroke in, and it will soon be all over with the record" appeared to be the prevailing opinion among these best qualified to judge. Subsequent events have proved the correctness of this estimate, for at Thurston's Grand Hall yesterday afternoon and evening, Reece compiled a sequence of 521 cannons in a mammoth break of 1,269. Contrast Stevenson's hitherto world's record of 802, with Lovejoy's official record of 284 cannons, with these figures of Reece, and you at once see where the justice of the barring demand comes in. Reference has been made elsewhere to the remarkable performance of the Oldham player, but I should like to point out that Reece compiled the break across the table and near the right top pocket in contra-distinction to Lovejoy's method up and down the table. We have thus had the stroke exploited at three different parts of a table. First, left top pocket, second, right bottom pocket, and third, right top pocket. Moreover, Reece played the stroke with both white balls dead level with each other, whereas in Lovejoy's case, the cue ball was a little to the rear of the object white. Apart from this slight deviation, the position of the balls in each of the three instances was practically the same.

Now that Reece has shown how easy the stroke is to a master of touch and strength—and the Oldham man possesses both to an unusual degree—something must be done at once to either bar it altogether or limit its use. It is on the latter lines, I believe, the B. A. will move, and move very quickly, from all I hear. Meantime, thoughts will revert to the position as record-holder held by that prince of billiardists, H. W. Stevenson. Everyone fully recognises that between the breaks there is no comparison. Will the B. A. adopt a classification mode of dealing with them? In common fairness to Stevenson they ought to do so, and somehow I believe they will. Whether they do so or not the public—who are excellent judges in a matter of this kind—will no doubt continue to consider the Stevenson effort as the break of breaks. That marvellous 1,269 by Reece, cannot possibly dim or tarnish the glory of that ever memorable 892 compiled in February, 1905—also at Thurston's Grand Hall, by the way—by Harry William Stevenson.

In view of Reece's colossal break, the appended list of players who have broken their records this season will be perused with interest:

THE MILITARY CHAMPIONSHIP.
Final Round.

The defeat of the King's Royal Rifles by the Life Guards, at Prince's Club, yesterday, came as a surprise, as it was confidently expected that the former would prove victorious. The want of form shown in the preliminary matches this week by Capt. Guest made the victory of the Rifles still more probable, but the Guardsman upset these calculations by playing yesterday at the top of his form. He made few of the mistakes in the court which on Tuesday and Wednesday detracted so much from the merit of his game while his service was almost invariably good. Mr. Astor, too showed at his best, and his improvement since last year is very pronounced. He served very effectively, and he is unboubtedly the hardest hitter seen in the preliminary competion. Major Mott and Mr. Lee played with their customary steadiness, but they were beaten by the superior power of their opponents in the rallies.

The match was witnessed by Lord and Lady Denman, and a large number of army officers, the latter including General Hennikey, C.B., Col. F. I. Maxse, C.B., D.S.O, Col. Leach, Col. Kennard, Lieut.-Col. G. F. Milner, D.S.O., Capt. P. A. Macgregor, D.S.O., and Capt. J. S. Cavendish, D.S.O. Details:—

THE MILITARY CHAMPIONSHIP (Doubles).
Final Round

1st Life Guards (Capt. Hon Mr. F. E. Guest and J. J Astor) beat 4th Batt. King's Royal Rifles (Major S. F. Mott and Mr. G. T. Lee) by 4 games to love, 63 aces to 48. Score: 15—11, 18—16 15—11 15—10.

First Game.—Lee won the spin for the service, and ran up three aces. Guest followed with two. Astor with a single, and Lee a couple before putting himself out by serving on to the board. So far the aces had all been made by service, but in the next two hands, which produced two to Mott and three to Guest, brought out some spirited rallies, Guest taking his part splendidly. Astor, took the lead at 8—7, but after Lee had failed, Mott, with four aces by service, went to 11—8. The Rifles scored nothing further, as Guest with five, and Astor with two, ran out.

Second Game.—Continuing his hand, Astor added five, but the two following essays of the Guardsmen were unproductive, while their opponents gained a lead of 6—5. Then Astor with five, and his partner with a single, went to 11—6, but Lee in the innings following equalised. Small contributions ensued until the game at 13 all was "set 5," Mott then being in possession. He added only a single while Astor was put out after he had scored a point. Three to Guest made the Guardsmen "game-ball"—1, and after Lee had failed and Mott had scored two, Astor obtained the winning ace.

Third Game—Astor continued in possession until "5—love" was called, Lee with a couple and Mott with three getting on terms at their following hands. After small innings. Lee, with a sequence of six, obtained an advantage of 11—8, but Mott as second hand did nothing, and the Life Guards then went to "game."

Fourth Game—Guest opened with three aces, and so made his full sequence seven and then level play and small scores were the order for a dozen hands. At 8—6 Astor put on two, and the same number after Lee, Mott, and Guest had each failed. Lee with three and Mott with a single drew close but after Guest had failed to score, Astor with three won the game, and the rubber.

The 1st Life Guards meet the holders the 2nd Batt. Highland Light Infantry (Mr. H. Balfour Bryant, M.V.O., and Mr. P. Bramwell Davis), to-morrow, at 2-30.

THE SINGLES CHAMPIONSHIP.

The Military Singles Championship begins on Monday, the draw being as follows:—

Capt. A. Berger (A. S. C.), Capt. C. M. Grogan (4th Dragoon Guards), and Capt. the Hon. F. E. Guest (1st Life Guards) byes.

Mr. H. Balfour Bryant, M. V. O. (2nd Batt H. L. I.) vs. Mr. P. Bramwell Davis (2nd Batt H. L. I.), Monday, 12 o'clock.

11TH PROBYN'S LANCERS vs. THE NEWCOMERS.—The tournament opened with this game on the 20th instant. It was a completely one-sided affair, the Lancers keeping their opponents entirely on the defensive all the time and running out winners by 6 goals and 5 subsidiaries to nil. Teams:—

23RD CAVALRY vs. KADIR TEAM.—The Kadir Team comprised four young officers of the 16th Hussars who have entered for the annual Kadir Cup Meeting near Meerut. Through the first half of the game the 23rd were in the ascendant, yet had hard work in building up their score. Then in the latter stages of the game the Kadir Team held the ball in the Cavalry's ground. Though scoring two minor points, that they did not get more substantial results out of their raids on the 23rd's flags was due to the fine defence of the latter. The game all through was a very good one. At the conclusion the score was 23rd Cavalry 2 goals 3 subsidiaries to 2 subsidiaries.

THE HORNETS' C. C.

THE Honorary Secretary of the above Club has kindly placed at our disposal the following figures which show the doings of the club during the season just closed. Twenty-seven matches were arranged, but eleven of these had to be cancelled—5 by the Hornets and 6 by their opponents. Out of the remaining sixteen matches ten were won, one lost and five drawn, and of the latter four were decidedly in the Hornets' favour. The general form displayed was good though on two occasions the Club fairly fell to pieces.—

GOLF IN THE BRITISH ISLES.

8th March 1907.

HAVE people in far away India any ken of an event which has lately been engrossing the time and thought of all the Professionals within a given radius of the metropolis? Every thing in the tournament—the London Professionals' Foursome Tournament—was going very smoothly when suddenly an extremely awkward situation was created. Some time before this event began the leading Professionals engaged to take part in the competition arranged by the Grand Duke Michael at Cannes; this invitation was, of course, an honour and would in all probability result in considerable pecuniary benefit therefore naturally the invited ones accepted with alacrity. Among those who entered for the Foursome Tournament and also took advantage of the Grand Duke's invitation was Rowland Jones' partnered in the former contest with A. H. Toogood. It was originally arranged that the finals of this should take place on Wednesday, 27th February. Nobody dreamt that the two events would in any way clash with each other, but assuredly at Golf the unexpected, the unwished for, the unlegislated for always does happen, and so in this case, for Jones and Toogood survived all their heats and were booked to play the final on the very day that all the invites were to be on the other side of the channel far away in the Sunny Riviera. What was to be done, those in authority took upon themselves to postpone the date of the finals to a day when Jones was back again in England, but evidently this arrangement did not meet with the approval of the other competitors (Ralph Smith and A Tingey) who claimed a walk over alleging excellent reasons in a letter to the Editor of the World of Golf, one of which was that on the date fixed for a match in this very same competition, between Jones and Toogood and the two brothers Gaudin the latter were unable to play and Jones and Toogood scored a walk over. With the exception of the final the tournament has been a tremendous success, the handsome challenge shields were presented by Sir Thomas Dewar and are said to be the most valuable trophies ever offered for competition. And now a word or two, may be a hundred words or so, on the Rival Competition which attracted Jones away from his native shores when duty—certainly a duty, he owed to his partner—bad him remain. In brilliant weather at Cannes the Professional Tournament, promoted by that ardent supporter of Golf—the Grand Duke Michael of Russia, was begun. There were only 12 competitors but such a dozen! Seven of these were Englishmen, four were Scotsmen, and only one who was not British born this was Arnaud Massey, a native of Biarritz, who holds the Championship of France and who has distinguished himself greatly in more than one open Championship. With customary insular prejudice the John Bulls and their womenfolk assembled to watch the play fully expected that premier honours would fall to one or other of the great quartette, Alas! Pride which goeth before a fall was bound to rumble some one from his exalted height in this as in other matters; In two brilliant rounds of 75+74=149, the non-British competitor stood head of the list at the conclusion of the play. Appended are the scores in order:—

Arnaud Massey	75+74=149
Edward Ray	75+75=150
J. H. Taylor	72+80=152
Rowland Jones	82+72=154
Tom Vardon	78+77=155
Alexander Herd	81+74=155
James Braid	81+76=157

A noteworthy incident happened to James Braid in his first round. His the shot landed the ball in a tree; there happens, as it so often happens, to be no local rule to legislate for such a contingency, and a question naturally arose as to whether he should play the ball (as is enjoined in the R. and A. rules and in the true spirit of medal play) where it lay or incur a penalty by dropping. Now Jamie did not want to climb a mimosa tree, nor did he think that a stroke with a niblick would dislodge the ball satisfactorily, so he dropped another ball and counted one stroke; eventually the committee on being referred to decided he must count two strokes, but this penalty did not materially affect the result of the champion place in the competition. The great meeting of Pros. was brought to a conclusion at Cannes with a 3 holes four-ball foursome competition by strokes, the best ball at each hole counting for the side. This partook somewhat of the nature of the now popular eclectic competition but want of space compels me to curtail my remarks and so with the bare results of this competition the account of the some day historic gathering of Pros. at Cannes must be brought to an end.

Roland Jones and Arnaud Massey ...	66+71=137
Ben Sayers and T Vardon	70+71=141
James Braid and Harry Vardon	71+72=143
Edward Ray and B. Callaway	72+71=143
J. H. Taylor and T Callaway	73+74=147
Alex Herd and J White	74+75=149

Before, however, really concluding the remarkable score of Jones and Massey is worthy of consideration in detail. One or other was continually doing a hole brilliantly and the only two 5.'s on their card were at the 2nd and 18th holes and a 2 at the 16th hole which measures 252 yards was a remarkable performance.

Jones and Massey Out 3, 5, 4, 3, 4, 4, 3, 4, 4=34 } =66.
Jones and Horne 4, 4, 4, 4, 3, 2, 2, 4, 5=32 }

The best outward round was accomplished by little Ben Sayes, (the King-Maker) and Tom Vardon thus: Out—3, 5, 3, 2, 4, 4, 4, 4=33.

It is understood that the Professional Tournament instituted this year is likely to be an annual event and for this the thanks of all concerned, players, lookers-on, organisers are due to the Grand Duke Michael, I now find that the incident in Braid's round referred to above took place in the four-ball Four some Tournament, and not in the singles—it is never too late to make amends. The conditions under which the London Amateur Foursome Competition are played are giving rise to some adverse criticism chiefly from clubs north of London; for in the rules it is enjoined that all matches in this competition are to take place either at Wooking, Sunningdale Walton Heath or By first, a stupid rather shortsighted proviso which has had the undesirable effect of keeping some of the clubs north of London from entering for the competition for these contend and justly too—"why, oh! why should we trouble to go to some unknown course south of the Thames to play two members of a very adjacent club?

A very sad and gloomy event occurred at Ilfracombe last week, when after playing a round in his usual health in the morning Captain Wylie suddenly expired from heart failure in the afternoon. In my last letter I dilated on the merits of the Colonel ball—since then this well known justly appreciated sphere has accomplished (not altogether on its own initiative must one confess) fresh triumphs on the green in that Arnaud Massey, Edward Ray, and J. H. Taylor, all seemed to prefer this to any other ball and played their rounds with the Colonels assistance and co-operation at Cannes; but another ball bids fair to rival this same all-conquering rubber core above mentioned—this is Spalding's famous. Red and Blue Dot." The name of Spalding is too well known to necessitate my giving their biography or even a sketch of the great boon and blessing their clubs, balls and golfing accoutrements have been, and are likely for sometime to be to the world of golf but these balls like Caesar's wife are undoubtedly "above suspicion": try them and like Pears' Soap you will henceforth use no other. Every golfer has his or her favourite club maker, and every player swears by the ball with which he has accomplished his best round, and of course each has his or her own particular green, preferable in his eyes to all others, but golfers are broad minded animals and are never averse to giving a fair trial to novelties therefore a word to them who have not tried Spalding's production.

There is very little space to devote this week to the doings of the two varsities on the Links, though every Saturday both are busy trying conclusions with the biggest and strongest clubs round London. On Saturday, 2nd instant, a very close match decided by holes up went in favour of Walton Heath over Oxford. Chiefly responsible for the victory was Mr. W. P. Henderson's 7 up to Mr. C. F. Younger, while towards the 16 points scored by the Dark Blue side was 5 up to the credit of the Hon. D. Finch-Halton, who did the first 8 holes in 32 strokes.

On the same day scoring according to their custom by matches only the Light Blue team played the Oxford and Cambridge Golfing Society.

On the Royal Worbington and Newmarket Club's course the sides and scores were as appended:—

NOTES AND COMMENTS

THE public have at last been presented with the League status, which owing to numerous scratchings and withdrawls, it has been nigh impossible to draw up. There has been very little change in the position of the clubs engaged since my last notes were written. The Rangers, however, who then tied with Calcutta for the leading position have only been able to draw with the B.-N. R. and Y. M. C. A and are now virtually "out of the hunt." On the other hand Caledonia are only one point below Calcutta and Dalhousie two, and these two teams are the only serious opponents Calcutta have to contend with. There are still several good games to be played, notably Calcutta vs. Hornets on the 27th instant, Calcutta vs. Dalhousie on 6th April, and Dalhousie vs. Rangers, all of which should result in good contests.

It is with the greatest regret one learns that Ballygunge have decided to withdraw from the League altogether and for some time past the decision has been inevitable. The club have, as it is, a very few hockey playing members and when a few of that number are unable to play from one cause or another, it is impossible to raise a side. Ballygunge's loss has been Calcutta's gain, as both Groves and Manders will be assisting the premier club in their future engagements. Groves has been unquestionably one of the mainstays of the Suburban Club for several years, and it is only that his old club are absolutely incapable of producing a team, that prompts him to offer his services to Calcutta.

Calcutta have only been called upon to play once during the week and the meeting with Mohun Bagan (whom they have every cause to remember in connection with the Minto Football Cup Competition) resulted in the defeat of the babus by 2 goals to 1. The score, however, does not in the least bit indicate the play, as Calcutta were all over their opponents, who it must be said put up a great defence. The babus after having scored a rather lucky goal, acted entirely on the defensive and simply crowded round the goal, insomuch that several hard and well directed shots never got within yards of the goal-keeper. The burly Bose in particular played a great game and his weight stood him in good stead. Half way through the first half Oldfield equalised for Calcutta as the result of a nice dribble and shot, but it was only a few minutes from the close that Calcutta took the lead through Sherman, who was backing up Manders. The result of bringing Manders from back to forward proved successful, and I am inclined to think he would be of more service in the attack. The half back line with Groves at left half did all that was required of them and Studd at centre improves with every game he plays.

Caledonia are going very strong and their last victory of 4 goals to nil over the Y.M.C.A. was as decisive as the score would indicate. They have, however, lost one or two of their regular players and this may affect them when meeting teams of greater strength than those they have so far had to contend with.

The Rangers, to whom I have already referred, have had to be content with two drawn games, and indeed at one stage were lucky to avoid defeat by the B.-N. R. The Rangers had some excellent opportunities of scoring, but failed through erratic shooting. Clark for the Railway team put up an excellent defence, while Tripp and Douglas at forward, tried all they knew to score, but at times luck was dead against them, and the two goals that were netted were rightly adjudged offside.

The Customs appear to be waking up again: their defeat of the Town Club by 6 goals to 1 should put fresh life into them. The game against the Rovers was not of a very high order. The Customs were admittedly without one or two of their regular players, but for all that they should have won. McCready when he liked played well but he struck me as not always being a "trier." Edwards was the pick of the halves and Adams at back played soundly. The Rovers with one or two exceptions have the making of a first-class team, but these with one or two exceptions might very favourably be weeded out altogether for all the good they are. The inside left in particular appears to have no other mission in the field, than to hack at his opponent's sticks in his attempt to get the ball. Now although there appears to be no very plain ruling with regard to this, I think the rule is meant to indicate that a player may hook his opponent's stick at the time either one or the other are playing the ball, but is barred from making deliberate cuts at it, and thus in some measure imperiling his opponent.

Another thing which is so often seen, now that the rule allowing a player to use his stick reversed, has come into force. For instance the outside right forward, after dodging his opposing half, gets down the wing with the ball, and the beaten half promptly starts in hot pursuit, and when, in his opinion is within striking distance, makes violent lunges with his stick across his opponent in his attempt to check the career of the ball. He may be successful, but the chances are greatly in favour of his checking his opponent, and if not tripping him up altogether, bark his shins to some tune. The Umpire gives a foul if he sees you are the first to be hit, which, of course, having only human eyes he cannot, and the ill-used one retires without a single compensating advantage. Of course when the shot in question comes off and is not dangerously played it is both effective and clever, but it so often is not, and should the injured one be of a somewhat fiery disposition the result is usually a quiet battle with the aggressor until the game is ended.

Sibpur who are now appearing again, are doing exceedingly well in spite of having lost several of their best men, including Lawton, Brown and Ansell, whose places it would be difficult to fill on any hockey field. But like school and college combinations the team plays so well together, that they make up almost for this individual deficiency. The victory of 6—1 over the Hornets, one hears was not a true index of the game, and I should quite believe not. The goal-keeper who delights in the nom-de-plume of "Johanson" being credited with the overwhelming defeat. Poor "Johanson" he was possibly persuaded much against his will, to play at the last moment, and in spite of his protests, disclaiming any connection whatever with the game, he was forced to don the pads. He tries his best and gets severely slated for it; you have my sympathy "Johanson," for was not I once such another! This goes to prove the great importance of a goal-keeper, and although it is no enviable position, and runs the risk of being severely potted at, yet it is certainly one of the most necessary positions on the field to ably fill and requires more nerve and judgment than science.

THE GRAMOPHONE CO.

GENTLEMEN,

The Gramophone of to-day I find is such an improved instrument for recording the human voice to the older machines with which so many of us are familiar, that my hitherto objection to allow the thousands who cannot hear me sing personally to listen to the reproduction of my voice through the instrumentality of your Gramophone is now quite removed, and the Records which you have lately made for me I think are natural reproductions of my voice.

Yours truly,

The Story Teller.

A FRIENDLY MOUNT.

A FEW YEARS SINCE, when walking round the Grand National course at Liverpool previous to the decision of the big event of the meeting, while pausing at Becher's Brook I heard a voice behind me: 'Rather a different course from what we had at our Dowlutpore Meeting, Colonel!' Turning round I was hailed by my old friend Godower, whom I had not met for many years, and whom I had known intimately in days gone by in India, where we had soldiered together. Godower was a smart cavalry officer, who, when I knew him, was in a lancer regiment; a keen sportsman and fine horseman, both over a country and on the flat. He always said he felt ever grateful to me as having been his first instructor in pigsticking, and for having given him his first mount for a race. A similarity of tastes and a keen love of sport in all its branches had thrown us much together, so the pleasure of the present rencontre was mutual.

As we strolled round the course we recalled many stirring incidents of sport in bygone days, of racing and chasing and gallops after the 'grim, grey boar.'!

While discussing steeplechasing Godower said: 'Of all the meetings in which we have taken part I think Dowlutpore stands quite by itself. Do you recollect your ride on 'King of the Valley,' Colonel, when I was on 'Empress'? 'Shall I ever forget it'! I replied. It was one of my riding recollections that I think I may consider unique, and it is the account of this event which Godower recalled to memory that I propose to give my readers. It occurred many years ago, and of all that took part in it I believe he and I are the only survivors.

Before starting my narrative I may mention that I am, or ither was in younger days in the far-away East, a riding man. India—at least, at that time—nearly everyone who was not revented by a wife, large pay and allowances, or obesity, was a ding man to a greater or less degree ; generally the latter. But e riding man par excellence was the individual whose weight ature had restricted to 9st. (reducible to 8st. 10lb.), imparting him at the same time a love of horses and all connected ith them, and also a good idea of stable management. y the way, on reflection, I think the aforesaid description almost equally applicable to the riding man of the present.

Well, such was my case. It involved at all times innumerable offers of mounts on their horses from my riends 'just to give him a bit of schooling,' or a gallop to see what you think of him—how he shapes up; 'often dding 'he may be a bit fresh.' This last precaution I soon got to know and to understand what it probably meant; he animal often proving a vicious buck-jumping waler hat was a little fresh from no man having remained long nough on his back to take it out of him! 'But to a chap ike yourself—who is a real horseman, you know—of course a ride of this sort must be perfect enjoyment'! his also was the opinion of a lady friend who insisted on my riding her fat Gulf horse 'Bijou' (aged eighteen) for he 'Ladies' Bracelete,' which she fondly expected I was to win, although three or four smart Arabs were running against him, You may imagine what my feelings were when the flag dropped and 'Bijou' began to curvet and amble! I need hardly say we did not win the bracelet, but I am quite sure that I altogether fell in her estimation, and that she thought nothing of me as a horseman subsequently. However, I had for many a long day to stick to my role. No big pay and allowances or obesity or matrimony came to enable me to make excuse and claim exemption from being any longer a riding man.

It thereupon followed, quite as a matter of course, that I received an invitation from my friend Simkin, who had been by guest at our Station Race Meeting at Fusserabad, to go and stay with him for their races at Dowlutpore. He added, as a further attraction to his invitation, that he would get me lots of good mounts: among them would be one on his own horse for the 'Grand Vale Steeplechase.'

It was the period when railways had not found their way any distance up-country, so Simkin concluded his letter with explanations as to my trip, promising he would arrange to have horses laid for me to ride in the last forty miles.

Getting the requisite leave from the brigadier, I went off in great glee. There was no hitch in the arrangements for my journey, and I found five capital nags laid to bring me on the last stages to Dowlutpore where I arrived on the eve of the races and was hospitably welcomed by Simkin and his wife. I must say Simkin had been as good as his word in getting me some mounts; as on the first day I won the Derby, a good race by half a length, and the Galloway Plate after an exciting struggle by a neck—two most enjoyable rides.

The Grand Vale Steeplechase was fixed for the second day, and as we returned from the course it occured to me to ask Simkin to let me have a look at the animal I was to steer therein. Imagine my dismay when I was introduced to a weedy-looking, mealy bay country-bred about fifteen hands, showing about as much breeding as a bullock; and this was the thing I was to ride against three others, one of which I knew to be 'Empress' the crack chaser of that part of the country However, I thought perhaps he might have some merits which were not superficially apparent, so said nothing, but made up my mind to take my chance, only asking his name. 'Oh!' said Simkin, we call him "The Snoozer," but he's entered in the chase tomorrow as "King of the Valley"!' It was not a cheering outlook. I mentally depicted myself struggling along hopelessly on King of the Valley'—known probably to every soul present as 'The Snoozer'—while 'Empress' was sailing away at her ease with Godower on her back; for he had told me with great delight that afternoon that he had the mount.

The more I pondered over it the less I liked my prospective ride; and as we sat down to dinner I suggested to my host that, as he knew the horse, he had much better ride himself. Upon which he replied, 'I would have done so couple of years ago, old chap, but since I've been married, my wife won't let me ride over jumps; besides. I've got too heavy to ride the weight, and am not fit!' Well there was no way out of it. Mrs. Simkin said, with her sweetest smile. "Oh! I hope you'll ride for us, my dear Colonel; I have been so hard at work on your jacket and cap, I am sure you'll think them so pretty; violet with white belt and quartered cap—that's the correct description, isn't it?"

After dinner they were duly produced and admired. Mrs. Simkin had spared neither trouble nor expense; they were of rich corded silk, made, she assured me, after a good English pattern. As I gazed at them I reflected sadly that their life (subject to the 'King's' performances) would be such a short one.

Simkin had already put some money on his horse at long odds, and offered to let me stand in halves or quarters, whichever I preferred; but I thought the risk I was about to undergo corporeally was sufficient, without yielding to the fascination of backing my mount.

My host promised that, as next day was a non racing one, he would show me round the course in the morning, which he accordingly did. It had come on to rain during the night and was raining as we rode up to the ground, which made the scene additionally dispiriting, the general aspect of the course being anything but but cheering. It was about two and a half miles over fields, some ploughed and others with standing corn. There was the usual variety of fences, hedges, post and rails, water and an Irish bank, which were fit to extend and English hunter; and I had to negotiate them on the brute I have described. The chief item was (as it generally is) the water jump, which, instead of being as usual, in front of the stand, was, owing to a friendly nullah being utilised, in one of the aforesaid fields. There was no make-believe about the obstacle; it was 13ft. from bank to bank with a 3ft. hedge on the take-off side, quite full of water, the stream having been dammed up on purpose, and was, I am sure, quite 5ft. deep Simkin seemed to look upon it as a beautiful jump, being, as he said, 'such a prefectly natural fence.' When I asked him whether any of the artists who had planned and laid out the course were going to ride, I was scarcely astonished to hear him reply they were not; each one having some good reason for excusing himself, my host heading them with his matrimonial plea of the previous evening. The rain continued that day and part of next night, making the going deep and sticky. It was suggested to put off the race, but to this the owners of two of the horses engaged would not agree. There was the usual big lottery on the event, and Simkin had bought his for five rupees, which did not look as if his chance was much fancied by the Dowlutpore public. He said to me that I must have some interest in the race, so he had put down half to me. I did not feel grateful, but agreed to let it stand.

He also told me he had taken odds about three separate events: first, that the 'King' would lead ever the first fence; second that 'Empress,' would fall; third, that 'King of the Valley' would win.

There were, as I have said, two others besides the 'King and 'Empress,' both Arabs—'Jack-o' Lantern' and TheLaird, neither of whom bore a very high repute; the former was considered fast, but an uncertain fencer, and a terrific puller.

We got off at the first attempt to a good start. My orders being to do my best to pull off bet No. 1, I tried at once for the lead, but found I was utterly outpaced. The others neared the first fence almost in line, when 'Jack-o'-Lantern,' who was on the right, swerved clean across, carrying the other two out with him, thus enabling me to come up and get over which I did with a scramble thus landing the first bet. Godower, however, though he had lost a lot of ground, was able to soon to pull up and repass me, with the other two in attendance. He seemed determined 'Empress' should be in front for the rest of the journey, and sent her along in earnest, so that at the post and rails, when trying to steady herself for the take-off, thus slipped on the wet ground and turned right over the railst knocking her rider out of time, and taking no further part in the race, thus winning for Simkin his second bet. Luckily for me, in her fall she smashed two of the rails, thus enabling me to slip through, for I am sure I should never have got over otherwise. At the next fence but one, 'the Laird and" 'Jack' collided and both came down, the former laming himself badly, the latter getting rid of his bridle and galloping home to his stable. I then went on along crashed through the hedge plump into the water, where as usual a large crowd had collected, so that there was no lack of willing hands to extricate us which was done after some difficulty. I remounted in sorry plite, soaked from head to foot, my mouth full of mud and water, and started again, a shower of blows falling on the horse's quaters as we set off.

I got two more falls and scrambled somehow through the rest of the fences. At last I reached the winning post bruised battered, and bleeding, with clothes torn to pieces. The first thing I did on pulling up was to be extremely sick, which greatly alarmed Simkin, who feared I would never be able to draw my weight at the scales, where, however, I received the requisite 'All right, weight,' and thus won Simkin the Grand Vale Steeplechase, together with his bets, though I fear the violet and white jacket and cap never did duty again. My half of the lottery amounted to a little over 1,000 rupees, which was some solitium for my cuts and buises.

Simkin duly presented me with a handsome whip, on which were engraved the name and date of the race, and also that of 'King of the Valley', who by the way, resumed his former life as 'The Snoozer', and I can confidently assert never risked the laurles he had gained by again trying his luck over a country being reserved for what Mr. Jorrocks terms 'Distinction in the minor fields of 'oss enterprise.'

(a) The best players do not now retreat this Bishop in similar positions. If it is left on Q B 4 time is saved, and the first player by taking it only opens the Queen's file for Black.

(b) A serious error.

(c) 10 P takes P, with the view of winning the piece, would have been very hazardous, on account of the reply—11 Kt to K 6, followed by Kt to Q 5, and threatening the capture of Black's K Kt B.

(d) The advance of these Pawns is rather premature.

(e) The worst possible line of defence, ensuring at least one passed Pawn for White. Kt to Q sq, followed by P to K B 5 and Kt to K B 2, looks more promising.

(f) All this is very good on the part of Mr. Lowe.

(g) By this move the first player gives himself much unnecessary trouble. P to Q B 3 wins at once.

Solution to Problem No. 25.

THE dealer's object is to clear his clubs and hearts and, if possible to avoid being led through in spades. A obviously led from the king, 10, 8, etc., of diamonds. Z should accordingly lead the 2, and win the trick in dummy by covering A's card. Y then leads a small club, and Z finesses the knave. If the finesses fail's Z will probably be led up to in spades or hearts. If it succeeds Z at once leads the 2 of hearts for the ace will probably be held up, and he will need two cards of entry, the ace of clubs and ace of spades, to ensure a second trick in the suit. The rest is quite simple. If led through ins spades, Z will, of course, cover an honor led, but should pass a small cards. The point of the problem is to take the finesses in clubs—contrary to the ordinary rule—on the first round, so as to avoid all risk of blocking the suit. If Z were to put Y in with the king of clubs at trick 2, for instance, and finesses the knave, A, if he won with the queen could shut out Y's long clubs by leading a diamond.

How ought the dealer to go on with the hand, and why?

Innumerable cases of temper in racehorses might be cited and if we go back to a very early period of racing, we find that Flying Childers had a bad reputation in that respect, whilst Eclipse, whose fame will endure as long as the world lasts, was not endowed with an angelic disposition, and at one time it was thought that he could never be brought to the post except as a gelding. Bay Middleton was also very unruly at times, and the same may be said of Sigmaphone and Crucifix, whilst the Irish grey, Chanticleer, was invariably a perfect demon, and the stable lad had often to make an exit from his box by the window instead of the door, when the horse exhibited more ferocity than usual. A story is told of Captain Vernon's Old Forester that proved him to have somewhat similar tendencies to Sea Song, and is as follows:—A match was made by Captain Vernon between Old Forester and Sir Jenison Shafto's Elephant, and for a considerable distance both horses ran nose and nose together. At length, however, Elephant got a little in front, whilst Old Forester was unable to recover his lost ground. Finding his efforts useless, the latter made a spring and caught the former by the under jaw, which he gripped so tenaciously that he held his rival back, and it was only with the greatest difficulty that he could be made to release his hold.

Muley Edris, to whom Archer had once administered a sound drubbing, did not forget the punishment, and had his revenge in a terrible manner some time afterwards. The horse had been given by Lord Falmouth to Archer, who sold him to one of the Newmarket trainers. Anyhow, one morning, when Archer was galloping down from the Top of the Town to the Turn of the Lands, Muley Edris rushed from the string of horses in which he was walking and seized the famous jockey by the wrist, inflicting serious injuries, from which Archer was a long while recovering. Eventually he put himself in the late Dr. Hutton's hands, with, it is needless to say, a satisfactory result. Despair was a regular savage, and always wore a muzzle, while his temper was considerably worse than that of Peter, and strange to say, both these horses carried off the Royal Hunt Cup.

LUXURY IN SPORT.

Over the familiar signature of T. F. Dale we notice in a recent issue of Baily's Magazine some remarks upon the growth of an "incongruous spirit of fastidiousness and luxury" in sport. The writer is dealing directly with fox-hunting and the anxiety to skim the cream while evading or shirking the scientific, the really sporting phases, of the sport. He argues that the modern spirit of hurry is invading the hunting field to the detriment of true sport: that masters under pressure of an impatient field are more anxious to get their fox away as quickly as possible, to kill him after a brisk fifteen or twenty minutes, and get on to another covert to repeat the operation. And he detects a growing tendency to indulge the taste of a field which cares nothing for real hound-work, but comes out for a gallop at steeplechase pace, careless of hunting in the true sense of the world. The average hunting man of to-day, he appears to think, is so impatient of hound-work that if a cold scent brings the pack to their noses he votes the whole thing slow. No doubt there is truth in the charge; but after all it is no new thing and hardly deserves condemnation as evidence of that spirit of luxury and fastidiousness the writer deplores. That that spirit is growing however, we cannot question; but we find better proof of it in the unreadiness of the hunting man who shrinks from going out on wet days or who does not feel that he can make his appearance in an old coat. We fail to see that the fashion of going to the meet—or "as near thereunto as he may safely get," to misquote a ship's charter party,—in a motor car has much in itself to be condemned. If it be permissible to go to the meet in a brougham, surely the means of traction does not make a vital difference, because the motor permits the user to cover the distance quicker and therefore, to get out of bed quarter of an hour or thiry minutes later. We grant that the use of a motor as an auxiliary to hunting is not in accord with the eternal fitness of things; but the fact does not necessarily mean enhancement of luxury. If it be argued that the presence of motors at or near the meet may operate to the detriment of sport, whether by frightening horses or by spoiling the noses of hounds (!) or, indirectly, by smothering scent going to or returning from the meet, then we have the basis of sound objection, though the case as regards luxury is not in our judgment advanced.

Where luxury is making headway, we imagine is in shooting. There are many shooting men to whom physical exercise is anathema and to these the shooting stool in a sheltered corner waiting for the "high pheasant" to make its appearance far more appeals than the laborious tramp through heather or roots; hard work in connection with shooting is voted a fag and a bore, and there are some people who so far subscribe to this doctrine that they provide conveyances to carry their guests from one covert to another and would consider their own faces blackened in the eyes of their own circle did they fail to provide a hot lunch. These innovations are partly the outcome of the exaggerated idea of "doing things well," partly of the spirit of competition with neighbours, and at the bottom of mistaken ideas of sport. It is true that the pheasant shoot where hand-reared birds are slain in thousands has not much sport about it; the artificiality of the business almost precludes measuring it by an orthodox standard of sport, and it furnishes an eloquent example of the depth of degeneracy which may be reached when artificial sport becomes accepted as preferable to the real thing. We do not find that sports which have not been artificialised suffer from luxurious innovations. Grouse shooting over dogs, save for improvements in guns and ammunition is much what it was in the days of the muzzle loader, unless we take more careful preservation into account. There are, fortunately still many men of Mr. W. Arkwright's way of thinking that grouse driving and shooting over dogs are so essentially distinct that they cannot be compared. The advocates of grouse driving urge the fact that by killing off the old cocks the head of game on a moor is increased, as an argument in its favour; but this presupposes acceptance of the theory that the sport is to be gauged by the size of the bag; and that we take it is not the true spirit of sport. We do not deny that the size of the bag may under legitimate circumstances reflect credit on the sportsman. It is one thing to start out snipe shooting in this country when the sun is well up and the birds are lying, and work all day for forty or fifty couple: it is quite another to sit behind a butt and contribute as many brace to the total bag of grouse. We take it that the essence of true sport is that the man should work for it; and that when adventitious aid is introduced whether to save him the exertion of working for it or to enhance the size of his bag, an element of luxury is admitted. Which is the better sportsman; he who is on his feet before dawn to accompany his shikari in the search for bison spoor and track the beast to his day quarters and take his chance of a shot, or he who lies abed until the shikari brings word that the bison has been tracked down and is led to the spot whence he is to take his shot? A remark of Mr. Dale's is apposite. "This (an "incongruous spirit of fastidiousness and luxury') leads us to shirk the laborious side of sport and to sacrifice the science and woodcraft of it in order to skim the cream." But is it "the cream" that we get by leaving the hard work to our native allies? Is there no pleasure, no excitement, no interest in the woodcraft? Surely no man who has acquired a little knowledge of the art of tracking game remains content with that little, but seeks to learn more as he gains the consciousness of independence and power that it confers upon him. Europeans who perforce spend the greater part of their lives anywhere but in the jungles cannot hope to arrive at the pitch of expertness which comes almost by nature to the native who lives his life in the jungles: but a good eye with educated intelligence behind it can do much, and all of us know, or have known, Europeans who could follow a spoor almost with the same facility and certainty as a native who has made tracking the business of his life. We cannot reduce the natural sport we enjoy in this country to the artificial level attained in home sports and we do not think there are many men who would wish to do so; but we can, and it will not be denied that many of us do, "shirk the laborious side" of it as far as we can. It is somewhat curious that the same man will, in cantonments find his greatest pleasure in a hard game of polo which means no inconsiderable physical exertion and in the jungle will leave the work of tracking to his shikari, ignoring the fact that that is the very essence of the sport he has come out to enjoy. There is no such thing as vicarious sport: the less a man does for himself the less he deserves the name of sportsman, whether he be actuated by indolence or by the wholly false idea that his share of the business is to kill the game with or without personal risk as the case may be. The aim of the sportsman should be to do for himself everything he can do for himself, whether it be to carry his own rifle or to track his own game.

Sporting Notes.

Operations on the Calcutta course continue to be briskly carried on, and are the only signs of activity in local racing circles. The engineering feat at the Hospital Corner has resolved itself into a catchpit with a stout masonry covering about 3 feet high. This wears a very permanent appearance, and adds to the dangers of the brave men who seek instruction in the art of horsemanship on the public riding track; still if it effects a good purpose none will complain of it seriously on this score.

Both the cold weather and monsoon tracks are undergoing a merciless harrowing, and every advantage is being taken of the late spring rain; as a rule the whole maidan is baked hard by April Fool's Day.

Another course that is being touched up this spring is the Tollygunge Club flat racing tracks. The big depressions near the five-furlong post and at the turn before entering the straight have already been filled up with loose earth, but it seems doubtful what the effect will be so far as racing this summer goes. It is hard to believe that the new earth will settle down in time to avoid relapse into bog when the monsoon comes along, though no doubt the ultimate effect will be very beneficial to the course.

A few strings of racehorses come out for exercise under the trees on the jail side of the course, but most of the select band of racers still left in Calcutta, are in retreat.

The most prominent of last year's monsoon winners is poor Watchfire, who may be seen every morning and most evenings, doing any quantity of strong work in the hand of a very energetic new owner.

The Calcutta programmes for 1907-08 are not yet to hand, but rumour hath it that there are one or two interesting changes from last year's plan.

The following tall story about a fight between a man and a panther has been going the round of the daily papers. We may as well reprodnce it too as a specimen of native reporting, though we should be sorry to vouch for its accuracy. It takes the form of a telegram from Lucknow and reads thus:—

A correspondent sends an extraordinary account of an impromptu wrestling match between a tehsildar and panther in the Banda district. The tehsildar concerned is one Syed Mahamed Hamid of Bados. He had received khabar of the panther being in the vicinity and proceeded to the river bank where it had taken refuge in a hole. But on the tehsildar's inspecting the cave a part of the panther was visible which he assumed to be its head and fired. While waiting with the other barrel, the beast suddenly rushed out from another outlet and the tehsildar fired hitting it in the lower jaw. In a second it had attacked an attendant, who was carrying the tehsildar's revolver and knife. The tehsildar thereupon flung himself upon the panther, and by sheer strength and desperate bravery endeavoured to tear the beast away. The animal forced itself away and retired to a short distance, and then again sprang fiercely at the tehsildar, and eventually after some twenty or thirty minutes' fierce struggle, the tehsildar succeeded in holding it down firmly. The attendant brought a hatchet and administered the coup de grace. The tehsildar bears some seventy wounds on the right arm and almost as many on the left, but no wounds on the body. Both he and his man are under medical treatment at Banda and are doing well.

With much regret we refer to the death of Colonel F. L. Adam, M V. O., Military Secretary to His Excellency the Viceroy. He caught a severe chill as the result of attending the unveiling of the Woodburn Statue when it hailed and poured with rain, pneumonia set in and other complications arising he died on Sunday night quite unexpectedly. A fine soldier, a keen and good sportsman and always a courteous and helpful official he will be missed by a great many in Calcutta, Simla and elsewhere.

We publish to-day the report of the last meet this season of the Karachi Hunt. Hounds were out twenty-nine times and killed twenty-five jacks. Congratulations to Mr. W. L. Graham, who has again carried the horn with signal success.

A wire from the London Office of the Chartered Bank of India, Australia and China to their Calcutta Agent states that at the approaching meeting of Shareholders the Directors will recommend a dividend for the past half year at the rate 13 per cent. free of income-tax (making 13 per cent. for the year). It is proposed to write £25,000 off Bank Premises. To add £100,000 to the Reserve Fund (making the Reserve now £1,075,000) and to carry forward £93,000 as undivided profit.

An old but nevertheless good story has been retold in a slightly different form by a writer in the Evening Standard. It is the story of the jealous and very keen shot anxious to arrange a woodcock pool which he should be certain of winning. He marked down a woodcock (so the story goes), and thought that none of the other five guns had seen the bird drop. He accordingly proposed a half-crown sweep for the first 'cock, and this, being agreed upon, walked up to his bird and shot it. He then looked round in triumph, only to find that all the other, five guns had evidently fired at the bird at the same moment, and were reloading. So far the story is familiar, but the Evening Standard writer supplies a fresh touch The jealous shot, on looking round, found "five other sportsmen ostentatiously emptying their guns at the same moment," but, it is added, "two at the extreme end (of the line) were ejecting full cases." The puzzle is to imagine what was the mechanism of the gun which would eject full cases.

Earl de Grey's remarkable break of 1,868 at billiards is not the only record which stands to the credit of the versatile heir of the venerable Marquis of Ripon. His Lordship, as is well known, is an amazing shot, and 1,000 brace of grouse have been known to fall to his gun in two successive days. Some years ago it was found, on a calculation being made, that during a period of 28 years Lord de Grey's own bag consisted of no fewer than 316,699 head of game.

The large entries for the Rawal Pindi Spring Meeting, did not bring forth the number of starters that had been anticipated, thougt the fields ruled fair, and the sport was of a high order. (Full details elsewhere.) Rain postponed the second day's racing from Thursday to the following Saturday—the third day being put off until Monday, 25th. Mr. J. D. Scott's stable was unfortunately prevented from being present owing to some difficulty with the railway, but several Umballa stables were represented. The Punjab Army Chase was won by a sporting subaltern of the 10th Hussars, who also rode the winner of the Handicap Chase.

Lamrock carried the green and gold jacket first past the post, but it is to be regretted, that his sporting owner was not present to see him win.

One result of the excessive number of race meetings in Australia, especially in New South Wales and Victoria (says the Globe's Sydney correspondent), has been the evolution of the woman punter, who has been found to interfere frequently to a serious extent with the business of the regular bookmaker. In Victoria it has recently been sought to check the objectionable practice by making bets by woman illegal, but in New South Wales the system is permitted on the course. The female punters belong to almost every class of society, tradespeople largely predominating, the conventional box of gloves at the great race meetings often signifying a certain number of guineas. In fact, race betting has acquired a fascination rivalling that of bridge for a certain section of Australian women. In Sydney the evil has been encouraged, largely by the action of the minor racing clubs which in their eagerness to popularise their respective gatherings, of which there were two or three each week, issued considerable numbers of complimentary tickets for ladies. This has proved an irresistible inducement to the recipients to visit the racecourse, where they are now regarded as outliving their welcome. A Sydney paper, commenting on the new feminine development, says: "No doubt the original idea in the minds of the committees who issued free tickets indiscriminately to feminine racegoers was that the ladies would add some decorative touches to the courses which they graced with their presence. Their function was to brighten and adorn, like the roses in the border and the pot-plants in he committee-room. They were to distract the attention of the general public from the more sordid aspects of suburban racing, and to help in conveying the pleasurable illusion that a race-meeting is a garden party."

"R" writes to our Allahabad contemporary:—"Sir,—Last year's accounts of the Calcutta Turf Club show the fees taken from bookmakers in the western enclosure to have been a lakh and thirty thousand rupees, and percentages on totalisators over a lakh and a half. Granting (for the sake of argument only) that the bookmaker is content with a net profit of twice his fee to the Club, we get it that the serious bettors in Calcutta have lost five lakhs of rupees during the year. The more frivolous bettors, the feminine and the small masculine flutterers, have certainly lost a lakh and a half. The poor old Lucky Bag did nothing to equal this."

Our Bombay correspondent writes:—With the end of the month comes the end of the season, as far as racing is concerned. We had a splendid wind-up on Saturday with another long card of eight events, a large attendance and good racing.

I think mention was omitted last week of the objection against Court Martial for wrong ownership and, so far, the Books are still waiting to hear whether to pay out on him or on Canter. The rule is clear, but for future reference a still clearer ruling is wanted and this being a sort of "test" case, it is only natural the Stewards want to get to the bottom of it. Should Canter get the race the possibility of working on this in future is evident and it will be interesting to hear the decision given.

The results, to get back to our subject, cannot be said to have favoured either layer or taker and some grand finishes were seen.

An unfortunate accident, which resulted in three ponies coming down, most luckily saw nothing serious happen, as all three were then in the ruck. It was at first thought Melsom was almost a "goner," being carried back to the paddock in an unconscious condition. Before long, however, he revived and has nothing more serious than a badly bruised head. Trenoweth and Hazza were the others, the former getting off scot free, but the latter sustaining a broken hand

Fred. Pearson paid Bombay a visit after a long absence and brought Whiteface with him. Doing no good over the mile la t week, he showed he had not come for nothing and won after a magnificent finish with Sabig, the favourite, in the last race of the season, the Auction Plate. He was kept in the stable cheap at Rs. 1,050, whereas Captain Davie bought Magna Charta for Rs. 950, realising the pony did not run up to form. In the opening race too there was a good deal of betting. For this Scipio was naturally fancied in a poor lot, but a track gallop by Sunshine made him a quarter of a point shorter with a nibble at Joker. This grey had a bad run on his last outing, but he showed his gameness now when attacking Scipio at the distance. Scipio went away again, but Joker struggled on and, after another hard finish by Forster, just got home by a neck. Mr. J. M. Mistry bought the promising winner for Rs. 950, whereas Scipio and Sunshine were bought in for Rs. 1,600 and Rs. 1,300 respectively.

To go on to the second division of this race, another great race between two was seen. Young Lomond was favourite with a strong call on Deenar. The former was brought along a bit too late, the latter lying handy from Nizam till the bend, where he came out strong. He appeared to be well in hand when Hoyt came up on Young Lomond, but fell short by half a length after quite an exciting chase. It took the new owners, Messrs. Pfaff and Rommell Rs. 2,000 to buy the winner in and the second Rs. 1,350, whereas Nizam was bought by Mr. D. L Khimjee for Rs. 1,000.

Both Hadhur and Vasco have been showing good form recently, with the result that practically tens bar two was on offer for the Goodbye Plate. Hadhur came into the lead at the half mile, but once again fell right away on entering the straight, where Vasco drew up to Emir and Monsoon. Soon after, Vasco went out in front, but Heeroo had to get down to work when Mirdas gave chase and only stayed out by a quarter length.

One of the only two easy wins of the day was in the Pony Consolation when Comeback's stable could never quite shake the confidence on Mandeville, who had five pounds the better of the argument than when he was last beaten a neck by the black. Comeback got away nicely but Vining elected to play a waiting game with Melsom out in front on the other, Virballa and Belle Cole being early out of the reckoning. Near the bend Comeback began to come up but Melsom has learnt how to wait in front and the least bit of encouragement saw Mandeville jump out again and win by a couple of lengths very comfortably, rest nowhere.

A classy field of thirteen came out for the Farewell Plate when with the rest he has had, Bay Middleton was thought to be good enough, with money for Young Gazelle and a late rush on Scimitar. The favourite has not got over his waywardness at the gate and, amongst other things, caught Oomerkhan on Mudlool a nasty kick on the ankle and eventually got away with the ruck. He and Young Gazelle gradually made up their ground with the result that they were 1 and 2 at the bend and a few lengths further practically level. From here both Ames and Vining were hard at work and raced neck and neck to the post where the grey just had his head in front.

The same stable followed with another win in the Andheri Plate of nine furlongs after another fine race in which Tachreet, the favourite, got home. This was the race in which the accident occurred at the half mile.

The Final Plate again saw the big horses upset punters back a bit as favouritism rested with Royalist and Admiral Crichton close and Primerole next. Projecture got away well from Rustile and Mulison with the first three mentioned in a bunch some way behind. The leaders all closed at the bend, where Mulison was going well, but Projecture just went out a bit and Ames with fine judgment nipped in and won on Primerole.

H. H. the Kour Sahib of Patiala has been most unfortunate with his recent purchase, Bandit II., who has only run once, unplaced, for him. Upholding the idea that he was a rogue, it was decided to add him to the list and he was probably injured when thrown as he died very shortly after—said to have had his "innards" twisted.

Athletic Notes.

The completely unsatisfactory decision given in the recent boxing match at Rangoon between Sam Newman and Corporal Smith of the Devons has resulted in arrangements for another meeting. The men are to try conclusions again next Saturday, this time the match being one of twenty rounds.

The Royal Scots recently held quite a good boxing tournament in Bombay. The results of the finals are appended:—

Light Weights (10st.)—Private Evans beat Private West.

Feathers (9st) —Private Evans beat Lance-Corporal McGuchian.

Catch Weights—Corporal Richardson beat Petty Officer R. J. Gibbs, H. M. S. Hyacinth.

Intermediates (10st. 9lbs.)—Private Eagles beat Private Kay.

Draft (9st. 8lbs.)—Private Jones beat Private Kelly.

Four Round Contest (Extra.)—Private Downie beat Private Gray.

Boys.—Boy Baker beat Boy Hunter.

Mr. E. H. Atkinson has added fresh laurels to his long list of successes at Lawn Tennis; he has just won the Punjab Championship singles beating Mr. J. Lang in the finals, by 5—6, 6—3, 6—0, and 6—4.

Charles Towns has challenged his brother George for the sculling championship of the world. The challenger has deposited £25, and given the champion three months in which to decide on his acceptance or refusal. It is anticipated that George Towns will retire within that period.

In a recent issue we gave the result of the race between Towns and Durnan for the Sculling Championship of the World. A few more details may interest some of our readers: These we take from an exchange. The race, observes the writer, was remarkable for three reasons—first, the easiness of the victory; second, the tremendous amount of writing up and puffing done in the various journals; and third, the absence at the race of anyone inclined to back the man who lost. Offers of 3 to 1 went begging, and perhaps that is as near a record as anything connected with the event. Now that the race is passed, and that everybody nearly has voiced his opinion—the scullers, trainers, backers, umpire, judge, etc.—it were well to remember that most of these opinions were given in the heat of the moment, some of them with a laudable desire to be generous to a visitor.

Putting sentiment on one side, one can but say that the race just passed has not advanced the sport of sculling. As a race for the world's championship it was not taken seriously by the general public, and few people took a serious view of it. Certainly a fair number made the journey to Penrith, but about 99 out of a 100 went to see Towns win, and felt sure they were going to witness that result. Personally, after witnessing the race from start to finish, I can only give it as my opinion that Durnan was never in it, and is not capable of extending Towns out of a common canter. Had it not been for the fact that at the start Towns kept too close to his left-hand shore, Durnan would never have led at any part of the race. As a matter of fact, Towns, when leading by about three-quarters of a length, was in such shallow water that he had to let Durnan pass him in order to get better water. Races of this kind should not be made without justification, and however much we admire Durnan as a man (and all who have met him will admit he is a sportsman and a gentleman), still it must be admitted that his career and his record did not warrant a race for the Championship of the World. Beating Tom Sullivan, if fit and well, is not classed to be near championship form, and, to my mind, it can only be described as one of the tamest and most uninteresting events I have witnessed for the world's title.

While waiting near the training sheds Durnan was the first to show up, and was received with generous cheers by the crowd .Towns, appearing shortly afterwards, was also given an ovation. They, with their trainers, embarked on the Fairlight and proceeded to the start, being shortly after followed by the umpire. Some delay was occasioned at the start by a smart shower, and also by the challenger not appearing in answer to the umpire's whistle. Towns appeared first, and the two took the water within a few lengths of each other. After taking C. Towns and J. Stanbury on board, the umpire called the men up and gave them a few words of advice as to rules, etc. The start was by mutual consent, and while a good deal has been said about Durnan not being used to this style, the fact remains that it was stated in the articles, and that Stanbury has been coaching him getting away for a long time. The whole difference was that while Towns gave three short, hard strokes, Durnan reached out for long ones, and failed to get his boat going.

Of the actual race little can be said. Towns, striking 36 to the minute, dashed off and led Durnan, who was rowing a slightly faster stroke (38). The latter, on outside, and in deeper water, soon passed him, but the champion with a few powerful strokes drew level, passed him, and at the half-mile had a lead of one length. From there out he seemed to take it fairly easily, and although the Canadian rowed a game race, and spurted repeatedly, the champion never seemed to worry. Approaching the finish many on the bank thought George was leaving it too late before he responded to Durnan's spurt, but he evidently knew his game, put in a few powerful ones, and crossed the line an easy winner. The judge's verdict was four lengths.

Messrs. G. Knowles and Co., Import and Export Agents of Calcutta, have added to our office accessories a neat and durable calendar for 1907, for which we thank them.

I took part once in a grave discussion among undergraduates as to what would become of a man who, when rowing in the boat-race, caught a crab when his boat was easily ahead, and so lost the race for his university says a writer in the World. The word "easily" must be marked. There was to be no doubt about the matter; the man was not to be able to console himself with the thought that the other crew would have won anyhow. He was to bear the unquestioned odium of having lost a race which was a gift for his crew up to that point. The sense of the meeting was that the man could hardly hope to bear up against his reputation.

One of the disputants said "if it were me I should change my name." Another said, "but you would always be known just the same." A third said, "I should certainly leave the country." A fourth said, "yes, you might make a fresh start where nobody knew you. I think I should go to Canada." And the optimist of the party said "It mightn't be so bad after all. In Canada, where nobody knew you, you might get on after all, and become prime minister.

The gravity of the Boatrace is the measure of the apprehension with which even the stoutest heart awaits it. As the boats are paddled down to the start they carry Cæsar and his fortunes sixteen times over. This is the explanation of that thrilling but painful complaint known as a "needle." A "needle" is a luminous example of a mental disease expressed in physical terms. Anxiety strikes very sensibly into that nerve situated, I believe, in the stomach, which also becomes active under a sharp pang of sorrow or remorse. The voice of the starter cautioning the crews before the pistol fires sounds like a note of doom. Then comes that lifetime packed into a moment while the crews await the pistol-crack, and then —oh, transformation!—nervousness disappears in the preoccupying toil, in the exaltation of speed, and the thrill of feeling the boat leap to the thrust and drive of every stroke.

Cricketers and footballers sometimes ask what satisfaction there is in propelling a piece of wood through the water at the cost of the most heart-breaking labour. They do not understand. The oarsman does not endure the miseries of Pangloss in his trireme without even the remedy of Pangloss's optimism. The freshman oscillating painfully on his fixed seat in excruciating discomfort while the boat runs consistently on one side may touch the depths. But even then he is working his way through the mill to the joys of a light ship. A light ship is almost a sentient creature. It responds like a nervous horse to the most delicate alterations in treatment. It repays bad treatment in kind, but leaps smoothly, steadily, and readily forward in the straight line in answer to the sympathetic demands of the good water-man.

The animation and sensitiveness of a boat are not felt so much in an eight as in a four and a pair. But in all cases when the boat is free off the hand, when the finish of the stroke is coming easily and strongly home on to the chest, when the oars grip the water at the same fraction of a second, and the legs all thrust together like pistons in unison, and the boat runs unharassed between the strokes, the joy of the movement is perhaps as much as M. Santos Dumont ever hopes to get out of his flying machine.

What exactly makes eight man into "a crew"—the word is used without attributes like that to express a satisfactory combination—is almost a problem for a psychologist. We have known eight men, individually good, who did not make a "crew"—who were without life and dash, and that increment of power which belongs to those who have developed a collective soul. And We have known eight men, individually rather bad, who for some reason shook themselves together and acquired a speed which their separate accomplishments had given them no right to expect. In rowing, it is better to do a bad thing all together than a good thing not together.

"I am glad to see that the question of instituting a Hockey Association for India is receiving some attention among hockey players remarks "H.S.D." in The Pioneer. The necessity of such an association is beyond question. In framing rules it would save confusion and misunderstanding to adhere as closely as possible to those of the English Association, merely introducing modifications suitable to the different conditions under which play is conducted in this country. Hockey grounds in India are as a rule more uneven and harder than they are at Home. The game is therefore faster, and lifting the ball is far more common, though I believe intentional undercutting is not frequent. During the last ten years I have played a great deal of hockey, and have also acted as referee very frequently. I have seen more than one nasty accident occur from the ball being lifted, and an authoritative ruling tending to reduce the risk of such accidents is very necessary, whether the lifting of the ball be intentional or otherwise. There are, of course, other points which require attention, but these can hardly be discussed in a letter to a newspaper without taking up more room than is available for the purpose. I have very frequently been struck with the prevailing incompetency of refereeing particularly as regards omitting to give penalties which should have been given, and giving decisions distinctly opposed to existing rules. Certificated referees are required out here just as much as at Home, for important matches, and if such referees were available I am sure competing teams would be only too glad of their services. Anyone who has played, as I have done, with an English certificated referee on the ground cannot fail to have been struck with the difference between the promptitude and accuracy of his decisions and those of the ordinary referee.

I have a good deal of leisure on my hands, some of which I would gladly devote to helping in the formation of an Indian Hockey Association, the more so as my headquarters during the hot weather are at Mussoorie, where a good deal of hockey is played and where the players often belong to teams located all over India, and if "Thorn," or someone equally capable, would take the initative, I think he would find many teams which would gladly support the movement. In my own station—Mussoorie—I would willingly undertake any correspondence or action to this end, and if any public desire to institute a hockey association is evinced, I will give my address to anyone wishing to have it."

One hears nowadays occasional grumbles in connection with dâk bungalows, most of which, Othello like, have found their occupation gone since the spread of the railway systems in India. We have in the course of our travels throughout Bengal occupied nearly everyone of these places; some are distinctly good, some are middling, others are best left alone; but surely in this Presidency there doesn't exist such another outrage on the public as the dâk bungalow at Berhampore! We had occasion to visit it this Easter and can assure our readers that we suffered sufficient discomfort, indignity and annoyance to last us for some considerable time. We refrain from further comment, we will confine ourselves to merely stating our experience.

A letter in English and the vernacular was sent to the khansamah in charge on Monday, the 25th March, apprising him of our intended arrival on the evening of Friday, the 29th: this letter he acknowledged having received. On the Friday, punctual to time, we and our friend having cycled in from Plassey, discovered the "Bungalow" after some search: it was represented by two dark-some rooms in a corner of one of the barracks round the big square. We had considerable difficulty in rousing an attendant and on the arrival of a frowsy menial we were shown into a dismal, godown-like apartment the effect of which was both depressing and displeasing. When our vision grew accustomed to the gloom this is what we saw:—Two filthy nawar cots in which the tape sagged as in a hammock, two inexpressibly foul mattresses, one rickety table covered by a grimy and stained cloth that might have been an accessory pertaining to the Knight of the Broom; two chairs (one with a broken arm), one teapoy, the top of which came off when a bag was placed on it. This was the entire "furniture"—there was not a toilet table, looking glass, almirah, cupboard, wash-stand, easy-chair or in short any of the ordinary necessaries to be found in the rest houses supposed to be maintained for the convenience of the travelling public. In a corner of a sort of ante-room leading into the back verandah were stacked several decayed punkahs: in the back verandah was a heap of sawdust, garbage, and broken glass crowned by the remains of a vase de nuit! Outside this verandah were two pits for the reception of dirty water full to the brim with some pestilential fluid in which vegetable and other putrid matter was floating and in which were breeding the mosquitoers which devoured us later on. The ceiling, walls, and floor of the room were thick with cobweb, dust and grime, the back verandah was literally awash with rinsings, parings, sweepings and dregs.

The cook—an illfavoured and impertinent ruffian—gave us dinner on Friday two hours late, and breakfast next morning two hours late. Questioned on the point he declared that there was no hukum for meals except at the hours arranged by him! He was as incompetent as he was repulsive and spoilt everything he served up. After twenty-four hours of this misery a friend in the station came to the rescue and at his hospitable board those purgatorial hours were partly forgiven, but not forgotten. Hence these lines of complaint and warning.

The representative of our esteemed contemporary of Chowringhee, was a fellow sufferer and, what time he was not noting the grotesque proceedings of the Congress held in an adjacent pandal, he shared our afflictions and the aforesaid broken relics. He refers to the incident in the following para which we cull from The Statesman of last Tuesday: "Berhampore possesses a dak bungalow which, by dint of the expenditure of a couple of hundred rupees and a little energy by the officials concerned, could be made as the boarding house landlady so delicately puts it, 'A home away from home.' At present it is a delusion and a snare. It has two charpoys, three broken chairs and a rickety table. The menial staff, is in keeping with the furniture. Meals of ruined viands are served two hours after they are wanted. The back verandah is utilized for the purposes of a dust heap, and as the last resting place of broken bath-room furniture. Berhampore is one of the most delightful stations in the province, and with a decent lodging for tired travellers would be a haven of rest and relief from the noise, and wear and tear of a strenuous life in town."

We are in receipt of a rosy tinted booklet from Messrs. G. F. Kellner and Co., and in it we are reminded of the "Food Product" lectures and practical demonstrations of the Heniz specialities so successfully carried through in Calcutta some time ago. In "Calcutta Comments" are set forth the numerous press criticisms (all appreciative, many eulogistic) which these lectures evoked. The booklet also gives the schedule of prices at which Messrs. Kellner are prepared to supply the 57 varieties of these foods and a description of each kind.

The members of the Sporting Union, a baboos' athletic club in Calcutta, last Sunday held a 7 miles walking race: the winner, B. K. Nundy, was said to have accomplished the distance in 67 minutes. Seeing that very few front rank amateur pedestrians at home can do their seven miles in the hour it strikes us as hardly likely that the Aryan brother can put up such a performance as seven minutes outside the hour for that distance.

Mr. Haldane's army scheme continues to engage a large share of attention. Volunteer Colonels have been ventilating their views very freely and those views are rarely favorable to the scheme. Few really sound alternatives have been suggested to the clause which proposes to bind Volunteers for a term of year on pain of fine: the best is that which urges remission of income-tax wholly or in part to volunteers whose incomes are under £1,000 a year and old age pensions to men over 60 who, leaving less than £160 a year have put in ten years volunteer service. This latter plan should bring a really good class of recruit and ensure efficiency but it might produce difficulties in connection with recruiting for the line. The impression grows that the Haldane scheme is the first step towards compulsory service in the shape of a final bid for (qualified) voluntary enlistment.

Truly our Prime Minister is a wonderful person. Asked on Tuesday if he would in future take steps to prevent the appointment to the bench of Passive Resisters, Sir C. B. laid down the amazing doctrine that the fact of a man being a passive resister "when his passive resistance is unaccompanied by brawling or unseemly conduct is not an objection to his being a Justice of the Peace." Manifestly then C. B. sees no objection to an avowed law breaker administering the laws provided he resists the law without actually engaging in riot. No wonder there was a distinctly ironical ring about the cheers and obvious contempt in the roar of laughter with which this astonishing statement was received.

A story is current in the clubs that for many months past eight German Officers have been making a "staff ride" through the Eastern counties of England: they are said to be travelling comfortably in motor cars, each taking a defined district and "doing" the country very thoroughly as becomes soldiers intent on acquainting themselves with the roads and byeways of a possible scene of campaign. A friend of a friend of mine stated yesterday that he met a few days ago at Southampton a young German Officer who frankly declared his belief that he had made acquaintance with every building in Yorkshire and "knew every blacksmiths' shop in the East Riding:" he said he could find his way blindfold about the greater part of the country. Interesting is it not?

Lord William Nevill was charged at Westminster on Wednesday with stealing £400 worth of jewellery by means of a trick. It is alleged that last October he induced a Sloane square pawnbroker to come to his house in Eaton Place, bringing certain jewellery he held in pledge from Lord William, representing that a friend of his wanted to buy it, and he intended to redeem it before Christmas. The pawnbroker accordingly renewed the pledge and took away with him a taped and sealed case which he supposed contained the jewellery. As the articles were not redeemed as promised he became suspicious and after Christmas opened the case in the presence of a witness: it contained pieces of coal wrapped in tissue paper: and he charges the prisoner with substituting this case for the one containing the jewellery. Lord William Nevill is reported to have made statements to the police of a distinctly damaging nature. He implored the prosecutor not to charge him; asked why he wanted to open the box at all since the money would have been forthcoming in a day or two, and declared that prosecution would mean twenty years penal servitude for him. His counsel said he was prepared to answer the charge, and remand for a week was ordered: two sureties in £2,500 and the prisoner's recognizance in £5,000.

The Kirk v. Kirk and Tidmarsh case which threatened to drag on to an interminable length without bringing satisfaction to any of the parties involved was stopped by the Special Jury on the eleventh day of the hearing. The Jury were satisfied that there was no ground for a decree nisi and did not want to hear any more evidence. Sir Gorell Barnes agreed with them and there was the end of it.

A very considerable section of the public is dissatisfied with Mr. Gladstone's decision to accept a private examination of the papers in the Edalji case by the eminent lawyers who refused to hold and enquiry on the lines suggested by the Home Secretary. The professors of the Birmingham University (Edalji studied at a Birmingham College), those of Dublin, and other persons of weight have memorialised the Home Office praying for a public investigation or protesting against the private undertaking. Mr. Gladstone in his reply to the Birmingham professors admits that he was "not altogether satisfied" with some aspects of the Edalji case and attributes the difficulties to its "extraordinary complexity." Surely admissions which indicate the propriety of a thorough re examination in open court.

The Psychical Society should be stirred to its marrow by the astounding discovery of Dr. Duncan MacDougal and four other Boston physicians. For six years past these five doctors have been conducting a singular series of experiments. At a certain sanatorium Dr. Mac Dougal had constructed scales which weigh to the tenth of an ounce; and whenever a patent was in extremis he had been carefully weighed, repeating the weighment as soon as the breath was out of his body. Making all allowances and deductions for the change caused by death, the doctors find that there is always an unaccountable loss of about one ounce immediately after death when a man died in the scales the weight side sank at once, and the only way he and his colleagues can explain it is on the assumption that the soul is represented by this undiscoverable ounce! No such change takes place on a dog's carcase. If names go for any thing Dr. MacDougal is a Scotsman and Scots are hard headed people, little prove to wild speculation in scientific matters.

If Mr. Glayde's had devoted a little more attention to Mrs. Glayde and less to the making of millions in America, I do not believe the trouble with Trevor Lerode would ever have arisen. But American-like John was taken up with the mighty dollar and neither knew nor cared what his Muriel was doing in Paris: though he came over in a mighty harry when he got an anonymous telegram to effect that Lerode was taking a long time to paint Mrs. Glayde's portrait. Mrs. Glayde's reception of him was cool: she felt neglected and John recognised that she had cause of complaint. But she had been flirting with Lerode: they kiss passionately before us what time the room door opens and shuts again, in such wise that neither they nor we know who saw the kiss. Glayde gives Lerode a cheque and tells him his services as painter are no longer needed: when Lerode tears up the cheque we know what to expect in "John Glayde's Honour" if we had not known before seeing that the play is Mr. Sutro's and John Glayde Mr. Alexander. Then John turns to business again. I guess the cable company made a forture out of him but the footman who saw that kiss lets out the secret and he cant go on dictating cables; he rushes off to Muriel and says he "knows" Muriel lies like thirty hatters. John believes and goes back to his telegrams: but enter John's private Secretary to say that Muriel and Lerode are sloping; exit John a raving lion.

Next scene is Lerode's studio where the guilty pair are preparing to elope despite the arguments of freinds. Here a morsel of unconscious humour; "she is not the woman to allow you to go on painting from the nude" says one good friend offering the only deterrent argument he can think of. The plea has weight with Lerode but only for a moment: Muriel is all in all. Enter John. Muriel confesses that she loves Lerode. John staggers, droops, reels and recovers himself "Take her" he says in effect "and be happy."

It sounds frankly melodramatic: in point of fact the play is really very amusing all through, full of movement and incident. We may tire of John Glayde's overwhelming nobility of sonl; we often wish he would let out one good, round Damn and relieve the wound we know must be surcharged: but he has too much self control. The piece is very much like other Sutro plays: high souled husband: frail wife: shamed lover. It suits Mr. Alexander well. Miss Eva Moore was generally satisfactory but she did her much lying so well that she deceived us as well as her husband: which was an error.

I cannot say that Mr. H. A. Vachell's four act play "Her Son" produced at the Play house on Tuesday, does justice to the author's reputation as a novelist. In rendering a sketch of the play one is handicapped by the fact that so much occurs "off" and one's account of it is therefore by no means what the spectator sees. Here is the rather complicated plot: Sir Augustus and Lady Helmingham want their niece Dorothy to marry Lord Ipswich: Dorothy does not want the peer: he is old which is one reason; and he sniffs (a habit which in my judgment furnishes full ground for divorce). Also she loves Dick Gascoyne, a journalist who in his past has "touched pitch." This is a very ugly and ungrateful way of referring to Crystal Wride, music hall article, who kept the fellow when he was starving and nursed him through pneumonia: Crystal deserves better at his lips and hands. Well, Dick's engagement to Dorothy being announced Crystal forces her way into the presence of Dorothy bent on scratching her eyes out; Dorothy (charmingly played by Miss Winifred Emery, disarms her hostility and on learning the truth of her visitor's relations with Dick buys Crystal's promise not to commit suicide and to lead a good life by postponing her marrage. Dick goes off to Africa as a war correspondent; war correspondents were plentiful scarce as if he did not go it would have been necessary to "send a Sub-Editor") and gets lost. Curtain rises eight years after. Dock has come home; rich, having made remarkably good use of the four years he spent in captivity with a savage tribe. Much has happened in those light years: Crystal has borne him a son whom she abandoned and whom a oh! long, long arm of coincidence! Dorothy has adopted ignorant of his parentage. Dorothy to avoid scandal! is now passing as a widow and calls the boy Min her son.

Everybody meets (the arm of coincidence is surely strained in this play) on Bournemouth Sands. Dick meets Mim and adores Min and Mim adores Dick: this interview is the best thing in the play. He had heard that Dorothy was married long ago and has a son, so he sought out Crystal and bestowed his hand upon that piece of "pitch." When the meeting on the Sands takes place Dorothy struggles between love and duty: she ought to give up him to his parents, but the boy has naturally become a real son to her. Duty of course wins and love loses nothing by it, for Crystal in a burst of fierce generosity refuses to take him away from her. This act of self denial was tumultuously cheered by a sympathetic house which had quite forgotten Crystal's statement that she "doesn't like kids," recollection of which rather marred the beauty of the transaction. Clearly the matter could not be allowed to rest there: so Crystal, having regard to the fact that the hour is late and that there really is not time for a fifth act mentions that she has not long to live; is suffering from a disease which may be expected to prove fatal in a few days. So when the curtain falls we know Dick and Dorothy will marry after all.

The play is full of structural flaws, and does not convince; but the dialogue is good, there are some strong Situations and the playing on the whole was good. I have seen Mr. Cyril Maude in many parts which suit him much better than Dick, Miss Nynne Mathieson is thrown away as Crystal. The boy Min was most admirably and naturally played by Master Bobbie Andrews.

"The Little Admiral" by Messrs. Hodges and Percyval is a play in a prologue and three acts: but for the programme I should have writ it down a play in four acts. It is one of those plays which delight you while you are more than half-ashamed of finding pleasure in anything so simple and artless. Old Admiral Sir Anthony Addenbrooke had a scapegrace nephew in his own profession: and when dying he leaves his £60,000 to the young Anthony provided young Anthony "gets his step" before 24th June 1823. Miss Anne Churchill overhears the will making and determines to have the £60,000 and Young Anthony. As the terms of the will are to be kept secret from Young Anthony he really has not half a chance between Anne and the Admiralty. Anne is really a nice girl: but methought she acted the part of a bold faced Pussy when she took a cottage next to that in which her prey was dodging and chaffing process servers in order to nurse her scheme: and Captain Kent R. N. was perfectly right when he told her she had no regard for her character to stay late in Anthoney's quarters helping him to master the signal book.

However, being as I said, really a nice girl, Captain Kent allows her to strike him down and he gives Anthony a berth on a ship which is sailing next day on active service. Anne has already discovered that what she wants is young Anthony and the £60,000. When he sails she discovers that what she wants is only young Anthony. In due source he comes back and he and Anne are very happy digging potatoes in the cottage garden when a most unbusinesslike solicitor Mr. Speedwell turns up. He meanders on about wills and money and eventually tells what we all knew, to wit that Anthony, having saved the situation (by four days) is entitled to that £60,00 also he reflects upon Annes disinterestedness.

The piece is so slight, such a trifle, it is remarkable proof of its intrinsic charm that it should so easily last out the four acts. Mr. Waller is excellent as young Anthony and Miss Evelyn Millard is charming in the not always easy part of Anne Churchill. There is of course any amount of comedy in the piece; old Cobble. dick the pigtailed sailor is a tower of strength and is capitally done by Mr. Herbert Jarman. There is a sort of lavender around about the play: an old world freshness, which rendered its occasional discursiveness more than pardonable.

Possibly you may remember "the Last of the Legends" in the early seventies. The German Reeds made a good thing out of it for it was very popular. Times have changed and our taste in humour is not the taste of thirty and odd years ago for the "musical extravaganza" when produced at Terry's on Saturday was somewhat coldly received. It did not "go" the players did their best with it and the old songs were well received; but it was quite evident that 'the Last of the Legends' is a back number.

It is unwise to exhibit gold bars in glass cases unless those gold bars are too heavy to carry away. On Tuesday night just before closing time two such bars weighing 436oz. and worth £1,600 were successfully carried away from the Horticultural Hall where the South African Product Exhibition is being held. The police have a theory; but the thieves have the gold bars; and are likely to keep them.

According to Mr. Asquith some legislation may ere long be possible to relieve the public as well as the publican from the "anomalous and unequal treatment of clubs as compared with the ordinary licence holder." How the private club can be held to stand on the same footing as a public house only a radical politician could explain.

The conviction of Gourlay the Engine. driver more or less responsible for the Arbroath disaster on 28th December was hardly a surprise; but at the same time nobody was surprised at a large minority opposing the verdict of guilty after 50 minutes discussion 10 for and five against. It is quite probable that the sentence of 5 months' imprisonment will be remitted; and when we consider the man's previous record, the appalling weather and the slackness of the signalling arrangements, remission of four months of the five would offend none.

BREAD, PASTRY AND BUTTER-MAKING.

A LITTLE brochure issued under the joint authorship of Miss Pearson and Mrs. Byrde, at the "request of many friends who wish to be initiated into these Arts." The compilers have been guided in their choice of recipes by "an intimate acquaintance with the requirements of an Indian home," and each recipe has the merit of having been personally tested by these skilful ladies. The chapters on bread-making include some useful recipes for yeast, as well as for testing flour, and in the comprehensive term "bread" we find included some little dainties such as raisin bread, dinner rolls, pulled bread, Vienna bread, Kongloff, and various sorts of bun—which would all make welcome additions to the tea and dinner table. Memsahibs who indulge the rulers of their destiny with puff pastry, shortcrust, or raised pies will find in this little book, the clearest directions for making most varieties of pastry in the simplest way possible. To the tyro in the gentle art of pastry making, as well as to others, the clearly put directions will prove invaluable, while up-country residents who obtain enough fresh milk to make their own butter will find the chapters devoted to butter making, a guide as well as a help. The useful little book maybe, purchased for the sum of one whole rupee from Messrs. Thacker, Spink and Company, Calcutta.

CHARGING BEARS.

THE account of a "bear charge" in The Indian Field of 7th February: recalls to my mind reminiscences of the past, when I had considerable experience in pursuit of bruin. The author of the article in question says that "some sportsmen have stated that a bear does not charge when wounded;" that is certainly not my experience, nor is it that of any sportsmen I have met with who have had much to do with these animals. With the species concerned in the Indian Field narrative I have had little acquaintance, but I have always been under the impression that the Himalayan black bear (Ursus torquatus) is the most ferocious of the four species found within the confines of the British Empire in the East. I have shot only one of this kind, and that was in Kashmir many years ago; poor thing, she had not much chance to charge. She was sitting in a mulberry tree, enjoying the ripe fruit, when I arrived underneath. The bear scrambled hastily down the tree, receiving a bullet through the middle which caused her to drop to the ground. Here there was thick bush cover, and the bear could not see me, although she dashed about growling for some time, as if in search of her assailant. At length I got in another shot, and killed her dead. I believe several sportsmen have been killed by these animals, and can call to mind at least three instances of this bear charging home; in one of these the hunter was thrown down a cliff and killed; in another, a sportsman of my acquaintance was severely mauled, and in a third case, the bear, being fired at from below, came down on to its assailant and knocked him over unconscious, passing on, however, without inflicting injury with either teeth or claws.

The Himalayan brown bear seldom seems to charge, probably because it is found and shot generally in the open, and few animals will charge from a distance on open ground. I believe the Russian bear, which I have hunted without success, is the same species, and he certainly charges with effect sometimes, as those know well who have read the account Tolstoi has given of the mauling he got from one of these animals. One brown bear did charge me in the Satai nullah in Kashmir, and that an unwounded one. He was about a hundred yards below me at the bottom of a hill when I fired at and missed him. He charged straight up the hill, in such a determined manner that I drew my long hunting knife and placed it on the ground beside me, ready for use in case the beast should make good his attack; but a bullet at some twenty yards' distance rolled him down the hill again, and he dropped dead into a hole in the ice, out of which we had considerable difficulty in hauling him.

I think more than one account of attacks by the Indian black bear (Ursus labiatus) has appeared in these columns. Certainly one well-known sportsman was nearly killed by one in Berar some few years ago; and I heard of a gentleman in the south of India who, pursued by one of these animals, attempted to escape up a tree, but was a moment too late, not being sufficiently agile, and it was some weeks before he was able to sit down again, owing to the effects of bruin's claws. This bear is certainly at times a fierce and aggressive animal, and feared by the natives in consequence; nor without reason, for I have seen several badly scarred from encounters with them. I recollect one bear sixteen years ago in a great forest in the Satpuras which had killed several people, generally grass-cutters, who had disturbed the beast at close quarters.

When stalking bison on the Satpura hills many years ago, I not infrequently came across these animals. What pleasant memories are those, now, alas! seen through the vista of seventeen long years. Hours before daybreak we would start for the distant ground, in order to be in a likely locality by dawn. Generally a path led through the forest for some miles, before we plunged into the trackless wilderness. One morning, an hour or so before daybreak, but when the moon was shining brightly, I was riding along a path through the jungle, when a rustling noise was heard of a heavy beast moving about among the dry leaves near the road. Suddenly a great bear rushed out, straight at us, and charged to within a few yards, when it turned with a gruff roar, and made off before I had time to put in a shot, although I got off my pony as quickly as possible. That same day I shot a panther that was sitting under a tree by the side of the road; and near the same place I killed a very large bear a few days later. My attention was drawn to this bear by the chattering of the monkeys in the trees over a nullah. I ran to the place, and fired at the bear, but though wounded he did not attempt to charge, and when I intercepted him again on the hill-side, he turned to bolt, but was finished off by another bullet.

On another occasion in the same forest I was on the look-out for bison in some bamboo jungle in the early morning, when something black appeared moving about in the long grass. This proved to be a bear carrying a cub pick-a-back, but the parties separated on receiving a shot. The big bear came charging straight at us, but was at once bowled over with a bullet through the heart; the little bear came trundling after, and received a kick in the stomach as it passed; it then clawed one of my shikaris down the leg, and had to be shot.

Thirteen years ago I came suddenly on a party of three bears in long grass within ten yards of me, but they attempted no aggressive action; two fell to a right and left, but one of these, being only wounded got up and began to maul its dead companion; and the third bolted unharmed, while the wounded one was finished off with another shot. The same year one was driven out of thick jungle up to the crest of a hill where I stood in wait for her. Seeing me when she came to the top, she charged straight at me with a roar, but was dropped with a bullet in the head at a distance of a few yards.

I have killed many other bears, both black and brown, but only those above mentioned have charged, or attempted to charge.

My own impression is that as a general rule bears, whether wounded or unwounded, will attempt to escape, but if one comes upon them suddenly at close quarters, they will charge at once. Perhaps, in the case of unwounded animals, this is frequently only a noisy demonstration, and the beasts will as often as not turn tail without making good their attack.

SPORTING RIFLES AND BULLETS.

MUCH activity of research in the direction of rifle and bullet improvement is manifested no all sides. Never before has interest in the construction of the bullet been so keen.

The vital importance of the projectile in ballistics the proportions of lenght to diameter and weight, and its structural character—has with one or two notable exceptions received scant attention from the manufacturer of sporting rifles. The latter has for the most part taken his cue both from the military constructor and the theorist in ballistics, who invariably regard the question from a standpoint diametrically opposed to that of sport.

It cannot be too often reiterated, for in nearly all discussions on this subject the point is lost sight of, that the sportsman needs a weapon and cartridge which will immediately kill; while the aim of the military man principally is to wound. The military rifle constructor indeed, is elated when he has succeeded in carrying the wounding capacity, as opposed to the killing capacity, of the weapon and cartridge to a still longer range. In this object he finds the theorist in ballistics his firm supporter. Both are ever seeking to increase the ranging power of the bullet at the expense of effectiveness or killing power; and therefore proceed on lines that widely diverage from the track of sporting need and efficiency.

The Spitzer bullet, which of late has a habit of cropping up in sporting journalism with a persistency as invaluable as that of the sea serpent, is an extreme example of the modern military idea. It is lighter than other military bullets on account of its tapered or almost pointed shape. Not much novelty by the way in this. It is therefore obviously capable of being driven at a high velocity with the consequent advantage of flattening the trajectory. In a bullet of this class, which exhibits nothing new, penetration, the sole desideratum of a military high-speed bullet, as opposed to expansion, is increased, and thus the Spitzer bullet repeats in a worse form, considered from the sporting standpoint, the errors and defects of a military small bore.

We have seen it stated that there are two principal and opposing camps of sportsmen; and the statement is true enough for general discussion. The small-bore man at one end; and at the other the advocates of the larger bores. That the small-bore military system of rifles has not proved satisfactory in sport on the whole, is shewn in various ways; one is, by many attempts to raise its smashing power to the level of the black powder rifle and lead bullet of .450-bore express. The soft nose, Dum-dum, Split, and Copper-tubed bullets were conceived with this idea, but although more or less effective, left the problem unsolved. Some forms of these bullets in the attempt at expansion, erred in the direction of structural weakness that caused them to go to pieces easily. Others, in avoiding this tendency to break up, erred in giving too much penetration; and it was not until the advent of the cap system of bullet that the difficulty was overcome—this principle of bullet possessing an equal balance of penetration and expansion, two qualities essential for producing a deadly effect.

Nevertheless, it must be admitted that the present small-bore efficiency is due in no little degree to the increased velocity, larger bore, and heavier weight of bullet, as witnessed in the .318 accelerated express rifle.

The foregoing remarks make it plain that but for the important part played by the bullet in the improvement of its shape, length and design, the increased velocity instead of assisting the sportsman would have proved an obstacle to securing good or clean killed bags.

I have had many opportunities of testing the cap system of bullet in all bores, and other public tests have been recorded from time to time. A very interesting and conclusive trial was that reported at the introduction of Axite Powder in June 1905. It was then stated that the .303 capped bullet at 100 yds. range completely penetrated a steel plate ¼ inch thick, while the copper-tube bullet only indented the plate and broke to pieces. The hole made by the capped bullet was considerably larger than the diameter of the bullet, and this is a remarkable feature that I have never seen exhibited by any other form of bullet.

At these trials in instituting a comparison between the high-velocity .450-bore Cordite rifle with solid bullet, and the .375/.303 rifle and capped bullet, at ¼ inch steel plate, and a range of 100 yds., it was found that the small bore capped bullet, owing to its peculiar construction, made a hole in the steel plate actually as large as that made by the .450-bore bullet in question. That is, the hole measured over 60 per cent. more than the diameter of the small-bore bullet. Tested at beef, Mr. Percy Easte, M.R.C.V.S. in his own independent trials, reported the wound channel in certain cases to be even three inches in diameter. It must be admitted that it is a remarkable bullet which enlarges its entry hole and subsequent passage to nearly ten times its own diameter. Mr. Easte concludes his remarks as follows:—

"The opinion I have formed is that in the copper-capped you have a bullet capable of inflicting the greatest possible damage both on hard and soft tissue, with great shocking power and not too much penetration."

Many sportsmen have, in practical use at game, confirmed the truth of this statement. I have had the advantage of hearing and reading many such expressions of independent opinion and I was particularly struck with one which related that a .450-bore capped bullet "made a hole as big as a saucer," thereby seeming to show that the increase in the wound-channel as compared with the diameter grows with the larger calibres of the capped bullet. This was from an Indian Sportsman, while from Rhodesia a correspondent mentioned that the majority of sportsmen there consider the .303 copper-capped bullet as the most destructive at any distance on big game. Under certain conditions this destruction may be considered excessive and sportsmen therefore, in those cases, take the nickel cap .303 bullet in place of the copper cap.

I have tested the .318-bore capped bullet firing at a steel plate ¼ inch thick at both 100 yds. and 150 yds., and find it makes a remarkably large hole as compared with its own calibre. The diameter of the perforation was over 9/16ths inch; in some cases ⅝ inch, equal in fact to that made with the .450 solid high-velocity nickel bullet, but with even greater rending effect.

Here is an illustration of the Westley Richards' cartridge with the case and bullet sectioned. It shows a nitro expansion express bullet which is lightened forward so as to give (a) greater velocity, (b) flatter trajectory, with increased accuracy, and (c) a larger degree of expansion or mushrooming upon impact. This projectile, it will be seen, thus combines, more eminently than has been hitherto achieved, those essentials necessary to the production of deadly effectiveness upon game.

The capped bullet invented by Mr. Leslie Taylor in 1899, originated a new principle of bullet construction and inaugurated a new era in the development of the sporting rifle, of which we have not yet seen the limit. Beyond the quality of expansion, which was the primary, if not the sole, desideratum the sportsman of that day was seeking for, it introduced other desirable qualities. Sporting rifles were then accurate enough, but both the small-bore military rifle of that time, and the subsequent large-bore high-velocity cordite rifles, and nickel bullets, in their race after velocity, and flat trajectory, had left in the lurch the quality of expansion or killing effectiveness. The capped bullet system possessed this qualification and also brought in its train other advantages which, ever since, have gradually and continually altered the foundation and general scheme of rifle construction. It lightened the bullet forward by means of a thin metal cap, having a cavity within between the end of the lead core and the point. This design not only produced a remarkable degree of expansion, but also permitted the use of a longer and therefore more accurate bullet, without increasing the weight beyond the recognised standards. Thus it will be seen, that under this system a bullet of much lighter weight can be made, which, while adhering to the normal length, raises the speed or velocity of flight. Both of these principles, first revealed by the capped system, have for many years been in use in some calibre or another. The Mauser pistol bullet, perhaps, is the first example of utilising the capped system for the purpose of increasing the length without adding to the weight of the original solid bullet. The capped bullet weighs the same as the solid, namely 85 grains, and yet is about ⅛ inch longer. Other examples of this method are seen in the .360-bore, the .400-bore, .500-bore, and other high-velocity bullets, which, when made on the capped principle, also with equal weight, have greater length than their solid prototypes. It was found that under certain conditions, this extra length tends to flatten the trajectory for, when shooting with the .360-bore high-velocity rifle, repeated trials have shewn that while with the shorter solid bullet the drop between 100 and 200 yards is 14 inches, with the longer capped bullet of same weight, it is only 12 inches. As one of the examples of employing the capped system with the object of reducing weight, while retaining the length of the solid bullet, I may instance the Sherwood copper-capped, which weighs 120 grains, as against the solid bullet of 140 grains, and thereby increases the velocity above that of the solid nickel bullet.

Both these principles are made use of in the Explora Ball and Shot Gun and the Fauneta types; the 730 grains bullet 12-bore Explora increased the length without adding to the weight; the 600 grains bullet Explora, has the same length as the 730 grains bullet. While we have two effective types of weapon like the Accelerated Express at the head of the small bore, and the .476, .500 and .577-bore rifles, as first rate representatives of the larger bores, there is a large amount of sport which could be effectually carried on by rifles of less power and of lighter weight than either types. The principle of the capped system by its lightening of the bullet forward, renders it possible to construct a series of rifles from .360 to .577-bore, which shall possess greater velocity and flatter trajectory than the old express black powder rifles. Furthermore, owing to the capped system, such rifles would have more expansive qualities than the rifles of old, in fact, expansion as opposed to penetration would represent their principal characteristic. Such a type of rifle would stand mid-way between the high velocity, small-bore and the large bores of modern nitro rifles.

In "Modern Sporting Gunnery," Messrs. Westley Richards & Co., permitted me to publish specifications of a series of these rifles which they are engaged in building. They will shoot bullets made upon the capped system with lead body, nickel base, and the nose in the form of a brass or copper cap, these bullets, being for equal weight, longer and therefore more accurate than the old express; and it is proposed that they shall be driven with a velocity of over 1,700 feet per second. It will be seen that the weights given below are much lighter than those of previous rifles of the same calibre. The smallest of these, the .360-bore, will I should think, be capable of accounting for the largest stag: the .400 bore being especially adapted for shooting the larger deer, and other animals of a non-dangerous character, while the .500 and .577 would be reliable for use against tiger, lion, and similar animals of a dangerous type. The .450-bore was intended to be included in this category, but for this no doubt the new rifle of .476-bore, constructed on the same lines, will be substituted.

I will here reproduce from "Modern Sporting Gunnery," page 317, the particulars as to these rifles, as possibly, they will prove of interest to readers of the Indian Field at this juncture.

BRIDGE QUERY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—Might I ask you to explain the meaning of a "Tenace"?

A. G. D.

JAFFLONG, SYLHET.

[A "Tenace" is a combination in the same hand of the best and third best cards that are still in of any suit, the second best being in some other hand.—ED.]

FIENDISH ILL-TREATMENT OF BULLOCKS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—In the cause of humanity I would be much obliged if you could spare me a few lines to lay before the public the gross illtreatment meted out to the bullocks of Eastern Bengal and to plead the cause of the poor dumb animals who cannot speak for themselves. I am speaking of Serajgunge in particular, but I am informed that the same state of affairs prevails all over Eastern Bengal.

The way the bullock is treated here is something too disgraceful for words; they are illfed and overloaded, but the worst evil lies in their poor sore necks.

The carts are overloaded to breaking point and the consequence is a terrible strain on their necks where the yoke lies, and the continual drag—drag—drag along sandy roads makes them break out into sores. This in itself is bad enough, but the inhuman brutes who own them take not the slightest notice of their sufferings and continue to work them just the same with what result may well be imagined. It is quite an every-day sight to see a poor illfed bullock staggering wearily along a sandy illkept road with an enormous load behind him, the cart even groaning and creeping under the weight, and the poor animal's neck one enormous sore, bleeding profusely, so much so that the yoke becomes red with his blood! I have seen this and do not wish to have to see such another sight again. The look of dull, hopeless long-suffering misery in that poor animal's face will haunt me for many a day.

If an inspection of bullocks was held by the authorities I am sure that at least 70 per cent. of them would be condemned as unfit for work. Before writing this I made a careful inspection of all bullocks which I passed and in about seven cases out of ten the necks were sore, some old partially healed wounds leaving terrible scars, and the necks hideously distorted, others open and bleeding as large as a man's hand on which the flies settled in swarms.

Surely in a Christion country something can be done to stop this barbarity? Let the reader imagine for himself the awful agonies the poor beasts must suffer when they start their day's work. The wounds which were open and bleeding the day before have partially healed and become stiff and inflamed and they are set to pull a heavy load in this state the next morning and kept at it all day; as far as I know nothing is done to endeavour to heal the wound: of course the only way possible would be to give the bullock entire rest, but that would mean so much less bhat to the brute who owns it, and is not to be dreamed of.

I have seen cruelties practised in other parts of the country on brickmaker's donkeys, etc., and have, when possible, brought it before the notice of the authorities; but never, never, have I seen such barbarities practised on dumb animals, such as I see here before me every day.

I sincerely trust and beg in the name of the long-suffering bullock that this may catch the eye of some one who has the authority to put a stop to these barbarities, and who will take up the matter and see it to a finish.

Sport in England.

LONDON, Friday, 15th March 1907.

HURST PARK.

THE head wind that blew down Molesey Hurst yesterday had the invigorating touch of spring withal. It was a brisk spring day, but the attendance did not much improve on Wednesday's muster, as might be expected now that the jumping season is dying so hard. Still, several prominent supporters of the sport between the flags were noticeable in the members' enclosure, and the muster was a good one. Better going could not have been desired, but fields might have been stronger.

With doubts of Old Windsor getting the course, although his plucky owner would ride a farm bullock over it for a bit of sport, odds of 4 to 1 were laid on Brown Eyes. Both nearly came to grief at the fence before the stand, and then the pair refused. Morgan was luckier in coaxing his mount over at the second time of asking, and gained a bloodless victory, and the mare, by slow degrees, thanks to Mr. Stevens' persuasions, mounted up to 100gs., at which price she was retained.

Childwickbury cut up badly in the Priory Selling Hurdle Handicap, after holding a forward position, and Sybil Primrose taking up the running a mile from home, looked like stoning for her stable companion's failure, but in a ding-dong finish Lucifer, on whom Driscoll, made a determined effort, came and snatched victory a short distance from home, to justify his slight favouritism by a three-parts of a length victory, Mr. Bonas giving 5gs. over his entered selling price for this well-grown, well-bred son of Matchmaker and Berry Moss, who was a failure on the flat last year.

The New Century Steeplechase did not furnish such a field as its endowment of 500sovs. warranted, being reduced to a quartette, Hartigan's stable, moreover, being responsible for half the field in Domino and Whitechapel, who run in different interests. The latter has proved himself a bit unreliable over hurdles, and was making his debut at fencing, but that he had a chance was demonstrated by the acceptance of 7 to 2 about him winning, though the success of Domino was presaged by the laying of 6 to 4 on. The two stable companions were soon in front, and coming to the stand touched several times, but there was no fear of an objection either way, and after running in close company till the second fence from home, Domino, on whom Williams had been sitting close, came clean away, and served by his pace, added another to his screed of victories in the easiest possible fashion, and this young chaser should some day make a big name for himself. York II. is as smart-looking a chaser as one would like to see, but he fenced sideways, and this will not do for the Aintree course.

How good Keithock is we have not yet possibly found out, but judging from the style in which she carried off the Hampton Hurdle Race, this grandly built filly, who could not score on the flat in nine attempts last year, looks like doing better service to Mr. Inglis, as she won all the way.

Laveline had run so forward in Wednesday's race that his chance was esteemed equal to that of Denmark in the Open Steeplechase, but Bachelor was expected to hold them both safe. Grimaldi fell, as usual, in the traps at the ditch, and after a staunch finish the favourite was beaten by Denmark pretty easily, and here we have another addition to the Grand National puzzle, as both the winner and Laveline may be seen at Aintree on the day.

We were all anxiously expectant to cheer the Royal colours home in the Novices' Hurdle Race, especially as Nulli Secundus, reported to have turned savage, was as quiet as a sheep in the paddock. Lady Yatesbury, who started favourite, never flattered her backers. Bed of Stone, who fell in the preliminary, played an ignominious part as contrasted with his running with Sancho at Newbury, and the issue was left to the King's horse and Melane, who alternately led from the last jump, but Melane was the quicker, and pinched the verdict, stopping the patriotic roar which was waiting to burst out had the King won. FOOTBALL.

UNDER ASSOCIATION RULES.

With the F. A. Cup ties in progress on Saturday, the Leagues were not so prominently before the public, but some of the games played were of more than passing interest. In the Southern League, Brentford lost their first home game in the tourney this season to Luton, and Norwich upset predictions by returning with two points from Millwall. Queen's Park Rangers did well to share the honours at Reading, and Fulham and Brighton divided the spoils in a non-scoring game at London-by-the-Sea. Tottenham fell at Portsmouth, and the success of the latter brings them into the running once more.

In the First Division of the League, the sensation of the afternoon was Stoke's win over Birmingham by three clear goals, this being the first time this year that Stoke have scored more than one goal in a League match. Bristol City continue their conquering career, but Derby County must be getting apprehensive of the spectre of relegation. In the Second Division Chelsea garnered in a couple of points at Stamford Bridge, at the expense of Burslem Port Vale, and as Nottingham Forest could only draw at Stockport, Chelsea have strengthened their lead. Clapton Orient placed a much-needed win to their credit at Homerton. The tables to date are appended:—

WILKINSON'S SAFETY RAZORS.

A Safety Razor which all users pronounce perfect.

The high reputation enjoyed by the Wilkinson Sword Company is sufficient guarantee that the quality of this shaver is of the highest grade.

It differs from other shavers, because instead of the old fashioned fence or comb protecting the face from the cutting edge, and which has always been the great objection to Safety Razors, a deep cut helical roller has been substituted. As this rolls, the lather and hair pass between the projecting screw threads, and all parts of the cutting edge are brought into action. This gives even wear along the whole cutting edge and feeds the lather on to it.

THE F. A. CUP SEMI FINAL.

EVERTON vs. CRYSTAL PALACE.—At Goodison Park, on the 13th instant before 84,000 people, the receipts amounting to £1,330, Everton defeated the Crystal Palace by 4 goals to 0, and thus qualified to meet West Bromwich Albion in the semi-final. The Sydenham men gave a capital account of themselves, and hardly deserved to lose by so big a margin. They started off with rare dash, and a weaker defence than Everton's would have succumbed in the first ten minutes, but then the Cup-holders scored twice in rapid succession, and the issue was never in doubt afterwards. Both sides were at full strength, and the only change from Saturday was Sharp for Donachie.

Everton started against a smart wind and driving rain, and the Palace at once pressed, Abbott clearing from Astley in the goal-mouth. Everton could not get going, but Taylor defended well and prevented several promising Palace movements from having a successful issue. Needham was badly shaken in a charge with Young, but he pluckily resumed. Everton's left wing got away, and Wilson crossed to Sharp, who sent the ball across the goal for Hardman to shoot through a crowd of players into the net. Everton's success came at the end of twelve minutes.

The Palace responded finely, but Abbott cleared, and from a corner conceded by Edwards Settle put on a second goal. Once more the visitors pressed, and Scott made a wonderful save from Woodger, later clearing from Wallace. At the other end Everton forced a corner, which Edwards cleared, while Hewitson later repelled a hot shot from Young.

At the termination of half an hour Everton got further ahead, a fine run by Sharp enabling Settle to beat Hewitson from close quarters. The Home right-wingers were too clever for Forster, and had Hardman steadied himself he might have again beaten Hewitson instead of which he shot high over. Taylor robbed Astley closes in, while Woodger sent behind, and at the interval Everton led by 3 goals to 0.

On the resumption Everton attacked hotly, and Needham twice kept out shots that must otherwise have scored. Hewitson saved from Wilson and Sharp, and the referee had to rebuke Young and Wilson for fouling opponents. Wallace and Roberts made many fine runs for the Palace, but both Harker and Astley sent wide when well placed. The Londoners tried hard to get a goal, but Woodger dallied with a fine chance until Balmer robbed him.

Soon afterwards, following a splendid run by Roberts, Astley had a great opportunity, but the slippery ball turned off his foot and over the line. The visiting centre subsequently tried Scott with a fine long shot, which was well saved, and Everton got going, Young, when almost off-side, adding a fourth goal from Sharp's centre. Result:—Everton, 4; Palace, nil.

Everton.—Scott; W. Balmer and R. Balmer; Makepeace, Taylor, and Abbott; Sharp, Settle, Young, Wilson, and Hardman.

Crystal Palace.—Hewitson; Needham and Edwards: Innerd, Ryan, and Forster; Wallace, Harker, Astley, Woodger, and Roberts.

UNDER RUGBY RULES.

WALES vs. IRELAND.—The twenty-second meeting between the brother Celts, Ireland and Wales, took place at the Cardiff Arms Park, Cardiff, on Saturday, before an attendance of quite 30,000 spectators.

Travers started for Wales, and Parks returned to Winfield, who found touch at half-way. Wales broke away from the scrummage which ensued, and carried play to Ireland's twenty-five line. The policy of the Welsh captain regarding Harding's position was at this time apparent. When play was in Ireland's ground Harding took his place in the pack, but when Welsh ground was invaded he acted as an extra back. After some hotly fought out scrummages, in which the Welsh forwards were able to command the ball, David got the oval to Bush, who in a zig-zag run beat Harvey and Robinson, and then parted to J. Evans. The last-named handed to Gabe, and the Welsh skipper at top speed gave a swift pass to J. L. Williams, who ran over with a try before the game was four minutes old. Winfield failed to goal.

The Hibernians resumed with great dash. Allen, Tedford, Gardiner and White swept the ball almost the whole length of the field in a rush which was almost irresistible. The Welsh backs who attempted to check the attack were lightly brushed aside, and it looked a certainty for a try when Tedford picked up. He, however, made too great a swerve in getting past Winfield, and very slightly infringed the touch-line. Before relief was secured by Wales, Ireland lost two good chances of scoring. The first was when Greaves failed to take a pass from Park when he had a clear run-in, and the second when Robinson stumbled in front of the goal-posts. Winfield's kicking removed the danger for Wales.

The pace set by the two sides was terrifically hot, and at this stage although Wales were three points to the good the likely result was very open. Parke, after being injured, secured and had a clear run in, but he threw a long pass to Maclear which went forward. A series of scrummages took place right on the home line, and then D. P. Jones falling to pick up from a loose rush of the Irish eight, allowed Maclear to get away. Harding just succeeded in preventing a score. The Irish forwards were playing with great keenness, and ill-luck alone prevented the Welsh line from being crossed by them.

The fortunes of the game were changed by sound play by David at the fringe of the scrum. Time after time he set his backs in motion, but strong tackles of D. P. Jones by Maclear and of J. Evans by Greaves prevented the attacks becoming dangerous. Then Bush finding he could not get through, kicked over the opposing three-quarters, and Gabe following up, fielded finely and sent along to Evans. Hinton's tackle was a fraction too late, for D. P. Jones had taken the swift pass, and gone across in the corner. It was a cleverly got try, which deserved the applause given. Winfield failed to convert.

Ireland was by no means done with after this the second score. The vim and dash of Erin's eight after the restart has rarely been equalled, but their backs passed poorly, and often lost the ground gained by the stelling work of their forwards. A dribble, in which Allen, Knox, and Sweeney took part, carried the ball over the home goal-line. Bush in a daring manner fielded, and with a kick found touch near the twenty-five. An improvement in the home forward work still further improved the position for Wales, for Harding, Neil, Travers, and Watts rushed to half way. Bush cleverly beat Maclear. But was earthed by Greaves when he was clearing the opposition.

Ireland had evidently felt the great pace, for at this stage their forward rushes were feebler, and there seemed little danger in any of their attacks; in fact the Welsh eight continued until the end beating them at their own game. Attacks first by Evans and then by Gabe were fruitless through capital tackling by Parke and Thrift. Wales was penalised for "legsup," but Thrift's kick, being replied to by Winfield, gained no ground. A failure by Gabe to take an easy pass allowed Maclear another opportunity. The Fusilier cheaply handed off D. P. Jones and going at a red-hot pace for the line, looked like notching a try when Evans smartly got across and pulled him down ten yards from the line.

Real cohesion between the Welsh forwards and backs made Ireland defend. Gabe once tried to drop a goal but the effort was a poor one. The drop out removed the invaders to midfield, and the scrummages which followed invariably found the Welsh eight heeling the ball, but Harvey and Robinson smartly spoiled all attempts of David to get it away quickly to his "threes." Half time:—

Wales (2 tries)	6

Play was restarted by Tedford, and Winfield replied to Greaves, who sent the ball back to the Welsh full-back, and he found touch at the centre. The Irishmen broke up a scrummage in splendid style, and the forwards went ahead with Allen and Tedford leading. Thrift was given the ball by Robinson, but was at once tackled. Another great rush followed from the Irish forwards, but Winfield saved in daring fashion by picking up at their feet, and running on, kicked to the Irish "25." No sooner had the ball been thrown out from touch than J. L. Williams, the Welsh left-winger, was seen in possession, and with a fine individual effort he clean beat the Irish backs, and with only Hinton to face he gave a perfect pass to the Welsh captain, Gabe, who scored a splendid try. Winfield took a difficult kick, and just failed.

A rush of the Irish forwards headed by Sweeney followed, but Winfield again sent them back. Play was taking place in the Irish "25" when Harvey got off-side, and from an easy position Winfield placed a penalty goal. Ireland showed plenty of spirit, notwithstanding the adverse score against them, and by fast forward rushes invaded Welsh territory. David got off-side, and from the halfway line C. E. Allen took a place kick, which fell short by five yards. Winfield fielded the ball, and kicked to centre touch. The Welsh forwards, with Brown and Niell at their head, dribbled away from the line-out, but Hinton brought off a magnificent save and screw-kicked to touch. The next scrummage saw the Irish forwards rush ahead, but Percy Bush picked up, and, after dodging man after man, passed to Brown, who was held a yard off scoring.

Directly afterwards David secured, and passed out to Bush, who dropped a splendid goal. Hamlet and Allen led a rush to the Welsh quarter. David had the ball heeled out splendidly, and passed to Bush, who beat Robinson and Parke, and then passed to Gabe. The Welsh captain put in a great run from near the visitors' "25" well over the centre, and, finding himself faced by Hinton, passed to J. L. Williams, who sprinted over with a fine try. Winfield added the extra points, and thus put the gallant little country 21 points to the good.

After this score Ireland had a hard time in defence; Maclear saved several likely scores and then Hinton relieved with a free-kick. The Welsh forwards, with Harding and Pritchard in the van, broke away again, but Maclear secured the ball in the loose, and ran down alongside the touch-line, but was well collared by Winfield ten yards from the line. Robinson started a passing bout, but Greaves was at fault, and brilliant play by Bush, Gabe, and Williams led to further attack by wales. There was no stopping the Welshmen once they got in Irish quarters David had the ball heeled out beautifully, and passed to Bush and he to Jack Evans, and then the ball went to Gabe, who made a great burst, and then gave the ball to Williams, who just managed to touch down in the corner. Winfield just failed to convert from a difficult kick.

It was clear that the Hibernians were beaten badly, and their forwards had not a rush left in them, Maclear was doing an immense amount of stopping work, or scoring would have been more than what it was. Gabe making a mark the kick found touch ten yards from the Irish line. The Welsh forwards heeled out, and after passing, Wales had the defence beaten but for a forward pass by D. Ponty Jones. In the next minute David secured the ball, and after beating Harvey passed out to Bush, who swiftly turned on his heel, and, breaking through the gap between Greaves and Parke, then beat Maclear and Hinton in very soft fashion, and scored behind the posts. Winfield had no difficulty in adding extra points, and so the Welshmen led by 29 points.

Play took place in the centre, and here Bush picked up in the loose, and after beating Maclear ran clean away, and passed to Harding. The London Welshman only had Hinton in front of him, but threw a forward pass to D. P. Jones. For once in a way the Irishmen heeled the ball out, but Harvey was making a poor show, and Caddell was being greatly missed. The collapse of the Irishmen was so bad that whenever the ball came out into the open, Wales looked like scoring. Gabe led off another attack, and Williams was just stopped by Thrift. Ireland gained ground through a "free" through Maclear being badly obstructed. Play took place at the centre, and then Mr. Marsh signalled "Time!" Final score:—

SCOTTISH FOOTBALL NOTES.

Four Scottish ties monopolised attention on Saturday, or rather one monopolised attention, and the others were merely of secondary importance.

The big match was that between Rangers and Celtic, two clubs whose rivalry quickens interest in their doings to such an extent that record crowds may be regarded as inevitable, whenever they meet, especially in the national Cup. Such was the case on Saturday, when the estimated attendance amounted to a total of 60,000, which does not include the many "dead-heads" who broke in. Roughly, 70,000 must have been present, and despite mounted police a large section of the crowd overflowed on to the pitch, £1,910 was collected at gate and stands. The game was a typical cup-tie contest—fast and exciting, with the teams on an equality, which the score does not adequately indicate. Celtic deserved to win but not by such a difference as three goals to nothing. The Parkhead forwards were responsible for the victory and of the front rank McMenemy, Bennet and Somers were good, Quinn after his two months' suspension being hardly at his best. At half, McNair was brilliant, while the backs, McLeod and Orr, and the goal-keeper, Adams, were safe. Of the Rangers, Newbigging was good in goal, Campbell was the best back on the field. Dickie was the leading forward for Ibrox club.

At Hampden, Queen's Park had no difficulty in settling Renton, whose sensational victory over Dundee had led one to expect great things from the erstwhile nursery of great footballers. In the opening minutes of each half it looked as if the country club were to repeat their recent sensation. But Queen's settled down and won easily, their victory being primarily due to the attack of Fitchie, McLean, and Paul. The gate was £170.

St. Mirren and Hibernians failed to reach any definite decision in their Scottish tie. The teams have already drawn at Easter-road, Edinburgh. Saturday's match was fast, with any superiority there was in favour of the St. Mirren, whose failure to win was largely due to the supreme ability of Rennie, the Hibernians' goal keeper.

The surprise of the ties was the draw of Raith Rovers with Heart of Midlothian, at Tynecastle. Hearts, even reinforced by their English importations, were woefully ineffective, and they must improve on their display if they wish to win at Kirkcaldy.

RACKETS.

THE MILITARY RACKETS CHAMPIONSHIP (DOUBLES).—Challenge Round.—2nd Battn., Highland Light Infantry (Mr. H Balfour-Bryant, M.V.O., and Mr. P. Bramwell-Davis) (holders) beat 1st Life Guards (Capt. the Hon. F. E. Guest and Mr. J. J. Astor) (winners of preliminary competition) by 4 games to 2. 77 aces to 63. Score:—17—14, 18—15, 10—15, 15—3, 2—15, 15—1.

Capt. Guest opened with four aces, and after Bramwell-Davis had followed with a single, Balfour-Bryant, Capt. Guest, and Astor all failed. A single to Davis preceded a run of eight by his partner, so at this stage the score was called "10—1" in favour of the holders. Capt. Guest did nothing, but Astor ran up four, a score equalised by Balfour-Bryant at the Highlanders' second hand. This made the latter "game ball," but in their succeeding innings the Guardsmen drew level. The game was "set three," but Astor was put out without scoring, and Bramwell-Davis made the three aces necessary to win the first game.

In the second game four hands were taken before Davis got possession at "3 all" and put on a couple. Balfour-Bryant followed with six, and after small contributions the holders stood at 13—6. Guest did not score, but Astor equalised at "13 all," and continuing his hand with a couple, after the game was "set five" made his full sequence nine. Davis only scored a single, but Balfour-Bryant went to game, a lucky angle stroke giving him the last ace. The holders were now two games up, and in the third they secured a lead of seven aces to two as the result of five innings. Then Guest failed twice, and each of the others once, before Astor scored as equence of eight. Davis drew level at "10 all," but Bryant did nothing, and the challengers won their first game. In the fourth game "6—love" was called in the Highlanders' favour, and their opponents obtained three in their succeeding two hands. This was their only score, as mainly by means of two runs of four by Bryant the holders gained a lead of three games to one. Bryant continuing his hand in the fifth game, added two, and then Guest with five and Astor with half a dozen took the Guardmen's score to 11—2. Both Davis and Bryant were put out by splendid low strokes by Astor, and after Guest had also failed, the old Etonian ran to game. Astor did not add in the sixth game, and then Davis before losing possession through serving on to the board, ran up six. A sequence of eight by Bryant made the holders "game ball," and after Guest had done nothing and Astor had made a single ace. Davis gained the point necessary to win the game and the rubber.

Mr. F. H. Browing was referee.

ATHLETICS.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY v. L. A. C.—The fourteenth meeting between these clubs has, like the first match in 1891, terminated in a draw, each side gaining a like number of points. The visiting club has not won since 1898, but they came very near to it on Saturday. Cambridge, however, are four matches ahead, and in number of first men home, claim 70¼ points to 51½. Considering the side the L.A.C. were able to get together—there being a strong element of Old Blues, who between them accounted for four events—they were expected to make a good showing, but they were somewhat lucky in tieing, for this they achieved by a bare quarter of an inch in the Weights.

Although the talent suggested exceptionally fine returns, the latter were rare. President Powell was not at his best, and could do no better than 16½ for the Hurdles. None of the Weight-putters could do themselves justice. Kenneth Macleod, for once failed to get his flying start for the sprint. Neither set of competitors at the Jumps were up to their best, but H. G. Weber was showing great improvement in the mile, and F. M. Edwards, although nervous about his foot, managed to do creditably in the Two Miles. Perhaps the most pleasing feature of the sports was the running of R. P. Crabbe. The old Corpus Blue has retired from the path for twelve months, but he had no difficulty in winning on Saturday, and had his rivals been capable of doing a fast quarter, he would have beaten 1min. 58⅘ secs. for the Half-mile. The chief feature of the meeting was the Hammer-throwing, and seldom have four such performers figured in the event. Lindsay Watson threw consistently and well, but was beaten in the final round by the old Oxonian, E. E. B. May.

Dr. Volecher (L.A.C.) and M. W. Welsh (C.U.A.C.) officiated as judges, the Rev. J. H. Gray (C.U.A.C.) was referee, Mr. W. M. Fletcher (C.U.A.C.) started, and the timekeeper, were Messrs P. W. B. Teppets (L.A.C.) and Newton Digby (C.U.A.C.). Details :—

100 Yards.—K. G. Macleod (C.U.A.C.) 1, W. Brass (C.U.A.C.) 2, A. E. D. Anderson (C.U.A.C.) 3. Macleod was not smartly off, but he always had his men safe, and won by 1½ yards ; inches Time—10⅖secs.

The best time for this event at these meetangs is 9⅖secs., by A. E. Hind (C.U.A.C.), 1901.

Hurdles.—K. Powell (C.U.A.C.) 1, R. T. Gladstone (C.U.A.C.) 2, O. Groenings (L.A.C.) 3. Powell never appeardd to be going at his best, but he was well ahead until half-way, when the others closed up with him. At the eight rise the King's man drew out again, but failed to finish with his usual dash. He managed, however, to win by 4 yards ; inches. Time—16⅕secs.

W. G. Paget-Tomlinson (C.U.A.C., 1899) and Godfrey Shaw (L.A.C., 1895) hold the record for these sports, viz., 16secs.

Quarter-mile.—E. H. Ryle (C.U.A.C.) 1, S. Abrahams (L.A.C.) 2, A. E. D. Anderson (C.U.A.C.) 3. Anderson led, but the pace was never over brisk. Ryle remained in the background until reaching the home stretch, when he let himself go, and had the leader beaten eighty yards from home, winning by five yards; a similar distance separated second and third. Time—52secs.

C. J. B. Monypenny (C.U.A.C.) in 1892, on a frozen path, did 49⅕secs., which is a Fenner's record.

Putting the Weight.—H. A. Leeke (L.A.C.), 36ft. 11⅛in., 1, A. Petrie (C.U.A.C.), 36ft. 11in., 2, J. L. Michie (C.U.A.C.), 36ft. 3⅛in., 3.

The American, W. W. Coe, for the L.A.C. six years ago, put 43ft. 3in. Of course nothing approaching this has ever been shown.

Half-mile.—Rev. R. P. Crabbe (L.A.C.) 1, R. Sheepshanks (L.A.C.) 2, E. S. Dougall (C.U.A.C.) 3. Dougall at first showed in front, but only for a few yards, when Just led out. The pace was so slow that it occupied 59secs. for the quarter. Crabbe now rushed ahead, and drawing right out, won easily by twenty-five yards, in 1min. 58⅖secs.

H. W. Workman (C.U.A.C.), 1min. 57⅕secs. in 1901, put up the best return.

Long Jump.—L. J. Cornish (L.A.C.), 21ft. 10⅗in., 1, R. P. Frankland (C.U.A.C.), 21ft. 5in., 2, S. Abrahams (L.A.C.), 20ft. 10⅗in., 3.

H. A. Jones (Jesus) in 1900 cleared 23ft. 0⅗in, which is a record for these sports and a Fenner's record.

Throwing the Hammer.—Rev. E. E. May (L.A.C.), 132ft. 3in., 1, R. H. Lindsay Watson (C. U. A. C.), 13ft. 10⅗in., 2, H. A. Leeke (L.A.C.), 125ft. 7⅗in., 3. This was May's third victory, having won in 1904 and 1905. On the former occasion he did the best throw for these meetings, viz., 134ft. 4in.

One Mile.—H. G. Weber (C.U.A.C.) 1, K. Helstrom (L.A.C.) 2, W. Hope Jones (C.U.A.C.) 3. Passing the quarter-mile mark in the second lap Weber went ahead, knocked off the second lap in 2mins. 58secs., and won by twenty-five yards ; eight yards. Time—4mins. 27⅕secs.

In 1903 H. W. Gregson, the old Light Blue president, did 4mins. 19⅕secs., which is the record at this meeting.

High Jump.—O. Groenings (L.A.C.) 5ft. 8⅗in., 1, E. E. Leader (L.A.C.), 5ft. 7⅗in., 2, W. H. Dunnett (C.U.A.C.), 5ft. 4⅕in., 3.

G. Howard Smith (Cambridge) four years ago established the record of 6ft. for the ground.

Two Miles.—F. M. Edwards (C.U.A.C.) 1, A. H. Pearson (C.U.A.C.) 2, F. B. Thompson (L.A.C.) 3. Edwards led at the mile in 4mins. 44secs. At the end of the next he drew away from Pearson, and going right ahead, won by eighty yards : good third. Time—9mins. 51⅕secs.

In 1904 A. R. Churchill, the old Caius runner, established the record of 9mins. 36⅕secs.

BILLIARDS.

ANOTHER RECORD BY REECE.—There were extraordinary scenes inside and outside Messrs. Thurston's establishment in Leicester-square yesterday afternoon as the time drew near for a resumption of the match of 16,000 up level for £100 a side between Inman and Reece. People passing through Leicester-square about half-past two o'clock must have gazed with astonishment at the crowds waiting their turn to get into the Grand Hall. An eager, struggling, yet withal a thoroughly representative and sporting assembly it was, but unfortunately there was no accommodation inside for quite two-thirds of the number.

Inside the Grand Hall all was bustle and excitement, and every available inch of space was utilised before three o'clock. Indeed, the whole scene has only one parallel in the annals of the game, and that was the ever memorable occasion of the great testimonial to Sergeant-Major Fitzgerald—the most popular of Irishmen—on Christmas Eve last.

Overnight, as all the world knows, Reece had once more got on the famous "cradle-cannon" stroke, and when the adjournment was called he was still in the identical position he started from, and had the huge break of 931 (unfinished) to his credit, with the scores reading :—Inman, 11,718 ; Reece, 9,056. Everybody had come prepared to see Reece's world's record break of 1,259 made last week go by the board, and on the popular idol of the billiard world making his appearance in the salon—fifteen minutes late, by the way—the packed "house" accorded him an ovation, and then settled in their seats to witness an achievement which with one accord they said was bound to come.

Starting carefully and with just a little unusual deliberation, Reece gradually attained his usual pace of scoring. With the object white lying against the shoulder of the top cushion, and the coloured ball against the shoulder of the side cushion—the position being close to the right top pocket—cannon after cannon was made with the ease and precision of machinery in motion. As each fifty cannons were reeled off, Reece paused for a rest—the maintaining of one position at the table must have caused a little back-ache—and incidently to dress his cue tip with a file, which for handiness he had placed on one of the ledges of the table.

Reece had never any trouble in maintaining the position of the balls until just passing the "9,800" mark when the coloured ball displayed a tendency to come down the cushion a bit. With a e flick of the cue a trifle thick on to the white ball first, he he red back into position, but for some little time afterwards ent very shakily. However with the calling of the score 00," Reece was himself again, and seemed likely to go on ome considerable time, until at 9,950 he half miscued, and ng on to the coloured ball to full, he missed the object e in the kiss back.

No cannon," was the referee's reply to the mute appeal of Lancastrian, and then all the pent-up excitement of the vast nble broke out into perfect storms of cheering, renewed and again on the announcement of "break 1,825" includ-99 consecutive cannons (all but six of which were of the ndle" pattern), both new world's records, the previous best g 1,269 points and 521 cannons, compiled by Reece in the e match on 5th March. The whole break was recorded in the fast time of fifty-one minutes, which includes the several eathers" taken by the striker.

he subsequent play was tame by comparison, breaks of 131, 2 (78 off the red), and 35 by Inman, and 56, 57, 35 and 83 inished) Reece, seeming very insignificant after the astrian's colossal effort. Interval scores :—

eece averaged 57·14 and Inman 17·57 for the sitting.

s a draw a sensational performance is always a strong card to , and probably hoping against hope that Reece would again ge, a large crowd witnessed the later session. It may be ed at once, that far from there being another sensation— ld's records are not broken twice in one day—the proceedings, epting perhaps the early stages, were rather uninteresting n otherwise.

When Reece began by carrying his suspended effort of 127 following two blanks hands, marked up 97, 119 and 54 in secutive innings, Inman keeping peace with him by record-40, 101, 98 and 78 in the same period, matters looked idedly promising from a spectacular point of view. But en thirty more visits—fifteen by each—were paid to the table a couple of double-figure items of 31 and 91—both going to nan's side of the marking board—it took the gilt off the gerbread.

While subscribing the big items referred to, both players formed in delightful fashion. Reece, for his delicate and ractive manipulation near the top spot, interspersed now and in with a few well-judged losers and long drop-cannons, and man for his fine forcing—although admirably judged—long ers from hand, each received well merited recognition from e delighted spectators. Subsequently both players died away most to nothing, Inman causing great astonishment by peatedly missing the easiest of middle-pocket losers, while eece missed a few fairly easy cushion cannons.

Towards the close, the Lancastrian rekindled interest with a nderfully fine top of the table effort of 179 ere a most lucky kiss robbed him of a certain drop cannon. The same ayer add 30 at his next hand, and after Inman had made one oring stroke, the proceedings were adjourned with the scores ading :—

Hunting.

THE KARACHI HUNT.

The hounds have now left to summer at Quetta, and we have ut to record the closing meets of the season.

On 10th March the hounds met at the Hunt Camp, Landhi, at A.M. There was a nice cool feeling in the air and plenty of dew, hich promised well for scenting. We started by drawing the amp covert blank, but the hounds began to "feather" as we got nto Parker's Nullah. Soon we heard a whimper and then a "crash" f music, and they were away over the fields on the left racing or the river bed. Our jack set his mask for the far bank, but he pack rattled him through the high grass at a pace, which nade him think discretion the better part of valour. He turned n his tracks and ran in a circle towards the Hunt Camp, and ve saw him skirting along the river bank, with the hounds unting beautifully together a few hundred yards behind him, while we were struggling through the heavy sand of the river ed. On reaching the bend of the river, he turned right handed hrough Parker's Covert, and across the Common to Rabu's Khet. We had a grand gallop over turf after him, and then the hounds rattled him through Rabu's Khet, and killed at the Old Trees just beyond, after an hour and 5 minutes without a check. It was a splendid run, and the hounds hunted and ran magnificently. The Master then drew the Landhi Vale, and we were soon on the tracks of another jack. The hounds pushed him through the thick covert across the open, running into him near the Big Bund, after a short spin of ten minutes. Drawing homewards, we found twice again, the denseness of the cover let the first away, the second jack saved his brush owing to the lack of scent. It was getting very hot at 10 so we whipped off homewards.

On 14th March we had another cool morning, and another capital morning's sport. Mrs. Travers, Mrs. and Miss Graham and Mrs. Wren were out. The hounds met at the New Jail at 7 A.M. Finding, about half past seven, along the Pinjrapol Bund, the hounds ran a great pace, and drove our jack out of the scrub across the over towards the Lyari on the banks of which they ran into him after a fast gallop of 20 minutes. Drawing again, we struck a stout hill jack after whom we had a run of 1¼ hours across the hills down towards Thull, and back again. He got to ground on Hyona Hill with the hounds and field close behind him.

17th March was the last meet of the season. It was hot when we started out from the Hunt Camp to canter across to Alladad, where the hounds met at 7-15. But there was very little scent, and though we did find, the hounds were soon at fault. The Master then lifted them and trotted off to the Subedar's Khet. A crash of music proclaimed a find, but the jack would not leave covert, and the hounds finally ran into him in thick hedge along the outside of the Khet. Thus terminated our Hunting Season of 1906-07, during which the hounds have been out 29 times, and have killed 12½ brace of jacks.

"You're lookin' bad Mulowney. What's wrong wid ye?"

"I've been sick; had a fall of a ladder seven or eight feet high, I had."

"Begobs! that wasn't far, for ye to fall. You're near six fut high yourself.

A young man had the misfortune to be run over. It was not until the motor car had gone a few yards further that the driver showted "Look out!" The unfortunate man struggled to a sitting posture and asked, "You're not coming back, are you?"

A doctor who had been summoned hastily alighted from his carriage. In the woman who was awaiting him on the step he failed to see the anxious look he had expected. "I understand," he said, "that your boy has swallowed a shilling. Where is he?" "Oh, sir," was the reply. "I'm glad to tell you we made a mistake! It wasn't a shilling: it was only a half penny!"

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

CALCUTTA by their victory over the Hornets are still at the head of the League table, and retain an unbeaten record.

The game in question was one of the fastest this season. Calcutta with the exception of Cooper in goal was at full strength, and although his understudy did well on the whole, should at least have stopped one of the goals scored. The Hornets had out as strong a combination as they are at present able to produce. Their forward line is as strong and speedy as ever, but they require one other half and a full back. The wing forwards Catchick and Rosetti are as good as are at present playing, but Apcar and the younger Rosser did not seem to get on very well together, and were always tumbling over and getting in each other's way.

For Calcutta Simson played better that he has done this season, and his two goals were the result of very pretty shots. Mander was played forward, and once he settles down should be of immense service. The halves were kept very busy and the speed of their opponents was at time too much for them, but McCaw and Graham played a sound game at back and kept out many a dangerous rush. The game, one regrets to notice was not conducted in as good a spirit as could be wished. The Hornets have at present one or two irresponsible youngsters doing service for them, who cannot refrain from claiming for impossible infringments, and generally questioning the decision of the referee in unmeasured terms. Knocks also must be received in silence, and the sooner a youngster conceives this idea the better. A few words from the Captain of a team should be able to remedy matters, for it is a pity that a team should get to be disliked because a few of its members making themselves offensive. To question the decision of the referee is most regrettable and deeply to be deplored; it does not tend to make the task of this gentleman any the pleasanter.

The Caledonians who are only a point below Calcutta, have every reason to be proud of their position and great interest will be evinced in the meeting of these two teams in the last of the league engagements, which will probably decide the ultimate winners of the Cup which is to be presented. I have not had an opportunity of seeing the team play recently, but the defeat of the Customs by 3 goals to 1, must prove them to be a very good side indeed.

The Rangers are losing ground considerably and have had to put up with a defeat by the team from the Fort. The latter are coming on, and although they cannot at present be ticketed dangerous, should give a fairly good account of themselvs in the Beighton Cup competition.

Practically the deciding game in the "B" division of the League was played on Tuesday last, between the two College teams St. Xavier's and the Medicals, resulting in a win for the former by two goals to nil. They thoroughly deserved their victory, and although perhaps not having more of the game than their opponents played it more scientifically.

These two teams are now certain of promotion to the senior division next season, which should be very welcome, for they are unquestionably two amongst the ablest combinations the City is able to produce.

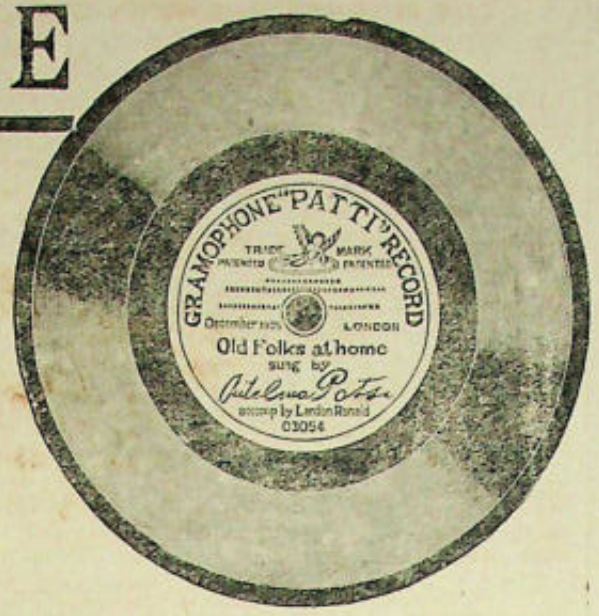
The Naturalist.

THE WAYS OF LIONS.

HALF-WAY between the East African coast, opposite Zanzibar and Lake Victoria (says a writer in Chamber's Journal) lie vast upland prairies on which antelopes and other wild beasts abound, as they did formerly in South Africa. These plains are uninhabited by man. They teem with zebra and antelopes. The latter are chiefly Coke's hartebeets and Grant's and Thomson's gazelles. There are also a number of wild beasts (gnu), but these move together from one district to another and are not generally distributed like the other antelopes. Herds of eland are present in certain localities, and there are a few giraffes on the Athi and some at Sultan Hamoud Station. Wart-hog are found in colonies, and bushbuck exist at the head-waters of the Athi, where the converging streams emerge from the Kikuyu forest-country near Nairobi. Along the banks of all the rivers are numerous herds of water-buck and impala. Buffalo exist on Donyo Sabruk Mountain, and their skulls are commonly found elsewhere. Duikers are present, singly, everywhere. Other animals of this region, which do not form the prey of lions—although the young may occasionally be attacked—are the hippopotamus (numerous in the Athi) and rdinoceros. Ostriches are also common, though whether lions ever secure them is doubtful.



When disturbed by lions at night, the zebra rush about wildly with a great trampling and uttering their peculiar cries. Going out early in the small hours, I have found them rushing about thus in great troops of many hundreds, panic-stricken. Lions are said always to follow the great herds of zebras wherever they go.

Nothing has struck me more in the natural history of lions than their power of rendering themselves invisible. The colour of their skins blends with that of the brown prairie grass. Their supple build must also lend itself to concealment; and their limbs, being short relatively to their length and bulk of body, enable them to creep through grass and cover that would not hide other animals of their size, as regards weight. I remember approaching a lion engaged in devouring a zebra half-an-hour after sunrise. My eyes wandered for a moment to some hyænas which were waiting for their turn, and in that moment the lion vanished. There lay the partly-eaten zebra forty yards away, and on every side nothing but the short brown grass. I searched for some inequality in the surface of the grass, and noticed a tussock rising above the rest. There was nothing whatever to mark it as anything but a tuft of grass, and I hesitated to fire at it, thinking that if it proved to be grass, and the lion were lying somewhere close by, it would be angered by the report, being doubtless in an ill-humour at being distributed at its meal. In the end I decided to chance it, and raised my rifle. Instantly the tussock developed into a large, fullmaned lion, which rose quickly and galloped off. I have on other occasions known lions rise suddenly from the grass close in front of me and leap into reedbeds. This invisibility enables them to approach the wary animals on which they feed. They hunt at night, stalking their prey until quite near to it, and then making a very swift rush.

I have more often heard lions roaring in the hour before dawn than at any other time, and I believe it to be true that they roar always after feeding. The sound is often heard at a great distance, and is then generally described as "moaning" or "grunting." Some men, in fact, say they do not roar, but moan. The sound is, I believe, roaring softened by distance, for I have heard it close at hand, and then it was a gruff roaring. In each spell of roaring were about twenty-four sounds; first a succession of prolonged roars, increasing in power until they seemed to be delivered with great violence; then a series of shorter, more abrupt roars, the last dying away gradually into hoarse pants, which finally became inaudible. Some one has said that a lion's roar is just like that of an ostrich. If this be so, I can only say that an ostrich's roar must be a most impressive sound.

There are always a number of hyænas lying up in the ravines or reedbeds in the vicinity of the abode of a troop of lions. These, together with jackals, finish up the remains of the "kills." I have seen a lion eating a zebra with a crowd of hyænas running to and fro all around him, uttering most piteous moans and howls; and a number of jackals' heads were visible in the grass, sitting patiently at a little distance. Every now and then a hyæna would endeavour to snatch a piece of meat while the lion lay resting from the labour of eating for a few minutes. There would be a deep growl, and the lion would rise up, whereupon all the hyænas would fly to a short distance, and their clamour would cease for a moment, then the lion would lie down again and after one or two plaintive moans the clamour and running to and fro would recommence. If anything remain after daylight vultures and marabon storks gather. Nothing whatever is left of the kill. The bones are carried away by the hyænas,

THE GRAMOPHONE CO.

GENTLEMEN,

The Gramophone of to-day I find is such an improved instrument for recording the human voice to the older machines with which so many of us are familiar, that my hitherto objection to allow the thousands who cannot hear me sing personally to listen to the reproduction of my voice through the instrumentality of your Gramophone is now quite removed, and the Records which you have lately made for me I think are natural reproductions of my voice.

Yours truly,

even to the skull. Hence there is nothing to mark a lion-kill on the spot where it occurred beyond the trampled contents of the entrails.

I recollect one morning, on going out on to the plain by Nairobi at dawn, coming upon a dead hyæna. My first impression was that it had been riddled by bullets, but on examining the wounds it became plain that a lion had struck its claws into the animal—one blow on the back, another on the side. Evidently the hyæna had angered the lion either by spoiling a stalk in its anxiety for meat or by venturing too near a kill. I had not then learnt to recognise the signs of a kill.

The manes of lions on these plains never approach the luxuriance of those of menagerie lions. They vary in colour, some being black, others dark brown, and many of the same pale brown as the body.

Although they hunt at night, lions in the natural state often lie just outside the recumbeds at all times of the day. I say in the natural state, because with the advent of the Uganda railway they learnt to fear man. Some of them became man-eaters, lurking near the great camps of Indian coolies and carrying off men night after night. The most notorious of the man-eaters was a lion which took up his abode near the construction camp at Kimaa, near Sultan Hamoud. I have been told by an officer of the railway that the coolies would sit up every night until they heard screams, when they knew they could turn in safely, the lion having taken his prey for the night. Mr. Ryall, the inspector-general of railway police, determined to sit up one night in his carriage, with two friends, with the hope of getting a shot at the man-eater. The three fell asleep, however, leaving the door and windows open, and at 2 A. M. the lion entered the carriage and carried off Mr. Ryall.

These man-eaters were so serious a nuisance that the managers of the railway offered a reward of Rs. 200 (£13-6-8) for every adult lion killed near the railway from mile 200 to mile 300. About 60 were killed in two years. The result was to inspire the survivors, many of whom had seen their comrades killed by their side, with a fear of human beings. This fear has been increased by the large number of sportsmen who have come out of late years for hunting trips on the Athi and adjacent plains.

JAUNTS IN BURMESE JUNGLES.

V.

The hardships related in a previous narrative consequent on a night spent in the forest lost to the civilized world, made a day's halt, before the resumption of hunting operations, imperative; both to enable my camp equipage, ten miles away to be brought in, and to give my person a thorough rest after our wet sojourn on the banks of the creek.

A sanctuary had been found in the only village located within the confines of this vast expanse of wooded hills. A consultation was held with the headman of the hamlet, and the few tillers of the soil who eked out a precarious existence in this far-removed plantation. It was ascertained that on the higher slopes of the main Pyingadaungs the lordly bison was wont to roam whether his fancy dictated. The game as a rule shuns with a bitter loathing the haunts of man, and when the wood-cutter's axe rouses the echoes of the darksome glades, this wild ox will migrate to pastures less likely to be disturbed. The wheel of fortune up to the present time had only been grinding out to me the chaff, and the prospects of better luck did not look over bright. When the goddess doles out her riches, however, it is often done with an unstinted hand, and lucky is the man who happens to be present when the largest is being disbursed. The previous guide had proved himself to be totally unreliable, so he was paid his dues and informed that his room was preferable to his company. The headman of this exiled community proffered himself as a companion for the projected outing. Divers wanderings in many portions of this Land of Pagodas and beetlenut have taught me that, when the leading light of a hamlet is desirous of taking up the post of guide and counsellor in a shooting expedition of this description, his actions are open to some suspicion, and very careful investigations as to his capabilities should be made before placing oneself in his hands. In many instances the offer is made purely and solely from a feeling of moral obligation. A stranger comes to his lands and it is his duty to accompany the sportsman in his various peregrinations, until he should have taken his departure into some other sphere of administration. If such be not the case his services may be pressed upon the traveller merely from a selfish point of view. The under-lying thought, naturally it must be admitted and wholly typical of the oriental, is, that if the European hunter meets with success in his quest for game, in the exuberance of his spirits, and in the gratification of that success there is a possibility of the intriguer's name being brought favourably to the notice of the local gods.

It stands to reason that in the majority of cases the village headman is not given to wandering among the wooded mountainsides; his work, if he stoops to manual labour, lies in the tilling of his fields and also in the administration of his particular charge. He is therefore sublimely ignorant of all except the most frequented forest paths, and in order not to appear uniformed in the eyes of his visitior he commandeers the services of the village tracker, gleans knowledge from him by the way and imparts it to the sportsman, with an accompaniment of much sagacity, as the product of his own attainments. Now when tracking big game a cavalcade of four retainers carries with it double the scent and creates twice the noise that only two followers would be responsible for. It is therefore a sine qua non that if the outing is to be crowned with victory numbers must be reduced to as small a margin as possible. Another personage that should be approached with considerabel caution is the professional hunter. It is my experience that except within very narrow limits, he is far more of a nuisance than a succour. There are certain areas in which every glen, and every brae can be read by him like an open book, but when he ventures forth beyond the borders of his happy hunting grounds with the sportsman he does so out of pure avarice. He knows that the booty, less the actual trophy, is bound to come his way, and he will be richer to a very considerable extent by the sale of the meat, which had he not been present, would probably have passed into the hands of the villagers without the extortion of a quid pro quo in the form of hard cash or grain. If the nomad can talk the language of the country with sufficient fluency as to be able to make himself understood, he will usually find that a wood-cutter will prove of far more utility. These men are not licensed hunters, that is to say they do not shoot game in order to make a living by selling the meat. They are, however, fully cognizant with every nook and corner of the forest in which they work and live and are moreover well acquainted with the localities which game customarily haunts, for during their wanderings they cannot fail to notice where the denizens of the jungle congregate in the largest quantities. The headman of his cluster of huts was an exception to the general rule, and as circumstances afterwards showed he not only knew the reserve from pot to crest tine, but he was also an experienced tracker. It was a damp chilly morning on the 20th August that two beings crept stealthily between the rows of bamboo constructed cabins. None of the inhabitants were astir at that early hour, but our exit was viewed with much suspicion by a quick-eared pariah, who by way of resenting our approach to his vicinity set up a sleep-disturbing yap from an adjacent hovel followed by an agonizing howl. A heavy thud, an oath muttered in a muffled voice, a series of still more doleful ululations enriched now by the rest of the canine community were the only sounds that greeted us as we picked our way along a slushy lane, avoiding the numerous branches that dropped downwards, and endeavoured to skirt the foul-smelling water buffalo wallows that formed a regular chain up the pathway. The mists cling in eerie fashion round the tree-tops, creating fantastic shapes and exaggerating their height beyond recognition, as we plunge up a winding track that curves in and out of these giant stems. A strange stillness seems to brood on everything, a silence broken only by the monotonous drip of the moist atmosphere from off the foliage. A puff of air, unnoticed at our level disturbs the upper branches of some narrow-barked patriarch, followed by a deluge of drops on the mouldering leaves at its roots. This sepulchral hush, like the proverbial lull before the storm, is strikingly characteristic of these big-tree forest glades. All nature seems to be preparing itself for the struggle of the coming day when life and death will once more be in their never-ending grip.

> All heaven and earth are still—though not in sleep.
> But breathless, as we grow when feeling most;
> And silent, as we stand in thoughts too deep:—
> All heaven and earth are still: From the high host > of stars, to the lull'd lake and mountain-coast,
> All is concenter'd in a life intense,
> Where not a beam, nor air, nor leaf is lost,
> But hath a part of being, and a sense of that which is > of all creator and defence.

As we advance shafts of light begin to penetrate the murkiness that enshrouds us like a fall: the ghostly sinews of the giant creepers gradually assumeless fanciful guises and as the gloom is dispelled progress becomes more rapid. The tracker bends this footsteps up a gently-rising spur, and I follow close in his wake, and when dawn has broken in real earnest we are a considerable distance up the slopes of the main Pyingadaungs. Soon a diversion, amusing to my companion but far from pleasant as regards my unfortunate self, is afforded. When moving through the undergrowth with which these forest brakes are clothed it is a wise precaution to keep one's weather eye open and to scan carefully the stems and leaves in one's immediate front. Some noise had for the moment attracted my attention, next second I was skidding pell-mell down the hill-side, the rifle is literally hurled away, and I plunge, regardless of protruding branches headlong into the thickest harbourage available. A few minutes later it was a sad figure that crept sorrowfully out of this temporary refuge. A peculiar form of bee builds its dependent from these large leaves. The combs are usually quite small and are frequently exceeding difficult to detect. Should the hunter accidently touch the stem from which these wax cells are hanging, the occupants are out in a flash to the extent of half-a-dozen or so, and they never fail to drive the intruder from their home. The latter at the first indication of his mistake, does not usually waste much time in putting a safer distance between himself and his aggressors, for if the whole horde be roused the consequences are sometimes serious. Confidence having once more been restored, I take stock of my injuries. A burning sensation on the tip of the nose indicates one centre of outrage, the lobe of the right ear is throbbing painfully, and one or two lumps on the arms shew where these pests have injected their poison. The next step is to institute a search for my trusty ·577 which was the recipient of such unwonted treatment. The weapon is found luckily uninjured, but the muzzle as a result of its aerial flight is clogged with about an inch of mud. Here is somewhat of a predicament, for a pull through does not figure in my equipment. A cleaning rod is fashioned out of a straight piece of bamboo and the tracker sacrifices a strip of his head-cloth; the barrels are once more rendered serviceable and a start upwards is again made.

The effects from the explosure experienced two nights previously have not quite been eliminated from the system, so when a convenient nook is reached, a halt is called for breakfast, though the hour is somewhat early for that meal. It is extraordinary what a difference in one's bearing a little food will often bring about. A feeling of absolute listlessness, indifference to every thing, may invade the body, but after a snack and a drink of water from a stream strength seems to return almost miraculously. Lassitude gives place to an intense eagerness for action which will last for many hours. Such was the case on this paricular occasion. I appeared to be imbued with a new vitality when I once more shouldered the rifle preparatory to a thorough exploration of the ridge on which our quarry might be roaming. An exclamation from the tracker brings my weapon with a jerk to the "ready." The sight is refreshing beyond words. Within 15 yards of where we have been sitting munching our frugal repast is that slot of a really fine old bull. Many are the varied thoughts that rush kaleidoscopically through the mind as we cautiously follow the trail. Here at any rate there can be no room for mistake. The cow bison has not yet been born that could boast of a foot print of that size. Is luck going to be with me I wonder? or is it to be a repetition of a previous attempt —a glimpse of a black hide, a series of deafening crashes and then silence. Other scenes of a similar description troop by one after another. There is the picture mirrored clearly on the brain, of the first bull ever bagged on a plateau in the Godavery Districts of India. Again, the adventure where from out a bamboo glade,

.....wide waving to and fro his angry tail.

That too was an old hoary bull—the fighter of many a hard-contested battle. Will this essay be one in which life depends solely on the smashing effect of 600 grains of steel and lead, or will it be a pot shot at 50 yards with never an ounce of danger to enliven the hunt. Such are the thoughts that willy nilly flash past the hunter's mental gaze as he step by step, yard by yard, disentangles the puzzling maze of hoof marks. Success or failure may entirely depend on the breaking of a single twig, so every precaution against noise is taken. My chuplies are discarded and the chase is continued in thin leather socks through which every stick can be felt instantaneously. At first I elect to take the lead placing the tracker in rear, but a sharp shower fills the imprints with water, and it becomes a matter of impossibility to worry out the freshest tracks from the criss-cross of intermingled hoof marks, and at the same time to maintain a vigilant look-out for our prey. I relinquish my position to the hunter, but a sharper downpour makes us seek shelter from the storm behind the buttresses of a straight stemmed cotton-tree. Time is precious so at the first signs of abatement of the storm we are once more on the prowl. Ahead of us looms a knoll, rising somewhat abruptly from the level of the surrounding land. The guide pauses and whispers that if the bull is near at hand he will be somewhere on the summit of that hummock. Precautions are now doubled—everything is in our favour, and owing to the recent rain the ground is sodden and soft as a sponge. That broad track of broken stems and trampled leaves lures us on as a magnet draws steel towards it; we have reached the base of this pinnacle.

lord of lowing herds,
may now be within hearing distance. Slowly we creep up the slope of that rounded hillock not straight after the manner of a Roman road but slant wise at a gentler gradient. The brow of the crag is only a few yards distant and the trail leads off away to the right. Suddenly the hunter pauses dead in his foot steps as if he had been petrified on the instant, so shorply does he pull himself back that a bump is only just avoided. Slowly "dah" in hand he lifts his arm, points over the lip of the pinnacle to the left, and as he drops it again rather glides than steps behind me. Three more paces and——

God——what a sight——.

There—within 20 yards of us and with his gaze fixed on the gloomy gorge below lies with graceful ease this magnificent ox, wholly unconscious of the presence of danger which if he knew it he might yet scatter with two bounds of this agile frame. There in the living is the huge spread of his massive horns. It is a spectacle that might occur once in a life-time: though it is the impression of only a second or two on the retina, still it is graven in the brain's image so surely that it will fade only when life fades also.

There is no doubt that I am face to face with a position in which it must be a case of straight shooting. A bungle may cost a life, for we are far too close in case of a charge to attempt to take shelter behind any friendly tree. If the first bullet fails to stop, three-quarters of a ton of flesh quivering with impotent rage and malice will be hurled on us in the fraction of an instant. Here was a situation in which my 8-bore would have proved of invaluable service, but the ·577 had never once failed me up to date.

Click—as the first hammer is raised. A twitch of the ears backwards is the only response.

A gadfly settles on the beast's flank—with a toss of his mighty horns he flicks it off and click—the left barrel is safely cocked.

How rapidly the brain works on such occasions of bodily danger.

It seems butchery to take him as he rests, and from behind; shall I attract his attention and give him his coup de grace when he is on his legs.

The tension has become too great.

The instinct of self-preservation forces me to run no unnecessary risks, though I know full well that the missile must traverse two feet of solid meat and bone before it can touch the vitals, I decide to trust to the penetration of the steel-pointed bullet, and fire between the shoulder blades.

What fury—what paroxysms of blind hate—the heaving mass is up on its hind legs instantly, but beyond its knees it cannot rise. The projectile has sped true and so it seems, has paralyzed the bull's fore quarters. Using his knees as a pivot he has slid his body round so as to face the danger.

What Titanic efforts he makes to propel himself upon his tormentors. What unavenged spite is depicted in those flashing eyes and tossing head, stones, mud, sticks, and turf fly hustling through the air in the Herculean struggles of this injured monster—what a subject for a Landseer—"shoot, shoot" implores the tracker, where excitement has reached boiling pitch by now. There is reasonable excuse too for his feelings to get the upper hand. Never in the whole of his existence has he been the witness of such a stirring spectacle—never is he likely to be the participator in such a sensational episode for the rest of his life. "No—friend," is my silent soliloquy—"an empty rifle in the face of a maddened bull 19 hands at least, would be as much use as a penknife against a tiger." A cartridge is hastily forced into the right chamber when it is apparent that the victim is powerless to do evil. I close with the quarry. The mighty frame gives a convulsive shudder; the red flood of life comes spurting in two frothy streams from this proud creature's nostrils, flecking the leaves and twigs with clots of foaming gore. Anon the legs stiffen, the eyes roll upwards; that noble heart has ceased to beat. The last death-agony of a creature of God is sad to see—I turn away and look out on to the never-changing landscape that was pleasing the pale-blue pupils of that carcase behind me only a few short minutes back.

What a scene for a Shelley.

Spirit of Nature! here
In this interminable wilderness of worlds, at whose involved immensity.
Even soaring fancy staggers,
Here is thy fitting temple.
Yet not the lightest leaf.
That quivers to the passing breeze
Is less instinct with thee,—
Yet not the meanest worm.
That lurks in graves and fattens on the dead,
Less shares thy eternal breath.
Spirit of Nature! thou
Imperishable as this glorious scene.
Here is thy fitting temple.

The bull was in truth a very fine specimen. The spot which it had selected for its mid-day siesta was characteristic of many such localities fairly common on the main chain of the Pyingadaungs. In front was a rocky precipice and below like a map lay spread out to the gaze a panorama of hill and dale hardly to be excelled for the intensity of its grandeur. Here on this elevated bluff, where the forest in which it was born and lived gradually melted away and merged in the shrouding clouds above, here repose had been sought, safe as the creature thought from its enemies. The stronghold was unapproachable from the east—the breeze gave due notice of an intruder from the south and west, the north alone was undefended, but to overcome this danger the beast had passed its lair and then come back down wind. Fate had at last, however, laid it low. On making an examination of the body of the bull a half-healed bullet wound high up on the wither was revealed. There could be no doubt that this was the same animal that I had wounded just a week previously in the adjoining reserve.

The excitement of the day was over. One more adventure to furnish food for happy reflection when the eye should become too dim and the body too frail to traverse these mountain fastnesses, had been notched up in the annals of my hunting experiences.

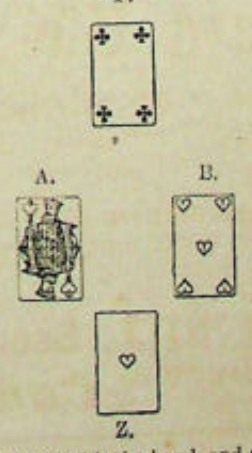
Solution to Problem No. 26.

Z should lead a small diamond, win with Y's ace, and return the queen. B, having doubled on four trumps, is virtually marked with the king of diamonds, so that the finesse will be of no use, and it is important to clear Z's knave before he is forced to part with the king of hearts. This will enable Y to get rid of a losing spade or heart, B probably being void of spades. After winning with the ace of diamonds, it would be wrong for Y to lead the knave of clubs, for B would then clear his hearts, block the diamonds, and force Y to lead up to A's probable tenace in hearts. The dealer could only make five tricks in the way, whilst by establishing the knave of diamonds he may make six.

Problem No. 28.



Score: A B 0, Y Z 0. Z deals, and declares hearts. A doubles, and Y re-doubles. Y's and Z's hands are as follow:—

Y's Hand (Dummy).—Hearts, none; diamonds, ace, king, queen; clubs, king, jack, 9, 4; spades, ace, king, queen, 8, 6, 3.

Z's Hand (Dealer).—Hearts, ace, jack, 6, 4, 3, 2; diamonds, 10, 7, 3; clubs, 10, 6; spades, 7, 2.

The first trick is as follows:—

The guide pauses and whispers that if the bull is near at hand he will be somewhere on the summit of that hummock. Precautions are now doubled—everything is in our favour, and owing to the recent rain the ground is sodden and soft as a sponge. That broad track of broken stems and tramped leaves lures us on as a magnet draws steel towards it; we have reached the base of this pinnacle.

The pulses quicken at the thought that the lord of lowing herds,
may now be within hearing distance. Slowly we creep up the slope of that rounded hillock not straight after the manner of a Roman road but slant wise at a gentler gradient. The brow of the crag is only a few yards distant and the trail leads off away to the right. Suddenly the hunter pauses dead in his foot steps as if he had been petrified on the instant, so shorply does he pull himself back that a bump is only just avoided. Slowly "dah" in hand he lifts his arm, points over the lip of the pinnacle to the left, and as he drops it again rather glides than steps behind me. Three more paces and——

God——what a sight——.

There—within 20 yards of us and with his gaze fixed on the gloomy gorge below lies with graceful ease this magnificent ox, wholly unconscious of the presence of danger which if he knew it he might yet scatter with two bounds of this agile frame. There in the living is the huge spread of his massive horns. It is a spectacle that might occur once in a life-time: though it is the impression of only a second or two on the retina, still it is graven in the brain's image so surely that it will fade only when life fades also.

There is no doubt that I am face to face with a position in which it must be a case of straight shooting. A bungle may cost a life, for we are far too close in case of a charge to attempt to take shelter behind any friendly tree. If the first bullet fails to stop, three-quarters of a ton of flesh quivering with impotent rage and malice will be hurled on us in the fraction of an instant. Here was a situation in which my 8-bore would have proved of invaluable service, but the ·577 had never once failed me up to date.

Click—as the first hammer is raised. A twitch of the ears backwards is the only response.

A gadfly settles on the beast's flank—with a toss of his mighty horns he flicks it off and click—the left barrel is safely cocked.

How rapidly the brain works on such occasions of bodily danger.

It seems butchery to take him as he rests, and from behind; shall I attract his attention and give him his coup de grace when he is on his legs.

The tension has become too great.

The instinct of self-preservation forces me to run no unnecessary risks, though I know full well that the missile must traverse two feet of solid meat and bone before it can touch the vitals, I decide to trust to the penetration of the steel-pointed bullet, and fire between the shoulder blades.

What fury—what paroxysms of blind hate—the heaving mass is up on its hind legs instantly, but beyond its knees it cannot rise. The projectile has sped true and so it seems, has paralyzed the bull's fore quarters. Using his knees as a pivot he has slid his body round so as to face the danger.

What Titanic efforts he makes to propel himself upon his tormentors. What unavenged spite is depicted in those flashing eyes and tossing head, stones, mud, sticks, and turf fly hustling through the air in the Herculean struggles of this injured monster—what a subject for a Landseer—"shoot, shoot" implores the tracker, where excitement has reached boiling pitch by now. There is reasonable excuse too for his feelings to get the upper hand. Never in the whole of his existence has he been the witness of such a stirring spectacle—never is he likely to be the participator in such a sensational episode for the rest of his life. "No—friend," is my silent soliloquy—"an empty rifle in the face of a maddened bull 19 hands at least, would be as much use as a penknife against a tiger." A cartridge is hastily forced into the right chamber when it is apparent that the victim is powerless to do evil. I close with the quarry. The mighty frame gives a convulsive shudder; the red flood of life comes spurting in two frothy streams from this proud creature's nostrils, flecking the leaves and twigs with clots of foaming gore. Anon the legs stiffen, the eyes roll upwards; that noble heart has ceased to beat. The last death-agony of a creature of God is sad to see—I turn away and look out on to the never-changing landscape that was pleasing the pale-blue pupils of that carcase behind me only a few short minutes back.

What a scene for a Shelley.

Spirit of Nature! here
In this interminable wilderness of worlds, at whose involved immensity.
Even soaring fancy staggers,
Here is thy fitting temple.
Yet not the lightest leaf.
That quivers to the passing breeze
Is less instinct with thee,—
Yet not the meanest worm.
That lurks in graves and fattens on the dead,
Less shares thy eternal breath.
Spirit of Nature! thou
Imperishable as this glorious scene.
Here is thy fitting temple.

The bull was in truth a very fine specimen. The spot which it had selected for its mid-day siesta was characteristic of many such localities fairly common on the main chain of the Pyingadaungs. In front was a rocky precipice and below like a map lay spread out to the gaze a panorama of hill and dale hardly to be excelled for the intensity of its grandeur. Here on this elevated bluff, where the forest in which it was born and lived gradually melted away and merged in the shrouding clouds above, here repose had been sought, safe as the creature thought from its enemies. The stronghold was unapproachable from the east—the breeze gave due notice of an intruder from the south and west, the north alone was undefended, but to overcome this danger the beast had passed its lair and then come back down wind. Fate had at last, however, laid it low. On making an examination of the body of the bull a half-healed bullet wound high up on the wither was revealed. There could be no doubt that this was the same animal that I had wounded just a week previously in the adjoining reserve.

The excitement of the day was over. One more adventure to furnish food for happy reflection when the eye should become too dim and the body too frail to traverse these mountain fastnesses, had been notched up in the annals of my hunting experiences.

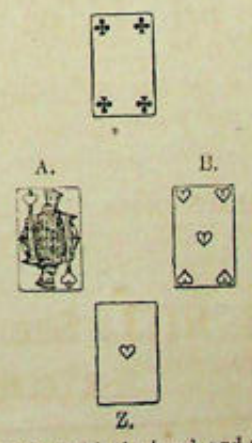
Solution to Problem No. 26.

Z should lead a small diamond, win with Y's ace, and return the queen. B, having doubled on four trumps, is virtually marked with the king of diamonds, so that the finesse will be of no use, and it is important to clear Z's knave before he is forced to part with the king of hearts. This will enable Y to get rid of a losing spade or heart, B probably being void of spades. After winning with the ace of diamonds, it would be wrong for Y to lead the knave of clubs, for B would then clear his hearts, block the diamonds, and force Y to lead up to A's probable tenace in hearts. The dealer could only make five tricks in the way, whilst by establishing the knave of diamonds he may make six.

Problem No. 28.



Score: A B 0, Y Z 0. Z deals, and declares hearts. A doubles, and Y re-doubles. Y's and Z's hands are as follow:—

Y's Hand (Dummy).—Hearts, none; diamonds, ace, king, queen; clubs, king, jack, 9, 4; spades, ace, king, queen, 8, 6, 3.

Z's Hand (Dealer).—Hearts, ace, jack, 6, 4, 3, 2; diamonds, 10, 7, 3; clubs, 10, 6; spades, 7, 2.

The first trick is as follows:—

How ought Z to go on with the hand, and why

THE BOMBAY RACES.

SEASON 1906-07.

THE Fourteenth Extra Meeting brought to a conclusion a season not only of record character in the matter of attendances and entries, but in high class racing full of interest, and kept to a high pitch of excellence by the ever increasingly energetic and liberal methods of the W. I. T. C. It is, of course, usual to give each official a sugar plum to suck and make his duties less thankless; but we think in this instance one may say with absolute frankness that both Mr. Cursetjee and Mr. O'Gorman deserve a very large measure of thanks from the public and owners for the excellent sport that has resulted. Dissentients there are, of course; but results speak for themselves, and the tact with which the former has allotted the loads is evident to those who have followed each day's racing carefully, and it is no small job with the varying moods of the host of new Arabs and the, practically, unknown quantities from up-country. As far as "thankless jobs" are concerned there can be none more deserving of the name than that of Mr. O'Gorman as Starter. He has a post the importance, responsibility and difficulty of which is realised by very few. He has had tremendous fields of unruly, and raw Arabs to contend with as well as the old stagers and the impartiality and patience he has exhibited deserve the greatest recognition.

Amongst the big horses that have been racing this year the improvement in "class" has been very marked and two naturally stand out head and shoulders as champions. It was a matter of very great satisfaction to Bombay racing men when the Hon. Mr. A. A. Apcar paid the W. I. T. C. the compliment of sending down his cracks. They unfortunately did not see the Cup winner in his true colours but they saw Ballark a stone at least better than when in Poona and, on Calcutta running, they were not quite unprepared for this. He fairly swept the board in the long races "like a race-horse" and there are many who think him, (even with Fitzgrafton fit and well) the best horse in India.

Over anything up to seven furlongs Sermon, that perfect picture of an English thoroughbred, stands out immediately and the style in which he won was a delight to spectators. Though a bit above himself, and he should be kept that way, he shows none of the temper with which he was credited in England and, in fact, ran as kindly as that able lad Bray could have wished. This does not mean that Killia has gone off, far from it; he is still the powerful, game horse with his long, sweeping stride and in sprint races can honestly came second place to Penton's charge. Though receiving a stone, and over, from the two mentioned, Manlock has shown grand form as a flier and the six furlongs, in which Sermon dead-heated with him on the post, was cut out in the sensational time of 1 min. 13 secs. As good, too, was his five furlongs of the Flying Plate which he won comfortably, carrying 7st. 9lbs., in 1min. 1sec.

The Trials winner, Saloon, cannot be said to have been a disappointment; he ran right up to form and well up to his fields over distances more suitable to the small C. B. than a Cup Course; the training for this is likely to do him no good. Others in the same stable, Kipling and Beaunero, showed up well and many think the latter, a rare stayer who should have run better in his other engagements, and would have won the great Byculla Club Cup had his weight allowed of a stronger horseman.

Turning to the 14 2s. it must immediately be admitted that the public have never been as much at sea as they were from first to last Extra. The only consistant ones amongst them seem to have been olour. This was undoubtedly the consequence aleness due to the gallops his owners sent him ll hours of the day and it is said, night; the re of this stable generally may be put down to ame cause, treating a horse more like a machine flesh and bone!

ith the exception of a very few, we have seen little worthy of note from the new ponies whose s, even after a season's racing, continue to be of raw animals. Big price as the Maharajah atiala paid for the Great Commander, we do not k double that purchase price would effect another capable trainer, when told of the inadvisability orking him for long distances, immediately ded to go to work and risk the "leg" the recent ner had been afraid of. The change made all difference, as seen in the Second Dealers'. Good rest remain more or less of a mystery as those shone early in the Season shine no more and, as eady remarked, this is not because of anything ticular cropping up from what we may judge by stop-watch.

As regards the Jockeys, every big Meeting seems see their ranks swell but the veteran champion, Robinson, still commands the first position in the blic mind. This, too, despite a wretchedly bad ne, as luck was all against the too stables; Mr. lstaun's and M. Goculdas and A. Nanji's. Luck
s, however, clung to Williams who has had a really markable time since landing in Poona where his ccesses began from the jump off. Trenoweth and oss have not yet had time and the other new lads, aesen, Ferguson and Rayes have not shown up as ell as expected. Ames has had a better time of it;
e consider him one of the best judges of pace and headiest" lads we have. T. Melsom has only peated his performances in Poona where his star as not shining; but Vining has again ridden some markably nice races; not a strong finisher, he is en to great advantage on a free running horse and very like Evans, the lad he replaced, even to his ult of being inclinded to cross a bit too soon.
Amongst the native lads the same four stand out,
eeroo, Kamad, Oomerkhan and C. B. Mahomed;
we cannot say there is much to choose between them and the majority of the European boys.

A slight improvement has been effected in the course at the bend, but there is plenty of room for improvement still and it could do with considerable widening which unfortunately would be difficult, owing to the railway.

A BLACK BUCK BUTCHER.

This head-line we think aptly describes the game slaughterer who, not long ago, inserted in the columns of a Calcutta advertising sheet the following outrageous notice:—

WANTED.

Offers from purchasers of Buck and Doe skins.
Advertiser can supply 100 skins per month.
Apply to L. M. Care of Printer.

Our readers can imagine the astonishment and indignation with which we perused this infamous advertisement. Try and consider it calmly for a moment ye shikaris and all ye who for some years have agitated for game protection, game laws, close seasons, etc.

One hundred bucks AND DOES per month!

The advertisement was replied to in the following letter:—

CALCUTTA, 28th March 1907.

DEAR SIR,—With reference to your advertisement now appearing in the————I shall be obliged by your giving me full particulars of the skins refered to, viz:—

3.—From what deer?
4.—If freshly killed.
5.—If supply would be continuous all the year round?
6.—How cured?
7.—Price.
8.—From what part of India to be supplied?

Yours faithfully,

The reply was prompt and to the point; it is appended:—

This man proposed to supply skins of "freshly killed" bucks and does "all the year round" at the rate of one hundred skins a month!! The close season for game in Bengal is from 15th March to 15th August; how does this miserable creature propose to keep up the supply of fresh skins during those five months? Even falling back on the comforting reflection that perhaps the authorities will find means of preventing him carrying out his fell work during that period, we are faced with the possibility of his being able—providing he can find a market—to exterminate black buck in one district at the rate of seven hundred during the shooting season. This is certainly the worst case that has ever come under our notice: we appeal to the Collector of Mirzapore (to whom we have forwarded the correspondence) to deal with this man and his agents in such manner as he thinks best.

THE theology of childhood is very peculiar. The only difference between us and the little ones is that while we think just as many funny things as they do we never speak of them, while they put them into words. We are reminded of this fact by reading of the boy who asked his mother if God made the monkeys as well as men. When she replied in the affirmative he quietly remarked, "Well, He must have laughed when He got the first one finished."

DURING the trial of a criminal case in Clare the interpreter is observed to be holding a muttered conversation with an Irish-speaking prisoner.

"What is he saying?" asks the judge, sternly.

"He is axin' me, my lord, who is the quare lookin' ould woman with the red cloak just come into court," answers the interpreter, coyly.

"Well, and what did you say?"

I said, 'whist, you fool! Sure, that's the old divil that's going to hang you."'

Sporting Notes.

THE extension of the Calcutta Race Course on the old Monsoon Stand side has taken a fresh development during the past week. The widening of the cold weather course just beyond the Monsoon Stand, by carrying it out to the edge of the Jail Tank, has been completed and this will ease the preliminary corner in the Sprint Races, to a small extent. But further than this a piece of the proposed new track has been marked out from the Hospital opening back over the open space between the present outer rails and the Roadway as far as the Jail Tank which the new alignment reaches at the end next to the Road. This may mean one of two things; the opening of an entirely new segment from the Big Tree round behind the old Monsoon Stand and the Road to the Hospital opening, or merely a new starting place for a cold weather five furlong track.

As yet there is no sign of coming down about the old Monsoon Stand and it is impossible to believe that the Tank can be filled up and so extensive a work carried out before next cold weather. But there is ample time to finish the second project suggested, that is to make a new piece of track from the farther end of the Jail Tank running into the cold weather course at the Hospital opening. This would effect a great improvement as it would do away with the first and most dangerous turn in the five furlong course which would then run almost straight up to the bend for home. The start, as at present located by the marking pegs, looks to be uncomfortably adjacent to the tank as also to the roadway, but the corner of the tank could be filled in to relieve this and, of course, it is always possible, if inconvenient, to shift the winning post a few yards further on so as to ease matters at the starts.

As usual at this time of year there are plenty of race horses for sale and there are a number on offer at Cook & Co's. auction this week. Buyers are very shy just now however and even an advertisement of sale without reserve fails in many instances to uproot the popular belief that there is a limit of some sort on everything that has any pretensions to pace.

THE new season's programmes are not yet published up till the time of writing, but there is no real necessity for their delivery for weeks to come and their non-appearance is hardly noticed except by those, who are anxiously enquiring for some racing news upon which to base a paragraph for the entertainment of the hot weather remnants of the racing public.

THE latest recruit to the ranks of Lady tmfites is the Countess of Suffolk, whose horse Friarsgate recently won the United Hunts Cup of Newbary. The Countess, when Miss Daisy Leiter, was well known in India; she married Lord Suffolk three years ago.

THERE is scarcely any occupation nowadays safe from the encroachment of women, even racecourse "tick-tacking" being exploited. In this connection a New Zealand exchange mentions that after the first race at the recent Dunedin meeting the racecourse detectives noticed a woman who was standing near the judge's box making two strokes in the air with her umbrella. They watched, and after the second race saw two strokes again, but quickly corrected to four. This was the race in which many thought that Fireiron (No. 2) had won, though No. 4 was the judge's decision. The club's detectives thereupon interposed, and the woman owned that she was a tick-tacker signalling to someone on the hill, this second person signalling to a third party who sent the news to bookmakers in town. She was promptly put off the course.

CERTAIN corrections are notified in connection with the programme of the Mysore Races; they will be found in a notice published today in our sporting columns.

THE W. I. T. C. announce that in regard to the result of the Selling Plate run at the Thirteenth Bombay Extra Meeting. Court Martial has been disqualified and the placings are as follows—Chadter, 1; Chum Chuman, 2; Namoos, 3.

A FULL report of the Jubbulpore Races appears elsewhere. The meeting was capitally engineered and the sport good, and barring the indifferent starts in some of the races on the first day, if would have been hard to beat.

that the firm have lately purchased the old established business of Messrs. Kohler and Sons, whose specialities were coaching, hunting and shooting horns. Swaine and Adeney keep the factory going and announce themselves in a position to turn out these instruments with the same regard to tone and quality which have distinguished them for over a century. Large stocks are being kept to ensure prompt delivery.

A SECUNDERABAD correspondent writes:—"News has come in from the jungles where many shooting parties are spending their holidays that big game is plentiful. Nawab Faridom Jung's party, which includes Major-General and Mrs. Hamilton and Mrs. Stephens, at His Excellency the Minister's own preserves have been fortunate in bagging four tigers in six days. The first fell to the Nawab's gun and the other three all came out in one beat, the General bringing down the first, Mrs. Hamilton the second, and Mrs. Stephens the third."

THE winner of the Gujerat Pig-sticking Cup was Mr. Medlicott and the runner-up Sirdar Singh of Shapura. The final of the Salmon Cup was won by Ranjit Singh of Baria, the runner-up being Colonel Forbes. The Tully Cup was won by Kingfisher (Symons, senior, up). The Pony Cup was won by Ranjit Singh of Baria. The Country-bred Pony Cup was won by Yellow Hammer, owned by Mr. Lory, and ridden by Symons, junior. Full details of the meeting are given further on.

LAST week a boy at St. Peter's College, Agra, was handling a loaded gun; it went off and another unfortunate boy named Farnon was shot dead. A most deplorable accident; but the questions that naturally arise is what was this schoolboy doing with a loaded gun, what sort of discipline exists where lads are permitted to have firearms?

THE final in the Murree Brewery Challenge Cup Polo Tournament was played off on the 1st April. The teams left in were the 10th Hussars "A" team and the 23rd Cavalry. In the former Milbanke replaced Kavanagh, who was hurt by his fall in the semi-finals. The game was level for the first two chuckers, but the 10th then asserted themselves and ran out winners by seven goals to two goals, thus winning the handsome trophy which had been in the keeping of the 11th Lancers twice. Practically the whole of Rawalpindi, plus many from the out-stations, were either exhibiting at the Horse Show or looking on at this most popular function, and the finals suffered in point of attendance in consequence which was a pity as the game was worth watching.

MESSRS. TRAILL AND CO., of Calcutta, have just got out a fine selection of the famous "Burlington Proofs" made so popular by the enterprise of the Fine Arts Publishing Co., Ld., of London, and only by reason of the perfection of its mezzogravure process has this Company been able to secure the privilege of reproducing some of the most charming pictures to be seen at Burlington House.

The primary purpose of pictures is to be constantly seen, as a back ground for the events of every-day life. It is only so that their charm can be thoroughly appreciated. They must sink in and become part of our mental equipment. The modern habit of holding exhibitions has tended to create a habit of casual and cursory inspection in the art loving public. To have seen a picture once amidst a multitude of others is not to know it; even a picture in a permanent gallery which can be visited from time to time is not the same thing as one upon the walls of a man's home. There is more solid satisfaction to be obtained from a photogravure that one possesses, than from the original picture in the possession of someone else. Both are equally works of art, but it is the work of art lived with that opens its secrets to the eye. Seldom, indeed, are the beauties of a picture to be discovered at a glance; that which takes an able man years of study to be able to make, and then months of hard work actually to produce, cannot be properly understood and properly appreciated by a mere amateur in a few moments. All fine art is subtle; no one can perceive subtle merits at a glance, hence it has always been the desire of those who really love pictures to possess them. It is only in recent years, however, that the possibility of gratifying that desire has come within the means of persons of moderate wealth. The reproductions of fine works of this series are primarily intended to be a decoration for the home. They have been carefully selected from the best work of the leading painters of various schools dating from 1400 A.D. to the present day. Any of our readers desirous of further details regarding these beautiful and ridiculously cheap reproductions should write to Messrs. Traill and Co. for their catalogue.

IN the last issue of the Calendar appears the following notice: The Stewards having inquired into the running of Flo in the Tharrawaddy Handicap at Rangoon on 16th March 1907, decide that under Rule 153 R. Morrison, the rider of Flo, is warned off the Calcutta course and other places where the Calcutta Rules are in force.

WE mentioned the sale of The Butler the other day. It may interest the large number of our readers who study form and take pleasure in noting the doings of a real good one to have a complete list of his performances during 1906-07. 4. Proposed by Mr. E. J. Buck and seconded by Mr. J. G. Dickson that the money given by the Turf Club to the Tollygunge Horse Show be increased to Rs. 1,000 and be given as prizes for events to be specified by the Stewards.

Carried unanimously.

With a vote of thanks to the Chair the meeting terminated.

THE fourth meeting of the Great Punjab Horse Show was an undeniable success in every way. Some first class animals were put into the ring. Entries were in every case good, and in almost every class a very high standard was observable throughout. To Colonel Pringle D.S.O., this success is due, his untiring energy has brought this meeting up to the level of the best Horse Show in India, and the response of owners who entered some 250 horses and ponies must have been highly gratifying. The officers of the 10th Hussars the members of the Punjab Commission and the officers of the Royal Artillery dispensed hospitality on the three days during which the show lasted. Major-General Mahon, C.B., D.S.O., and Colonel Morgan of the Indian Civil, Veterinary Department, gave satisfaction in their capacity as judges. The list of prize winners is given further on.

"Old and Bold" writes as follows to our London namesake on the subject of the Indian Golden Plover—"In the late sixties and early seventies I was stationed at Cawnpore for three years, and during that time had ample opportunities of observing the different kinds of game and wildfowl inhabiting that district in my frequent shikar expeditions. The only time that I ever fell in with the Indian Golden Plover was on one occasion, but that was a memorable one. A fellow subaltern and I were out shooting together on the bank of the Ganges one day in January or Febrnay, when we observed a large flock of birds, which I at once knew to be Golden Plover. We marked them down into a small ravine, not far from the river, and proceeded to stalk them, with the result that with our four barrels fired into the flock we picked up thirty. My companion had never seen birds of that species before, and did not know what they were until I told him. They were a welcome addition to the bill of fare at the mess, and I can bear testimony to their excellence for the table. My friend is now a distinguished general officer Commanding a division in India, and if this should meet his eye he will most probably remember the incident."

There has recently been some correspondence in The Field on the subject of reloading rifle cartridges. To the discussion our old friend "Fleur de Lys" contributes the following:—

Sir,—There is little chance of that inquiring spirit regarding matters pertaining to the rifle which we see flourishing so vigorously on the other side of the Atlantic, ever even germinating in the hearts of British shooters. In England it seems the sportsman must have everything done for him; no one dreams of preparing his own ammunition for the rook and rabbit rifle. This lack of interest and energy on the part of English rifle shooters is the main reason why we are so wefully behind our American cousins in knowledge of the miniature rifle.

Nothing can be more significant than the fact that only now have we adopted the ·22 long rifle ammunition for our shooting clubs, though the excellent qualities of this ammunition have been well established for quite fifteen or sixteen years. The man who never reloads his own ammunition loses a great deal of pleasure, and also opportunities for finding out fresh and interesting facts. Thus the merits of smokeless powder for miniature rifles were first brought home to me about 1891, when I began to get successful results with Schnitze in a ·22 C. F. Winchester Since those days I have had many and many a set of Ideal reloading tools for the various miniature rifles which have succeeded one another in my affections. The two most thoroughly successful weapons I have had, for reloading purposes, were ·25 25 and ·28-30 Stevens single shot rifles. The straight, well-made, heavy shells are almost everlasting, and can be reloaded again and again. I have used thousands of reduced charges, Schultze and Amberite in these rifles at various elevations and in differing climates. For instance, the ·28-30 was equally successful with 5grs. of smokeless during the hot weather in the Indian plains and among the snows of Ladak, 13,000ft. above the sea.

That reloading cartridges is by no means difficult is evidenced by the fact that I have constantly done this work in camp, with no better adjuncts than a folding table and an open charcoal fire. I would it were possible to arouse some interest and enthusiasm among British shooters over cartridge loading. The rifle crank's efforts, besides being a source of instruction and pleasure to himself, help to increase his people's interest in that arm by which the fate of nations is decided. Lastly, he who shoots his rooks and rabbits with cartridges loaded by himself experiences the same fine feeling of satisfaction as does the fisherman who kills a fine trout on a fly of his own tying.

Shooting for the Prix des Reveds on last month, at Monte Carlo, Mr Kevill Davies divided 3,000 francs with Mr. A. Thomer and Count F. Hoyos. Mr. Kevill Davies shot with a new hammerless pigeon gun recently supplied to him by Chas. Lancaster, of London, and used Curtis's and Harvey's "Smokeless Diamond." there were 41 competitors, and this was Mr. Davies's first trial at Monte Carlo. This success sheds more lustre still on the merits of English guns and English gunpowder.

Lord Chevlesmore, Chairman of the Council of the National Rifle Association, is appealing to members to assist in raising £3,000 to defray the expenses of sending a representative team to Australia, in acceptance of an invitation from the Commonwealth Council of the Rifle Associations of Australia, to compete for a trophy at the Commonwealth meeting next October. The Prince of Wales has subscribed £50, and Lieut.-Colonel John Barlow £100 to the priliminary list.

The New York Zoological Society has recently received from London the longest tusks ever known to have come from a living species of elephant. The longest tusk has the astonishing length of 11 feet, 5½ inches, while the other measures exactly 11 feet. One measures 18 inches in circumference; the other 18¼ inches, and the combined weight of the two is 293 pounds. The next largest tusk on record is only ten feet, four inches in length, or more than one foot shorter. These tusks are from an African elephant, evidently of enormous size.

This giant pair was purchased at the last ivory sale in London. They came to the Zoological Society as a gift from Mr. Charles T. Barney, Chairman of the Executive Committee, Mr. Percy R. Pyne and three other gentlemen. The price paid in London was § 2,500, and they were secured by the prompt action of Mr Barney who the moment the opportunity was made know to him authorised the purchase.

It has been stated that these huge tusks were formerly owned by King Menelick of Abyssinia, and by him were presented to an official of the French Government. The Zoological Society knows nothing definite on these points. It is known, however, that the longest tusks grown by African elephants are produced immediately South of Abyssinia.

Both these tusks are quite perfect in every respect. They originally set into the skull about 26 inches. It is evident from their shape that after leaving the skull they curved inward slightly, then outward and upward in very graceful and pleasing lines.

These tusks are not only the longest ever known, but the chances are as ten thousand to one that they never will be equalled by any living elephant.

Athletic Notes.

There was a poor attendance at the general meeting of the Bengal Automobile Association last Wednesday; perhaps it was not sufficiently advertised or notified—for ourselves we knew nothing of it. The Hon. Mr. G. Gordon, I.C.S., was elected Chairman for the coming year, Mr. E. J. Oakley being re-elected as Vice-Chairman, and a Committee of eight members was elected. There are a number of new names on the Committee this year as many of the old members are going home. Mr. Stevenson-Moore, the retiring Chairman, was accorded a hearty vote of thanks.

The final in the Lahore Trades' Association Football Tournament between the Gloucesters and the Seaforth Highlanders was won by the Gloucesters by 1 goal to nil which was obtained in the last minute of play. The game was a magnificently contested one and extra time had to be played to decide the issue.

At Dehra Dun the other day the Viceregal Party witnessed a three mile foot race between Naik Jit Bahadoor, of the 2nd Gurkhas and a man of the 5th Gurkhas, supposed to be the champion of the Punjab, while Jit Bahadoor was dubbed the Champion of Bengal. Where do they get these titles from? Anyhow it was a good race and Jit Bahadoor won by twenty yards in 12mins. 5secs(!) after having led all the way.

This is a specimen of the way such events are clocked out here, or it is a printer's error for which our Allahabad contemporary is responsible! The World's and English amateur record for three miles is 14mins. 17-2/5 secs. held by the invincible Shrubb; the English professional record is 14mins. 19½secs. by P. Cannon; the little Gurkha's time is returned at 12mins. 5secs. or 2 mins. 12-1/5secs. better than World's record! Shabash indeed!!

Mike Elias, who is now pretty well known in India as a smart cueist, has been exhibiting his skill recently at Bareilly. He gave Major-General J. Spens 400 in a game of 750 and won by 28 points; his best break was 96. The General was obviously off his game. Elias also took on Sergeant Hunt of the 1st Royal Scots on the same terms, but was beaten by just 2 points.

The Amir has ordered six pairs of gold rimmed spectacles from Messrs. James Murray and Co.; this extraordinary potentate seems to do everything wholesale.

Inman the celebrated billiard player is now on a tour round the world; he is "scheduled" to arrive in India next November.

That the high class qualities of Daimler Cars are appreciated, not only by the general public but also by other manufacturers in the same industry, is shewn by the fact that orders have been placed with the Daimler Company for 45 H.P. Cars by Monsieur De Dietrich and Monsieur Leonce Girardot. The Company's advertisement appears on the last page of to-day's paper.

Messrs. Hamilton & Co. of the White House, Portrush, Ireland, send us an exhaustive catalogue, most charmingly, got up and arranged, of their splendid assortment of Irish linen, home spuns, serges, towels, handkerchiefs, lace goods and embroidery. The hand made homespuns are a special feature and who that is up-to-date does not either golf, or shoot, or hunt—for which occupations garments in this material should be always neat, workmanlike and suitable. "There never has been," say the Proprietors, "any doubt about the charm, the quality, and the economy of Ireland's best work, but there was a difficulty in getting it at reasonable prices, and in feeling sure that you had got the genuine thing"—with this, Messrs. Hamilton & Co. assure us they are in a position to supply the public. Perhaps everybody is not aware that Portrush is at the north west extremity of County Antrim, North of Ireland, on a small peninsula projecting into the Atlantic, and is about two and a half hours by rail from Belfast or Larne, and is the most popular seaside watering place in the North of Ireland. As a summer and golfing retreat it is simply ideal; there are sands for the kiddies, deep sea and shallow bathing for ladies and gentlemen, and the air is bracing and healthy. This then is Portrush and the depot for the Irish peasant industries, so that by ordering from the White House, we shall kill two birds with one stone, benefitting both ourselves and the Irish peasantry. Many of the royal families of Europe, and several Indian Princes have placed orders with this Irish firm, the business of which must be world wide, at so phenomenal a rate, does it develop. Belluk China, rugs, baskets, walking sticks, in fact almost any kind of souvenir of the land of the Shamrock can be supplied, and it needs only a glance through the catalogue, to see how thoroughly artistic in production and style are these goods. The catalogue is accompanied by copies of testimonials from all parts of the world, sufficient in themselves to show that anyone who sends an order to the White House will receive the satisfaction there always is in dealing with a reliable firm.

Some interest was taken at Bangalore on the 14th instant in a swimming match between Mr. C. A. Flower, of the Vacuum Oil Company and Corporal Bastow of the Sherwood Foresters. It was over a 70 yards course in the reservoir and the soldier won by 3 feet in 45½ secs. It seems a pity Mr. Flower has forfeited his amateur status by competing against a professional; for example if by any chance he desired to swim at Calcutta for the All India Amateur Championships which were mooted last year and which the Calcutta Swimming Club may put through, he would be barred by reason of the C. S. C. running under the A. S. A. Rules.

The Association match between England and Scotland, played last Saturday, resulted in a draw with a score of one goal each.

In our review of "Sport in England" for the week ending 22nd March, will be found a full account of the Varsity Boat Race and the R.M.C. Sports at Sandhurst where there was some very good running. Details are also given of the Lincolnshire Handicap and other races with which the flat racing season opened at Lincoln.

A satisfactory result was arrived at when Sam. Newman met Corpl. Smith of the Devon Regt. for the second time. On the first occasion the verdict of the draw was generally unpopular, so the men agreed to meet again last Saturday at Rangoon to decide who should be entitled to the title of light-weight Champion of Burma. They went twenty hard rounds in which some really smart work was seen and Sam Newman won on points—one of the best exhibitions of boxing ever given in Rangoon.

It is announced that on the 20th instant there will be another Golf Tournament at Frasergunge. Sir Andrew Fraser has presented a handsome cup to be played for. Gentlemen desiring to complete should send in their names at once to Hon. E. W. Collin, I.C.S., Commissioner of the Presidency Division.

The R. A. Bengal Football Tournament was won by the 3rd Battery R. F. A. who beat the 79th Battery in the final, at Lucknow, by 2 goals to nil. The trophy was presented to the winners by Colonel Massy.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Friday, 22nd March 1907.

FROM Saturday until Wednesday we suffered from a succession of gales—or rather from one long and barely interrupted gale, till we were perfectly weary of it. The list of wreck and disaster at sea has been a very long one and the full extent of mishap is not known yet. A very singular and unusual feature of the weather prevailing on Sunday night was the thick haze which accompanied a gale strong enough to blow fog to shreds, one would suppose. Hence the wrecks of the Jebba and the Suevic—the two most important wrecks that occurred—from a property point of view.

Suffragism made another assault on the Houses of Parliament on Wednesday: or rather two, for the ladies attacked first in the afternoon and again in the evening. The direct assaults were defeated by many firm but polite constables: a flank attack skifully planned was more successful; fifteen or twenty Lancashire operatives in shawls and clogs mounted a char-a-banc to "see the sights of London" and bade the unsuspicious male driver take them to Westminster, where unsuspicious police allowed them to pass, and had the trouble of hauling the crowd out of Westminster Hall. Sixty-seven arrests were made during the afternoon. Hard is the case of would be martyrs whose relatives have disgraced themselves by service to the State. I am told that orders have been given the police not to arrest Mrs. Despard, suffrage she never so wildly. This is a courtesy to her brother. Sir John French views his sister's behaviour with disapproval.

I had the privilege of hearing Miss Christabel Pankhurst expound her views at the Sesame Club on Monday. The lady's oration would perhaps not greatly interest you. She is anything but a typical female agitator: rather small, neat and well dressed, her face has character. She speaks fluently—with awful fluency—and her speech is the speech of a woman who has been brought up in very decent society. She showed readiness and address in answering the various speeches made by men at the club against the cause; but I am bound to say that the men who spoke were not powerful advocates in an opposition sense and left unsaid most there is to urge: but that perhaps was politeness.

Mr. Morley has finally refused to sanction the ascent of Mount Everset as Reuter has no doubt informed you. It is not easy to understand why: Sir George Goldie carefully explained the plan of the proposed ascent which involved entering the extreme edge of Tibetan territory, very sparsely populated at that, while the party would turn its back on Lhasa from the moment of crossing the frontier. Mr. Morley calmly assumed that it was proposed to send the party in a "furtive" manner, whereas the application to the India Office gives the assumption obvious and flat denial: and also assumes that "the expedition" proposed "exploration in Tibet." Mr. Morley or his advisers or both are apparently comprehensively ignorant of Indian frontier geography. The Royal Geographical Society is not pleased with Mr. Morley's treatment of the application.

Mr. John Burns think the proposed audit of the L. C. C. accounts undesirable. At this I am not surprised. Other people who want to know the truth about the L. C. C.'s municipal trading schemes, think the plan most enimently desirable, since the late Council's reports are—to put it mildly—rather vague and confused. Mr. Burns thinks the official auditors suffice: but he forgets that these are only concerned with items of expenditure; not with those sordid details of profit and loss, due it may be to Socialist folly and extravagance with which the rate-payers are most concerned. Mr. Burns' disapproval will not, I imagine, prevent the audit being made and that by independent auditors.

The National Service League which seeks to educate public opinion in favour of universal military training is certainly making headway. It advertised a meeting in Kensington Town Hall on Friday evening, and your onlooker went; rather, he confesses to see and hear Lord Milner than for any other reason National Service League views, objects and principles being familiar to him. Though the evening was cold and wet, the hall was literally crammed and the proceedings were enthusiastic. Mr. Maxse, Editor of the National Review, made decidedly the best speech of the evening. After Lord Milner had spoken the members of the audience were invited to sign cards approving the objects of the League: and I am told over 300 signatures were handed in, as the hall holds only about 600 and many of those present were already members, this was distinctly good.

The facts that a gale was blowing, arctically cold, though from the west, that it was dull and threatened heavy rain, made no apparent difference in the crowds which turned out to see the boat race on Saturday afternoon. The sympathies of such as sport favours, cabmen, errand boys and the like were all with Cambridge, indicating I apprehend the crew in which the wearers trusted to win them shillings rather than anything else. The boats were received with great enthusiasm considering what a procession the race was: a spurt made by Oxford was received with tremendous applause, futile though the effort proved. Such was the state of wind and water that the value of "stations" was reduced to zero: and at one stage both boats were close under shelter of the Surrey bank.

At the end of a twenty-seven hours' sitting of the Commons yesterday (pray imagine a Board of Directors or the partners of a business firm sitting for 27 hours to discuss any matter that demanded clear headedness and cool judgment!) Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman announced that his Government viewed with disfavour the Channel Tunnel scheme. For this relief some thanks. The plan was so preposterous that there was real danger of this complacent cabinet accepting it.

Mr. Tree revived The Red Lamp on Saturday for a three weeks' run. The part of Paul Demetrius suits Mr. Tree well and he was more than acceptable in it. Miss Coustance Collier is the Princess Claudia, stately but perhaps a little too self-restrained in a part requiring some emotional display. Mr. Lyn Harding was a capital General Morakoff, but he was a soldier of the old English stage school rather than a Russian. The old play was followed by a new one act adoption from the French of Perinque by Mr. Gordon Lennox: it is called "The Van Dyck" and is best described as a melodramatic practical joke. It is a bit spun out, but with judicious cutting should enjoy long life as a curtain raiser for which it is well suited. Mr. Peters (Mr. Weedon Grossmith) is an art connoisseur—he says so—and his beautifully furnished flat is full of valuable things, picked up cheap from "friends who owe me money, widows who don't know what the things are really worth" and people like that. Enter Mr. Blair Woldingham (Mr. Tree) who occupies the next flat: he has sought Mr. Peter's acquaintance to thank him for his beautiful violin music which actually caused him to desist from suicide last night when he had the pistol at his head. Mr. Woldingham is charming and amable: looks at all Mr. Peter's treasures, hears how he got them and raves over the Van Dyck, "the gem of my collection" which is an obvious and clumsy forgery. Mr. Woldingham grows more confidential: he is distracted, pathetic attention is replaced by anxiety. He gets restive: Mr. Woldingham grows more heated and finally pounces on Mr. Peters and holds him down in his chair that he shall hear to the end the tale of love and poison with which Mr. Woldingham is bursting. Wilder and more excited he grows till it is clear Mr. W. is a raving lunatic. Knocks at the flat door: battering and kicking: crash! the door is down and in rush warders and keepers just in time to rescue Mr. Peters. Mr. Woldingham fights desperately and the head keeper hustles Mr. Peters into his bedroom "because he excites the patient"—and locks him in. And then the murder is out. Mr. Woldingham becomes sane instantly and joins the "keepers" in looting the flat. When Mr. Peters gets out of his bedroom, the premises are stripped of all his priceless treasures except that Van Dyck: the burglars left that because it was such an obvious fraud. The thing is a trifle but is most cleverly played. It gives Mr. Tree an admirable opportunity of working himself up from debonnair calm by progressive stages to madness: and Mr. Grossmith has perfect scope for exercising his remarkable gift for working his features. Often I have thought Mr. Grossmith makes too much use of those mobile and expressive eyebrows: as Mr. Peters they had ample play and the owner's dumb show acting while his visitor's madness developed was a real treat.

One of his admirers has produced a table to show that Mr. Bernard Shaw is now the most popular playwright in the world. During the last twelve months plays of his have been produced in England, America, Germany, Austria, Bohemia (in Czech), Belgium, Hungary (in Magyar), Denmark, Norway, Swdeen, Russia, Finland and Switzerland. "Patience" is the next Gilbert and Sullivan opera down for revival at the Savoy. Depending as it did so greatly upon the aesthetic craze now mercifully dead and forgotten, one doubts a little whether this opera is likely to prove as great a draw as the Yeomen of the Guard or The Gondoliers, both of which treat of the "eternal verities."

The Miracle, —or Mystery, play Everyman is to be revived, the play will be given at the Coronet and at Kensington. Miss Wynne Mathieson will take the part of Everyman in which she scored such a great success when Mr. Poel first produced it. I wonder what Mr. Bunyan would have thought of the dramatisation of his book. A company of clever amateurs gave "The Pilgrim's Progress" on Saturday at the Imperial, Mr. Frank Dicksee R.A., having arranged the tableaux which former a large part of the play. I cannot say that the Pilgrim's Progress lends itself happily to the stage: The strong individual note of the original is impossible to reproduce. Much speculation was rife concerning the material of which the angel's wings were made; I think the lady who detected in them "that crushed tissue paper, they use for lamp shades" hit the right nail on the head. Large liberties were taken with text, characters and action:

Christian did not even come to blows with Apollyon, but routed him by holding up his cross handled sword. The music (old folk songs and ancient melodies) was admirable and harmonised very well with the spirit of the play.

Gaints are always a "draw." The Hipprodrome now has a giantess named Marie Fassnauer a Tyrolean, said to be over 8 feet high. I cannot say the large lady appeals to me. She is 27 years old but her face is far more rugged than the face of most peasant women of forty: dull in repose, but when she smiles—or grins for she doesn't do it by halves, a singular change from heaviness to shrewd alertness comes over her features. She is not very bulky, weighing only 24 stone. We were assured that Marie is fond of children and a regular churchgoer: items of information which appealed in different ways to different parts of the house: though why there should be anything peculiarly humorous in a giantess going to church, I confess is a mystery to me. Perhaps there is humour however in making such an announcement to the Hippodrome audience.

A new strong man named Auto Atlas also adorns the Hippodrome. He is a German; and his great feat is to lift with his teeth a motor car with passengers weighing a ton, what time he balances on his hands on parallel bars. Auto Atlas is willing to lift any car weighing up to 3 tons and will do it while the engine records a speed of 50 miles an hour: from which I conclude vibration troubles Auto Atlas' nerves not at all.

The Millman Trio are attracting attention at the Alhambra. The trio consists of a man and two girls, one of the latter in short skirts who does most of the business. The stage is darkened and Miss short skirt Millman appears floating in mid air; after various gyrations we discover that she owes her flotation to a wire which carries a pad she holds in her teeth. The rest of the performance is of the usual tight-wire walking kind, remarkable for the amazing energy and vitality of Miss short skirt Millman, who conveys the impression that she is thoroughly enjoying herself. She is the most sprightly and vivacious wire walker ever seen in London, I should think.

La Belle Tortajada is restored to us. She reappeared at the Palace this week and received a tempestuous welcome. As handsome as of yore, she dances no less wonderfully and, infected perhaps by the warmth of her reception, was on quite intimate terms with the audience. She has learned more English since we last saw her in England and is not unwilling to display her knowledge.

While writing of music hall entertainments it seems not out of place to remark on "La chasse de l'entente cordiale which is about to be given near Paris. A sort of artificial course with fences, etc., is being prepared near Versailles, with grand stands overlooking it: and here it is proposed to turn out bag foxes from the Ardennes and "hunt" them with hounds imported from this country! The Paris tailors are reported very busy making red coats and white leather breeches.

At Sotheby's on Saturday a number of Burns and Bret Harte Mss were sold: it is interesting to compare the prices. A Mss of "Scots wha hae" went for £355: and a batch of poems of less note on 11 quart pages brought £365. Three original Mss of Bret Harte brought respectively £17, £12 and £51.

Millicent Marsh, the servant girl on whose perjured evidence a youth was sentenced to imprisonment has escaped very lightly. It was assumed that she acted under influence and she was sent to a home instead of prison: one can only hope that the comforts of that home are of a drastic character.

Mrs. Jane Oakley, erstwhile so familiar as a contributor of verses to the advertisement columns of the Times, left about £22,000. The bulk of her estate goes to the Sussex Country Hospital.

Lord William Nevill was before the magistrate again on Wednesday. The only item of evidence worth noticing was the prosecutor's assurance to counsel that he would not have lent the defendant 300 guineas on the security of two fragments of coal: a statement which seems somewhat superfluous. Lord William stands committed to take his trial at the next North London Sessions, on bail as before. Defence reserved.

I doubt if it has ever occurred to anyone who occasionally buys a pack of cards, secondhand, at his club that he is breaking the law and that the seller incurs a penalty for each pack sold of £5. The secretary of a Dover Street club has found this out to his cost: he sold cards to a non-member who proved to be a revenue officer and was "run in": it cost him 10s per pack sold.

"Not if you wash your face," retorted the boy; and first blow was struck within one-third of a second.

TOM ROUSE'S BEAR.

"SPEAKING of bear," said Tom Rouse, as he raked a baked potato out of the hot ashes of the campfire, "reminds me of the little tussle we had with a big grizzly back in the sixties on the east side of the Tehachapi Mountains." Tom broke his potato in two, dug out the salt can from the camp mess and took a bite a little too big and so much too hot that he had to roll it about for some time before he dared to either chew or swallow it. When he at last succeeded in clearing his mouth, he exclaimed: "Gosh, boys, but that was hot, but no hotter than the time we had with that bear. Wait till I finish this spud and I'll tell you all about it."

Tom Rouse was an old hunter, and while sometimes the boys thought he "put a little too much risin' in his dough," they still knew that he had an enviable record as a bear hunter and carried a few unmistakable scars to bear mute witness to encounters a little too close for anyone with less courage than Tom was known to possess. The day's hunt had been very unsuccessful and accordingly the little group around the campfire was rather dull, so Tom's promise of a good bear story at once commanded attention; for they all knew that when Tom Rouse characterized an encounter as a "hot one" it was sure to be entertaining.

After Tom's baked potato was finally stowed away and his pipe lighted, he began:

"If any of you have hunted on the east side of old Tehachapi you'll remember the big rock cliffs, just where the wall was broken down with the earthquake of '51 and left those two big leaning rocks in the form of a tent. I wasn't there in '51 but I'm inclined to think that the Indians lied about the earthquake putting those rocks in that shape. My experience in San Francisco last spring was that earthquakes aren't particular about piling things up in a useful way, any more 'n a bronco mule is about what becomes of you after he had given you a broadside from his business end. My belief is that them rocks were put in that shape by the good Lord for the very purpose of saving Bill Piper's life. No earthquake could have made calculations on any such a race as Bill had, but the good Lord could, and I believe he did.

"Well there were three of us in the camp, and me and Lige Dickens had left Bill Piper to keep camp and had gone to look for bear. Lige had gone up on the ledge of rocks where he could look down while I took along the side of the mountain about fifty yards below. We had nearly reached the northern end of the ledge when I heard Lige whistle. I looked up to the top of the ledge and there was Lige waving his hand to me to go back as if he was in a big hurry about it. I stood still and listened and looked ahead of me but I could neither hear nor see anything, while all the time Lige was waving his hand frantically for me to fall back. But I was looking for bear, and if there were any of 'em near I didn't want to retreat without seeing 'em and at least getting a shot. The brush was pretty thick and about as high as my head so that I couldn't see more 'n ten or fifteen feet ahead of me, but I wasn't going to back out until I knew what was there. Lige was about sixty feet above me and some fifty yards away and was therefore looking down so he could see what was doing. At last when he saw that I wasn't going to retreat he called down: 'It's two big grizzlies—and they're not fifteen feet from you!'

"At the sound of Lige's voice I heard a snort and the breaking of brush right in front of me. I made a jump to get behind a clump of brush, but my foot caught in a vine or something of the kind and I was just falling beyond the brush when the end of the nose of one of the bears hit me in the side and knocked me clean out of his way and over against the dead branches of a fallen tree. May be you think I wasn't scared. Well, I was, but not half so much as that bear. The two of them had been waddling along leisurely up to the time Lige called to me. His voice scared them and they broke into a run, not knowing that I was right in front of 'em, so that when I tripped and fell before the leader just in time to be caught by his nose he didn't realize what he had run into, and hadn't time to stop to investigate, but went tearing through the brush, snorting at every jump. As soon as they had passed me, and before I had extricated myself from the dead tree and recovered my rifle, I heard Lige shoot. Our guns in those days were muzzle loaders and of course he had but the one shot and the bears went on.

"As soon as I had assured him that I was not hurt Lige began reloading, telling me not to follow them too close as I would have no show with them in such thick brush. After reloading he followed along the ledge, while I had no difficulty in following their trail from below, which was taking a direct course for our camp. Every minute or two I would look up to Lige—who was now keeping pretty well out of sight—for directions as to where and how far the bears were ahead of me. A grizzly never runs far at a time, when he does run; and he never runs when he thinks he is in close quarters and can see his adversary, and very seldom after he is wounded, unless it's after the fellow who did it, so I expected any moment to come on to them.

"When I had been so unceremoniously knocked out of the way I didn't have time to see how big the brute was but Lige said one of them was a monster, and this being the case I didn't propose to let him get away, so I kept following 'em up pretty close. We had got to within less than two hundred yards of the camp when Lige motioned that they were right in front of me. While I was working up cautiously Lige raised his rifle and fired. At the crack of his rifle I again heard the brush snapping and rushed up to get a shot at them myself. But the brush at this point was considerably higher than my head and quite thick, so it was difficult to see any distance at all. Lige motioned me to come up closer to the cliff. At the same time Bill Piper rushed out from the camp, calling to know what was up. Lige holloed to him to get back out of sight, that the bear was coming right toward him. Just at this the big fellow broke into the open where our camp was located, and seeing Bill made straight for him. Bill drew a bead on him and fired but failed to stop him. I tore through the brush as best I could and reached the open just in time to see Bill running around the rock tent with a fifteen hundred pound bere not more than ten feet behind him.

"The two leaning rocks that formed the tent were close up to the perpendicular ledge, and a lot of other rocks in falling had piled up between them so as to form a high connection with the ledge. Over this Bill came scrambling as fast as he could and down the side toward me with the bear too close a second for Bill's peace of mind. 'Go round again!' I holloed as I fired at the bear's throat over Bill's head. My shot hit him hard in the sticking place and he half rolled down to the level ground. As he recovered his feet and made after Bill I called to Lige to look out for him as he came over again, and drawing my revolver rushed up to close quarters. In less time than it takes to tell it I saw Bill coming over this course on the second lap. Lige had reached a point not more than ten feet from the hurdle over which they were coming and nearly above them, and I had gained a rock within six feet of the course. On account of the bear stumbling from my shot Bill had gained a lead of fully twenty feet, and the bear, weakened from the three good shots that were now in him, wasn't taking the hurdle as clean as he did on the first lap. As Bill came over I called to him saying: 'Keep it up Bill! If you gain as much the next lap as you have on this you'll have him by the tail.' As the bear appeared Lige caught him with a good shot from above in the neck, while I, reaching to within four feet of his ear, directed my fire for the brain and he went down like a felled ox, hitting the ground at the bottom of the rocks with such a thud that further shooting was unnecessary. Billy, however, had taken my advice and came over the hurdle for the third lap with such a rush that he almost landed on the dead bear, while Lige, from his perch on the cliff, called out: 'Bill wins in the third round; time one minute and twenty-seven seconds.'"

As Tom seemed to have finished his story and began raking in the ashes again, one of the boys asked:

"What became of the other bear?"

"Oh," said Tom, "the little fellow kept right on when the big one took after Bill. As soon as Bill had recovered his wind we all three took his trail and got him with less than half a mile of the camp. But that's another story," he said, as he raked another potato out of the fire, "and I'm not going to let this spud burn for the sake of a young grizzly that didn't weigh more'n five hundred pounds."—The Western Field.

Fishing.

DOWN BY THE OLD LOG POOL.

OH, I long for a waft of the woodland,
For a breath of the redwoods cool;
And the creek's soft, singing melody,
And the little wild birds twittering glee
Down by the old log pool.

Oh, I long to see the red sun rise
Over the green-topped hill;
And to hear echo back from each mountain wall
The far, faint tattoo of the quail's drum-call,
While all save the brook is still.

Oh, I long to wander, rod in hand,
When the rosy dawn is breaking;
And in the clear, blue sky above
With whistling, creaking wings, the dove
Her fieldward flight is taking.

Oh, I long to steal down stealthily
Where the oak upriven lies,
And where the murmuring ripples go
To the deep, dark silent pool below,
To cast my eager flies.

There's a flash and a dash, a scurry and splash,
And at my line a stout pull—
As, with leaping rainbowed body bare
There flashes an instant in the air
The king of the log pool!

He's off in a headlong, maddened rush—
I can feel the tough rod bend,
And the long, lithe body's frantic feel
At the spurring touch of the stinging steel,
And the high-pitched song of the skrieking reel,
As he breaks at the pool's far end.

He circles and doubles and dashes swift,
For the battle's not won yet;
And he still fights hard with a waning strength
Till I draw his gasping, supine length,
Half-struggling, to the net.

Others may sing of their shooting,
Of triumphs 'neath nature's rule—
But I long for a bout with a good old trout,
When the stout rod bends and the reel runs out,

ANCIENT AND MODERN ARCHERS.

The address of President Chase to the Massachusetts Rifle Association, is interesting and affords much food for reflection. The statement that the ancient armour preserved in Britain shows that we, of the present day, are larger than our ancestors were, has been clearly proved to be correct. During the preparations for the celebrated Eglinton tournament, held about seventy years ago, it was found that the old armour was too small for the chests and limbs of medium-sized men.

The largest suit of armour in the collection at the Tower of London is that which was worn by King Henry the VIII. It would fit a powerful man of the present average size, but could not be worn by any one who is now considered to be a large man.

I never heard before of the armour at an ancient town in England which Mr. Chase was informed can only be worn by ungrown boys in the annual processions.

Nearly all old armour will fit small and muscular men of to-day. The mere fact of our ancestors having been smaller than we are, would not, I think, prove that they were much, if any less strong. They had no newspapers and few books. Hardly any except priests could read. Tobacco had not been introduced, and there were very few indoor amusements. The men therefore, when not engaged in necessary work, would be impelled to amuse themselves with various out-door exercises and thus would become more powerful than those who now work in offices and factories, or spend their leisure in reading, smoking, and at billiard tables.

In judging the effects of ancient archery by what we see modern bowmen doing, great allowance should be made for the fact that our ancestors were constantly practicing from childhood until they were well advanced in life. The ancient laws of England obliged every yeoman to give each son, on attaining the age of seven years, a bow of his own height, and a new bow every year afterward until he was full grown. The most powerful men used yew bows six feet long, with arrows of three feet, called, in old writings, "cloth-yard shafts." The bowmen were compelled by law, to practise regularly on saints' days, and on Sundays after attending mass.

Therefore the muscles, specially engaged in archery, must have been developed to an extraordinary degree of power; and the yeomen would be able to use bows which far larger modern archers would be unable to draw.

In the reign of Henry the VIII an Act of Parliament was passed, forbiding men to shoot at the butts, which were erected, near evey village and town at any shorter range than forty rods. This shows that sending an arrow 220 yards was well within the power of the average bowman, and doubtless many could shoot to far greater distances. I doubt if many of even the most powerful modern archers could send an arrow 200 yards.

Mr. Nicholson states that when a youth attending college at Cambridge, he was passionately fond of archery, and practised until he was able to readily use a bow of ninety-five pound pull. Few of the strongest modern archers can draw a bow of more than fifty or sixty pound pull, Nicholson writes: "I Eventually found that a range of 400 yards could be attained and that at forty to fifty yards an arrow with a square pyramidal steel head could be sent through an iron spade."

As he mentions that when full grown he never weighed more than 164 pounds, it is fairly certain that the most powerful of the ancient archers could draw bows with which arrows could be sent fully 500 or 600 yards, and which would pierce armour at short ranges when the arrows did not strike so obliquely as to glance off.

The illustrations of the archery meeting in ARMS AND THE MAN represent the bowmen drawing the arrows to their breasts. This system has also become customary in England because a more accurate aim can be taken by holding the notch end of the arrow under the right eye; but our ancestors were taught to draw the string to the right ear, which enabled them to use longer arrows and thus increase the range.

As they shot in battle at masses of men and could see where the arrows fell the sacrifice of a little accuracy was not of much consequence. If any reliance can be placed on history, it is certain that the victories of Crecy, Poitiers, Agincourt, and Flodden were largely due to the shooting of the English archers.

I believe Mr. Chase to be mistaken in supposing that ·22 caliber rifles would have been more effective in battle than the ancient bows. The bullet of the ·22 long-rifle cartridge would have no effect in stopping a charge of cavalry cased in armour; but arrows with broad-barbed heads would penetrate with deadly effect into every exposed part of the horses. It is well known that Indians, when hunting the American bison, used frequently to send arrows completely through a full grown bull, with their short and comparatively feeble bows, and that an arrow penetrating deeply in almost any part of the body generally stopped an animal from moving, more quickly than a bullet, in consequence of the pain resulting from any further motion.

The absurd tales about the skill of the old archers in hitting small objects at long ranges, were doubtless due partly to the way in which the accounts of events become exaggerated when passing from one individual to another, partly to the fact (which applies equally to reflemen) that every one, who shoots for many years, occasionally makes extraordinary hits which men who know little about projectiles, think the marksman can repeat at will. Lastly and perhaps chiefly, these romances are due to the fact mentioned by President Chase, that people remember the few lucky hits and forget the multitude of misses.

In Ivanhoe, Robin Hood is described as splitting a peeled willow stick at 220 yards: and in The Pathfinder, three men in succession hit and nail on the head with rifle bullets at 100 yards. If any one of such feats were done once, it could probably not be repeated in a hundred subsequent attempts.

"Drink and the inadequate remuneration of female labour were among the causes cited as contributing to the downfall of many young girls at the forty-eighth annual meeting of the London Female Preventive and Reformatory Institution."

Really! What awful goings on at a respectable meeting!

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

Sir,—I have more than once criticized the unnecessarily heavy bullets adopted for sporting high velocity rifles, and pointed out that the Winchester Arms Company were proceeding on sound lines in using light projectiles for their new smokeless weapons. We now see a tendency among British gunmakers to increase velocities and lighten bullets. This policy has no doubt arisen in consequence of the success of the new German pointed bullet. The Germans have come to the conclusion that a very high muzzle velocity combined with a light bullet, offers superior advantages, from a military point of view, over the long heavy bullets and moderate velocities hitherto in vogue. The light bullet gives a considerably flatter trajectory than the heavy up to 1,000 yards, beyond this distance weight tells. The tactical superiority of the new ammunition over the decisive ranges is thought to very much more than compensate for the inevitable falling off at longer distances—with the sporting rifle there are no long ranges to consider, and a judicious lightening of the bullet, combined with a corresponding increase in the muzzle velocity tends to make the weapon enormously more effective for the special purpose for which it is intended.

Messrs. Holland have brought out a 200 grains bullet for the ·375 Holland Schoenauer rifle with which a muzzle velocity of nearly 2,400 feet per second is obtained. I do not, however, consider that such a moderate result can be described as altogether satisfactory, and I am of opinion that in this bore, with so light a bullet, a velocity of 2 700 feet per second or thereabouts should be aimed at. The chamber pressure is so moderate, under 14 tons per square inch, that it is evident the full capabilities of the ·375 have been by no means worked up. All who have used a Mannlicher, or Schoenauer Mannlicher on game at long ranges must have thoroughly grasped the immense advantages conferred by the high velocity. These rifles, however, use comparatively heavy bullets and therefore in weapons imitating Spitzer conditions, we may reasonably expect to see velocities still further enhanced and trajectories flattened. Messrs. Westley Richards have shown what very high velocities can be attained with rifles using the latest and most improved forms of smokeless powder. The latest modifications of cordite, and similar propellants, have tended to reduce the temperature of explosion and also chamber pressures. With our latest marks of 12 inch and 9·2 naval guns we are able to get nearer and nearer to the ideal velocity of 3,000 feet per second. The wear and tear on the gun with a velocity of 2,800 feet per second is no more now than it used to be with a muzzle velocity of 2,400 or thereabouts, using the older and hotter form of cordite. Heavy guns keep the same weight of projectile, so as not to diminish their penetration into armour, but with small arms bullet weight is being diminished so that taking this into account in addition to the improvements in powder, we ought to shortly see very high muzzle velocities arrived at without any excessive chamber pressure or wear on the barrel. The bullets of the ·405 and ·350 Winchester high velocity rifles are lighter in proportion than those of the ·303 British, ·276 Mauser and ·256 Mannlicher rifles, but nevertheless there is a margin for lightening them still further and so obtaining considerably higher velocities for the same chamber pressure. I should like to see the ·350 Winchester bullet reduced to 180 or 190 grains, with a muzzle velocity of 2,700 or 2,800 feet per second. This rifle and the ·405 also would be greatly improved if they could be produced with detachable barrels.

It is most necessary that one should be able to clean a modern sporting rifle from the breech with a rod. For this purpose there is nothing better than a wood covered steel rod, with a bristle brush over which has been placed a piece of soft rag well soaked in orite. The bristle head forces the cleaning rag well into the grooves, while it never sticke in the barrel. Pull-throughs to my mind are not to be compared with a cleaning rod furnished with a bristle head. The bristle brushes are quite cheap, and can be renewed at trifling cost, as soon as the bristle lose their stiffness and elasticity.

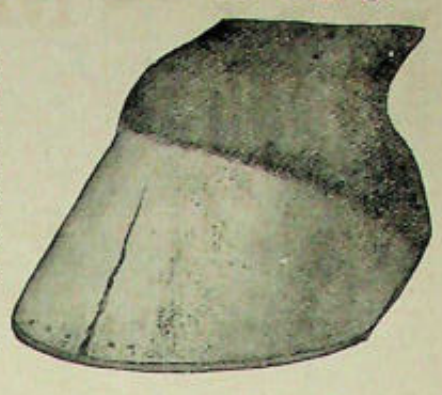
COMPLICATIONS.

Dear Sirs,—I beg to inform you that I tried your La Corniere on a carriage horse twenty years old, suffering from sunken sole, after lamanitis and extensive destruction of horn tissue, as the result of seedy toe. I find that a new growth of horn is appearing, both in the walls and the sole. This case was considered incurable.



Yours faithfully,
J. SUTCLIFFE HURNDALL, M.R.C.V.S., London.

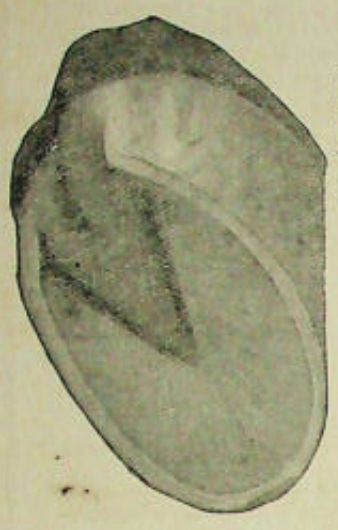
FEVERED FEET.

Dear Sir,—I have tried your La Corniere for a horse with bad feet, and my stud groom considers it very efficacious, and thinks that the use of it tended much to increase the growth of the hoof, and also to remove the fever in the forefeet to which the horse was subject.

Yours faithfully,
(Earl) HADDINGTON.

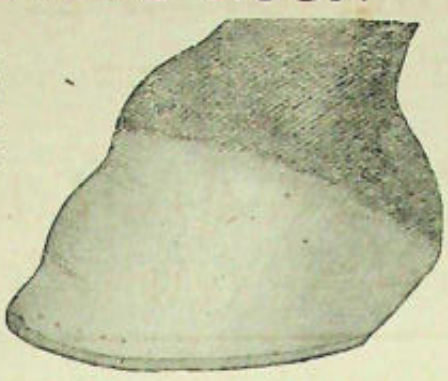


SAND CRACK.

Dear Sirs,—I had a valuable horse with both hind feet split right through the coronet. I had two staples across each foot, and rubbed the cornet with a stimulating ointment, but did not make much headway; but I am pleased to say that, under the treatment of La Corniere fresh horne is growing on the horse's hoof, which seems sound all round; one hoof is almost all right again.

Yours sincerely,
W. GRIFFITHS,
Alders End, Tarrington, Hereford.

EVERY AFFECTION OF THE HORSE'S HOOF.



CORNS.

Dear Sirs,—I have much pleasure in saying that your La Corniere has been a great success with my mare. When I wrote for a Jar she was so tender from two corns she could not bear them touched; but now they have nearly disappeared, and she is absolutely sound, and doing a lot of hunting.

Yours truly,
(Mrs.) R. S. BAGNALL.

Dear Sirs,—I have much pleasure in testifying to the good qualities of La Corniere for horse's hoofs. I have used it with great effect on a driving horse which had very bad contracted feet when I purchased him; but I am glad to state that your Ointment has made a wonderful change for the better.

PRESS OPINION.

"The Field."—Diseases of Horse's Hoofs.—"Any discovery which enables us to deal more effectually with diseases of the horn structures of the horse's foot will be welcomed, more especially by those who best know the difficulty of directing Nature's efforts to the reproduction of sound material in the place of diseased, which it has been necessary to remove. La Corniere appears to have this most valued quality in an usual degree, as veterinery surgeons have testified. Without such a horn producer, there is a natural fear of taking away too much "foot" and the consequence of such hesitancy is more or less failure to bring the selected medicament into contact with the whole of the diseased structure. The proprietors of the new remedy, very wisely, as we think, supply printed directions by an eminent veterinary doctor, recommending the removal of imperfect horn, even to the extent of scraping away a sandcrack "until the blood oozes." In this way, corns, sandcracks and other defects are cured by going to the origin of the trouble, and exciting a new secretion of sound horn, which shall not give way under similar strain to that which originally caused the malady. We have not seen it recommended for the treatment of those troublesome, indolent heel diseases in cattle, sometimes known as kibe, and variously described as foul of the foot, but have found it most useful in restoring a serviceable heel to stand upon, in place of the soft and tender substance which for so long hinders the subject of it from walking. Being a volatile substance of penetrative power, it is also a preparation which needs to be carefully closed when put away, or rapid deterioration results. It is to be obtained in London from LA CORNIERE, 83, Mansell Street, E., "Country Life," "Military Mail," etc.

"The Broad Arrow." "La Corniere" Hoof Ointment."—The preparation which, under the title "La Corniere," will come as a boon to horse-owners and all connected with the care of horses. It is claimed to be the best hoof ointment on the market, and is guaranteed to cure in a few days. Mr. Demuth has so much confidence in its efficacy that he undertakes to refund the cost to anyone giving it a trial where a cure is not effected. "La Corniere" is not only a speedy remedy for corns, sand cracks, contracted heels, speedy toe, shelly and fevered feet, and other affections of the horse's hoof, but it promotes a rapid re-growth of the horny substance, and is a most efficient preventative against future ailments. Although is has been for only 12 months on the English market it is already in much favour, and numerous testimonials have been received speaking highly of it success. In each of these, whether it be from titled owner, breeder, trainer, veterinary surgeon, private individual, cab proprietor, omnibus company or business firm, they are unanimous in its praise and request a further supply of the ointment. Some of the cures reported are certainly extraordinary, and in one instance the case had been pronounced incurable.

LINCOLN.

A WILD and stormy night did not hold out very pleasant prospects for the opening day of the flat racing season, on the 18th instant, and the wind blew with the force of a hurricane when the time came for a move to be made to the Carholme.

It was early evident that the attendance would not be above the ordinary Monday average; in fact, we have seen larger, especially amongst the holiday-makers. Several of our leading Turfites were in the club enclosure, and a few ladies braved the rigours of the day, while a pretty fair sprinkling of the business community occupied Tattersall's Ring. I append details of the principal items on the card.

Lincoln on a handicap morning reminds one very much of Doncaster on the Leger Day by reason of the strangers in its gates. It is a good-humoured though noisy crowd, and gives little trouble to the traffic managers, and shows in marked manner the appreciation in which sport is held up North. The wind was again strong, and the dust flew in clouds, but fortunately the blast came from the rear of the stand and down the course. It was evident that visitors had been keeping themselves in reserve, as the attendance, a good one all round, was nearly double that of Monday, the enclosures packed, and the holiday crowd extending on the far side up to the distance. The going has rarely been in such excellent condition. After the decision of the second race the whether changed, and a heavy cold rain fell as visitors congregated in the paddock to scan the handicap runners, a cruel bit of fate, still the rain laid the dust, and did the course no harm.

For the Lincoln Handicap the field was the same strength as last year, viz., 24, and a rush was made to look them over. The favourite was late on the scene, as his apricot cloth was not taken off till the last, his trainer keeping him walking in the shed out of the wet, but as far as could be seen he was in perfect fettle. One of the best trained of the lot was the light chesnut, Wild Aster, as hard as pinwire, clean of limb, and on his toes. Catty Crag has grown into a massive horse ; Crescent and Roseate Dawn, two bright bays, looked as fit as fiddles, with the defined quarter-mark that was lacking in so many of the competitors, owing to the hard winter. Bill of the Play was one of the most muscular of the lot, and the compact Kaffir Chief lacked little in condition. Sarcelle had a varminty appearance, but Camisard was sweating profusely. Ob struck me as a bit lusty, and by no means a taking horse, nor fit as last year. Watson had put a good polish on Minos, and Japan did justice to his preparation. Details of the important races.

(Winner bred and trained in France.)

BETTING : 9 to 4 agst. His Eminence, 6 to 1 Bill of the Play, 10 to 1 Crescent, 100 to 8 Athi, 100 to 7 each Roseate Dawn, Camisard and Kaffir Chief, 20 to 1 each Japan, Minos and Crusader, 25 to 1 Ob, 33 to 1 each Sarcelle, Rifleite, Wild Aster and Lovania, 50 to 1 others.

There was no special place betting.

Rifleite and Japan left the paddock for the post some quarter of an hour before the others having been given special permission to miss the preliminaries. The others paraded in the order on the card. Bill of the Play, very much on his toes, was led by an attendant in a chifney. Athi was the only one allowed to stride out on his way postwards, and gained additional friends from the style he went. On reaching the starting-post, Bill of the Play fairly scattered his opponents lashing out right and left, and kicking Dumbarton Castle and Sarcelle. Monkshead was another who joined in the mêlee, and it was just on half an hour late when the flag at length fell, the light, owing to heavy rain, being very bad. Bill of the Play ran into his stride at once. but Sarcelle backed into Roseate Dawn, causing Minos to whip round. Another to suffer in a straggling start was Crescent, but it was partly his own fault, as he was slow to get going. Bill of the Play nipped away with a good two lengths lead of Rifleite, whilst Velocity was as smart to strike off as anything. Ob, towards the left, was at once in his stride, and headed Kaffir Chief and His Eminence, whilst the hurdler, Wild Aster, went the pace as well as Athi, the latter being on the stand side, well clear of Crusader and Camisard. Then at an interval came Truffle de Perigord and Athleague, Kolo, outpaced, being among the rear rank, who were in straggling order. Bill of the Play had expended his dash after going three furlongs and here Rifleite was left in front of Ob, Kaffir Chief and Athi, whilst His Eminence thus early in the race was hanging on his bit and Velocity soon passed him. In fact, His Eminence and Bill of the Play were the first beaten, and half way Rifleite was still in command, with Ob, Athi and Kaffir Chief as his nearest attendants. Soon afterwards Athi tacked from the stand side towards the left, and he and the leader slightly interfered with each other, and at this point, two furlongs from home, Ob shot out from his field with a terrific burst of speed, and the race was as good as over, Stern sitting still and passing the post five lengths in front of Kaffir Chief. Rifleite, three lengths away, was third. Crescent running on after a slow beginning, was fourth a length away. Dumbarton Castle (kicked at the post) was fifth, Athi (easing up) sixth, Truffle de Perigord (ridden out) seventh, Bill of the Play a bad eighth, Wild Aster (running on) ninth, Camisard tenth, His Eminence eleventh, Velocity (ran well) twelvth, Japan thirteenth, Lustleigh fourteeth, and the rest whipped in by Athleague. Time—1min. 45⅕secs.

Thanks to Tuesday's downpour, all traces of dust had departed, and everything looked bright and cheerful in the glorious sunshine. The wind had abated little of its violence, but no longer dust-laden, had an invigorating rather than an exasperating effect, while the going was grand. Considering how many people had gone home wet and dispirited after the French triumph on Tuesday, the attendance was a good one for the closing day, many of the club members sticking to their guns, and a fair attendance filling Tattersall's and the further enclosure. LIVERPOOL.

Liverpool was highly honoured yesterday, for H. R. H. the Prince of Wales, who generally confines his racing visits to Epsom, Ascot, and Goodwood, was among the guests at Knowsley, and his presence attracted a very large and brilliant company to Aintree, the country turning out its rank, beauty, and fashion to meet the Royal Visitor. It was Royal weather, too, a pleasant westerly breeze replacing the cold gales of Lincoln, while glorious sunshine sent the temperature up to summer heat. All round the attendance was one of the largest seen here on a first day.

A rousing cheer greeted the Prince's arrival at the Royal Box, over whose entrance the Prince of Wale's feathers in light blue and silver were draped in Royal purple, which, with gold edgings also embellished the stand. The executive have put a charge of admission of 6d. on their piece of land, which is enclosed with iron rails between Beecher's and Valentine's Brooks, cutting the course across, and the holiday people seemed to take kindly to the innovation. The going was in tip-top condition, and racing up to the high standard expected here—a grand afternoon all round.

Considering the value of the Union Jack Stakes, the field was a small one. Glacis had run third to Persinus and Bridge of Canny in a trial, and had just the preference over Freeborn, reported a much improved colt, and Stick Up in the wagering. The race was a turn up for Auber, who started last season with a run of victories, and at the December sales at Newmarket changed hands for 2,000guineas to the Hon'ble Mr. A. A. Apcar, the owner of Great Scot. He was certainly the best trained and best looking, though worst fancied of the lot, and after breaking the tape to begin with, he, in the hands of Lyne, made all the running. Prince of Orange coming at the finish beat Freeborn for the 100 sovs. accruing to second place. Auber is evidently at his best in the spring, and his new proprietor can congratulate himself on a good bargain.

The executive could not but be satisfied with the success attending on the Spring Cup, as Velocity was the only absentee. The best looking of the sixteen was Bridge of Canny, who has thickened into a grand horse, while Manaton and Goring Heath are also as fine specimens of the British thoroughbred as one could wish to see. In the parade Birdcraft refused to join, evidently not liking the crowd, and tried to kick his jockey off, and led to the post, he turned when the flag fell, while Monkshead and Goring Heath also lost a lot of start, a fact that undoubtedly lost the latter a place. Succour, who had a 4lb. pull in the weight scale with Cadwal, had been specially prepared for this event, and looking very fit, he started a pronounced favourite, Bridge of Canny coming next on the same mark as Turbine, and the big bay amply atoned for the defeat of Glacis. Rounding the Canal turn Auber came clear of Stick Up, Glacis, Prince of Orange, and Freeborn. Half-way up the straight Prince of Orange ran into second place, slightly in advance of Freeborn, but neither had any chance with Auber, who led all the way and won in a common canter by two lengths; a head between second and third. Glacis (ran well for seven furlongs) was fourth, Stick Up fifth, and Gortshalgan last. Time—1min. 47secs.

FOOTBALL.

UNDER ASSOCIATION RULES.

SCOTLAND vs. IRELAND.—The twenty-fourth match between Scotland and Ireland was played at Celtic Park, Glasgow, on Saturday. The conditions at the start were almost perfect, the ground being very fast and wind almost entirely absent. Losing the toss, Ireland started. Their left wing made a promising beginning. Young showing Jackson a clean pair of heels, and with the game in its infancy the visiting nation should have been a goal up. Muir rushed out to make amends for a faulty clearance by Agnew, and, missing the ball, it went straight to Maxwell, who with a tenantless goal shot recklessly wide. Following this escape Scotland took the game in hand. Twice Bennett sent over centres, but Scott came out and cleared cleverly, while the custodian in addition stopped a fine attempt by Somers. Playing very close football, the Scots still pressed, but without success, their shooting being badly at fault.

Young once more changed the scene of operations, and as an individual effort his run and finish was not beaten in the game. He tricked Thomson, beat Jackson, and wound up with a fast angular shot, which Muir just got at and placed past the post. Key was conspicuous with pretty feeding of Bennett, whose shot, however, was marvellously saved by Scott, who just beat O'Rourke by inches. Somers retired with a strained muscle, and the Scottish forwards, never very happy, went from bad to worse. This was Ireland's opportunity, and only perfect saving by Muir kept them from scoring. The custodian was handicapped by the uncertain kicking and tackling of his backs, but he never made a mistake, all manner of shots coming alike to him. Twice he cleared well-placed corners, and a terrific drive from Connor was coolly dealt with. After thirty minutes' play O'Rourke, after missing a centre from Fraser, got his foot on one from Bennett. Scott pluckily threw himself at ball and foot, but could not prevent O'Rourke scorning, and received a bad kick on the hip in the attempt, the game having to be stopped until the goalkeeper was attended to. Even play characterised the remainder of this half, Thomson on the one side, and McCartney on the other, doing good defensive work. Scotland led at half-time by 1 goal to 0.

Rain fell when the second half started, and continued until the finish. The result was that the nature of the ground changed, and the slower conditions were quite to the liking of the Scots, whose lack of speed on the fast surface had been very pronounced. They played a very much improved game forward, particularly on the right wing, where the diminutive Key was placing to Bennett and Walker like a machine. Scott cleared one shot from Walker, Willis turned aside another from O'Rourke, but after ten minutes' play Walker headed a second goal from an accurate corner kick of Bennett's.

This further reverse had no depressing effect on the Irishmen, who continued to play delightful football in midfield without meeting with any success at goal. A high shot from Blair brought a corner, off which O'Hagan had Muir at full stretch to save a hard grounder; while immediately after a pretty run by the inside forwards was finished by Maxwell shooting straight into Muir's hands. This disposed of, Scotland again attacked, and Thomson, from well out, had two well-directed drives saved by Scott. Neat work by McNair put O'Rourke in possession, and dashing between the backs, the centre looked like scoring when Wilils threw him heavily inside the penalty area. A penalty kick was granted, from which Thomson scored a third goal. Scott, who was evidently suffering from his injury, then left the field, and Willis went into goal.

Ireland, playing the one-back game, had most of the play subsequently, but although their forwards continued to play neater football than the opposition, they were unlucky in finding Muir always on the spot. The finish came with McNair dribbling through the defence and shooting straight into the hands of Willis. Result:—

The result illustrates how little good play in the outfield counts if it is not finished by accurate shooting. Ireland had if anything more of the attack than their opponents, but in finishing they either shoot recklessly or straight at Muir. The game was really won by Scotland's half-backs, who as a trio were ahead of the Irish middle line, and who had in Thomson the outstanding personality on the field. The centre half was good alike in defence and attack, and one distinct feature was his judgment in going through himself for a try at goal. Muir covered himself with distinction in the early stages when the shots he saved had some sting about, and were well placed, but subsequently he had the unusual experience for a goalkeeper of having the ball invariably sent straight at him. Jackson and Agnew were good and bad by turns, and never wholly reliable. Key was at his best when co-operating with his forwards, while McNair was under club form. The forward line can be written down as a failure. They were certainly handicapped by the absence of Somers, for seventy-five minutes, but even making allowance for this they were disappointing. Bennett and Walker in the second half brightened up, Fraser was feeble all through and O'Rourke, though willing, was not class.

Scot kept a grand goal for Ireland, his saving being often done at much personal risk, and he was ably seconded by McCartney and Willis, the former back being easily the finest of the quartette playing. Connor alone touched International standard at half. Forward all were clever, but Young and Blair were extremely smart. The inside men showed delightful footwork, but were lacking in steadiness in the goalmouth. To this may be put down Ireland's defeat by a score which altogether misrepresents the play.

It was never a great game in the best sense of the word, but it was always fast, and spasmodically brilliant. The money drawn amounted to £705, the turnstiles showing an attendance of 25,000 in round figures. It may be noted the referee by some mistake only played forty minutes in the second half.

Scotland.—Muir (Dundee); Jackson (St. Mirren) and Agnew (Kilmarnock); Key (Queen's Park), Thomson (Hearts), and McNair (Celtic), Walker (Hearts), O,Rourke (Airdrieonians), Somers (Celtic), and Fraser (Dundee).

Ireland.—Scott (Everton); Willis (Linfield) and McCartney (Belfast Celtic); Wright (Cliftonville); Blair (Cliftonville), Maxwell (Belfast Celtic), Maguire (Distillery), O'Hagan (Aberdeen), and Young (Linfield).

Referee.—Mr. Lewis (Blackburn).

The meeting of Clapton and the Casuals in the Isthmian League, at the Spotted Dog, provided a capital game, and the teams were so well matched that honours were even at the finish. UNDER RUGBY RULES.

SCOTLAND vs. ENGLAND.—The apex of the international Rugby championship of 1907 was reached on Saturday at the Rectory Field, Blackheath, where the chosen representatives of England and Scotland met for the thirty-fourth time. There existed little doubt prior to the gathering on the point of issue, and the result was quite in accordance with expectations, the Scotsmen achieving one more triumph, and regaining, by the victory, possession of the Calcutta Cup. But by the victory Scotland put a magnificent coping-stone to the year's football, and established a new record in the world of Rugby football.

Scotland won the toss, and Munro elected to take advantage of the strong wind, which, although blowing in a slanting direction, was favourable to the side playing from the pavilion end. E. W. Roberts kicked off for England. The oval found touch at the Scottish "25," but almost directly the position of play was in close proximity to the centre line. Here a little scramble ensued, but a smart pick-up by Start enabled him to get away in the direction of the Scottish lines. McLeod, however, was not slow to get on the track of the Devon half, and before the latter could get thoroughly into his stride the Cantab had his adversary outstretched. Off-side against Scotland further increased the English chances, which were considerably enhanced when Schulze failed to gather the ball when in a comfortable position. McLeod came to the rescue of his countrymen, and, getting in a lengthy punt, the ball, by the aid of the strong breeze, travelled well down the field. Gathering well and making off at top speed, Jackett brought off a pretty piece of play, and mainly through his efforts England were enabled to make a thrilling rush on the Scottish goal-line. E. W. Roberts, Mills, and Kelly were at the head of affairs, and at every second an English success seemed imminent. Just when the big Devonians were on the point of sweeping the ball over the line, McLeod dashed in, and with the assistance of Munro split up the movement, and sent the oval well out of danger. It was a lucky escape for Scotland, but the manner in which they cleared their lines was deserving of all praise. Simson was prominent in a subsequent movement, but getting knocked out of his stride, he failed to cause much anxiety to the home defence. Meeting the ball in characteristic fashion, Birkett elicited considerable applause by the manner he gathered the ball and sent it into Scottish ground.

For the first time in the game Scotland's three-quarters got into action, but the oval, after travelling right along the line, was finally handed to McGregor, who was quickly smothered. A little later the same player got in a lofty punt, and Sloan, racing on, made his mark quite close to the mid-field line. An attempt was made to land a goal, but the squally nature of the breeze made accurate kicking an impossibility. Up to this point the struggle had been a determined one, and the respective sides had succeeded in their object of keeping the game very close. Getting away in a fine dribble, England looked like causing further trouble to the opposing defence, but off-side drew them up.

From the resultant penalty-kick Macleod made a magnificent attempt to land a goal, his kick from the other side of the centre line hitting the left post and rebounding into play. It was a very lucky escape for England, and they had scarcely time to draw their breath when Macleod again failed by a few feet to gain a score. When things were looking anything but bright for the representatives of the Rose their forwards got away. They kept the game going just in the way they were expected, with their superabundance of weight, and carried the ball to the stand corner of the Scotch line. The English spectators were intensely delighted with this sudden change in the aspect of affairs, but they had only momentarily congratulated themselves when Macleod, getting possession, came away in magnificent style. He ran to over the centre, and then got in a "drop," hoping to outdistance his English attendants. Jackett, however, had a yard or two start of the Cambridge flier, and as Macleod had to get into his stride, after dropping the ball, the Cornwall back was able to reach the leather as it bounded across his line. The way in which the game had swept in a couple of minutes from one end of the field to the other was of an exhilarating nature.

From the drop-out play hung a few seconds in the region of midfield, and here the heavy scrummaging work of the Saxon forwards told. Another long drop by McGregor this time sent the ball over the English line, the wind, of course, playing a very great part in the repeated touch downs of England. From any part of the centre it was pretty-certain that a high drop would carry on the breeze to the dead-ball line. However, on the next drop out there was some scrummaging, and then Shewring darted away, but he was finally brought down by Purves. Play now brightened up considerably, and both Macleod and Sloan had capital runs, which kept the game effectually in English soil. A mark by Macleod gave Scotland another chance, but it was quite impossible to gauge the fluctuations of the wind, and the leather once more was carried very wide of the uprights.

A straggling English forward rush relieved the run of Scotch progression, and Mills did something to justify Devon County's big representation by some clever leading. Not for long did play remain in the Scottish division; the wind was too great a factor, and Munro, getting in a mighty punt, put the Thistle again in the happy position of pressing.

The game, it must be said, up to this point had been anything but attractive; no doubt the wind was a serious factor, but the half-hour which had gone was distinctly the poorest half-hour of any international played this season. As time ran on, and no Scottish score looked probable, the enthusiasts from the North began to grow anxious, and it was quite apparent that the home pack was giving a good deal more than it got. Peters, who was working the scrum, got the ball out to his men more often than did Simson. Offside against the little dark Devonian let Scotland obtain a free-kick, but Munro put too much screw on the ball, and it carried into touch a little distance off. Some mauling was subsequently engaged in at midfield, and smart pick-up by Munro as the ball came out on the blind side of the scrum let the visitors away in a passing run. Newton and Start were successful in their spoiling tactics, and another series of scrums took place near the centre line. A bout of passing between Peters, Start, and Birkett took play to the Scottish twenty-five, and it was with the greatest difficulty England were kept at bay. The Englishmen made a stubborn effort to get over, and a score was hopefully looked for, when Sivright, Geddes, and Frew took the ball at their feet to midfield. It was a characteristic Scottish rush, and it was only the sterling spoiling tactics of the English "threes" that prevented Scotland from obtaining points. The battle was being fiercely waged at the centre line when the interval arrived, there being no score. Half-time:—

During the interval the prospects of England were favourably discussed, and to cross over with a clean sheet in such a wind was certainly quite creditable. The second half, however, opened in somewhat sensational style, the Scotsmen setting to their work in characteristic fashion. Following some captal play by the forwards, McGregor had a dodging run. He was just held outside, and then Macleod was all but in. For a moment or two the game was in front of the English posts, but a high kick turned the issue in other directions. A bad fumble by McGregor caused a complete change, and a drop at goal was a rather weak affair, the ball running dead. From the drop-out Mills was at fault, but Sivright led the Scottish forwards in thrilling fashion towards Jackett. It looked certain for a score, but off-side pulled the Scots up. The immediately succeeding work was full of exciting incidents. On one occasion Munro came round the English forwards, and, passing on to Purves, the latter transferred to Sloan, who was pulled into touch. A long drop by McGregor sent Scotland further afield, and the play was running in a groove wellwishers of the predominant partner had calculated.

Solid work brought England to the centre, and here Simson, getting the ball out beautifully, made off in a single-handed effort. Wilson, Jackett, and Birkett crossed over to meet him, and when on the point of being tackled the Scotsman punted over the heads of his opponents in the direction of the uprights. Before the Englishmen had time to gather themselves, Simson was again on the ball, and in the next moment he was over the English line. It was a most adroit movement, and earned the enthusiastic plaudits of the crowd. "No charge given as Geddes was about to kick, but this did not assist the Watsonian to produce the major points.

WILKINSON'S SAFETY RAZORS.

A Safety Razor which all users pronounce perfect.

The high reputation enjoyed by the Wilkinson Sword Company is sufficient guarantee that the quality of this shaver is of the highest grade.

It differs from other shavers, because instead of the old fashioned fence or comb protecting the face from the cutting edge, and which has always been the great objection to Safety Razors, a deep cut helical roller has been substituted. As this rolls, the lather and hair pass between the projecting screw threads, and all parts of the cutting edge are brought into action. This gives even wear along the whole cutting edge and feeds the lather on to it.

MADRAS.

This turn of affairs was quite sensational, but on the play it had been more than deserved, for Scotland had unquestionably all the best of things during the quarter of an hour of the second half which had passed. The drop-out brought England no relief, and it was quite apparent that the Scotsmen were playing with very much more purpose against the elements than with them. Twice afterwards the home nation found themselves hard pressed, once from Munro's kick, and another time when that player, intercepting, passed to MacGregor, who was only brought down in front of the English posts. Gradually play was forced to mid-field, where the forwards, keeping the ball closely at their feet, disputed supremacy for a little. The Scottish three-quarters, particularly Macleod, tried their hardest to open out the game, and a long pass from the Cantab to Purves was the means of putting the Scotch pack once again on the move. Spiers and McCallum led the attack, and so hard pressed was Jackett that he had to touch down in defence. Following the drop-out, England tried hard to drive their opponents back, but their efforts seemed unavailing, for Sivright, who had played a splendid game, outmanœuvred the opposition, and made off all alone. It was left to Birkett to bring him down, and with Jackett also coming to the rescue, a possible score was averted. Jackett was in exceptionally fine form, and on every occasion he field the ball he always got good length when finding touch.

Twenty-five minutes of the second half had now gone, and Scotland, although only 3 points to the good, were all over their opponents. E. W. Roberts imparted some confidence into his forwards by a rousing kick fully half the length of the field, and Slocock and Green were not slow to follow up. Schulze, who had been practically idle so far, did not enhance his reputation in fielding the ball, and fumbling badly, he let the Devon forwards down on him. However, Purves grasped the ball at a critical stage, and worming his way through, carried into touch at his own twenty-five.

A united effort on the part of the Scottish pack led to the swamping of England. The English three-quarters were unable to get a hold of the ball, which was sent over the home line, and struck Jackett's boot in its progress. Purves had a clear opening, and being unmarked, the London Scot experienced no difficulty in gaining the touch. With the place quite close to the posts, Geddes made no mistake in majorising.

Victory for the Thistle now seemed assured, but it was exhilarating to find England, true to their traditions, rising to the occasion in a remarkable manner. For a moment or two the game was disputed at the centre flag, but picking up smartly on the blind side of the scrum, Peters let Start away.

The ball travelled with great rapidity from one player to another, and finally, after the English pack had swept the ball right up to the Scottish posts, Peters gained possession and darted over. It was a splendid effort on the part of Peters, and, needless to say, vociferous cheering greeted his success. E. W. Roberts took the kick, but he failed to gauge the strength of the breeze and his kick went very wide of the mark. Time immediately afterwards arrived, Scotland being winners of a very stubborn game. ROWING.

THE 'VARSITY BOAT RACE.

The success of Cambridge in this year's inter-'Varsity Boat Race was as pronounced as their most ardent supporters could have wished. They practically led from the first two or three strokes, and the result was never in doubt.

The weather was threating at Putney in the morning, and there was a strong S. W. wind blowing, which meant an advantage of about two lengths over the full course to the surrey station boat, but the conditions were not so bad for rowing except between the bottom of Chiswick Eyot and Barnes Bridge. Set for three o'clock in the afternoon, the race did not promise to prove such an attraction as usual, judging by the early attendance. At twelve o'clock the towpath at Putney presented a deserted appearance compared with what it has been during the last fortnight, but at that time both the crews had finished a light practice to test oars and stretchers, so that there was nothing much to see. Later on, however, people began to put in an appearance very quickly, and there was the usual big gathering of Old Blues and rowing men at the Leander Club and the London R. C. Boat-houses. During the actual race it was evident that the crowd on the banks was exceptionally large, extending as it did all the way from Putney to Mortlake, but the craft on the river seemed fewer than usual.

The wind maintained its strength throughout the afternoon, but the flood tide came up to its time, and at three o'clock, the hour fixed for the start, there was plenty of water and a good current. Oxford as the challengers brought out their boat from the London R. C. boat-house a few minutes before 3 P.M President Bucknall had won the toss for choice of stations, and naturally choose the Surrey side, as the wind was off the Surrey bank right up to the Ranelagh Bight; fair into Hammersmith; but foul from the Doves to Barnes Bridge, with favourable conditions to the finish. Cambridge were not long in following, and it was barely five minutes past three o'clock when Mr. F. I. Pitman, who acted as starter and umpire from the steam launch Maritana, gave the signal to start.

Both sets of oarsemen rowed 21 strokes in the first half-minute and 39 in the full, but the difference in the pace of the two boats was most marked. The Cantabs went into the lead immediately, and were half a length ahead off the Duke's Head. This advantage had been increased to three-quarters of a length at the London R.C. Flagstaff, while at the Thames R.C. the Light Blues were just clear. The leaders had settled down to a steady 33 to the minute, and were moving along very smartly as they passed Craven Steps in 2min. 10sec. from the start. It was smooth water Crab Tree Reach, and Oxford made great efforts to close with the leaders, but were quite unequal to the task, as Cambridge reached the mile post in 4 min. 1 sec., with over two lengths' lead. This they continued to improve upon to Hammersmith Bridge, which was breasted by the Light Blues in the fast time of 7min. 15sec., only 5sec. outside the record. Oxford now found some help from the Surrey station, and decreased the lead of their opponents somewhat between Hammersmith and the Doves, but rounding the bend into Chiswick Reach, Cambridge went ahead again, and took their opponents' water to get the shelter of the Surrey Bank. They were able to hold the position easily, and led by three lengths at Chiswick Church. Time, 12min. 4 secs.

Rough water had then been encountered, but it was rougher still above Thorneycroft's. Cambridge's coxswain sought the shelter of the Duke's Meadows, where the river was much smoother, but Oxford rowed gamely into the rough stuff and shipped a lot of water, which had a palpable effect on their pace. Both crews shot for the centre arch of Barnes Bridge at a sharp angle, Cambridge from the Middlesex side and Oxford from the Surrey. At that point Cambridge were five or six lengths in front, and the time was 16min. 59sec. Oxford were still rowing gamely, but they were altogether outpaced, and without unduly distressing themselves the Light Blues finished the course in 20min. 25sec. (by Benson's chronograph), winning the race by four and a half lengths—the official verdict of Mr. Fred Fenner, of the London R. C., who again acted as distance judge.

There was a lot of enthusiasm shown by the spectators all the way up the course, and the winners had a great ovation at the finish. Both crews paddled their boats to the Ibis R. C., at Strand-on-the-Green, where they dressed, returning to Putney by steam launch.

The result was in every way predicted by the market, as Cambridge were always favourites, and the price at the start was 5 to 1 on them.

Oxford deserve the credit of rowing a very plucky and stern chase, and their experience should bear good fruit in the future, as they are mostly a young crew.

There has been much comment on the style and pace of the Cantabs, but on their rowing to Hammersmith the crew would prove a record-breaking combination on a favourable day.

The following table shows the positions of the crews at various well-known points on the course:—

Duke's Head.—Cambridge led by half a length.

London R.C. Flagstaff.—Cambridge led by three quarters of a length.

Thames R.C.—Cambridge just clear.

ATHLETICS.

R.M.C. ATHLETIC SPORTS.—Some fine performances were made at the annual sports of the R.M.C., Sandhurst, on Friday and Saturday last in spite of the very bad conditions under which the meeting was held. The weather on the first day was very wet, and there was a rather strong wind, but on Saturday the conditions were even worse, the wind being very rough. The mile and two miles produced some fine running, the feature being the performances of Cadet B.C.O.T. Paget, who won both events. In the two miles he had the fine time of 10 min. 34 4-5 sec., and made a remarkable sprint at the close, winning by twenty-five yards. Sergt. Messum also performed well, winning the jump, 100 yards, and coming second in the long jump. He had the misfortune in the hurdle race, for which he was hot favourite, to fall at the last hurdle, when well in front. Details:—

BILLIARDS.

A FEW NOTES.—A general all-round improvement in the quantity and quality of the breaks compiled last week as compared with the one immediately preceding it is to be noted. Tom Reece's 1,825, of course, occupies the chief place of honour, but without this marvellous break his return for the week would have indeed been a poor one, his next best effort being below the second century. In pleasing contrast was his rival's work in this direction, twenty-one three-figure efforts giving Inman the excellent total of forty-three for the whole match. This was a record fortnight for the Richmondite, and well worthy of a line to itself. He exceeded the single century twenty-eight times, the double century twelve, the third century twice, and the fourth once, the latter occasion marking the creation of a new individual record, viz., 476. Altogether Inman aggregated 7,997 out of a total of 16,000 points by means of his century efforts—a wonderful performance, and one which will send him on his way round the world with a light heart.

Of the others, Dawson did by far the best, and he is to be congratulated on making an upwards move on the table which denotes "brilliance of execution." A few repetitions of his great show at Huddersfield—how appropriate he should choose his native town for his revival of form—and he will go still higher. That 590 (undinished) must have been an eye-opener to Lovejoy.

In the "Record of Matches" table, the most notable feature is the "fall" of Reece from fourth to eleventh position—owing to the extraordinary severity of his defeat at the hands of his rival. Apart from this, there are no special "changes" to note from the positions occupied the previous week.

Pigsticking.

THE GUJARAT CUP 1907.

This meeting was held as usual at Easter, the headquarter camp was pitched at Dholka in and around the District Officer's rest-house, a very fine building kindly placed at the disposal of the committee by the Collector. Dholka is about 25 miles from Ahmedabad on the narrow gauge railway and so is admirably situated for getting in supplies, horses and competitors, and the hundred and one things necessary for a big camp.

This year the entries were quite up to the average, three ladies braved the heat and gallantly rode from morning to night every day, with such an example set no mere man could feel lazy or at any rate could not show it. About thirty-five competitors and nearly 100 horses made things fairly lively, and contractors must have made quite a nice pile. A meet like this ought to be welcomed by natives, as a very large sum is spent on beaters, grass, grain, and supplies generally.

The Bombay-Baroda and Central India Railway as usual most sportingly and generously gave concessions to competitors and their horses and made things as easy and comfortable as possible for everyone. More power to them!

It was a subject for general regret that none from the north of India came down. Neither did Mhow send a single representative. The clashing of the Kadir Cup fixture was largely responsible for this, but one would expect a station like Mhow with several mounted units to be more sporting, one can say the amounts offered, viz., Rs. 2,000 in solid cash and a challenge cup value Rs. 750 is insufficient attraction.

It is not possible to hold the Gujarat Cup at any time but Easter; it suits the Bombay men, and has been the date selected for many years, all know this and make their arrangements accordingly. It is greatly to be hoped that in future years the Kadir Cup executive will bear this in mind and if fixtures in those parts admit arrange their date so as to allow of a clear three weeks between the two pigsticking events.

Perhaps a few words on the horses and ponies may be of interest. All who rode in the Tully Cup were walers and with one exception thoroughbred with at least one good race to their credit, never before had such a good lot faced the starter. Kingfisher, awinner of a Bombay Hunt Cup and a previous Tully Cup now added a second win by just getting home from Neptune, who has a record of one win and two seconds out of three starts in Bombay. Sloth, a winner of a £300 steeplechase in Australia, ran well, as he was bound to do the fact that he and Neptune ran the wrong side of a flag dettracted nothing from this performance, as if anything they went further. Merman and Curlew are also grand horses, the former having just run second in the Bombay Hunters' Flat Race.

Among the ponies result stood out preminently and beat all the horses in the Gujarat Cup. A thoroughbred South African his like is hard to meet, he is the winner of many races where he was bred. Akbar Khan, a grand representative from Arabia, just failed to add another win to his score in the Pony Cup which was annexed by Gaiety, a waler who was in receipt of quite four stone from all the others, helped by the light weight of his rider who rode about 8 stone. This pony was impossible to beat and in addition his rider also annexed the Salmon Challenge Cup.

The country-bred pony point-to-point was an innovation this year, got up primarily to encourage men who cannot afford expensive ponies to come to the meeting. It proved popular and filled easily. Bulbul was the fittest and came in first, but with Derry, who is ashapely pony, but unfit, was disqualified for going the wrong side of a flag, thus Yellow Hammer, a Kathiawar pony, won pretty easily, not a bad performance as he was carrying 12 stone, the remaining two were beat to the world, but were placed second and third.

It will be noticed that there were many disqualified in these point-to-point races; this unfortunately always seems a feature of the Gujart Cup meeting. Year after year it occurs and seems difficult to remedy if one may judge by results. Directions are frequently too intricate; this year they consisted of "leave so and so on your left and when you get to such and such a place leave it on your right." perfectly plain no doubt when you are cool and collected in a chair, but most confusing when galloping hard with an eye on the other competitors. If it can be remedied it ought to be, as nothing disgusts men more than to gallop a good horse pretty nearly over two or three miles of stiff country and win perhaps or get placed and then be told he has had some rotten little rag of a flag or a tree on his wrong side.

In the Gujarat Cup itself this year the ponies and smaller horses had it pretty nearly their own way. Medlicott, O. Symons and Sardar Singh of Shapura, all rode ponies and were all in the final or semi-finals in the close country of Dholka; they turned and twisted after the pig in a way that generally left the big horses in the rear. Of course in a long straight run the horse scored, but the first jink often more than equalized matters.

The following is aprecis of the heats:

GUJARAT CUP FIRST NOMINATION.

1st heat.—Col. J. Forbes (winner) ... Beyts.
Narshinghi of Katosan ... A. Forbes.

A nice gallop after a fair sized pig in rather close jungle. J. Forbes was not to be denied.

2nd heat.—R. C. Brown, T. Moore (winner), J. L. Symons.

This heat was let go after a small jinking sow. All had a look in. Moore at last succeeded in pricking.

3rd heat.—Medlicott (winner) ... Capt. Rudkin.
Becharsinghi of Katosan ... D. Graham.

A fast jinking run after a small pig all got thrown out alternately. Becharsinghi got lost owing to his not keeping up with the umpire at the start. Medlicott speared handsomely.

4th heat.—O. Symons (winner) ... Col. Dimmock.
R. R. Boyd ... Sirdar Singhi of Shapura.

The run lay chiefly between Symons and Sirdar Singhi. The others could hardly go the pace, Symons speared eventually.

5th heat.—Darley (winner) Thatcher, Crum, Soutar.

The umpire let the heat go after a clinking good boar, Darley and Crum raced, the former getting up and jinked, swinging round he again missed and Crum had a chance, but failed, Darley then racing up speared. A very fine long run.

6th heat.—Thakor Shree of Katosan, Ranjit Singhi of Baria, Lory (scratched).

This heat was disqualified as they lost the pig, the umpire giving it as his opinion that they had every chance of spearing.

Semi-final.—O. Symons (winner) Darley, Moore.

They were let go to a fine boar. Darley raced up and jinked, Symons going over a fence got badly thrown out, Darley and Moore following on with the pig through some heavy wait-a-bit thorn jungle and lost him momentarily. Symons coming along had the luck to see him going down a lane. And speared him: a long run.

Col. Forbes, Medlicott (winner.

One of the finest runs of the meeting. Over some big fences and cotton field. Pace was a cracker. Medlicott's pony proved a shade faster than the others big horse; both had a chance and eventually Medlicott was able to show first blood.

Final.—Medlicott (winner) O. Symons.

A very short run after an exceedingly fat boar, who did not run, but being speedily brought to bay promptly charged Medlicot, who, of course speared, and thus won the first nomination for the Gujarat Cup.

SECOND NOMINATION.

1st heat.—Col. Forbes (winner) ... J. L. Symons.
A. Forbes ... Medlicott.

The umpire keeping his eye on the pig had not a spare one for his heat and gave the order to ride when Col. Forbes had a comfortable lead of well over 100 yards and Medlicott 50 or 60 yards in rear of Symons and A. Forbes. A jink let the rear guard up and they had a chance, Medlicott broke a stirup leather, and pulled up. Symons might have speared, eventually Col. Forbes' drew blood, this was an exceedingly fast boar that kept in front a long time.

2nd heat.—Soutar (winner) Darley, Thatcher, Thakur Shree of Katosan.

A grand gallop after a fine boar. Darley showed the way, closely followed by Soutar, jinked the pig and missed. Again getting on he just managed to reach the pig, Soutar spearing immediately after. Darley failed to show blood and the spear was awarded to Soutar.

3rd heat.—O. Symons (winner), Moore, Crum.

A small pig which gave a good run. Symons who had abandoned his big horse for his pony was not to be denied.

4th heat.—Sirdar Singhi of Shapura (winner), Brown, D. Graham.

A fine run. Graham up first, but missed on the jink, and let in Sirdar Singhi.

Semi-finals.—Soutar, Sardar Singh (winner).

Sirdar Singh's pony proved the smartest and did not give the horse much of a look in.

O. Symons (winner), Col. Forbes.

A fine boar and a fine run. Forbes was up first, but when the jink came he let Symons on his pony in who speared easily. Forbes got mixed up with a babul tree and broke a leather.

Final.—Sirdar Singh (winner), O. Symons.

Sirdar Singh never left the issue in doubt. When the heat was let go he got on the tail of the boar, jinked when he jinked and speared twice before Symons got a look in.

Final—Mr. H. E. Medlicott, 4th Battery R.F.A. (winner), Sirdar Singh of Shapur.

After a tiring delay they were let go to a fine pig, Medlicott on his grand South African pony, Result, proved too much for the other Arab good pony as he was, also giving no chances away; he speared and won the Gujarat Cup of 1907.

A prominent winner in two previous years, every one congratulating him heartily.

SALMON CHALLENGE CUP.

1st heat.—Narisinghi of Baria, Lory scratched, Narisinghi of Katosan, Hickey scratched.

T. Moore (winner).

A fairly soft thing for Moore, who was on him the whole time and seemed to be going the faster.

2nd heat.— Col. Forbes (winner) ... J. L. Symons.
R. R. Boyd. ... Beyts.

Forbes seemed to have the legs of Symons, the others could hardly go the pace, which was a cracker.

3rd heat.—Sirdar Singh ... Rudkin
Gordon ... R. C. Brown

Fine, long, straight run, Brown and Rudkin making the winning, both missed and the boar ran into a bush, charging out just as Sardar Singh was passing, a nice bit of luck as he thought he was badly left.

4th heat.—Ranjit Singhi of Baria (winner) Darley
Soutar (scratched) ... O. Symons.

A fast run after a small jinking boar, all had severe attempts and the pig almost seemed able to wriggle off the point of one's spear. Ranjit Singhi at last drew blood.

5th heat.—Medlicott (winner), Crum, Hurst, Suraj Mowghi of Katosan.

A nice run with any odds on Medlicott, who won as he liked.

6th heat.—Graham (winner), Thatcher, Wiles (scratched) Lloyd.

A fine run after a nice pig. Graham won fairly easily.

Semi-Finals.—Col. Forbes (winner), D. Graham, Medlicott.

A magnificent run after a good boar all well up. Forbes had a dig at the pig and was lucky to catch him on the back and be able to show blood.

Ranjit Singhi (winer), T. Moore, Sardar Singh.

Ranjit Singhi's fine waler pony combined with his light weight proved too much and he won nicely.

Final.—Col. J. Forbes, Ranjit Singhi of Baria (winner).

Forbes' pony looked a bit excited and out of hand, probably owing to the delay and shouts of the beaters. A good run and Ranjit Singhi scored and became the possessor of the coveted Pony Cup.

The last night saw the final break up dinner. I venture to say that there is more for bonhommie and sporting feeling over the Gujarat Cup events than in any other sporting event in India. All meet on the true ground level of sport, and sport only; betting is practically non-existant and would not be tolerated. The meet is the rendezvous of old pigsticking pals who can always count on meeting one another here at Easter. Year after year this occurs and men look forward to it.

At the dinner the usual toast, and the usual song "The boar" was duly drunk with musical honors and sung with musical power. May the singer Mr. J. L. Symons be with us at many more meetings; he owned to pigsticking for well over 30 years. When he made the remark the prevailing thought in most of our minds was was "more power to you, may I be half as good a man when I am your age."

Pigsticking besides being the finest sport bar none in the world, has the finest effect on a man. No man who hopes to succeed can be anything else but exceedingly temperate in all his habits. When can stand the blazing sun in April or May from daybreak to dark and drink much alcohol or beer, he may be foolish and try to, but abighead will cause him speedily to change his ways.

A couple of months' pigsticking would be a magnificent training for any youngster when he first comes out to the country. Pity the supply of pig would not admit of the experiment, to say nothing of the manner in which such a proposition would be received by a paternal Government.

A vote of thanks was unanimously passed after dinner to Mr. J. H. B. Thatcher, D.S.P. of Ahmedabad, who, assisted by Mr. R. R. Boyd, performed the functions of Honorary Secretary.

It is real hard work, everyone bothers him with questions in season and out of season. All arrangements are on his shoulders. More power to the man, in this case two of them, who forgoes a lot of pleasure and labours unselfishly for the sport of others. Right well have they both earned our thanks.

Golf.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

March 22nd 1907.

ONCE more the vernal equinox is passed, and for several days preceding this event, the winds blew where exactly they listed, ships were tossed about and wrecked, trees were uprooted, rivers swelled far beyond their natural bournes and pecks of March dust collected in ears, and eyes, and noses and made people wish themselves anywhere, but where an unkind fate compelled them to be! Even the Golf Links were, no longer a Paradise, and whilst the wind blew big guns, players had little or no control over the flight or course of the ball. Talking of balls and hurricane before I begin to talk of hitters of balls, reminds me that a trial should certainly be made of Messrs. Martin's Limited of Birmingham. "Hurricane" and "Zodiac" excellent goods at 2s. each, the first named is perhaps the better of the two, it is, what its makers claim for it, a hard ball, which comes away from the club with the endearing, encouraging "click" which with the obsolete gutty one regretted as never again to be heard in the land. The "Hurricane" does "click," it is very hard wearing, and flies very true, and so far as one can tell from a couple of trial rounds does not lose shape or paint—and will stand the onslaughts of niblick iron and bad players as well as any other ball in the market. The "Zodiac" no imaginary zone in the heaven's, but a very real and tangible terrestrial globe, also possesses special attractions, and in the opinion of many first-class players, both amateur and professional, is second to none. Both these balls can be obtained at 18s- per dozen, the same firm also advertise a 1s. 3d. ball called "Pluto" and a shilling ball called the "Nipper."

But all things come sooner or later to an end and so too must ball talk. There are now in process of competition two very important events, the Cricketers' inter-County Tournament, and the London Amateur Foursome Tournament, both of which are engrossing the minds and bodies of many athletic young men, for the majority of those taking part belong to the young school of players. Both these competitions are played by match play in pairs and some highly interesting play and close results have already been witnessed. As regards the Amateur Foursome Tournament the 1st and 2nd heats have both been played: in the 2nd round South Herts (Mr. A. C. Lincon and Mr. W. H. Scarborough) beat Enfield (Mr. W. Brander junr. and Mr. E. M. Ellis by 1 hole up.) Royal Ashdown Forest (Mr. Cec'l Burns and Mr. A. Quitzow) at Woking beat Acton (Mr. J. D. Fordyce and Mr. A. Spence) by 8 up and 6 to play. Fulwell (Mr. Eden Gawne and Mr. W. T. Finnis) at Sunningdale beat Sundridge Park (Mr. H. W. Foster, Mr. P. and Mr. S. C. Wyatt) by 2 and 1. Richmond (Mr. H. E. Taylor and Mr. J. A. Healing) at Byfleet beat Northwood (Mr. Kenneth Cobb and Mr. H. B. Garland) by 7 and 6. Sunningdale (Mr. A. S. Colt and Mr. C. C. Lingen) at Woking beat Stock Exchage Golfing Society (Mr. R. Harris and Mr. E. A. Smire) by 1 up. Woking (Mr. B. Darwin and Mr. F. H,) Mitchell at Sunningdale beat Bamford (Mr. A. H. Reid and M. J. C. Berd. by 9 and 8. Mid Surrey (Mr. S. H. Fry and Mr. J. S Worthington) at Walton Heath beat Beckenham (Mr. A. J. Ayden and Mr. G. L. Mellin) by 5 and 4.

One would rather like to hear the comments of the Old Scottish Golfers of Auld Lang Syne on the game as she is played at fashionable foreign resorts, An account is to hand of the 14th annual Foursome Match between Biarritz and Pau for the Challenge Cup presented by Lord Kilmaine. Of course fine weather prevailed and the large gallery which assembled to see and be seen were fashionable ladies in the latest modes and finest feathers, and, it is for the especial non-golfing innovation that the canny Scottish fathers would porbably have most strongly objected, as they were no pipes or pilbrooch, the Band of the 57th Regiment played! Of course the presence of and august sovereign added enormously to the attractions of the function. Edward VII is a keen golfer and does much to encourage the game wherever he goes. The winners last year for Biarritz, the Hon'ble Osmund Scott and Mr. Angus V. Hambro, again defended their Club's honour, and were opposed by Messrs. Charles Hutchings and H. Ferrier-Kerr for Pau. Thirty-six holes are played on the course of each club and at the end of the first day's play Biarritz were 8 up, the last half is being decided to-day at Pau.

A great amount of advertisement attends the deeds by sea and land of the two English varsities, but very little fanfare of trumpets proclaims the feats performed by the Scottish and Irish Universities, and yet they are every whit as interesting to some people as are those of Dark or Light Blue Men. At North Berwick last Saturday (16th March) a very fine close match took place between members of the Tantallon Club, and the Scottish University Society; there were no halved matches, the counting was by matches and there were 12 players a side as below:—

On the Foursomes, therefore, as the Singles were a draw, depended the result of the match, and although as a rule this paired Golf is considered of quite secondary importance, in this case on the issue hung great things, and as will be seen from appended details the Universities achieved a great victory:—

It is really delightful to meet such a long list of real Scotch names, with no interspersion of the usual Jones-Smith, Brown, or Robinson; look through the lists of competitors in any English club and it is seldom that one or other of these does not occur, but while in the above described contest all were undoubtedly Scotch, it is curious that not a single Mac took part. Apparently until recently the Scottish universities have rather neglected golf, but now a brighter day is dawning and the other four universities will be closely knit together by indissoluble and on (let us hope) indissoluble links and Edinburgh. St. Andrews, Glasgow, and Aberdeen will be as well known is bound together either as a society, or as chacun pour soi and fighting against the other varsities in the Scotch national pastime the royal and ancient game of golf! We hear of matches, in which the players on each side number from 1 to 12 frequently, then less often 15, 18, 20. Not rarely does one read of any inter-club contest in which 50 players are engaged on each side. Yet on Saturday, 16th March, a blustery cold, rainy unpleasant day all over Britain between Sandwell Park and Olton Club this unique match took place. The first 25 couples played on the first named club's course and the others at Olton, and resulted, when the difficult addition was ultimately negotiated, in a win for Olton by 2 holes to the good at each place—2 at Sandwell and 2 at Olton=4—Minute details and names of the hundred competitors are NOT here recorded.

An American invasion is being organised: men and women golfers are comiog over to these Isles to try conclusions with our brightest and best amateurs and professionals; both intend to complete at Hoylake in the Open Championship. Mr. Eben Byers, the American amateur Champion, sails from New York on 17th April to take part at St. Audrews in the amateur event, so too will another good player, Mr. F. O. Horstman, whilst several of the leading lady players are entering for the Championship at Newcastle county Down. The Ladies' Golf Union have changed their silversmith and all orders will in future be executed by Messrs. Plante and Bannister 3, Regent Place, London, W. This firm have just made a very beautiful Challenge Cup and Memento given by the L. G. W. J. Competition, every spring under handicap and the head of the firm was previous to setting up on his own, manager of a well-known firm of Silversmiths in London.

Hockey.

NOTES AND COMMENTS ON TH CALCUTTA LEAGUE.

THE game of the week was unquestionably the meeting of Calcutta and Dalhousie on the latter's ground on Saturday last.

The largest crowd that has this season been seen on a hockey field, were rewarded by witnessing a most exciting, and at all times, fast and interesting game. The match excited the greatest interest possible, for had Calcutta not been successful, their prospect of heading the League would not have been a certainty, whereas a victory would greatly enhance their chances.

Both sides were well represented, with the exception that Calcutta had no regular goal-keeper, and Badham had to be pressed into service at the last moment, not having previously had any experience in this position. The game resulted in a win for Calcutta by 4 goals to 3, but at one time it looked as if Dalhousie were to be successful, for by scoring the 1st and 3rd goals, they were leading 2—1 within 15 minutes of the close.

Calcutta then pulled themselves together, and the dogged way in which they went at it, was delightful to see, and before a further ten minutes had elapsed scored three times. Dalhousie also never once relinquished their efforts and kept their opponents dangerous forwards well marked. Calcutta certainly deserved to win, for they were the better team, especially in the second moiety, and it would have been bad luck indeed, had the winning goal gone to their opponents.

Dalhousie without having any particular stars, are a very good and level lot. The goal-keepar is sound, and could in no way be held responsible for any of the shots that beat him. Evans struck me as being the better of the two backs. The half-back line are a hard-working lot, and at times brilliant, but they gave me the impression of not making the greatest use of their hands, and feet, in stopping. A flying shot at the ball is at times necessary, but should not be indulged in, unless the player is in a very tight corner. A much more accurate pass to a forward is obtained from practically a dead ball, than one coming bounding along.

Jackson was the best of the forwards, and Prike on the wing was at times dangerous, but he happened to find Heilgers at the top of his game, and but for this, his speed must have carried him through. What, however, was lacking in the attack was backing up. How often is it seen, that a forward gets right away and has only a back to pass; the back holds him up, and eventually clears the ball out of danger. Had the player, who has been robbed of the ball been backed up, by another of his side, the chances are in favor of the other players being able to carry on the ball after the temporary check, and before a clearance has been effected, and score an almost certain goal.

Of course it may be asked, how is one to know when to follow on, rather than keep one's position to receive a pass? In this the player must use his own judgment. By playing together he should be able to judge when his colleague is going through on his own, and in such a case should always be ready to back him up. To prove its value it scored the winning goal for Calcutta on Saturday, as Sherman, who was backing up Manders had nothing to do but tap the ball into the net.

On the Calcutta side, in the match in question, it would be difficult to pick out any for individual prominence, but McCaw, Heilgers and the forwards excelled themselves. The inside forwards passed with accuracy and precision, and the wingmen sent in some good centres. The goals, although credited to Sherman and Simson, were the result of combined efforts, and are therefore all the more creditable.

A splendid game from start to finish, was not only the opinion of the spectators, but the players themselves, and one played in the best spirit.

Caledonia who, before Saturday's game, were only a point below Calcutta, were beaten by Sibpur on their own ground by 4 goals to nil, scored in the closing stages of the game.

This should make it almost certain of Calcutta heading the list, as they have now only two games to play, viz., against the E. I. R. and Caledonia and only require to win one of them to come out on top.

I will, however, reserve my congratulations till after the event. Caledonia have done exceedingly well considering that they were early deprived of the services of two or three of their best men. Byrne at full back is probably the best man in the team, and has got his side out of many a tight corner. Speed, in the form of Pybus and Crawley in the forward line, has enabled them to score goals, and the half back line vie with Dalhousie for dogged determination.

The Rovers, for whom I hold the highest regard as a hockey team, were only able to score a 2—1 victory over the Y.M.C.A, and that after vanquishing the Hornets by a fairly large margin. They should make a good show in the Cup, especially so if they can obtain the services of one or two more Ranchi boys.

The B.-N. R. gave a very creditable display against Calcutta during the week, while the E.I.R. accounted for the Town Club by 2 goals to nil. The Customs beat the Fort team by 5 goals to nil, and the Rangers, Mohun Bagan by a penalty goal. The following is the League list made up to 8th April.

ALL INDIA TOURNAMENT.

Judges.—Major Wake, Lieut. Yates, Capt. Chapman, Capt. Houston.
Referee :—Capt. Craven.
Time-keeper :—Mr. Twymann.

The tournament was held in the arena of the Manchester Regiment, Trimulgherry : big entries were obtained and some really good Exhibitions were presented to large and enthusiastic gatherings. When distributing the prizes General Francis said that this tournament was undoubtedly the most successful ever held there, the competitors having come from every corner of India. Though he may be considered old-fashioned, he thought it was a mistake for most of the contestants to go in for so much of round arm hitting. He reminded the men that Peter Jackson hit out straight with the left and the General thought he would have had many of those who had fought before him asleep in a minute, a remark which elicited much laughter. Neither would Ned Donally nor Moir have stood these round arm hits. This was a weakness of Tiger Smith's and the result was that he was knocked out in less than three minutes. General Francis then proceeded to thank all the officials whose efforts had made the tournament the immense success it was. Details:—

FIVE DAYS IN A NATIVE STATE.

In response to a kind invitation from the Maharaja a team consisting of 13 men and 3 ladies left Cawnpore for Bulrampur last month to play cricket, football, tennis and billiards against a team collected by His Highness the Maharaja of Bulrampur.

The train timed to start at 6-15 actually left the station at about 7 by which time our several maunds of luggage has been safely stowed away. The B. and N.-W. Railway Company had obligingly attached a dining car to the train and given us through carriages for the journey. Frequent meals with "bridge" in the intervals enabled us to survive what might have been a somewhat tedious journey. On arrival at Bulrampur Station we were met by our host himself and Mr. O'Donnell, Opium Agent at Gonda, and were driven in motor cars and barouches to the guest house, a fine white building in which most of us found rooms ready for us. A most luxurious camp had been pitched for the overflow from the guest house. Tea was ready on the lawn and there we were greeted by Mrs. O'Donnell and introduced to a large party of guests from Gonda and other places in the neighbourhood, who had arrived before us. After tea everyone went off to practise cricket, tennis, etc. The Maharaja was at the nets giving a most scientific display of batting as also was Ram Lal of Naini Tal fame. Another old friend we found there was Moti the Naini Tal ground man, who seemed younger and more energetic than ever, although one member of our team remembered him at Naini over twenty years ago and said he was then in his prime.

After dinner in the huge dining hall the actual contests opened with a four-handed billiard match, in which Messrs. Allen and Alexander of Cawnpore defeated the Bulrampur representatives by a narrow margin after a very hard fight. The Maharaja for Bulrampur played an excellent game, but his partner was not quite in his best form.

At 8 a.m. on Thursday we were all driven to the palace to pay our respects to our host, who received us in the drawing room and presented us each with an elaborate garland and some "pan." The late Maharaja was a great shikari and the palace is full of trophies of the chase—tiger, leopard and bear skins and numerous heads adorning the rooms and stair cases. At 11 a.m. the cricket match began and a most exciting match it proved. Thanks chiefly to Kundan Lal 77, Abel 46 and Madan Gopal and the Maharaja 25 each the score reached the respectable total of 217. Allen Twiss and Ross divided the wickets. Twiss bowled particularly well, but did not have much luck. Cawnpore had about 35 minutes batting before stumps were drawn and lost Ross and Williams (23) for 67, Cumberlege being not out 37.

The time between cricket and dinner was spent by some in the billiard room and others at the piano where Messrs. Cumberlege, Gilbert and Williams were in great form. The same evening Cawnpore won the billard singles and were thus one up. On Friday morning early most of us went to the Zoological Gardens where there is a splendid collection of animals, a tiger, two lions, numerous bears and leopards, a zebra, wild dogs and snakes of all sorts. One of our ladies lent her parasol to a huge black bear and had some difficulty in persuading him to return it.

After an inspection of the garage where five fine motor cars are kept including the "Napier" lent to the Prince and Princess of Wales during their tour in India, we returned to breakfast. Cricket was continued at 11 o'clock. Cumberlege brought his overnight score to 89 before being bowled by Madan Gopal at 178. With only three wickets to fall and 40 to make to win we were getting anxious, but Twiss rose to the occasion and helped Allen, who had been playing very well to carry the score to 216 or within one of our opponents' total. Then the aspect of the game changed. Twiss was bowled for an invaluable 18 and Bannister caught in the slips first ball. With one wicket to fall we were still a run behind. Morton played the ball and Allen called him for what seemed an impossible run, but it was successful and the scores were even. Then Allen in trying to hit was clean bowled by Kundan Lal and a most exciting game ended in a tie, there being no time for a second innings. Allen's 59 was a very good innings and nearly won us the match.

We lost the tennis mixed doubles in the afternoon. Mrs. Sandys and Mr. Allen being defeated after a hard fight by Mrs. O'Donnell and Mr. Dampier and also lost, our only successful pair being Messrs. O'Donnell and her brother. The men's doubles we also lost our only successful pair being Messrs. Coningham and Twiss.

This made the score all square, billiards won by Cawnpore, tennis by Bulrampur and cricket a tie, so all depended on the football, to fit ourselves for which we danced most of the night to the strains of the Maharaja's own band. A very cheery little dance it was too and it was not until about 2 a.m. that the party broke up. On Saturday we had a quiet morning, some of us motored, some visited the armoury, where some remarkable old weapons were to be seen, others did not appear till late, having taken the opportunity of having a Europe morning.

The football match was preceded by tennis singles in which the Bulrampur lady, Mrs. Dampier and the Cawnpore man representative, Mr. Allen, were successful.

There was great excitement when the teams lined up for football, the Maharaja at centre "rush" being the most prominent figure on the ground. The head chauffeur and the Prime Minister were also playing. Cawnpore played with the wind the first half and scored two goals to nil. After half time, however, the Bulrampur team played up hard and scored a goal. Nothing further happened till nearly the end of time when Cawnpore scored a third goal through Gilbert and won the match and the rubber. It is only fair to say that Bulrampur were without their best player, Mr. Sheldon who has gone home. Had he been there the result might have been different. It was an excellent game and everyone played up really hard. On the winning side Cumberlege, Twiss and Williams were most conspicuous, while the Maharaja, Kalil (inside left) and the goal-keeper were prominent for the losers.

After the match we were shown how wild elephants are captured in a kheddah which was most interesting. The elephants then gave a display of skill in picking up various articles from the ground and handing them to the mahounts,—cricket bags, match boxes, rupees and lasty, amidst loud cheers, Mr. Williams.

The Maharaja honoured us with his presence at dessert that night, and after the health of the king had been drunk Mr. Williams rose and proposed the health of our host His Highness the Maharaja of Bulrampur. He said that His Highness had given us all a splendid time and showed in every branch of sport what a fine all-round athlete he was. He pointed out that the fact that the Maharaja and his partner had defeated at tennis himself and Mr. Ross proved the facts that he was a first-class tennis player and alluded to the success of the Maharaja at centre "rush." He concluded by remarking that if His Highness ever happened to be in Cawnpore he would be delighted to place a small room at his disposal and sat down amidst cheers and laughter. The toast was drunk with much enthusiasm. Major Sandys then proposed the health of Mr. and Mrs. O'Donnell, who had made all the arrangements for our entertainment and expressed the gratitude of the Cawnpore team to them for all their hard work. The Maharaja could not be induced to make a speech.

A very lively concert finished the evening. Mrs. Sandys and Mrs. Ross sang charmingly and the latter's violin playing was very much enjoyed. Other performers were Mr. Kavanagh, who sang an excellent song, Mr. Gilbert, Mr. Cumberlege, Mr. Coningham and Mr. Williams. Mr. O wens danced a cake walk uncommonly well and Mr. Gilbert was invaluable at the piano.

The Maharaja stayed till the end and drove away in his motor car to the accompaniment of three hearty cheers.

On Sunday we regretfully returned to Cawnpore having thoroughly enjoyed our visit.

The Naturalist.

EXPLICET QUI POSSIT

A BIRD PHANTASY.

So they built their nest and lived happy ever after.

That, I suppose, was the beginning of the story. But I must confess at once that I know nothing at all about the beginning. The end (that part of it which happened before my time) must have puzzled somebody; for the couple of Blue Tits were not like ordinary fossilized, petrified objects. Turned and changed they certainly were outwardly—supposing them once upon a time to have been alive—but nothing of the life and go, the self-assertiveness natural to a Blue Tit was lacking in this petrified pair. Still, I repeat, I know nothing of the beginning of the story, and can only take it up where I found it, and that was in the sunny corner of an old curiosity shop in the Cathedral city of Winchester.

Side by side on a brown shelf, the brilliant little birds sat, life-like in their attitudes as in their colourings. The small round heads were bent so low over some delicacy the tits were enjoying, that the little pert sectionised faces were hardly visible, and the bright blue caps were almost lost to view. Each bird was engrossed with a piece of cocoanut or hard fat—it was difficult to say which—and the sharp straight little beaks had patterned the food all over with hundreds of pin point marks of machine-like regularity. In such top-heavy attitudes (if anything as light and gymnastic as a Blue Tit may be called top-heavy), the balancing blue tails, which stuck straight out at an acute angle from the closely folded wings, had a purpose expressed in every shaded feather.

I, bird-lover and bird-friend, never doubted that the Blue Tits were alive when one morning towards the middle of March I stepped down into the old gabled shop, and tip-toed swiftly towards them, too much astonished to bestow more than a hasty glance on the owner, who watched me from behind his counter. Needless to say, I very soon discovered my mistake, and the old dealer, when I turned towards him, met my wondering gaze with a look of smiling satisfaction which I interpreted wrongly at the moment. He removed a pair of large horn spectacles and remarked solemnly: "You have got the proper inner eye, you know a bird when you see it."

"I should say rather I am incapable of recognising an imitation when I see it," I answered airily; but the look I once more fastened on the little blue birds routed the deprecating words, and I sat down in full view of the narrow dusty shelf, where the feast of fat or cocoanut seemed to diminish visibly under the silent workings of those needle-sharp beaks.

"Well, what do you think of them?" asked the owner of the shop.

"They are wonderful," I replied, "I have never seen anything so life-like. Are they for sale?"

"Sale? No!" the old man answered emphatically as he re-adjusted his immense round spectacles, which certainly bestowed very proper "outer eyes" on him. "Though I don't say I never mean to part with them," he added. "That all depends."

"And on what does it depend?" I enquired with my eyes upon the shelf; but before he could answer I had sprung to my feet and darted across to the Blue Tits, over-turning in my haste an old spinning-wheel, which fell with clatter enough to have scared a whole flight of birds. These two, however, remained motionless, and after once more gazing long and closely at the pair I returned to my seat, feeling thoroughly ashamed of myself, more especially when I stumbled over something lying in the way and found that it was a broken distaff and a bunch of tangled flax.

To my words of apology on discovering the extent of the damage done the round-eyed old owner of the shop paid not the smallest attention. He leaned towards me over the counter and asked in a wheezy anxious whisper: "What made you jump up and cry out like that?"

"Did I cry out?" I asked. "Well, to tell you the truth, the smallest of the two birds seemed to me to move suddenly, and I am convinced it moved," I added with heat. "Have you never noticed the same thing?"

Instead of replying to my question, the old dealer pulled himself up by the counter and shuffled across the little shop to the shelf. He was very stiff in the joints and unwieldy, but with the greatest care and gentleness he lifted first one little Blue Tit and then the other from its perch on the shelf, and set them down side by side in front of me on the counter. Then with many grunts and groans he sank heavily into his capacious round leather chair, and began to talk.

"I am close on eighty years," he explained, "and I got these Blue Tits when I was a lad of eighteen. It don't matter to you— if you'll excuse me saying so—how I got 'em. P'raps I bought 'em, or may be I took this little 'un off her nest, Blue Tits take a deal of moving, and the gentleman here must needs resent it and come along too. P'raps the pair of them came to me with a lot of other stuff when the old folks died. The whole point of the story, I say, is that these little 'bee-biters' are standing before you this very moment on this very counter."

I could not altogether agree with the kind old man, but would not tell him so. The point of the story, to me was to learn the origin of these bewilderingly natural little birds, and I also felt a certain anxiety on another point, namely, whether "the inner eye" for birds with which the old dealer accredited me might not be a sign of some threatening brain trouble, for even as I watched the wholly engrossed little Blue Tits I was once more compelled to believe (this time with a thrilling sensation) that I saw a shake and a flutter pass along the blue wings and through the small yellow feathers of the soft under parts of the body. Yet the modelling, however achieved, of these unsociable small "gourmets" was open to all beholders, the stoniness of the beautifully coloured wings was incontestable.

"And when you ask me whether these birds are for sale," the man continued, "I say again, no!" Here he banged on the counter so heavily with his fist that the Blue Tits made a ringing sound against the wood. "But I repeat that I don't say I never mean to part with them."

"Yes?" I murmured, stroking the smallest Blue Tit with loving covetous fingers.

"During all these sixty years—come each spring-time—not another soul except myself has seen what you've seen to-day. Yet wherever I've been, these birds have caused more talk than anything else in my shop. Gentle and simple all say the same, 'They might be alive,' and many a one has wanted to buy, offered good prices too. But I know what I know, so the little monkeys and I have stuck to each other, and if I was twenty or even ten years younger, they wouldn't leave this shop unless I left it too."

"But now?" I enquired in what I hoped was a wholly disinterested voice.

"And if you hadn't seen what you've seen," continued the old man without heeding the interruption, "they would go (nesting-time or no, poor souls) where neither man, woman or child, in this town or any other town, would ever hear of them again."

He paused, and as my fingures involuntarily closed round the smaller Blue Tit, he snatched it from me and pressed the tiny strapped head to his ugly old lips, holding the little bird tenderly in the hollow of his hand.

"Have you ever kissed a living bird, Miss?" he asked significantly.

"Yes, often," I replied. "Once I caught two Blue Tits sitting on my dressing-table, and held one in each hand. First I kissed one little blue cap, then the other, and after making the two birds kiss I carried them into the garden and let them fly away."

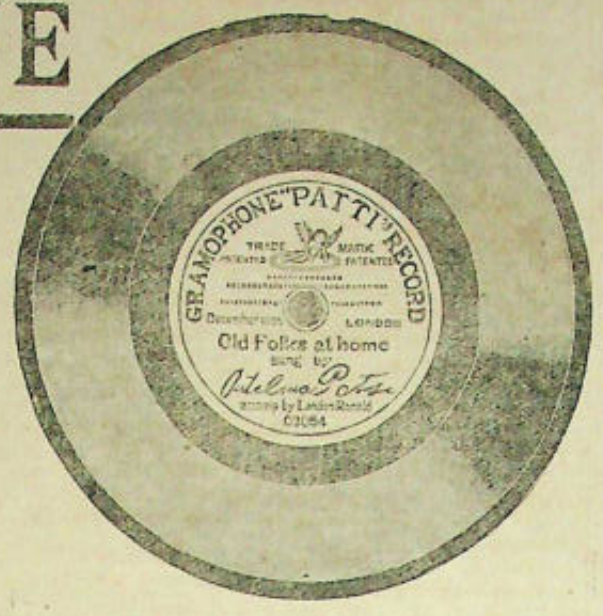
"Where they likely pecked each other's eyes out if they were cock birds and it was mating time," he answered, shrugging his stiff old shoulders and setting the little Blue Tit down on the counter beside its companion. Presently he dived for a ragged piece of paper and busied himself in another corner of the shop. The birds were no longer on the counter and the old man had suddenly become stern-looking, the horn spectacles giving him the appearance of an angry old ogre. I began to feel frightened, and this feeling was not lessened when after a long interval, he pushed a very badly done-up parcel towards me, muttering some sort of imprecation.

It was useless to mistake the meaning of the parcel, however politic to feign ignorance of the muttered curses, so I boldly picked up the Blue Tits and turned to go.

"And you will not let me give you anything for them?" I was idiot enough to enquire as I reached the low doorway. The need to say something was imperative. Sympathy I felt would be cruel, a commonplace remark insulting at such a moment. I had hoped to combine in my farewell words appreciation of his sacrifice with sincere regret that I could never repay him for his precious gift.

On my misguided head the storm burst, and I fell up the step leading from the shop into the street and took to my heels. But a stentorian voice recalled me before I could reach the turning into the High Street.

"He cannot part with them after all," was the thought that flashed into my mind, and I hesitated to obey. Then sick with fear that the Blue Tits were to be wrenched from me, I slowly retraced my steps. Anything less ogre-like than the old dealer now appeared cannot well be imagined. He had aged ten years in my short flight down the sunny street, and stood in the doorway of the pretty old gabled house nervously fingering a large red pocket handkerchief with which every now and then he wiped his forhead and hands.



"Give them every bit of sunshine you can just these two—three months in the year," he whispered hoarsely; "and never part with them as long as you live, unless you must, and then only—but you know——

Yes, I know, but I do not understand.

The "two—three months of the year" are over now, and the tits have taken up their abode in a long glass case among many other treasures, Roman plates, old rings, miniatures, coins. But when spring-time comes round again with her awakening touch, I shall unlock the glass case and place my pair of birds where the first rays of the warm life-giving sun can shine full upon them.—Nature Notes.

THE GRAMOPHONE CO.

GENTLEMEN,

The Gramophone of to-day I find is such an improved instrument for recording the human voice to the older machines with which so many of us are familiar, that my hitherto objection to allow the thousands who cannot hear me sing personally to listen to the reproduction of my voice through the instrumentality of your Gramophone is now quite removed, and the Records which you have lately made for me I think are natural reproductions of my voice.

Yours truly,

The Story Teller.

A QUEER NEW YEAR'S EXPERIENCE.

THE following is the narrative of a man with whom I was lately comparing views as to curious experiences in different parts of the world. He is fairly well known to me, and I see no reason to disbelieve him. His yarn is simply put into narrative form, together with the use of fictitious names.

It was some few—not very many—years ago, that in the course of his wanderings, a youngster, whom I will call Blake, found himself embarked in a mining venture in Australia. He had foregathered with his companion, a somewhat morose and much older man, some months before, and the two had joined forces. This elder man—we will christen him Clancy—was one of those incorrigible rolling stones who are in evidence all over the world. Originally a gentleman, and still bearing signs of his gentle blood and breeding, he had more than once been within measurable distance of a fortune, but each time he had failed to reach it, and it was now Blake's diminishing exchequer which furnished the necessary money to carry them out into the wilds again.

And they were wilds indeed! Were I to mention the district of the huge island continent which this modest Christmas story concerns, it is doubtful whether many of your readers would be any the wiser, although a good deal of gold was taken out of it a decade or so ago. However there the two were, in a rough mining camp, with their clothes, their "swag" and a very modest amount of money remaining in Blake's belt.

The adventurers were received by the camp with the rough good-fellowship which characterises such gatherings of pioneers, but were told that prospects were by no means bright.

"It's a fact I reckon", said one of the oldest inhabitants (of perhaps twelve months' standing), "that the only place where there's a pile to be made now, is 'Clancy's Camp' and we don't hanker after going there to look for it."

"Great snakes! Why!" cried Blake. "By Jove! old man," he added turning to his chum, the very name should be a good omen for us." Humph—yes, replied the elder man. "But chum," he continued, turning to the first speaker with a keen look, "Why do they call it "Clancy's Camp'?"

"Can't tell you I'm sure", was the reply. "Men have come and gone, and died of fever and drink and dysentery, by dozens during the past few years, and we are all pretty news chums. But you ask this camp whether they'll go there to dig for gold."

Apparently relieved by the reply, Clancy turned away. "The camp was submitted to a rigid examination principally conducted by Blake, although Clancy seemed to listen closely to the replies, and unequivocally declared their disinclination to exploit "Clancy's Camp."

"Duds and devils are said by the padres to go together," remarked a university educated neer-do-well, "but he'd be a tough lot who would look for even the first commodity in the company of the second."

"Try it on lads," declared a huge rough "huskey," who looked capable of taking on most things short of an elephant or an earthquake.

I did—once. 'Once my duckey and only once," he quoted emphatically, rolling ponderously off to his hut.

But Blake and Clancy agreed to prospect this tabooed locality. Blake, with the optimism and self-satisfaction of youth, laughed at the warnings of the camp, nor indeed could any very definite information be obtained. It only appeared that for the last year or two, successive parties of miners had visited the place, and had returned after forty-eight hours' occupation at the outside. These were the bolder spirits, twenty-four hours sufficed as a rule. Details were not available, and owing to the constantly moving population of the camp, the greater part of what was gathered was "hearsay". Had anything been seen? It was believed not. Had anything been heard?

"Go and listen sonny," was the final reply to this last question, and the above may be taken as fair samples of the information acquired.

"Oh! you're a lot of idiots'" cried young Blake impatiently. "I'm going to 'Clancy's Camp' and considering the special proprietorship which the name seems to give you, I suppose you'll come too old man", he added, turning to his comrade.

With no suspicion of hesitation Clancy replied:—"Come lad, of course I'le come. None of these skeery skunks can tell us much about it, so I take it we'll have to find out for ourselves."

"Clancy's Camp" consisted of an old clearing in a heavily wooded gorge. It was evident that heavy flushes took place in the streams when rain fell, and Blake's first remark was that they would have to look sharp on such occasions to prevent their tools and swag generally from being carried away.

But there were clear indications of gold, and a fair day's prospecting took place to begin with.

It was on the last night of the year, that the two men lay down for their first night's rest in "Clancy's Camp" Undoubtedly the place had on eerie aspect. The wind moaned through the trees and up and down the deep gorge like a lost soul, but there was a bright moon, and a promise of continued fine weather. First the old clearing to the big camp was between three and four miles.

About midnight from Clancy's blanket came curious stirrings and muttered oaths, and Blake sat up and listened in surprise. His companion was not a foul-mouthed man in ordinary life, nor was he as a rule disturbed in his sleep. However the boy put the matter down to nightmare, and was falling off to sleep again, when from the exterior of the tent came the sound of voices in angry altercation. Distinctly Blake heard the words and then to his utter astoundment, there followed the whip-like cracks of revolvers in rapid succession, followed by a yell and a terrific and unprintable oath. Before the echo of the shots had died away, Blake was at the tent door, revolver in hand.

The wild bush slept under a full moon, tranquil and quiet as it must have done ages before puny man came to disturb it with his evil passions, and that was all there was to be seen.

Running round the hut, Blake listened eagerly for the noise of men breaking through the undergrowth. Not a sound of that, or of any other description broke the silence of the night, and, sorely puzzled, the lad went back into the hut, wondering whether he had been the victim of a specially bad dream. But he could not think that this was so. The sounds had been too distinct—too real. Moreover he had hardly been asleep when he first heard them. He could remember the very words used, and—it suddenly struck him like a cold chill—surely he had heard the name of "Clancy" used in accents of reproach and detestation.

As though to bear further testimony on this point, he had scarcely re-entered the hut, when he noticed that his companion was sitting up and staring strangely at the open door.

"Just Heaven"! he muttered as though to himself, "it's his very voice. Am I mad?" And then noticing Blake, he pulled himself together with a visible effort and changed his tone.

"Hullo Blake," he said: "What the devil's the matter. Is there a row on outside, or have I been dreaming?"

A bit shakily, Blake replied that he had certainly thought he had heard what seemed to be a fight going on outside the tent, but that on going out he could see nothing. With a rather forced laugh, Clancy rejoined that possibly Blake had dreamed, and had uttered some ejaculations as he went out which had aroused Clancy himself; but it was a lame explanation, and had not Blake been already convinced, a look at Clancy would have shown him that the latter did not believe his own words.

But on the following night the thing was repeated with additions. Again the oaths, again the revolver shots, and again nothing but the far stretching, moonlit bush to be seen. At the first alarm, Clancy did not seem to be disturbed upon this occasion, but after Blake had sunk into an uneasy sleep, the youngster was again awakened, this time by the apparent plying of pick and shovel round the hut, The frail structure shook violently and seemed about to fall, so once more Blake rushed outside. Still nothing was to be seen, and now the tent seemed quiet and undisturbed. Putting his head in at the door, Blake glanced over at the corner where Clancy was accustomed to sleep. It was unoccupied and the red miner's blanket lay in a heap.

Thoroughly frightened now, the lad turned again to the open, and as he did so, he seemed to see for a second the figure of a strangely short man creeping into the bush. Like a flash his revolver was out, and three bullets from a not unpractised hand, travelled in quick succession to the spot where he thought he had seen the form.

But there was no answering yell, as of a wounded man, and hurrying to the spot, Blake could see no traces of anyone having been there. Shaken, and half-believing himself insane he walked off to the main camp, and made enquiries for Clancy, but could hear nothing whatever of him.

The next morning a search was made, and Clancy was found quite dead in the bush a few hundred yards from the hut of evil memories to Blake. Two slight punctures on the instep, led to the idea of snake-bite being generally accepted as the cause of death, but Blake declares that he never saw such horror depicted upon any human features, and after hearing his story, the oldest inhabitant "allowed" that it was time "Clancy's camp" was "wiped out." A party of miners dug up the whole surrounding ground to a moderate depth, and not far from where the hut had stood, discovered the headless skeleton of a man. There was no possibility of identification, owing to the lapse of time and the entire absence of the head, but Blake considered this latter fact with an uncomfortable shiver, as he remembered the strangely short stature of the dim figure at which he had fired.

It may be said that the brief sequel fits in suspiciously well with the story, but I have no more reason to doubt the one than the other. A year or two later Blake was relating the above tale to a veteran miner whom he had never seen before and has never seen since. They simply met, and made chums over mining reminiscences, in a place of public resort. As the story proceeded, the old fellow became keenly interested and at its close he exclaimed:—

"What did you say this man's name was lad"?

"Clancy," replied Blake; "John Clancy." "Then I knew him my boy," said the old man, "knew him in the very place he died. He was there with his chum, a quiet innocent sort of a chap, and they were making a big pile. But all of a sudden his chum disappeared, and Clancy seemed in a hurry to leave the place. But although we were not too particular in those days, we thought there was something very suspicious in the matter, so although we could not well hang him up on suspicion, we formed a rough court, fined him of most of his pile, which was surprisingly big, and kicked him out of the camp. Draw your own conclusions boy, mine are pretty clear." (And so are mine.)

Drawn.

(a) This is the Ruy Lopez Opening, with the positions reversed.

(b) White's play is perfectly sound here, but the result is a wholesale exchange of pieces, which leaves, the gamejvery dry and featureless. Q Kt to K 4 might have been tried here without danger.

(c) White might have capturad Bishop with pawn, and afterwards moved up P to K B 4 with safety.

(d) Very weak; nothing is gained by advancing the Rook's pawn which monopolises the whole energy of the Rook in defending him.

(e) This manœuvre might have been tried at least as advantageously before the Kings were brought up.

(f) Here black should have played his king into the centre of the board at once. White's next move entirely prevents him

(g) The end game is indifferently conducted on both sides. The proper move for Black at this point is—62 P. to K. R. 5, by which he evidently secures for himself two spare moves with his Pawns more than his adversary. These spare moves must have given him the opposition and the game.

CYCLING AND MOTORING IN ENGLAND.

What promises to be one of the most interesting motor cycle contests abroad during the coming season is the race from Paris to Ostend and back promoted by the Autocycle Club de France, the date fixed being 18th to 21st May. The event will be made up of five sections, as follow:—Third of a litre capacity motor-cycles, quarter of a litre motor-cycles, tricars with a maximum cylinder capacity of half a litre, 6 and 8 h.-p. voiturettes. As one or two English cracks have announced their intention of competing, they are informed that when presenting their machines for sealing purposes (all parts will be sealed during the whole race, and any competitor attempting fraud will be instantly disqualified) they must produce a certificate granted by the Automobile Club. This must attest that the motor has been measured and sealed by the said A. C., and must state dimension of motor, bore, and stroke. Full particulars as to entry fees and other regulations can be obtained by applying to the headquarters of the Autocycle Club de France, 23, Rue Jean-Jacques-Rousseau, Paris. C. R. Collier, the holder of the principal English records, has announced his intention of competing.

A Promising Putney Star.

Although at the present time there is a scarcity of real champions in the London district, a visit to Herne Hill reveals the fact that there are at least half a dozen riders who should be near winning championship honours. One of these is W. Lower, who, under the charge of William Gardiner, one of the head trainers at Herne Hill, is already moving in fine style. In build and manner Lower very closely resembles the late Arthur Linton, and he is undoubtedly a very game finisher. He did not ride in many races last year, but each time he entered he showed considerable improvement, and when he won the double event at the Polytechnic meeting he struck one as being a very promising crack. At the Billingsgate Sports he won a half-mile heat from fifty yards in 56½secs. without any undue strain, and later he won the double event at Reading, a three miles scratch race at the Crystal Palace, and in the one mile London Centre championship he proved a very worthy opponent to Buck, the ultimate winner, the judge's verdict being but a few inches in favour of the Anerley crack. At the south London Harriers' meet at the Oval, Lower secured the mile from the seventy yards mark in 2mins. 19⅘ secs., and, barring accidents, he is sure to be among the prizes at Easter.

An Excellent Notion.

The recent trip to Brighton undertaken by four pupils of the Motor Academy on an academy car, was so successful that Mr. Turberville Smith has decided to organize a series of such trips. On 10th March the car made a journey of 130 miles to and from Oxford, four pupils each taking a turn at the wheel. On each succeeding Sunday a car is to be put in charge of a quartette of students for the purpose of giving them that actual road experience of car-control which can be secured in no other way. The directors of the school in Boundary-road, Holland Park-Avenue, are convinced that short jaunts in neighbouring thoroughfares are of no practical value, and have adopted this satisfactory, if expensive, alternative.

Items of Interest.

Fred. Hatton, the popular racing honorary secretary of the Manchester Wheelers—one of the richest clubs in existence—was among the visitors at the Olympia Motor Show, and informed me that the racing prospects up North were particularly rosy. Says he, "Cycle racing is not dead; when good programmes are put up and the public made aware of the fact then it is easy to draw from 15,000 to 25,000 spectators. If, however, there are only the usual handicap races, and say one scratch race, then it's very difficult to draw 5,000 spectators."—Peters, the coloured crack, who is training at Herne Hill, is a well built young fellow, and when he gets accustomed to fast surfaces should show up well.—The Anerley B.C.'s meet at the Crystal Palace on Easter Monday is the only one in London devoted purely to cycle racing, while every class of rider from the novice to the single pace follower is catered for. As will be seen from the advertisement which appears below the entry fee is but one shilling for each event, the competitor's ticket admitting to the Crystal Palace all day on Easter Monday. Racing economists will no doubt take advantage of the A.B.C.'s meet and enter in full force.—A £20 cash prize is put up for the professional scratch race at Ton-y-pandy on Easter Monday.—The pick of the London cracks have now received their amateur licences for 1907.

Overheard in Kensington Gardens.

Two smartly-dressed little minxes, not more than eight years old each, thus addressed a demure little lass about the same age:

"We don't want to play with you. You're quite shabby. You haven't even been operated on for appendicitis. Please go away!"

A pretty American girl had been staying at a large house in the Midlands. Someone asked her if she had enjoyed herself. She replied: "Well, I guess I must have been a bit of a failure. There were four doors to my bedroom, and I never even got a tap."

Scotch witness, somewhat given to prevarication, was severely handled by a cross-examining counsel. "How far is it between the two farms?" said the counsel. "By the road it's twa mile." "Yes, but, on your oath, how far is it as the crow flies?" "I dinna ken; I never was a crow."

A young curate, wishing to add to his funds for charities, and at the same time to provide a little wholesome recreation for his parishioners, thought he could not do better than to get up a gymkhana. The tidings of this event were soon spread around, and reached great popularity when the curate, walking in the town, was greeted by a young lady of his flock in loud tones thus: "Oh Mr. Small, do let me know when your pyjama comes off!"

I have now had six months' experience of my 30-40 h.p. Daimler Motor Car, and I can truly say that I am quite delighted with it in every possible respect.

Like all my Cars, it has had to run nearly every day in all sorts of weather (including snow), and over all sorts of roads, yet it has never once failed or even faltered.

Moreover, I cannot imagine a better Hill Climber than it is, and hill climbing is a specially important matter to anyone living, as I do, in a very hilly district.

"WASTING."

Few men who get up to steer a horse or pony in a race can do it without more or less wasting, generally rather more than less; and happy is he who can go to scale in the comfortable certainty of drawing the weight required without more preparation than he has given himself by riding training gallops. The young G. R., the ambitious rider whose heart is entirely in the business and regards ability to ride, say 8st. 7lbs. as the first duty of man, is a little apt to overdo the thing before he realises that what he succeeds in getting off is not his only loss. Far be if from us to discourage the leading of the strenuous life—for it is strenuous though not in the sense usually understood—necessary for race riding: always provided that preparation be not carried to excess the process of training down to take mounts means in very many cases return to the most wholesome and active mode of life we can lead. Polo, we need hardly observe is about as good a way of preparing for the race meeting as human ingenuity could devise, always provided that we do not celebrate conclusion of the evening's play by the consumption of more pegs than are absolutely necessary to replace the loss of tissue. Few men under middle age in this country can be taxed with over indulgence in the way of food: in the hot weather most of us are not inclined to eat, and the temptations provided by bazar and bawarchi are not difficult to resist; but we "take it out in drinks," and long drinks impose upon us the necessity of wasting quite as hard when the time comes as would long dinners. Liquor of any kind puts up weight; the maxim would be useful to the temperance advocate were it not that it is bulk and not alcohal which does the harm, from a banting point of view, and the bulk consists of Aerated waters to consumption of which no temperance man we ever met has urged objection. Were we asked to advise any young G. R. on the subject of wasting our advice would be primarily to renounce the soda and stick to the filter. Aerated Waters as some experienced horseman has remarked, it was the late Captain Hayes or we are much mistaken—are so refreshing it is almost impossible to refrain from taking too much of them. As for the rest, in view of the slender temptations set before us, we should be inclined to let the young G. R. enjoy the run of his teeth, so long as the scale shows that he is not actually gaining weight; it is an easy matter enough for the man who is in normal condition to get off from 3 to 5lbs. in as many days and that without any extravagant physical work or exercise of self-denial.

We are averse from strong measures, the use of medicine and fast walks in heavy clothing, except under special circumstances, though we know some men who decline to vary their ordinary way of life—as regards drinks—on the ground that a favourite nostrum will enable them to get off half a stone within twelve hours: no doubt there are some men who can do this without any bad result immediately and thereafter, but the method is not one to be recommended. The placid man of sound constitution may take such liberties with himself and discover no bad result; he may be able to ride as good a race after it as he would have done without recourse to drugs; but such immunity is not granted us all. The man need not be of conspicuously nervous temperament to suffer heavily from recourse to this method of getting off weight; training down much below the normal weight as most people know, has a damaging effect upon the temper; and this simply indicates disturbance of the nervous system due to over-setting of the normal condition of body. Violent methods produce this result on the nervous system for a time, and though the effects soon pass away, the time during which they are most apparent is just the time when the man should be at his best, his nerves cool and undisturbed, his muscular system braced and his vitality, in a word, at its highest. Far more races in this country are lost by over preparation than by the reverse ; and we are firmly convinced that in the vast majority of cases it is infinitely better to declare a few pounds over weight than to take strong measures to get rid of the excess.

We are all very much alive to the unwisdom of overding it with our horses ; we should be wise to apply the same principle to ourselves. The Americans who, with their peculiar thoroughness have made training (for boat races) a scientific study as nearly as it can be made, have came to the conclusion that much more is lost than is gained by a rigorous system of training. Of course the lessons they have drawn from their careful observation of an eight in training, do not apply with exactness to the jockey in training ; in the one case the eight with its varied constitutions and temperaments is subjected to a common standard : the traning has to be adjusted loosely to suit all : moreover a few extra stone in a boat's crew is comparatively speaking a small matter, and may often mean an advantage in the shape of the increased muscle so necessary to get the best work ; but broadly speaking the principles adopted to put the men in the boat on the race day in the highest possible condition apply to preparation for race riding. If the jockey is going to ride one race in the day perhaps a little over training will not greatly affect his performance in the saddle, though we should regard his chances with doubt were the event a steeplechase : but when, thanks to light weight and sound judgment he finds his services in request for the whole programme ; when he accepts mounts on animals of all sorts and dispositions some of which he may never have seen before the syces bring them down to the course, the man who has "rather overdone it" is apt to discover his mistake. He may not find it out in full force during the first two or three events unless they are closely fought out and his riding powers are taxed ; but most assuredly he will find it out during the latter part of the day and be quite unable to do justice to his own reputation and to his mount. In no department of life is moderation more to be counselled than in training for the saddle : the man who through over wasting is "done" before his mount is infinitely more likely to be beaten than he would be had he kept himself judiciously fit at the cost of declaring five pounds extra. It needs moral courage to refuse a good mount when we know that it is physically possible for us to get down to the weight : but if we cannot do it without affecting that subtle "nervous system" and throwing the whole frame for a time off its balance, refusal is the better part ; it is fairer to the owner who has paid us the compliment of offering the mount and fairer to ourselves who have other engagements which we can fulfil without undue wasting.

Sporting Notes.

Eight of the twenty-three starters in the Grand National struggled home this year, the procession being even more strung out than usual. Eremon's victory was extremely popular the more so as the crowd seem to have grasped that his jockey was in trouble early in the chase. The home papers are full of his feat in getting the course successfully in spite of breaking a leather at the second fence and being continuously interfered with by the riderless Rathvale. Without detracting from the performance in the least it must be admitted that this riding minus a leather, uncomfortable though it is, cannot be so very, very difficult since so many jockeys succeed in doing it. In our own little world we have heard of quite ordinary riders travelling the best part of a paperchase course in the same predicament, and although the comparison may at first sight appear to be a descent from the sublime to the ridiculous the fact remains and will bear working out. But in this case no doubt Newey's difficulties were greatly increased by the vagaries of Rathvale, and although the latter did him several good turns by upsetting his nearest pursuers, more particularly Ascetic's Silver, Newey could hardly have appreciated his assistance until the race was over. Eremon began life in a country cart it seems, but lost no time in shewing his metal as a 'chaser, winning a hunt steeplechase very soon after being put into training. Thence forward he advanced by rapid strides and was well thought of by the newspaper critics and much fancied by his connections for the great race at Aintree. After this purchase at fifty pounds there is a distinct hope for the most impecunious cross countryman. To return to the "ridiculous" ; would any one be vastly astonished to see Lord Harry win the Tollygunge Grand National next New Year's Day. Once it had happened there would be dozen men in the paddock who had fully expected it weeks before the race. If the Calcutta course were a little less simple and included a dozen solid steeplechase fences, even a dozen, a horse like Captain Holden's bay would have a very reasonable chance even on terms. Some day this race will be a handicap and we may hope to see more competition than customary at present.

The programme for the Calcutta Races, 1907-1908, is now published and in addition to the changes already noticed there are one or two noteworthy alterations from last year's prospectus.

The following rule has been added to the General Conditions ;

"If in a pony race there are less than eight entered in bona fide separate interests the race may be declared void." This will give the Stewards discretion to strike out some of the half backed races to which we were treated in this class last year and probably points to a doubt in the minds of the executive as to whether some of last season's pony races were not padded up with entries in the interest of the owners who really meant business. The appearance of the rule looks very like the beginning of the end, namely, the abolition of pony racing on the Calcutta course, an end to which we have been steadily moving for a number of years past, unnoticed until comparatively recently by many of those favorably interested in the closed class.

The suggested formation of another Turf Club in India to control the military meetings in the northern provinces is not likely to obtain unanimous support, and its proposers probably underestimate the difficulties and responsibilities which have to be faced and undertaken by the executive of a Turf Club. The two existing organizations are now in thorough working order and fully capable of continuing the control of these distant meetings and their authority and supervision would be with difficulty replaced. A subsidiary Association to promote racing in Northern India might on the other hand do much useful work, as there is at present no permanent body representative of military racing to influence the legislation of the big Turf Clubs in favor of "mofussil" racing. The present trend of rule-making is rather to foster the advance of the two or three big meetings irrespective of the consequent effects upon the small up-country meetings. The several Executives of the Turf Clubs have only to be approached with a suggestion from an authoritative source to render prompt assistance and support, but such an authority is at present sadly needed.

The most interesting of the expected changes in the new season's programme has not been confirmed in the Racing Calendar. It was said that the Calcutta Plate had been changed from a handicap into an open six-furlong race, but the value of this race has been raised from to Rs. 5,000 and there may be some mistake in the printing of the terms.

It is said that Mr. Apcar has purchased yet another flier in England ; his latest acquisition being Golden Gleam, a Chestnut colt by Bend Or—Fascination. This colt won the Wokingham Stakes in 1906, carrying 8st. and beating a fair field amongst others Paddy's Darling at 6st. 3lbs. Sermon will not find himself at the top of the handicaps after all if this young gentleman takes a liking to the Indian climate.

Dalkeith's unexpected victory in the first of the big Spring Handicaps will make English critics a trifle more respectful of Indian form. If only Great Scot can repeat the lesson in the Metropolitan and Chester Cup all the racing men on leave this summer will get their trip for nothing as they are all certain to have a trifle on the old chestnut for old time's sake. What a magnificent horse he is too ; one of the good old cut that they very seldom see in England now-a-days.

Good news for all shooters of Indian feathered game! Mr. E. C. Stuart-Baker's valuable articles on The Indian Ducks and their Allies, which have been the feature of the journal of the Bombay Natural History Society for some time, are to be produced in book form with all the coloured plates which have so far appeared. These plates, absolutely correct and of high pictorial merit, are the work of the first ornithological artists of the day, while Mr. Baker's letterpress, as we all know, is that of our leading authority on Indian ducks and an experienced shikari to boot. The book will probably be out by October next. We await its appearance with much interest.

As the season for hunting big game has commenced, it appears opportune to offer some remarks regarding accidents in encounters with dangerous animals, the record of which is annually repeated with unfailing regularity, writes "R.G.B." in the Pioneer. The majority of such unfortunate occurrences are preventible, and are in many cases due to the neglect on the part of the sportsman of the most ordinary precautions, and, in the case of novices, to ignorance of the nature and habits of the wild beasts with which they have to deal. In the majority of instances these accidents occur in encounters with tigers and panthers, by reason of the greater ferocity and activity of these animals, and owing to their habits of concealment, while the wounds they inflict are frequently mortal, due to the terrible armature of the beasts and the poisonous conditions of tooth and claw. It may be remarked, in the first place, that an animal of the feline species should not be fired at by a man on the ground when it is facing him. Struck by a bullet a tiger or panther seldom turns; it almost invariably follows straight on in the direction it was facing. If an animal is met with in this manner the shot should not be fired until it is passing or has turned. Usually, however, the sportsman is on the safe vantage of a tree, bank, or rock, not so much for the sake of safety, as to ensure the chance of getting a shot. For animals do not look upwards, but are quick to see anything moving on their own level. It may perhaps seem superfluous to say that a good rifle should be used ; but lives have been lost owing to the use of small-bores or express rifles with inefficient projectiles. The '500 express with a heavy hollow pointed bullet, weighing 440 grains, will be found sufficient for any tiger. This will deliver a knock-down blow, and another shot should be put in if the animal is still alive. A double-barrelled weapon is better than a magazine, which is noisy and probably of too small a calibre.

The tiger or panther should, if possible, be killed within sight, but sometimes following up a wounded animal is unavoidable. Nor should a wounded and dangerous beast be left in the jungle. When about to follow up, all the men should first be assembled in one spot, so that there may be no stragglers. The sportsman should examine his rifle, take out each cartridge and replace it after looking down the barrels to see that they are clear; dead leaves, bark, or earth may have got into them in descending from the tree. The hammers should be cocked, or the safety bolt pushed forward if the rifle is hammerless. These elementary instructions may appear unnecessary, but lives have been lost by their neglect. A sportsman was killed by a tiger some years ago, owing to his having neglected to reload his rifle when following up the wounded animal; another lost his life by failing to cock his rifle, and trying to fire at a charging beast when the hammers were down. The greatest caution is needed in following up. The sportsman should keep above the animal where possible, and must have every sense alert. A few trustworthy men, armed with spare guns or rifles, may be taken, and one or two men sent up trees at intervals during the advance. A charge of buckshot in a gun is very effective. The reports of natives should not, however, be implicitly trusted; their lively imaginations will not infrequently see the quarry, dead or alive, in every bush or stone. The sportsman should be careful to keep his eyes not on the tracks, but ahead. If anyone is wounded, the injuries should be washed out with hot water, and syringed with a solution of carbolic acid; they may then be dusted with iodoform or boracic powder and bandaged. A supply of these antiseptics as well as lint and bandages should always be taken on a shooting expedition.

If due precautions are taken, the chances of accident will be greatly minimised, for such catastrophes are generally due to carelessness or to neglect of one of the precautions that have been indicated. Care should be taken that those following up a wounded animal do not scatter, or it is highly probable that one will be seized. Bears are more easily killed owing to their comparatively slow movement, and are therefore not as dangerous as tigers or panthers, which will charge like a flash of light. ["R.G.B." ought to know. Ed., I F.] Nor is the bear able to conceal itself so easily; one of the feline species will hide behind a very small bush, or in a slight depression of the ground. But the bear will do what the tiger or panther seldom does—it will charge even though unwounded. Consequently Bruin is not to be despised, and although he is generally easily killed, even when charging from a few yards' distance. While his attack frequently terminates in a mere hostile demonstration, he should be approached with circumspection. One thing is most certain—that it is dangerous to fire at a bear immediately above one. In such circumstances he comes down hill like an avalanche and the sportsman is likely to be knocked over, and sustain severe injuries in the process, even if he does not suffer from teeth and claws.

A correspondent writing to a Bombay paper, describes a white tiger recently seen by him. The beast, he says, "was killed some time ago near Orissa, it measures 9 feet from head to tip, is quite white and the stripes, instead of being black as usual, are brown; it is certainly not an albino." We have ourselves seen the skins of two white tigers and described them in print years ago; in neither were the stripes visible except in certain lights, or when the skins were wet.

A Calcutta shikari was in our office last week solemnly declaring that he had only the other day plainly seen a black tiger, and furnishing details which certainly suggested that he was not mistaken. He is an old hand at machan shooting, and we believe is at the moment out in quest of that particular beast. Mr. C. T. Buckland, many years ago, wrote of a black tiger which he had seen shot near Chittagong.

An observer writes to a Western India paper:—"One evening about a fortnight ago, as I was resting on a bench near the Museum in the Victoria Gardens, I saw a cat jumping backwards, forwards and sideways in a small patch of shrubs bordering on one of the garden walks. I watched her proceedings for about five minutes when I saw her come out in the open carrying something in her mouth. I ran up to see what it was she had caught and to my surprise I saw it was a snake. With the aid of a ramosi I got her to drop her prey, which I noticed she had disabled, there being two marks of her teeth, one on the neck and the other in the centre of its body. It was of the green variety, about thirty inches in length.

Our personal experience is that cats frequently do this: many years ago we possessed one which killed quite a number of small snakes round and about our bungalow on the banks of the Pudda River.

We have been asked by a few who thirst for zoological knowledge what has become of Mr. Frank Finn whose regular contributions to The Indian Field were, we have reason to think, a popular feature of the paper up to within a few months ago. As we had not heard from our old friend since last September we were beginning to fear that he might have "hatched himself a cherubim" when our eye fell on a notice of his latest book—Ornithological and Other Oddities—just published by John Lane, London. This may explain his silence; he has evidently been busy, too busy to think of his public on this side of the world, but we have no doubt his latest contribution to bird literature will compensate us in some degree for having been "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of neglect." We have not yet seen a copy of the "Oddities;" but it has been very favourably reviewed in England. This is what the Shooting Times has to say about it.

"In a very short preface we learn from the author of the work on review, Mr. Frank Finn, that the majority of the essays contained in the same first made their appearance in various London periodicals, and we can say that the interesting articles can well bear repetition in book form. The author chiefly deals with bird life; but towards the close of the work we are introduced to some monkeys and other four-footed friends of the writer. The story commences with "The Study of Sexual Selection," and, indeed, like human beings, the lower creation has its whims and fancies in selecting partners. Then follows "The Courting of Birds," the males donning their most gorgeous apparel to entice the love of the lady-bird. Writing about "Hybrid Birds," Mr. Finn tells us—and we believe his statement to be correct—that "wild hybrids are indeed rare, but they are of much more frequent occurrence than is generally supposed." The author records some instances of fertile hybrids, although we believe, as a rule, most hybrids are sterile. The call of the cuckoo at home is indeed a welcome sound; but "Some Indian Cuckoos," the writers tells us, are not beloved by Anglo-Indians, the birds calling by night as well as by day. Short, pithy chapters are then devoted to "The Toilet of Birds," "The sense of smell in Birds," "Mimicry of Birds," and "Birds in the Moult." We quite agree with the writer that "few creatures are so active and joyous as wild parrots." That we have seen for ourselves; nevertheless we do not think the parrot suffers from confinement as does the lark. Birds that talk and mimic are recommended, though the list of talkative feathered friends is by no means exhausted. Lovely woman, despite all remonstrance, must have her adornments, one of which—the osprey feather—is much in demand. The author describes how osprey farming might be carried on to advantage. The home life of dozens of other birds is noted. A very learned and interesting chapter is that entitled "The Zoology of Herodotus," and we commend to those about to visit the "Shiny" the article on "The Treatment of Animals in India;" also one advising on park animals for London, although we fear there would be some difficulty and, perhaps, considerable expense in procuring all the specimens named. The introduction of the squirrel into London parks would, we believe, be welcomed by the inhabitants of the Metropolis. The volume is well illustrated, and is certainly a very amusing and highly instructive publication."

A sensational sale of a copy of a "Compleat Angler" took place at Sotheby's Auction Rooms on Saturday the 23rd ultimo. This was a book from the Rowfant library, entitled "The Compleat Angler, or The Contemplative Man's Recreation," being "A Discourse of Fish and Fishing, not unworthy the perusal of most Anglers. Simon Peter said; I go a fishing; and they said we also will go with thee (John xxi., 3)" Thus runs the quaint title of a tiny book in sheepskin, covered with blue silk. Mr. Quaritch made the first bid of £200; then Mr. Massey joined in, and soon £1,000 was called. At £1,250 he had made his last bid, and Mr. Albert Jackson took a turn. At the enormous sum of £1,290, however, the Izaak Walton fell to Mr. Quaritch. Previously the record for the book was £415, paid in 1896.

When the order prohibiting the importation of ·450 sporting rifles or ammunition therefor was passed in September last by the Government of India it took both sportsmen and gunmakers very much by surprise, remarks the Country Gentleman. Their annoyance was equal to their surprise, because the ·450 was a popular sporting rifle for large game that was not only very largely in the possession of big-game shooters, but also being made in considerable numbers by their gunmakers. The grievance was so acutely felt that the matter was taken up by the gun trade sections of the London and Birmingham Chambers of Commerce and the Gunmakers Associations of these two centres, along with the Gunmakers of India. It was found that military reasons were given for the restrictions on ·450 and ·303 rifles on the contention that neither sporting nor trade interests should be permitted to overcome Imperial requirements even though the latter might result in seeming hardship. Though the reasons given for the restriction may not have been very convincing, it became clear that the Indian Military authorities were desirous of the adoption by sportsmen of rifles with calibres as distinct as possible from those used in war, and that the only point to argue about was how the change could be made with the least possible friction and inconvenience to the world of sport and those earning their livings by depending upon it at home as well as abroad. Representations were accordingly made by manufacturers of rifles and ammunition for big-game shooting, and in reply the Secretary of State for India, while adhering to the decision to stop the importation of ·450 rifles agreed to a modification permitting the importation for a limited period of such rifles as had been actually ordered and under manufacture on 11th September 1906, applications therefor being receivable by him up to and including 1st May next, such applicants in all cases being required to furnish evidence of the bonâ-fides of the order. For the next month, therefore, manufacturers who had ·450 sporting rifles on order for India, and actually under construction when the notification was so suddenly made, are enabled to execute their orders and avoid the loss which must otherwise have fallen upon sportsmen employing them. Thus the most crying grievances of all have been removed on the representations referred to of the serious inconveniences entailed upon those who had acted in ignorance of the possible prohibition of ·450 rifles, or had obtained such rifles and were debarred from obtaining ammunition therefor. To meet the latter, dealers in India have been selected and licensed to hold a limited stock of ·450 rifle cartridges, other than of Martini-Henry pattern, making it possible for exempted persons possessing ·450 rifles to obtain ammunition in India from such selected dealers. While in the interests of sport, therefore, the prohibition is altogether regrettable, its worst feature has been considerably modified in response so far to the remonstrances on behalf of representative bodies of the gun and ammunition trades in this country and in India. For such concessions as have been obtained, sportsmen have mainly to thank the alertness of the London Chamber of Commerce as representing the manufacturers prejudiced by the unexpected prohibition.

A couple of good cards have been put out for the Mahableshwar Sky Races which are fixed to take place on Thursday and Saturday, 9th and 11th May.

Details of a tragic occurrence which took place at the Zoological Gardens at New York have just come to hand. A big cage in the Gardens had been occupied by a large Polar Bear for a long time, and it was desired to introduce a female bear which had only arrived a few weeks. Preliminary to the introduction the new bear was put in a shifting den which adjoined the one occupied by the old bear, and through the bars the two animals made acquaintance and seemed to be very friendly. According to the accounts, when the female was put in the den with the male, they began to play with each other, but in a very few moments the smaller bear was knocked down, and the large one caught her by the throat. Efforts were made by the keepers to separate the two animals, but with only partial success. But at last ropes were thrown over each, and they were dragged apart. It was too late, however, for the female died shortly after they were separated. It seems to be a question in the minds of those who witnessed the fracas whether the encounter was a fight, or merely a play so rough that the smaller bear which is said to weigh only a little over 500 pounds, to 900 pounds of the old bear, was choked to death and her throat torn. A case somewhat similar to to this happened at the Zoological Park two or three years ago, when a female jaguar was introduced to the cage of a large old male and was instantly grasped by the head and killed.

A dear old lady in the country had sent at Christmas to a very lively nephew in London a few jars of cherries, from her own garden, preserved in brandy, and she wrote: "My dear nephew, I am sending you some of our favourite cherries, preserved in brandy so that they may keep. I hope you and your friends will enjoy them." To which young hopeful replied: "My dear aunt,—A thousand thanks for your kind gift, I appreciate the cherries immensely, not so much for themselves, as for the spirit in which they are sent."

Some horses are naturally addicted to stumbling, others acquire the fault, and still others have the stumbling habit thrust upon them, says an exchange. In the first, it is almost incurable, but the second and third causes can be remedied by the rider or driver. If the ground is rough or uneven, horses with a low action are prone to stumble. Other horses which are naturally slipshod, generally stumble because they do not lift their feet high enough from the ground. Laziness is another cause for stumbling, and horses that are heavy in front, or whose fore legs are weak or unsound, have the same fault. Very often carelessness on the part of the driver causes a horse to stumble. This makes it necessary always to bear in mind the value of keeping the horse well in hand and sufficiently collected. If the habit is due to laziness, it can often be cured by riding or driving the horse over rough ground until he has been broken of the fault. But in all cases the cure rests with the driver or rider. The most sure-footed of horses is bound to stumble at times, but this can be reduced to a minimum by keeping a tight rein. A slack rein is often the sole cause for stumbling. If fatigue is the cause, extra care must be taken to keep the horse well up to the bit. No good horseman will ever take chances of his horse stumbling by allowing a slack rein. Stumbling is not only an annoying habit, but it often results in serious injury and many times in the total disability of the animal. While an habitual tendency to stumble often does not admit of a cure, the average case can be prevented by the methods suggested above.

A two days' Open Gymkhana will be held at Meerut to-day and Saturday.

The number of persons reported to have been killed in the Madras Presidency by wild animals and snakes during the year 1906 was 1,852, or 343 less than in the previous year. Decreases occurred in most districts, the most noticeable being reported in Godavery and Salem, though the decrease in the former is not so large as the figures show, as the returns for the district are incomplete. There was a considerable increase in the numbers killed in Cuddapah. The number of cattle destroyed increased by 148. The total number of wild beasts for which rewards were paid during the year was 890, or 81 more than the previous year. The amount paid for their destruction was Rs. 14,565. A sum of Rs. 12,882 was spent during the year on the removal of noxious undergrowth.

Concerning elephants in the Coorg Forests, Mr. McCarthy, Deputy Conservator of Forests, remarks in his annual report:—"In consequence of the general scare in the jungles resulting from the adjacent Mysore Khedda operations for the Royal Visit in January, very few elephants were left in those forests of this province in which the capturing pits lie. Also the drought confined the few that remained to the immediate neighbourhood of large rivers where alone water was available. Only five animals were captured, of which four survive at present. The cost of the capturing operations was Rs. 1,360, and that of the feed and keep of the whole stud Rs. 6,979. The annual sales in October realised Rs. 15,420 for eleven animals, whilst the department retained ten for timber dragging operations. The number of animals on hand at the end of the year is 14, of which four will be sold in October."

The Simla Sporting fixtures will begin next month and after the first Gymkhana at Annandale the out-door gaieties will be in full swing. This year Captain Holden, of the Bodyguard, is Honorary Secretary of the Annandale Club and he may be relied on to keep things moving. The Polo Tournament week begins on 10th June; the summer races on the 28th, 30th May and 1st June; the autumn races in October. Gymkhanas will be held weekly. The Simla Cricket Club vs. Outstations Match takes place on 4th and 6th June. The Horse and Dog Show is in June, and the Durand Football Tournament in September. For the races the Stewards are: General Sir Beauchamp Duff, Colonel de Courcy Hamilton, Colonel J. W. Morgan, Colonel R. C. Broome, and Mr. Fell, C.S., with Captain H. N. Holden, Secretary. The first day card will include the Jakko Plate (a hurdle race), the Novice Plate, Griffin Plate, the Minto Cup (given by H. E. the Viceroy), a six furlong handicap for all ponies 14 2, and the Schwaiger Cup given by Mr. Imre Schwaiger. The second day will include seven events, the most attractive of which will be the Kitchener Cup, valued at Rs. 250 and presented by H. E. the Commander-in-Chief.

We print, under "Races to Come," the programme of the Darjeeling Sky Races to be held on the 21st, 23rd and 25th May, entries closing on the 20th idem. Mr. Kenneth L. Mackenzie is Honorary Secretary and it goes without saying that the card for each day is a full and attractive one.

Told in a whisper. A very high dignitary of the Church, well known as the author of some charming books, was dining out the other evening. Of the two ladies between whom he was seated, the one on the right hand side was an intimate acquaintance, and in the course of dinner, noticing that her distinguished neighbour was very silent and distrait, said to him, sotto voce, "I am afraid you are not very well this evening; you do not seem in your usual spirits." "Well, to tell you the truth," said the dignitary, "I am not quite the thing, and must apologise for seeming so rude and preoccupied; but the fact is, I am in rather a nervous state of mind about my health, and have a sort of presentiment that a serious illness is hanging over me; I am conscious of a peculiar numbness all down my right side, which seems to forebode an attack of paralysis." His fair companion expressed her hope that such fears were ill-founded, and suggested that he might be mistaken as to the sensation of apparent numbness which he described. "Ah, no!" he replied. "I'm afraid there's no doubt of it, for I have been pinching my right leg all the dinner-time, and can elicit no responsive feeling whatever. The limb seems dead to all feeling." "Oh!" exclaimed the lady, briskly, and with a feeling of intense relief on her face, "if that is all that troubles you I think I can at once relieve your mind from anxiety, for the leg which you have been pinching all the evening is mine!"

Among our English athletic news to-day will be found details of the Inter-Varsity Sports—the bare results of which have been given in our special telegram—the Amateur and Public Schools' Boxing Championships and some remarks on Reece's extraordinary billiard record.

Mr. Beach Thomas, writing in the National Review, on "The Failure of Games, has some interesting remarks on certain tendencies in the favourite sports of the day. One of these tendencies is the growing specialisation of games which begins in school days. Mr. Thomas declares that a boy specialist is "a horrible idea," and that a school team, as well as an individual, ought to be able to do many things well before it takes precedence—to shoot well, to swim well, to drill smartly, no less than to win house matches at a game. Yet, with the growing popularity of sport, specialisation was bound to come. It is the only condition by which supreme excellence can be reached. In the physical, as in the intellectual, sphere, few boys or men can gain the highest success unless they concentrate their energies on one branch of sport. How seldom is a great cricketer, a first rate sculler, or an expert pugilist a proficient rifle shot. Yet specialism in sports has its drawbacks. In America, says Mr. Thomas, the finished athlete is often a pampered specialised being, as little fit for citizen service as the poor sweated factory hand, whose one accomplishment is packing files. It is, he considers, a poor accomplishment to run a quarter of a mile in 49secs., if you cannot handle a gun or a group of men. One of the results of specialisation is professionalism in sports, as a man who excels all others in a particular game can hardly be blamed for turning his skill to account as a means of making a living. Another feature equally inevitable is the growth of a large class of people who take no part in games, but like to watch them and read about them.

Mr. Thomas thinks that it is a confession of vice for a nation's youth to spend their hours looking at other men, who are paid for the job, engaged in kicking goals; and sighs over the black-coated company of sedentary youths who assemble round a football match at Fulham, rave over its progress, and sulk over local defeats. Those who watch the game on Saturday afternoon read about it on Sunday morning. It is the same with other games. Mr. Thomas mentions a gentle little scholar of 15, who knew by heart the breaks of all the great billiard players, and could tell you off hand the points and positions of the leading league clubs. No doubt this concentration of interest in sports is carried to excess, but up to a certain point it is quite legitimate. No one can be blamed for enjoying an international cricket match or a billiard tournament, and if it is allowable for one, why should it not be for thousands? The mistake is to regard sports as the serious business of life, and take no interest in anything else. Specialisation, professionalism, and the differentiation between players and spectators are inevitable accompaniments of a highly-developed system of sports. At the same time something may, with advantage, be done in encouraging games that are not purely competitive. Mr. Seton Thompson, the popular author of books on animal life, has, we are told, achieved unparalleled success with clubs for boys from the New York slums by a system of ahtletics—with an Indian camp fire and a totem pole as nucleus—in which the reaching of a standard is substituted for the star principle of victory. Proficiency in wood and field lore is also part of this excellent system.

Our Bombay correspondent writes:—It is an extraordinary thing how difficult it is to change a custom; this is apparent even in a small thing like a hockey ground. I remarked before that a very late start has been made this year with the Hockey season and that the Cooperage is not available. This last fact is responsible for the lack of interest in the games going on and the public seem absolutely to refuse to watch them on any of the other grounds.

The most important item of news is the disbandment of the Cathedral High School Old Boys' team, as the rules point out that only clubs, in the proper sense of the word, may enter for the Aga Khan Tournament. This materially assists other teams, and especially the Customs who, under Mr. P. R. Cadell, visited Poona and did well in their division of the said tourney. They played with quite a new set of men and consequently lacked combination, but with practice are admitted to be about the best of Bombay's teams.

Perhaps the best game, from all points, was seen on Saturday, when the Bombay Gymkhana met the Customs. It was a hard game throughout and, being fast, was full of interest till the Gymkhana eventually won by a margin of 3 goals to nil.

At centre forward the Gymkhana possess an old English International in Mr. Cole and he played brilliantly, scoring the three goals registered. The team, as a whole, is a promising one and if taken in hand carefully may rise to its old importance and strength.

Entries are very large for the Doubles and Singles Tennis Handicaps, now on in the Gymkhana. In the latter, two games have been played in one of which P. M. D. Sanderson beat G. de Rhe Philipe after a hard struggle by 4—6, 6—4, 6—4. The former's mark is—15·2 and the latter's—15·3. In the other game H. Reid—40·3 beat S. Clements, scratch, very easily by 6—2, 6—0.

In a moderate wind three races were sailed at the Yacht Club on Saturday. Four started for the B class Handicap which saw Mannikin win on time, but a protest was lodged and the prize could not then be awarded; Trixie was second from scratch.

Coralie won the T. and C. class, for which seven sailed, after a good race with Maud, Clutha third and Tomtit the Class Prize.

Of the four for the A Class Turquoise did not finish and two scratch boats, Swin and Swale had the race to themselves; the former winning fairly comfortably.

London Week by Week.

Friday, 29th March 1907.

November mornings—orthodox November—have prevailed all the week: we wake in fog, breakfast by artificial light and look for sunrise about eleven o'clock. By that hour the sun has generally managed to penetrate the fog and by noon has dispersed it: but all the sunshine of the longest day cannot relieve us of the dirt which the fog holds in suspense and leaves behind it. Monday's fog was particularly obnoxious: it was a dead still day and as the morning wore on the fog grew more and more foul, proving that it retained possession of all the smoke: the wreaths of soot that adorned doorsteps and pavements after were a sight.

The Easter exodus is as large as usual, and the shops are taking the prolonged holiday which has become the rule of recent years. If customers go out of town clearly there can be no use keeping the shutters down, but the result is gloomy for those who shun the crowded trains to, and hotels at, holiday resorts. The Russian sailors who, at the King's wish, paid a visit to town did not see London at its best: the morning fogs should have been enough to damp their 118 spirits, but they go about their sight-seeing with energy and apparent delight. If Russian sailors keep themselves informed concerning world politics the "crowd that cheers but not discriminates" must puzzle them not a little: but perhaps their British cicerones explain that Londoners don't regard foreign guests through political spectacles. They put up at the Grand, Charing Cross and "did" the Hippodrome and Alhambra, sandwiching a drive through the streets and a massive dinner between the performances. The men were evidently a picked lot for all were of splendid physique.

German acquiescence in the steps taken by France to obtain satisfaction for the murder of her citizens in Morocco has put an end to the prospects of a row which were thought decidedly rosy in the earlier part of the week. Germany would of course have put herself quite in the wrong had she opposed the occupation of Udja; but perhaps she thinks the situation will afford a more plausible opening for interference by and bye.

I did not go to the meeting in Russell Square, held under the auspices of the Times and the Book Club on Tuesday. The purpose of the meeting was to consider the advisability of starting a publishing company, and the meeting approved the plan. The Times announced this decision in a few lines of large type, but observed judicious reticence concerning the proceedings: not a single name was mentioned. This reticence seems to me very wise, for the vengeful publishers would undoubtedly boycott any presumptuous author who would support the new movement: as they will any author who produces a book through the new company. Dearly as I should like to see the publishing fraternity brought to its bearings. Timeo Danaos, etc. There is too much of the American spirit in Printing House Square. I remember King Log and King Stork and stay my hand.

The first taximeter motor cabs made their appearance in town on Saturday: it is reported that there were a hundred of them distributed among the various cab ranks in City and West End. I asked the driver of one how he found it answered: whereto he made the cautious answer that it might be "the novelty" but he had not been idle for ten minutes together since eight in the morning and had "engagements" for the rest of the day. The instrument is fixed on a bracket in front of the cab so that the fare can study it all the time if he likes. By the way the Cabdrivers' Union held a meeting in the Park on Sunday to protest against taximeters among other innovations.

This being Holy Week there is little going on in the theatrical world. The Gaiety and Daly's close for the whole week: His Majesty's from Wednesday. What is going on is of little importance. Friday night saw the production of "The Gypsy Girl" at the Waldorf with Miss Sybil Arundale in the name part. Her acting of Katrina, the Gypsy Girl, who is not a gypsy at all was charming; she has two or three capital songs and her dancing is always a joy. The plot seems to depend on Katrina's engagement to Jack Willoughby and the jealousy of Pedro who tries, without even stage success, to get her into trouble by giving her a stolen bracelet. The piece, which is in two acts, depends less than do most musical plays upon spectacular effect: its strength lies in melodious numbers and clever dialogue: moreover there are some amusing situations, in virtue of all of which the Gypsy Girl was very cordially received. Mr. Claude Arundale is responsible for the book and music, Lyrics by Mr. Follett Thorpe and additional numbers by the author and Mr. Heffervaan: the authorship of these musical pieces is as mixed as the pieces themselves.

It is curious to observe how the public idea changes in regard to comfortable access to the theatre. Years ago Sir Henry Irving tried the plan of booking seats in the pit and gallery, but so little was advantage taken of the innovation that it was speedily given up. Mr. Cyril Maude is repeating the experiment at the Playhouse in respect of all parts but the gallery, and reports that it meets a very general want. I suppose there are some who cling tenaciously to the doubtful privilege of standing for hours en queue at the pit door.

An American play, "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch," a dramatised version of the so popular book by R. H. Rice, is to be produced at Terry's on 25th April. Mr. Lewis Waller is going to revive Lady Clancarty and Sir Charles Wyndham will revive The Lears early next month to keep things going until Mr. H. H. Davis' new play The Mollux can be put on.

Nor is there much to record concerning the music halls: a mild flutter has been caused by the assertion of the manager of one hall that the biograph pictures of the Grand National shown at another are "faked" from films of last year's race: but I surmise that for the great B. P. in town one Liverpool is as good as another.

The Hippodrome is now the scene of a new sensation. A person of iron nerve named Speedy ascends to the top of a ladder 40 feet about the theatre roof (that not being high enough) and dives therefrom 130 feet into the submerged arena. He is a most amazing diver; he hardly goes under at all: it is said that he does not even wet the whole of his back! The feat is one that gives the mere onlooker most unpleasant feelings all down the spinal marrow. Mr. Speedy I presume has no special marrow.

Mr. Horace George Rayner was tried on Friday last, found guilty after the jury had deliberated for ten minutes and was sentenced to death. The 9th April has been appointed for the execution. The man went into the witness box and gave evidence on his own behalf with extraordinary composure; so free from embarrassment or appearance of fear that many in the court held his demeanour proof of insanity. The Lord Chief Justice, however, told the jury in his summing up that the question of sanity or the reverse must be dismissed from their minds; and truly no evidence worthy the name was offered to show that Rayner did not know what he was doing. Vigorous endeavours have been set on foot to obtain a reprieve: in various shops your attention is invited to forms of petition for signature, and there are plenty of kind people to set their names thereto. I suspect more signatures are prompted by report of the murdered man's moral character than by conviction that Rayner was not answerable for his actions. A question was asked in Parliament yesterday about the prospects of a reprieve. Mr. Gladstone is giving the matter "grave consideration"; but I conceive that is no more than the case of every sentenced murderer receives. [Alas! the sentence has been commuted as we have learned by telegram. —Ed.]

The points of contact between the Thaw case in New York and the Rayner case, jump to the eyes: and the contrast between an American trial for a sensational murder and ours compels comparison. In either case a wealthy man was the victim: in either case the murderer believed himself aggrieved: in either there is no possibility of disputing the circumstances under which life was taken: and in either the relations of the murdered man with women have played part. The heart of the contrast lies in the defence set up: insanity in either case. Rayner, for whose insanity there was at least as much to be said as there is for Thaw, has been tried, convicted and sentenced within the space of five hours. The Thaw trial began on 23rd January, and was adjourned on Wednesday, 27th March, more than two months after that a commission might investigate the plea of insanity: and when that commission shall have delivered its opinion, it is quite an open question whether the trial will drag on for another couple of months: while the prisoner, if sentenced, may take advantage of legal loop holes to procure a year or more of reprieve. I confess that British methods seem to me the more sane and satisfactory to everyone concerned; perhaps even to the prisoner.

Sirs,—In reply to your enquiry as to whether I have derived satisfaction from your Alterative Horse Powders, I beg to say I should not have sent for other lots had I not found them beneficial for their intended purpose. I don't approve of physicing horses, but these Powders seem to possess a harmless and special virtue. The object of your enquiry being to use my reply as a testimonial, you are at liberty to do so for what anybody may think my opinion worth.

It is a long time since the moderate drinker who likes his peg, has had a word said for him: and no doubt Dr. G. H. Savage will get into hot water with the teetotal people over passages in his lecture before the Royal College of Physicians dealing with "Insanity, Its Causes and Increase." The ratio of insane to sane has nearly doubled during the last fifty years in this country, and alcoholism was commonly held accountable for it. But the important fact that people are far more temperate now than they were fifty years ago is entirely overlooked: and Dr. Savage "sometimes wondered whether the complete change from alcoholic indulgence to temperance had a beneficial effect on the brains and nerves of the race." He believes that influenza is the modern predisposing cause: and regards it a real and efficient cause of insanity more powerful than all other causes put together. This is disturbing: we can stop drinking even in moderation, but who by taking thought can keep influenza to'ther side the hall door?

Mr. Martyn's quarrel with the Kildare Street Club has been common property in Dublin and, in less degree, London for many months past; and some of us were not surprised to hear that he was going to take it into court. To put it briefly Mr. Martyn, a Galway landowner of Nationalist leanings, said in one of the not wise speeches to which he is addicted that "any Irishman who enters the British army ought to be flogged" or words to that effect. The Club Committee took the matter up and Mr. Martyn was expelled by resolution of a meeting held in January 1906. He now challenges the right of the committee to shoot him out; the case will be heard in Dublin after Easter. Feeling on such matters runs high in Dublin and the committee's action was very generally approved.

The "Wagstaff case" has come to an end after a long hearing. A matter of £180,000 or rather the life interest therein was involved and the case was a singular one. Mrs. Jalland, Mr. Jalland being alive, went through the form of marriage with Mr. Wagstaff, and when the latter died claimed the life interest in his property he left as his "widow" so long as she remained his "widow." It was contended by other claimants that, inasmuch as the woman admitted bigamy, she could not be regarded as Wagstaff's widow for she undoubtedly was not in the legal and accepted meaning of the word. Mr. Justice Kekewich, however, has decided that the will intended to benefit Mrs. Jalland and awards the case to her. At the same time he advises the plaintiffs, and Mrs. Jalland, to try, and come to some arrangement instead of taking the matter to the Lords.

Is the Hippodrome a suitable place for love making when one of the parties is among the audience and the other in the arena and when both are giants? Mr. Darrill of Wagga Wagga, who is eight feet high, is smitten with the charms of Mariedl which is the other name of the Tyrolese giantess now in Leicester Square. Mr. Darrill and a friend bought tickets for the performance on Friday, and the manager assembling his myrmidons turned them out before they could take their seats: wherefore Mr. Darrill has applied for summons for assault which Mr. Denman granted. Mr. Darrill's desire to marry the giantess, and the Hippodrome manager's desire to discountenance the match are the alleged cause of expulsion. I should have thought the large gentleman's presence under such circumstances would be a novel attraction.

The Coliseum is for sale, and will be offered at Tokenhouse Yard on 25th April. It holds over 2,200 persons. The house was not a success run on the Mammoth twice-a-day programme principle, but it is very conveniently situated, and if we have not too many theatres already it should be possible to make it pay. The revolving stage is one of its great attractions according to the auctioneer.

CROCODILES I HAVE KNOWN.

"NUMBER ONE."

THERE are two species of crocodiles to be found in Bengal, namely, Crocodilus Porosus and C. Palustris. Though the two species differ somewhat in size, colour, etc., they are otherwise very much alike and in my opinion are almost identical. The difference as to size and colour is mainly due to C. Porosus frequenting less extensive and more confined pieces of water, often stagnant and overgrown with weeds and aquatic plants of sorts.

Besides the above two species of crocodiles, there is to be found in Bengal, what is known as the gharial, Gavialis gangeticus or the slender headed Gangetic crocodile. These reptiles do not affect brackish waters and never descend so far as to come within the influence of the tides. Though the gharials attain a length of twenty feet and sometimes even more, they are harmless creatures preying solely on fish and turtles.

C. Porosus is to be found chiefly among some of the smaller streams, marshes, tanks, ponds, old moats, in fact any piece of water well stocked with fish and turtles and deep enough to afford them a safe shelter. C. Porosus seldom exceed 8 to 10 feet in length and are proportionately less bulky. Their diet consists mainly of fish and turtles, but any unfortunate geese, ducks or any other bird found swimming on the surface are silently and quickly pulled down. Some of the larger of these crocodiles, often take to preying on calves, goats, and dogs and some even take to pulling down full-grown cattle and on rare occasions even men are included in the bill of fare of these lesser saurians.

C. Palustris are the scourge of some of the waterways of the Gangetic delta. These crocodiles may be found in most of the bigger rivers, and though partial to brackish or salt water, are seldom found in the sea or the shores facing it. The main haunts of these mighty saurians, are those rivers that flow through the Sunderbunds and their estuaries, as well as those countless creeks, that are to be found in those parts. C. Palustris grow to an immense size, often attaining a length of some 25 feet and sometimes even more. Their distinguishing characteristics are their comparative shortness and great breadth of skull, enormous size of body and a marked preference for salt or brackish waters from which they rarely ascend far up. This a truly dreadful monster, a desperate and confirmed man-eater and man-hunter and its strength is so prodigious, that it can even pull down a buffalo. The general colour of C. Palustris is dull greenish grey, though I have seen some that were almost black. Crocodiles in Bengal, as those of the Nile and the alligators of the Mississippi, are found lying asleep with jaws widely extended, though I have never yet noticed the little bird, known as the Trochilus, common on the banks of the Nile, serving it in the capacity of tooth pick!! It is not unusual in the Sunderbunds to see these crocodiles suddenly come up, holding in their mighty jaws a large fish or a huge turtle weighing perhaps a 100 pounds or more, which they gulp down without the slightest difficulty. Some years ago Mr. E. Chapman of Chandbally shot a crocodile of this species, a confirmed man-eater, on the river Damra and from the inside of it, took out metal, such as gold, silver, cooper, brass, etc., weighing in all some 30lbs., ornaments of its victims.

The biggest crocodile I have shot myself measured slightly over 19 feet; its bulk was immense and from its inside I took out a ball of human hair nearly the size of a football, a couple of large turtles and metal ornaments such as pewter, zinc, silver, etc., weighing some 13lbs. and among these was a small gold nose ring, which I kept as a memento of one of its unfortunate victims. This saurian was a well-known man-eater and used to roam over a large tract of waterway, so people were never sure as to where it would make its next appearance. Its last victim had been a Mahometan fakir or mendicant, who was carried off while bathing among a lot of other people. A couple of days later, I was returning from a day's duck shooting and was riding along the bank of a stream, when my attention was called by my men, who were following to what they said was a crocodile lying on the opposite bank. I could not at first make out what my men were referring to, for the only thing I could see were a couple of plantain trees that had been made into a raft and were now lying at the water's edge. Why, I said to my men, that is not a crocodile you see, but a couple of plantain trees. No, sir, they said, look higher up the bank and you will see a crocodile and at the same time pointed towards it. Closer inspection on my part revealed what looked very much like an overturned boat of some size. Is this the crocodile I said to my men? that huge grey looking object I could now easily make out. Yes, they said and that too is the man-eater, that has created such a dread in these parts.

The next question was how to get at the monster, which was lying on the opposite side of the stream and which at this particular spot could not have been under 200 yards wide, far too distant for a shot at such an object as a crocodile. My men soon solved the difficulty by pointing out to me, that if I went a little higher up I could get a boat to ferry me across. After having carefully noted the spot the crocodile was lying on and the few land marks about the place, I made for the place, and willing hands soon ferried me across. Having landed, I made my way cautiously forward towards the spot. I was armed with a 10-bore muzzle loader, while the man who followed me had a 12-bore breach loader, the former being very effective at short range. I had noticed from the opposite bank, that just above where the crocodile was lying was a clump of small acacia trees and I accordingly made my way towards it, taking care not to go too near the edge. Having got parallel with the trees, I looked through them and to my surprise I saw the huge form of the crocodile lying within some 10 feet of where I stood; there the monster was, looking at me quite unconcerned, as if to ask, who the devil are you to come and disturb me. Now or never said I to myself and thinking he was going to make a dash for the water, had a couple of hurried shots at the huge neck. I at once stepped aside to get out of the way of the black powder's smoke which prevented me from seeing everything. There to my astonishment, I saw the crocodile lying just as he had been before I fired. I knew I could not have missed him at that distance, but the only thing I could see was a tremor that shook the gigantic frame and then I saw a couple of tiny streams of dark blood flow from where the two bullets had taken effect in the neck. Thinking the brute was done for, I stepped to within four feet of it and fired a couple more shots into the saurian's head, one of these going through the crocodile's right eye. My last two shots were followed by a tremendous commotion on the monster's part: it now begun snapping its jaws and lashing its tail and each time it breathed a regular fountain of blood spurted out from its damaged eye. The next two shots I fired was down the brute's throat, but, strange to say, these had only the effect of reviving it and making it more lively, for it now began gliding towards the water and the next instant had disappeared out of sight!

As might have been expected, my astonishment was great; but I was confident, that I had not seen the last of my crocodile. From the commotion going on in the water, I could make out the whereabouts of the reptile. A boat was quickly brought round and preparations made to haul up the body of the supposed defunct crocodile and as it was lying in shallow water a thick rope was passed round its tail and body. No sooner, however, did it find itself being hauled up then it made a dash for deep water, the boat at first being towed at an amazing pace and would have very soon disappeared all together with all its contents had not the men on board quickly cut the rope and thus parted company with their dangerous customer. After this little bit of excitement, the crocodile, which must have found itself again on even keel, lay quiet and the only signs one could now find of its whereabouts were the air bubbles, that rose on the surface. I knew very well it could not possibly live with all that amount of lead in its anatomy. After waiting for a short time and seeing that there were no signs of the crocodile showing itself again, I left for my factory, having given the necessary instructions to watch for the body, which was sure to float up. The following afternoon information was brought, that the body of the defunct crocodile had risen to the surface and that the habeas corpus having been performed it was now on its way to the factory; but it was not till late at night that the cart with its hideous load turned up. The men, who came with the crocodile's body, said that they had had no end of trouble in getting it in, for the cart on which it was brought, was first yoked to a couple of big buffaloes, who on finding out what they were carrying had bolted with the cart and that the crocodile, cart and all had been upset and had fallen into a tank and that after a great deal of difficulty, it had been hauled up again on terra firma and a couple of the more docile bullocks having been yoked, the rest of the journey had been performed without any further trouble.

Wanting to see, what the internal organs of this crocodile contained I had it cut open and as already related got a ball of human hair besides sundry zinc, pewter and silver ornaments and the little gold nose ring which I prize. The post mortem being over, I was anxious to get rid of the body as quickly as possible for the musk-like effluvia which arose from it was really too sickening; I therefore give orders to have the remains carted off to at least a mile from the factory and being anxious to preserve the head, gave instructions to have it cut off and buried under ground. But I had not yet finished with my crocodile, it proved to be a far worse customer in death, than in life, for it was not very long before I began to get complaints, that as this unfortunate carcass had been thrown close to the road no one could pass along it owing to the stench from it. The Police Sub-Inspector who came to see me said "that the smell was so very killing" that he had to make a long detour to come to me. The unfortunate part of the business was that jackals and vultures would have nothing to say to this tempting morsel! Scores of vultures used to come and sit round the body which had swollen now to twice its natural size, as if in conference, but would have nothing to say to it and it was days, nay, weeks before I saw the last of my crocodile!

"NUMBER TWO."

Crocodile number two, though smaller than the one first described, as it measured only some sixteen feet, was a confirmed man-eater and man-hunter, for within some four weeks of its first appearance, it had accounted for two men, a woman and a boy. This saurian suddenly turned up in a small stream, that flowed to the south of the factory. This stream, which was one of the estuaries of that large tidal and crocodile-infested river the Modomothee, contained very little water during the drier part of the year, but during the floods became a fairly broad and deep stream, with 18 to 20 feet water in it. It was during this period, that crocodiles from the river Modomothee found their way to it and the appearance of the dreaded man-eater usually created a general panic among those living along the banks of this stream. The first intimation on the present occasion of the arrival of this unwelcome guest was rather startling. It had during the night climbed up the bank of the stream and made its way to the police outpost, where it had seized one of the constables who was sleeping outside in the verandah. The crocodile had made its way first to the bunglow, but as the floor of it was some three feet above ground it could not possibly have climbed up, it then apparently went round the place, till it came to the steps and up which it went up and was not long in coming across one of the constables sleeping on the floor. It at once seized the unfortunate man by the head, his yelling and shouting for help soon brought others who were sleeping about the place to his rescue. The crocodile tried now to get away as quickly as it could, but in its haste it did not try to find the steps, but jumped down, carrying with it, in its jaws the unfortunate constable's pillow, which no doubt mister crocodile thought was some part of the man's anatomy! It was this seizing of the head and pillow together by the saurian, that saved the unfortune constable being badly injured, they tried to bar the way of the unwelcome visitor, but it kept every one at a distance. For if anyone had ventured within reach of its tremendous tail, he would have been minus one if not both his legs. The crocodile after this little bit of adventure had disappeared for a few days and it was not seen nor heard of for 10 or 12 days, when it suddenly reappeared, its victim this time being a woman, which it carried off while bathing from among a dozen others. A few days later a fisherman was carried off while fishing. The unfortunate man's brother, who had decided to drag him was the next victim; he was knocked over with a sledge hammer blow from the monster's tail, seized and dragged under while watching harpoon in hand for its coming up on land to sun itself.

The last victim of the man-eater was the factory peon's son and I was an eye-witness to his being knocked over and carried off. It was early in September and I was returning from a morning's marsh partridge shoot. I was on my elephant and was going along the edge of the stream, where the crocodile had recently appeared. In front of me a couple of hundred yards or so was the factory peon's son, a lad of about fifteen who was fishing with a small hand net. I was speaking with the mahout about this very crocodile when I suddenly saw in front of us and at the distance of about 50 yards or so what appeared to be a wave some six inches or so high rapidly approaching shoreward, but before I could question the mahout as to what it meant, there was a tremendous commotion and splash and the next instant, the man-eater with a tremendous sledge hammer blow of its tail had knocked over the unfortunate boy and pulled him under water, everything was over in an instant. The first surprise being, however, over, my next thought was, how I was to destroy this cruel murderer. For the moment the boy had disappeared, pulled down under water and nothing was to be seen of him; but I had not long to wait, for scarcely five minutes had elapsed, when about mid stream there suddenly appeared the upper parts of the victim's body; a most distressing circumstance connected with this incident, was the fact of the victim's fingers which appeared above water opening and closing as an appeal for help. His long hair, becoming now loosened floated on the surface, as he was carried in an upright position being apparently caught by the knee. As I was now close to the factory, I quickly dismounted from the hathee and getting into a small country boat shoved off and made towards the spot. I had last seen the unfortunate victim's hands appear above water. I had not long to wait before the monster rose once more to the surface. Unfortunately the upper part of the poor victim's body was all that was visible above water. The only thing we could do was to strike the water with long poles, hoping to frighten the saurian; but this had only the effect of making it sink and disappear. It rose twice more to the surface and then sank for good.

Some four days or so had elapsed since the unfortunate chowkidar's son had been pulled down and I had not yet been able to avenge his death. During this interval, I had been going up and down the stream in my boat. I had now and again caught sight of the crocodile's head, as it floated on the surface, its cruel green eyes seeking for fresh victims; but no sooner did the cunning brute see me approach, then it disappeared. But the man-eater's days were numbered; for a few days later, I had the satisfaction of slaying it. As usual, I had gone down in my boat and was coming up the stream, when I was accosted by a couple of men, who warned me that the saurian we were looking for was lying on the opposite bank and a couple of hundred yards or so ahead. I instructed the boat men to pass the spot, and having gone a short distance beyond to drop down again with the tide and well in shore towards where it lay basking. Having got well ahead, the boat's head was turned down stream and I was now ready prepared to rouse the saurian from its slumber! Slowly the boat dropped with the tide, neither oars nor poles being used. A tangled mass of vegetation grew down to the water's edge, so I could not see the brute till I was nearly on top of it and it saw us the same moment; but the distance was so short, that the bullet could not miss its mark and it sped true hitting the brute behind the fore-paw and for a moment I thought I had killed it outright, as it rolled on its side; but soon recovering itself, it dashed into the water with a second ball in its head, the mark showing bright red before it had disappeared. I thought at first that I had lost it, but it rose and again made for the shore, a thing crocodiles frequently do when hard hit. I allowed it to ascend, when I had a couple more shots at close quarters. Its death throes were indeed terrific, as with distended jaws it rolled over from side, to side snapping its jaws, and striking right and left blows from its tremendous tail and exhibiting the most awful rage in its agony. It was indeed a sight worth seeing, while great was the inward satisfaction I felt at the destruction of this dreaded man-eater. I do not know how long this awful struggle would have lasted, had I not closed it with a couple of shots at the back just behind the neck. With the help of the willing bystanders who had now collected in a crowd the body of the defunct crocodile was hauled on board the boat. My return to the factory was a perfect triumphal procession, being escorted on both banks by crowds of the villagers, who had turned up en masse on hearing the shots. As already stated this crocodile measured some sixteen feet, but was of immense bulk. The usual post mortem examination followed and besides a ball of human hair found in all man-eaters some twelve pounds of metal ornaments were found, and what was truly gruesome, was the partly digested arm of the unfortunate chowkidar's son the identy of which there was no doubt, as it still bore the silver bangle.

Fishing.

SHARK FISHING IN MANY WATERS.

Some of the most exciting fields of sport in this and other countries are unknown to the majority of lovers of the strenuous on account of prejudice and lack of information. If I should state that after taking almost all of the great American game fishes known, from the tarpon to striped bass, I had found shark fishing the most satisfying, I should have every rod angler in the country at my heels, as the shark is condemned as vermin, a miserable "beastie," a fearsome game to be cut loose from and knocked in the head. It must be confessed that most sharks belong to this class, but the ones described in the following, would, were they not sharks, be considered game fishes; in a word, by any other name such a shark would be sweeter, better game.

One day I drifted into a curious little fjiord on the south side of the mountainous island of Santa Catalina, sailed up the deep canon, as it were, and there found that the head of the inlet was pre-empted by a school of small tiger sharks, which were swimming about in water a foot deep, stirring up the mud and doubtless having a convention of some kind. Having a penchant for shark fishing I took a fifteen-ounce yellow tail rod of one joint, fitted it, doubled up about twenty feet of eighteen-strand line near the wire leader, and presently was on the beach just above the school where the water was about five feet in depth. Hard by was the cabin of a professional fisherman, or sharker, one Johnnie Daly, who at that moment came riding up on as queer a vehicle as could be found in a hundred mile run. The wheels were of solid wood, about a foot high and six inches wide, the two axles just large enough to hold an old rum barrel upon which Johnnie sat astride, driving a raw-boned white horse that he assured me was owned by Carrillo, not the navigator, but the famous bandit who lived some time in the past century; so the horse must have been over one hundred years of age, which was all very well for a horse story.

Dismounting, Johnnie got me some smelt for bait, about a pound being put on at once, and being too heavy and too fragile to cast he backed up his skiff, and rowing out fifty feet into the stream, dropped the bait over, then returning to act as gaffer and story-teller. He caught sharks for the oil, and sold the fins to the Chinese who boiled them down into a dainty.

It was not long before the line began to run out and the reel to click and buzz; then I slacked some and gave the fish the butt. Up into the air, clear of the water, went a long, slender marbled fish that lashed its tail from side to side and dropped with a splash. How it took me down the sandy beach in a long rush for the open sea! How Johnnie Daly pranced by my side calling out orders and instructions! Now rushing out knee deep into the bay, then back and up the beach again as I turned the fish that was in the air repeatedly showing its graceful shape and displaying an amount of vigor that would not be expected in a mere shark.

How long I played it I do not know, but it made repeated efforts to get out into the bay and carried me down the beach. I finally worked it up to the head again and inshore on the marvellous thread of line, a line which Johnnie declared was wire, but which was good linen. Then Johnnie gaffed the fish and dragged it in with a show of triumph, as though he did not catch a dozen in a day with netts We had to cut it up to weigh it, and I remember that is tipped the scales at sixty-two pounds, and established jumping shark fishing with the rod at that place for some time to come.

As a rule, sharks are poor jumpers, but there are several kinds that leap in fair imitation of the ouananiche and tarpon. When fishing at the Aransas Pass in Southern Texas, my companion hooked a leaping shark that went out of the water like a bird and lashed its tail like a whip lash. Had it not been for the lack of colour or the gleam of silver one might have considered it a tarpon, as it was a leaper beyond dispute. On the outer Florida reef I played such a shark and watched its leaps, and had it not been under the ban and known as shark it would have been enrolled under the banner of the game fishes.

The power and strength of sharks is beyond question, but some very large ones have been killed with light tackle. Probably one of the first attempts to kill a shark with a rod was made by Dr. Wm. Provost, of Chicago, who was fishing for bluefish in Long Island Sound. He had a strike, and after a long contest landed an eight-foot shark that weighed several hundred pounds. This was supposed to be the limit. In the same year Admiral Douglass, of the St. Augustine yacht club, landed a shark six or seven feet long on a ten-ounce rod, and doubtless a number have been taken in the same way if all shark fishermen could be heard from.

Some of the finest shark fishing I have had has been at the mouth of the St John's River, Florida, in the shad season. The sharks follow the shad school up the coast and enter the river at this point. At the north entrance, where the river channel is near the beach, at the time of my last visit, was a famous locality for them. I stood on the beach, tossed a five or six pound shad bait thirty feet out into the channel, fastened the long rope to a big stranded log and laid down on the warm sand to wait for a strike. This part of Florida has a peculiar charm. The air was delicious tinctured with balsam, the sky was blue, the river ran merrily over the bar and to the north a faint curl of smoke rose from the palmetto grove. The roar of the surf on the outer reef came in muffled tones blending with the musical trill of the river waters along the beach.

I was alone; the fishermen were hauling their nets out in the river, and the scene was purely a contemplative one tranquil in every respect. How long I waited I cannot recall, but suddenly my line began to run out, at first slowly, then rapidly, and taking it I felt that indescribable thrill that runs up the line and connects fish and angler. I gave out twenty feet of slack, then braced back in the sand, and as the line came taut sent the cold bit of steel into the jaws of the game. Into the air vent the head and part of the body of a large shark, to fall with a splash that sent the surges out on to the beach, roll after roll, while the line ran through my hands at a speed that suggested smoke.

I held on, but the shark took me into the water knee deep, then waist deep. I reached the sands and dug my feet into it and laid back, but I could not stop the deliberate onward, outward pull of that shark that gradually took me down the beach to the sea. The end soon came; the log bagan to roll, and throwing all pretence at playing aside, I grasped the log and held on for my life. But that inexorable game must have been of endless horse power, as it never stopped, and the last thing I saw of my log it was bobbing up and down in the tide eddies in mid stream and my shark may be going yet.

Later I had better luck. The specimen may have been fourteen or more feet in length, I did not see its entire length, but for exercise and strenuous sport there is nothing to compare to this big savage game that is determined to carry you out into the stream and offshore to the deep unfathomed caves. The big shark becomes demoralized when hooked. It will often remain prefectly still, roll itself over and over, and fairly tie itself up in the line to turn and dash away with a rush that takes everything with it; but after all it is merely a question of time with a shark; it can be worn out by a constant pull and haul, give and take process that limbers up every muscle in the human body.

On the shore the fisherman does not have the same chance as when in a boat, and on the outer reef of Florida, where the channels were so near the shore that you could literally step into deep water, I have been repeatedly hauled into deep water and forced to give up. In fishing from a wharf, where I had my rope tied to a huge scantling, the shark I hooked would have pulled the ten men overboard had they remained at the line; as it was, it took the plank and ultimately the line. For sharks from six to eight feet in length beach fishing is interesting, but the really big game, the bulky man-eaters, should be played from a boat when they can tow it and the fisherman can play it at his leisure. Few men can look unawed at a boiling sea of sharks and retain their perfect equanimity. It was my plan when shark fishing to bait up a certain point with the blood and refuse from a slaughter house. My man towed this out and fastened some of the bait in bags to the coral in shoal water, and the blood was poured into the channel when we arrived at the grounds. This resulted in the collection of numbers of sharks of all kinds and sizes; and to stand on the deck of the boat and see these monsters all about, swimming around like hounds in search of prey, was an appalling spectacle.

It is not always the large sharks that are the most dangerous At certain times the coast of New England is visited by raids of a small shark known as the dog fish.

So vast are their numbers that they cannot obtain food and rush in upon the out-shore cod fishing grounds, a starving horde, ready to devour anything. It happened that I saw the incoming of this school one year. The fishes were so ferocious that they bit at our oars and tore the sail of a neighboring boat. A reliable skipper informed me that a number of fatalities had occurred, which I could readily believe easily happen, as the smallest object tossed overboard would attract a dozen or more sharks. As far as I could see into the depths these creatures were attacking jelly fishes and taking the hook with a rush. The effect on the fishing of the entire coast was immediate. One moment the men were catching cod and other fishes; the next the water was filled with sharks which took hooks, lines or anything they could seize.

There is something very disagreeable in the aspect of a large shark, especially the kind known as the man-eater. He is very deliberate in his movements; his bulk is enormous; he is a bull dog or fighting machine, almost devoid of pain or fear, and when aroused by the scent of blood, a fiend incarnate. The great so-called man-eaters of the Atlantic and Pacific weigh tons, and attain a length of twenty or thirty feet. One taken near Australia was found to contain a full-grown horse in three or four pieces,—an animal that had been thrown over from some troop ship. Such a shark can be caught only with the most powerful tackle—a large and long rope, a steel hook a foot in length, and a three-foot chain. I once ran into a camp of sharkers on the Florida coast. They had found a little inlet where sharks were abundant, and gone into business killing sharks, and I learned that they utilized nearly the entire output. The jaws with the rows of teeth were sold as curiosities; the back bone when cleaned and dried was pierced by a steel rod and sold as a cane, while the fins went to a Chinaman who dried them and shipped them to New York Chinatown where they became a sort of pate de fois gras. The skin went to shagreen makers; the liver provided a valuable oil, and the flesh was in demand by planters who converted it into guano and fertillizers. This last business is a valuable one, and on the Mine cost may be seen buildings on which is the sign "Dog Fish Factories" the proprietors of which buy and catch all the cheap fish-sharks, rays dog fish and others and grind them into fertillizers

The shark camp was an interesting place, as some one was always catching a fish. They had twenty or more lines out all the time leading off from the beach. When a large shark was hooked a flat bottomed boat would be shoved off, the line made, fast and the big fish played, amid shouts and cries, by the fishermen who made sport of what would be considered hard work by the average man. Yet there is much excitement in shark fishing, at least to the one who holds the line, that makes up for the labour that is just as surely part of it. I have, with a single companion, held on to a big shark for hours, been towed miles, and had my arms nearly, apparently, torn from the sockets.

The gamiest shark on a line is the hammerhead, the common form of the Southern California islands where, in August, they are very familiar, sometimes stealing the boats of the men and playing havoc with their lines. A hammerhead will wreck a valuable $300 seine or gill net in a night. He will roll himself up in it and then bite it in pieces. A strong robust brute, he is only caught after a hard struggle. I have fought such a fish two hours, the shark then appearing as fresh as when he bit. One of the largest sharks ever taken with a line was caught by Mexican Joe, a well-known boatman of Santa Catalina Island. This fish required four or five men to subdue it, and then it nearly capsized the boat. In these waters a swivel-tailed shark was recently taken that made a desperate fight. The peculiarity of this fish is that the upper lobe of the tail is as long as the entire body, and it is used as a sort of sabre to strike from side to side, giving fearful blows that will lay open the flesh like a sabre. A more singular creature can hardly be imagined.

At Santa Catalina shark fishing with rod and reel is one of the pet diversions for men who want hard work. The most remarkable feature of the sport lies in the fact that the monster is caught with rod and reel and usually a No. 21 thread line, which is not very much larger than an eyeglass cord—indeed I have seen men fishing for black bass in the St. Lawrence with a line quite as large as this thread with which the Santa Catalina Island anglers catch sharks of ten or twelve feet, weighing up to five hundred pounds. There are two clubs at Santa Catalina which encourage this sort of sport, one of which is the Tuna Club, which established the standard of rod sport in the island, and the other the "Light Tackle Club," whose president is Mr. Arthur J. Eddy, of Pasadena, California, one of the most skilful anglers in America and an all-around sportsman. Mr. Eddy carries the idea of the Tuna Club a step beyond, declaring for the use of the nine-thread line for all the big game fishes, and it is interesting to see what Mr. Eddy and his fellow members catch—fishes running up to sixty and seventy pounds.

The secret of shark fishing, according to the writer's views, is to have a light, safe boat; a thousand feet of line, and smooth water. I have often, single-handed, worn out seemingly impossible sharks with a very long line. Shark fishing may not be an æsthetic sport, but it is conducive to exercise and health.

All around the Australian coast sharks are very bad. It is not safe to allow your dogs to retrieve even in the upper reaches of the tidal rivers, for these devils of the deep will take them, and men fishing from the rocks, and washed off by a bigger sea than they expect, have no escape. There can be little doubt that sharks will keep about, expecting the good fortune of a cast-away man, and, horrible as it may appear, their awful greed, their terrible jaws and hungry stomachs are often gratified. In the very neighborhood of Coolangatta a boy, with his father, had been fishing from the rocks for small fish. The usual wave came along; with a cry of terror the unhappy man was washed off the ledge. With the nose of a stoat and the eye of a vulture, the shark was there to seize the poor fellow and to fight with his unholy mates for the sharing of the carcase. A good boathook, with the point or fender sharpened with a rasp, will deal out good "stoush" or punishment, although a hit over the nose with a hammer will steady them. The bait used in that part of the world for shark fishing is a mullet, or a migratory so-called salmon, enormous shoals of which frequent the coasts about January and February, the commencement of the autumn in the southern hemisphere. The sharks follow these fish as do a few other large and swift swimmers in search of food.

THE BERHAMPORE DAWK BUNGALOW.

To The Editor of "The Indian Field."

Sir,—We move slowly in India; rapid changes, especially if they are in the direction of improvement or progress, come seldom. Consequently when I read your remarks about the Berhampore Dawk Bungalow, a vision of three miserable days I spent in that depressing and unclean tenement rose before me. The same old decayed punkahs, same old four pieces of broken furniture, same old midden heap in the verandah, same all—pervading dirt, same colossal examples of impertinence and inefficiency in the kitchen, as I encountered five years ago, Sir! What you describe as having seen at Easter 1907 was exactly what I saw in 1902. Something should be done to preserve these interesting if unpleasing relics of bygone days. Happy thought! Why not add them to the Victoria Memorial Collection? They might serve to show future generations what their ancestors endured and enable them to form a just estimate of the hardy twen' cent. Briton who could suffer these things and survive.

A CURIOUS GOND'S HEAD.

To the Editor of "The Indian Field."

Sir,—There appeared some months ago in your English namesake a description of a malformed chital's head—a head with 3 horns—if I am not mistaken. I send you a photograph of a Gond (marsh dear) head with three distinct horns. This was shot by Mr. Lincoln (Barrister-at-Law, Lucknow) last month in Kheri, Oudh.

The two main antters are normal, one having five and the other six points. Below the right brow-tine this horn grows straight up and parallel with the horns: it is 6 inches in length 2¼ in circumference at the base and grows off the bone above the orbit and behind the brow tine. Of course it is only a freak, but the kind of freak that one would not probably meet with again in a lifetime.

K.

Bareilly, 14th April 1907.

FROM THE HOME PAPERS.

LONDON, 29th March 1907.

LIVERPOOL.

A LOVELY morning last Friday, set all doubts as to weather at rest, and set also thousands of people moving Aintree-wards. The electric trams now mightily relieve the pressure on the railway, with its awkwardly primitive station totally inadequate to the occasion, but even then they made no appreciable difference to the traffic, train after train rolling packed from Tithebarn-street. Thursday's muter augured the largest attendance ever seen on a Grand National Day, and it was the welcome presence of the Prince of Wales, who arrived early with the distinguished guests, headed by the Master of Knowsley, conduced much to this successful result, and the rare assemblage of fair women and brave men who assembled to greet them filled the spacious stands to repletion. The cheaper slopes of steps right away to the distance carried on the picture in more sombre tints, while between races the sun glinted on a scene of frolic and joy. Every coign of vantage on the spacious course was occupied to such an extent that the Grand National field ran through a lane of spectators as far round as the Canal Bridge. His Royal Highness, who was again enthusiastically received, must have been struck by the picture, the effect of which the faddists would like to mar with their daubs of ill-assorted colours. There was hardly room to move in the paddock, the fair sex taking as much interest in the noble animals as their attendant squires, and with grand weather, good sport, no severe accident, and a popular victory, it was as pleasant a function as the heart of man could desire.

Ascetic's Silver looked a bit big as he followed the other chesnut, Rathvale round, York II., afine upstanding chesnut, looked more like a mile sprinter; Timothy Titus looked better, but is a plain customer, Patlander showed plenty of muscle on his powerful quarters; and Tom West, wiry and well, looked small by comparison; Loop Head, with his two white near legs, looked like carrying 16st. to hounds, and Hogan, having the mount in place of Mason; Extravagance, whose tail was plaited in the old-fashioned style, looked a perfect picture; as did Eremon, who held quite a levee as Coulthwaite superintended his toilette in the far corner; in fact, he proved the centre of attraction, and most rightly so, as the sequel proved. Barabbas II, towered above all the rest, and Bouchal Ogue was in marvellous fettle; Detail looked a hack by comparison, Teddie III, a pony, and then crossing over we came to Red Lad, bandaged in front and booted behind, very much on his toes, and fit as a fiddle after his strenuous preparation; in fact, he looked eager for the fray, while the stolid, sober Drumcree took it as a matter of course.

To begin with, the first real catastrophe happened to Rathvale, and this horse going on loose caused no end of anxiety to more than one, as he stuck closely with the leaders, and was the cause of Extravagance's fall nearing the water, and Newey had to hit him over the head as he cleared it first on Eremon, to keep him off. By the way, this jockey's stirrup leather broke at the second fence from the start, which makes his performance all the more meritorious. Going into the country the second time, Patlander was following Mr. Howard's horse, and in this round several formidable opponents came to grief, including Timothy Titus. Curiously enough, at the same obstacle as he fell at two years ago, and whilst condition would never allow Ascetic's Silver to have a peep in at the race, Red Lad, a beaten horse at the time did not take off at all at the Canal point, but smashed right through, and his mishap brought down Bouchal Ogue, going fairly well at the time. Considering the time that Tom West had been penned up in a railway box he ran an exceedingly brilliant race, and there are many who express it as their opinion that that fine horseman Newey could have won on first or second, as he caught up the long lead of Eremon in a couple of furlongs from the Canal point. We do not share this view entirely, as it is our conviction that Eremon is one of the easiest winners of this race on record, barring perhaps Cloister. Ravenscliffe, who also had been knocked down, just missed third place, a bit of bad luck for that popular sportsman, Mr. Bob Hannam. The victory was well received, as there is no more popular trainer than Tom Coulthwaite, who had the satisfaction of seeing his care and judgment verified in a real triumph. Eremon must have always had it in him, but when he arrived at Hednesford he was almost stigmatised as a scarecrow, but Coulthwaite, soon discovering his wonderful lepping qualities, set about building an impoverished frame up. Appended are details of the principal race:—

(Winner trained by Coulthwaite.)

BETTING: 7 to 1 each agst. Red Lad, and Ascetic's Silver, 8 to 1 Eremon, 10 to 1 Extravangance, 100 to 8 Timothy Titus, 100 to 7 Ravenscliffe, 100 to 6 each Tom West and Kilts, 20 to 1 each Rathvale, Barabbas II. and Centre Board, 25 to 1 Drumcree, 33 to 1 Napper Tandy, 40 to 1 each Buckaway II. and Detail, and 50 to 1 others (offered).

There was no special place betting, and proportionate odds will rule.

Although admittedly a moderate field, it was satisfactory to note that their exertions during the past season had kept them in tip-top condition, and with commendable promptitude the 25 were saddled in good time, with the exception of Tom West, Seisdon Prince, and Extravagance, who missed their positions. The parade as per card gave the public an ample opportunity of scanning each competitor, of whom Red Lad pecked on landing over the preliminary hurdle. Mr. Coventry had little trouble with his field, and only one false start occurred, and when they did get away, Bouchal Ogue, who had gone to the rear, was left some fifteen lengths. At the second attempt they steamed off. Eremon at once dashed to the front, followed by Rathvale, Roman Law, Timothy Titus, Tom West, Kilts, Buckaway II., and Red Lad, with Loop Head, Detail, and Extravagance, heading Centre Board. Then came Napper Tandy and Patlander. Bouchal Ogue whipping them in. At the first fence Kilts fell and broke his neck, and at the third Rathvale came down and went on loose. Here Timothy Titus took a temporary lead of Eremon, Roman Law, Centre Board, and Extravagance, York II. going on next in front of Ascetic's Silver and Tom West, whilst Drumcree was now last again. Making the railway turn at the top of the course, Eremon again joined Timothy Titus, the pair side by side being six lengths clear of Red Lad and Detail; then came Extravagance, Roman Law, York II., Ravenscliffe, and Patlander, Bouchal Ogue creeping up in front of Tom West. Centre Board refused at the fence on the turn, and at the open ditch Timothy Titus came to grief. Eremon was now out on his own in front of Extravagance, York II., Red Lad, Ravenscliffe, Seisdon Prince, Tom West, Patlander, and Roman Law, with Bouchal Ogue many lengths ahead of Look Head, whilst Ascetic's Silver was now toiling hopelessly in the rear. At the obstacle before the water a loose horse interfered with Extravagance, and opposite the stands the latter fell, and Newey on Eremon had to hit the riderless Rathvale over the head to keep him off his mount. Eremon then went on from Patlander, Ravenscliffe, Tom West, and York II., with Barabbas II. two lengths in front of Red Lad, Roman Law, Bouchal Ogue, Seisdon Prince, and Loop Head, Ascetic's Silver and Buckaway II. racing side by side in the ruck. At the second fence in the country Seisdon Prince was pulled up, and at Beecher's Brook York II. fell, a similar fate befalling Roman Law. Here Eremon shot right away from Patlander, Tom West and Bouchal Ogue moving up into third and fourth positions in front of Red Lad, Ravenscliffe, and Barabbas II., whilst Napper Tandy fell back in company with Ascetic's Silver. Coming to the fence before Valentine's Brook, Detail fell, and at the ditch Red Lad failed to rise, and brought down Bouchal Ogue and Loop Head, Ravenscliffe improving his position. After jumping Valentine's Brook, Eremon was twenty lengths in front of Tom West, who was an equal distance from Ravenscliffe, with Barabbas II. and Patlander next, only the five being left in it, as the rest were tailed off. Coming along the racecourse, Tom West began to close with the leader. Both successfully negotiated the last two fences, although hampered by the loose Ratvale, but when it came to the pinch, Eremon had most left in him, and amidst great enthusiasm sailed home a gallant winner by six lengths; Patlander just beat Ravenscliffe a neck for a bad third place. Then came Barabbas II. fifth, Ascetic's Silver twenty lengths away sixth, Buckaway II. (who fell five fences from home and was remounted) a long way off seventh, and Napper Tandy the only other to complete the course. Time—9mins. 47-1/5 sec.

If only on account of the brilliant weather, the first spring meeting of 1907 will be pleasantly remembered, but its attractions were enhanced by the patronage of the Prince of Wales, and the county should carry a vote of thanks to Lord Derby for persuading H.R.H. to grace a meeting at which his illustrious sire, the King, has more than once been present, and few will forget the enthusiasm which prevailed when His Majesty had the satisfaction of leading his gallant horse Ambush II. in after the Royal jacket had been borne to victory in the Grand National. The isignia of Royalty had been removed from the Royal Box on Saturday, as the Prince limited his visit to the two days, and many of the distinguished visitors followed his example, but enough remained to furnish another representative company in the members' enclosure, and the attendance all round was again a good one. The day was perhaps the brightest of the whole week, the course in splendid order, and fair fields did justice to an excellent programme, which, however, turned out disastrously for backers, whose best laid schemes were upset by frequent turn-ups, only one actual favourite getting home. Seldom, moreover, have falls been so disastrously frequent, while the old adage of the "slip 'twixt cup and lip" was verified in the Champion Steeplechase, which Old Fairyhouse looked to have "on his own." FOOTBALL.

UNDER ASSOCIATION RULES.

THE LEAGUE—DIVISION I.

There were only five games in the First Division of the League on Saturday, but they provided a couple of sensations. In the first place Sheffield United, whose consistent form in the past two months had been one of the features of the contest, were smothered on their own ground by Manchester City, who had previously won only two matches on foreign soil during the season. The United were beaten 4—1, and the result is the more staggering when it is pointed out that since January came in no other team has scored more than twice in one afternoon against the Blades. Liverpool arose in their might, and smote Newcastle United to such purpose, that the latter were three goals down at the finish, a similar margin separating Sunderland and Birmingham, at Roker Park, the visitors being overplayed and outplayed. Bristol City garnered in a couple of points from Preston North End, and are now splendidly placed in the table, but Derby County made their position more precarious by losing to Aston Villa. The table to date is appended:—

THE LEAGUE.—DIVISION II.

Chelsea are on the up grade once more. They sent Leeds City away pointless on Saturday, but the value of their win is somewhat discounted by the success which attended Nottingham Forest at Glossop, the latter being defeated by two clear goals. The Foresters are now in a relatively better position than Chelsea, and it will be a splendid struggle between these teams during the holidays for the leadership. Blackpool did the two top clubs a serviceable turn by winning their game against Leicester Fosse, but the surprise of the afternoon was provided by Lincoln City, who went to Hull and obtained the points at stake by the add goal in 3, Clapton Orient lost a point at home against Burslem Port Vale they badly need, and they will have to smarten themselves up a bit, as they are dangerously near the perilous zone. The figures to date are:—

ATHLETICS.

THE INTER-VARSITY SPORTS.

The annual athletic contest between Oxford and Cambridge at Queen's Club on the 22nd instant maintained all the dignity which one is wont to associate with such a classic event. Whether or not the calibre of the 'Varsity athlete is good or bad, whether or not the standard of athletics is high or low, the annual contest between the rival seats of learning still remains the outstanding social athletic gathering of the year. The meeting was graced by the presence of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales' two elder sons, Prince Edward and Prince Albert, who were accompanied by Sir William Carrington. Yesterday's was the forty-fourth meeting of Oxford and Cambridge, and with charming weather prevailing, a crowd of fully five thousand spectators were present. There have been more exhilarating meetings, and there has been better running, but the overwhelming victory of Oxford was totally unlooked for. It is perhaps not too harsh to say that only one representative of Cambridge displayed his best form, and that was Kenneth Powell, whereas the Oxonians quite excelled themselves in many respects. The meeting had a sensational opening, for a disagreement between the judges as to the result of the initial race—the hundred yards—led to a deadlock among the officials. After an Oxford victory had been announced, the decision was recalled, and a dead-heat awarded.

The magnificent bequest of the late Mr. Cecil Rhodes to Colonial scholars was, in the main, responsible for the inclusion of several athletes in the Oxonian ranks. H. Sutton, who was third in the mile, is an Australian; A. M. Stevens, of Balliol, who figured first with the hammer, like P. M. Young, the Oriel high jumper, and W. E. Schutt, the third placed man in the half-mile, hails from America, W. W. Thayer also being a visitor from the other side of the Atlantic. R. L. Robinson, the winner of the weight, is an Australian, and like all the others, is immensely popular with all 'Varsity men. Indeed, it is only another happy example of the benefits which accrue from entering thoroughly into sport. The success which has attended Rhodes scholars has been remarkable, and in all branches of sport those gentlemen who have been fortunate enough to obtain scholarships appear to shine. Such results as those which obtained yesterday must tend towards producing friendship between our Colonies and the Mother Country. On all sides the winners were loudly cheered, but none were more popular than these young athletes from the Antipodes and elsewhere.

It had gone forth that Oxford, if successful, would make a trip to America this summer, in order to oppose the winners of the Harvard and Yale contest, but from a conversation the Sporting Life representative had during a brief respite in the proceedings with one of the leading Dark Blue officials, it would appear that the statement has no foundation. As a matter of fact, no challenge or invitation has been issued from the other side. We are, however, informed that should such a challenge be received it will undoubtedly be given due consideration, and as some of the Oxonians are quite willing to take a favourable view of the matter, it is just possible that a meeting may be arranged. Still, at present nothing of a definite nature is known.

From an athletic point of view the display by Cambridge was indeed poor, and the only redeeming features were the achievements of Powell, in the hurdles, and Macleod in the sprint. Oxford, on the other hand, performed better than was expected, and after the first few events had been decided, their victory was assured. Powell's great speed in the hurdles, and Stevens' remarkable hammer-throwing were the outstanding features of the meeting. Although Powell was regarded a certain winner in the hurdles, after his record performance at Fenner's a few weeks ago, he had to run his hardest race; indeed, he only managed to defeat Hussey by the smallest of margins. It was the fastest hurdle race ever run at the sports, and the time of 15-3/5secs. is only one-fifth worse than Kraenzlein's British record created at Stamford Bridge in the A.A.A. championships of 1900. Stevens' hammer-throw of 146 feet 9 inches also creates a new record for the 'Varsity sports, being 8 feet 6 inches in advance of G. H. Hales' record under old conditions, and 9 feet 6 inches farther than A. H. Fyffe's "new condition" throw of a year ago. Details:—

BOXING

THE PUBLIC SCHOOL CHAMPIONSHIP.

Under the patronage of General Sir John French, G.C., VO., commanding the Aldershot Army Corps, the annual public schools fencing, boxing and gymnastic competitions took place in the Headquarters Gymnasium, Queen's avenue, Aldershot, yesterday, under the most favourable conditions. The number of entries was a record, there being eleven more than last year, which was itself the best previously known. The chief increase was in the middle weight boxing, the number of competitors being just double that of 1906.

For Gymnastics 34 schools and colleges were represented, the judges being Major C. Moore (Royal Berks Regiment), Major S. Menzies (Royal Fusiliers), Captain R. D. Cheales (East Lancashire Regiment), Captain C. K. Hutchison (Coldstream Guards), Captain J. C. D. Speeding (A.P.D.), and Lieutenant A. R. Orr (Scots Guards).

The entries for boxing were 53 in all, the officials being:—Referee: Colonel G. M. Fox; judges, Lieutenant A. M. Snagge (R.N.) and Lieutenant J. R. Simson (H.L.I.), superintendent of gymnasia; timekeeper: Colonel Goldsmith. In the fencing competitions there were 21 competitors for Foil vs. Foil, and 8 for Sabre vs. Sabre.

Two schools that have never before been represented appeared this year on the programme, both sending competitors for boxing, viz., Wolverhampton and Downside, and in each case their representatives proved easy victors in their first bouts. I give details of the final bouts.

FEATHER WEIGHTS (Final).—Anderson beat Stiven—Stiven led with a right-hand punch on the jaw, Anderson retaliating with a straight left on the nose, but at the finish there was nothing to choose. A give-and-take round followed, Stiven having a bit the best of matters, but in the last round Anderson pulled up splendidly, and after getting home some heavy body blows knocked his opponent over with a swinging right on the ear, and won the best fight of the day.

In the second round he forced tht fighting and continued to use his left to some purpose, while Warne's shots went wide of the mark. In the final Gabain still kept up forcing tactics, and although Warne made a good show at the finish, Gabain won a grand fight.

Darley attacked in the second round and got home on the jaw, but Lilley made matters lively directly afterwards by repeated swinging blows on the head. In the last round both were very tired, Darley especially so, and Lilley, who lasted the longer, gained a popular verdict.

GYMNASTICS.

There was a large attendance, which included hundreds of ladies, to witness the gymnastics. The challenge shield eventually fell to St. Paul's School, represented by W. G. Hull and A. E. Bullock with 191 points. Harrow was second with 191½, and Blundell's School third with 184. The gold medal for best individual score was won by W. G. Hull (St. Paul's) with 100½ points, and the silver medal for next best by C. G. Dickson (Blundell's) with 95½.

Lady French, who was accompanied by Miss French, presented the prizes. The string band of the R.A.M.C. played an admirable programme during the afternoon under the direction of Mr. Bennet.

THE A. B. A. CHAMPIONSHIPS.

Wednesday was Derby Day in English amateur boxing. There was a time, and not many years back either, when old St. James' Hall, in Piccadilly, was sufficient to meet the public demand to witness the premier amateur fistic event of the year, but as years rolled on more adequate accommodation had to be provided. After such historic buildings as the old Queen's Hall, the Imperial Theatre, the Central Hall, Holborn, and St. James' Hall had in turn been tried and found wanting, so to speak, it was thought that the capacious Northampton Institute would prove capable of holding all those who desired to witness the great amateur fistic tournament. But a few years' tenancy of the Clerkenwell establishment convinced the Amateur Boxing Association officials that a bigger building was necessary, and when one realises that at yesterday's "matinee performance" over three thousand spectators were present, the step taken by the governing body in moving to such a colossal building as the Grand Hall of the Alexandra Palace was indeed a wise one. The A.B.A. have evidently found a home at the Wood Green establishment that will serve their purpose for at least a few years to come.

As usual, the weeding-out process was a big undertaking, and occupied some five hours. An early start, shortly before midday, enabled the officials to get through the heavier part of the programme in the afternoon, and thus reserve the good turns for the evening session. A beginning was made with the bantams, and an old veteran champion in H. Perry (Columbia) had the honour of participating in the opening bout with W. Ladbury (Greenwich). The older hand proved himself a general at the game, and after having by far the worst of the opening round, he brought victory to his grasp by superior judgment. The other preliminary ties in this weight were fairly interesting, more especially the one in which Cotterill and Hebblewhite engaged. The feathers produced some spirited boxing, and Morris, Holmes, and Miner, all old hands at the game, displayed the best form, each of them winning his bout in easy style. A foreign competitor in H. Jordan, the French feather-weight champion, appeared in this weight, but against such a skilled opponent as Holmes he was at a considerable discount. The Frenchman gave a very clever display, and fully justified his entry in such an important competition. Considerable interest was taken in the light-weight class, but the boxing did not come up to expectation. The Danish champion, V. Holberg, was the first of the "stranger" element to go down, while the New Zealand champion, Arthur Blewden, did not strike one as being a "flier." In justice to the Colonial it must be said that he boxed in a resolute manner, but Spiller, his conqueror, had a greater knowledge of the game. A hardy Naval boxer in Petty Officer Hunnings struck one as being a very likely performer, but towards the close of his fight with Bevan he was very nearly beaten. In this weight a great struggle was anticipated between M. Wells (Lynn A. C.), the holder, and F. Grace (Eton Mission B.C.), but in this respect the spectators were sadly disappointed. The element of caution was too much in evidence, with the result that after a tame display Wells was proclaimed the winner.

The middles and heavies did not serve to atone for the poor displays in the lighter weights, Warnes, a winner on three previous occasions, was much ahead of the others in point of science, and gained a clever victory over Hines, a much younger boxer. Penford did not display championship form against Collins, while Hearsey and Gainsford were each put out in the first round. Hearsey had Titley beaten in the first minute, but boxing with very bad judgment, he was whipped in the next. The heavies introduced another Colonial aspirant in Weaver, the South African champion, but the visitor had the misfortunate to step hard against the right of his oponent in the middle of the second round. Stanley and Major were both decisively beaten by Read and Ireton respectively, but the boxing in these bouts was hardly up to championship class. The Danish heavy-weight champion—Yansen—put up a lively display with that well-tried exponent Brewer, but the latter was a winner from the start. The foreign champion is a good, solid puncher, and it was only Brewer's extra cleverness which enabled him to win.

Appended are the results of the final bouts.—

BANTAM WEIGHTS.—(8st. 4lbs and under) E. Adams (Columbia B. C.) beat W. I. Cotterill (Brimingham A.B.C.) Adams, it must be admitted, was decidedly lucky in gaining the casting vote of the referee. The winner boxed in last year's championships, but lost to Winger, the ultimate winner in the second series, after outpointing F. Cany (Paris). Last season Adams won the Old Goldsmiths' B. C. 8st. 8lb. open competition, and the Lynn bantams, in which he defeated H. Perry in the final. Last January Adams was beaten by W. Webb (N. Pancras B.C.) in the first series of the Old Goldsmiths' B. C. 8st. 8lb competition.

FEATHER WEIGHTS (9st and under).—C. Morris (Polytechnic B. C.) beat H. Holmes (Columbia B. C.) Morris has been one of the most consistent boxers in the lighter divisions for the past half-dozen years. A protege of Arthur Westley, Morris has done his mentor great credit while sporting the colours of the Polytechnic Club. He won the feather-weight cup in 1904, and competed without success in the two following years. He reachee the final last year, but was beaten by A. J. Miner in the final round after a gruelling bout. This season he has been fairly successful, and among his victories may be enumerated the Polytechnic B.C. 9st. 10lbs. club competition, in which he met several heavier opponents. Morris has been runner-up in many open competitions, including the Cestus 8st. 8lbs. event, which was won by Ringer.

LIGHT-WEIGHTS, (10st. and under).—M. Wells (Lynn A. C., best F. Spiller (Gainford B. C.)

This was of brief duration, for after a few halfarm blows had been exchanged, Wells crossed his adversary with the right in a telling manner. Spiller went down, and having hurt his ankle, held out his hand in token of defeat.

Wells, by his fourth consecutive victory, creates a record in this weight. He is one of the most accomplished light-weights that ever boxed under A. B. A. conditions, although many may doubt this statement. He has won the German Gymnastic middles, the Eton Mission 10st 8lbs, while in a recent six rounds contest with H. Collins (Eton Mission), he triumphed rather easily. He was trained by Jack Meeking (Woolwich), at Whetstone, and was brought to the scratch in the acme of condition.

MIDDLE WEIGHTS. (11st. 4lbs. and under).—R.C. Warnes (Gainford B. C.) beat H. Collins (Eton Mission B.C.,) Assisted by extra reach, Collins, who took the initiative, showed to the fore with the left hand until Warnes forced himself to close quarters. Then they took part in some lively exchanges, in which each in turn was master of the situation. The second round was spoilt by a general inclination to hold, but Warnes, when at half-arm distance, effected plenty of mischief. He tried some well-meant rights which were only partly successful, and in response Collins was busy with the left. Keeping up aggressive tactics, Warnes just succeeded in taking a winning advantage, and this he increased at the start of the third meeting. Collins would not be denied, and at times he did well without ever getting on terms. The pace grew tedious towards the finish, but Warnes alwayf held sufficient in hand to pull through.

Warnes is quite a veteran at the game, and he scored his first championship success as far back as 1899. After his victory in 1903 he practically retired from active competition, but this year he felt so well that he decided to have another "go" His fourth success creates a record in this weight, and eclipses Joe Steer's three successive wins in 1891-2-3. Warnes is a member of the Grainsford A C. and Surrey Commercial Docks A. C., in the latter of which he acts as honorary instructor. The champion has been in active training with Charlie Wilson, the well-known Notting Hill professional, who a couple of seasons ago gained a sensational victory over Jim Casey (America) in Dublin.

HEAVY WEIGHTS. (Any weight).—H. Brewer (Polytechnic B. C.) beat A. Ireton (City Police A.C.) The last-named, in addition to being several inches the taller, had a pull to the extent of more than 3st in weight. Making the most of himself, Ireton at once got in with a dig on the mouth. This brought about a rapid distribution of telling punches in Ireton's favour. The latter landed on the mouth with much severity, but in trying to repeat the dose he was cleverly avoided. Brewer now took a turn of attacking, and getting home a well-meant drive with the right, he completely closed the policeman's previously damaged right eye. Handicapped from this cause, Ireton gave many chances by leaving himself open, and this did a lot towards levelling up matters for Brewer. The latter, although not the first to resume, showed up well in some slashing work, and using fine judgment, he had the best of the first part of the meeting. Ireton, if somewhat erratic, made the most of his extra weight, and when forcing his opponent into a corner, he did plenty of damage. Both showed visible signs of severe punishment, and although Ireton hit with most force, he allowed his rival to get home quite a number of left shots. The concluding meeting was of a very heavy order, but Brewer, making the most of his superior cleverness and experience, kept using the left continually. It was a slashing struggle, and in the end the honours went to Brewer, who was a popular winner.

Brewer will be remembered as the wiuner of the light weight championship in 1899. Increasing weight caused him to retire for a number or seasons and it was only as a result of the active coxing of the Polytenic boys that he decided to try his luck again. He is a very cool boxer, and always uses his judgment to perfection. At the close he was heartily congratulated, andparticularly so by his clubmate, F. Parkes, who only relinquished the title this year.

CROSS-COUNTRY RUNNING.

THE INTERNATIONAL CHAMPIONSHIP.—Cross-country sport is merely in its infancy in Scotland. But it is fraught with immense potentialities, and the International match, which was held at Glasgow on Saturday afternoon, is certain to give this form of athleticism an impetus in that surging centre of civilisation. There are not many clubs in Scotland as yet, but the few there are prosecute their calling with considerable activity; indeed, on the eve of the great race—or, as they call it in Scotland, "the Grand National"—the West of Scotland Harriers celebrated their coming of age by holding a banquet in St. Enoch's Hotel, at which many athletic interests were represented, while England carried a message of welcome to that club in the person of Mr. A. J. Eggleston, president of the National Cross-Country Union, who, in a speech of much humour and force, emphasised the oneness of all the bodies and all the clubs which were in any way associated with this great sport. We merely mention this fact to show that if the cross-country clubs beyond the Tweed are not plentiful in numbers, they at least are strong on the social side of the sport, which, after all, is not the least important side.

Saturday's race cannot boast of a long and glorious history. Established in 1903, the initial struggle was held within the ducal policies at Hamilton, which in many respects is a much more suitable venue than that of Saturday—Scotstoun. But the Scottish authorities thought this was a favourable opportunity for bringing cross-country sport under the notice of the Glasgow public, and Scotstoun, a well-appointed enclosure, belonging to the Agricultural Society, was preferred to Hamilton, with all its associations, sporting and otherwise. There was an attendance of 2,000, which, if not all that the importance of the event deserved, was at all events a great improvement on what was experienced at Hamilton in 1905.

The course did not give very general satisfaction, more than one Englishman declaring that there was too much pathway and not enough genuine cross-country. But this is one of the disadvantages of holding a race of this kind in a large city. The "out-country" was in fine order, and as the distance was just under ten miles, the time is to some extent a tribute to the fastness of the going. The Scots ran in rubber shoes, but the others held to their spikes, which in some cases had to be shortened. The spectacular side of the race was scarcely a success, as only a portion of the course could be seen. The start, however, was a blaze of colour, and as the sun was shining with a glory rarely seen in Scotland at this period of the season, the whole formed quite a pleasant spectacle. The course was covered three times. Mr. Moore got the lot away to an excellent start, and the first quarter was done at a cracking pace.

There is really no need to go into detail, as from start to finish there was only one country in the race, and that was England, whose representatives showed a superiority which dwarfed those of France, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales. This is the first time France has taken part in the race, and our friends have reason to be quite satisfied with their initial appearance in Britain in the capacity of cross-country runners.

WILKINSON'S SAFETY RAZORS.

A Safety Razor which all users pronounce perfect.

The high reputation enjoyed by the Wilkinson Sword Company is sufficient guarantee that the quality of this shaver is of the highest grade.

It differs from other shavers, because instead of the old fashioned fence or comb protecting the face from the cutting edge, and which has always been the great objection to Safety Razors, a deep cut helical roller has been substituted. As this rolls, the lather and hair pass between the projecting screw threads and all parts of the cutting edge are brought into action. This gives even wear along the whole cutting edge and feeds the lather on to it.

RACKETS.

THE AMATEUR CHAMPIONSHIPS.

SINGLES.—The final and championship round of the singles racquets campionship, at Queen's Club, on the 25th instant, resulted in a hard and close fight, the even nature of the match being shown by the fact that each player scored the same number of aces. It was expected that Mr. Foster, after the good form he had shown in the preliminary matches, would win, but he failed badly at a critical part of the game, and Mr. Noel gained a deserved and popular victory. In the first two games the Old Malvernian could do nothing wrong; he found the length of the court admirably, and killed the ball off the front wall with tremendous power, but later his hitting became erratic, the ball going out of court or finding the board repeatedly.

Among the spectators were the three sons of the Prince of Wales—the Princes Edward, Albert and George of York. Details:—

Mr. E. B. Noel (Winchester and Cambridge) beat Mr. B. S. Foster (Malvern) by 3 games to 2—64 aces to 64. Score:—7—15, 6—15, 18—14, 15—7, 18—13.

First Game: Noel won the spin of the bat, but did not score, and Foster, finding his service at once, scored three aces before being put out by a hard, low stroke. Noel, returning on to the board, again failed and Foster made another ace after a tremendous rally, Noel then opened his account with a single, but Foster went to 8—1 in his next hand. A low return of the service put Noel out without any addition, and small and unproductive hands followed to the end of the game, the longest innings being three by the Old Wykehamist.

Second Game: Foster, continuing, made only a single, a beautiful angle-stroke losing him possession, and Noel with a couple led for the first time. Then six hands were taken before Foster, getting in at 3—6, went out with the longest run of the match.

Third Game: The Old Malvernian added a single, and so made his full sequence thirteen, and Noel followed with a couple before putting himself out with two faults. Then a dozen hands were taken before Foster equalised at 9 all. More small and unprofitable innings followed, both players hitting very hard in the court, and the game was "set five" at 13 all, Foster then being in. He lost his chance by hitting the ball out of court, and Noel eventually won.

Fourth Game: Noel, who had gone out with four aces, added a couple, and after six more hands led at 6—2. Foster made three, and after both players had failed, Noel with four led at 10—5. Foster was now hitting somewhat wildly, and after each of his next two innings had realised a single, he returned the ball on to the board, and Noel, with a sequence of four, equalised the games at 2 all.

Fifth Game: The Old Wykehamist kept a splendid length to his service, and on continuing his hand ran up five, his full sequence amounting to 9, his highest of the match. Foster regained possession with a superb angle-stroke, but after scoring three a clever drop-stroke let Noel in. The latter made only a single, but Foster failed, the ball again going out of court. An unproductive hand to each followed, and then Noel, with two, gained the lead at this critical part of the match at 8—5. Foster, hitting hard in the rallies, and killing the ball well, retrieved his position with two runs of three, while his opponent did nothing, but Noel, getting in at 8—9, came again with a sequence of five. Foster once more got on terms with four, but lost his innings when the game had been "set five" at 13 all. The Old Malvernian now did not have another chance, as Noel with five won the game and the championship.

DOUBLES.—The final and championship round of the Doubles Amateur Championship at Queen's Club, yesterday, produced a hard-hitting contest, in which, after the first game, the brothers W. L. and B. S. Foster always had a bit the better of the exchanges. W. L. Foster found his game at the start, and never grew slack, while his brother showed much of the brilliancy which gained him his place in the final of the singles. Balfour Bryant was scarcely so effective as customary in the court, opportunities of killing the ball being missed in an unusual manner, while his partner was made to appear only moderate class by the hard-hitting Old Malvernians. Details:—

FINAL AND CHAMPIONSHIP ROUND.

Captain W. L. Foster, D. S. O., R.H.A. (Malvern), and Mr. B. S. Foster (Malvern) beat Mr. H. Balfour Bryant, M. V. O., and Mr. P. Bramwell Davis, 2nd Batt. Highland Light Infantry (Army champions) by 4 games to 1, 56 aces to 50. Score:—3—15, 15—6, 15—10, 18—13.

First Game.—The Highlanders won the spin for service, and Davis opened with a couple. The latter failed at his next hand, after the Fosters had each scored a single, and Bryant went to 5—2. A single by W. L. was the last score the Old Malvernians made in this game, as after small and unproductive hands Bryant got in at 8—3, and went out.

Second Game.—The Army champion did not add to his sequence of seven, and W. L. Foster followed with five. The succeeding ten innings did not advance the score much, but Bryant went from 2—8 to 6—8. Three to W. L., followed by four to B. S., however, gave the Fosters the game.

Third Game.—A dozen hands were taken before Basil Foster, with a run of five, caused the game to be called "10—3" in the Old Malvernians' favour. More small and unproductive innings succeeded, W. L. Foster, with a couple, reaching "game."

Fourth Game.—The Artilleryman did not score upon continuing his hand, and Davis followed suit. Bryant put on a couple, but a single to W. L. and four to B. S. gave the Fosters a lead of 5—2. The Highlanders' next hands were both barren, and W. L. with five doubled the advantage. Small and unproductive innings followed until Davis went from 5—13 to 8—13, and Bryant, as second hand, added two more before W. L. made the two necessary aces.

Fifth Game.—Continuing his hand, the Artilleryman made five, and so increased his sequence to seven, and eventually the Fosters stood at 11—3. Mainly by means of runs of three and five by Bryant the Army champions drew up and led at 13—12. W. L. Foster equalised, and after the game was "set five" he went to 4—love, and his brother made the winning ace.

Mr. E. B. Noel was referee.

HOCKEY.

ENGLAND vs. SCOTLAND.—England's international hockey campaign was brought to a conclusion at Bourneville, Birmingham, on Saturday, 23rd instant, with a three goals to nothing victory over Scotland. In their four engagements, therefore, the English representatives have scored 28 goals and lost none. They first defeated Wales by 6 goals, then France by 14, and then Ireland by 5.

Splendid weather prevailed, and with the ground in capital order, the match was played under ideal conditions. There was very little to choose between the sides in the first half. L. A. Mackenzie, the Scottish forward, looked like scoring on several occasions, but C. W. Marshall and L. C. Baillon always succeeded in dealing with the visitors' attacks. The English forwards combined splendidly, but their shooting was somewhat erratic, otherwise they might have scored before the interval. As it was, neither side had penetrated the others' defence at half-time.

On changing ends, however, the English eleven showed to great advantage. Four minutes after restarting a good combined movement culminated in Jordan scoring the first goal. The Scottish forwards then made several desperate efforts to break away, but they could never get past the opposing halves, of whom E. W. Page was always conspicuous. Later Logan shot England's second goal, and before the end Whitehouse notched the home side's third point.

BILLIARDS.

REECE'S EXTRAORDINARY ACHIEVEMENT.—Not until making the winning stroke on Saturday did Tom Reece break up the position he had maintained near the right top pocket since the early part of Wednesday evening. Then, amid a scene of the wildest enthusiasm, he slashed out at the balls and sent them careering all round the table in a spirit of sheer abandon and relief at the completion of the task he had set himself to accomplish. As he entered upon his final "ten" a buzz of excitement broke out all over the hall, and almost before the final stroke was shaped up for, all the pent-up excitement broke out into a volume of applause such as is rarely heard in any of our billiard halls.

After the cheering had almost died away through sheer physical inability to continue, the representative of the Sporting Life (who was officiating as referee) gave the coompany a few particulars of the most astounding performance in the whole annals of the game. After pointing out that Reece had broken every record on an English table, he proceeded to read out the following remarkable figures:—Full break, 4,598; number of consecutive, cannons, 2,279; 2,268 of which were of the "cradle" order; time occupied by Reece in compiling the break, 1 hour 38min. 6secs.; and finally, the Lancastrian won by 4,135 points. Break record, cannon record, and time record now belong indisputably to Reece, while he also enabled Weiss to claim a record—ture an unenviable one—inasmuch as for six full sessions, and the greater part of a seventh, was not called upon to play a stroke. Such adjectives as wonderful, marvellous, astounding, brilliant, etc, appear quite inadequate to describe a performance, the like of which the present generation, at any rate, is not likely to see or read of again.

The fact that Reece, at the most, if he retained position, would only score 584 points in something like twelve or thirteen minutes, did not deter another large crown from attending Messrs Thurston's Grand Hall, Leicester-square, on Saturday afternoon, to witness the continuation of his remarkable break which overnight he had brought up to the huge total of 3,428 (including 1,696 consecutive cannons). Among the spectators was the Australian champion, who with his cue resting between his knees as usual, sat patiently waiting to take his part in the improvised programme—he had apparently resigned all hope of getting another stroeke in the match—while near by him sat W. J. Peall, the spot stroke champion, whose great break of 3,304 Reece had pulverised the previous evening. A little further away were Leslie Stuart, the eminent musical composer; A. J. Browne, a prominent amateur; and W. Mitchell, the veteran Sheffielder, all of whom displayed the keenest interest in the proceedings.

After acknowledging the hearty welcome accorded him as he made his appearence, Reece proceeded to the head of the table where as cool and confident as ever, he proceeded to wake the stationary cue ball into "life" by gently prodding it on to the red, from whence it kissed back on to the object white, and from there back to its original position. The clicking of the balls, and Dixon's voice calling "One," "Three," "Five" "Seven" and so on, at each movement of the cue, were almost the only signs of life heard in the auditorium, so eagerly was everyone's attention riveted on the balls. At intervals of about two minutes—when Reece took a "breather"—one might detect what almost sounded like a sigh, but which was in reality only a long-drawn deep breath, to be immediately suppressed as the wonderful little Lancastrien again took up the "song of the cradlecannon." The scoring of each "century" varied but little, as the following time will show:—

Dixon's announcement of break "4,012 unfinished," a round of applause, and then the spectators settled down in their seats again to witness the best of three "frames" of pyramids, which Reece won by the score of 8-7 in each of the first two games. Afterwards the Australian champion gave his inimitable show of trict and fancy strokes, those requiring the aid of wine glasses being especially clever and entertaining. And then the spectators trooped out in a thoroughly contented frame of mind, pleased with everything they saw. Interval scores:—

Weiss...	... 2,865

There was a perceptible thinning of the attendance when the final stage was entered upon, but the company was nevertheless a large and appreciative one. As showing the fascination which the latest novelty in strokes exercises over players and public alike, we may mention that the celebrities already referred to as having been present at the afternoon sitting, were again in evidence at the final stage, and were joined by another prominent amateur in C. H. Mortimer.

As the final proceedings ran in a similar groove to that which had gone before, there is little in the way of detailed description to be added to what has already been written on this most remarkable of matches.

Reece dropped into his touch at once, and proceeded smoothly and at the same uniform pace to reel off hundred after hundred. Entering upon the last "lap," the record breaker gave the first sign of possessing "nerves," he on one occasion nearly letting the coloured ball get beyond control, while on another occasion the cue ball got so close in as to cause mild groans of disappointment from the company that the striker had got into a "tangle" when so near "home." Steadying himself, however, Reece surmounted both difficulties very cleverly, and ran straight to game as already described, without further trouble. The times for the hundreds were as follow:—

"THANKS," said the tragedian; "many thanks for your good opioion. I always study from Nature, sir. In my acting you see reflected Nature herself."

"Try this cigar," said an admirer of Nature, reverently. "Now, where did you study that expression of intense surprise that you assume in the second act?"

"From Nature, sir, from Nature." To secure that expression I asked an intimate friend to lend me £5. He refused. This caused me no surprise. I tried several more.

"Finally, I asked one who was willing to oblige me, and as he handed me the note I studied in a glass the expression of my own face. I saw there surprise, but it was not what I wanted. It was alloyed with suspicion that the note might be a bad one. I was in despair."

"Well?" said the other, breathlessly.

"Then an idea struck me. I resolved upon a desperate course. I returned the £5 note to my friend the next day, and on his astonished countenance I saw the expression of which I was in search."

Football.

THE INDIAN FOOTBALL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING.—Representatives of twenty-three clubs attended the meeting held at the Dalhousie Institute on Tuesday night, Mr. F. H. Reynolds occupying the chair. The voting for members of Council gave the following result:—

Dalhousie, Y. M. C. A., Rangers, Northumberland Fusiliers, Hornets, Mohan Bagan, National Association, Sova Bazaar, Highland Light Infantry, and Howrah United.

Mr. Frank Carter, President of the Calcutta Football Club, was unanimously elected Vice-President of the I. F. A. for 1907, Mr. Douglas Baker, C. F. C., and Mr. D. L. Walker, Caledonia A. C., resuming their duties as Joint Honorary Secretaries and Treasurers.

The annual report stated that the thirteenth year of the Association's control has not been without its appropriate incidents which, though regrettable from many points of view, have but served to emphasise the necessity for that strong and sensible governance which it is this Association's endeavour to accord to local football. The past season has witnessed the introduction of several desirable amendments to the I. F. A. Rules as well as the elimination of many anomalies.

The formation of a Calcutta Referees' Association undoubtedly calls for the co-operation of the I. F. A. as calculated to remove or at least alleviate much of the discontent which has up to now frightened away many likely referees and disheartened the good ones. Provided the Referees' Association is successful in recruiting really reliable referees, the I. F. A. should have no diffidence in according it the fullest support.

The majority of the meetings held during last year, it is pointed out, were necessitated by incidents of a distinctly undesirable nature, and the Council view with apprehension the increasing tendency of junior clubs to involve themselves in litigious disputes where a broader and more sporting view of the game would [illegible] to settle such matters, but would materially diminish the present severe tax on the time and patience of council members imposed by frequent and unnecessary reference to that body.

There were eleven entries for the Shield, one less than in 1905, and the Trades Cup attracted 32 entries,—a record number. There were nineteen entries for the Cooch Behar Cup and ten for the Elliott Challenge Shield. The Cadet Cup attracted six entries, and the Beighton Hockey Cup 30.

The balance sheet shows a credit balance of Rs. 1,679 available for next year, showing a profit of Rs. 81 on the season's working.

Some surprise and disgust was evinced when the proposal for the formation of the Referees' Association was discussed, and it was found that the wrong-headed native element at the meeting was strongly opposed to it. Naturally almost everything proposed by Europeans meets with the opposition of the Aryan brother nowadays [illegible] in this case, childish and ridiculous. These short sighted anti-progress wallas will find out their mistake ere the football season is a fortnight old.

Other matters were considered at this meeting, and some important resolution were passed, notably that in connection with the eligibility of players for the Cooch Behar Cup.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

THE League is now practically over and public interest is being drawn to the Beighton Cup competition.

The number of teams entered is much the same as in previous years, and the only two up-country clubs that figure are Ranchi (the holders of the Cup) and Jamalpur. It is a great pity that a team from the Jats and Dogras could not see their way to take part in our tournament as the winners of the All India Hockey Cup would have been sure to have given a good account of themselves, and given the Calcutta public an opportunity of witnessing what form there is outside their own city.

The result of the draw is perhaps not so satisfactory as one could wish as there is every likelihood of probable finalists meeting each other in the early stages of the tournament.

For instance Seebpore and Hornets meet in the very first round and the winners of this game play Calcutta in the succeeding round, and thereby two of the strongest local combinations will have no further interest after the preliminary stages.

In the writer's opinion if Ranchi can show anything like their form of previous years, they will again carry off the Cup, as it must be acknowledged that local Clubs are not as strong as they have been in seasons past. The Hornets in full strength will probably be Calcutta's best, but it is doubtful if they will be able to show much combination as it is rumoured that several of last year's players will join the forces of the "buzzers" ere the tournament commences. Failing the Hornets, Calcutta should give as good a display as any club.

They will, however, have to take the field without Heilgers, who, one regrets to note, has been invalided to Kasauli with a dog bite and Powell the best available substitute will probably take his place, but otherwise the team will be as hitherto.

The Championship of the League, which was considered as definitely settled, has now some element of doubt, as Calcutta by their defeat by Caledonia on Monday last are only two points ahead of Seebpore, while the latter have a game in hand.

Seebpore have now to play Dalhousie and should they prevail would tie with Calcutta in points, but would be placed first on the strength of a better goal average.

Calcutta's display against Caledonia was only mediocre; one might almost say indifferent. True they were without Manders, Heilgers and Cooper, but this should not have robbed them of victory. After having the better of the game, and I think it will be admitted playing the better hockey, they had to own defeat by the odd goal of five.

Calcutta did score an equalising goal in the closing stages of the game, but this was adjudged off side.

The other games in the League have attracted little or no interest as having no bearing on the ultimate result.

The League tables now stand as follows :—

The Kennel.

THE SPRINGERS

The English Springer is probably the prototype of the whole of the sporting Spaniel family. Some of the earliest records speak of the "springing Spaniel," and he is no doubt a contemporary of the "setting Spaniel," the two dogs doubtless being the only Spaniels in existence at the period. They were probably much the same in type and conformation, the former being taught to "spring" at his quarry in flushing it, and the other to "set" it—hence the distinction. From the latter the Setter was doubtless evolved, and from the "springing Spaniel" the whole of the beautiful varieties we now possess have emanated, leaving the original a derelict on the sands of time. It is probably incorrect to say that the old English Springer has ever become extinct, for although he never gained a footing on the English show bench until very recently, when, through the instrumentality of Mr. W. Arkwright and the Sporting Spaniel Society, the Kennel Club were induced to place him on the register, yet he has been kept in his purity in many shooting kennels in different parts of the country, the owners of which have preferred utility to beauty, ignoring what they have termed the "elongated moustrosities" of the show ring.

The Sporting Spaniel Society was the first to come to the rescue of the old English Springer, guaranteeing classes for the variety at several of the more important shows. The entries in the English Springer classes at the earlier shows were a somewhat heterogeneous and motley group, embracing as they did all sizes and shapes from a half-bred Setter to half Cockers and Clumbers, misfit Field and Sussex Spaniels, and what were then known as Norfolk Spaniels, that is, the liver-and-white, medium-sized, symmetrical, and well-balanced type of Spaniel, which was, and is still, greatly used and much valued as a working dog all over the country. I often think that of all Spaniels this dog (about whose origin there is no distinct record, some holding that he is indigenous to the county of the same name, and others that he is the product of one of the Dukes of Norfolk), whose size, colour, and conformation are so fixed and distinct, and whose intelligence, tractability, endurance and capability in the field are beyond dispute, has very great claims to recognition as a distinct variety of the sporting Spaniel, both by the Spaniel Clubs and the Kennel Club. It is held by others that the Norfolk Spaniel and the English Springer are identical, one and the same, but I do not hold with this theory, and I have a letter before me from Sir Hugo Fitz Herbert, Bart, a great enthusiast in the cause of the English Springer, of which he is a successful breeder and exhibitor, who also negatives the idea. Sir Hugo says that whole colours, whether black, liver, or red, were never associated with the Norfolk Spaniel, in which he is quite right, but these colours, and, indeed, all colours, have been, and are, associated with the English Springer. This further confirms my view of the uniformity of type of the Norfolk Spaniel, which, with its indisputable beauty and utility, and the fact of his having preserved his individuality through all the Spaniel evolutions and metamorphoses, in my opinion, gives him one of the strongest possible claims to recognition as a distinct variety.

The English Springer is, with the Norfolk Spaniel, one of the most rational dogs in point of architecture of all the Spaniel varieties, viewed from the vantage point of utility. He may be any colour almost, and is a leggy dog in comparison to the Field Spaniels, with a short and more symmetrical body, straight front, flat coat, a long head, square muzzle, rather narrow skull, and low set ears. His eyes and expression, gait and feathering, are all distinctly Spaniel. He combines strength with activity, courage with docility, and all the characteristics of a workman and gentleman combined, without his vices. He is a dog of from 40lbs. to 50lbs. weight.

The Welsh Springer. Coming to the Spaniel product of "gallant little Wales," we have a variety which excels any of the English varieties for size, colour, and fixity of type. His origin, with the other varieties, is no doubt a common one, but while the red-and-white Field Spaniels in England have almost died out, in Wales the variety has been preserved and bred in its purity for a long period, probably for hundreds of years, according to the records. It is only in recent years that the Welsh Springer has been recognised on the show bench, and later still (in 1902) that the Kennel Club placed the variety on the register. The variety has, however, been kept in several leading sporting Spaniel families in the Principality for many generations, no shooting expedition at one time being complete that did not include a team of these merry red-and-white Spaniels. As workers they have no superior, no day being too long and no covert too strong for the endurance and pluck of these gay Cambrians.

The principal pioneers of the breed, to whom the credit is in the main due for bringing them to the front, include Mr. H. T. Williams, Mrs. H. D. Greene,, Mr. David and one or two others.

The Welsh Springer is a dog of from 30lbs. to 40lbs. weight proportionate in all his parts, with a well-balanced head, straight front, grand spring of rib, and powerful hindquarters. He may be described as an enlarged Cocker, but shows less feathering than is found in most of the other varieties, and the ears are also shorter. As in all Spaniels, snipiness and thick heads are common defects, and the Welsh Springer is no exception. This said, the breed is at once a rational one, and possesses all the traits of his English cousin, while the uniformity of colour and its irregular distribution give to a group of Welsh Springers quite a picturesque appearance. In this way the variety has made great headway on the show bench, and enlisted a number of enthusiasts within its ranks, who are much devoted to the breed, not only for its general beauty, but also for their wonderful prowess in the field.

The Horse.

A FEW HINTS ABOUT BANDAGING HORSES' LEGS.

FOR a long time it has been the custom to bandage the legs of horses subjected to all kinds of fast work, and this custom is now becoming more general every year. The main reasons for bandaging the legs while doing fast work, such as hunting and racing, is to give support to the tendons on which most of the strain is laid, to lessen the effect of blows, and to protect the fetlock joint from sprains.

In order to bind up the legs so that the bandages will not slip and so that they will bear any pressure at all upon the tendons it is necessary to put the bandage on very tight, the result of this is that the circulation of the leg is stopped, there is enormous pressure made to bear upon the front and back portions of the limbs which do not require it, and there is practically no support given to the tendons.

These facts have been realised by the majority of up-to-date horse owners, and they insert cotton wool under the bandage, putting a greater thickness on the sides of the legs in order to give equal pressure all round. This practice is troublesome and expensive, and there are few g who can bandage properly with cotton wool, and the cotton wool, when it becomes saturated with sweat or water, is apt to get displaced and the bandage consequently slip, the lower folds dropping from under the outer ones and forming a loop which has caused many a fatal accident, through the horse putting his foot through the loop.

A new and very excellent bandage has now been put on the market, called the Sandown Patent Fleecy Horse Bandage. These are made with a padding knitted into a porous and elastic groundwork, and when bound on the legs the folds adhere to the leg and to one another, and form, as it were, one piece or fabric the whole length of the leg bandaged, consequently there is no fear of their slipping. The wool padding beds well into the tendons and prevents too much pressure eleswhere, this combination, of a padded and elastic bandage allows the circulation to run free and does not injure or weaken the legs no matter how often they are bound up

The Sandown Bandages are easy to apply, look neat, and are economical. Horses are generally bandaged when they return from work, and here the advantages of the Sandown bandages are most marked. The legs may be washed and the bandages put straight on while they are wet, the fleecy material quickly absorbs all the moisture which passes through the bandages to the outer folds leaving the fleece dry inside. They support tired legs without irritating the horse, they protect the limbs from blows and strains in the stable and do not leave any marks from hard edges: these marks so often seen on the legs of horses which have been bandaged mean that the edges of the bandages have been cutting into their legs and stopping the circulation, and the more often they are bandaged the weaker they become, until they eventually become deformed.

Many horses try to tear their bandages off, sometimes for mischief, but more often because they are stopping the circulation and thus causing irritation.

Those who bandage their horses with plain serge bandages cannot have any reason for doing so except that of appearance, and because it is a general custom, and they do not consider what effect this bandaging has on the legs. If we have a weak joint, we do not bind it up with a rigid cloth, but use something elastic which gives and takes with the movements of the joint, and the same should be applied to horses.

The Sandown Co. are now sending large consignments of their bandages to India and other Colonies where they are taking the place of boots and leggings for Polo Ponies, and are found to be very much better.

The Sandown Bandages have many good points when used for wet purposes as they have for dry, and when used for cold water applications, they hold a great quantity of water and keep wet and cool for a whole day, and they hold the water like a sponge and the heat instead of being kept in is allowed to escape.

Veterinary Surgeons find them most useful for applying lotions and oils. All oils and embrocations produce their maximum effect on the limbs of horses if they are afterwards bandaged with the wool fleeced bandages.

Six horses were recently shipped to South Africa and their legs were bandaged with the Fleecy Stable Bandages before going on board and were left on for the whole voyage and when removed at the other side their legs were found to be all in a beautifully cool and fine state. These bandages are made in six different sizes in order to suit all purposes, and these sizes are all mentioned in the Company's advertisements in this paper.

ZEBROIDS.

FROM zebras which he has imported at great expense, Warner M. Van Norden, president of the Van Norden Trust Company of New York, entertains great hopes that the zebroids (as the hybrid offspring of the horse and zebra is called), will come to be generally and favourably known in this country.

"The zebroid," explained Mr. Van Norden recently, "makes an excellent all around animal for domestic use and I hope to introduce it in this country. It is already used in South Africa, where it has given satisfaction. I cannot say just how speedy the zebroid will be, but those I shall raise shall be from the finest stock, especially suited for driving purposes. These animals are much stronger and more vigorous than the horse and live about twice as long. They will rank with any of the horses in general use to-day and in value will range from $800 to $1,000. They will be very tough and able to endure twice the hardship the average horse can stand."

The parents, perhaps, of generations of American zebroids yet unborn are now contentedly munching hay in the barn of Mr. Van Norden's country place at Rye, N. Y., all unconscious of the weight of the responsibility resting upon their carefully groomed backs.

In temporary quarters in one barn are three zebras said to be among the finest of the species ever brought to this country. One of them is declared to be a genuine Grevy's zebra from Abysinia and this animal alone is valued by Mr. Van Norden at $5,000. The other two zebras belong to what is known as the Bohimii class. Two more, equally as valuable as those now in Rye, have been captured for Mr. Van

I must confess to you I had no idea the Gramophone was such a scientific and musical instrument, nor that such strides had been made in the science of sound reproduction. I had hitherto refused to have a record made of my voice, believing the result would be inartistic. I am, however, absolutely satisfied with the Records, and am content that future generations shall judge my voice by the Gramophone.

Dear Sir,—I have tried the records and find them really wonderful reproductions of my singing. I feel that, in them, all the care and trouble to which your experts went last month have found great reward. My friends who have heard them are simply delighted with them.

Norden and will be shipped to this country early next spring. These animals are about six years old and, inasmuch as the life of the average zebra is about 50 years, they are as yet more babies and are full of more life and tricks than young colts.

So much for the zebra parents of the zebroid. The parents on the other side will range from the full-blooded Arabian mare down to little burro jennies, through a list of horseflesh including piebald, hackney and mustang.

The zebroids will owe their appearance in this country, however, not so much to Mr. Van Norden's desire to raise them for themselves alone, as to determine to solve the problem of telegony.

He is determined to demonstrate whether it is real, as scientists declare. Explaining the object of this undertaking, Mr. Van Norden said:

"All breeders believe in telegony. It has always been their claim that if a female animal is bred to one of a different species but of the same family and is afterwards bred to one of her own species the second offspring will show resemblance to the first sire. Opposite to the claim of the breeders is that of the scientists, who say there is no such thing as telegony and that the breeders are mistaken in their diagnosis.

"A man who stands near the head of the scientists in their contention that there is nothing in the breeders' fear of telegony is Professor W. Cossar Ewart, of Edinburgh University, and for years he has conducted experiments to support the correctness of his theories. Professor Ewart is now experimenting with pigeons and rabbits. He asserts that no one has ever gone into the subject of telegony in such a manner as clearly to demonstrate the truth or falsity of the many claims made concerning it. The experiments of Professor Ewart and others have thrown some light on the subject, but there is still much to be learned."—Breeder and Sportsman.

The Naturalist.

ANIMALS AND BIRDS THAT CATCH FISH—THE MINK.

On numerous occasions while trout fishing I have seen mink both on shore and swimming in the water. It is much smaller in size than the other and somewhat larger than the weasel, whose habits and savage nature towards all the lesser animals is of a similar bloodthirsty character. The mink is by no means a rare animal; indeed it is still quite common throughout the whole of North America. It is always found near the banks of large ponds and rivers, preferring the rapid flowing water in spring and still waters in autumn; this of itself is a sign of its angling propensities, fish being more plentiful and easier to catch under those circumstances. Though not half such a murderous creature as the otter, the mink, considering its size, will often destroy great numbers of fish. Living as it does near the water it is endowed with boundless resources in the manner of taking its prey; diving in the water without a ripple or splash, it darts like an arrow after its food; or, with the ease of a squirrel, climbs a tree, when opportunity offers, and varies his diet with an occasional bird. It will also eat dead fish, if found fresh, as the following incident will show: It has always been my habit when coarse fish, like chub or dace take the fly intead of trout, not to return them to the water but throw them on the river side; more than once has the mink followed me down stream, at a respectful distance, eating each fish on the spot he found it. Sometimes, if nearer the opposite shore, I would throw it on that side; the animal would swim across and get it; this always happened from sunset till dark. I am not sure the same mink followed after me on different occasions, as I know more than one animal frequented the locality. Most anglers, at least I do, follow each day the same beaten track down the stream; we know our own footprints from those of others, but on this river, no tracks are seen for weeks, except those of the different birds and animals.

The track of a muskrat, the mink's bitter foe, is about the same size and makes a somewhat similar impression in the soft, wet sand. The mink will kill and eat the muskrat, though they are both about the same size, which is about twenty inches long, and its thick, round tail eight inches more. The mink never attempts the capture of a large fish; its method is to creep inside a shallow pool, then drive the fish, who flee in terror ashore, then with quick, rapid movements manages to scoop in three or four at a time. Not nearly so fastidious as the otter, the mink will eat head, tail and all, leaving no remnants for the lesser creatures. Even in the daytime, if a dead, fresh fish is placed on the river bank three hours later it will be gone, the keen sense of smell in animals, equally keen and far-reaching vision of birds, are brought in play, so that some creature in constant search after food has removed it. At times, in the quiet evening stillness, my attention is aroused by hearing a long squeak, and on turning round will see, a few yards distant, the sly mink snarling at some invisible creature hidden in the bushes, possibly trying to steal part of the fish he holds firmly between his paws.

When mink are plentiful, sometimes half a dozen old fellows will join together on a fishing excursion, travelling quite a distance to some good trout pool that one of the party is acquainted with, each taking a given position, then in a body, driving the fish before them, somewhat like a net, so that few escape. Here they will stay for days together feasting on this dainty fish, and after getting a full supply, will then return to their homes and go to sleep till they are again hungry. The mink is not absolutely nocturnal in its habits; it hunts by day, when so inclined, and if food is plentiful, it gorges to the utmost, especially if ground game, like young quail, grouse, and woodcock, or chicken and ducks are at hand.

But its accomplishments are so varied, it easily provides food for itself and its young, and in the winter, when the water is frozen, will make its way under the ice from some spring hole, getting a fish meal of young trout or minnows, passing by large-sized fish and confining its attention to localities where young fish of three to six inches in size shoal together. After catching three or four fish, placing each in its mouth when caught, it swims swiftly back to the shore, arranging them side by side, and at once begins to devour them, first bitting off the head and shoulders, and in two or three snaps swallows every particle. If it feels that four or five fish are insufficient to satisfy its hunger, another dive is made with similar results. The mink's preference for trout is very likely to be caused by the absence of scales and spines. Bass and perch in particular are well provided with sharp spines and the scales are large and heavy, making it harder to bite and to eat.

At the opening of the trout season, that is about the middle of April, the female mink noses around to find a suitable hab'tation, and arranges her cozy nest in some hole in the rocks situated conveniently near the water, or better still she tries to find a hollow log or stump lying among the grasses or bulrushes beside a stream. Such a situation, especially in boggy or wet places, insures greater safety for the mother to rear and educate her young. If the hole is not roomy enough she will begin to bite away the rotted wood, then make a soft bed of dried leaves and grass. Soon a litter of young ones appear, usually from four to six in number, whom the mother zealously guards, hiding them away from the male, who destroys and eats them (whenever he gets a chance) till they attain about half-growth. This trait is common among the males of many species; rabbits, weasels, stoats, all devour their young if the female is not constantly on guard to protect them from their murderous father. It is during the time her family are young that the mother confines herself to a fish diet, this being the easiest and quickest method of satisfying her hunger. Leaving the nest mostly during the daytime, or just after dawn, she is back again in a very few minutes, staying with her young for two or three days together. The time soon comes when the little family requires hunted game for food, and the mother begins to teach them the rudiments of hunting, beginning in a small way on young frogs, crawfish and minnows. Frogs, in particular, are easy to catch, and near at hand, in the marshy water; but frogs are few and far between. Moreover, near rivers the number of creatures that feed on them is legion, as many kinds of fish, birds, reptiles and animals seem to consider a frog a dainty tit-bit. The mother mink then has to fall back on the finny tribe to provide herself and her young with food.

The young rarely if ever leave their mother ti.. winter draws near, when they are nearly full grown and able to care for themselves. By the time the snow is on the ground they separate, each looking after his own welfare as best he can. The youngsters first begin their career as hunters in catching rabbits; this is more easily done when the white mantle of snow aids them in tracking and capturing their prey. Then they catch and devour wood and field mice. It is not until the spring that the young mink begins fishing. After the ice clears and the freshets are over they take to the water and very soon become expert anglers like their parents.

The fur of the mink is excellent in quality as well as beautiful in color, the tail and head being brought into requisition for ornamental purposes in the make-up of winter garments. In color it varies from a light red brown to dark brownish black—in the lighter specimens a dark streak runs down the back and the tail tips growing darker towards the end. The hair is composed of two kinds, one longer, darker and more bristly, the other close, compact and woolly. It bears a great resemblance to the sable, often being fradulently substituted for that fur.

The village innkeeper and the local chemist were sworn enemies. The former was walking down the street the other day, when he was accosted by a travelling chimney-sweep, who asked for a job. The publican, struck by a happy thought, pointed across the road to the chemist's establishment, and replied—"You can sweep my shop chimney if you like. My manager has a vile temper, and may kick up a fuss; but stick to him—I'm going to sack him anyway." When the innkeeper returned that way five minutes later, he beheld a tattered object being fired out of the pillshop, and a harsh voice from among the debris of the bottles yelled—"Yer gov'ner said I was to sweep the bloomin' chimney an' sweep it I will."

The new housemaid had only been twenty-four hours in her new place, when, having pricked her finger with a fork, she came running in great trouble to her mistress. The girl was frightened the wound might be troublesome, and was quite reassured when told that all the plate in the house was real silver. Next day she was gone, and all the sterling hall-marked stuff with her.

(a) This move has long since been discountananced in positions of this kind, as throwing the advantage into the hands of second player. The Pawn should have taken pawn, with the better game.

(b) P to Q B 4 is the proper move, and gives Black the advantage.

(c) The opening is very poorly played. White's fifth, ninth and tenth moves are useless. His twelfth and thirteenth lose him not only time, but material also.

(d) Black's turn for ill play now begins. In a few moves he loses all his advantage.

(e) White should have seized the advanced Pawn, and at move 26 he should have played K to Q 2. The error of neglecting the advanced Pawn is fatal.

MOTORING AND CYCLING AT HOME.

In considering the question of dazzling head lights, it must be borne in mind that the carrying of front and rear lights by every kind of road vehicle does not do away entirely with the necessity of illuminating the road to a reasonable extent for the passage of the faster vehicles, such as motor-cars, motor and pedal cycles, fast-trotting horse vehicles, &c. It is not only the crawling hay cart or other heavily loaded industrial conveyance that has to be looked out for, but also horsemen, droves of live stock, and pedestrians, none of which are likely to be compelled to reveal their presence by any kind of light. In properly lighted streets of towns and cities brilliant head lights are unquestionably out of place, and are a genuine source of complaint. It would, therefore, be quite reasonable if some method of obscuring the glare were made compulsory. One such device, is that fitted to the Autoclipse lamps. It consists simply of a dead black metal disc, which, by means of a Bowden wire worked by a lever within reach of the driver's hand, can at any moment be interposed between the burner and the reflector. This completely cuts off all the glare, leaving merely a small point of light, which, while it may be intense in the case of acetylene, can throw no reflected rays, and therefore has no dazzling effect. The method is so cheap and simple that there is really no excuse whatever for not making use of it, if only out of consideration for the comfort and safety of others, not only in lighted streets, but also in dark country roads, where the sensation of plunging into the black void that faces one behind a brilliant pair of head lights is most unnerving.

Cases furnished by members of the motoring bodies enumerate great numbers of narrow escapes and serious accidents experienced with unlighted vehicles, not only to motors, but also to horse carriages. For instance, a Worthing correspondent says that market carts crawl in pitch darkness between Lancing and Shoreham, and that a carriage and pair dashed into one of these with serious results. In another case it is stated that the main road from Bradford to Leeds is nightly thronged by hundreds of carts and waggons usually moving in the centre of the road, with no rear lights. It will be remembered what a sensation was caused last year when the Duke of Connaught narrowly escaped being killed through his car colliding with an unlighted cart in the streets of Edinburgh. Special attention is called to the extreme danger of loads which project a considerable distance behind the vehicle, and may escape observation even if a red rear light is carried. The lights should in every case be attached to the extreme end of such loads. One case under this heading is that the cart conveying ships' propellers between Sunderland and Newcastle, the blades of which often project beyond the sides of the carts, which might act with the same deadly effect as the scythes fixed to the axles of the ancient British war chariots. It is interesting to observe that when collisions do occur through the absence of lights it is the motorist who has to pay for any damage done. The fact that the question is now receiving serious attention is undoubtedly largely due to the spread of motoring amongst the more influential class of the community.

A very representative entry has been received from manufacturers both of six-cylinder and four-cylinder cars for the Flexibility Competition promoted by the Crystal Palace Automobile Club, and fixed to take place to-day. The time table of the competition is as follows: The first car will leave the Crystal Palace (Rock Hill entrance) at 8 a.m.; Sevenoaks, 9-0; Toubridge, 9-20; Battle, 10-30; Bexhill, 11-0; lunch at the Sackville Hotel, Bexhill, 12-30; trials on the track at 1-30. Returning: Bexhill, 3-0; Battle, 3-30; Toubridge, 4-40; Crystal Palace, 6-0.——The first act of the new committee of the Automobile Club at their first meeting on Tuesday was to resolve to express their humble thanks to His Majesty the King for conferring the title of "Royal" upon the club.—— Mr. Charles Day Rose, M.P., who has undertaken the responsibilities of Chairmanship of the R.A.C., is the second son of the late Sir John Rose, at one time Prime Minister of Canada. He has been for sixteen years a member of the Jockey Club, and is keenly interested in sport as a breeder and owner of race-horses, as a yachtsman, and as a tennis player.——An examination for driving certificates will be held at the Great Northern Hotel, Lincoln, on Saturday, April 13, by arrangement with Mr. Godfrey Lowe, honorary secretary of the Lincolnshire A.C.—Twenty-five clubs are now affiliated to the Auto-Cycle Club, while the total membership is 1,620. During the past year granted, 30 clubs being granted permits to enable them to promote open motor cycle events.

In view of their increasing business in the North of England the Daimler Company have found it necessary to take over additional buildings adjoining their present depot at 60 Deansgate, Manchester.

Extensive alterations are being made to these premises which will henceforth be known as "Daimler Buildings."

J. S. Benyon arrived at his old training quarters, New Brighton, last week, and in the hands of his old trainer, Ted Carter, is putting in some goodwork for his match at Herne Hill on Good Friday. His French opponent, Delage, writes me that he will arrive in London on Tuesday morning and put in a couple of days at Herne Hill to accustom himself to the track. As to Harry Reynolds he will be up in London early next week. J. H. Bishop, the holder of the Penrose Cup and the Lightning Cup, is training very seriously at Canning Town, and will make a big effort to put his name on the trophies again. Bouffler is also at the East End enclosure, but rather short of work. Buck took his first trial against the watch at the Crystal Palace on Thursday evening, and it was very satisfactory. Draper, Upward, and a couple of other Anerley cracks are wel advanced for this time of year. At Herne Hill, H. N. Edwards, W. Lowe, V. B. Casey, and E. C. Piercy are all good enough to score at Easter, while Creaser, the crack grass track rider, should be able to hold his own. The tandem champions, Matthews and Rushen, are located at Kensal Rise, the former riding very well on his single. Also are to be found at this enclosure Meredith, Summers, and Corderv, the last being expected to create a surprise this year. It will thus be seen that everything points to a good opening, and the Bovril cracks are very confident.

H. D. Buck, the Anerley champion, must now be regarded as an old timer, for during the past half-dozen years he has won something like £700 or £800 in prize value. Although, however, he has met and defeated every crack of note in turn, he has not yet won a N.C.U. championship, but his name figures on the London Centre, British Empire, and Irish championships list. During the past three years he has won each of the respective British Empire championships, viz., the quarter, half, and five-mile events. His favourite distance, however, is a quarter, and I do not think there is a rider in England who can do a better time for the 440 yards than Buck. I cannot recollect a single instance where he has been defeated over a quarter when he has gone all out from the crack of the pistol to the winning line. At the commencement of last season he won half a dozen short-distance races almost in succession, opening at Herne Hill on Good Friday with the one lap dash, and securing the quarter at the Crystal Palace on Easter Monday. Shortly afterwards he won the quarter for the "Cycling" 50-guinea bowl, the half-mile scratch at Birmingham, quarter-mile scratch at Exeter, and on June 9 he won the quarter-mile Irish championship. This year he will make a big effort to be the out and out champion. All his successes have been accomplished upon a Rover cycle.

A bold bad burglar recently broke into the house of a man who watches in the night. The man awakened, and questioned:

"What do you want here? What look you for?"

Said the burglar, gruffly, "Money."

"Hold on a minute," quoth the man, "and I will help you. I've been looking for it myself for ten years; but perhaps the two of us may have better luck."

"My dear madam," said the amateur photographer, examining his negative, "your light blue bodice hasn't come out at all."

"How awful! I've got nothing on underneath. I shall never dare show your photo to my husband."

I have now had six months' experience of my 30-40 h.p. Daimler Motor Car, and I can truly say that I am quite delighted with it in every possible respect.

Like all my Cars, it has had to run nearly every day in all sorts of weather (including snow), and over all sorts of roads, yet it has never once failed or even faltered.

Moreover, I cannot imagine a better Hill Climber than it is, and hill climbing is a specially important matter to anyone living, as I do, in a very hilly district.

NEW AFRICAN ANIMALS.

AFRICA, it appears, is by no means yet played out in the matter of new animals of sufficient bodily size to interest the sportsman; and the present year has already proved more than usually productive in the matter of the discovery of new species and races of this nature in the Dark Continent. From our present point of view it is satisfactory to learn that most of these discoveries have been made by sportsmen; several of whom have, with the generosity of their kind, presented their much prized trophies to the national museum. Till the whole of his collections arrive in London, it will of course be impossible to say how much Major Powell Cotton (who has been travelling and exploring in the Ituri forest) may have done towards enriching our knowledge of the Central African fauna. As it is, however, in addition to procuring the complete skeleton and skin of an adult male okapi he has been enabled to add two apparantly new types of animals to the list, which have been described by Mr. Lydekker in the Zoological Society's publications.

As all acquainted with natural history are aware, the ratels, or honey badgers of India and Africa are so alike that it has been found impossible to refer them to separate races, let alone species; both having the same remarkable type of colouring, namely, grey above and black beneath. Strange to say, however, a specimen of one of these animals sent home from the Ituri forest by Major Cotton is wholly black, and has accordingly been named as a new species; in honor of the intrepid explorer; although it still remains to be proved (by the evidence of additional specimens), whether it is really anything more than a black phase of the species, analogous to a black leopard. In the meantime it is legitimate to assume that it represents a distinct species coloured to harmonize with its surroundings; most tropical forests having a marked tendency to develop a dark colouring in the animals by which they are inhabited.

A second animal described on the evidence of the first instalment of Major Cotton's collection is a new sub-species of African water-chevrotain, or mouse-deer, likewise named after the donor. Although this animal has been regarded merely as a local race of the West African species, there is a possibility that evidence not yet made public may entitle it to specific rank.

This, however, by no means exhausts the novelties from the Ituri-Semlike forest, for Colonel J. J. Harrison has sent to the Natural History Museum the skin of a pigmy antelope which serves in some degree to connect the royal antelope and an allied West African species with the suni antelopes of Zanzibar and Mozambique. By modern naturalists the royal antelope and the suni are referred to separate genus; and on this view it was deemed essential to make the Ituri and the allied Western species the representatives of a third genuic group. Perhaps a more philosophical course would be to revert to the view of Sir Victor Brooke and include the whole group in one genus.

Passing on to north-eastern Rhodesia, we find that Dr. Jentink, of Leyden, has described from that area a larger species of duikerbok under the name of Cephalophus coxi. It is allied to the west African C. Syloicultor (an antelope about the size of an ordinary donkey), but distinguished by its somewhat inferior dimensions, shorter horns, more slender hoof, and certain details of colouring, the general hue is for instance, decidedly different while the pale triangle on the back is larger than in that species and not separated by a black band from the rump patch, and the buttocks, in place of being like the flanks are similar in colour to the tringle. The type specimen was purchased in England by the Leyden Museum; and it seems a pity that it did not first come into the hands of English naturalists.

A second new species of the same genus (Cephalophus Walkeri), based on a female skin obtained by Mr. E. G. Walker in the Blantyre district of Nyasaland, has been named by Mr. Oldfield Thomas of the British Museum. It is one of the smaller members of the group. Of greater interest is a new race of Eland (Taurotragus Oryx pattersoni) obtained by Colonel J. H. Patterson in British East Africa, described by Mr. Lydekker in the Field. The special interest attaching to this Eland is the presence of a white chevron on the forehead, in which respect, as in other details of colouring it differs from all the South African Elands and resembles these of the Soudan and West Africa. It forms in fact, such a connecting link between the two, as to leave little doubt that they really form only a single species, instead of two, as hitherto supposed. The West African and Soudan Eland not only carry the aforesaid white chevrion, but their bodies are marked with a number of vertical white stripes. As we go south, first of all the chevron and then the stripes disappear, so that the typical Eland of the Cape is a uniformly fawn coloured animal, save for the tuft of long brown hair on the forehead of old bulls. As analogous colour changes are noticeable in the case of the giraffe and Burchell's Zebra as we go from north to south, they are in each case no doubt due to some general cause, although we are still in the dark as to the purpose of these differences.

Another antelope forming a connecting link between two distinct species has likewise been discovered by the naturalist last mentioned. This is a member of the group of lesser water bucks, or kobs, and has been named Cobus vaughani, after its discoverer Captain P. E. Vaughan, of the Egyptian Army, by whom specimens were killed in the South-western district of the Bahr-el-Ghazal province of the Soudan. To the southward of its habitat, in Uganda is found an almost uniformly chestnut-coloured species (Cobus Thomasi); while to the northward, on the white Kili and the Sobat occur the white eared kob (C. leucotis), in the old bucks of which the ears and much of the face are pure white, while the rest of the upper parts is deep blackish brown. In the intermediate species both as regards habitat and colouring the face of the old bucks has white areas similar to those of the white eared kob but the rest of the upper parts is of the same chestnut hue as in the Ugarda species. A more interesting case of an intermediate type, it would be difficult to find.

The last animal on our list in a forest hog from the extreme western side of the Congo basin, which is regarded by Mr. Thomas as distinct from the great black species of Central and East Africa recently discovered by Captain Meinertzhagen and described as Hylochrerus Meinertzhageni. The new species (H. Rimator) is at present known only by the skull, which has however, teeth so much smaller than those of its Eastern cousin, and likewise differing to some extent in structure, as apparently to justify its separation.

Most of the aforesaid animals, it will be observed, are species or races of more than ordinary interest, so that this year's tale of work in regard to the larger animals of Africa is decidedly above the average. Even these important novelties can, however, scarcely be deemed to exhaust the list of new animals to be expected from Africa, and we may therefore confidently look for discoveries of a like, and perhaps even more interesting, nature in the near future.

Sporting Notes.

THE sensation of the week in Calcutta racing circles has been the reported purchase of Poseidon by Robinson on behalf of Mr. Galstaun at the princely figure of 7,500 guineas. Here indeed would be a competitor to cope with Watson's all-powerful string, but it is scarcely necessary to say that there seems to be but a foundation of truth in the report. Mr. Galstaun is himself away on a trip to England and reliable or positive information is therefore not obtainable, but it is generally understood by those most likely to have the earliest knowledge of such a purchase that the negotiations have not gone beyond an offer many thousands of rupees below the price mentioned. Mr. Galstaun will probably be able to find something less costly in England to suit his purpose.

As reported the Calcutta Plate has been converted into a six-furlong terms race of Rs. 5,000 to be run for on Viceroy's Cup Day, as fully appears from the last Racing Calendar. This is an innovation of importance and is no doubt intended to encourage owners to import first-class sprint horses and so improve matters out here by attracting high priced horses outside the Cup contingent. This is of course an experiment and it would be idle to speculate on the probability of its success or failure. The change is now an accomplished fact and we can only await events. There must be at least some little doubt whether a valuable prize like this may not tempt a certain number of owners to refrain from competing for the Trial and Cup and so decrease the fields for those events. If the new race proves successful without interfering with the long distance races it will no doubt speedily advance still further in value and such an advance will do much to improve the class of horses racing on the Bengal side of India.

MR. APCAR has given a lead by the purchase of Golden Gleam, and has set a standard which will not be easy to maintain, but such is the uncertainty of racing and more especially Indian racing, that Sermon or Paddy's Darling might next year prove the equal of the best sprinter to be bought for money in England or Australia. Auber's successes in England may induce his owner to run Golden Gleam in the old country also during the summer. Auber has now walked off with the Newmarket Sale Stakes and is evidently thriving in Mr. Farquharson's stable. The Colombo sportsman, after an unlucky opening season, has quickly made his mark on the English Turf and in India we are hoping to hear that Great Scot has this week added to the reputation of Austral-Indian racing.

DALKEITH started at eight to one and it is said that a rush of Oriental silver, converted into sovereigns at the standard rate of exchange, maintained by a complacent Government at the expense of the Indian agriculturist, brought the black gelding into a respectable place in the betting list shortly before the race was run. It is comforting to think that some of our friends are getting their fun for nothing, but of course they are losing the profits of the coal boom so they don't get it all their own way and there is no reason for down heartedness among the poor toilers left this summer in the plains of India.

THE Derby, really another Derby, for we are right round to the merry month of May once more, is beginning to attract attention. Galvani was the two-year-old most before the public, but Slieve Gallion has now won the Craven Stakes and heads the betting list. How many bets does that betting list represent at this stage in the proceedings ; its value must be very doubtful and we shall hear very little of the real chances of the cracks until the middle of May at the earliest. Major Eustace Loder has two strings to his bow, a very lucky one these days ; an Isinglass colt, named Baltinglass, being Galvani's stable companion.

PROSPECTS for the Calcutta Monsoon Races this year are very promising ; a big string is expected from Dehra Dun, and Mr. E. J. Marshall has taken over the big house and compound at the Ballygunge corner of Lower Circular Road, where a fine range of stalls is already erected. Racing stables are being pushed further and further away from the course by the gradual advances of the speculative builder and the next of the old landmarks to disappear will probably be the Bhowanipore stables, known for some years past as "Tattersall's." Mr. Galstaun's new permanent stables in Circular Road will soon be the handiest of all and in this connection the proprietor of the new Veterinary and Shoeing-Forge at the foot of Camac Street seems to be taking the tide upon the flood and with all these racing stables springing up in the immediate neighbourhood the prospects of success look rosy.

IN connection with the Ooty Hospital Fete on the 4th proximo a dog show will be held in the Gymkhana pavilion when prizes will be awarded for the following classes, if there are sufficient entries :—Sporting dogs; fox terriers, smooth haired; fox terriers, rough haired; Irish terriers; Scotch terriers ; toy dogs and other varieties; the prettiest dog in the show, and the ugliest dog in the show.

FROM letters appearing in certain sections of the home press, we note that the senile envy exhibited by played out sportsmen (and women) is extending, and though willing to admit there is justification for the condemnation of the extensive batteau we fail to see why an outcry should be raised in respect of the wild beast or birds in such countries as this, and others where the hunter and his quarry meet on pretty equal terms. We may allow, and many home huntsmen fully concur and insist that reynard whether he gives a good run or not, ought never to be "dug out," but those who seek to discredit the chase make no distinction. As a matter of fact the "harrowing spectacle" of one being exhumed, as described in the Standard of the 21st March is of the rarest occurrence, and we feel sure will be discountenanced by all true sportsmen.

These considerations, however, do not affect the hunting of game or "varmint" in India, where sport in every sense (except, perhaps, in the regrettable instance of waterfowl shooting) is conducted on fair enough grounds. In this latter instance however, we are aware that the big bags made during the past season are receiving consideration at the hands of the several associations and those proprietors of preserves where such have been secured, so that we have every season to believe next cold season will witness moderation in this respect. But when men like Mr. Rees would curtail or interfere with the legitimate shooting of big game we think it is time that all Indian hunters should take energetic measures to check such undue interference; as not content with taking up the cudgels in defence of leopard and tiger this gentleman would now extend his protective sympathies to birds of prey. From the sublime to the ridiculous is but a step and we may yet see pleas put in for the mungoose, jackal, hyæna, wild dog or other game destroyers, while mayhap, a champion will arise on behalf of the cobra and krait

As we may now consider Fraserganga to be firmly established as a week-end resort, pleasure seekers who have souls above golf might organise a sailing club ; not at first on the ambitious scale proposed some years back which embraced big yachts, but a start might be made with small cutters and other craft. An hour or two's run well off the land in the south-west monsoon would be something for our jaded city men to look forward to. Fishing, it goes without saying, could be included in the programme and, in fact, all such mild distractions as make the seaside so popular in other countries might with advantage be adopted. We are convinced that nothing of a permanent nature can ever be contemplated in Fraserganga, owing to the ever-present danger of the tidal waves or the heavy cyclonic storms which might sweep the place away in a few hours ; but while those who are interested in running the place as a health resort and recreation centre are about it they might as well consider the advisability of letting their programme embrace something more than golf and deer shooting.

FULL entries for the Derby (run Wednesday, 5th June) are published in our to-day's issue.

For when you raise your reckless gun
And fumble with the trigger,
I might receive, it's ten to one,
The contents in my figure.

At tennis I'll your partner be,
And suffer your attack
(For even then, when serving free,
You'll hit me in the back).
Such shocks with patience I can bear,
And try to think it fun ;
Far be it from me, though, to share
The pleasure of your gun.

I'll sing you songs of old romance,
I'll mote with you full fain,
I'll join you in the maxy dance,
Or on an aeroplane.
Despise and flout me if you will,
And cowardice impute,
I'll not deny it, but I'm still
Resolved—we will not shoot.

When a man attains pre-eminence in any branch of sport it often augurs, as Herbert Spencer said to the young man who beat him so badly at billiards, "a mis-spent life." But that cannot be said of Lord Walsingham of London, though he is easily the best shot in England. He is an accomplished writer, one of the first entomologists of the day, a fellow of many learned societies and the owner of the finest collection of moths and butterflies in the world. Yet he has devoted enough time to his favourite sport to make himself the all-round crack shot of the kingdom. He is probably the only man in the world who shoots wasps on the wing. That requires marvellous accuracy of aim. To practice on these little pests and other insect game he had a miniature rifle specially constructed for himself.

His bag of 1,070 grouse to his own gun, shooting for close on fifteen hours on end, has never been surpassed. On another day, on the Yorkshire moors, he brought down 421 brace of grouse, using 1,100 cartridges, which shows what a large percentage of his shots are fatal. He is as expert with the rifle as with the shotgun, and has hunted big game in Oregon and California, but of late years he has preferred hunting insects.

The following is a word picture of sport in Queensland as contributed by the London correspondent of the Queensland Herald :—Imagine a sportsman out with his gun on the Queensland plain. A couple of miles away a line of eight or nine black dots apprises him that a flock of emus is in sight. If he is without a stout dog it is not much use to gallop after them ; but, being a new arrival, he is sure to put his horse into a canter and prepare for the chase. The emu's chief weakness is curiosity, and the birds will run round uneasily as he approaches, stopping now and then to regard his movements with a timid uncertainty. If he reins in and stands motionless, they will probably circle round him with great swiftness, coming within twenty or thirty yards, so that he can see the startled expression of their large dark eyes and admire the wonderful grace of their movements before they finally turn and continue their flight beyond the horizon. As he rides along he will see the plain turkey or Australian bustard warily watching him as it slides away through the grass or spreads its great wings to look for grasshoppers at a safer distance. This bird is excellent eating, and weighs as much as 20lbs. It is in great abundance on the Western plains. The scrubs on the coast-side of the range also yield the sportsman excellent bags of great variety. There are many varieties of pigeons, the wonga and the gorgeous painted pigeon being the most prized. As our sportsman pushes his way through the thick tangle of undergrowth and creepers, he is possibly surprised to come upon a freshly-made mound four or five feet in height, and from fifteen to twenty feet in circumference. His first impression may be that in his tumulus reposes some native chief, his bow and spear beside him, secluded in death from a civilisation so fatal to his race. He will be astonished to learn that this is a bird's nest. The scrub turkey, an excellent table bird, rather smaller than the fowl-yard specimen, constructs this great mound in which to deposit its eggs, which are hatched by the sun.

His Highness the Maharaja of Cooch Behar has just purchased First Bell and Forget-me-not from Colonel Stisted.

Major J. H. Enson, the Secretary of the Lucknow Races, who has been making strenuous endeavours to cater for the racing public in the mofussil, addressed a memorandum to the Stewards of the Lucknow Races, at the close of the February meeting, pointing out the desirability of increasing the popularity of racing at Lucknow, from the point of view of the owner, and also of the general public. The proposals made by him met with the approval of the Stewards, and have since been communicated to the Honorary Secretaries at the various racing centres in Northern India, who have displayed their interest in the matter. These suggestions are (a) that there should be combined action and co-operation with the up-country stations ; (b) alteration of dates of meeting to lessen expense, and add to the continuity of racing; (c) transference of flat horse races from the spring to the autumn meeting, and increase of Arab races ; (d) the making of military events more bonâ fide, in order to encourage gentlemen riders ; (e) increased accommodation for the general public, and the opening of a register of stabling in Lucknow ; (f) the formation of a Race Club; and (g) a moderate increase in stakes. All these proposals, with the exception of the establishment of a Race Club, regarding which opinions are divided, have been, or are in process of being carried into effect. It has been found that it is necessary to look to the Punjab and districts adjacent to Lucknow, for the bulk of the support needed for the improvement of racing in Lucknow, and every thing is being done to arrange fixtures with a minimum amount of interference with meetings at these racing centres.

The Gymkhana meeting will be held later than usual, and the sky meeting will be converted into a first extra meeting, to take place a week prior to the autumn meeting, fixed for the 19th, 21st and 23rd November, and will be followed, a week later, by the second extra meeting. Thus there will be, in all, nine days' racing in November and the latter end of October.

The stakes have been increased substantially, and special attention has been paid to the pony events. The closed races have also been made more attractive. The sanction of the General Officer Commanding the station has been obtained to the opening of a register of stabling, and owners wanting stabling will be able to get it on application to the Race Secretary. It is also proposed, with the sanction of the Civil Service, to put back the Civil Service meeting, from the first to the third week in March, to admit of the stables from Bombay visiting Lucknow at the close of the racing in Bombay. The principal attraction, however, for the general public, is the announcement that the Race Stewards have sanctioned the erection of a grand stand, in keeping with the traditions of Lucknow racing, at an estimated cost of Rs. 16,000 The structure, which will be a handsome addition to the course, will be 150 feet in length, and will accommodate over 500 people ; the present stand is about 50 feet in length and holds 200. The building will be of brick and iron, with a tiled roof and flated pillars, and will be erected at an angle of about 300 to the course, which will admit of a clear view down the straight which the present stand does not afford. The model shows that the tiers of seats will be divided by a gangway through the centre, and there will be a row of boxes at the back, one being reserved for the Stewards and another for the Lieutenant-Governor. The building will also contain a reading room and cloak room for ladies, and similar accommodation for gentlemen. The present stand is being demolished, as also the second stand, and it is hoped to complete the grand stand by October. The construction of the second stand will be taken in hand next year.

Athletic Notes.

We commend to the earnest attention of all interested in Calcutta football the special article written by "Referee" on the present position and future prospects of the Indian Football Association. The time has come for the serious consideration of these matters. The baboo alas ! continues to exhibit those characteristics so concisely catalogued by Lord Macaulay in his famous essay ; he has shown a certain aptitude for participating in the outdoor pastimes of the British, but it seems hopeless to expect he will ever play those games in the proper spirit. We can never hope to make a sportsman of him and in the present deplorable conditions of racial prejudice it is as well not to persevere further with the unprofitable experiment.

Our Bombay correspondent writes :—The general public interest will now for a time have only the Aga Khan Hockey tournament to centre itself upon. Arrangements are in the hands of the following :—President, Mr. D. B. Binning ; members, Messrs. T. A. Savage, H. F. Busch, C. D. Baker, E. B. Ousley, C. R. Cole and C. B. Gannon, and the duties of Honorary Secretary are with the energetic Mr. E. M. Webb. Entries close on the 4th May, drawings on the 6th and the first game on the 8th.

The Bombay Gymkhana continue to improve and by tournament time should be a very useful team and I think as good as any local combination. In goal they have Collingwood, who when he settles down in that position, will be quite brilliant, having ample pluck. At back C. D Baker and C. A. Ward make quite an exceptional pair and will take some beating and in front they possess in Cole England's right half in 1906 as well as useful players in Williams and Saxby. The Gymkhana all round seems to be backing up a bit and the number of hockey players available will probably see a B team entered.

Entries for the cup so far are the Royal Scots, King's, (Nasirabad), East Lancs (Poona) and Parsee H. C. (Bombay). We would like also to see one or more of your Calcutta teams competing.

Since last writing there have been four more games played in the singles Tennis Handicap at the Gymkhana, but all somewhat tame. The best contested was one between E. B. Ousley scratch and G. Hately scratch which after long rallies of a rather soft description ended in a win for the former by 3—6, 6—5, 6—4. The others were easily won. T. D. Parry +15 3 beating R. Peel 3 by 6—1, 6—0, and E. E. Hill + 3 beating F. L. Gore + 15·3 by 6—2, 6—0.

A start has been made with the doubles and two good games have been played. C. Thomson and S. L. Bean —30 beat E E. Coombs and S. Curling scratch by 6—5, 6—5 Play was of a high order with good, hard driving and the result always in doubt It was a bit of a surprise when E. B., Ousley and R. J. Brown +·3 beat R. L. Roberts and H. Cheetham – 15·4. Cheetham was dead off and not playing anything like his true game.

At the Yacht Club on Saturday three races were sailed with a moderate wind blowing and some close finishes were seen ; Turquoise being under repair only two sailed for "A" class and after a good race Sapphire just got home by 16½ secs. on time allowing Melody 9mins 43secs. over 10·6 miles.

Four started and finished for "B" class and a good finish between them all was seen. Erin just won from Mannikin with Trixie unable to make up the allowances.

With Valkerie scratched, seven went for the "T" and "C" class and a splendid race it was with Lapwing finishing flying a protest flag On the same marks, Maud and Coralie had a great race following the scratch boat, Tomtit It was quite a neck and neck affair between the former two, which Maud won by only 16secs. with Clutha 72secs. off, also saving her time on Tomtit who won the class prize.

What might have proved a very serious accident occurred recently to Mr. R. C. Lehmann, M.P., whose fame in sport is world-wide. It appears that while he was driving in his car down a hill near his home at Bourne End, the hand-brake snapped, and the foot-brake was not sufficient to stop the car.

Mr. Lehmann, who was accompanied by two of his daughters and a niece, turned the car into the bank, the whole of the occupants being thrown out. He himself was thrown under the car, but escaped serious injury, as also did his companions, who were naturally very much frightened.

A Dutchman's moralising over his dog is given in the Sydney Bulletin :—"You vas only a dog, but I vish I vas you. Ven you go mit your bed in, you shust turn round dree times and lay down. Ven I go mit the bed in, I have to lock up de blace, and vind up de clock, and put the cat out, and ondress mineself, and my frau vakes up and scolds, den de baby vakes up and cries, and I haf to valk him mit the house round ; den may be ven I gets myself to bed it is time to get up again. Ven you get up you shust stretch yourself a leedle, and you vas up. I haf to light de fire and put on de kettle, scrap some mit mine wife already and get myself breakfast. You blay around all day and haf blenty of fun ; I haf to work all day and haf blenty of drubble. Ven you die you vas dead ; ven I die I haf to go to hell yet."

Thirty or forty years ago the young men who did battle for their Alma Mater in the University Boat Race were looked upon by many as "butcher'd" to make a London holiday, or at any rate as foredoomed to premature breakdown and untimely death. The part of Cassandra was first played by Mr. Skey, of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, but he had not a few rivals and under studies in the role. Mr. Skey's denunciations of the Boat Race found a powerful echo in Wilkie Collins, who in "Man and Wife" depicted the University oarsman as a brutal ruffian who is suddenly struck down by death in the flower of his strength. In October, 1867, however, the late Sir George Humphry, says the British Medical Journal, gave an opinion, based on the experience of more than a quarter of a century, that the ill-effects of boat-racing had been exaggerated. He said that on the whole boating is unquestionably a great physical and moral good to undergraduates, affording a healthful, agreeable recreation and imparting vigour to body and mind. His own experience led him to the belief that it is seldom productive of serious bodily mischief either immediate or subsequent. Some possible evils Sir George admitted, but these, he said, were reduced to a minimum, and he pleaded strongly for boat-racing as helping to develop the man and prepare him for the struggles of life, part of their value in this respect being due to the "courage-exciting risks" involved.

The myth as to the dangers of rowing in general, and of the University boat race in particular, was finally dissipated by the late Dr. J. E. Morgan, of Manchester, a graduate of Oxford, who had himself been captain of his college boat. He made a series of enquiries among all the men who had rowed in the race between 1829 and 1869, and their friends and relatives. Dr. Morgan sums up the results of his inquiry as follows: "115 (or 39 per cent. of the whole) were benefited by their exertions, 162 (or 55 per cent.) were in no way injured, while 17 (or about 6 per cent.) refer to themselves, or are spoken of by their friends, as having sustained that amount of injury," which on critical examination turns out to be open to considerable doubt.

THE sporting entente with France is resulting in very marked improvement in the playing of team games by our neighbours. A few years since one watched their efforts at "le football" and other games with superior smiles. Now they are distinctly coming on at football and hockey (a team of French schoolboys has recently beaten a Cambrige holiday team), and would do very well in a year or two if they took up lacrosse, a game eminently suitable to the French temperament. But at rowing, in which France excelled to the extent of the defeat of a London crew by a French eight before she became prominent in other sports, there is a deadlock. The French oarsmen cannot see their way to fall into line with the strict amateur definition of the Amateur Rowing Association. The latter regret this decision, but must adhere to a clause which keeps rowing supremely pure amateur sport. It is a pity that the French amateur cannot come to an agreement in view of appearances at Henley, and particularly at the Olympic Games regatta of next year, which bids fair to be one of the most notable aquatic gatherings in the history of rowing.

THINGS promise well for the Paris Boxing Tournament: a list of the second entries is given among our boxing news to-day.

REUTER'S Agency wires on the 21st instant:—'G. Dawson, while playing Lee-Jay 25,000 ms, made a break of 23,769 unfinished, of which 11,798 were anchor cannons.' Surely this stupendous farce must now cease!

THE Football Association Cup final last Saturday brought together Sheffield Wednesday and Everton, the first named winning by two goals to one.

AMERICAN college girls for years have been exponents of President Roosevelt's advice to live the strenuous life physically and mentally and they now engage in athletic contests, which in England might be considered a trifle unfeminine. Nothing vexes the American college girl more than to be called a mollycoddle. Only the other day a gentle girl undergraduate, the lady football champion of Chicago, threw her own father down so hard that the old gentleman must remain in hospital for months, and last month, in a New York theatre knock-outs were the features of Greek games in which the Barnard College girls participated. In the wrestling matches and tug-of-war they showed ferocity and muscular strength which one observer describes as 'truly Amazonian.'

Unlike their brothers, these Barnard College girls do not know how to take defeat. In the tug-of-war between sophomores and 'freshmen,' four Barnard girls succumbed as the result of their heroic exertions, fainted from exhaustion, and wept hysterically. With returning consciousness, however, they fought with their friends to return to the combat. In the efforts made to revive these stricken ones, water brought in sombreros and buckets was spilled recklessly around on the healthy students as well as on the unconscious athletes.

During a wrestling contest Miss Grace Smithers, by an adroit move threw Miss Millicent Baily to the floor much more heavily than is good for the average young lady or even for athletic Barnardians.

The tug-of-war, however, was the piece de resistance. Never before was there such tugging, pinnging, pulling backward and forward, mad struggling, and screaming, for America's college girls seldom put in their best work silently. In their flowing white cheesecloth garments, like those worn during the time of the Cæsars, with their hair done in ancient Greek style, the girls looked strikingly pretty, at least at the commencement of the games. It is just possible that a reaction will shortly be witnessed in America against men's games being played by girls but that time, despite the protest of Professor Royce, of Harvard, who declares that modern athletics unrestrained will "lead to hysteria," has not yet arrived.

THE M. C. C. will send a cricket team to Australia in the autumn.

THAT misguided slogger "Tiger" Smith has again gone down. This time he aspired to take on Sam Langford, the American, for the Middle Weight Championship of England. The meeting came off at the National Sporting Club on the 22nd instant, and, as was only to be expected, the unfortunate Smith was knocked out in the fourth round. The "Tiger" had better drop his ferocious sobriquet now; seeing that he is a sort of "lion's provider," in that he occasionally gives the big ones of the English ring a few moments' hectic excitement, how would "Jackal" do?

A GENERAL MEETING of the members and Referees of the Calcutta Referees' Association was held last Tuesday night at the Y.M.C.A. The attendance was fairly representative, and amongst those present were:—(Messrs. J. A. Bell (C.F.C.), F. E. Bushby (C.F.C.), D. L. Walker (Calcutta), P. C. Maggio (Calcutta), Theo Walsh (D.F.C.), A. B. Rosser, Harness, Sergt. Watson (N.F.), A. R. C. Miller (C. R. A.), T. Jackson (C.F.C.), S. N. Bose (Mohun Bagan), N. R. Bhattacharjee (Rovers), and D. Sen (Sporting Union). Mr. F. H. Reynolds was voted to the chair.

After some discussion, which lasted for over an hour, the following resolutions were proposed and carried nem con:—

(a) That this meeting do place on record their disapproval of the decisions arrived at by the I.F.A. with reference to the affiliation of the Calcutta Referees' Association, and do request the I.F.A. to take due steps to reconsider their decision at a Special General Meeting which has to be called under section 10 of the Rules of the I.F.A.

(b) That the C.R.A. apply for affiliation to the I.F.A. and pay the usual subscription of Rs. 10.

(c) That Mr. A. R. C. Miller be appointed representative of the C.R.A. to the I.F.A.

With the usual vote of thanks to the chair, the meeting separated.

Friday 5th April 1907.

NEVER have we had a more glorious Easter: windless, bright sun never a cloud in the sky. The exodus from town taxed the railway companies to their utmost and fantastic figures purporting to represent the traffic were current: one journal triumphantly headed the list with the statement that two of London's five million inhabitants 'went out of town.' The number of incursionists must have been enormous also. On Easter Monday a procession of eighteen char-a-bancs made a pilgrimage round the West end: these carried about 30 persons in each, and represented one of countless "cheap trips" from the big manufacturing towns to London brought out by the splendid sunshine. We had a wholesome reminder concerning the reliability of spring weather on Wednesday, Dartmoor was buried under a heavy snow fall.

Her Majesty and the Empress of Russia paid a private visit to the Natural History Museum last week. There was no ceremony: the two officials escorted the royal visitors round but only an hour's notice of their intended visit and the whole thing was so quietly done that casual strangers in the museum as usual did not even know that the two sovereigns were in the building. The Queen, I am told, was as excited and pleased as a child, displaying the closest interest in the exhibits and asking endless questions which sometimes taxed her escort to answer.

Mr. Swift McNeill, has come forward with a scheme of his very own 'for the improvement' of the Upper House. He writes to 'C. B.' to point out that it is the prerogative of the Crown to issue writs of summons to peers. Let the king issue such writ only to peers who are known to be in active sympathy with the present wonderful administration:—and there you are! The peer not summoned has no remedy. Only peers who think with Mr. McNeill, Mr. Keir Hardie and their kidney would adorn the benches of the Lords. I wonder how many there would be when the House of Peers assembled on these lines was gathered together.

Forty of the suffragi-t martyrs were released from Holloway on Wednesday. They were met by the usual band, formed the usual procession to the nearest underground station met for the usual breakfast and heard the usual speeches: and announced the usual intention of waging remorseless fight against their voteless fate. Experience of prison has enabled these good people to enlarge their programme: they mean to agitate incidentally for female prison inspectors, lady prison doctors, and lady visiting magistrates. Officials of this kind may become desirable if the campaign is continued: but the police authorities are growing very anxious about the growth of the mobs these women bring about Westminister, and measures may be taken to check their folly.

Mrs. Grossman of New Zealand has been showing us ourselves as others see us in the pages of the XIX Century for this month. London seems to be in a bad way. Londoners it seems severely censure "trifling faults of manner or dress" (can anyone have been rude enough to criticise colonial accents and dressmakers in Mrs. G.'s hearing?) "but take elaborate pains to ignore vices perhaps because there are much more troublesome things to deal with." More likely I think, because our neighbour's vices are his own affair so long as he does not obtrude them upon our notice. "Though crimes of violence are proportionately rare, fraud and dissolute living seem to flourish without restraint or punishment." One may live dissolutely I admit if discretion be exercised and one does not disturb the people next door, but fraud is another thing. Fraud only goes unrestrained until it is found out and had Mrs. Grossman stayed a little longer in town she would have discovered that it is found out with results very damaging to the offender. Mrs. Grossman admits that our manners in London are good, but I think she must have been unfortunate in the friends she made. "There is a superficial kindliness and bonhomie prevalent in London streets, analogous to the conventional courtesies of society and equally destitute of real warmth or depth of feeling." I confess this dictum puzzles me: let's consider it.

* * * * * *

What did the lady expect to find "in London streets"—assuming that this is a way of saying "among the people the stranger accosts in London streets?" Not so long ago business taking me to the Strand I was accosted by a stranger who singled me out in the stream of pedestrians to ask how far it was to St. Paul's: I told him: he said he would join me if he might as I was going thitherward. He was a man of autobiographic tendency. He was from "the Colonies" which was obvious: he was "seeing London" which was equally so: he had made a "bit of money" a fact which did not concern me: he was unmarried: ditto: and much more equally personal and equally uninteresting to me in a man of somewhat battered exterior and rude speech who wanted to see St. Paul's. Twice I caught him eyeing me out the corner of his eye, in a fashion that made me think of the "confidence trick" and the possibility that the stranger might be sizing me up as to my susceptibility as a victim. I steered him past St. Mary's, correcting his idea that it was St Paul's, past the Law Courts, directed him on his way, declined a drink and sought refuge up Fetter Lane where I had no concern.

Now my dear Editor what did that unmarried colonial with the bit of money expect? I was polite—I must even have looked sympathetic or why did he single me out as a guide and attach himself to me. I repeat, what did he expect? Did he look for "real warmth or depth of feeling?" Was he disappointed because when he said he was from the Colonies I omitted to fall upon his neck and give him a tearful welcome? Was it my duty—in his eyes—to instantly bid him return to the hotel (Something Street, Charing Cross) pack up his things and hold my house and all that therein is, his home and abiding place what time he should sojourn in London? Did I outrage his good feelings when I excused myself from drinking on the ground that I had lunched? Ought I to have said I would eat? I feel sure the man was disappointed by the way he squared his shoulders as he walked away. His air reminded me of that other man I encountered once in an omnibus at the top of Sloan Street: he was openly and frankly aggrieved when, opening a small parcel he disclosed a cloth cap he had just paid 3s. 9d. for he failed to elicit anything but titters, and expatiating at length on its qualities. "In the Colonies," he said severely, "we'd think you were all dumb;" and relapsed into dumbness himself did he get out at the Albert Memorial. It is a hard saying: but that covert anxiety to exploit his neighbour for his own advantage which Mrs. Grossman tells us is one of our besetting sins, is the very thing that leads us to look shyly upon strangers in London.

Major Murray's death, which took place on the 28th March, recalls the sensational incident of the early sixties in which he was the chief actor. You may remember it. Major Murray used to dabble a good deal in city matters, and one day while in Hungerford Market he was accosted by a stranger who introduced himself as Mr. Roberts a solicitor, prepared to find money for a budding company in which Major Murray was interested. Major Murray accepted his invitation to his office, and Roberts closing the door, caught up a revolver from the papers on his table, while apparently making search among them and fired at his visitor. Major Murray fell, wounded, and thinking his assailant a homicidal lunatic shammed death. This not preventing Roberts from firing at him again, he sprang up, grabbed the tongs and attacked Roberts. Major Murray was a very active and strong man and a furious fight ensued (do you recollect the lurid coloured print of the "Room after the fight"? Oddly enough a copy of it caught my eye in a second handbook and print shops only a few weeks ago). Roberts was also a strong man and he used his pistol freely. After a bloody struggle Major Murray caught his man fairly on the temple with the tongs and stunned him: then as the door was locked he jumped out of the window into a court at the back where he fainted from loss of blood. Roberts died in hospital and Major Murray's very clear account of the affair at the inquest secured what no one doubted the proper verdict of "justifiable homicide." He was 88 years of age when he died last week.

Mr. Gladstone anticipated the numerous petitions for the reprieve of Rayner: on Saturday it was announced that "having regard to all the circumstances" the Home Secretary had recommended the usual course. Had I not received information from a source that must be well informed I should have ventured the conjecture that Sir Geo. Lewis had imparted to Mr. Gladstone the evidence he was allowed to withhold at the trial and the minister regarded such patricide as a crime with extenuating circumstances: but my informant tells me that the influential circumstances were that Rayner had been nursed back to health for legal uses, and the condition of the murderer's wife (who gave birth to a daughter on Monday). It seems to me a doubtful kindness to condemn the unfortunate woman to 20 years of parish support with the prospect of recovering a very indifferent mate at the end of it. Had Rayner got his deserts in all reasonable probability the woman's unhappy situation would have brought her suitors—of a kind—before the quick lime had done its work on his carcase.

The reprieve of this interesting murderer raises a very nice question. Grant that the victim was a greasy obsequious old hypocrite whose moral character would not bear the light of day, and left a million to charities, while his illegitimate off-spring starved—for there is not the shade of a shadow of doubt after Sir Geo. Lewis' silence in the witness box that Mr. Whiteley was his victim's father. Grant these things, I say, and can we say that a murder so deliberate was one which deserved anything but the rope? On Rayner's own written evidence—he foretold a "double tragedy" you may remember—he sought out his father with intent to kill, if he failed to get help from him Never was murder more deliberately planned. I am not prepared to maintain that the fact of Whiteley's paternity in the circumstances aggravated the crime: but it is equally difficult to uphold the theory that in any degree condone, the shooting. Take the crime and the reprieve by the light of the legal proceedings into which the question of the deceased's relation to his murderer was not allowed to enter, then Rayner's case is the worse: Mr. Whitely was not proved to be Rayner's father: ergo in the eye of the law he was not the accused's father; and Rayner was guilty of murder as the alternative to failure in an attempt to blackmail a rich tradesman, and deserves hanging twice over. Mrs. Rayner's condition is held to be the excuse adopted to save the feelings of legitimate relatives of the murdered man and never has reprieve been more sharply criticised. Meantime bilious sentimentalists are organising agitation for further reduction of the sentence.

It was with Patience that the Savoy Theatre opened over quarter of a century ago. I confess that I went last night almost in fear and trembling Would an opera which depended so largely on a passing craze appeal to an audience, many of whom know æstheticism only by name and barely that? It came triumphantly out of the ordeal there is quite enough of the eternal human in it, quite enough of the wit that is of no age, and there is the music. Whether I am grown more critical or not I will not enquire, but the playing did not content me: did not compare with my recollection of the original. Mr. Chalow as Grosvenor was excellent, Miss. Clara Daw as "Patience" acts and sings delightfully and Miss. Jessie Rose satisfied in Miss. Jessie Bond's old part of Lady Angela: but Mr. Workman has by no means grasped the Gilbertian idea in his reading of Bunthorne on whom so much depends: he makes Bunthorne too much of a buffoon: and what is worse he tries, and fails conspicuously, to improve upon his author. This was a great mistake. Clever actors can improve on most authors: indeed it is expected of them that they shall "work up" the material provided for them: but this cannot be done with Gilbertian humour: it is too real, too individual, too rounded in its neatness and finish to bear retouching or remoulding. No actor on the modern stage can improve on Gilbert and he only advertises his own shortcomings if he be rash enough to try. Mr. Workman cannot make Gilbertian characters funnier than Mr. Gilbert has done: he were wise to take them as they are.

It has been represented to Mrs. D'Oyley Carte that it would be inadvisable to revive the Mikado: presumably some wiseacre at Whitehall imagines that the Japanese are so sensitive that they would dislike it. It is not easy to believe they are so foolish, after reading all that has been written to show the national sense of humour and love of stage-plays: but the representations have been made and the operas will not be revived after Patience, which took the Savoy boards last night.

I feel no overwhelming inclination to dwell on Mr. Walter Howard's "Stirring Romantic Play" in four acts which was produced at the Lyceum on Saturday. The posters are enough to choke off anyone—a young person of prepossessing appearance turning her back on a crowned gentleman who tenders a crown on a velvet cushion to the back of the young person who rushes to a handcuffed gentleman in preference. The crowned gentleman is the wicked—unutterably wicked—King of Ravensburg, the handcuffed party Eric, Earl of Strathmore, "a soldier of fortune," and the young person is the princess, both want to marry. Stirring? I warrant you! Romantic? I should think so! How the heroics of that Earl of the hair breadth escapes roused the pit! How the autocratic utterances of that king pricked the gallery to hiss! Oh a wholesome, if filling meal is "Her Love Against the World." Weakness triumphs over strength, virtue over vice, poverty over wealth. The only endurable character of the crowd and it is a big one, is Princess Iris' comic servant Frisy: Mr. Oxley is really funny and his humour is wasted in popular melodrama.

Mr. Lewis Waller has revived "Monsieur Beaucaire" himself of course in the name part. Miss Evelyn Millard is the Lady Mary as a foretaste: it suits her to a shade: the only new hand of note is Miss Dora Barton, who plays Lucy Rellerton, not a part that gives her much of a chance, but she does well what she has to do.

The Hippodrome manager shows rare ingenuity in using the stock of water acquired for the Food: the supply is now used for the Typhoon, another wet spectacle much to the taste of the B. P. Terrific and excellent stage storm with bursting marine boilers (why should a steamer's boilers go and burst just when a bad weather sets in?) and most lurid lightning were as peculiar as the new Lyceum melodrama. Such rain you never saw on stage before; nor such thunder heard. The weather clears with commendable stage promptitude for life boat to come on. It was a very nice life boat manned by white men: a detail which recalled to the precisian the circumstance that the Typhoon occurs in the China Seas.

The new street Betting Act has only served to turn the betting business into a new channel. The men who made books with workmen now establish themselves openly in offices as "commission agents" and do a thriving business as such. So long as no money is seen to pass they are as safe as bankers: their customers pay in a deposit and bet on the strength of that. When will moral legislators learn that Law wont stop men betting?

The Prince of Wales' South Lancashire has had its old regimental number restored to it in response to a request from a French source: and the Band of the 40th as such will play at a charity fete at Lille. I wonder if this is the thin end of the wedge. I do not think there would be much complaint were the old numbers restored for every day use.

The wretched Sueric has been cut in two by means of explosives and the better half of the vessel has been towed to Southampton to be repaired sufficiently to go to Belfast. The decaying carcases of mutton and rabbits from the cold storage chambers strew the beach at the Lizard and the stench renders the place intolerable.

The sentence on Gourlay, the engine driver, more or less responsible for the Arbroath disaster, has been reduced from five months to three.

THE SPORTSMAN IN CEYLON.*

THE long period which has elapsed since the publication of Sir Samuel Baker's well-known work on Sport in Ceylon affords ample justification for the issue of another volume on the same subject, if only to show the changes which have taken place in the country as a hunting-field. As might have been expected, the changes are great in this respect, and all for the worse, so great, indeed, has been the destruction of game during the last few years that, as the author strongly urges, it is high time Government took more active and effectual measures to check the process of extermination which is only too surely going on. Judging from the number of antlers exported, after making ample allowance for those naturally shed, the annual destruction of chital and sambur must be simply enormous; the drain, in an area rather smaller than Ireland, being such that no big game animal can long withstand.

The mischief is apparently in very great measure due to the trade in dried venison, for which purpose does are slaughtered in probably even larger numbers than bucks. Added to this is the trade in buckshorn and, it may be presumed, in hides. Exportation of such commodities is, it seems, already under Government control; and the real remedy, in the author's opinion, is the total prohibition of the sale of all products of the chase in the island itself. On the other hand, it is only fair that the villagers should be permitted to kill such game as they require for their own consumption.

Much the same story is told with regard to elephants, the author stating that in his opinion there are less than a couple of thousand wild ones to be found in the whole island at the present day, although not many years ago the number was estimated at five thousand. This is a terrible contrast to the state of affairs some sixty years ago, where one sportsman is credited with having slaughtered no less than 1,400 head, and two other nearly as many between them. Possibly in those days there were too many elephant, and the crops suffered proportionately, otherwise it is difficult to understand why the Sircar should have offered rewards for their slaughter.

Probably it was these rewards that induced the sportsmen referred to above to shoot elephants in this wholesale and apparently wanton manner; for the absence or rudimentary condition of tusks in most Singalese elephants renders their slaughter in large numbers little, if at all, removed from simple butchery. It in true indeed, that the author and some of his friends were in the habit of preserving the skulls of some of these slain elephants as trophies; but such trophies are somewhat bulky objects to keep in a house, and very few of them would, we think, suffice to satisfy most sportsmen, should any sportsman become tired of keeping such trophies he may be reminded that they would probably be welcome gifts to museums both in this country and at home, more especially as Ceylon elephants are becoming so scarce.

Very interesting is the statement to the effect that there is a breed of very large tuskless elephants existing in the Tamankaduwa district; one of these shot by Mr. Storey himself measuring, so far as could be ascertained nine feet nine inches, while others are said to reach ten feet. On the other hand, the ordinary height of Singalese elephants does not exceed from seven feet six inches to eight feet six inches at the shoulder, any animal over nine feet being a monster. If we knew more of these Tamankaduwa giants, it is highly probable that they would prove to be a distinct local race.

As he expressly disclaims any qualifications entitling him to rank as a naturalist, the author refrains from alluding to what has been written with regard to the tusker elephants of Ceylon. It may be mentioned, however, that the suggestion had been made that these tuskers were originally imported from the mainland, and are therefore racially distinct from the presumably indigenous tuskless Singalese elephants.

Be this as it may, we learn from Mr Storey that tuskers are now exceedingly rare in the island in the wild condition and that he only heard of two or three having been killed by sportsmen during the last dozen years or so. The latter portion of the statement may, however, in all probability be partly accounted for by the fact that shooting tuskers, unless they be "rogues," is now prohibited under heavy penalties. It is added that there is a considerable number of tame tuskers in the island among which are several quite fine ones; but it would seem that all these are aged animals, probably captured many years ago.

* Hunting and Shooting in Ceylon. By Harry Stoss (and others) London, Longmans, Green, and Company, 1907 pp. xxiii and 366 illustrated. Price 15-0, net.

The author has many stirring stories of elephant-hunting to recount; and he gives excellent advice to beginners when he warns them never to go out unless accompanied by an old hand. For, he further tells us, that although Singalese shikaris and gun-bearers are much too familiar with elephants ever to think of bolting during a close encounter or a charge, yet they have the awkward habit, owing to excitement, of firing off both barrels of the weapons left in their charge. The sportsman has therefore in most cases to depend entirely upon the one rifle in his own hands. Another piece of advice given to the tyro is not to attempt to swarm up a tree (least of all a small one) when an elephant is charging.

As to weapons, Mr. Storey first of all used, and apparently with success and satisfaction, a "paradox"; but this was subsequently discarded in favour of a rifle of much larger calibre. The following anecdote in probably unique;—

"I once saw a very interesting sight in the case of an elephant I had fired at and failed to kill. In running away it ran blindly into a matted mass of thick woody creepers and actually stuck! It drew back and pushed forward again like a battering ram, but again stuck, though branches flew in all directions, breaking with reports like pistol-shots. Again it retreated a few and made a most determined efforts, this time smashing its way through; great creepers, twigs, and branches cracking, snapping, and flying all over the place. I was so interested in the sight that I did not fire again, but let him go."

Of the smaller animals of the island the author has much to tell us, although limitations of space prevent fuller reference to this part of the subject. It may be mentioned, however, that Mr. Storey supports the statement that the Ceylon chital differ in certain respects from the mainland animal; and he seems to hold the opinion that analogous differences obtain in the case of most of the other game animals when contrasted with their Indian representatives, as, indeed, is most probably the case.

The book is not, however, by any means restricted to the mammals of the island; we have, for example, a most excellent chapter on snipe-shooting.

A special feature of the volume (which is most distinctly one to be read) is the contribution by other sportsmen of sections on subjects with which they happen to be specially familiar; so that, with the author's own experience of fifteen years, the work may be said to be a thoroughly up to date account of the sport of the island. If that sport is not like what it was in Sir Samuel Baker's time, it is still good enough —accompanied as it is by exquisitely beautiful scenery—to satisfy most men. All that is needful is that Government should take steps to prevent the game from undergoing further serious diminution.

Shikar.

TWO IBEX IN SPITI.

MANI means gem (Om mani padmi hun. The village so named is a perfect emerald in a very rough setting. We first caught sight of it from a small rise which concealed it from view till quite near. We had got to ibex ground at last and intended to stay. Our first business was to inform the authorities of our arrival. The man in power here is the Nono who seems also to be the head of the people. There are no officials here in the usual sense of the term. We were informed that the Nono was a young man who had taken to drink—and was now dying from over indulgence! He was quite unfit to perform any duties. In fact he died three days after our arrival. The next person in authority was the Assistant Commissioner of Kulu to reach whom a letter would take at least two days as there was no post and a messenger would have to be sent! We felt now that we were certainly off the beaten track and far from the madding crowd, and that we could enjoy, without fear of being cut by our best friends, the luxury of a collarless shirt and a leather belt. The ancestral feeling of savage freedom rapidly revived in us and we lapsed into dirty clothes and rough beards without an effort. The only local representative of the British Empire within reach was the "patwari" but he was only a village official, the clerk who kept the accounts of the peasantry. Luckily, Mani was his head quarters, so we interviewed him. He was almost blind! We struck oil at last, in his son, a lad of sixteen, who was his father's inseparable companion and transacted all official business under the sanctioning presence of his progenitor. This young man did all the clerical business of the country, besides keeping the village accounts, as he seemed to be the only person in Spiti who knew the Indian vernacular. He was an obliging young man and helped us efficiently. With his aid we despatched a messenger to the Assistant Commissioner of Kulu asking for permission to shoot in Spiti.

The original plan of our journey was to have a few days ibex shooting, gather supplies here in the meanwhile, and then make our way across the Parang-la to the Tso-Morri Lake, work back by the Baralacha into Lahoul, cross into Kulu by the Rotang—and so to railhead at Pathankot or Simla by the middle of October. We therefore advanced the Patwari forty rupees to collect supplies while we proceeded on our ibex hunt. A large quantity of supplies was absolutely necessary for our intended journey as, after crossing the Parang-la none would again be procurable till we reached Lahoul. The Patwari and his son served us well in this respect and saved us an immense deal if trouble.

Our ibex ground was the knot of mountains to the south-west of Mani which sends long spurs down to the Spiti river, and very short ones, on the reverse side, down to the Peen. The highest points in this range are marked in the map "Snowy Peak 19,404ft." and "Great Rock 19,606ft." I shot my first ibex between these two peaks in the Lung-de valley, the stream from which runs down to the Spiti river. My second ibex I bagged on the Peen side of the range near the sources of the Kyoka stream which joins the Peen river above the village of Tiling. We spent exactly three weeks in this ground but most of this time we lost in travelling over the lower spurs of these mountains getting from one slope to the other. The shikaris absolutely refused to take us from the head of the Lung-de into the Kyoka valley and I was obliged to come down again to the village of Tungti in the Peen, get round by Tiling and Hansa and ascend again to the ibex gounds at the sources of the Kyoko. We thus wasted two weeks while one week only was spent in actually following the game. During that time I had two stalks in the Lung-de and two in the Kyoko valley, and bagged two ibex. There was also that difficulty about the cook. He could not be in two places at the same time, so he was left at the main camp in the lower part of the valley while my friend took one ibex ground with four days food and I did the same in the opposite irection. The cold food, backed by rough chapatis cooked by a coolie, soon blunted our appettes and we were irresistably attracted back to the cooking tent where hot meals awaited us. I could generally last out my four day's but my friend was not so stoical. I always found him down before me within measurable distance of the fleshi pots. It must be said in his extenuation that this was his first experience in ibex shooting and roughing it was not his strong point.

I ascended the Lung-de valley on the 19th of June and remained there five days. My first stalk was a failure as the ibex had seen us approaching from a long distance and my camp was in full view of them all the time. The second attempt was successful. But only after a very tough bit of work. We sighted three old bucks, all by themselves, late one evening. So left them alone for next day. We found them in the morning just under Snowy Peak, 19,404 ft. We had left camp at 4-30 a.m. and sighted our game an hour afterwards. We first managed to get above them after an exhausting climb and then followed them over awful ground till 1 p.m. The ascents and descents were without number and frequently most dangerous. The ibex seemed restless but not alarmed; they would lie up, for a time, then get up and slowly move on. Their instinct told them there was something wrong, but they could not locate it. The hunt was so long and fatiguing that I began to flag, but the Spiti shikari was untiring and quartered the gound like a dog. Shortly after noon he found the three bucks at last, lying down on a low ridge commanded on all sides by higher ones—but out of range! The place was splendidly chosen for a quiet snooze in perfect safety and there were the three old rascals lying at perfect ease absorbing the genial rays of the sun. We took in the position at once. It was hopeless trying to get within range, and the ibex would not move for at least three hours when there would not be enough daylight for a stalk, and return to camp before night set in. We decided to await developments till 4 P. M. We would just give ourselves time enough to get into camp before dark—and see what could be done in the meantime. We made ourselves as comfortable as circumstances would admit on a commanding ridge above our game and, following their example snoozed on and off for a couple of hours. At 3 P.M. the ibex were up again—and here my luck came in at last. The bucks ran straight down to the stream below us, crossed, and walked up slowly right under the ridge where we were perched! The attraction was a patch of young grass on a flat bit of ground on the edge of the stream and on our right front. By crawling down one slope for a couple of hundred yards we would be within shooting distance. But that two hundred yards took me half an hour! We had to descend from our ridge very slowly to prevent stones and slates from rattling down, and the angle was so acute that there was danger also—for one careless step would have taken me down to the level of my game in no condition to shoot! I managed the descent successfully, but my nerves were considerably fluttered by the anxiety not to loosen a stone, slate or make any kind of noise. When at last I peeped through a slit in the jagged ridge that hid me from the ibex I was relieved to find that I was within one hundred and fifty yards and could get a rest for my rifle for the first shot at any rate. But even with this help, I was so shaken by the painfully slow crawl down that steep and rugged slope that I was by no means certain even of my first shot! The ibex were in and about a small clump of birch bushes, moving slowly and eagerly feeding. My first shot was a steady pot at one of the animals standing against a green bush with his head down, grazing. The ibex shivered as the bullet touched him but he never moved for at least thirty seconds—he then slowly walked away out of sight getting under a lower ridge that intervened between us. I afterwards found that the bullet went low, and just touched the lower part of his lungs. The other two, as usual, ran about the little flat uncertain what line to take. I broke the hind leg of another as he ran down to the stream, but I missed the third at various long ranges as he fled the way he had come. The one with the broken leg crossed to the opposite slope, and I missed him twice at long range. I left him for next day as there was no time to follow him so late in the evening. The sun had disappeared behind the Western sky-line and we had to make haste. My two men descended to look for the first ibex that had concealed itself below the ridge. He never moved till they were almost on him when he ran down to the stream and began slowly to ascend the opposite slope. As soon as I could see him I fired and he rolled down dead—the carcase coming to a stand still just on the edge of the stream. The two shikaris had not had a morsel to eat all day and were savagely hungry. They cut the liver out of the still warm body and ate huge chunks of it with just a warming at a little fire they made. I had not yet tackled my breakfast and tried to do so now, but failed to dispose of more than a couple of mouthfuls. There was no water to drink as the stream contained a black paste-like liquid which had overflowed its banks and had spread a layer of soft mud mixed with boulders and debris from above. Blocks of ice had also come down, chips of which I ate after much cleaning with my handkerchief. My two companions were quite cheerful now—the smoking liver had warmed them up. During the day when tired and depressed, they had consoled themselves with pinches of snuff—now they had solid meat under their belts. The carcase was left on the ground protected by stones and bushes heaped over it and we started for camp, three miles away. The return of the wearied hunter, after the excitement of the chase, is, without doubt, the most trying part of his hunt. The re-action that follows, caused by physical fatigue, brings on a depression of spirits against which it is hard to struggle and one begins to curse one's folly for following a wild goat for hours at the imminent risk of breaking his neck a dozen times during the day. Such was my state of mind now. The long tramp back in the cold shade of the valley, the depressing gloom of approaching night and the awful surroundings of the most rugged and savage mountains in the world, induced a corresponding mental depression which obliterated for the moment all the joys of our successful stalk. The final ascent to the camp by short cuts, which my companions would take, regardless of the played out individual following them, landed me at last under my cheerless rock at 8 P.M. Sixteen hours since I last saw it. My exhaustion was so thorough that I was unable to warm up the cold food in the pot. I was just able to make a cup of tea and after that a cup of bovril (well mixed with brandy!) which revived me sufficiently to make myself comfortable under the blankets—where I remained for twelve solid hours without a move!

I was too done next day to follow up the wounded buck so sent the shikaris after him with the dog they had in camp. They returned in the evening unsuccessful. They had tracked him across the Lung-de stream, up the opposite slope in the direction of the Kyoka valley for which, they said he was evidently making. As that was the direction in which I intended proceeding I had every hope of recovering the wounded beast eventually; but I was quickly undeceived for my men flatly refused to go straight across taking a short cut into that valley because, so they said, there was no track and they had never gone that way before! I could not insist strongly as all my eatables had been consumed and I was obliged to return to the main camp for a fresh supply. We therefore crossed the ridge above our camp and descended over very dangerous ground to the village of Tungti. Here I was joined by my friend who had remained with the main camp. He shot two small ibex just above this village the day I arrived.

Skirting round by the mountain spurs running down to the Peen river we reached the Kyoka stream and camped in a side valley about three miles above the village of Hansa. This was to be our main camp. My friend elected to go higher up the same valley and try his luck on the grassy slopes near the top of the ridge dividing Kyoka from Lung-de. Signs of ibex were numerous—in fact several young bucks and females had been seen from the main camp as soon as we reached the place. I crossed the Kyoka stream and went up a valley in the opposite direction. We camped under a rock about four miles from the river and were lucky enough to come across the fresh traces of a bear just before we halted. He had gone up that very morning and was no doubt ahead of us on the upper slopes of our hunting ground. Next day, after moving camp further up, we ascended the nala in the evening to look for him. We saw him about a mile up the shallow valley, coming down towards us. We ran up the hillside and waited for him and I thought it was a certain thing—but it was not! The eagerness of my men and myself ruined our chances. He was within four hundred yards of our ambush when the wind changed. He threw up his nose, had a sniff and was off up a side valley at his best pace looking like a big hairy caterpillar undulating up the hill-side in a great hurry. He was a large beast and had a splendid coat, which I admired and envied as I watched him through the glass. Had I left the bear alone till next morning I am sure he would have been easily stalked as the wind would then have been right and he would have been busy feeding. This was the only brown bear I saw during the whole of this trip. They seem to be rare in Spiti.

Next morning early we were out again and going up the same path to look for ibex. An icy cold wind was blowing in our faces which made progress slow and uncomfortable. Just on the very spot where the bear had stopped and then bolted we now discovered five ibex eagerly grazing in the tender grass right in the edge of the half-frozen stream just like a flock of goats. We crept down to the stream when a female, not seen by us, detected our movement. She gave the alarm and up they went the side valley where the bear had bolted! The Mani shikari had his dog with him tied up and asked me if he could let him go. Not knowing exactly what would happen I said "yes," and away went the dog who seemed to be all there. He soon got a view of the ibex, not more than four hundred yards away and, crossing the stream, was up after them. I followed the chase with the glass till a swell in the mountain-side concealed them from view and I thought all was over. After a time a male ibex suddenly appeared over the curve of the hill making for the rocks and precipices on my left front, but going down the valley towards camp. He was not going fast. Some time after the dog too appeared on the ibex-track, but going at a moderate pace. He had evidently cut the buck off from the flock! Now a splendid chase appeared in full view along the rocky face of the precipitous mountain side. We ran down to the bed of the stream and kept parallel with the hunt above us waiting for a chance, to put in a shot. The ibex and dog were in view all the time not more than five hundred yards off. The ibex could not go fast and seemed done. The dog gained rapidly and in a short time had the buck completely under control, driving him down towards us at every turn while the hunted beast made every effort to ascend. This continued for some time—the dog chasing the ibex up and down along the ledges and always managing to bring the quarry nearer to us. The sure-footedness of the animals was wonderful to behold—they never made a mistake. The ibex was at last brought to a stand-still and the dog bayed him in grand style in full view of us. The poor old buck goat was fast losing his head and getting bewildered. He again attempted to escape but soon had to stand and turn round in self-defence for the dog stuck to him most tenaciously. Once the dog turned him back and drove him down a good distance towards us—but still out of shot, for I viewed him twice. The ibex again bolted higher up and got in a flat bit of rock where he turned and faced the dog. He actually charged him with head down but the dog was too nimble for him. I had two more shots here but the distance was too great—four hundred yards at least—and I missed. The dog at last got the ibex off the flat rock and drove him down, in one rush, a good distance towards us before the hunted beast could pull up. He found refuge at last on a ledge in the face of a precipice which was a regular trap as he had blank space in front of him and the dog behind; but he managed to turn round in this position and showed a bold front to his untiring pursuer. I now had a steady shot at his right shoulder—the bullet entering his small ribs, passing through the breast-bone and into and through the left shoulder; the metal casing was found just under the skin. The ibex fell off the ledge and rolled down to the edge of the stream, not twenty yards from where we were standing—the dog worrying the carcase all the way down. All this happened not half a mile from camp! The two shikaris went across the ice-cold stream and opened the body—the good dog getting the smoking entrails on the spot as a reward for his splendid work. I had thus witnessed by a mere accident the chase of the wild ibex as practised by the hunters of Spiti during winter when the game is driven down to ground near villages by heavy falls of snow. It is easy to imagine the havoc committed among the helpless animals at that season of the year. As the hunters make no discrimination as to sex, the destruction effected must be enormous. The extermination of ibex in this district, the easternmost habitat of this noble animal cannot be far distant. They are becoming rarer every year and can now be found only in a few localities where their last stand against effacement is now being made. Though laws may exist for their preservation it is hardly possible that they can be efficiently enforced in an inaccessible country like Spiti where British authority is unrepresented by even a single Government official. These splendid game animals must therefore die out.

One word regarding the sporting dog that gave me such a good show. He was of a reddish colour, of medium size and in some respects resembled the wild dog so universally spread over the Indian Continent. He had a foxy head, pointed snout, pricked ears and his eyes were small and fixed close to each other—an unusual feature that struck me at once. With these characteristics he was still the thorough village mongrel, not differing much from the yelping curs attached to human habitations. His master treated him with uniform brutality—to which, however, he seemed thoroughly accustomed. He lived on the outskirts of the camp receiving a scrap of food now and then from the men, but went without a mouthful for days at a time. He received all my advances with sullen indifference and never came near the bones and cakes I used to throw to him till I had moved away some distance. Nevertheless I had a kindly feeling for him and admired him for his staunchness and tenacity when after game. When not transfigured in the pursuit of his quarry he was the veriest pariah one could imagine. He had certainly wild blood in him—and from a not far-distant ancestor.

The ibex I shot had horns of thirty-one and thirty-two inches—very small indeed. Many others that I examined carefully with my glass did not appear to be much larger. I doubt whether I saw a single buck with horns of forty inches. The second ibex I bagged was a very old animal, yet his horns measured only thirty-one inches. The stunted growth of these heads I can attribute only to the savage country in which they were destined to exist. Insufficient nourishment and the severity of the climate, I should say, had a good deal to do with the poor show of horns I came across.

Our grand project of the round journey by the Tso-moriri came to a miserable end. We ran short of rupees! We tried our best to change notes for cash but could not raise a single rupee in the whole of Spiti, and none could be had in Basahir though we tried as far as Rampur. My friend also could no longer conceal his disgust at the lack of sport and the hard travelling he had to endure day after day without any adequate return. He confessed at last he was not "built" for this kind of rough and tumble outing—and I agreed with him. So after squaring accounts with the Mani patwari we returned by the Mani-rang, or Mani pars, to Chini and then back to Rampur. I had to come thus far with my friend so as to feed him on his way back. Rampur is within easy reach of Simla to which station my companion hurried while I branched off to Kulu and continued my travels to the head of that valley.

So ended my grandly projected journey—with only "Two Ibex in Spiti."

THE JARRUCK'S TRIAL.

One night I lay a sleeping
Beneath the starry sky,
For this is what we always do
When Summer draweth nigh;
There came a mare unto my bed
Her mane and tail unkempt,
She sat upon my chest all night
And this is what I dreamt.

I saw a jungle clearing
And a Court of Justice sat
"His Lordship" was an Elephant,
A monster too at that!
The jury also Elephants,
They never could keep still,
A jarruck for a prisoner,
For stealing from a kill.

And every kind of beast was there
To witness this strange sight,
The trial of a jarruck
Upon a moonlight night;
And many different kinds of birds
Sat on the trees around,
They said we get a better view
Than we should on the ground.

A tiger was the plaintfff,
He marched up to his place,
And in a very angry voice
Began to state his case.
"Some days ago, I killed a cow
As fat as fat could be,
And this vile beast (the jarruck winced)
I charge with larceny,"

"I ate but little meat that night,
I can afford to waste,
And after lying by a day,
It has a better taste.
Next night returning early
I heard some clattering stones,
And found that there was no meat left
And very little bones."

Some animal was making off
As hard as he could run,
And now I beg of you, my lord
That justice may be done.
Could I have caught the animal
When in the act of stealing,
There would have been no need, by lord
Of to the court appealing.

The judge when he this statement heard,
Was very, very wrath,
And shouted to the prisoner
"You hear this charge?: Stand forth
And give an answer to this charge,
An answer brief and true,
For if you lie: Your day of birth
You'll very greatly rue.

The jarruck stood forth trembling,
His mouth was very dry,
His eyes were starting from his head
(You know the reason why).
He stood before the elephant
But kept just out of reach,
He tried his best to make reply
But stammered in his speech.

Pi-pi-pi-pity me,
I ne-ne-never did this thing,
Oh ca-ca-can't you see.
The tigers' angry Be-because"
(His watering eyes he wiped).
"I t-t-t-t too like him Am s-s s-s-striped."

"Some excuse" Sir: the judge replied,
"I did not doubt you'd give,
And if I find it is untrue,
You soon will cease to live.
For if you are "not guilty,"
Why tremble you with fear,
Now stand aside: and one by one
The witnesses I'll hear."

The first one was a porcupine
He said "the other day,
When I was digging in the ground,
This jarruck passed my way,
Going through the jungle
As hard as he could run,
I asked why are you hurrying,"?
He said "Oh just for fun."

Next witness was a jackal,
With only half a tail,
He said I found a jarruck's tracks
And followed up the trail.
They led up to some clean picked bones
Around was jarruck's spoor."
But he quite forgot to mention
He'd been there himself before.

A Sambhar next gave evidence
"That on that fateful day,
Something I heard approachig
So moved out of its way.
It must have been a jarruck,
True: I didn't see it: yet
The gentle breeze which came my way
I never shall forget.

This caused a roar of laughter,
The Judge in anger rose,
And said the facts are now quite clear
The evidence much close.
Gentlemen of the jury,
On you I must rely,
To see this wretched prisoner
Is now codemned to die."

The jarruck gave one howl of fear,
One terror stricken wail,
When off my chest the night mare jumped
A whisking of her tail.
Said she "I must be off you know
To have my feed of corn,"
And I awoke in great surprise
For it was early morn.

Fishing.

OBSERVATIONS ORIGINAL AND OTHERWISE.

TROUT FLIES AS THEY SHOULD BE.

As spring approaches there can be no more interesting subject to the fly-fisher for trout than the flies he ought to use. Without suitable flies a day on the best waters is thrown away, while with appropriate artificial flies a brace or two of good fish may often be lured out of what at first sight seems an impracticable or an over-fished river. A good many difficult questions are asked about flies. Ought they to resemble nature as most Englishmen believe, or will it answer equally well as the Scotchmen and many American men believe, if they only carry on their face something of the character and color of their prototypes? Are wingless flies (spiders) always the best of lures as many accomplished anglers assert? Nay, should we cease to care for nature and boldly make flies of any combination of fur, feathers, or gold and silver tinsel which experience shows the trout most affect. There are many points on which many words might be written, but I intend in the present writing to only give a few considerations on the above general questions. Many may regard my opinions as heretical, and I invite from my readers their criticisms. I can only plead that a long experience is my warrant for entering on these disputed points, and if my disquisitions in any manner enlighten brother anglers, the aim of this writing will have been attained.

It may be held as an axiom that in angling questions, and far more important subjects, all hard and fast general rules and statements are to be distrusted. Exceptions must always be expected and looked for in every art. Men who firmly believed in "conventionalized creation," as Dudley Warner termed the "fancy fly," which is made each time a step further from the exact original pattern, yet find it expedient at times to use the most exquisitely fashioned fly, and the one most resembling nature, which they can find in their books. Fish have their own likings and dislikings. Again, every water is different in some respects (often in many respects) from others. Each requires its proper fly, says the fly-maker. It may be so, but a very limited selection of flies, with a proper skill in showing then to the fish, may be trusted to fill a basket (if the day admits of it) from almost any stream. I have not much faith in the ancient fisherman, who confidently avers that it is impossible to do any execution on his pet stream without the "Blue-ringed snorter," the "Tipton Slasher," on "Blue Jay." The "oldest inhabitant" is however, useful when a man reaches a stream he does not know to inform him what fly is on the water so that the newcomer may not lose time in ascertaining this for himself. For the rest, a jaunty fly, with full wings and a couple of tails, especially if it possess a peacock hurl body, if there is a breeze, will yield us excellent reward.

There is no need to match the artificial fly in grades of finely graduated color with the natural insect. The size and shape and general similarity of color are all that the fisherman need attend to. Size, also, is more important than color, and the fly-maker may take this statement from me as the truth. Spider flies, that is, those without wings and tail and made from the hackles of birds, are useful for transparent streams, rocky mountain burns, and rivers flowing in a stoney country. Hence, they are invaluable in such localities, and are to be strongly recommended for such conditions. Their bodies are thin, and in such fishing are to be commended before the large fly with the thick body. The thickly covered fly makes a splash in clear water which the trout most certainly perceives at once, and is fatal to the angler's chances. Stewart says: "Every possible advantage is in favour of the lightly dressed fly; it is more like a natural insect; it falls lightly on the water, and every angler knows the advantage of making his fly fall lightly, there being less material in it. The artificial nature of that material is not so easily detected, and also the hook is not so much covered with feathers; there is much better chance of hooking the trout when it rises." These are cogent reasons. In a flood, of course, I should use a larger and thicker fly. It is then necessary to give the fish something that can be readily seen. In ordinary slow flowing rivers, I confess to the use of winged flies; they float better and can be seen more clearly at a long distance, and they cast better, being heavier than the tiny gnat-like fly. As a rule, also they generally catch larger fish than their wingless brethren. An entirely conventional fly is only a success at certain times, when the trout are rising greedily and almost taking anything.

Endurance of Black Bass

A remarkable dicovery was made recently at South Kensington, London, with reference to a black bass (Micropterus dolomieu) whereby substantial evidence of the hardihood and endurance of that fish under adverse circumstances is afforded. It appears that a consignment of black bass, together with white fish, rock bass, German carp, etc., was imported for the museum and aquarium at the instigation of the Marquis of Exeter. Unfortunately the voyage way a rough one, and the heavy seas caused much injury to the fish generally, and particularly to the black bass. On arriving at the aquarium, however, most of the fish revived, with the exception of the bass which died to all appearance a few hours after having been placed in the tanks. The other day as the attendant was cleaning one of the tanks out to his great surprise a black bass suddenly emerged from the rock work where it had evidently been secreted eversince the day of its arrival, sixteen months ago. How it survived is a mystery as apparently it had taken no food. The tank is inhabited by cat-fish which are fed on a dietary quite unsuited to their solitary companion, beside being bottom feeders and great scavengers, they naturally appropriated all available food themselves. The black bass is in fine condition and to all appearances in exuberant spirits. It still lives a hermit's life among the rock-work, never seeking the companionship of its congeners who by the way, show no sign of amity or even recognition towards their American cousin. Their habits of life are, of course, not in bon accord, and the two species take up their position in water at different stations, namely, the cat fish at the bottom and the bass near the top of the tank.

Autocracy Among Fishes.

It is an indisputable fact that over every race, kindred and nationality, there exists at some time a sovereign in the form of a chief or leader, who has the prerogative over everything and everybody. In the walks of everyday life also, among communities and classes one prominent figure stands out pre-eminent among men whose will is obeyed, whose superiority is acknowledged, and whose judgment is respected. He assumes this position, either by election or force of character, which carries everything before him and makes his confreres stand aside like "wonder-wounded hearers." They acknowledge his superiority and instinctively feel it and yield to him accordingly. It is so with savage tribes, and it is not only found to be so in the human race but in all species of animals as well. How plainly this is evidenced by cattle feeding in a herd on a meadow; the leader of the herd can at once be recognized His subjects follow his call and instinctively follow his footsteps when grazing. Descending to the lower dynasty of fishes we find them following the same law as their terrestial conquerers. There is some truth in the doctrines of the old Buddhist lore telling of fishes choosing Leviathan for their king. Leviathan was doubtless a huge sea monster, a form of whale, both animal and fish, and was therefore naturally assumed to be the potenate of the aqvaeus kingdom.

I have made careful observations for years upon this interesting subject and am able to speak from actual experience. I have found that trout as well as salmon acknowledge the leadership of a monarch as I shall proceed to show. I have watched the movements of many tribes of trout, and of each one there always appeared a particularly fine one, which I afterwards learned proved to be the ruler. In every case he was located in a certain part of the stream, end of the best situations, and, moreover, an excellent feeding ground little frequented by professors of the "gentle craft." In one stream I used particularly to observe that some eight or nine fish would remain at a respectful distance from their chief, and if by chance they encroached somewhat on his position, a slight movement on the part of his majesty would cause them to retire instantly. One day the sovereign trout was snatched from his splendour and pomp by a crafty piscator, and the monarch was seen no more. Strange to tell, on visiting this spot on the succeeding day, I found his throne occupied by another fish, who seemed to exercise the same influence over the tribe as did his predcessor. It was an exceedingly comely fish, and I determined to capture it, so I fished the stream throughout the greater portion of the day; but to no effect, for the enthroned monarch did not so much as condescend to look at my well-proportioned fly temptingly displayed before his optics. Curiously enough, none of his subjects attempted to seize what their chief disdained so contemptuously, but looked on restlessly as if uncertain what course to pursue. Disgusted with the intelligence displayed by these trout I departed but returned next day to repeat my efforts. To my utter astonishment the sovereign trout and his clan had disappeared, and not a fish was to be seen. Here, then, was an instance not only of sovereignty among fish but also of marked intelligence they are capable of exerting. Unbaffled by this occurrence I searched the stream lower down for many days and was at length rewarded for my pains. I espied the identical monarch and his tribe about a mile from his former kingdom. Again I tried to come to terms with him but utterly failed, although I succeeded in capturing one of his subjects. Doubtless the autocrat of a tribe of fish attains his position from physical prowess that at once elevates him above his fellows who rely on their chief's experience in conducting them to the most prolific feeding ground and guarding them from danger. Notwithstanding this we know they sometimes fall a victim to treachery, and the angler realizes full well that the seductive fly skilfully displayed levels all ranks and lays both monarch and subject high and dry on the bank, gasping in the pains of death.

Trout Fishing in Brooks.

In the present rush to any stream reported to hold trout it is singular how frequently the brooks which run in a fisherman's neighborhood are neglected. These streamlets often hold good trout, not many, of course, as compared with rivers. There are frequently many obstacles to be overcome before brook trout can be caught, bushes, trees, posts and the like interfere seriously with the casting of the fly. But the true angler is satisfied the more with his day's sport, should he be able to bring home three or four good fish obtained with infinite difficulty under such circumstances. Better a brace of good fish than a dozen fish of indifferent weight. The fact is that fishermen around a brook such as we have in our eye, much choked with bushes and high banks, generally rest content that the trout can only be caught with the worm, and, in consequence, such ignoble fishing takes place, and fine, shapely trout are pulled out with big red worms as if they were the valgur perch or soach. Of course, we know there is a branch of worm fishing which when the brooks are low and of shallow depths through extreme drought when the fish are caught on a long rod and a worm which is cast like a fly upstream in front of the angler. But this itself is a fine art and a very different process from sneaking behind an overhanging tree, when the stream is much colored, and dropping a garden lob-worm into the gullet of some unfortunate trout below. We would therefore by no means rest satisfied with the rustic babble that the trout in such and such a brook can only be caught by the worm, and venture to promise the enterprising angler much satisfaction if he boldly endeavours to take these fish with the artificial fly. First the brook trout itself must be found.

Open meadow and such a streamlet are easily fished. Almost all that is requisite is to keep well back from the stream if the angler elects to fish down stream. If the banks are low it is much better to fish up stream, and to keep as much as possible on a level with the water. Few things scare a trout so much as a vision of an angler on the sky line. Nor is its apprehension calmed if the fisherman is waving his arm and brandishing his rod. The trout immediately rushes into the nearest hole in the brook or under the floating raft of sticks and weeds, and is seen no more that day. Should the banks be thickly grown with old hawthorn, willow, rambling cedars, straggling bushes overgrown with hedge roses, ivy, briars and the like, a different treatment is required. Here a familar knowledge of the water greatly aids the fisherman. At some places by crawling through an opening between two bushes, by standing behind the thick stem of a tree, or simply advancing on hands and knees and flipping cleverly rather than casting the flies, a good trout may now and then be secured under the dark shade of the foliage where he has lain in security for many a happy month. It is not a bad plan to cut an opening with a clasp knife here and there. If the aperture be no use for to-day it will be so to-morrow. For such fishing a short rod must be used and an easy running line. Directly the angler feels the fish he must strike smartly (taking for granted that his gut and line are strong, and have all his wits about him), or he will invariably lose his fish. It will either dart under roots or leap up and entangle the line in the branches. When the fish is struck the proverbial three courses are generally open to the fisherman. He can jump into the stream and fight his fish, under the branches, or remain on hands and knees to do it or leap up (a most hazardous course), and so kill it, if he can. In any case, the process must be to shorten the line and keep the fish from the deeps of water which may be in the centre of the stream. If he has more than one fly (which should never be the case) on his cast he will infallibly hook some weed or root. The angler should not forget to have the landing net at his side and lose no time in using it. Should the angler elect to jump in by lowering his rod he can often pass it under the undergrowth of the banks, and perhaps kill the trout in the open space beyond. Remaining stretched at full length is frequently the safest course to adopt. Not seeing the foe the fish does not run about with such frantic terror and this means less danger of breakage. Then good luck rather than skill must befriend the angler. How well we know by experience what in such a case often ensues. There is a brief skirmish—a slip—a sudden exclamation, and the angler finds himself up to his knees or higher in mud and cold water, his cap suspended on a briar high above his head, his hair towselled, his face hot and red, his hands torn, his line inextricably tangled in the boughs, his top joint very likely snapped, and certainly his fish lost. It is not every combat in brook trout-fishing that the fisherman wins.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

Sir,—I have shot snipe in Ceylon, in many parts of India, in Kashmir, and at Home, and have often asked myself the same question which "Raoul," in the issue of 14th March, puts to the readers of the Indian Field.

Snipe in Britain undoubtedly fly quicker and twist more than the same birds in Madras or Ceylon, where it is always hot, no matter what the time of year. But in the cold weather in Upper India, in Kashmir, and on the breezy plateau of the Neilgheries, I believe the birds to be every whit as fast as they are at Home. Another point, ... heat and glare handicap the sportsman, even more than the birds; and if the snipe on a blazing September day in India, do quit their muddy beds sluggishly and reluctantly, the shooter's perspiration, blurred eyes and languid limbs, are more than sufficient balance on the other side. The only ACCURATE way of comparing the difficulties of snipe shooting in different places, is to keep a note of cartridges expended to birds gathered. I rather hesitate to put my own experiences on record, as I am one of those moderate shots who has to confess to being but little better than half. That is to say that usually I have been able to produce but very few more than half the number of snipe, for quantity of cartridges expended. At Home my notes show that the average was always practically the same as in India. Something has been said in the Home papers about driven snipe being easy to shoot. This has also been my experience. Snipe sent over the guns by beaters usually fly straight, and no faster, than when walked up.

A FRIEND IN NEED.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

Sir,—The domestic buffalo is usually considered a stupid animal. The following incident seems to show that it may on an occasion exhibit a very considerable degree of intelligence. I was sitting up for a panther a few weeks ago over a dead goat, a live goat being picketted beside it. Shortly after sunset I heard the sounds of a herd of buffaloes grazing in the jungle a few hundred yards away. They gradually approached the spot where the goat was tied, and when within 20 yards or so there was a sudden stampede and the herd rushed out into the cultivated land at the edge of which my machan was, snorting violently and evidently greatly excited. I thought they had winded the panther, but it was soon apparent that the goat was the object of their curiosity. There was bright moonlight so I could see distinctly what occurred. The buffaloes remained drawn up in line watching the goat for about 15 minutes, occasionally snorting and stampeding a short way. At last they approached the goat in a solid phalanx and when within a few yards several of them lowered their heads as if about to charge. They seemed, however, to recognise the goat as belonging to their village and after smelling it for several minutes and examining the dead goat curiously they moved on a few yards. They seemed to expect the goat to follow them. After waiting for a few minutes an old cow-buffalo was seized with a sudden inspiration. She returned to the goat, smelt it again as if to make sure that it really did belong to their village, and then deliberately placing her left horn under the rope at which the goat was straining, she gave a jerk. The goat was flung into the air, but the rope which tied it was broken and it ran free to join its rescuers! Having accomplished their object the buffaloes quietly moved off, but they had effectually spoiled my sport and I had to return to camp without seeing anything of the panther.

After this who shall call the buffalo a stupid animal?

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

Sir,—You may have noticed during the last few months certain references in the Press to the need of a Society for the Preservation of Historical Institutions connected with Calcutta. The suggestion for the formation of such a Society was put forward in a letter in which the correspondent after lamenting the apathy of the public towards historical relics said:—

"Would it not be possible to form a Society having for its object the gathering together of the threads or history of Old Calcutta, of its once prominent citizens, their houses and old time social rendezvous and pastimes? It should not be difficult to form the nucleus of a Calcutta Historical Society which in the course of a few years with a band of earnest workers would gather together such a goodly pile of information and records as would provide the material for a full and lasting history of Old Calcutta, a sufficient justification for such a Society's existence apart from the happy result of bringing together those who are interested not only in the land they live in, but in the History of 'Citizens of no mean City.' It needs but the energy of a few to start such a Society, the formation of which it is to be hoped will not be long delayed.

In a letter recently received from Dr. Busteed, M. D., C.I.E., one of the greatest living authorities on Old Calcutta, he sympathises with the movement and rightly refers to the cause as "a sacred one."

It is sought, therefore, to start a Society of the kind needed, and your co-operation is earnestly solicited.

I may mention that I have already received the cards of several prominent gentlemen interested in the movement and it is proposed to call a meeting at an early date which will be duly notified to you on hearing of your desire to be present.

BANKERS:

The Punjab Banking Company, Lahore.

The present issue is for the purposes—

(1) Of working the Kashmir Sapphire Mines, of which an extension of one year of the present Exploring and Prospecting Licenses have been obtained.

(The sale of Gem Stones found in the Summer of 1906 more than covered the entire costs of Working, Rent, and Royalty.

(2) Of providing Pumps for draining, and Gear for working gold-bearing gravel in Baltistan, under a Lease covering about 50 miles of the Dras River.

Local diggers worked these gravels extensively, but were unable to go below low-water level.

The richer ground overlying bed-rock could not be worked.

(3) Of proving the Indus River gravels above and below Attock for 48 miles, with the view of putting on Dredgers to recover the contained gold.

The auriferous character of these gravels is historical. The bed of the Indus for miles above Attock is a broad gravel bottom, and is easy dredging ground. Two grains of gold per cubic yard will amplly cover depreciation of plant, repairs, and running expenses.

To prove these gravels to contain at least 3 grains of gold, and therefore that they are highly payable, is the preliminary work now to be undertaken, and the concessionaire from the Government of India has agreed to give 3 years' "Option" to the Company. The cost of providing Dredgers and undertaking regular Mining operations is not contemplated by this Company.

(4) Of providing funds for further prospecting and taking up mineral lands in Kashmir and British India.

Applications with remittances, which will be registered in order of receipt, should be addressed to—

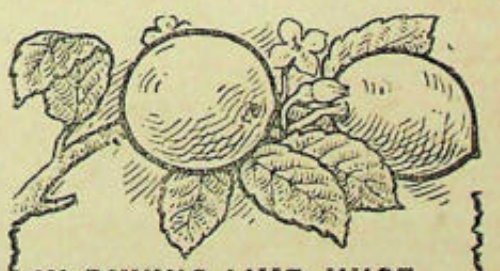
Every position in life has its cheerful side. No man can go so far down the hill that the sun won't shine on some part of the valley for at least an hour a day. Think of the poor organ-grinder, and take heart. "Ah!" he said to himself, as he turned the awful crank of that unmelodious instrument and heard the pennies drop on the sidewalk; "if I hadn't studied music when I was young I might now be a common beggar."

Captain Sealby, of the White Star liner Cretic, was explaining to a Cincinnation that his company had considerable difficulty in finding names for their new ships.

"They all have to end in 'ic,' you know," the captain explained.

The Cincinnatian, who was pale and seedy, said, as he looked dismally at the rolling ocean :—



"For a suitable name, I would suggest 'Seasic.'"

UP the river, one fine day last week, a young sculler, remarkable for his "coat of many colours," was reclining on the bank enjoying his "bacca," when a boatload of merry laughing boys and girls came along. The usual riverside chaff ensued, and one young lady thought to quelch that sculler with "What are you waiting for, Joseph?" The coat-wearer was ready, and replied, "Not for you, Mrs. Potiphar!" It was rather rough on the "gal."

"LADIES and gentlemen," said the prestidigitateur, "I must request one of the weaker sex among my indulgent audience to be kind enough to enter the magic cabinet. I shall then close the door, and when I reopen it a moment later the lady will have disappeared."

"Polly, my love," said a spectator in the stalls to his wife, "do me a favour. Step up on the stage and let him put you in the mysterious cupboard."

Sport in England.

LONDON, Friday, 5th April 1907.

MANCHESTER.

APRIL-LIKE showers alternated with brilliant sunshine at Castle Irwell on the 1st instant, and these were beneficent, in as much as they laid the dust and nicely moistened the galloping tracks. Fields were large, and the sport was on a somewhat high plane, though in the main results went all against backers, whilst the fortunes of the Hednesford stable received a check when young Americus and Herbert Vincent failed to justify their positions as favourites. Appended are results of the principal races.—

WINDSOR.

A sort of patchwork week for South Country sportsmen called their attention to Windsor yesterday, when a fair attendance discussed an interesting menu. The executive had made a further alteration which seemed to give general satisfaction—the 10s. ring, now reduced to 5s. having embraced the cheap shilling one, and been comfortably enlarged. Rain, much wanted by the gardeners, while improving the course, brought a fall of temperature, as those who left their greatcoats at home sorrowfully acknowledged. Details.—

FOOTBALL

UNDER ASSOCIATION RULES.

The Easter holiday is invariably a very trying period for teams in the running for championship honours. Heavy programmes have to be surmounted, and many a time and oft has a side comfortably placed at the head of one or other of the great leagues before the advent of Good Friday had all pretensions shattered by a series of heavy defeats in the next few days. Therefore, team managers who govern the fortunes of clubs claiming the top rungs of the various ladders may well be excused for exhibiting jack-in-the-box propensities when all-important matches are in progress. But in the general sense the present Easter holiday is something of an exception, for few turn-ups have occurred.

THE SOUTHERN LEAGUE.

Fulham had something in the nature of a gift presented to them by the visit of Northampton to Craven Cottage on Saturday, but many and anxious were inquiries as to the result of the game between Luton and Portsmouth on the former's enclosure. This game was recognised by experts as almost deciding the championship, and many huge sighs of relief were vented when it was known that Luton had conquered their opponents by a substantial margin. Luton have been progressing splendidly during the past few weeks, picking up points both at home and away with equal impartiality. They were in rare fettle against their visitors, and made a win practically a certainty by scoring two brilliant goals in the first five minutes. Fulham have now a lead of three points with one more match played, and have two hard games in anticipation away from home ; but they are notoriously quite as good when operating on foreign soil as when disporting themselves on their own ground and they are not likely to suffer a relapse with the shield within their reach. Rough play has so materially lessened within the past few years that it is a matter of regret to find this distasteful phase of the game in evidence at Tottenham. Of all sides the 'Spurs play intelligent and fair football, and the Brighton players—or the section at fault—should have known better than to introduce unsavoury tactics. As it happened, Tottenham won, and that pretty easily, scoring three goals without response, but several of their players, particularly Walton and Reid, are not likely to cherish pleasant memories of the game.

BRENTFORD SURPRISED.

Brentford are so rarely defeated on their own ground that Millwall's performance of capturing two goals without response must be treated as an exceptionally meritorious piece of work. The visiting forwards were a source of continuous anxiety to the home defence, which was sorely troubled to stay the raids of Twigg and his confreres. Another side to do well was New Brompton who considerably astonished Norwich by effecting a draw on the latter's ground. The visitors, led by the odd goal in three until the closing fifteen minutes when Wood allayed the anxieties of the spectators by equalising. Southampton are unfortunately experiencing trouble with several of their players, and in these circumstances did well to draw with Watford, who are one of the surprises of the season. A similar result came from the meeting of Swindon and Plymouth Argyle, and the latter are finding points very difficult to gather. Plymouth are but a shadow of their former strength, and are in financial difficulties, but a movement is afoot to remedy both these troubles, and there is every probability of their being as strong as ever next September. The remaining games call for no particular comment. Bristol Rovers were confidently expected to account for Queen's Park Rangers at Stapleton-road, and did so by three goals to one ; Crystal Palace just scrambled home against Leyton by a solitary goal ; and West Ham, always difficult to score against at Boleyn Castle, sent Reading away with a

WILKINSON'S SAFETY RAZORS.

A Safety Razor which all users pronounce perfect.

The high reputation enjoyed by the Wilkinson Sword Company is sufficient guarantee that the quality of this shaver is of the highest grade.

It differs from other shavers, because instead of the old fashioned fence or comb protecting the face from the cutting edge, and which has always been the great objection to Safety Razors, a deep cut helical roller has been substituted. As this rolls, the lather and hair pass between the projecting screw threads and all parts of the cutting edge are brought into action. This gives even wear along the whole cutting edge and feeds the lather on to it.

NEWCASTLE GOING STRONG.

Unless something quite out of the ordinary occurs, Newcastle are booked for the championship of League I. So well have Bristol City disported themselves on opponents' grounds that it was not long odds against their succeeding at St. James' Park, but for once in a way the City could not manage to score, and were beaten pointless. A tally of three goals proves that the Newcastle men are leaving no stone unturned to realise ambitions, and with a comfortable lead of six points they are not now likely to be headed. They have, of course, taken part in two more games than their nearest attendants, Everton, who ran round Sunderland to the tune of four goals to one, but the Mersey team have the Cup final in prospect, and With the blue riband of football to be fought for, the League must necessarily be of secondary importance. Anxious almost to the verge of desperation by reason of their lowly situation. Stoke made a supreme, effort at Sheffield to better their almost hopeless predicament, and what is more succeeded, wining, after a tame encounter, by a goal. Here again Cup tie considerations probably influenced the losers, for Wednesday were not fully represented, and there appears to have been a disposition to take matters easily until too late for recovery. Twin unfortunates in Derby County and Notts County were likewise doing everything humanly possible to avert the dreaded relegation to lower division football, and both met with partial success. Brilliant defence was the prime cause of the County snatching a point at Deepdale, Iremonger giving a marvellous exhibition. He was only beaten once, and on numerous occasions defied the Preston forwards single-handed. Derby were at home, and by drawing with Birmingham earned a valuable point. But they must do better than this in their remaining matches, or Notts County, who have fulfilled three engagements less and are only two points behind, are certain in the natural order of things to vacate the last place but one in the table to the Peak team.

POINTS FOR WOOLWICH.

With the cares produced by Cup ties now dissipated, Woolwich Arsenal are able to give undivided attention to their League programme, and although the championship is out of the question, the Southerners are certain to finish in the first flight. They picked up a very useful two points from Sheffield Wednesday in the first of their holiday engagements, and the visit of the famous Rovers from Blackburn to the Manor Field supplied a further opportunity for them to please their many thousands of supporters. Two very fine object lessons in full back work were given in this match, Crompton for Blackburn, and Sharp for Woolwich playing perfectly. One or two of the Arsenal forwards showed signs of staleness at one period, but they combined beautifully for the most part, and only masterly work by Crompton and Evans kept the scoring down to such moderate proportions as two goals to nothing. Bury could not afford to be beaten at home by Manchester United, for they are by no means out of the wood, and Middlesborough severely disappointed their followers by capitulating to Sheffield United at Ayrsome Park. Home defeats are never palatable, and as Middlesborough are but rarely humbled when possessing this undoubted advantage, the sting was all the more pronounced. The Aston Villa and Liverpool game, at Villa Park, started rather late, owing to the referee being delayed in transit to Birmingham, but a crowd of 30,000 strong were compensated for this by their favourites gaining a four to nil victory, and no doubt the players were extremely grateful for having the opportunity to operate with the thermometer indicating a more reasonable degree of heat. Appended is the League I table:—

A CHELSEA REVERSE.

The number of occasions on which the hopes of visiting teams have been buried at Barnsley must total to alarming proportions. This hard-working eleven, with little pretensions to class, simply refuses to acknowledge the right of palpably superior organisations to carry points away from the Yorkshire mining town, and in keeping with this trait Chelsea went through the mill on Saturday. There were no half-measures either. A three goals to one victory denotes that the visitors were beaten fore and aft, as indeed they were. Chelsea played their usual unemotional game, but the forwards were too fond of studying the exact spot to shoot from before letting drive, and Barnsley do not stand on ceremony. The winners gave a dashing display all through, and ran the Chelsea defence off its legs in the last twenty minutes. Through this, and by reason of an easy ninety minutes with Blackpool, Notts Forest go to the head of affairs, and as they have played 32 games only against Chelsea's 34 and are level on points, the Foresters are practically assured of the championship. West Bromwich, the only club likely to at all challenge Chelsea for the right to claim acquaintance with the senior division, drew at Chesterfield, very much to the relief of the Southerners, and allowing for the unexpected Chelsea need now have no qualms as to the future.

CLAPTON ORIENT'S POSITION.

It is just as well for the Orient that their out programme is completed. They wound up their last away engagement with another defeat, Burnley netting thrice without response. The Homerton team has now four games to play, against Chelsea, Leeds City, Barnsley, and Gainsborough Trinity, and although their position of eighteenth is far from satisfactory, yet there should be no idea of finishing in the last three if the men can shake together. Recently there has been quite a lack of combination between the front rank, but primarily the fault rests with the halves, who have been sadly remiss in attending to their wants. This defect remedied, and a higher plane in the table is bound to be attained; otherwise the undesirable may happen, for each of the matches to come are certain to be strenuously contested. Nothing out of the ordinary took place in the other matches, each resulting about as anticipated.

The Second Division table is as follows:—

AMATEUR CUP FINAL.

It is indeed satisfactory to be able to write of Clapton's success in the final for the amateur trophy. Stockton are more or less an unknown quantity in the South, and they were generally thought to be a much better team than proved to be the case. All things considered, a gate of 5,500, and receipts of £161, were very satisfactory and as a fine vigorous game was served up at Stamford Bridge, few can have regretted attending. Stockton had a large contingent of supporters to cheer them on, and so evenly were the teams matched in the first half that the interval arrived without either goalkeeper having allowed his defence to be pierced. A different state of affairs came into being afterwards, Clapton, improving while Stockton deteriorated, and amid much enthusiasm the Claptonians won the cup by two goals to one. Stockton were good in defence but the forwards were moderate. It was in this department that Clapton were so much superior, Clyde Purnell and Harvey playing especially good football.

ENGLAND vs. HOLLAND.—England has conquered Holland! On this occasion it was a struggle for supremacy on the football field, and the country which has made football so important a part of the every-day concerns of life won the first International encounter in which it engaged with the Netherlands. The game was decided on Easter Monday afternoon at The Hague, and the charming Dutch capital, where Queen Wilhelmina holds Court, and reigns in the affections and goodwill of her industrious and contented subjects, was immensely excited over the event. It is customary, and perhaps it is much nearer the truth than many accepted definitions of the principal characteristic of a people, to speak and write of the Dutch as a phlegmatic race. There was not much stolidity or self-repression on Monday afternoon on the ground of the Haagsche Voetbal Vereeniging, where the contest between the two countries was waged. Football is not something new to the peace-loving, prosperous people of the Netherlands. It has been played there for many years, and several of the clubs are strong enough to meet with equal chance of success many good-class amateur sides in our tight little island.

The English team entered the field to the strains of the British National Anthem and having undergone the ordeal of photography by a small army of photographers, professional and otherwise, the game was started in blazing sunshine, the home country having the assistance during the opening half of a breeze that had some effect on the ball, especially when it was ballooned, and it also tempered, the heat. The opening exchanges were vigorous, so far as Holland were concerned, and if energy and determination were the only necessary factors to command success the Netherlands would soon have placed the issue beyond doubt. They were soon taught the value of well-nigh perfect combination. The English halves were as cool and brainy as could be wished, gave their forwards plenty of well-judged passes, and there were some sweeping movements on the Hague goal. Hardman, Woodward, and Bell rammed home shots like cannon balls, but Holland has not anything to learn in the art of goal-keeping, Beeuwkes fisting out again and again in a style that would have enhanced the reputation of Asheroft or Hardy. He had a very warm time indeed of it, but he showed infinite resource when his backs were beaten. This often happened, especially on the English left, where Bell and Hardman worked together like the parts of well oiled, perfectly fitted machinery. It was inevitable, however, that the net should be found under such a hot fusilade, and when ten minutes had elapsed the Everton representative slipped away, crossed the ball like a flash past the goalmouth, where Raine was in waiting, and he quietly sent on to Mansfield who scored with a tremendous shot.

Then Holland had a turn, Van der Vinne showing a fine turn of speed when he was able to elude the vigilance of Foster, but Corbett and Timmis were masters of the situation, although more than once long-range efforts appeared likely to prove troublesome. The English halves were in great form, and Hawkes appeared to be a favourite, for he showed consummate cleverness, did as much attacking as a forward, and shot as often as any of the men in front of him.

The second goal did not materialise until twenty-five minutes had elapsed, and it came about in a delightfully simple way. Hardman received the ball after Hawkes had indulged in some solo work, and the out-side-left centred to Woodward, who drew the defence, and then placed the ball for Bell to break through and place in the net—as neat a goal as could be wished, and bearing the stamp of perfect football.

These reverses did not discourage Holland, who restarted with refreshing vigour, and in double quick time they were hovering round Rowlandson, who caught a smashing shot from Van Beek. The next minute they came down on the left, Van der Vinne swung across a centre, and Blume, who was only a couple of yards from the goal-line, headed into the net. What a shout went up, and the home team thoroughly deserved the applause bestowed upon them, for the goal was well worked for, and there was not a semblance of a fluke about it.

There was no further opportunity for the Netherlands in the first half, for the visitors took things into their own hands, and in the course of a few minutes the home country had lost the game beyond recall. Woodward was the immediate agent who was responsible for England's third goal, a brilliant over-head kick taking Keyning so much by surprise that he assisted the ball into the net, while a minute later Hawkes pushed the ball on to Hardman, who ran half the length of the field, eluded the defence, and beat Beeuwkes from close quarters. The scoring in the first half was concluded by Hawkes, who got in a long daisy-cutter, the pace of which beat Beeuwkes, and England crossed over with the following advantage:—

There were not so many goals in the second half, but the English team gave an exhibition of passing which delighted the onlookers. They did not, however, do exactly as they pleased because the Netherlands were always hard at work, and had they had the reward to which they were entitled, they would have beaten Rowlandson on a couple of occasions. They would have been justified in growling at the scurvy trick which Dame Fortune played them when Blume sent in a shot which seemed bound to find its billet, and the referee was ready to blow his whistle, but the ball struck the upright and rebounded into play to the accompaniment of a chorus of expressions of disappointment.

The English were more fortunate. Providence was again on the side of the big battalions, although lest a misconception should arise, it were well to state that the visitors really had no more than they were entitled to on the run of the play. Twenty minutes of the second half had become identified with the infinite azure of the past before Beeuwkes was beaten, and the irrepressible Hardman was responsible for the point. He got in one of his perfect centres, and it was turned into the net by a member of the home side. Two minutes later the Evertonian waltzed off again and dropping the ball well in front of Raine, who had gone inside right as Mansfield was limping, crashed the ball into the net. Another two minutes elapsed, and the eighth and last goal was scored for England by Mansfield, after brilliant work by Foster.

From this point England slackened a bit, and the Netherlands were not slow to perceive it, and endeavour to take advantage of it. It was, however, a case of thus far but no farther, Timmis or Corbett interposed at the psychological moment, or else Rowlandson came to the rescue with his safe pair of hands and the clever manner in which he always placed the ball to an Englishman was duly noted and applauded by the crowd. The closing ten minutes were fairly even, the Netherlands making heroic efforts to reduce the balance against them, and the English forwards, led by Woodward, indulging in some dazzling combined movements. The shooting was erratic at both ends, and there being no more scoring, the game ended:—

BILLIARDS.

The cradle cannon fever from which we have been suffering more or less for a week or two back reached its climax last week, when by its aid two breaks of over 6,000 were compiled in places so widely apart as London and Southport. Any attempt to give a description of the mammoth breaks compiled by Dawson and Reece must of necessity prove lacking in colour and quite without feature. There is realy so little to tell and what little there is concerns itself with the effect of the stroke on the billiard going public. Popular to begin with, because of its novelty, and the means by which breaks of hitherto undreamt-of magnitude could be compiled, it has, so far as London is concerned, at any rate, already almost outlived its popularity. This is not to be wondered at, when one remembers that for sheer monotony it is impossible to find its equal on a billiard table. The preliminary manœuvring which leads up to the now famous position is certainly interesting and very clever, but the continual tap-tap-tap on the first object ball, and the marker's voice calling out "Two," "Four," "Six," and so on, as each stroke is made is almost sufficient to drive anyone into a lunatic asylum.

FEATS OF ENDURANCE.

As feats of endurance the efforts of Dawson and Reece were certainly remarkable, but as a feat of skill neither effort is to be compared, say, with the same player's 742 and 627 compiled earlier in the season at Thurston's and Burroughes and Watt's respectively. To anyone who saw or read of all these performances, this fact is so evident that it would be worse than useless to pursue the point further. We can find more interest in comparing the merits of the latest astounding breaks, and in this connection all unbiased critics will unhesitatingly award the palm to C. Dawson, inasmuch as he was rightly or wrongly looked upon as somewhat lacking in the extreme delicacy of touch necessary for the exploitation of the latest in the way of "freak" strokes. Presumably Dawson had little or no practice with the stroke yet here we have him recording the marvellous break of 6,245 the first time he seriously set himself to play it in public. After all it is scarcely surprising that the brilliant little Yorkshireman should confound his critics in this manner when one remembers that to a brilliant artist such as he undoubtedly is, all things on a billiard table are possible. Again, where will you find his equal for grit and determination when once he sets his mind on anything? There can be no gainsaying the fact that Dawson was all out for the world's record. That he secured it is only another testimony to the skill, grit, and determination he possesses, and to which I have already referred. The race for the honour between himself and Reece added spice and interest to what must otherwise have been the most monotonous experience ever undergone by the Huddersfielder, to say nothing of those looking on.

BREAKS NEW AND OLD.

In view of the widespread interest created by the marvellous breaks compiled by means of the cradle cannon, I feel certain the appended list of breaks compiled by its aid since Lovejoy first introduced it into match play will be read with interest. Here they are:—

6,245 (unfinished), by C. Dawson (world's record under B.A. rules), March 26—30.

6,138 (unfinished), by T. Reece (under B.A. rules), March 26—30.

By Royal Warrant to His Majesty The King.

BOVRIL

is guaranteed the product of the finest Ox Beef.

A small quantity of BOVRIL added to Soups, Curries, Stews, &c. increases their nutritive value and improves their flavour.

4,593 (unfinished), by T. Reece (under Reece's rules), March 20—23.
2,257 (unfinished), by W. A. Lovejoy (under B.A. rules), March 22 and 23.
1,825, by T. Reece (under B.A. rules), March 5.
1,269, by T. Reece (under B.A. rules), March 13 and 14.
1,211, by W. A. Lovejoy (under B.A. rules), March 22 and 23.
800, by C. Dawson (under R.W. rules), March 25.
604, by W.A. Lovejoy, under R.W. rules, March 13 and 14.
603, by W. A. Lovejoy (under B.A. rules), Jan. 18 and 19.

For the purposes of comparison, breaks made in past years under varying conditions will form a set-off to the wonderful cradle cannon breaks, and prove a source of interesting study and discussion.

3,304 by W. J. Peall (under all in rules), Nov. 4, 5, and 6, 1890.
2,539, by Frank C. Ives (under spot barred rules), June 1 and 2, 1893.
1,467, by Tom Taylor (under spot barred rules), April 24, 1891.
1,392, by John Roberts (under spot barred rules), May 3, and 4, 1894.
821, by John Roberts (under present B.A. rules), Jan. 24, 1905.
802, by H. W. Stevenson (under present B.A. rules), Feb. 16, 1905.
748, by C. Dawson (under Rimington-Wilson rules), Feb. 22, 1906.

These performances, however, lag considerably behind the marvellous sequence of 7,156 cannons (each cannon counting one point) set up by Hugo Kerkau, the German champion, at Zurich, in 1901. It is interesting to recall that Kerkau kept possession of the table for five days, during which period his partner did not have a stroke, and that the balls—Bonzoline, by the way—were not jambed in any way. Kerkau having to go round and round the table throughout the whole run.

A World's Record.

The honour of being the world's record holder under Billiard Association Rules now belongs to Charles Dawson, of Huddersfield. Since Tuesday afternoon the Yorkshireman's one ambition has been to place himself above all the cradle stroke exponents. Practically for the first time Dawson has come out of his shell in exploiting the stroke, and he has proved that he holds the key to the situation.

Commencing on Tuesday afternoon, he held possession of the table until Saturday night, during which time he scored a break of 6,245 (unfinished). Every stroke from the commencement was made by cannon play, the odd point taking him to 8,001. Thirteen of these cannons were gained during his successful endeavour to secure the cradle position, and the remainder by the now famous stroke.

When play commenced on Saturday afternoon the scores stood:—Dawson, 6,401; Lovejoy, 3,152. Dawson scored his 800 points in 19 min. 40 sec., the interval scores being:—

Dawson	(in play)	...	...	7,200
Lovejoy	(rec. 2,500)	...	...	3,152

At night Dawson ran to game in 19min. 37secs. His full break amounted to 6,245. He received a great ovation from the spectators at the Albany Rooms, Southport, at the close. Lovejoy had not had a stroke since 3-20 on Tuesday afternoon last Closing scores:—

Dawson	(6,245 unfinished)	...	...	8,000

SWIMMING.

Proposed International Relay Race.—We have not yet arrived at that period of the year (writes our Paris correspondent) when numerous candidates for the cross-Channel swim are attracting public attention by endeavouring to repeat Captain Webb's famous and unique exploit. Bearing in mind, however, the many futile though courageous and desperate attempts that have been made of late years, no small amount of interest will be taken in the announcement, just made by M. Desgrange, Editor of the Auto (Paris), that he will select three of the best French long-distance swimmers, who will essay, to swim the Channel this year on the relay system.

The method to be adopted is quite simple. The first swimmer will remain in the water until, owing to exhaustion or inability to make headway against the currents, he is compelled to abandon the attempt, whereupon the second will take his place. The latter will be relieved by the third swimmer, if necessary, in like manner. A condition of the swim is that a swimmer once having abandoned the attempt shall not return to the water.

An International challenge accompanies the announcement of M. Desgrange's proposal. These three French swimmers (whose names are not given) are prepared to meet the best trios of other nations in the attempt. Italy is almost certain to join in the fray, and it would seem strange were England to abstain. Further details will appear later.

Mixed Double Sculls.

Won by Mr., Mrs. and Miss Lloyd in the dark, after a closed and exciting race.

Mariners' Message Race.

The conditions were:—"Double Sculling tubs, crews of three, prize to lady cox. Entries limited to five boats. Start at green flags. Soon after starting-gun 5 bottles painted white (one for each boat will appear across the water about 50 yards from starting line. The competitor that picks up a bottle and passes the nearest yellow flag first wins. The bottles will all be in one direction, but whether up or down the river is not known." Much mystery and amusement resulted and in the end the race was won by Messrs. Moor and Ogden, coxed by Miss Boyson.

Football.

A NEW INDIAN FOOTBALL ASSOCIATION.

It is generally admitted by all the senior football clubs of good repute in Calcutta that the time has now come for the reconstitution of the I. F. A. on a sounder basis, and that this can only be effected by a process of elimination remarks The Journal. How this may best be carried into effect is of course a subject for due deliberation. That it is necessary admits of no discussion whatever. The experiences of recent years have proved conclusively that, as at present constituted, the Indian Football Association is so heavily handicapped as to be practically incompetent. Decisions of the Council—where the European element predominates can be set aside by the simple calling of a Special General Meeting where the Indian element, as shown above, must always predominate. Such a state of affairs inevitably accentuates racial prejudice and ill-feeling between clubs, and leads to open manifestation of these feelings on the field of play, not infrequently resulting in free fights and other highly undesirable incidents. Last season there was an affray on the Sova Bazar Football club ground so serious as to necessitate the interference of a mounted constable. Even as I write, I have in my possession a letter from the Commissioner of Police calling attention to a fight between two hockey players on the 16th instant. These are only two instances of many which will recur to those who are in the habit of frequenting the various football grounds on the maidan. A rot has set in and it must be subjected to the severest antiseptic treatment without delay, if local "socker" is to be preserved to Calcutta as a sport and not as a pot-house brawl.

* * * * *

The circumstances seem to demand such urgent attention that a few suggestions as to the personnel of a reconstituted I.F.A. may not be out of place. First and foremost the Association should be restricted solely to such clubs as are in the possession of football grounds measuring at least 100 yards by 80. Only the rightful lessees of these grounds should be admitted to affiliation and co-sharers should be excluded. Before accepting the affiliation of such clubs, it should be the Council's duty to satisfy itself that these grounds can be satisfactorily enclosed so as to keep spectators at least 10 feet from the touch lines and goal lines and referees should not be permitted to commence any match until they had seen these requirements observed. Every affiliated club should be required to appoint two members whose duties would be to walk up and down the lines throughout the duration of the match and see that order was kept amongst spectators, and that a space of 10 feet was kept between the front row of spectators and the touch line all round the ground. Dalhousie, Calcutta and Rangers have shown that this can be done with a little care. It should be made imperative in the case of all affiliated clubs.

This restriction would reduce the number of affiliated clubs to about twenty—quite sufficient for all purposes of administration. These twenty clubs should be required to pay an affiliation fee of Rs. 30 each per annum which fee would entitle each club to one vote. The Council might remain as at present. As regards the various competitions, governed by the I.F.A. it would be obviously unfair to exclude clubs from competing because they do not possess grounds. Therefore let the entry fees for these competitions include affiliation but without representation, that is to say, the entry fee of Rs. 5 for the Trades Cup, for instance, sent in by a club which possessed no football ground of its own should be taken to render that club subject to all I. F. A. rules and regulations but would not entitle it to a vote.

As regards the numberless other competitions which are not at present governed by the I.F.A. a Junior Association should be formed to govern them, which should be quite independent of and distinct from the I.F.A.

With twenty football clubs of proved respectability, the Indian Football Association would command some respect and would be able to govern local football with authority and promptitude. At present it does neither. It is an unwieldy body of heterogeneous constituencies, and it incurs abuse for what is not its fault but its misfortune.

THE INDIAN FOOTBALL ASSOCIATION.

IS IT COMPETENT?

Times have changed greatly since the inception of the Indian Football Association nearly fourteen years ago, but greater still has been the change in the conditions of Association Football as played in Calcutta. Recent years have witnessed the gradual adoption of the game by the Bengali baboo until to-day we find native football clubs and teams nigh as thick as leaves in Vallombrosa. And year by year the pots, pans, pewters and shields grow in numbers, awaiting the ever-ready pursuit of the "filimentous" dhoti-clad baboo, bare of foot, fleet and funky, and, withal, the most unsporting thing that the good God ever put on this earth. Four years now have I watched the baboo on the football field. I have seen him tackle, head, dribble, dodge and shoot goals. I have seen him fight, kick, foul and trip. I have seen him downcast with defeat and swollen with victory and phosphozone. I have whistled long blasts until a mounted constable chased him off the ground. But I have never yet understood his football. It is, to me, a species of game which might, with equal facility and satisfaction, be played in the Small Cause Court with a formidable array of pleaders engaged for either side and the Worshipful Judge as referee. Litigious to a degree, obstinate, argumentative and quarrelsome, the baboo makes of football a mirror wherein are reflected all his worst traits. And for Rs. 10 per annum he has the privilege of driving to the verge of distraction and premature obsequies a long-suffering, much-abused body known as the Council of the Indian Football Association.

Some few weeks ago, I chanced to be in conversation with one who was an I. F. A. Council Member in 1897, and, remarking on the increasing frequency of disputes and protests amongst native football clubs, asked him how these matters were dealt with in those far off halcyon days when swadeshi was not to be found in Bengali text-books and the Barisal guns were phenomena entirely unconnected with military police. "Oh," said he, "when any fellow bucked too much we simply ruled him out of order!" And I breathed a silent prayer to heaven for a return of those dear simple days when a baboo could be made to stop talking by ruling him out of order.

Kipling sings about "killing" Kruger with your mouth." This is precisely what the baboo is doing to Calcutta football, and if the I. F. A. does not come to the rescue soon, it will be all U. P. with decent "soccer" in these parts. The question arises,—how is the I. A. F. to tackle the matter? How is it to enforce orderly play instead of the brawling that is getting so common? How is it to take the baboo in hand and teach him what football really is? At present, it is obviously unfitted for the task, composed as it is so largely of just that element which has reduced the game to a pot hunting quarrel where the losing team will protest if it can borrow twenty rupees. The Biblical answer seems to fit the question with some precision and I give it in all confidence that it is the right one. "First cast out the mote that is in thine own eye!" In the case of the I. F. A., this is no simple operation with the moistened corner of a handkerchief; but rather a serious surgical operation not to be completed without much gnashing of teeth. Plainly speaking, it is the European, Eurasian and better class Indian clubs that must constitute themselves the doctors, and the case must be taken in hand at the earliest possible opportunity. Though, by the present rules of the I. F. A. this opportunity cannot arrive until the commencement of the 1908 season, the ensuing season should be taken advantage of by all old established football clubs, proud of their reputation and prowess, to proclaim and strengthen their position as the nucleus of a new governing body which is destined to work out the salvation of Association Football in Calcutta. Far too many clubs are permitted to affiliate themselves to the I. F. A. now-a-days. Worthless native teams which have no ground of their own to play on and no distinguishing colors to play in, send in a ten-rupee note to the I. F. A. Secretary and are then privileged to throw out, with their combined votes, a proposal which is supported by every European club in the city. Such a state of affairs is ridiculous, intolerable. The new I. F. A.—and a new I. F. A. is admittedly inevitable after what happened at the Annual General Meeting on the 16th instant,—must be restricted to a limited number of clubs, conveniently twenty, each of which should pay an annual affiliation fee of Rs. 50.

The following clubs, or a plebiscite, would certainly fill the twenty vacancies:—

1. Calcutta F. C.
2. Dalhousie F. C.
3. Rangers F. C.
4. Howrah United F. C.
5. Caledonia F. C.
6. Y. M. C. A. F. C.
7. Fort William Regimental Team
8. Dum-Dum " "
9. Hornets F. C.
10. Customs F. C.
11. Sibpur College F. C.
12. St. Xavier's F. C.
13. Medical College F. C.
14. Sova Bazar F. C.
15. Mohan Bagan F. C.
16. Mahomedan Sporting F. C.
17. National Association F. C.
18. Mesmerr's F. C.
19. Phœnix F. C.
20. Calcutta Free School F. C.

In this list will be found four honourable exceptions to my indictment of the baboo players. They are Sova Bazar, Mohan Bagan, Mahomedan Sporting and National Association, all good native clubs which have been competing in I. F. A. governed tournaments ever since the early nineties. With twenty good clubs like this and a council of twelve from the best of them, the I. F. A. would be on infinitely better terms both with itself and with all other clubs. Competitions governed by the I. F. A. would still be open to outside teams, entry fees, in their case, being taken to include non-representative affiliation for the time being and thereby rendering them subject to all I. F. A. Rules and Regulations. The European clubs are now beginning to apprehend the danger which must arise from conditions whereby the passing or rejecting of rules affecting the governance of football is absolutely at the discretion of the predominating native element, as it has so recently been proved to be, and, for their own sakes as well as for the sake of the sport, which is, after all, the main thing to be preserved, it is to be sincerely hoped that they will grapple with the danger at once and arise from the lethargy with which they have for so long regarded such actions of the I. F. A. as do not immediately concern themselves or their members. Meanwhile, to show what a pitch matters have come to it may be observed that the Commissioner of Police has issued warnings to several club authorities and Secretaries drawing attention to the frequency of disorderly conduct on the field of play! Which, in itself, constitutes an unmistakeable moral to my story!

GOLF IN THE BRITISH ISLES.

5th April 1907.

EVERY year Easter comes along with unfailing irregularity and makes an agreeable break in the monotony of the work-a-day world. Golfers, of course, ever ready to take advantage of public holidays, make plans for enjoying the only time in the year when two recognised Bank holidays follow quick on each other's footsters and when extraordinary facilities and reduction in fares are made by railway companies to enable tired workers to escape to the sea and country and enjoy the Great Vernal Festival. Pessimists this year were loud in their prophecies of a wet cold Easter, but these unpopular prognostigators of evil were entirely out in their calculations, for more beautiful weather has never and may be will never be experienced for a great number of years. Sun spots may have something to do with this and if so long may King Sol be spotted! All events naturally pale and sink into insignificance before the various important competitions and matches connected with Easter. Record attendance seems to have been the order of the day everywhere, the getting to and from the links been much facilitated by the ubiquitous motor-car, which although very popular with owners and fortunate occupants, was duly anathematised and held in abhorrence by pedestrians and cyclists on the dusty highways. With Easter practically the golf season opened, and all the well-known players' names figure conspicuously in the lists; for instance at the Royal St. George's Club at Sandwich great confusion was created by the two names of Hutchinson and Hutchison: for these Messrs Horace and Cecil respectively tied at 77 for the Cinque Ports Gold Medal played for from scratch. Mr. Hutchinson went out in 34 and came home in 43, whilst his rival without the "n" scored 35 and 42. There was a big muster at the Royal St. David's Club, Harlech and players from all over the country gathered there; the principal event was the King Edward VII Bowl Tournament for which very nearly 100 players sent in their names, and among those who qualified by score for the subsequent Match Play were Mr. G. P. Laughton, from Sunningdale, Mr. T. K. Dashwood (Shanklin), Mr. G. E. Godwin (Royal Liverpool), Lord Maidstone (Oxford University), etc., etc. At Littlestone more than a hundred golfers concentrated theirs efforts on the Gold Medal, the Scratch Medal and the Mayor's Bowl; the course was in fine order, and although the greens owing to the dry weather, were very fiery still low scoring was easy and Mr. F. L. K. Lewis and Mr. S. C. Wyatt's 82 should have been beaten for the scratch rewards. At Aberdovery, Felixstowe, Westward Ho! Scarborough big fields testified to the ever-increasing number of converts to, and popularity of, the game, but interesting as details and records of their skill are to those taking part one must not overlook the fact that to others who are less keen, less fortunate and less golfy the monopoly of the conversation by golfers, after their round, their talk savouring of stymies, lies, hazards and such incomprehensible jargon, the noble royal and ancient game is apt to become a nuisance, and stirring as are the Pascal Deeds others preceding these are of equal importance and a brief retrospect is pardonable, but before doing so I would fain draw attention to a very excellent ball, recently put in the market by the 'Improved Golf Ball Company" this is the "Jeellcore" presumably by reason that some gelatinous substance enters into its internal composition; anyhow whatever be the nature of its "innards the jeellcore" is an excellent ball; it flies beautifully when hit properly by a wooden or iron club, and does not lose its paint or shape, nor does it vascillate or bolt on the green in fact is docile, tractable and amenable to discipline. The makers claim that you can't crack or split it and also volunteer the information that it is "colloid-centred": anyhow it is worthy of a trial and may be obtained almost everywhere, but is manufactured by the Improved Golf Ball Company, Locksley Street, Limehouse, London, E. Before going back to prepascal doings just a few lines recounting the finish at the great golfing gatherings at Sandewick, the Sidwich Cup Tournament which was entered into with great gusto by all the members. In the semi-final round Mr. W. H. Lyall (13) and Mr. G. P. Leach (15) beat Mr. S. Mare-Fergusson (+4) and Mr. F. E. Speed (7) at the 19th hole after a most exciting contest; and Mr. W. H Bovill (scrached) and Mr. C. M. Smith (2) after being badly down up to the 8th hole pulled themselves together and qualified for the final by 2 up on Mr. A. E. R. Kennedy (scratched) and Mr. W. P Matthews (scrached). In the final the two L's (Lyall and Leach) won by 3 up and to go. At Harlech great and protracted were the competitions and many and much coveted were the trophies The Bogey Competitions was won by Mr. F. Carr with 1 up, another Bogey Round for the vice-Captain's Cup was tied for by Lord Maidstone and Mr. Donald Dawson, both being square to Bogey; then again Mr. Donald Davidson with 89-14-75 secured for ever and a day by virtue of two successive years wins the Corder Challenge Cup. A golfer from Fermoy secured the Cup presented by another Vice-President Mr. Rhys-Owen: this was Mr. J. A. Davenport, but the plum of the meeting was won by Lord Maidstone; this was the Scratch Aggregate Gold Medal. Rather an interesting two has been personally conducted by Mr. W. P. Snooks: of Nottingham players, in East Lothian one of their matches was against a team representing the Scottish Universities Golfing Society and the contest took place at Muirfield. In the morning singles were played and in these the English visitors were successful by 6 matches to 4, but in the afternoon in the 4-ball Foursomes the Scotchmen won by 3 points to 1 thus bringing the days results to a tie.

In the meantime the "London Amateur Foursome Competition" though temporarily put a stop to by Easter, dispersing and scattering the players, has reached the final stages, and the semi-finals will be contested by Fulwell vs South Herts At Walton Heath; Richmond vs Woking at Byfleet. One of the best matches in the third heat was between South Herts and Walton Heath by played at Woking. It is never wise to draw foregone conclusions nor indeed to prophesy at all about the result of a golf match, and this was a case in point, for on paper and in the clubs the Walton Heath pair certainly would be spotted as winners, the representatives, Messrs. O. C. Bevan and Spencer Pollan, having a decidedly bigger reputation than Messrs. Allan, Lincoln and W. H. Scarborough, who represented South Herts. At the end of 18 holes the game was all square, but in the second round, the ultimate winner went off at a tangent, and though the Walton Heathens made strenuous efforts they never succeeded in getting the lead and the match was won by 2 and 1. Again in the match between Richmond and Mid-Surrey the least fancied pairs were the winners. Messrs. S. H. Fry and I. H Worthington have reputations enough to terrify most opponents, but the Sudbrook Park choice of Messrs. J. F. Abercromby and H. E. Taylor was fully justified when after a terrific fight they pulled through into the semi-finals by 1 hole up. An easy victory in this same heat was won by Woking over the two players of the Royal Ashdown Forest Club; this too was fought out on the very popular Walton Heath Course, but the Woking Club had the advantage of a very powerful combination in the coupled strength of Messrs. F. H. Mitchell and B. Darwin, and although only 1 up in the first 18 holes they so far increased this advantage in the second round that they won by 6 up and 5 to go. Another genuine surprise was the fourth match, that between Fulwell and Sunningdale at Byfleet when Messrs. Eden, Gawne and W. T. Finnis of Fulwell were 3 up and 2 to play on Messrs. H. S. Colt and C. C. Lingen. The semi-finals of this Tournament must be played before 8th April and the finals will take place in the following week; this is its first year and so far it has been an unqualified success. Let us hope that no unfortunate contre temps such as occurred to mar the harmony of the Professional Foursome Tournament in its final stages will occur among the amateurs.

THE BEIGHTON CUP.

FIRST ROUND.

E. I. R. vs. ST. XAVIER'S COLLEGE.—The Dalhousie ground was in excellent condition when this game was played on it. It was an even and fast game and very interesting in the second half, pretty exhibitions of attack and defence being given by both sides. The College team made two goals and the E. I. R. one in the first half, and by that margin the boys won, the second half being destitute of score. Teams :—

ST. XAVIERS.—Voyvodech, goal; Vaughan and Smith backs; Cameron, McGuire and Vanspall, half-backs; Cox, Manuel, Owens, Smith and Newton, forwards.

E. I. R.—Palmer, goal; A. Smith and Linton, backs; Ginder, Burgess and Hart, half-backs; J. Smith, Bowkett, W. Smith, B. Young and Knight forwards.

Referees:—A. S. Apcar and C. Patterson.

WANDERERS vs. CALEDONIANS.—It was expected that the Caledonians would win this rather easily, consequently their supporters were somewhat staggered to find they could only make a one goal draw of it. The Caledonians were quite off their usual game, indeed both sides played erratically. At the second attempt, on Monday, the Caledonians won by three goals to nil.

MOHUN BAGAN vs. LA MARTINIERE.—The school-boys proved themselves superior to their opponents in every respect and after doing pretty much as they liked and withal taking matters easily they won by two goals to nil.

CALCUTTA POLICE vs. HOWRAH SPORTING.—A draw of one goal all, both put in during the second half. A second attempt also produced no definite result, though the game was amusing.

UNITED SERVICES vs. NATTORE.—This was another draw, the score standing at two goals each: an uninteresting and unscientific display. The replay found both teams in infinitely better form and, after a fast and good game, the U. S. won by three goals to nil. Teams.—

UNITED SERVICE.—White, goal; Platt and Captain Hogg, backs; Captain Hart, Lieutenants Selby and Waterworth, half-backs; Landon, Hill, Lyde, Peyton and Kalberer, forwards.

NATTORE.—S. Dey, goal; Joseph and R. Chuckerbutty, backs; J. Bannerjee, M. Roy and Bagchi (jr.), half-backs; Bholah, K. Roy, J. Bagchi, (sr.), and P. Sen, forwards.

ROVERS vs. H. L. I.—This was by no means an uninteresting game. The Rovers were strong in attack; but they were met with a really fine defence and so the score was but two to nil in favour of the Rovers. The soldiers' attack lacked sting and combination, as a rule. Teams :—

H. L. I.—Murray, goal; Henderson and Shrubshell, backs; Welch, Allen, and McCluskie, half-back; Sim, Cuthbert, Taite Wade, and Duncan, forwards.

ROVERS.—Ghose, goal; Chatterjee and Sircar, backs; Bose Joseph, and A. Sukul, half-backs; Peter, Nathaniel, Berkmann Chittoo, and B. Sukul, forwards.

Referees:—Messrs Studd and Simson (C.F.C.)

HORNETS vs. SIBPUR.—The first attempt to decide this tie was made on Saturday on the Rangers' ground when a big crowd witnessed a hard fought-game which ended in a draw. The Sibpur-men set about their work with tremendous vim and had the best of the first half, the interval finding them with a lead of two goals to nothing. In the second half the Hornets bucked up well and, amidst quite an enthusiastic demonstration, drew level just before the call of time. Darkness prevented the playing of extra time, so they met again on Tuesday. At the second time of asking there was no mistake about it. The Hornets, exhibiting a grim determination to win, played a really first-class game and, after Sibpur's initial attack had been repulsed, they settled down to tactics which were for the most part offensive and ran out winners by four goals to two. Teams:—

SIBPUR.—Seth, goal; Patterson and McGrath, backs; Robb, Milchem and Street, half-backs; Murphy, Haupt, S. Lawton, Skempton and Payne, forwards.

HORNETS.—Simon, goal; Yakchee and E. Russell, backs; Cooper, A. B. Rosser and Simmons, half-backs; Catchick, L. Rosser, Apcar, Hoff and G. Russell, forwards.

CALCUTTA vs. BARRACKPORE.—Played on the C.F.C. ground on Saturday and a perfect picnic for the home team who won by seven goals to one.

RANGERS vs. CUSTOMS.—A tolerably comfortable win for the Rangers who made two goals to their opponents' one. But the Customs have been known to play much better than on this occasion; their wild shooting practically lost them the match.

DALHOUSIE vs. TOWN CLUB.—Of course the Dalhousie men beat the Town Club, even though (owing to Jackson being injured) they played only ten men most of the time. Their margin of victory was one goal to nil

MEDICAL COLLEGE vs. Y. M. C. A.—Played on the Y. M.'s ground on Saturday, the Collegians winning by three goals to nil.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

THE championship of the League has at last been definitely settled and the Commitee at a General Meeting have decided that Dalhousie should be awarded the points for their engagement with Sibpur. It would be difficult to see how they could have come to any other decision with the facts of the case before them. Sibpur College entered for a tournament at Allahabad, which they knew clashed with the Calcutta League, and as they decided to compete in the former cannot expect to eat their cake and still have it.

Whatever may be said on the subject, as to both Calcutta and Dalhousie claiming the points, owing to the college failing to play on the dates specified, they were perfectly entitled to them, and I am in a position to say, that had the course of procedure in requesting the postponement of one of these games been carried out in a different manner to that done at least one of the clubs concerned would have given it serious consideration. It has been said in favour of some of the clubs that they were "sporting" enough to give the collegians an opportunity of gaining the points, but it also must be borne in mind that neither of the so-called sporting clubs had anything to lose by it, and in fact the play in one match in particular gave one the impression that the college opponents had only one object in view, and that was to give Sibpur every opportunity of bettering their goal average.

The decision of the League Committee will, however, in any case tend to show competing teams, that the League is not a thing to be trifled with and it may be necessary for them in future to allow no postponements without their sanction, and only under very exceptional circumstances.

THAT Calcutta deserve the Championship there can be little doubt, for out of 15 games only one has been lost and one drawn. The team has played very consistently throughout the season. The Carnobis Challenge Cup, I understand, is the only hockey trophy of which the Club can boast, and it should act as an incentive to greater deeds in the future. I shall make no invidious distinction in the personnel of the team, but congratulations to them as a whole, and to McCaw, the Captain, in particular on a splendid achievement.

THE first round of the Beighton Cup has not been without its customary drawn games and in no less than 3 of the 10 games played, could any definite result be arrived at.

To commence with the United Services drew with Nattore the score being two goals all, after the Services had by far the bigger share of the game.

Hill and Lyde at forward did splendidly, the former being credited with both goals scored by his side, and rattling good shots they were too.

Selby at centre half and Platt at back were the minstay of the defence, the former displaying great judgment in getting the ball out to his forwards, while Platt saved many a dangerous rush by judicious tackling.

The Services cannot be said to be nearly as strong as in the days of Gardiner, Collins, Arundel, Wilson and Le Fleming, but still they make up in kenness and combination what they lack in individual brilliancy. It was a pity Major Rimington did not assist his side, as he would have been a tower of strength either at half or back. None know the game better than the Major, and few there are who can show him the way to play it.

In the replay on Monday last the U. S. won by 8 goals to nil, and were the winning side all through. Hill was again responsible for two of the goals, while Lyde added the third.

The Nattore team are full of dash, but have yet a lot to learn; the centre forward and left full back being the most useful men in the team.

CALEDONIA at the second attempt accounted for the Wanderers by three goals to nil. Neither of the games were of a high standard of excellence and from the form displayed by Caledonia it would be difficult to imagine how they ever attained second place in our league. The Wanderers appear to be a side composed of young hopefuls from the Railways and Government employ, and have evidently not played together often, as there was a marked lack of combination. The centre half was about the most useful man on the side, but the team as a whole are of a talkative disposition, and have a strong aversion to shutting up.

ONE has not seen or heard much of La Martiniere this season, but their display against Mohan Bagan was rather an eye opener to many. The team is splendidly balanced, and were all over their opponents from start to finish. The side is composed of comparative youngsters, and when they attain a little more weight and nerve will take all the beating any local team can give them. Cody at centre forward, the centre half and the two backs are the bright particular stars in a team of youthful aspirants to hockey fame.

Mohan Bagan on the other hand gave a sorry display and even the mighty Bose could not stem the tide of disaster.

The Tommies played hard but lacked science and speed, and without these qualities could not expect to be successful.

Allen the "footer" player did well at centre half and the right full back was quite an average player; and couldn't he hit it! but the man to be congratulated on the result is the goal-keeper. He was as good as Edmondson of the Royal Irish at his best, and saved extremely difficult shots time and again. He did not look so imposing as the giant of the Rifles, but then, that was hardly his fault, and so long as he kept his goal intact, it was all that was required of him.

The Rovers played good hockey and the forwards combined well. The centre and left half are good, but why don't they drop the right half: he is no "earthly" and never gives his forwards an opportunity. The centre and right wing forwards, all Ranchi boys, gave an excellent display of dribbling and passing, and one had only to look at these three chokras to form some idea of what an entire eleven, such as they are capable of doing. We have seen what Ranchi can do, and it is any odds on their retaining the Cup they so gallantly won last year.

DALHOUSIE are stale and nothing can go right with them. After their meritorious game with Calcutta, they have done nothing to merit applause, and their last display against the Town Club was any thing but a fine index of their capabilities earlier in the League. They won by the only goal scored in the match, but the margin of victory was not enough to flatter even their most ardent supporters.

The most unkindest cut of all, will be the loss of Jackson, who was rather seriously injured in the game mentioned. It is as badtluck on Jackson as it is on the team for which he has done yeoman service, and the sympathy of his club mates and admirers will be given him in no unstinted degree. Luckhurst, too, another good forward, is unable to play, and leaves for home shortly.

Dixon the old war horse of the club in this department of the game still plays as hard a game as ever and doesn't give up until he is absolutely cooked, and then Taffy Evans is always there to the rescue and with cheery countenance, clears the ball from the danger zone.

THE Rangers have accounted for the Customs by 2 goals to 1, Tripp of the B.-N. R. assisting his club once again.

The Medicals were 3 goals the better of the Y.M.C.A., but have lost both Boo and Dingavin, and it is difficult to see how without these two, they can go very much further.

CALCUTTA beat Barrackpore by 7 goals to 1 after a very one-sided game. It was after this match that the Carnobis challenge Cup was kindly presented by Miss Ross to McCaw the Captain of the C. F. C. team.

ST. XAVIER'S beat by E. I. R. by 2 goals to 1 after quite a good game, the latter team showing up better than was expected.

HORNETS vs. SIBPUR.—The first meeting of these teams was the game of the week and resulted after a somewhat sensational game in a draw of 2 goals all. Sibpur scoring twice in the first ten minutes and the Hornets equalising just in time.

The replay on Tuesday last resulted in a win for the Hornets by 4 goals to 2.

Sibpur again led off with a goal in the first 10 minutes, the result of a clinking shot by Skempton, and it looked any odds on the college again scoring, as a well directed shot by Haupt was turned off by hitting Russell on the goal.

From this stage, however, the Hornets pulled themselves together and scored three times before Sibpur could notch their second goal. L. Rosser and Catchick were the pick of the Hornets forwards and Skempton on the college side alone did himself justice.

No better goal keeping has been seen this season than the display given by Seth of Sibpur.

The Hornets now meet Calcutta next Saturday in the second round of the competition, and a great game should result.

CAREER OF A WORLD'S CHAMPION PUGILIST.

THERE are very few boxing enthusiasts who are not familiar with the name of Terry McGovern, of Johnstown, Pa., U.S.A. Although McGovern has never been seen in England, his fame has travelled, and it is sufficient to know that it was he who wrested the world's bantam-weight championship from Pedlar Palmer at Tuckahoe, on 12th September 1899, in almost record time, the fight lasting a mere matter of seconds. But McGovern, like many other great pugilists, has seen his day, and is now practically in a state of poverty and mentally weak. In eleven years he has run through a vast fortune, and now he is not worth a humble cent. McGovern, a few years ago, was one of the gamest bantam-weight fighters that ever lived, and in his eleven years' pugilistic career he defeated such men as Pinkey Evans, Casper Leon, Joe Bernstein, Sammy Kelly, Pedlar Palmer, Billy Retchford, George Dixon, Eddie Santry, Frank Erne, Joe Gans, Aurelio Herrera, and Tommy Murphy, the bulk of whom have battled for fistic honours in England.

"What has McGovern done with all his money?" is the question which is worrying New Yorkers at the present time. Sam Harris, McGovern's original manager, and Joe Humphreys, who managed the great little fighter during the last few years, have furnished, according to Mr. Bob Edgren, of the New York Evening World, facts and figures giving the true story of how Terry let thousands of dollars slip through his fingers. Messrs. Harris and Humphreys went through old accounts, covering ten years of McGovern's life, with the result that nothing could be more official and exact.

McGOVERN'S EARLY AMBITIONS.

McGovern's sole ambition, when he began his fighting career, seemed to be the uplifting of his family. He was a dutiful son, and his constant devotion to his old mother was one of the brightest lights that ever crept into the prize ring. As soon as he had looked out on the world beyond Brooklyn he realised that his humble family had not been so favoured with education and refined influences as had others, and he manfully started out to repair the difficulty. All Terry" early and disastrous expenditures were intended to help his family. The thousands of dollars he threw away on the race track were originally intended at the beginning of a plan to make his brother Phil a jockey, that he might also turn money into the family coffers. McGovern imagined that his brothers could do anything, and that all they needed was a start. He furnished the start, but the ending was always disastrous. When McGovern had made his first £1,000 he promptly invested £200 in a vegetable and green grocery store for his mother. This proved a failure. He then spent £220 in the purchase of a peddling outfit for his brothers Hughey and Phil. Here another failure was recorded.

Idol of the American Ring.

In the meantime Terry had become the idol of the ring, and riches were being showered upon him. Another £4,000 had come into his possession, and in his innocent way he started out to invest it where it would do the most good. He promptly purchased a house at a cost of £2,600, including the furnishings, that his wife might be comfortable and his children raised in the proper surroundings. His love for his wife was not so great, however, that he could forget his mother, and he purchased a house for her at a cost of £800. He then invested £500 in vacant lots on Avenue U and the Boulevard. These still stand in the name of the family, but they are so heavily mortgaged that redemption seems almost impossible. Money continued to roll in, and McGovern continued, to dispose of it. He invested £1,000 in a saloon in Brooklyn, which proved a total loss.

His "Club" and Racehorses.

Terry's next venture was the establishment of a social institution called the Terry McGovern Club. In this he invested £500, but as soon as his popularity waned his friends deserted him, and the clubrooms were left cold and bare. No one would pay dues, and the money invested was a total loss. He then entrusted £300 to the care of a friend, and the supposed friend decamped with the money and has never been seen since. He conceived the idea of making his brother a jockey, and the stories of his turf speculations filled the newspapers for weeks. To begin with, he purchased the horse Ocklawaha and selected purple and green for his racing colours. Following this he bought Cincinnatus, Saturday, One-eyed Connolly, and Spring Beauty. For these horses he paid £3,000 and engaged a coterie of trainers, jockeys, and stable boys, for which he paid £2,400 a year for two years. Having the utmost confidence in his judgment of racehorses, Terry bet on his entries, and lost in this way £4,000. He was a good thing for the bookmakers. His racing stable failed and Phillie did not become a jockey. The investment of £11,800 had proved a total loss.

The Horse.

SPEEDY CUTTING.

This is caused by the horse being unevenly balanced. Having more propelling power behind than in front—that is, the front feet not being able to get out of the way of the pass, the outside of the front foot strikes and wounds the inside of the shin bone in the hind leg, frequently causing much pain and soreness. It is termed "speedy cutting," from happening while the horse is in rapid action. It is an evident fact that all horses with bold, lofty knee action are not speedy cutters. Those, however, who travel with a low, gliding, forward movement are called "daisy cutters," and are proverbially afflicted with speedy cutting in rapid motion. To overcome this defect it is necessary to equalize the different actions of the parts by quickening that of the front and slowing that of the hind. This can be done only in shoeing.

As there are, however, but few trotting horses that can have their toes shortened, since it would have a tendency to make them double up or shorten their stride, I use for them a double rolling motion flat shoe, gradually thinning the shoe from quarters to heel, and from quarters to toe, with dropped crease on the outer quarters. Such a shoe will allow the front foot to land on its heels, roll over the toe more quickly, and get out of the way of the hind legs. If the front feet or tendons are sore, it would have a tendency to slow the front action of the horse in landing, as he fears to hit the ground. In such cases, shorten the toe of the front foot as much as safety will permit, examine the feet as well as the splint bones, for, if soreness is present, it will have a tendency to retard the action in front. If the horse is a long strider or dweller, apply the scoop-toed, rolling motion, or the plain rolling motion shoe, which, being rolled in front, will assist the horse in getting over the toe of the foot quickly and thus get out of the way of the other parts. In dressing the hind feet, lower the heels as much as safety will permit, keeping the front part of the toes at the natural angle, so as to have all the ground surface possible. Apply the shoe by placing long heel calkins at the side of the heels, or allowing the shoe to extend at least one-half inch longer than the heel of the foot, the down action of the flexor perforans will be lessened, and in a relative degree the quick-up action of the foot will also be lessened. The weight of the shoes to be worn must be determined accurately by the driver or proprietor. I have often shod this class of trotting horse, with front shoe weighing eleven ounces, and with hind shoe weighing fifteen ounces, before I could get them balanced and square in their gait.

Running horses are more liable to obtain speedy cuts than trotting horses; this is occasioned principally by the carrying of weight upon their backs, the weight being placed more directly on their front legs than on their hind ones. In plating running horses to overcome this difficulty, level and straighten the front feet, having the heels and frog of an even bearing when the feet are placed on the ground; shoe with thin three-quarter tips, beveling the outside of the plate from the ground to the sole-bearing surface, so as to obviate the possibility of the leg being cut by the shoe in passing. The punishment of speedy cutting is oftentimes so severe that the race is lost by the horse being unable to withstand it without his speed being retarded more or less.

THE MOST WONDERFUL OF ALL ANIMALS.

The most mysterious and the most misunderstood animal in existence is the mule.

The mule is not natural, but artificial. The zoo knows him not; neither, presumably, did the ark. He was not included in the scheme of creation, but is the invention of man. He is a mystery, standing midway between the horse and the ass, each of which has its own tribal characteristics. But the mule, instead of inheriting his traits from either or both of his parents, blossoms out as an individuality by himself.

Where does he get those traits from? Why is he so magnificent a mountaineer? Whence came his intelligence and common sense? Why does he combine with these two qualities his lack of nerves? Why, again, when he has his mother's coat, does half the attention produce an equal result? What makes him particular as to his drink?

How shall we account for his mental traits, which those that we know describe as docile, friendly and intelligent? A more willing beast never existed, and if he has equals he has few if any superiors in the matters of endurance and good-humoured philosophy.

The philosophic coolness with which a mule will stand, with all his four feet close together, perched on a pinnacle, and thence determining the next downward step, is a study of cheerfulness and sound sense under difficulties not easily paralleled. He never seems to want to turn back. He does not get frightened at prospective perils. He knows exactly what is wanted of him, and literally brings his mind to bear on each emergency as it comes up. It is at such times that one begins to see that the mule is not only a beast of burden but a strange and fascinating mystery.

It is as a mountaineer that the mule shines, but merely to mention his surefootedness is to go not nearly far enough. A mountain battery was taken out by the English army in Baluchistan for a big climb, and some of the problems the mules solved on that occasion were of a nature to make the hair stand on end. It was like climing a tree. The load carried is great, ranging from 260 to 360 pounds. The mountains of Baluchistan are particularly unpleasant as ground for marching over; the going is mainly over loose stones; there is no shade, practically no water, and one makes one's path as one goes along. During manœuvres some years ago a party of English soldiers started one morning before dawn and marched under such conditions, up and down, down and up, till about 3-30. The force thus pushed ahead was small when it started; it was smaller still when it came into action. But the guns were there. One mule only fell out. The mules of a mountain battery are provided with reliefs, but on this occasion there was not time to get the relief line up and change the loads. The mule that dropped out marched on hour after hour, mile, after mile, showing no slack, offering no complaint, and finally fainted away with the load on its back—fell down in a swoon like a girl.

The horse will gallop his heart out; he is uplifted by excitement. He may die between the shafts, but will he go on to such a pitch without an occasional persuader?

Physically speaking, the mule has the horse's coat, but will look extremely handsome with only half the amount of grooming. He is less troublesome about his food, but is nicer with regard to water. His foot is extremely hard; indeed, he can go perfectly well unshod. And most valuable of all, he is provided with an unfailing remedy for fatigue. Is your mule exhausted? Relieve him of his burdens and leave him alone. He will roll; for not only is a roll a magic recuperator for his flagging energies but a wise precaution of Providence. It is a practice of which he is fond. The deliberation with which he begins, the relish with which he employs each side in turn and then lies, deeply thinking, spread out perfectly flat and plainly concentrating his mind on the last great effort, the enthusiasm with which he tries to roll, clean over, and the air of satisfied triumph with which he gets up, having done so, are little less than exhilarating.

Theological blunders are sometimes peculiar. Two ladies were recently at a dinner party. The husband of one was dead, and the spouse of the other was in India. The wrong one leaned on the arm of a gentleman, who was leading her to the feast. She remarked that it was very hot. "Yes," he replied, hoping to make himself agreeable, "but not half so hot as the place to which your husband is gone." He discovered too late that he was talking to the lady whose husband was dead.

A fat American colonel is playing whist. His partner revokes.

The Colonel (after a yard or two of profanity): "I've shot a man in Texas for less than what you have done."

His Partner: "And eaten him, too, I should think."

Little Boy (loq.): "Oh, here's a lark! Father's fallen down and broken his leg, and I shall have only one boot to clean to-morrow!"

The Naturalist.

A COUPLE OF NEGLECTED CRAFTSMEN.

Two Indian birds have a world wide reputation. Every one has heard of the weaver bird (Ploceus baya) and the tailor bird (Orthotomus sutorius). Their wonderful nests are depicted in every popular treatise on ornithology. They are both master craftsmen and deserve their reputation. But there are in India birds who build similar nests whose very names are unknown to the great majority of Anglo-Indians. The Indian wren-wabler (Prinia inornata) weaves a nest quite as skillful as the famous weaver bird. This neglected craftsman is common in nearly all parts of India and if you speak to Domiciled Europeans of the weaver bird they will think you mean this wren-warbler, for among such he is universally known as the weaver bird, the famous weaver whose portrait appears in every popular bird book being called the baya by permanent residents of India.

As its name implies, Prinia inornata is a plainly-attired little bird. Its upper parts are earthy brown. It has the faintest suspicion of a white eye-brow, and its under parts are yellowish white, the thighs being darkar than the abdomen. Picture a slenderly-built wren with a tail, three inches in length, that looks as though it were about to fall out, and which is constantly being waggled about and you have a fair idea of the appearance of this little weaver. But this description applies to dozens of other birds found in India. The various warblers are so similar to one another in appearance as to drive ornithologists to despair. The inimitable "Bha" admits that they baffle him. "There is nothing about them" he writes "to catch the imagination of the historian, and they will never be famous. I have been perplexed so as to how to deal with them. To attempt to describe each species is out of the question, for there are many, and they are mostly so like each other that even the title ornithologist does not qualify one to distinguish them with certainty at a distance. If you can distinguish them with certainty when you have them in your hand you will fully deserve the title."

It is just possible to recognise the Indian wren warbler by its note. When once you have learned this you are able to identify the bird directly it opens its mouth. But how shall I describe in? It is a peculiar harsh but plaintive, twee, twee, twee; each twee follows close upon the preceding one and gives you the idea that the bird is both excited and worried. If you see a fussy little bird, constantly flitting about in a cornfield and uttering this note, you way be tolerably certain that the bird is the Indian wren-warbler. This bird never rises high in the air; it is but an indifferent exponent of the art of flying. It flits about by means of laborious jerks of its wings.

It is a true friend to the husbandman, since it feeds exclusively on insects. The most remarkable thing about it is its nest. This is a beautifully woven structure, composed exclusively of grass or strips of leaves of monocotyledonous plants which the bird tears off with its bill. These strands are invariably very narrow, and are sometimes less than one-twentieth of an inch in breath. The nest may be described as an egg-shaped purse, some five or six inches in depth and three in width, with an entrance at one side, near the top. It is devoid of any lining and its texture puts one in mind of a loosely made loofah. The nest is sometimes attached to two or more stalks of corn, or more commonly it is found among the long grasses which are so abundant in India. When the nest is built in a cornfield the birds have to bring up their family against time. They are unable to begin nest building until the corn is fairly high and must, if the youngs are to be safely started in life have brought them to the stage when they are able to leave the nest, by the time the crop is cut. In India nearly every field of ripe corn has its family of wren-warblers; the two parents flit about followed by a struggling family of four. These little birds do not by any means always beat time. Numbers of their nests containing half-fleged young are mown down at every harvest by the reapers' sickle. The nest is woven in a manner similar to that adopted by the baya; the cock and hen in each case work in combination.

Its texture is looser than that of the more famous weaver, but it is not less neatly put togather. In it are deposited four or five pretty little green eggs, marked with brown blotches and wavy lines.

* * * * *

Our second neglected craftsman is a tailor. He sews a nest so like that of the world-famous tailor as to be almost indistinguishable from it. Some authorities declare that the two nests are distinguishable. They assert that the nest of Orthotomus is invariably lined with some soft substance, such as cotton wool, the silky down of the cotton tree, soft horse hair, or even human hair, while that of the species of which we are speaking is lined with grass or roots. This distinction does not, however, invariably hold. I have seen nests of this species which have been lined with cotton wool.

This bird is known to ornithologists as the ashy wren-warbler (Prinia socialis). Anglo-Indian boys call it the tom-tit. It is a dark ashey-grey bird, with the sides of the head and neck and the whole of the lower plumage buff.

There is a tinge of rufous in the wings and tail. It is most easily distinguished by the loud snapping noise it makes during flight. How this noise is produced we do not know for certain. Reid was of opinion that the bird snapped its tail. What exactly this means I do not know. Jesse thinks that the sound is produced by the bird's mandibles. I have spent such time in watching the bird and am inclined to think that the noise is being caused by the beating of the wings against the tail. This last is constantly wagged and jerked and it occurs to me that the wings beat against it as the bird flits about. When doves and pigeons fly their wings frequently meet, causing a flapping sound. I am of opinion that something similar occurs when the ashy wren-warbler takes to its wings.

Perhaps the most extraordinary thing about this bird is the well-authenticated fact that it builds two types of nest. Besides this tailor-made nest the species makes one of grass, beautifully and closely woven, domed, and with the entrance near the top. I have never seen this latter type of nest, but so many ornithologits have, that there can be no doubt of its existence.

The strange thing is that both types of nest have been found in the same neighbourhood, so that the difference in the form of nursery is not a local peculiarity.

I am at a loss to account for the existence of these two types of nest. I have no idea how the habit can have arisen, nor do I know what, if any benefit, the species derives from this peculiarity. So far as I am aware no one can say what it is that leads to the construction of one type of nest in preference to the other. The nests of this species present a most interesting ornithological problem. I hope one day to be in a position to throw some light on the subject, meanwhile I shall welcome the news that someone has forestalled me. The ashy wren-warbler is a common bird, so that most Anglo-Indians have a chance of investigating the mystery. The same kind of eggs are found in each type of nest. The are of exceptional beauty, being a deep mahogany or brick-red, so highly polished as to look as though they have been varnished.

EDWARD LLOYD.

I must confess to you I had no idea the Gramophone was such a scientific and musical instrument, nor that such strides had been made in the science of sound reproduction. I had hitherto refused to have a record made of my voice, believing the result would be inartistic. I am, however, absolutely satisfied with the Records, and am content that future generations shall judge my voice by the Gramophone.

Dear Sir,—I have tried the records and find them really wonderful reproductions of my singing. I feel that, in them, all the care and trouble to which your experts went last month have found great reward. My friends who have heard them are simply delighted with them.

Yours faithfully,

America. The remains of this triceratops, as it is called, are found in the upper cretaceous strata of Wyoming; and the model at South Kensington is reproduced from an entire, although somewhat restored, skeleton from Converse County, exhibited in the National Museum at Washington. The horned dinosaurs, of which the species is one of the best known, are remarkable not only for the horns from which they take either name, but likewise for the enormous relative and absolute size of their skulls. In the model, for instance, the skull measures 6 ft. long, or nearly a third the length of the whole animal, and is many times the size of that of the dipodocus, despite the fact that the total length of the latter monster is 85 ft., whereas that of the triceratops falls short of 20 ft. It is true that in the last-named creature the size of the skull is exaggerated by the great bony range overarching the neck; but even if this were removed the relative proportions of the cranium would still be prodigious. With its three horns, arranged unicorn fashion, triceratops, although its habits were herbivorous, must have been one of the most extraordinary, not to say terrifying, monsters that ever walked the earth.

Few persons probably, other than those engaged in the pursuit of science, are aware that the Black Sea presents an interest of its own to the zoologist and the geologist shared by no other part of the ocean at the present day. Throughout the greater part of the ocean the bottom is the dwelling-place of a number of creatures whose business it is to consume the bodies of the members of the surface fauna which after death sink to the bottom. In the Black Sea, however, owing to special geological events, such scavengers are totally wanting over the greater part of the bottom, so that the carcases of the creatures which fall from above are left to decompose, which they speedily do at the comparatively high temperature of the water. By their decomposition two soluble compounds, carbonate of ammonia and sulphuretted hydrogen, are developed in enormous quantities; while no free lime, except such as is introduced from the Mediterranean, is left. The volume of sulphuretted hydrogen is so great as to poison the water from the greatest depth (1,227 fathoms, to within about a hundred fathoms of the surface to such a degree that life, except for a few bacteria, is absolutely impossible. The circumstance has a double interest—firstly, that it is absolutely unique at the present day, and secondly that it seems to offer an almost exact parallel to the state of affairs that existed at the inconceivably remote epoch when the oldest known sedimentary rocks were laid down as mud on the ancient sea bottom.

Professor Stewart shows that (with a single exception in Africa) the wing tints of birds, like the colours on the wing-case of the beetle and the rich blue iridescence of the Indian butterflies, are solely "interference" effects caused by the peculiar surface structure of the feather. The colour is purely optical, like the tints on the soap bubble, and the iridescence of the oyster-shell. The African exception seems to be a casual experiment of Nature's with the dye-vat, hastily abandoned. In rainy weather the colours of this unhappy bird become literally washed out, leaving her, for the time being, a sadly dingy creature. Professor Stewart proceeds to illustrate a number of the conclusions arrived at by Darwin, Wallace, Bates, and others who have devoted so much patient research to solve colour problems in animal life. Why are fishes, as a rule, dark-hued on the back, and light or silvery underneath? Probably as a protective device against both aerial and aquatic foes. The dark colouring on the upper surface of fishes seems mainly produced by the action of light. This was experimentally proved in the case of the sole at the marine biological station at Plymouth. Of course, many of these colours have no protective or utilitarian significance at all, being merely excretory deposits of one sort or another. But it is impossible to mistake the significance of colour where sexual character is involved. It is well known, of course, that female birds are everywhere (as a general rule) of a dingy and inconspicuous hue, contrasted with the brilliant coloured ornamentation of their mates. The reason seems to be pretty clear. The female bird is forced by its maternal solicitude to spend a considerable portion of its time on the nest, engaged in the important duties of rearing the young. It is practically helpless during this period, and were it conspicuous by its colour and readily distinguished from the nest and its surroundings, would fall an easy prey to enemies. The best proof of this is that where the male sits on the nest and attends to the nursery, it is he who is dingy of hue and inconspicuous, and the female who is brightly coloured. Even the gorgeously-tinted male wild duck turns a dingy, decayed-reed colour at one season of the year. But this is precisely the time when he needs protection, namely, when unable to fly, on account of casting his pinion feathers.

Little enough is generally known about the food of the fishes that feed us; indeed, it is only within the last year or so that this matter has gained the attention of scientists. In the Central Hall of the Natural History Museum at South Kensington there has just been placed a series of preparations in spirits, illustrating the various creatures upon which the cod-fish preys. These number thirteen in all, though, of course, they can only be regarded as samples of a diet which shows remarkable variety. Of fish, the herring, common dab and whiting, when immature, each contribute, according to this bill of fare, 4 per cent. and the sand-eel 5 per cent. But crustacea appear to form the staple diet, as may be seen from the fact that swimming crabs of two species contribute between them 21 per cent.; spider crabs, 6 per cent.; and Norway lobsters or Dublin prawns 8 per cent. The pink shrimp is laid under contribution to the extent of 14 per cent., while the helpless hermit crab pays the heaviest toll of all with 45 per cent. That the bristly sea-mouse finds favour is somewhat surprising, yet it appears to do so, since it figures on this list at 11 per cent., while the whelk stands only at 7 per cent.

The important place which crustacea play in the dietary of cod-fish may be gathered from the fact that from their earliest stages of growth, when all that is visible of the body to the naked eye is the great head and enormous eyes, they feed on microscopic crustacea. A little later, when about 1½in. in length, they have the curious habit of crowding under large jelly-fishes for the sake of the crustacean parasites which infest those frail animals. When about 4in. or 5in. long they are capable of preying on other fishes; but the zoologist Sars found, that of shoals of cod of this stage, those which haunted floating seaweed for the sake of crustacea harbouring there, were altogether plumper and better nourished than similar fish of the same size which had been feeding on worms and small fish obtained by hunting over sandy ground. This would imply, however, not that this food was less nourishing, bulk for bulk, but that it took longer to catch and required greater efforts in the capturing.

The haddock, whiting, ling and hake, near allies of the cod, which are also to be reckoned among our most valuable food-fishes, show a somewhat different choice in the matter of food. Thus the haddock appears to feed chiefly on crustacea and molluscs, though echinoderms, such as star-fish and worms, especially the "sea-mouse," form almost as large a part. On the West Coast of Ireland echinoderms appear to form the staple diet, and after these come crustaces, worms next and molluscs last. This is a fact of considerable interest, and seemingly supports the contention that these fish feed on such prey as can be most readily obtained. The haddock appears to be largely addicted to cannibalism, but besides preys upon young herrings and shrimps.

Mr. Eagle Clark, keeper of the natural history department of the Edinburgh Museum, has recently issued his annual report for 1906. He states that during the past year there were added to the collections 9,627 specimens, 550 being by purchase, and the others by donation. The most important purchase among mammals were fine mounted examples of the North American bison, Polar bear, American black bear, orang utan, chimpanzee, jaguar, puma, red howler monkey, walrus, bearded seal, and ringed seal. Several rare and interesting birds have also been bought, including a fine adult specimen of the rare Ross's rosy gull (Rhodostethia rosea) and British examples of the rustic bunting, ortolan bunting, and desert wheatear. A fine python from northern India and two coloured plaster casts of rare British fishes have been acquired, while the invertebrates added include 164 shells and molluscs for the type collection, and a number of beetles from the Gold Coast. Lord Hindlip has presented a very fine giraffe from the Quashengeshu Plateau, British East Africa; Mr. J. M. Gordon, a mounted specimen of Alpine ibex from Bunneval, Savoy; Professor Sherrington an orang utan; Major-General A. A. Kinloch, the bones of the flipper of a humpback whale from Shetland; and Sir Archibald Buchan-Hepburn, a nearly complete skeleton of red deer and some bones of the urus found in excavating at Smeaton-Hepburn. The Hon. Walter Rothschild has given 174 birds' skins, five nests, and a specimen of the amber fish of New Zealand painted in natural colours. Many interesting birds were presented by Mr. William Berry, Dr. John Dalziel, Mr. George Girdwood, Mr. N. B. Kinnear, and Mrs. Leslie Milne. Lieut. F. M. Bailey sent from Thibet two specimens of a snake new to science, while to Miss Rimmer the museum is indebted for a large collection of the shells and mollusca formed by her late father, Mr. Richard Rimmer, of Dalawoodie, Dumfries. A large case has been built for the reception of the fine collection of Antarctic seals presented last year by Mr. W. S. Bruce, and the extensive and representative collection of Antarctic birds and birds' eggs brought home by the Scottish National Antarctic Expedition has been worked out in the museum, and a complete set selected for the natural history department.

In an interesting article on the artificial breeding of tench in the "Oesterreichische Fischerei-Zeitung," Herr Mannskopf points that the ova of the tench are exceedingly small and difficult to count. The number of ova in a given fish may range from 100,000 to 300,000. Tench spawn at the age of two or three years, but for breeding purposes a well-made but not too fat fish of four years is the best. Tench are generally lovers of darkness, but come on to the top of the water in spawning time to lay their eggs on the weeds, selecting, when possible, the water aloe (Stratiotar aloe) for this purpose, owing to the fact that it generally abounds in the larvæ of water-snails and mussels, which form the staple food of the tench fry.

If a man admires a woman, why does he object to another man expressing about the said woman sentiments which exactly coincide with his own?

Wee Dougal MacFougal was reading the Bible, when his mother exclaimed: "Oh, Dougal, Dougal, are ye reading that good book on a week-day? Put it away until the Sawbath."

The Story Teller.

THE OPEN DRAWER.

THE short winter's day had come to an end, and we had collected in a cosy group round the log fire in the hall. The lamps were not lit, but an occasional ruddy gleam, breaking through our circle, would fitfully illumine the armour, weapons, and sporting trophies which covered the walls. It was a suitable occasion for ghost stories, and they took an added eerieness and realism from the half gloom.

I remember one tale in particular, though I have forgotten the name and even the appearance of the narrator. Here it is :—

Some years ago I was wandering about the Eastern counties, looking at houses for friends. They wanted an old fashioned house on the East coast. After looking at several in the vicinity of a small town on the Suffolk coast, I found one which seemed so suitable in every way, that I decided to stay the night and go through the place thoroughly the next day. I found a comfortable looking old hostel, the Buckland Arms, and so sent for my portmanteau, which had been left at the Station. The landlord of the inn struck me as a curious looking man, with his dark lantern-jawed face, and unkempt grey locks falling to his shoulders. Dinner time approaching I rang for a maid to show me my room. A gaunt but strongly built, hard-featured woman answered my summons. I said a few words to her but her short disagreeable manners discouraged efforts at conversation. Preceding me upstairs with a candle, she opened a door on the landing, and with a laconic 'You'll find hot water ready' left me. The room looked comfortable. The bed was a modern brass mounted one, but the wardrobe, chest of drawers, etc. were of unusually handsome pattern: all of mahogany, nearly black with age and polishing.

I found my portmanteau placed in a convenient position, across the arms of a very solid-looking arm chair, but my sense of neatness was disturbed by the awkward attitude of the chair, which had been pushed towards the chest of drawers until its back was hard against them.

I pulled it out near the fire place where an arm chair ought to be.

The dinner turned out a good one, and after a pipe or two I went off to bed.

When I got to my room I found that the maid, after emptying my basin, had again pushed the heavy arm chair with the portmanteau lying across its arms, against the chest of drawers. With a slight feeling of irriation I pulled it out a second time and then undressed.

After my clothes were off, certainly not more than ten minutes after I had entered the room, I happened to glance ag in towards the chest of drawers, and saw to my astonishment ha t the right hand top drawer was open. I went over and look ed at it as I felt sure I had not opened it myself. The drawer was quite empty : there was not even the paper at the bottom whi h one usually finds. I shut it and it closed smoothly, nor was there any tilting to account for its having opened by itself. The drawer was not fitted with a lock, nor had it ever possessed one, as the wood was not cut away.

The unexplained opening seemed rather uncanny, so instead of putting out the lamp with which my room was lighted, I only turned it down slightly, and then got into bed. Puzzling over the drawer prevented my falling asleep.

I had been lying thus awake for about half an hour, when a feeling I cannot explain drew my eyes irresistibly towards the chest of drawers.

There I saw the top right hand drawer slowly open until nearly fully out. Then above the edge something rose slowly ..... First I saw hair ; it was light brown, but seemed discoloured with dark patches. Slowly the hair lifted and tilted backwards, disclosing gradually a pallid forehead, and then at last a pair of awful glassy eyes in which were written an unutterable horror and despair. These dreadful eyes glared stonily into mine over the top of the drawer. My nerves are good, but I yelled at the sight and leapt out of bed. In a flash, hair, face, eyes, all had vanished. I seized the lamp, turned it full up, and rushed to the open drawer. It was as empty as ever. But from its void came a strong unbearable whiff of stale blood. You know that unmistakable smell of blood which has begun to decompose in a hot sun. I banged the evil drawer to, and rang the bell furiously. After a short delay the forbidding maid appeared ; she did not wait for explanations but burst out at once.

"Well, what did you move the chair for ? If you'd left it alone you'd have seen nothing. I suppose now you want another room. Well you can only have the little one at the back, and if you're uncomfortable it's your own fault for not leaving things alone."

I tried to question the grim dame, but her mouth shut like a trap, and nothing more could be got out of her She helped me with my portmanteau to the small room, and then left abruptly with a scowl still on her face.

My efforts next day to pump the landlord resulted in his accusing me of having dined not wisely but too well, so I paid my bill and left the inn in a bad temper.

I questioned several of the inhabitants as to the history of the town, hoping to throw somelight on the affair, and was advised to get hold of a certain "old Jock" who was a wonderful hand at stories.

Old Jock turned out to be an intelligent old man of seventy, and what he told me seemed to explain the mystery of the drawer.

Long ago, before old Jock was ever born, there had been a terrible murder at Lang Court, an old house in the vicinity. A number of guests were staying at the Court, and one of them, in a fit of mad jealousy had murdered his wife, and then having cut off her head, had placed it in a chest of drawers in the room of the woman's lover.

The latter, without an idea of what had happened, had opened the drawer and found the poor head with its awful glazed eyes and blood dappled locks.

What the sequel to the tragedy was my informant could not tell me, but he believed that a lot of the old Lang Court furniture was now in the Buckland Arms.

MOTORING MATTERS AT HOME.

AERO CLUB DISPLAY.

THE motor car and aeronautical display which will open tomorrow at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, promises to be the most brilliant of the long series which Mr. Cordingley has held. The number of exhibitors has reached the large total of 400, which is said to be a record for any exhibition held in this country, and, judging from the interest which the general public now takes in motoring matters, the attendance is likely to be larger than ever.

A visit to the hall yesterday showed that preparations were well advanced for the reception of exhibits, though but few were in place. One great advantage which exhibitors at the Agricultural Hall enjoy is that loaded wagons can drive right up to the stands, and thus save much labour in transferring articles. A huge five-ton steam goods wagon, drawn by four powerful horses, presented a strange spectacle when passing through the midst of the hall, though it reached its appointed stand in the easiest and most speedy manner.

The minor hall has been set apart for commercial vehicles, of which a very large number will be shown. The galleries, as usual, will be crowded with accessories, and the Aero Club display, in a separate hall, is sure to attract a large share of attention. The roof of the building has been tastefully decorated with many coloured flags, and present quite a gay appearance, whilst the stands, as usual, will be profusely decorated according to the individual tastes of each exhibitor.

Members of the Automobile Association will be admitted free to the Cordingley Exhibition, and have been kindly granted free space on the ground floor near the exhibition offices, where, at Stand No. 158, the Automobile Association secretary and a few of the leading members of the staff will be in attendance daily during next week. The well-known Automobile Association map, on which are displayed the whereabouts of agents, patrols, and other important information, will be on view, and the stand will be easily recognised by means of a large model of the Automobile Association car badge.

AMERICANS AHEAD OF US.

Whilst our own Weybridge track is still in a very unfinished state, and only a brave man would venture to predict the date of its opening, our go-ahead cousins in the United States are planning and constructing tracks of a much more ambitious character in all parts of the country. It is small wonder that they are so active in this direction, for their need is infinitely greater than ours. Apart from the almost impassable nature of the ordinary country roads, there are many places where the thoroughfares are specially designed to prevent the rapid passage of motorists. One of these, a suburb on the Lakeside, some 25 miles from Chicago, has given rise to a new phrase, "a Glenco bump." Any obstacle especially objectionable to motorists may thus be described, and those who have seen the original article need no further explanation. The "Glenco bump" consists of a crossing for foot passengers, built of brick and raised about six inches above the street level, the sides rising at a sharp angle. To go over these even at the moderate pace of 20 miles an hour is an experience not to be repeated ; springs have been broken, and passengers even thrown out in the process. Ingenious American manufacturers are building cars with specially designed shock absorbers, which it is claimed can surmount such obstacles with ease, but the "parkway," as it is termed, seems a simpler way out of the difficulty.

A LONG ISLAND TRACK.

Such a one is now being laid out on Long Island, which, being close to New York, is a favourite resort for Translantic motorists. The track is to be sixty miles long and a hundred feet wide. Fifty feet in the centre is to be laid with a prepared surface as a motor highway. The margins on either side are to be laid down with grass and beautified by planting shrubs and vines. There are to be no level crossings, as all intersecting highways are to be carrried either above or below the track. Although the road is intended mainly for touring purposes, certain portions of it will be set apart for racing events, where there will be the usual grand stands and other accommodation for sightseers. The track will not be a monotonous one, for it is to be neither level nor straight. Nature has provided suitable hills along the course, whilst man has arranged that the way shall be sufficiently curly. The requirements of really fast racers will be adequately met by the provision of several straight stretches varying in length from four to seven miles. The route is said to be remarkably picturesque. From one hill over which it passes the tourist will be able to see the Atlantic Ocean on one side and Long Island Sound on the other. The road also passes through heavily wooded tracts, skirts several beautiful lakes, and threads its way through fertile valleys.

ALLOWING A FAIR TRIAL.

At St. Louis they are trying a simpler plan, which might well be followed in this country, for insuring the fair trial of motor cars. The St. Louis authorities propose to permit makers of ordinary stock cars to show what they can do on the open public roads. The competitors will only have to prepare certain roads so as to insure public safety, and then they will be allowed to race along to their hearts' content and get as much advertisement as they can out of the contest. If only the Motor Act permitted, some arrangement of this kind would greatly facilitate our own hill climbing contests and other club competitions.

THE AVERAGE CAR.

A persevering American statistician has hit upon a novel method of ascertaining just what the average car in the United States really is. He has taken the cost, horse power, dimensions, etc., of all the home made cars, and averaged them all together. By this means, the Motor Age points out, he has ascertained that the average car is sold at a price of £570. It weights 1701bs., and has four cylinders, each 4½in. by 4½in. The horse power is given as 30, and passenger accommodation is provided for four people. It would be interesting to know how a car of this make up would run, and if any one has the time to spare they might apply the same method to the motors exhibited at Cordingley's. The result might not be instructive, but it would certainly be amusing.

Amongst recent purchasers of Daimler motor carriages in Captain the Right Honble Gerald Portman, late A.-D.-C. to Lord Curzon in India, who has ordered a 10½ wheelbase 30HP "Milverton" Landaulette.

A SCOTCH golf story is told which says that there were two local players, both Scotsmen, and they went out to the links to play a match in the dark. Each Johnnie had cut a hole in his pocket, and had a ball ready to drop down the leg of his trousers just in front of the other ball. Off they drove, and on they walked, and presently one says to the other.

I say, Jock, my mon, I'm thinking you're overwalking your ba'."

"Na, na," says the second. "Mine was a fine clean drive, but whaur's yours?"

"Eh, mon! Mine was an awful clure."

So they went another fifty yards. Then the first said:

"Eh, Jock, mon! I'll take my davy we're past yours the noo."

"Then whaur's your ain?"

"Eh! mine was an awful clure."

Another fifty yards brought them to the putting-green.

"Eh, Jock! I'm no seeing your ba' on the green.

"Maybe you'd best see if it's in the hole."

"My certes! Why, there it is. And, eh! but it's curious, but there's mine in the hole beside it! Mon, it's awfu' curious."

"Het's halved, then."

"Het's halved—one each—good play."

They turned up for the next hole solemnly. Then they stood looking at each other a moment before they drove off.

"Say, Jock, my mon, d'ye think it's any use to gang on playing like this?"

"I'm just thinking it would be a halved match."

"Het's my own very, thocht, Jock."

"A well, we noo ca' it a halved match and gang hame."

"I'm of the same opeenion myself."

"I'm of the same opeeneon myself."

DAIMLER

Mauldslie Castle,
Carluke,
N.B.

I have now had six months' experience of my 30-40 h.p. Daimler Motor Car, and I can truly say that I am quite delighted with it in every possible respect.

Like all my Cars, it has had to run nearly every day in all sorts of weather (including snow), and over all sorts of roads, yet it has never once failed or even faltered.

Moreover, I cannot imagine a better Hill Climber than it is, and hill climbing is a specially important matter to anyone living, as I do, in a very hilly district.
