The Story Teller.

ON THE VELDT.

THE neighing of horses, the guttural imprecations of Kaffirs hurling anathemas at luckless mules, who have mistaken a stray boot or the ends of their harness for their nose bags, and the general stir and bustle of a huge camp, rouses one from a sound sleep, to attend to the duties of another long day, amid the kopjes and outheaps of the rolling veldt.

No bugles are sounded, but it is not necessary and somehow, everyone is awake. Some are giving their horses a last rub down, while the animals are busy with the contents of their nose bags, while others again are lighting fires, to cook their breakfast and brew a "billy" full of coffee. A pannikin of coarse mealy meal and a hard biscuit, washed down with a draught of inferior coffee, without milk, does not sound a particularly appetising concoction, but it is, and we are glad even for so much, and lucky the man who has had time to get through his simple breakfast, before the order "saddle up" is given. "Mount," and we are ready to walk, trot or canter, as the case may be; advance guard, escort the guns, or guardthe baggage. Nobody knows which it is to be, till we are well on the move and find ourselves, passing in turn, cavalry, artillery, or infantry and see nothing before us, but the unending veldt as far as the eye can reach, when we breathe a sigh of relief and know that our duties for the day are the pleasantest of the lot, and that we have to do advance guard and supply the scouts. As the day dawns, I find myself with eight men, far in advance of the rest of the regiment, with orders to keep 1,500 yards in advance of the supports and head due east. No big engagement is expected to-day, but one never can tell, where we may not meet a "commando" and it behoves us to keep a sharp look out. As the sun rises and puts some life into our chilled bones, we are miles away from last night's camp and going goodness knows where. Our regimental dog, which has followed us from Bloemfontein and accompanied us through many a trying day, now trots along ahead of me, sniffing into every ant bear hole he comes across, the only creature in that vast crowd, thoroughly happy and intent on enjoying life.

I look back, to find the column has halted for some reason unknown to my little band, so we do likewise and while waiting, I notice a hare scampering off in the distance, and to my surprise, see a kestrel in full chase. This is most unexpected and can I be mistaken that the bird is a kestrel? There can be not much doubt about it, the long tail, pointed wings, red back and light silvery underparts, all point to it bring a kestrel and the flight too is that of one, but surely the South African bird must be a very superior bird to his Indian cousin, if he can tackle a hare single handed. He means business too, for as I watch him stoop, a bunch of fur flies from his claws. Asking one of the men to keep an eye on the column, I give chase to see what the end will be, for this is the first kestrel I have ever seen, or heard of attacking a hare and my interest is aroused. The hare dodges from bush to bush and finally sits behind an ant heap from which I dislodge him and away he goes with the kestrel after him, stooping like a well trained peregrime. The hare is getting tired and I soon hope to see the end of the chase, but a shrill whistle catches my ear and I see we are on the moor once more and I must go back to my men, much to my disgust. I know of no other falcon which so closely resembles a kestrel as this one did, and yet it is hard to believe that a kestrel could possibly have raised sufficient pluck to tackle a hare. A couple of antelope jump up near the foot of a kopje, we rush off, headlong among the rocks, up above. More than one of us long to jump off our horses and draw a bead, with the hope of replenishing our empty larders, but the breeze is blowing directly from us, to the army behind, and a shot would easily be heard and bring up our supports in double quick time, so firing is out of the question.

Far away on the horizon a dark mass is visible which, as we get nearer, is seen to be a clump of trees and presumably a farm, so our hopes rise and we see visions of a "squeaker," a goose or even a humble moorghy dangling from our saddles and we push on the horses a little faster and increase the distance to about 2,000 yards. A depression in the ground, some 500 yards from the farm, aids us and we put our horses at a canter and arrive to find the place deserted and not a human being to be seen. Our business, however, is not with humans, and two of us hand our horses to a third, and we rush off to the poultry yard, but here, too, all is still, till a clucking in the shrubbery, hastens our footsteps in that direction and we are soon in pursuit of a cock and two fine fat hens. Practice makes perfect and by now, we were no novices at throwing bayonets, about the only use and chopping up wood they had yet been put to! and both the hens were soon secured, but the old cock proved a tougher customer, in more ways than one. Bit by bit we drove him to W—, who held the horses, but as they required very little holding, he transferred the two extra rains and his rifle to his left hand and out came his bayonet and the old cock was kicking his last and a crimson stream dyeing the green turf beneath him.

We were mounted and away with our spoils, before the supports showed over the rising ground behind us, and the little ground we had lost, was, of course, due to our caution in approaching a farm, which may have harboured rebels! We give the horses a good drink, fill our water bottles and resume our march, and as we rise from the stream to the top of the opposite bank, we see a succession of farms which put us in the best of humours. At the first we meet an old "frau" who insists on not understanding our attempts at Dutch or German and to all our questions, she returns a sullen "Ich kaun nicht verstehe," so we have to make our meaning clear with signs. I show her a half crown and point to a goose I see waddling along, but she resolutely shakes her head, and while we are considering the advisability of first catching the goose and talking to the old lady after, a shot rings clear in the still air and a bullet whistles over our heads and strikes the wall behind me, then another and still another.

We are into our saddles and gallop behind same cover, to try and see where they come from. They sounded too near to come from the further farm, so the Boers must be concealed behind that small kopje in front, whose summit is one mass of rocks and boulders. We let fly a volley into it on "spec" and a few seconds later hear a deep boom behind and simultaneously a shell shrieks over our heads and bursts with a dull "thud" straight over the kopje, the shrapnell searching every nook and cranny behind those rocks. The shells follow each other fast and we cautiously emerge from our hiding and canter round to the side of the kopje, and just in time, to see a party of half a dozen Boers, going for all they were worth, on their sure footed little ponies, on the other side and about 1,000 yards in front, so while they are within range and in sight we dismount and do a little target practice on our own and then return to the farm and have no compunction in taking by force what a few minutes before we would gladly have paid for. A report has gone that the Boers have fled, and once more the column advances and we move on with a goose each, to keep the fowl's company. We had not gone far before a dark brown volume of smoke rising behind us, tells us the owner of the farm has paid the price of his treachery and the surly old "frau" is a homeless wanderer on that vast wilderness, unless she has chosen to join the refuges, in the wagon that accompanies our transport.

It was late in the afternoon, before we came to another farmstead, but unlike the others, this showed a white flag and as we approached, cheery little faces under sun bonnets, smiled a welcome and sturdy little urchins in short knee breeches waved to us, while a strapping broad shouldered son of Scotia greeted us with "Aye, its a treat for sore een to see ye; come ben and ma lass will gie ye a sup o' summat and may be a wee drap."

Thanking our kind host, two of us dismounted, while a kaffir held the horses, we went inside and partook of a glass each of lovely rich milk, not feeling inclined for any stronger beverage much to the surprise of the old farmer. However we could only give ourselves a couple of minutes, which passed only too soon, and we were once more in the saddle, bidding good-bye to those kindly faces. We were told that a commando had gone ahead that morning, so we might come across "snipers" further on, where the ground was intersected by deep cuttings and ravines and afforded ample cover, but were not likely to meet with any big force, for two or three days.

We had gone about three miles past the Scotch farm and had passed a couple of small ones on our right, when we noticed the column had halted, so here we should evidently camp for the night. Just as I was turning back, I spotted a couple of bustard alight half a mile further on and as there was not much chance of a shot being heard in the hubbub of guns, carts, and the hundred and one distractions attending the forming of camp, I rode off to try my luck and when within a hundred yards, I dismounted and drew a careful bead at the legs of the only one I could see and was delighted to see him roll over. My little mess would be well stocked now, and I rode back in triumph with a goose, a fowl, and a bustard, hanging from my saddle, but only to find when I got there, that the whole of my section was to be on outlying picket and was to start in another half our. All my fond visions of roast bustard gone. The savoury and appetising smell, which in imagination had greeted my nostrils for the last half hour, to be postponed indefinitely; all my cherished illusions shattered at one fell stroke. Such is life on active service and instead of delicious game, I was to content myself with hard biscuits and a mouthful of "bully beef," i. e., if it was served in time. Well I would make up for it on the morrow and the bustard will be the more tender, which was some consolation, as I marched up with the rest to make my bed among the hard rocks on that bleak uninviting mound showing black against the setting sun.

"EXILE."

A Highlander who lived not very far from Balmoral sent two beautiful collies as a present Queen Victoria, who knew him well, having often driven past his house and once or twice stopped to speak to him and his wife. The Queen not only accepted the collies, but told the donor that if he ever found his way to London when she was at Windsor he was to call and see her. As it happened, he had to go London soon after. So he went to Windsor and asked for John Brown, who had heard what the Queen said to him. John Brown let the Queen know that her Highland friend was in waiting and was told to bring him in. John took care to post the visitor in the etiquette to be observed, told him not to speak until the Queen spoke to him, and to be sure always to say "madam." The Highlander was then ushered into the presence of the Queen, who received him kindly and asked about his family. But when she began to praise the collies, and say what favourites they had become, and how kind it was of him to send them to her, the delighted mountaineer forgot his instructions. "Toots, wumman," he exclaimed, "What's twa collies atween you and me!"

Travel and Adventure.

IN THE HIGHEST SIERRA.

THE Yosemite Valley may well be called the crowning glory of the Sierra Nevada mountains. Every year thousands of visitors enjoy its majestic cliffs and waterfalls, and many have been the written descriptions of this world-renowned spot. Of late years, the King's river canyon has attracted an increasing number of mountain lovers, and several articles have appeared in American publications which are tending to increase the travel thereto. But of the great mountain mass which lies between them, of this, the grandest portion of our High Sierra, which blocks the direct travel from one to the other, and to which these canyons as well as many others are tributary, almost nothing is known to the travelling public, and practically nothing has been written of a detailed nature. It is with the idea of calling attention to this little known region, and of attracting thither a few mountain enthusiasts, that the following brief account is attempted:

Before taking up the description of routes and scenery through this magnificent mountain range, it will be necessary for the reader to have at least a general idea of its topography, which though highly complex in detail, is wonderfully simple in its broad outlines. It may here be observed that this part of the Sierra Nevada, like that to the north, consists of a gently sloping plateau, rising gradually eastward from the San Joaquin valley for a distance of seventy-five miles to the crest of the range, and then dropping off in one tremendous leap to the desert valleys of the Great Basin in from five to ten miles.

The altitude attained by the crest in this portion averages 13,000 to 14,000 feet, and the drainage from the snowcapped summits has given rise to a series of rivers, which cut their way to the valley through roughly parallel transverse canyons of extraordinary depth. The Yosemite Valley and Merced river is one of these, fed by the snowy group of Mt. Lyell. Next south of this is the San Joaquin, which is divided into two great branches, the middle and south forks. Still further south is the middle fork of the King's river, followed by the south fork of the same stream, upon which is situated the King's river canyon. It is evident, then, that to reach the summit country from the west, one has but to follow up the main canyons or the great divides between the water courses, or in any case has but minor tributaries and gorges to cross, but to make the trip from Yosemite to the King's river canyon parallel to the summit of the range he has to cross all the great river canyons, as well as the snowy divides between them. Furthermore, the trails in this portion are not well marked; in fact, the traveller must depend principally on his own general idea of the country in order to get through at all. But, on the other hand, the direct route through is not rough, and with the aid of a guide, or one member of the party familiar with mountain life, there should be no difficulty in working a way through this magnificent mountain region.

In passing, I may say that there are two possible routes. One, the high mountain route, which has not yet been completely worked out, lies between 8,000 and 12,000 feet above the sea, and is not safely attempted by anyone unfamiliar with the details of the country. The other, or middle route, is further west, and is the one to be preferred. While it does not pass through the highest portion of the range, side trips of one or two days' duration will in any portion bring the traveller to the crest region. It is this route which will therefore be described.

The start can be made best from the north, the reason for this being that the roughest part of the journey is at its southern end, which should therefore, be left until the season is as far advanced as possible, and the packs have become light. A good starting point is Summer-dale, or Fish Camp, on the Raymal stage road, about seven miles west of Wawona. This settlement is in the heart of the great sugar-pine forest belt, and a network of old lumber roads and trails extends away to the east through the deserted sites of many saw mills, to the Beasore meadows on the southern slope of the great divide between the Merced and San Joaquin rivers. From this point the old Mammoth trail trends eastward, through the Chiquita and Jackass meadows and through splendid timbered country, but edging continually toward the rim of the great San Joaquin canyon, which parallels the route just to the south. Finally, after crossing Granite creek a splendid clear tributary, the great spurs of the Merced divide force us out on the very edge of the San Joaquin canyon, and a fine view is obtained over the rugged country at the junction of its two main forks.

The Trail now plunges down into the canyon of the middle fork and for 3,200 feet it zigzags down the rocky slope, for we must cross the river at this point, where a substantial sheep bridge spans the otherwise impassible torrent. A short steep climb up the other side soon brings us over the low ridge which divides the south from the middle fork of the San Joaquin and we bear off through the timbered country to the south just at the brim of the latter canyon.

The course of the south fork of the San Joaquin is rather unique amongst Sierra streams, inasmuch as its course is toward the northwest or almost parallel to the main crest of the Sierra. The forest-covered plateau on either side or the course of its own deep canyon furnishes therefore a most obvious pathway which leads us for many miles into the very heart of the highest Sierra. It is fed by four great tributaries from the east, Mono Creek, Bear Creek, Piute Branch, and Evolution Creek. Each of these in turn furnishes a possible route toward the crest region.

For the first twenty-five miles after crossing the middle forks our route passes over this timbered plateau above the rive, canyon and then descends to Mono creek. Throughout its lower course Mono creek flows in a wide, almost level valley covered with reddish sandy soil and a sparse growth of timber. Highe up it comes down through a magnificent canyon whose walls rise to a height of 2,000 feet above the stream. The southern wall is especially fine and at intervals side gorges break through it, forming deep recesses about whose heads are the snowy summits of the Abbott group, nearly 14,000 feet in elevation. A rough trail leads up the north bank of the stream across the mountains to Owens valley, and a side trip to the splendid Alpine region about the headwaters of the creek is well worth the time. The deep recesses on the south wall are known as the First Second, Third, and Fouth recesses. Of these the Second is the largest and easy access to it is obtained by an old sheep trail. The stupendous scenery about the head of the Second, Third, and Fourth recess it is quite impossible for me to give an idea of in the short space of this article. Suffice it to say that they are headed by Mt. Abbott (13,700 feet), as yet unconquered by the mountain climber; Mt. Gabb (13,582 feet) and a number of others of nearly equal height, breaking off in tremendous precipices to the north and west. This region has the attraction to the mountaineer of being almost, if not quite, undescribed. To the south of the main canyon of Mono creek rise the imposing summits of the Slate group, consisting of Red-and-White peak and Red Slate peak, each about 13,000 feet in height. This group is a most striking one on account of the brilliant colouring of the rocks and the vast field of snow which lie about their bases.

Returning again to the lower portion of Mono creek valley, the traveller, if he wishes another high mountain trip, may leave his base camp and make his way up the steep slope which walls the valley on the south, and thus reach the top of the Mono-Bear creek divide where a good trail will be found following very nearly the summit of the ridge. This finally leads to the upper valley of Bear creek, which may now be followed without difficulty to the point where it branches about the base of the Seven Gables. This latter peak is one of the most picturesque that is to be found in the high Sierra. It is in the form of a huge rectangular block of granite, bounded by sheer precipices over 2,000 feet high on the north east and south, formed by the tremendous canyons of the upper tributaries of Bear creek which have cut their way through from the summit snows.

The crown of this immense block rises in peaks like the gables of a roof, that on the south east being the highest, and shooting up like the spire of a cathedral. The elevation is about 13,000 feet, and though in the wildest portion of the San Joaquin Sierra, its summit is not difficult of access. The view from that commanding point cannot be excelled, for it stands one of a host of giants in the heart of the wilderness. Close at hand and across the tremendous chasms on all sides rise Gabb, Abbott, Bear Creek Spire, and in the south the airy summit of Humphreys. The view is well worth the rather arduous trip to its base.

Returning again to Mono creek valley and following down the stream (here almost as large as the Merced river) to near its confluence with the San Joaquin we can again pick up the main trail which crosses the Mono-Bear creek divided at a much lower point, then crosses Bear creek itself and swinging far to the west about the huge mountain masses on its south side, finally descends to the bank of the Main South Fork of the San Joaquin river. This beautiful sparkling stream, fresh and pure from its snowy fountains, we now follow upward, through a miniature Yosemite, then through wide grassy valleys where the clear stream swings in graceful loops, to a point where it issues from a rocky canyon. Here our trail is forced up on the mountain side again, and for four or five miles we thread our way amongst the glaciated slopes, turn the "Great Bend," and again descend to the river at the Blaney meadows.

These constitute a good camping ground for the broad grassy flat furnishes the finest of feed for animals, a convenient hot spring of pure water is most convenient for bathing and the surrounding scenery is superb. The Blaney meadows can also be easily reached from the west, by leaving the end of the stage road between Fresno and Pine Ridge at Shaver and taking the Red Mt. trail.

About five miles above the hot spring, the Piute Branch enters the river through a deep canyon. This canyon is entirely impassable for pack animals, so if the traveller wishes to explore the Mt. Humphreys region he must either carry his food and blankets on his back, and as we say 'knapsack it," or must lead his pack train over a rough promontory 3,000 feet high and descend into the Piute canyon several miles above Either of these methods is mountaineering with a vengeance for there are no trails, nor can guides be procured that know this country. In 1893 the writer, in company with Mr. C. L. Cary, explored the high ridges to the north of the great canyon then returned to the Hot Spring and knapsacked it up the terribly rough canyon to its source. Here we attempted Mt. Humphreys, but failed, and the mountain remained unscaled till last summer when James and Edward Huchusa succeeded in completing the ascent. With the exception of the extreme head of the middle fork of Kings river this region is the most difficult of access in the whole length and breadth of the high Sierra, but these difficult regions are always the most magnificent. The whole south face of the divide between this and Evolution creek consists of a series of huge crowns, walled in by continuous precipices and separated by thin knife edges. These tower to a height of 4,000 feet above the creek. Mt. Humphreys, 14,055 feet in height at the head, is a fitting centrepiece for the stupendous picture.

Returning once more to our regular route, we take the well-marked trail up the canyon of the San Joaquin. Five miles above, the Piute Branch must be crossed, and, in high water, this sometimes gives trouble. Above this the river flows in a great canyon, and for the remainder of the distance the trail keeps close to the water's edge, for the walls of black metamorphic rise from 1,000 to 3,000 feet above the river. Over these walls at short intervals plunge glorious cascades, their snowy white contrasting most strikingly with the sombre walls. After crossing the river, we finally come to the point where Evolution creek, a stream which carries fully half the now much diminished river plunges over the east wall in a grand cataract.

Though apparently the most difficult of all the tributaries to follow up, we find to our surprise that a good trail winds up the apparently inaccessible side of the south fork canyon, and lifts us 1,000 feet up to the lower end of Evolution valley. This is a fine example of a great glacial valley. For six miles it pursues a perfect "U"-shaped cross-section, and its floor is covered with timber and meadows. There will be found only slight remnants of the old sheep trail, and our route is about go-as-you-please, but little or no difficulty is encountered till the head of the valley is reached. Here there is an immense amphitheatre into which streams from all directions tumble in foaming cataracts. On the south side is the Hermit, a clean-cut pyramid of granite rising 2,000 feet above the meadow. Blocking the whole eastern sky stands the colossal Mt. Darwin nearly 14,000 feet in elevation, and dominating everything in the neighborhood except Humphreys.

The main stream tumbles down from a shelf at the foot of Darwin, and though possible to take animals up to this shelf, it is better to proceed from this point on foot, as the distance to the source can be made easily in a day. Upon this shelf lies beautiful Evolution lake. Grouped closely around it are the great peaks of the main crest, and the Goddard divide Mts. Darwin, Haeckel, Wallace, Spencer, Eiske, and Huxley. This latter, the most beautiful of all, lies directly at the head of the lake, and the creek, which above this point flows from the south cut around its base. It is not possible to take a four-footed animal above this point, but a man afoot can climb on up the creek to its very source, which seems to be as near the heart of the high Sierra as it is possible to get. It heads in a broad open basin, contains two large lakes of crystal clearness fringed with snow. On the south towers the Goddard divide which separates the San Joaquin from the Kings river.

On the west we are hemmed in by the spires of Mt. Goddard itself, and on the east by the main crest of the Sierra. Crossing this basin and climbing the snow slopes of the Goddard divide, one can make his way to its crest, and look down the other side upon the headwaters of King's river—upon a scene of the most inspiring grandeur. Southward for miles the whole limit of vision is crowded with snowy ranges of peaks, cleft with immense canyons. To the east the main middle fork of the King's cuts its own preferred canyon through the black metamorphic rocks and at our feet fall away the great tributary gorges which swell its volume below. Against the eastern sky towers the mighty array of the Palisades, its highest point 14,212 feet above the sea; the finest mountain except Shasta in California.

To give even a short description of the scene would be beyond the limits of this paper, so we must return to our main camp on the San Joaquin, and continue our journey to its source, where at an elevation of 10,200 feet amidst extensive meadows and glorious Alpine scenery, we make camp at the foot of Mt. Goddard Though our traveller makes no other side excursions during his trip though he climbs no other mountains, he should not neglect the opportunity of enjoying the most extensive view in the Sierra from the summit of Mt. Goddard from an elevation 13,502 feet on the highest point on the divide between the basins of our two great watercourses, the whole region is now laid out to his view. From Mts. Conness, Dana, and Lyell, our familiar friends of the Yosemite region, over all the great canyons and mountains among which he has been travelling, over the vast wilderness of King's river, and even to Mt. Whitney, which towers above the King's-Kern divide, the country lies like a map. There is lesson in geology and physical geography to be learned from several hours' study on this commanding point which can never be gained from books.

Our direct route southward is now completely blocked—although a high mountain route is gradually being worked out across the savage sources of the middle fork of King's river, no one has as yet taken a pack train across the upper Goddard divide In any case such an undertaking would never be attempted by one unfamiliar with the details of the whole region. So our party will have to make a wide detour to the west, avoid this magnificent though difficult portion of the high Sierra, and enter it again along its southern boundary. So retracing our steps for a mile or so down the south fork, we finally leave its canyon by a ledge along the western wall.

An old sheep trail runs along this, but it is dim and hard to find. Our best assurance lies in the fact that it is impossible to travel anywhere except on the ledge, and as it is not over 100 feet wide we cannot go far wrong. This ledge can be followed for about three miles, when it finally brings us out in a great open region at the base of snowy peaks. Just to the south of what is known as Red Mt. is the Hell-for-sure pass, the only place for miles about where the San Joaquin divide can be crossed. Although at an elevation of 11,300 feet this pass is not as bad as its name implies. On the other side lies the lake-dotted basin in which the north fork of the King's takes its source. The descent of the other side is rough, but once down there is but little difficulty in pioneering a way (for now we have not even a sheep trail to follow) across the basin, and down into the canyon of the north fork of King's river. Crossing this small stream, and the high ridge on the other side, we find ourselves at the source of Crown creek, a tributary of the middle fork of King's river, which may now be followed down to Crown or Collins' meadow.

This beautiful meadow may also be reached from Pine Ridge by taking the Collins trail at Ockenden's, near Shaver. It is an excellent starting point for Tehipite and the upper middle fork country.

We are now in the region of trails again, and strike south on an almost level stretch to the brink of Tehipite, and then down, down for 3000 feet over one of the roughest trails in the mountains to the bottom of this wonderful gorge. The Tehipite is one of the grandest of Sierran canyons, ranking with Yosemite and Hetch Hetchy in the magnificence of its cliffs, and far surpassing the King's and Kern river canyons. The great feature of the valley is the noble dome which stands out from the north wall. This, according to measurement of the United States Geological Survey, rises 3,480 feet above the river; as clean cut and perfect a granite precipice as the world affords. The top is capped with a perfect hemispherical dome. The rock in my opinion ranks next only to El Capitan and Half Dome, though in many respects it is in no way inferior to them. At the foot of the Dome are the graceful Silver Spray falls formed by Crown creek. These are two in number and aggregate 200 feet in height. On the south side there is no such vertical precipice as the Dome, but the rugged wall is of pure gray granite without a sign of vegetation. Its highest points are 5,000 feet above the river.

It is in regard to the floor of the valley that the Tehipite as well as the King's river canyon falls so far below Yosemite and Hetch Hetchy. Instead of green meadows and picturesqul groves we have boulder-strewn flats and huge piles of talus all savagely rough. But the river is magnificent as it rushes throug in a continuous chain of rapids. In order to reach the high mountains again—to regain our lost ground—we must follow up the middle fork of King's for about fifteen miles to Simpson meadow. The trip is a most interesting one. Throughout the whole distance the canyon is magnificent, second to none in the Sierra. The trail, though rough, is safe and well marked. At Simpson meadow we have the most glorious camping spot which it has been my fortune to find in California. The meadow is over a mile long, covered with tall grass and groups of stately pines. Flowers of innumerable hues spangle its broad openings, and through the middle rushes the splendid stream well stocked with the finest rainbow trout. On all sides rise mountains to from 4,000 to 6,500 feet above the river.

This, then, is an ideal spot for a permanent camp, and our traveller may rest here, or spend some time exploring the roughest mountains in our country about the head of the river. A good trail leads up the south bank of the river five miles to its confluence with Cartridge creek, the first great tributary from the east. Above this point the main river canyon is impassable except to a man on foot, but Cartridge creek may be followed to its source with a light pack train of the best mountain mules or burros. A few miles above the river we find Triple falls, one of the most unique cataracts in the Sierra. Here, too, almost equal branches of Cartridge creek approach within a few feet of one another, and fall side by side over an absolutely vertical cliff 100 feet high into the same pool. The combined water then make another vertical drop of 100 feet into the dark chasm below. Above Triple falls are other smaller ones making altogether a chain 550 feet in vertical height. The view down the canyon from the top of these falls is very fine. The opposite wall of the middle fork canyon rises nearly 5000 feet above the river in an almost perpendicular cliff of black slate. This figure is no guess, for it depends on an actual measurement by barometer, and later by triangulation. I consider this the highest rock face to be found in the Sierra. The canyon above this point is savagely rough, but good mountaineers can navigate a pack train to its source near Lake Marian, which is the nearest point to the Palisades that can be reached from the south or west. Any further explorations of the middle fork north of this must be made with a knapsack. To the southeast of Lake Marian, however, is a rough pass over the great divide to the sources of the south fork of King's river. This latter heads in a beautiful broad basin at the southern end of the Palisades near Split Mt. (14,076 feet). Although so very difficult of access, this basin is a very paradise for the mountaineer, and once in it he may travel in any directon. But it is not possible to follow the main stream down to the King's river canyon, nor is it possible to leave the basin by any point to the south or east. We must return, therefore, to our base camp at Simpson meadow.

Picking up again our through route at this point, we take the well-beaten trail up the tremendous mountain to the south, climb 4,000 feet in one pull, and then pass through thinly timbered basins, and high meadows to the Granite Pass on the great Divide between the South and Middle Forks of King's river. We now cross Granite basin, and then a low divide to Copper creek, down which the trail then runs. Before finally descending, however, we may cross the high ridges to the east, and scramble down into Paradise valley, a miniature Yosemite on the main King's river five miles above the great canyon. This, as its name implies, is a good camping spot. There is abundance of meadow land, and the beautiful groves have been unmarred by the few campers who visit them. Although the canyon of the main river above Paradise valley is impassable, there is a dim trail up Woods creek, a large tributary entering from the east. This leads us back to the main crest again, and Mt. Pinchot (13,485 feet) may be ascended, or the lake basin north of the Kearsarge Pass explored.

Returning again to Copper creek, we hurry down the trail to the level floor of the King's river canyon, and aim to reach Kananyer's camp in time for dinner, for well we know the good things that Mrs. Kananyer will have in store for us.

An old-time English barrister was John Williams, a sarcastic wit and a bachelor with as intense prejudice against marriage. His clerk one day asked him for a holiday to get married; and some months afterwards, on entering his chambers, Williams found his dead body suspended from the door. He engaged another clerk and asked him if he was married. "No" the clerk replied, but thinking Williams would regard marriage as a guarantee of steadiness, he added, "but I am going to be." "Very well," replied Williams; "but understand this—when you hang yourself, don't do it here!"

THE SOUTH AFRICAN FOOTBALL TOUR.

ON Wednesday, 2nd January, the South African team played their last match in England and thus brought practically to a close a tour which in every way has been hardly less successful than that of the New Zealanders in the previous season. We might tabulate the results of the two colonial tours in very few words and it may be of interest to set them down here :—

	Matches played.	Matches won.	Matches lost.	Points.
New Zealanders ...	32	31	1	830 agst. 39
South Africans ...	28	25	2	553 ,, 79

Add to the South African record the one drawn match, that against England at the Crystal Palace on 8th December, and we have the returns complete. It may be admitted that the extraordinary interest evoked by the methods, style and success of the New Zealanders did something to discount the sensation caused by the South Africans. The ease and certainty with which the former bore down all opposition until they met the Welsh team almost at the end of their tour set the world of Rugby Football agape and forced upon it the necessity for examining crystallised theories of play and turning over a new leaf. We are notoriously slow to assimilate new ideas especially in connection with sport and games in which it has been our peculiar pride to "set the time," but the New Zealanders taught lessons in Rugby Football which had to be learned. Above all British players learned the value of attack: the New Zealanders' success was due to many things, to pace organisation and cleverness of ruse; but before they came to the end of their tour the more discerning observers of their methods realised that the main principle was to attack at once and maintain the aggressive; but by the time this had been realised, the invincibility of the New Zealand team had been much more fully realised and the morale of the teams they met must have been affected. No county team felt equal to adoption of aggressive tactics; each felt that its great object was to defend its goal from the onslaught of the colonials; that the idea of attacking their defences was not to be entertained. Hence the New Zealanders from start to finish were very rarely put on the defensive and were suffered to play the game of attack in which they so excelled. In a word they played their own game and naturally succeeded. Now the South African tour is over thoughtful critics of football are asking whether the New Zealanders could beat the South Africans and if so by how much. Measuring the prowess of one against that of the other as shown by points won, the odds are all in favour of the New Zealanders: but we must bear in mind that the South Africans had a harder nut to crack than the earlier visitors. The New Zealanders were called upon to beat what we may fairly call old fashioned players: the South Africans had to face players who have largely changed their method and principles of play by the light of colonial teaching: they faced not the old fashioned players but the new or remodelled school of football: therefore comparison between the New Zealand score and the South African score does not give a fair standard for comparing the merits of the two. Were the New Zealanders—as we hope they may—to meet British teams again they would find that their teaching had borne fruit: and the tale of points they might then compile against home teams would furnish a much better standard by which to measure the relative merits of themselves and the South Africans. There is another point to consider: the New Zealand's "wing forward" was a valuable contributory factor towards their success: but he was a fruitful source of difficulty to the referee: it is very often difficult to decide whether a player is or is not offside and it was particularly difficult to decide at times whether the wing forward was transgressing or not. There was very often a doubt and nobody complained when the visitors received the benefit of a very large doubt as frequently was the case: and receipt of that benefit did a good deal to roll up their wonderful score of points. We understand that the manœuvres of the wing forward had been condemned in New Zealand as opposed to the principles of Rugby Football: however that may be the formation which includes this place and the play expected of the wing forward were used and exercised on the English tour with valuable results. The South African game on the other hand has throughout been remarkable for its unswerving observance of the rules in spirit as well as in letter; their transgressions against rule have been so rare and so obviously accidental that the sportsmanlike spirit which actuated them has been the subject of general remark. The South African record is less brilliant than that of New Zealanders; their defeats by Scotland at Glasgow and by Wales at Cardiff were due very greatly to the mud in which they were quite unable to do themselves justice, but mud is a condition for which players at home must be prepared hardly as it handicaps men accustomed to dry grounds and dry grounds only; particularly was this the case at Cardiff on New Year's Day when they sustained defeat by two goals and three tries to nothing. Their defeat by the Cardiff team was a much heavier one than that inflicted on the New Zealanders by Wales, when the visitors were stale and off colour after a long series of matches. But if less brilliant than the record of the New Zealanders the record of the South Africans is none the less creditable; the South African players were all conspicuous for their fleetness of foot and if the forwards were somewhat weak the strength of the backs more than atoned for this shortcoming. Then the South Africans, so far as we may judge from accounts of matches and critical articles on their play, proved themselves peculiarly careful and scientific. What the New Zealanders could have done on the defensive we can hardly guess, for they were never forced to defend: the comparative weakness of the South African forwards obliged the team to adopt the defensive over and over again: and it was soon seen that in this team at all events was an exception to the rule that the fifteen strong in attack is a fifteen weak in defence. Their defence was every whit as able as their attack: they defended as soundly as they attacked brilliantly: so marked has been the excellence of the play of their backs that many critics hold these members of the South African team the finest exponents of the game ever seen in Britain: a compliment which has special significance in view of the praise which was lavished upon the New Zealanders. The comparative weakness of the South Africans would seem to be due in some measure to this scrupulous regard for fair play; this was often manifested in the scrummage; they never attempted foot-work until the ball was fairly in, and thus lost something to their opponents. This was characteristic of their principles of play: we cannot avoid the feeling that if the South African example receives the acceptance it deserves the lot of the referee, to put the point temperately, will be a much pleasanter one in future. "They played the game" in the highst sense of the phrase.

The philosophical shrewdness of some school children is remarkable. A Sunday-school teacher had been telling her class the story of "David and Goliath," and, she added, "All this happened over three thousand years ago." A little cherub opened his bright blue eyes with wonder, as he remarked, "Oh, teacher, what a memory you've got!"

Little Johnny Smith suddenly asked, in a startled voice, "Mamma, is that bay rum in the bottle on your table?" "Mercy, no dear!" she replied. "That is gum." "Oh," said little Johnny. Then, after a moment's pause, he added reflectively, "Perhaps that's why I can't get my hat off."

Sporting Notes.

IN the Calcutta Paperchases this season Mr. Evers is evidently bent on putting up a record. After winning the first four chases on Cain he came out last Saturday on a new recruit to the game, Cain being on the sick list, and again defeated all comers. Now that Messrs. Deakin and Holmes have practically retired from this particular field of sport, there is a sad lack of light-weight thrusters to keep him company.

Mrs. Collins' accident last week still further reduces the little band of lady riders and it should be difficult to collect a field for the Ladies' Cup this year. The season of cups is rapidly drawing near and with it approach unwelcome thoughts of the hot weather. However, sufficient until then, and we still have a few weeks left.

The disposal of the racing stable for which he trained left Ferguson disengaged, but he is to have charge of a larger and more important stable and Mr. Galstaun is lucky to obtain such a reliable stableman and clever trainer.

Saturday's racing in Calcutta was of a moderate order, but the big race, The Merchants' Plate, produced an exciting finish between Mallard, an odds on favorite, and the Ceylon horse, Footprint. The former was backed as though the race were over in spite of the advantage which Footprint held on the handicap according to book form. He put up 10lbs. overweight and nevertheless ran the favourite to a very short head indeed, while the Stand vibrated with sighs of suspense from the favourite's army of backers. Their suspense once over, they stated boldly that Mallard might have won with ease had he been ridden in some other manner the precise nature of which did not transpire. Possibly much the same might be asserted with equal force about Footprint. Mr. de Soysa's horse richly deserved to win a race, but so indeed did Mallard, a good honest horse, who has always been popular amongst Calcutta race-goers. Prince Lyon ran third in this race, defeating Kipling, who ran very disappointingly, probably because he is stale If he is not so he has every excuse to be, having done yeoman's work ever since the beginning of the season. Blitzen again displayed her astonishing loss of form, and there was evidently something seriously wrong with The Master.

In the rich Hooghly Plate Mr. Dartmoor had the chance of a lifetime. His two chestnuts, Amyas and Sacristan II, were allowed to go out at 5 to 1 and from time to time longer prices were obtainable about either of these very smart horses. The public backed Manlock down to two's and Dulcimer for a place, but Amyas and Sacristan II raced each other home a neck between them in the very smart time of 1min. 1⅖secs. Annamulloch was caught on the rails in this race and held there right up to the winning post, when she was running very strong indeed. This mare has been coming on very fast the last week or two and is a good deal better than the public believed her to be last Saturday if the betting be a proper criterion of their opinion.

It is a good thing to back horses that are in winning vein and Rustile brought home the green and white hoops in undeniable style from a field of sixteen in the Bhowanipur Plate. This was a splendid betting race as nobody liked to put down their money heavily with such a crowded field. Camira and Bell Dhu were most fancied, and very few seem to have thought of Rustile.

The Selling Handicap produced a rattling good race between Presbyterian, Master Charlie and Foy. Mr. Avasia's old English horse, carrying a big lump of weight, fought it out very gallantly with Master Charlie and had him beaten ten strides from the post. He then began to take it easy, but was surprised by Foy's rush on his near side, and before he could tackle the newcomer found himself beaten by a neck. That wonderful old mare Psalm had on a better fitting set of plates this time and rolled home comfortably in the one mile Pony Race. The totalisator paid Rs. 68 on the winner.

The City Plate round the course was a very pretty race. Leda slipped the whole field at the mile post and entered the straight with a tremendous lead, her rush having strung the field out into an extraordinarily long line. These tactics suited the favourite, Mr. Deakin's Beannero, and when Keesen set out in earnest, she strode to the front and won with great ease. A victory of the dark green jacket is always popular and doubly so when the public has guessed that it was coming. This race gave Keesen his third winning mount, while two others were notched by Vining, who profited by the enforced absence of Evans, and showed his ability to win a big race. It would have been hard lines on him indeed had Mallard scored his first win in the hands of another.

The entries for the English Spring Handicaps are to hand by this mail, and the lists are more interesting than usual to Indian readers by reason of the inclusion of both Dalkeith and Great Scot, whose performances on the Calcutta course are still fresh in memory. Mr. Apear's big chestnut has been put into the two big handicaps over two miles and a quarter, namely, the Great Metropolitan of 1,000 sovs. at Epsom and the Chester Cup. Dalkeith is more heavily engaged over shorter distances and is entered in Mr. Farquharson's name—The Queen's Prize, 1½ mile; the Newbury Spring Cup, value £1,250, over a mile, and the City and Suburban and Kempton Jubulee, both over a mile and a quarter.

There is nothing much doing in the way of betting on the Civil Service Cup as the weights are not yet out. As we go to press the prices are: 3 to 1 against Cain, 7 to 2 Circus Girl, 4 to 1 bar two.

That noble army of martyrs—the Honorary Secretaries—whose "sport" for the most part is hard work, many kicks and few ha'pence, in order that others may indulge their taste for sport in any shape or form—may find something to interest them in the special announcement of Messrs. Barton Son and Company which appears on page iii among our advertisements to-day.

Entries for the Calcutta Kennel Club's First Championship Show have closed. The result is excellent, as we felt sure it would be. Most of the popular classes have filled well, the terriers, greyhounds, danes and others almost to overflowing; the entries have outnumbered anything recorded in the old Tollygunge days and everything at present sets fair for a top-notch show.

There was witnessed the other day at Boulogne an incident of the dog muzzling regulations which has not yet, probably, been experienced in England, or anywhere else where unfortunate dogs are muzzled. A poor beast of a dog, abroad with his jaws free, was being tracked down by a gendarme, when M. Sironi, who, besides being a local professor of standing is a lover of dogs, observing the situation, and "cruel only to be kind," gave the animal a switch in the ribs which sent it in flight at full speed. In this way it escaped the gendarme, who then turned to vent his wrath on the professor, whom he would have arrested but for the combined resistance which the latter and his son-in-law, Dr. Trombacco, were enabled to offer. Escaping to the professor's villa, they managed to imprison several officers who pursued them, in an outbuilding, whence an escape was only obtained by leaping from a high window.

We see it stated that there is to be an Extra Race Meeting in Calcutta on the 2nd March. This is incorrect. The Annual Sports meeting of the B.P.A.A.A. is fixed for that day and there will be no horse-racing.

Complete entries for the Civil Service Cup are published to-day. The single final entrant was Mr. P. R. Butler's b cb h The Butler. Also are published the final entries for the Lucknow Spring Meeting.

There is nothing like straw for a horse's bedding, and possibly the great superiority of England's horses has been partly due to the system of bedding. The method is seen to perfection in a racing stable. The boys are taught by the head lad to bed up in the most exact way. There is some straw added daily and some taken away, but the bed is always clean and soft, brought up at the sides of the box or stall at the right height and angle, and with no bare or uneven spots anywhere. It looks quite an art to see a horse bedded up at stable time, and as the door closes the racer looks as if he has nothing to do but to enjoy his corn, his lump of hay, and then to sleep quietly on this perfect bed. You never used to see the same thing in any other country. In France le garcon d'ecurie would take hold of a bundle of straw and shake it all over a box, but he had not the skill of the pitchfork. Very few of the natives could ever please the Chantilly trainers, but some were amenable to teaching. When the late Emperor of the French settled into his dignity and court in Paris he determined to fill the imperial stables with good hunters, carriage horses and hacks, and, just as some epicures would have none but French cooks, Napoleon III. bethought himself of none but English stablemen. This caused a small revolution amongst the native grooms, and their demands had to be allowed excepting that the Emperor would persist in retaining the services of his stud groom, Mr. Gamble, and the latter deplored that his new staff could not dress a horse properly, and, far more important still, they could not bed him up.

The exploits of a man-eating horse are thus described by Captain James Creagh, late 1st Royals, in a home paper :—"During the second year of the Indian Mutiny I was riding along the road just outside Secunderabad, the largest military cantonment in India, and in the direction of the great city of Hyderabad, about five miles off. At that time no European, unless by permission and strongly guarded, dared venture inside its gates; for, had one done so, he would have been set upon and slain. The city—a hot-bed of fanaticism—was filled with marauders, ruffians, murderers, and savages from all parts of India, even of Asia, and animated with deadly hatred of Englishmen; everyone prowled about the crooked streets, armed to the teeth; there were no police, and the people lived in a state of anarchy.

"A horseman—a good specimen of the city ruffian—and a native of this pleasant spot, passed me on the road. His white turban shaded a black face, expressive of all the evil passions, cruelty, ferocity, and hatred of mankind, especially of misbelievers and Englishmen; and his appearance was not improved by a pair of enormous whiskers, dyed bright red, and stretching straight out, to the distance of about a foot, from the sides of his sooty cheeks. He was mounted on an excessively showy, dark bay horse, whose arched neck, dilated nostrils, long mane and tail, and remarkably fiery eyes excited my youthful admiration. I was in want of a horse, and the syce, by whom I was accompanied, and who spoke a few words of English, acted as interpreter. The horse stood straight up on his hind legs, and smartly coming down on his fore ones lowered his head nearly to the ground and let out behind, and, greatly to my alarm, repeated the performance several times.

"'For God's sake, sir, let yourself off or he'll be over on top of you,' shouted one of the soldiers of the main guard who had been a groom previous to his enlistment; and, following his advice, I dropped down on my feet and close to the brute's tail. Bucephalus shrieked, pirouetted, pawed with his fore feet, and kicked, till attracted by a coolie about 100 yards off, he made for him, open-mouthed and as hard as he could lay legs to the ground. The yells of the terrified black man vied with those of the horse, and both together produced a volume of sound which caused the whole guard to turn out, the Sepoys looking on stolidly, while the loud laughter of the soldiery manifested great amusement at the show. Just before Bucephalus reached the coolie the latter, with great agility, scrambled over a high wall fortunately for him close by, and the former—baulked of his prey—returned open-mouthed, and at a tremendous pace, back towards the main guard. Both sepoys and soldiers rushed into the rooms, and slammed the doors. The sentry came to the "charge," and having run up into a verandah on the first floor of the guard house, I watched from a safe point the gyrations of the mad horse till they were stopped by the red-whiskered man and some of his confederates, who, having cleverly lassoed him, again blindfolded him and led him away. I never heard of him again, but was told that such brutes—called by the natives 'man-eaters'—are not uncommon in India, and that the one of which I had had such a disagreeable experience, had probably been drugged in the hope that he might have been quiet for an hour's ride."

A slip of the pen last week made us quote rvana as the horse which returned Rs. 1,593 on totalisator. We should have written Cheer Up.

Calcutta is being subjected to what looks almost like a Madras invasion. Messrs. Eardley Norton and Barton have come up to practise at the Bar, and now we find the well known-firm of Messrs. P. Orr and Sons about to establish a branch of their business in the premises at present occupied by A. Stephen, the jeweller. We welcome the advent of our friends from "down south" and have little doubt their magnificent and valuable stock will provide Chowringhee with a gold and silver smith's establishment worthy of the main thoroughfare of the second city of the Empire. They open early next month if all goes well.

The following short hints on horse feeding are intended not for the experienced, but in the hope that some owners who, with the best intentions, know nothing of the delicate organization of the interior economy of a horse, may be induced to pay more attention to the feeding of that useful animal.

All probably know that a horse requires three meals a day, but are not careful of the proper interval of four to five hours between each meal. Few, for instance, know or care to know the time required for digestion—namely, at least two hours for oats and three hours for hay—so that the hay should be given in the evening when the day's work is over. The evening meal should be, of course, the most substantial, for, the work being over, there is ample time for rest and digestion, and for the renewal of exhausted tissue or muscle.

Some horses are such shy feeders as to eat only at evening or night. Feeding should be regular, and the horse required to work as little as possible on a loaded stomach, and an interval of half an hour should elapse before food is given to a heated and tired animal. It is equally injurious to feed a horse too often or too seldom, both being productive of the same result—namely, colic. The horse fed at too long intervals is apt to fret and knock about, eats too greedily when he gets the chance and is apt to become a cribber. Food, then should be given about every five hours, when the previous meal is digested before charging the stomach again. But little food or water should be given during short stoppages, in order that both stomach and bladder may not be overcharged while at work. Most people know how a bucket of water will stop a race horse, but few think how the overcharged stomach affects the lungs of a horse when at work. A horse when fed while heated and out of breath cannot digest its food, and the result is diarrhœa, or, curiously enough the extreme opposite, in the form of colic or indigestion.

Messrs. Swallow and Ariell, Ld., of Melbourne present us with a very pretty calendar surmounted by a coloured picture of an Australian sylvan scene with harvesters in the foreground: in its leafy luxuriance and deep tints it might be an autumnal scene from the old homeland. A big poster also issued by the firm is attractive and not lacking in humour: it represents a beautiful English child offering a biscuit to an infant aborigine slung on the back of a typical "gin."

Our sporting monarch was able to enjoy thirty-five days' racing last year, though absence from England prevented him from being at the first two of the three spring meetings at Newmarket. His first appearance on a racecourse was at Kempton on 11th and 12th May, and he was at Newmarket for three days in the following week. His Majesty was at Epsom all four days (30th May to 2nd June), and again at Ascot 19th to 22nd June, and he would, in the ordinary course of events, have been accompanied by Queen Alexandra, who, when not in mourning, usually favours these two meetings as well as Goodwood with her presence. The King was again at Newmarket in July, being present all seven days; and on 20th July he was at Sandown for the Eclipse Stakes. He was at Goodwood, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, for the four days (31st July to 3rd August); and, as he went to Marienbad soon after, he was not seen on a racecourse again until Doncaster, when he was again the guest of Lord Savile. The King went only three days to the races, Thursday being devoted to a motor drive through the Dukeries; and, as he proceeded direct to Scotland from Doncaster, he could not be at Newmarket for the first of the three autumn meetings. But his Majesty was at Newmarket for three of the four days of the Second October meeting (10th to 12th October), and for all the four days of the Houghton meeting (23rd to 26th October).

A snowstorm unparalleled in ferocity during the last quarter of a century holds the Highlands in its grasp, and at the time of writing has little appearance of relaxation, writes an English sporting contemporary. Christmas Day was crisp and frosty, and although snow threatened all day, it was midnight ere it began to descend in that smooth, mealy form so portentous of long continuance. And fall it did, in real earnest. All Wednesday and Thursday snow fell heavily, accompanied by a biting wind that drove the snow into huge wreaths, cutting through fur and feather, blocking up railways and mail-coaches, and bringing nearly every country district and hamlet into a state of splendid and enforced isolation. To find its equal one has to go back into the early eighties, and even then the elements were, perhaps, less bitter and severe. Deer were driven before the storm, choosing to sweep down into the woods rather than stay where no footed animal could live. In the wooded retreats there was at least shelter, and underneath the snow some rich grass, and deer are grand snow-scrapers.

Lions are evidently rather too thick in Portuguese East Africa, as the Compantria da Boror, whose head office is at Quilemane, is offering most liberal terms to huntsmen for their destruction. In addition to paying for the licences and permits of the hunters, the Compantria offers a reward of £5 for every lion killed in the company's lands, and the slayer can keep the skins of every lion he shoots; and these skins, we may remark, fetch very good prices.

It is painful to observe how the advance of science robs of their odour of sanctity many of the most respected animal heroes of our youth. The latest of our friends to be dragged from his pedestal is the African secretary-bird, which all properly brought up children used to be taught to venerate, in the course of early studies in geography or the art of reading, for its wise and philanthropic labours in killing off venomous serpents. Now, however, African ornithologists have proved that it is an inveterate destroyer of game birds, and a bird to be outlawed and abhorred; while even its former respectable name of the "secretary-bird" has been altered into the unpleasant title of the "secretary-vulture."

A correspondent writes:—"As you very truly remarked in reference to the First and Second Extra Meeting in Calcutta this season, Mr. 'Johnny Armstrong' was conspicuous by his absence; but unless something radically wrong happened to my race-glasses, that enterprising individual was rather too obtrusive at the Second Meeting!

"Last Saturday in the Bhowanipur Plate, we saw sixteen runners, in my humble opinion and in that of many others with whom I have discussed the matter, far too many for a five furlong race on the Calcutta Course as it at present exists. It was a pity motives of economy were allowed to weigh with the wealthy C.T.C. and that the race was not divided for until the course is widened, it is almost impossible to get satisfactory results out of a field of more than a dozen, whether these results are viewed from the standpoint of the sportsman, the spectator or the punter. It seems to me that the uninteresting and really redundant Pony Purse, in which there were only two runners (!) might have been wedged in much earlier in the programme so as to have admitted of the dividing I suggest without in the least effecting that two horse show. Besides, the sooner we put an end to pony racing the better; it is dying, why not stamp it out altogether in Calcutta at least and leave it to the big mofussil racing centres where it flourishes?

"In respect of forfeits in a place like Calcutta it appears to me that where the conditions set forth that 'top weight not accepting the weights will be raised etc., etc.' such condition should read 'top weight not running should be declared an hour before the time for starting the race etc., etc.' for only in this way, it seems to me, can sufficient time be given in which owners can arrange for jockeys to carry proper weight."

Our Bombay correspondent writes:—Last Saturday the Sixth Extra Meeting filled, and some good blood was seen out in each case. The Newmarket Plate was a most open race in which, of course, Killua was installed favourite, place money coming for Baritone, Vocalist, and Adelaide. Considering she won the Sydney Plate in 1min. 3secs., carrying 9st. 12lbs. there was every justification in sending the pony out at twos as with a stone and 9lbs. off her back she would be sure to go very close on 1min. 2secs. The race, as it happens, was run in 1min. 2⅕secs. and Killua held her fairly safe by half a length. The fight for places was a grand one, Killua, Gun Metal, and Vocalist rattled down the straight with barely half a length between each and Baritone quite three lengths behind at the distance; the latter just beat Vocalist on the post, a head behind the pony. It was one of the fastest finishes I have ever seen.

With Mandeville not quite wound up, Byramji's stable had another good thing for the Adelaide Plate for which five went out, all except Mr. Hunter's Achievement who, though good looking, cannot stand more than 13-3. Comeback was, of course, a hot favourite, and after allowing Koko and Mandeville to make the running, drew up at the bend, had the latter beat and was content to win by half a length from his stable companion, though I am inclined to think he could not have gone very much faster.

In more ways than one, the Little Arab Plate was a peculiar one thought to be in the hands of Byramji's lot again. When the betting started Mint was at evens and Little Joker threes, but gradually the grey's price shortened till he went out a decided favourite just a trifle above evens and Mint twos. Apparently expecting the grey, the stable must have been on good terms with themselves when they saw him take up the running from Young Gazelle and enter the straight like a winner. Shanwar, however, had hung on to him and after a short struggle forged ahead and Little Joker shot his bolt letting Darby up. Williams was just behind on Mint and coming with a wet sail seemed sure to land home in front, but Mujeed got to work on Shanwar who gamely staved the challenge off by a neck with Darby only a head behind the chestnut.

Antica, in the Church Gate Plate, showed himself a game stayer. Mudlool was equal favourite and his insignificant running was due more to the grey's improvement than his bad running. Once more Vedas, who found place money, failed to stay further than the bend after leading by five lengths. Ashroff was the surprise packet, but Antica overhauled him fast in the straight and won comfortably.

The first of the three Nurseries proved an upset as a strong favourite in Lucky Prince found a master in Nazzar whose win was most convincing.

The second also lost punters money as Little Sanaya ran most disappointingly and could not answer when the whip came out. Salanic looked good now, but Anee came through full of running with Matlik who beat Salanic by a head, the former winning well in hand.

There was a third set back for punters on the new ones as both Madras and Rackhan found an outsider in Caroon too good for them. At the bend Rackhan held the lead, but once more went very wide and with Squire was passed by Caroon who won by close on a length, Squire beating Rackhan who does not give promise of staying.

On both hunting days last week there was a kill though that on Thursday was but a short run. The meet on the 13th was at Sahar Hill, but at the Marole Caves hounds were at fault and it was some time before they got going again. The jack, as a matter of fact, was in hiding in the thick cactus from which he was eventually hunted into the Goregaon jungles where he was run down with the field well up.

Parla was the rendezvous for the 17th and putting up a jack immediately hounds ran him down after a short, fast gallop over the melon ground. At the pipe they soon found again, but this one proved a jinker. So well have hounds hunted throughout, however, that they were not to be tricked and, after a run along the railway, bowled him over.

Three events were sailed off at the Yacht Club last Saturday, only three sailed in the first two, the third had eight starters.

In the "A" Class Handicap the scratch boat Eileen led the whole way increasing steadily, but Melody also sailed well and saved her time comfortably beating Turquoise who was giving her 3½ minutes.

Trixie scratching left only three in for the "B" Class, but the race between the scratch boats, Pixie and Sayonara was an exciting one; Erin was never in it. The two raced level and the race was in doubt till very near home when Mr. Aspinwall's boat just got ahead and won.

Another good race was that for "D" Class for which eight sailed and Tomtit took a long lead from Meg and won the Class prize, but Meg could not save her time from Midget, Clutha and Maud who were sailing well together. Midget got the best of it after an exciting race and won the handicap with Jean second. Clutha, however, was flying a protest flag and it seems was not given room by Jean at North Karanja Buoy. No decision has been arrived at.

The batch of stallions brought out for Government arrived on the Hindoo, and are stabled at the Bombay Stable Co., Byculla. They have arrived in splendid condition and a fine-looking lot of seven. The two which stand out are General Cronje and Sandbag, both well-known at Home, the former being by Gallinule—Moira and his finish behind Pharisee in the City and Suburban will be remembered. The latter is a Carbine out of Sanderling and has run no less than eighty-one times! A grand looking Arab bred by Mr. W. Blunt. The others are Sforza by Galiazo—Sweet Lavender, Ozone by Ocean Wave—Bit of Fun, Kirkbride by Bread Knife—Florianthe, Bos Croker by Ravensbury—Harton Rose.

Athletic Notes.

THE two local teams who have qualified for the final stages of the Minto Fête Football tournament are the Customs F.C. and the Northumberland Fusiliers. The Calcutta division of the competition has not been particularly interesting. The Calcutta-Mohan Bagan incident excluded two teams, the Hornets and the Howrah United Club scratched, while the H.L.I., R.G.A. Hughli Defence, and E.B.S.R. were defeated in their matches. The other teams who have qualified in their respective divisions to take part are the Royal Irish Rifles (Meerut), Gordon Highlanders (Peshawar), the Queen's (Rawalpindi), Glosters (Lahore), Warwicks (Quetta), East Surrey (Mhow), Royal Scots (Poona), Durham L.I. (Lucknow), and Manchesters (Secunderabad).

The long-anticipated contest for the heavy-weight championship of the world has at last been ratified. James J. Jeffries has come out of his retirement, and appended his signature to articles for a world's championship battle with Bill Squires, of Australia. This interesting event took place at San Francisco on Saturday, the 29th ultimo, in the presence of representatives of the Rhyolite Club, Nevada, who have agreed to give a purse of £6,000 in April next, the winner to receive 60 per cent., and the loser 40 per cent. as their respective shares. Queensberry Rules are to govern the contest, and five-ounce gloves to be used. Squires cabled his acceptance, and is leaving for America almost immediately.

Jeffries holds a unique record, and at the best he was one of the greatest pugilists the world has ever known. Born at Carroll, Ohio, in 1875, he stands 6ft. 1¼in. high, and his best fighting weight was 15st. When he meets Squires he will probably be at least 16st., which is far too much weight for a nimble man to carry. Jeffries, possessed of natural fighting ability, tackled big game right away, and in his first year he boxed twenty rounds draws with Gus Ruhlin (the Akron giant, who defeated Tom Sharkey at the National Sporting Club, London, in June 1902), and Joe Choynski. In 1898 he whipped Joe Goddard (four rounds), the late Peter Jackson (three rounds), Peter Everett (three rounds), Tom Sharkey (twenty rounds), and Bob Armstrong (ten rounds). Since then he has twice beaten Jim Corbett and Bob Fitzsimmons, and overcome Gus Ruhlin, Hank Griffen, and Jack Munroe: but the latter can claim a victory over Jeffries at Butte in 1902. Jeffries was proclaimed champion in 1899, when he defeated Bob Fitzsimmons in eleven rounds at Coney Island, New York, and since that time the title has been in his keeping.

Squires was born in Narrabri, New South Wales, in 1879. He is 5ft. 9½in. in height, and weighs 12st. 8lbs. During his brief career in the ring he has met and defeated every heavy-weight of note in the Colonies, and is regarded as a second Frank Slavin, who hailed from the same country. On 6th November last Squires beat Peter Kling (Sydney) at Ascot Racecourse, Sydney, in three rounds for the heavy-weight championship of Australia. Little more than a week ago the Australian defeated Mick Williams, the South African champion, at Melbourne, in the record time of 45secs. His other battles are as follow:—Beat Tucker (two rounds), at Wallsend; Mick Ryan (three and four rounds), at Wallsend; Heckenberg

(three rounds), in Newcastle; Starlight (four rounds), in Melbourne; Felix (eleven rounds), in Newcastle; beaten on a foul by Cripps (eight rounds), in Sydney; beat Felix (two rounds), in Sydney; Farley (one round), in Newcastle; Fenessey (four rounds), in Melbourne; Kernick (three rounds), in Melbourne; Felix seven rounds), in Sydney; Ed. The ruling clubs cannot be congratulated on the action they have taken regarding the Open Golf Championship, remarks The World. For two or three years it has been evident that some weeding-out system must be adopted, as the existing conditions imposed far too great a strain on the competitors, and rendered the tournament unwieldy and congested. By the old plan, initiated in 1898, the tournament lasted for three days, and competitors who were more than twenty strokes behind the leader at the end of the first day (two rounds) were compulsorily retired. More recently the twenty strokes were reduced to fifteen, without the least effect in the way of limiting the entries. Under the new regulations, which will come into force at Hoylake next June, a fourth day is added to the tournament. On the first two days the competitors will play qualifying rounds over seventy-two holes, and players to the number of thirty who come within the limit of fifteen strokes will fight out the issue on the last two days. It is obvious that the alteration is not sufficiently drastic. Every year the number of entrants increases, and the congestion on the first two days of the tournament will be as bad as, if not worse than, ever.

Some idea may be gleaned of the increasing popularity the motor is acquiring in the United States from the fact that the outturn of these vehicles of all descriptions rose from 3,500 in 1900 to 38,000 in the year just closed, while all the car-building firms have their hands full of order. Pretty much the same tale comes from Europe. Lest horse owners and breeders should feel alarmed at the passing of "man's friend" we cull from a London police report that, what an inspector described as "sausage horses," fetch between £16 and £17 each for the Amsterdam market. The introduction of the motor 'buses into Calcutta should throw a good number of our tiecа tats on owners' hands, so here's a chance for some enterprising individual to follow in the footsteps of the late lamented Mr. Croft to establish a German (?) saveloy factory in our midst.

G. Towns and Durnan have signed articles for a race for the world's sculling championship on the Nepean River for £500 aside to take place on 2nd March.

If an absolutely filled house, an enthusiastic audience, and numerous recalls spell success, then certainly it was success spelt with a capital S that attended the first concert given by Madame Hester Otway at the Calcutta Concert Hall last Saturday. To all true music lovers, the programme read an alluring one, and the sympathetic rendering of the items contributed by the four violins of l'Orchestre du Conservatoire, who with Mr. Alec Marsh and Mr. Ralli, together with Mrs. Denison Ross as accompanist, also assisted, was not one of the least pleasing features of the evening's entertainment. This opened with the familiar air, dear to all German hearts, of the National hymn—Vater Prüne Du mit Segen—the ever recurring melody of which floats through every movement of the Quatuoren Si Maj. The celebrated contralto herself was in excellent form, and a charming personality, combined with her very evident gift of a lovely voice, absolutely pure in tone and quality, soon won the sympathies of her hearers, who numbered amongst them Her Excellency Lady Minto with a party from Government House, the Chief Justice and all the élite of Calcutta. In her choice of five good items and several happily chosen encores, which the enthusiastic audience would not be denied, Madame Otway convinced us of her ability to sing equally well in four different languages, and, to the initiated Still wie die Nacht and Ich grolle nicht, with which two gems she delighted her hearers in the early part of the programme, were perhaps intrinsically the best, though they did not appeal to the greater part of the audience quite so successfully as The Enchantress, in which, as in most of the compositions of the same author, there is a distinct effort to obtain effect. In the Che Faro Madame Otway convinced us of her ability to faithfully interpret Gluck's music, although may be some of us have heard it sung with a thought more passion. After the fatiguing recitative and cantabile from Gounod's Reine de Saba it was more than obliging of the lady to respond to repeated recalls in a charming little French morceau, which was rendered by her in the same sportive fancy in which the composer had conceived it, while amongst other encores Kathleen Mavourneen, sung with great feeling, stood out pre-eminently as the most popular. In the person of Mrs. Denison Ross was provided a skilled accompanist, but being so, it was the more noticeable that she was more than a trifle too loud in her accompaniment of Mr. Ralli's 'cello solo, the allegro from Grieg's sonata in A minor, which somewhat marred this item. Mr. Alec Marsh contributed a couple of songs from "In an Indian Garden," the second of which, The Temple Bells, was a happier selection than the first. Wieniawsky's Legende was played by M. Sandre of l'Orchestre Conservatoire in a perfectly finished manner, handicapped as he too was by rather indifferent acompanying. Madame Hester Otway's second concert takes place next Saturday, the 26th instant, when those of us who had the pleasure of being present at her first will no doubt renew that felicity, and those who were unfortunate enough not to have yet heard this charming lady will do well to secure seats.

The Rink still continues to flourish, and at the races last week the attendance was phenomenally large, and the valuable prizes were contested with great eagerness and much skill. The first item on the programme was a one mile handicap on roller skates which was won by O. Mylne, who started from scratch. Private Reid distinguished himself in the 220 yards flat race, while in a similar race for amateurs J. Pybus came in first. In the quarter mile flat race for soldiers, Bombardier Humphreys came in first. To-night's Carnival will be followed by a ball, so that there is no doubt that the genial and ubiquitous proprietor as the season wanes, and the days of the rinker grow less in the land, still maintains the reputation for popularity and fun always held so well by the Columbia Rink.

THE Great Frost—the halfpenny papers were a little premature in awarding it the dignity of capitals—came to an abrupt end with the old year, and until last night—when it froze hard—there was a steady thaw to clear the streets. The frost was very sharp while it lasted and the snowfall in parts of the kingdom was something like a record. It is not often we hear of drifts twenty feet deep in the Border counties, and it must be many years since all communication between the north of Scotland and the south was cut off so completely as was the case. Trains have been stopped by the drifts and then to aggravate matters relief trains bringing food have been stopped. In many cases the drivers were obliged to return to their starting point and count themselves fortunate to get there. The deaths from exposure during the last days and nights of the year were numerous.

The Arbroath accident was the only serious one arising from the snow storm. The Dundee Aberdeen express on Friday afternoon was one of the trains which had to stop and return; and while running back at a rate of twenty miles an hour through heavily falling snow it collided with a local train standing at the Elliott Junction platform. Twenty-one passengers and others were killed or have died of their injuries and the list of injured is a long one. How the accident happened we shall not know until the Board of Trade official discloses the result of his enquiry. The railway between Elliott and Arbroath runs along the coast and is very exposed, and it seems likely that the signals were obscured by snow or that the mechanism was frozen. A painful sensation was caused on Monday by the announcement that the driver of the express, Gourlay by name, had been arrested. It is reported that he was drunk when the collision occurred: but his state soon after the disaster in which he was hurt is unofficially explained by the statement that one of those who helped in the work of rescue gave him a stiff drink of spirits to revive him.

I doubt whether any offer of burial in Westminster Abbey has evoked more universal approval than that tendered on Monday by the Dean to the executors of the late Baroness Burdett Coutts, whose death at the age of 92 occurred at Stratton Street on Sunday morning. Lady Burdett Coutts was something more than a personage; she was an institution for that during sixty years she had used her enormous wealth with a unique combination of wisdom and generosity. She came into her fortune in 1837: it is commonly supposed that fortune exceeded a million in ready investments and cash, and in addition she enjoyed half the profits of the famous bank founded by her grandfather. Perhaps the most notable feature of the lady's charities was the fact that in very many Sirs,—In reply to your enquiry as to whether I have derived satisfaction from your Alterative Horse Powders, I beg to say I should not have sent for other lots had I not found them beneficial for their intended purpose. I don't approve of physicing horses, but these Powders seem to possess a harmless and special virtue. cases they anticipated the more business like methods of a more modern day. She never attempted for example to bolster up a decaying industry like the Spitalfields silk weavers: she financed endeavours to develop an industry to replace it. Another feature of her generosity was its catholicity: she founded and endowed colonial bishoprics and she organised the Relief Fund for the "Unspeakeable Turk" in 1877-78. She built endowed institutes for the betterment of the poor and was a tower of strength and discretion to the R. S. P. C. A. —a body not always discreet in its proceedings. She started and endowed schools for cooking and sewing, and she set the fishing industry on its feet in some of the poorest districts of the West of Ireland. She had inherited all the shrewdness, foresight and practical good sense of her grandfather Thomas Coutts, and these qualities exercised with unique generosity over her great wealth made the Baroness the first philanthropist of the day: using the word in its best sense.

You would remember the storm of acclamation which welcomed Queen Victoria's decision to make Miss Burdett Coutts a peeress in her own right, in 1871; and its renewal the next year when she received the freedom of the city, the only time this honour has been conferred upon a lady. And no doubt you remember the utter astonishment with which the announcement of her approaching marriage was received in 1881: the surprise was indeed pardonable: for who could ever have expected that the independent Baroness with her well known detestation of politics at the age of 67 would marry a young politician of 30? Mr. Ashmead Bartlett, by the way, was never her private secretary: he was the honorary and very capable administrator of her Turkish Relief Fund. If her husband owed anything to her name for his election for Westminster he owed nothing to her exertions; true to her antipathy she never spoke or wrote a word to aid his candidature.

Mr. Haldane's speech on the Auxiliary forces made at Auchterarder on Saturday was not very illuminating. The nation is going to ask the Volunteers "to accept better organisation;" an organisation such as will fit them for war. What the better organisation is to be he did not say; but that may be because he had so much to say about the removal of the Scots Greys from Piers Hill barracks and to explain why those quarters could be used for artillery while unsuitable for cavalry. I do not suppose we need attach undue importance to Mr. Haldane's summary of his duty "to see that the Army, if it existed at all, should exist in a state of readiness, etc.;" but in view of radical views, the parenthetical qualification cannot be regarded as perfectly happy.

Sir John Brunner, M.P., and the eighty-eight Liberal and Labour members who memorialised the Lord Chancellor on the subject of appointments to the Commission of the Peace have received a polite but crushing snub from Lord Loreburn. The memorialists began by urging the propriety of preserving the bench free from the taint of party: and proceeded to amplify the case for appointing more Liberals: which the Lord Chancellor, naturally, "could not reconcile" with the avowed object of the memorial. It is, of course, true that conservative justices vastly outnumber their Liberal Colleagues: twelve years ago they were as 8 to 1, now as about 13 to 4; but if the one party has nearly all the intelligence, education and social position, it seems only reasonable that that party should provide the country with J. P.'s. Mr. Gladstone's "workman magistrates" did not prove a remarkable success.

The addition to the Statute Book of the New Street Betting Act has brought Sir Walter Gilbey into print with a plea for the introduction of the "tote." Sir Walter, with characteristic straightforwardness and sturdy good sense, points out that Acts of Parliament can no more abolish betting than abolish the stock exchange; and he urges that this means should be taken to give an innate human instinct fair play, to the profit of the Treasury. Mr. John Hawke, in the snug and self-satisfied tone of the faddist gratified, furnishes a very weak reply to Sir Walter on behalf of the Anti-gambling league. The only place in England where I have ever seen the "tote" system applied was at Ranelagh when the day's entertainment was pony-racing. The people took to it more than kindly as soon as they understood the business. Why should we not adopt it in England.

Are we to have a channel tunnel or not? The promoters of the scheme are girding up their loins to approach Parliament on the subject and the military spokesmen are up in arms or down in pen and ink. It is difficult to see what advantage the country can gain from the tunnel should it ever be made; and it is not easy to see how it will ever pay—but that is the promoters' affair. The strategic objections are great: we need not fear invasion by train; but it is pointed out that capture of the Dover terminous by raid is not at all impossible and then what can the navy do? It really does not seem worth while to sacrifice the strange advantage of the channel to spare passengers an hour's sea-sick discomfort.

A curious and disgraceful state of affairs has come into being at Tulse Hill a south western suburb about 4 miles from Charing Cross. There is at Tulse Hill a long row of 60 or 70 detached houses with gardens backing on Brockwell Park. Brockwell Park is under the L. C. C.; the police cannot enter it after closing time and the L. C. C. have no concern with the houses adjoining. The result has been a long succession of successful burglaries, nearly every house has been visited during the past five years; one twice in the last two months. Appeals to the police are useless because the L. C. C. replies that burglaries are no business of theirs and appeals to the police are equally useless because the L. C. C. refuse to allow them to patrol the Park at night. Priceless indeed the blessings of local self-Government by such as we elect to conduct it?

I ought to have referred last week to Mr. Tree's production on the Thursday evening of "Antony and Cleopatra." The play has been remodelled in four acts consisting in all of thirteen scenes—it was manifestly necessary to dispense with the playwright's division which I reckon up to forty-two. I must confess that the result hardly satisfies: we look for spectacular effects in this play and we get them: we get them, to my thinking, in excess. For example in Act II, Scene 11 of the original Domitin Enobarbus (Mr. Lyn Harding), gives Agrippa and Mecœnas a full description of Cleopatra and her barge. At His Majesty's, the gentleman gives the description and does it very well: but Mr. Tree cannot resist the temptation to produce so gorgeous a sight and he does it admirably. The same thing occurs in connection with Octavius Cæsar's account of Antony's appearance with Cleopatra in Alexandria: the description is given also an impressive and gorgeous tableau. The mere spectator feels that these tableaux might be left to speak for themselves; if a purist he would keep the lines and cut out the tableaux. In other details unusual violence is done to the text: Shakespeare would no doubt appreciate the scenery and effects at his Majesty's; but I doubt whether his shade would sit patiently in the stage box while the latter portions, particularly of his play, are mangled and dovetailed and cut and rejoined as is the case here. I did not much care for Mr. Tree's Anthony; it lacks sincerity; nor does Miss Constance Collier quite fulfil my idea of Cleopatra who has always seemed to me the embodiment of serpent like grace. Octavia was particularly well done by Miss Maud Cressall and most of the minor parts were excellently filled.

Another item omitted last week was the opening of the Hicks Theatre on Thursday evening and the translation from the Aldwych Theatre thereto of the "Beauty of Bath." I do not know that there is much to be said concerning the new house at the corner of Rupert Street and Shaftesbury Avenue. The stalls are roomy and comfortable beyond the standard of ordinary stalls, and the auditorium is very beautifully upholstered in pink, white and gold. It appeared to me that the piece "went" with more vigour and go than ever; a result, perhaps, of the satisfaction felt by the whole company at having a home of their own.

The "Doctor's Dilemma" has been put into the evening bill at the Court. The unanimous condemnation with which the death scene was received did not move Mr. Bernard Shaw—nobody ever did not move Mr. Bernard Shaw—nobody ever expected it would, whatever their hopes and it remains: a blot on a play whose dialogue is perhaps the cleverest the author has ever written.

"Amasis" which has been running at the New since last July was transferred to the Criterion on Monday. Pharaoh has a good deal more to do since the piece was remodelled and as Mr. Rutland Barrington in the part is the backbone of the clever absurdity the change is a decided improvement. A great deal of new "business" has been worked in since I saw the play in the summer.

Various revivals are billed for production within the next few days. "Dorothy o' the Hall" is to be revived at the New, pending production of a piece called "Matt of Merrymount" which has had some provincial success. "Lady Huntworth's Experiment" is to be revived with Miss Compton in the name part which fitted her so well and Miss Pollie Emery as Keziah. "The Bondman" is to be put on at the Adelphi with Miss Wynne Matheson in Mrs. Patrick Campbell's part. Mr. Frohman has imported a new supply of American girls to play in "Nelly Neil" a new musical piece which will be produced at Mr. Aldwych next Thursday. I wonder how the Parisians will like "Peter Pan:" Mr. Frohman is going to produce it in Paris.

The O. P. Club gave a dinner at the Hotel Cecil on Sunday night to celebrate the revival of Savoy Opera. Mr. W. S. Gilbert (why has he never been knighted?) was the guest of the evening and the 450 diners included a large number of actors and actresses whose names were closely associated with Gilbert and Sullivan Opera in old days. Mr. Gilbert's speech was very interesting; not the least interesting item was what he told us about "Ruddigore" which play has always been regarded as the one failure of the series. It ran for eight months, and Mr. Gilbert said that it put £7,000 into his pocket. If this be the fruit of failure what is the fruit of Savoy success?

Lady Clancarty, so well known aforetime as Belle Bilton of variety stage and after as Lady Dunlo who figured in the subsequent divorce suit, died on Monday at Garbally, County Galway. She had undergone an operation for cancer in Paris, but in her case the knife failed to give her the brief extension of life it procures in some cases. Lady Clancarty had devoted her energies largely to charity since her husband's accession to the title, and was deservedly esteemed and respected in County Galway.

"Vanity Fair" has changed hands again: important changes are to be made in the paper under the new editor, Mr. Frank Harris; I hope these will not affect the cartoons.

First fruits of the new act to relieve Trades Union funds of all responsibility: the Free Labour Union advertises its preparedness to supply stalwart men as "counter pickets" where the peaceful pickets, towards whom the Government display such tenderness, happen to put in appearance. Where the peaceful and counter pickets meet I anticipate in the words of Artemus Ward "there will be a fite."

THE SHADIPALLY JHEELS.

NEAR Shadipally, in Sind, are some of the best duck jheels in India. I spent a few days there at the end of 1903, and had excellent sport. A brother officer, B—, went up with me from Karachi, and we stayed in a resthouse close to Shadipally railway station, going to our ground each day on camels. The natives who act as beaters most thoroughly understand their work, and one can always rely on getting plenty of shooting. We exploited two swamps only, the Chota and Burra Chaylee Jheels. The first is five, and the second seven miles from Shadipally. A feature of the Sind marshes is the great extent of high reeds. The density of the cover makes the percentage of birds lost very high. I estimated that 20 to 25 per cent. of the ducks killed, or well hit, were never gathered. As many of the birds come over very high I think that one should use a specially powerful gun, in order to make the best of the shooting. An eight pound full choked 12-bore, chambered for brass perfects, with 1½ ounces of shot, would enable one to do better and neater work than with the ordinary type of game gun. Geese especially have to come very low, for one to be able to bag them with a light shot gun.

Our best day was on Burra Chaylee. There was some deepish water to cross in order to get to our stations at the edge of a vast sea of reeds. We were towed most of the way on grass boats, big cylinders of grass on which one sat astride. When the water shallowed and the boats would go no further, we waded to our respective stands. In front of me as I stood, thigh deep in water, was a great ten-foot wall of reeds. The coolies were in line afar off, and walking steadily through the marsh towards us, sent the birds beautifully overhead. The swift flight of the pochard and teal tested one's hand and eye to the uttermost. When later on the spot-bills came over, it was quite a relief to turn one's artillery on these big and comparatively slow going grey duck, after the strain of endeavouring to allow enough ahead for the lightning speed of the smaller birds. What a triumphant moment it was, when four spot-bills sailed over, and my right barrel crumpled up the two big drakes flying incautiously close together, while the left accounted for one of the remaining ducks!

A grey goose came over, too, and then it was I mourned the lack of a more powerful gun. Hit hard with both barrels he went on, and I saw him come down in the dim distance. This bird was never recovered. The shooting over, we gathered our duck. I had had the better luck, my pick up being forty one against B—'s thirty. I had one black backed goose (or nukta), 4 mallard, 7 spot-bill, 1 western white-eyed pochard, 5 common pochard, 4 shovellers, 1 gadwall, and 18 teal. B—had a drake pintail amongst his birds. At little Chaylee we did fairly with the duck, and shot a good number of snipe. One day on the small marsh I got a grey goose, 10 mallard, a wigeon, a whistling duck, and a pochard, besides snipe. The snipe were plentiful and I got twenty-six couple one day in addition to some duck.

One smart little lad named Rubayunoo attached himself to me the whole time, acting as retriever. One day he had a great chase after a wounded goose: he eventually caught the big bird and returned in triumph.

Shooting at Shadipally is not at all expensive. The natives who drive the duck over the guns are so skilled in their work, that one only requires a few of them. Another good feature about the sport is that one can get the snipe and duck into Karachi before they are spoilt, so that it is possible to distribute the fruits of the chase among one's friends.

Spaniels would be no use among the high reeds of the Sind jheels. When shooting a marsh in Scotland, which was densely covered with similar high reeds, I found that even a powerful retriever was quite at a discount. The fallen or beaten down reeds lie at right angles to the growing ones and make it impossible for a dog to get through. The only remedy for the high percentage of lost birds is to use a more powerful gun.

FLEUR-DE-LYS.

DEER IN THE ROCKIES.

A FEW years ago, George Newton, an old time Wisconsin schoolmate, who had located in a wild and isolated district, about 60 miles west of Glenwood Springs, invited me to visit him at his ranch, and greatly excited my love for sport by the statement that deer were plentiful thereabouts. I found an ideal western mountain ranch, not more than two hours' drive from a small railway station named DeBeque. His place was situated uppermost on one of the streams entering the Grand river, fully five miles above the nearest neighbouring ranch. Aside from being large, the place was a picturesque one stretching across a valley bordered on each side by abrupt mountains rising to a height of two thousand feet, crested with overtopping ledges or "cap" rock, presenting queer outlines against the sky. Through the valley coursed a trout stream weaving like a strand of silver through meadow and foliage, and a quiet prevailed which could be almost felt in the pure air as breathed. Naturally, my first inquiry was about the deer, and my astonishment can well be conceived when he took me but a short distance from his house that evening, just at the time that all game animals are feeding, and showed to me the slopes of the mountains fairly alive with them. He also showed me bands of rocky mountain sheep perched on the ledges within gunshot of his home. In contemplating the number I might kill in a day I was conscious of a sensation of murder creeping over me, so tame, and undisturbed were the animals. "We only kill what we want to eat," said my friend, "so they are not hunted much." During my stay of two weeks I think I saw fully twelve thousand deer in that vicinity, which may sound like a big story, but it is truthfully stated.

The sport I had contemplated on coming to the ranch did not materialize for they were too thick, so I contented myself with riding about the place testing the timidity of the animals, watching their habits, etc., and was well satisfied on returning to my home with two very nicely pointed antlers of the rocky mountain, or mule eared variety. I was told that this was the favourite feeding ground for deer in winter, and that they migrated in thousands from the higher mountains during the months of September and October to the valleys nestled along the Grand river. In fact I saw them passing over in bands, like flocks of sheep, making deeply beaten paths across the country. Mingling with cattle about the ranch they reached a point almost bordering on domesticity, and my friend showed me how he had to build high fences about his hay stacks to keep them out during the winter. I also noticed that he had a high barbed wire fence about a young orchard to protect that too. The strands were not more than six inches apart, as he said the deer would crawl through an ordinary wire fence.

One morning, rising early, I saw about one hundred deer about five hundred yards from the house grazing in a pasture, drifting towards the stream for a morning drink. Taking a round-about course through the bushes I secreted myself in their line of travel, and without detecting my presence some of them came within twenty feet of the spot where I was concealed. There were a number of fawns in the band, and here for the first time I heard them making a singular noise, which sounded like the mew of an overgrown kitten. Finally an old doe scented me out, and giving a warning snort scampered to cover followed by the entire band. Every deer hunter knows how easily a deer will scent a man; the wind being favourable they will manifest this instinct at very long range. In hunting I have learned to overcome this acuteness of the animal by the use of anise oil, a few drops of which sprinkled on my hunting jacket entirely deceived them. In the mountains there grows a plant known as wild celery, which has a flavour of anise. In this they like to wallow delighted with the smell of the bruised plant. It is not so much the sight of a man that terrifies a deer as the smell of one has been my experience. The use of anise has proved a profitable experiment.

My first trip to the Newton ranch was ten years ago and every year since then I have gone there, usually accompanied by a friend or two, and now the place has become quite a resort for hunters. Last October, one day I counted twenty-eight hunters mostly from Denver and every man had his one deer, all that is allowed to be in possession at one time by the laws of Colorado.

During my hunting seasons at the ranch I have witnessed many pleasing incidents, some of them almost amounting to the dignity of adventure. One experience I recall, which I trust I may be pardoned in relating, as it concerns my wife. She is fond of the recreations of the ranch and usually accompanies me on the hunting trips.

In the fall of 1895 a hunter reported, as he came in one night that he had seen an unusually large buck about two miles above the ranch, which eluded him by hiding in a dense patch of spruce timber. That was the very buck we had been wanting, having seen it on one or two occasions, so we decided to get an early start in the morning, and before daylight were well on the way, afoot. On nearing the place, while it was scarcely yet daylight, we were startled by a succession of growls, snarls, and a thrashing in the brush in the vicinity just where we could not locate, that sounded more like a general dog fight in a country village than anything else. It was some time before the light was sufficient for us to fix the spot when I saw three great timber wolves, about 100 yards distant, up the mountain side, threshing the ground with each other. I dropped my sights on the bunch and fired. They separated, slipping through the brush, and I saw one of them dragging a broken hindleg. On climbing to the place I found that they had been eating a deer and were fighting over the remains.

Turning away from the spot we proceeded on the hunt for the big buck, cautiously passing from one bunch of brush or trees to another, closely scanning the openings, when all of a sudden, as if placed there by magic, the splendid animals appeared on the summit of a bare knoll about 300 yards distant. I had a Ballard rifle mounted with a telescope sight, good for almost any distance, and taking a peep through the tube was more than delighted with the magnificent wide spreading antlers the fellow carried, there being six points on each side nearly perfect in uniformity at that. Sighting the cross hairs I fired. When the animal wheeled around, but still majestically held the summit. Injecting another cartridge I fired again and as before he wheeled partly around, standing rear and quartering towards me. Again I fired and he plunged over the brow of the knoll. We expected to find him on the other side, but on reaching the spot, found only drops of blood, spattered along his trail on the leaves and stones. We trailed the wounded animal for four miles, fully, some times the footprints entirely indistinguishable from the many others, and the dust absorbing the blood. Sometimes the trail was lost and we went in the general direction, crossing and recrossing until a spatter of blood on a leaf or stone betrayed the course of the fleeing deer. On approaching a ridge, a cautious survey was made, and only about 50 yards distant lay the animal with his head in the air keenly alert. With a bound he landed on his feet and dashed away on three legs, plunging into a patch of dense brush where he fell unable to proceed farther, but full of fight. Taking a lighter rifle which my companion carried, a neck shot ended his career.

On examination I found that the two first shots had pierced the antlers on each side at the main fork from the beam as clean as could be done with a drill, and the third shot had broken a hip. The shots had gone high, due to the use of express bullets which hold up well for almost any distance. The gun I used was a 40. 90 calibre, and I had been used to solid balls, which explained the high shooting, as the trajectory of a solid ball is greater than that of the express. The buck was the finest that had been killed in the district for several years, was as fat as the proverbial butter, and weighed, when dressed, 200 pounds. With much difficulty the venison was suspended on a pole, which I elevated by shoulder lifts, a little at a time, my wife slipping a forked pole, placed under the end, with the other end in the fork of a tree, as I lifted, in a manner that hunters will understand; and when we had the proud satisfaction of seeing him well up we started for the return trip to the ranch not having had a bite to eat all day, not even breakfast, where we arrived at 2 P.M., hungry but feeling successful. The next day the deer was brought in on a pack horse, and when the pelt was removed the fat was found to be two inches deep on the saddles.

A HUGE JACK SNIPE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—It may be of interest to some of your readers that yesterday I shot a jack snipe which seemed to me to be of abnormal size and weight. On reaching camp I weighed it most carefully myself and found it weighed slightly more than an ordinary fantail (full) snipe. The exact weight was 4⅞oz. As the average weight for a jack snipe is, I believe, 2½oz. and for an ordinary snipe 4¼oz. it will be seen that it weighed slightly more than the average full snipe.

RIFLE NOTES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—The importation of ·303 and ·450 bore sporting rifles being now forbidden in India and their ammunition being also difficult to obtain in the near future, it seems to me that it would be worth while in many cases for the possessors of these weapons to send them home to be rebored or otherwise altered to take suitable ammunition of a slightly larger calibre.

As regards the Lee-Enfield or Lee Metford this weapon is now being made in ·375 calibre as a sporting arm. It has, I believe, the same breech mechanism and magazine as the ·303, so that possibly ·303 magazine sporting arms might easily be converted into ·375 bores by having their barrels replaced by ·375 bore barrels, or it might perhaps be cheaper to have the ·303 barrels rebored for the ·375 cartridge. Double or single barrel rifles of ·303 gauge could no doubt be rebored to take any suitable cartridge from 315 to ·375 gauge.

Mr. Jefferies, an eminent rifle manufacturer, has just brought out a new ·475 calibre cartridge to take the place of the forbidden ·450. It is of the same kind as the newest and most powerful of the 450 cordite cartridges, but as its bullet is of 500 grains weight in place of 480 grains, it strikes a slightly harder blow with equal muzzle velocity—about 5 000ft. lbs. compared with 4,900ft. lbs. with a muzzle velocity of 2 150ft. secs. No doubt some of the existing ·450 nitro rifles could be rebored and chambered for this cartridge, as the difference in gauge and dimensions is trifling.

With suitable ammunition of about ·475 gauge made in the same varieties as the ·450, it would be possible to convert most of the existing ·450 single-shot and double barrelled rifles into ·475 bores. I wonder if gunmakers will take the matter up.

THE U. P. GAME LAWS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—In continuation of my letter on the subject of the U. P. Shooting rules, printed in your issue of the 3rd January 1907, I wish to bring to public notice that, as I anticipated in my criticisms on Rule 10, the Conservator of this circle, so I am informed, has ruled that exempted officers and annual permit holders in form A on Rs. 100 cannot take friends with them during such period even if they are prepared to pay for them! In other words, they are, if they are to shoot at all, compelled to shoot alone for half the season and for the other half, as the demand for the jungles is, consequent on these very periods of grace much increased, they run a very good chance of not being able to get a permit in form A at all! Why exempted officers and Rs. 100 permit holders should be put under such serious disadvantages as compared with others is incomprehensible and the only effect will be that such officers and annual permit holders will endeavour as far as possible to secure jungles during a permit period. It will not cost exempted officers one pice more to do so, and if they succeed, they will block the jungles so taken by them to the public for 45 days! In other words, under this ruling if I am able to get a particular shooting area for a permit period I can shoot in it uninterruptedly for 45 days in succession, i.e., for the first 15 days as a period of grace alone, for the next 15 days with friends, on payment for them, and for the third 15 days again as a period of grace alone. A more ridiculous state of affairs it does not seem possible to imagine! Of course the Forest Officer, as an Exempted Officer, will be bound by the same ruling, so he, too, if he wishes to have a friend to shoot with him in future, will be compelled to give himself a permit for a permit period which, of course, he can always do and the nett result will be the practical exclusion of the public altogether!

U. P.

SAHARANPUR, 15th January 1907.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—In your issue of 3rd January your correspondent "U. P." of Saharanpur says the "main object of his note is to invite criticisms from any persons interested in them;" that "he personally, falling within the definition of Government Forest Officers, has no axe of his own to grind." As the locality whence "U. P." dates his letter is Saharanpur, his championship of the outsider creates a suspicion which is not dissipated by a careful perusal, and reperusal, of his lengthy letter. Notwithstanding his denial, it is clear that he has an axe to grind—a heavy one that he has been sharpening ever since the new rules came into force—and he has now delivered his blow. "U. P." of Saharanpur's "note" occupies nearly nine columns of your paper, containing, by calculation, eight thousand words; the lines in these nine columns make a continuous length, by calculation, of seventy-five yards! Having bound his victims, the Forest Department, hand and foot with this immense cord, and smothered them with a deluge of verbosity, he has buried the axe, which "he had not to grind," in the brains of these offending officials. Standing on the dividing ridge of his beloved Siwaliks, brandishing his dripping weapon, we outsiders contemplate in awed surprise this modern sporting Shiv!

Up to the 15th September 1906 all district officers were "restricted" by the new rules like the common herd outside the official pale. By dint of hard fighting certain of them won back their places among the "exempted." But this position is much below the commanding one which they held under the old rules

To regain their former standing, "U. P." of Saharanpur (who is evidently one of them) now attempts to use the sporting public as a means towards that end. But, intoxicated by the exuberance of his own verbosity, he has betrayed himself. All through his "note" he suggests suspicions against, and imputes unworthy motives to, the higher officials of the Forest Department who obstruct the path of sporting collectors. The Forest Department are well able to defend themselves and will probably do so at the proper time and in the proper manner. In the meantime the outside public should stand on their guard.

"U. P." of Saharanpur, on account of his official position, cannot discuss these rules "fromthe point of view of the general public," with an unbiassed mind; but he is eminently fitted to criticise them from the point of view of the "hitherto exempted official." The opinion is prevalent that "the interests of district officials, of the private person and of the military officer run entirely counter to one another." Any endeavour of the first to win over the two latter to their side should be viewed with suspicion. In the present instance it is plain that "U. P." of Saharanpur is making a stalking horse of the "general public" for the purpose of getting within range of the only forest game now left him, the Forest Department itself!

The rules picked to pieces by your correspondent are certainly defective in many respects. They will form a good basis for a new set which will doubtless be issued in due course. If "U. P." of Saharanpur had been more temperate in his language, and had confined his criticisms within reasonable limits some good might have come of his study of the new regulations; but he has been so led away by his eagerness to attack the Forest Department that he has succeeded in only exciting suspicion

It would be too great an infliction on your readers to follow your correspondent's example and to spread this letter over nine columns of your paper in the attempt to expose the unfairness and misleading nature of most of his criticisms. Let two instances suffice. "U. P." of Saharanpur says "rule 2 is intended to prevent any sportsman from spearing chital and para from horseback" and he cannot understand "why it should be considered more objectionable to allow a man to spear a chital stag or a para stag by fair riding than to allow him to approach and shoot one from within a few yards from off an elephant." Rule 2 (4) says: "spearing and running with dogs is absolutely prohibited." The horse is not referred to at all. No mention whatever is made of "spearing from horseback." Under rule 5 your correspondent suggests that "Gazetted Forest Officers being exempted might, under this rule, in a comparatively short time, shoot the full number of species allowed to be shot; and that then the outside public would be excluded on the grounds that a sufficient number of a particular species had already been shot." "If there is to be a limit let there be the same limit for one and all, exempted or otherwise." The exact words of this rule are: "The Conservator . . . shall restrict shooting so as to prevent the fixed limit being exceeded. This restriction applies to both permit holders and exempted officers." "U. P." of Saharanpur says Conservators should not have such absolute powers. Who then is to have them? Sporting Collectors of course!

In other parts of his "note" your correspondent says the Forest Department works the rules "tactlessly" and "unfairly," that they tried to prove that game was being exterminated, which is "untue;" that they were reserving the forests for themselves; that they were ignorant of the requirements of sanctuaries; that they have exceeded their powers; that they can easily ensure their own applications being first received and so on

It seems impossible to touch this subject without importing into the discussion this contentious spirit—more's the pity for the outside sporting public.

THE TURF.

GATWICK.

A KEENER twinge in the air sent the smoke-like wreaths of clouds of Wednesday to the rightabout, and left the sun master of a clear sky—a grand day, indeed. At this time of year we do not expect big attendances, nor does the value of the stakes run for hold out expectations of exceptional merit, hence the business part of the community formed the larger portion, and the band played to a small muster in the members' enclosure. Under the care of Mr. Hook, the going had fairly surprised us on the opening day, as we looked for mud and found solid grass, which was all the better for a night's blowing wind, so that good as were the field under existing circumstances, they might have been better, as with the entrance fee paid horses could have had a rare good schooling over a pretty easy country.

FOOTBALL ASSOCIATION RULES.

Although most of the matches in minor competitions were postponed on Saturday because of the Arctic-like surroundings, the majority of the fixtures in the three big leagues were duly brought off. The Plymouth Argyle vs. Portsmouth game was the only one postponed in the Southern League, but in the League Sunderland vs. Newcastle United, and Stoke vs. Liverpool could not be played. In the Second Division, ten games were decided, and 40 goals were scored, as against 23 in the First Division, and 29 in the Southern League. Five home teams in each league were successful, there were in all five home defeats, and seven games were drawn. In the Southern League, Brentford provided the sensation of the afternoon by defeating Watford; at Watford, this being Brentford's only away win of the season. Swindon did well to draw at Southampton. Norwich sorely harassed Fulham at Craven Cottage, and Leyton played a hard game at Brighton, the points being shared in each of these games. West Ham, Reading, and Bristol scored emphatic wins, and Queen's Park Rangers obtained a couple of much-needed points at the expense of Luton.

The Arsenal placed a splendid win to their credit at Plumstead, Manchester City going under by 4—1 for the second time this season. The Woolwich forwards were in an irresistible mood, and the halves and backs gave them excellent support. A weekend Sheffield Wednesday team was beaten at Owlerton by Bury, who were the first to defeat the Senior Blades on their own ground this season. Notts County did well to draw at Bolton, and Bristol City were full value for the point they brought away from Clayton, where Manchester United have not realised expectation. Birmingham, Derby County, and Everton all won by handsome margins, and Blackburn Rovers defeated Aston Villa, after a sharp tussle, by the odd goal in three. In the Second Division of the League there was a startling result—Nottingham Forest were defeated at home by Grimsby by three clear goals. Chelsea found one goal sufficient at Glossop for the two points, and Clapton Orient are to be congratulated on halving the spoils at Stockport. West Bromwich did not have anything to spare against Burnley, but Leicester Fosse easily disposed of Burslem, Wolverhampton were routed at Hull, and Gainsborough were overwhelmed at Chesterfield.

QUEEN'S PARK vs. CORINTHIANS.—The Corinthians, who appeared at Hampden Park, Glasgow, yesterday, are welcome guests in that city, and this New Year's day encounter is looked upon as an annual function of no little importance. The fixture is now a very old one. Of the forty-one matches already played, the Queen's Park have been on the winning side on twenty-two occasions, while the Corinthians have carried off thirteen of the engagements, six ending with honours even. The attendance was not, perhaps, as great as in former years, due principally to the fact that miserable weather conditions prevailed. The snow had certainly been cleared away, but the ground was on the hard and greasy side, due to a recent quick thaw. Still, there were about 18,000 present. The visitors lost the toss, and Cornelius set the ball in motion. Queen's Park were at once down on Rowlandson, but Fitchie's parting shot was weak. This delicate attention was replied to by Vassall dashing down the right and shooting hard, but Adam saved. Again Rowlandson was tried, this time rather severely, yet he cleverly cleared. A foul against M. Morgan-Owen on the "25" line looked dangerous for the Corinthians, but his side rallied, and Guy broke through, the home goalkeeper kicking aside. McIver was down with a rush, and as Paul was lying in goal the situation was saved at the expense of a corner. In saving from this kick Adam, the custodian, collided with an opponent, and was so badly hurt that he had to be carried off the field. Richmond took up charge of the Queen's Park uprights, Riley came to back, and Paul did double duty as centre half and centre forward. Nevertheless, the Queen's were the aggressors for a time, and Key brought out Rowlandson with a long, high shot. With that courtesy usually associated with the Corinthians, the latter allowed a substitute in the person of W. Stewart, of the Queen's Park Strollers, to defend the Queen's Park goal. Things were thus again equal, and Fitchie signalled the favour by giving Rowlandson a stiff shot to save. A second later he found the net, but the point was disallowed for offside. Soon afterwards what looked like a clean goal was not awarded the Corinthians. Stewart fumbled the greasy ball and it slipped up through his hands. He, however, regained it after it had apparently gone just inside. However the point was not claimed and the game proceeded. Rowlandson had some excellent saves after this, and did his work smartly and well. It was a good game under adverse circumstances, and neither had scored at half-time. The second period was started by Paul, and directly Rowlandson was called upon to clear. He made no mistakes and was repeatedly cheered for his clever work. He fisted, kicked away, and caught in marvellous fashion. It was his day, and he enhanced his reputation. After a stiff siege the Corinthians broke bounds. Their left wing worked right into the home corner, and Vassall centering, Cornelius had no difficulty in scoring for the visitors after ten minutes' play. Under close pressure immediately afterwards Witherington has a penalty awarded against him. Richmond took the kick, and beating Rowlandson equalised the scoring amid much enthusiasm. Both teams continued to play good football, the passing being very pretty to look at, and the defence on both sides strong and determined. In was really wonderful form on such a slippery footing. With ten minutes to go a corner fell to Queen's Park, which, though well placed, ultimately went behind. The Corinthians organised a combined attack on the home goal, which was all but successful, Morgan-Own being a shade too high in his final effort. The end drew near, and there was still a considerable amount of vitality in both teams. Certainly Rowlandson had most to do, but he possessed an infinite of resource in defending his charge. The result of the game was a draw of one goal each. Teams:—

QUEEN'S PARK.—J. C. Adam, goal; J. S. Thomson and A. Richmond backs; W. Kay, A. F. Murray, and J. Riley, half-backs; A. Armour, A. Templeton, H. Paul, T. T. Fitchie, and C., Hamilton, forwards.

RUGBY RULES.

THE SOUTH AFRICANS' TOUR.

MATCH vs. LLANELLY.—As in other parts of the Kingdom few Rugby football games were played in Wales on Saturday owing to frost. The Llanelly club have taken a well-timed precaution of covering their playing ground at Stradey with a thick coating of straw before the frost set in. The snow falling on this prevented the ground becoming hard, and when snow and straw were removed on Saturday morning, the field was found to be in capital condition. Sixteen thousand spectators watched the contest—a smaller number than that expected, but still this was a record attendance for a match played at Llanelly. Both teams were strongly representative, except that the Welshmen missed the services of D. M. Davies at half. At the last moment the reserve, Ben Davies, being unavailable, it was decided to remove Harvey Thomas from the quartette to half, and bring in Griff Rowe in the three-quarter line.

The game will live long in the memories of all who witnessed it. In the first portion of the game it was a truly desperate struggle between two great packs of forwards. After the interval, victory rested with the Colonial eight, chiefly through the magnificent generalship of Paul Roos. Unfortunately, throughout the second half of play the spectators continually found fault with the refereeing of Mr. Marsh. "Barracking" of a most objectionable and undeserved character culminated in the need of police and players surrounding Mr. Marsh after the final whistle to prevent personal violence. Needless to say the action of the noisy section of the crowd is deeply regretted in Llanelly, and in fact in all sporting Wales.

Llanelly won the toss, and had the benefit of the gradient. Douglas Morkel kicked off, and Arnold returned to the centre. The first scrummage was carried by the home forwards, but offside play by Lloyd caused a penalty, and exchange kicking between Gabe, Marsburg, Arnold, and De Villiers resulted in the last-named finding touch over the halfway line. Indifferent half-back play by Llanelly allowed the Colonial forwards to dribble to the home "25." Dobbin initiated a fine round of passing, which looked likely to result in scoring, when De Villiers, who had no opposition in front, knocked on. Lieutenant Dobbs, the English International, dashed off and cleared all in marvellous fashion, except Marsburg, who hauled him down in a most determined and effective manner. Passing by the Llanelly backs broke down at Griff Rowe, who knocked on when there was a chance of his wing gaining a lot of ground. For a time the home side altered their tactics, and instead of heeling, their forwards started short, sharp, rushes, which called for the best defence of De Villiers, Hirsch, and Marsburg. Hard scrummaging in midfield took place for some minutes, and then Jackson, in a very smart way, picked up, after Llanelly had heeled, and kicked to the Welshmen's quarter line. The Colonials tried hard to get their backs in motion, but the home eight were in great form, and prevented the visiting quartette from having any chances.

Brink securing in a line-out, set Hirsch off, but the latter was finely tackled by Rowe. Two penalty kicks were given against the Springboks for offside tackles, and through these Gabe removed play into South Africa's half. The home forwards improved on this by dribbling to their opponents' "25." The Llanelly pack dashed off from the next scrum, and Tom Evans picking up near the line, beat Marsburg and scored in the corner. The cheers at this achievement were simply deafening, and hats were thrown into the air. Gabe's attempt to convert failed, but considering the difficult angle he did well in getting so close to the crossbar as he did. From the drop out Arnold marked, and his kick being misfielded by De Villiers, the Llanelly forwards dashed off with a terrific rush. It looked as if another try would be registered, when Marsburg risking his "neck," threw himself on the ball. An injury to Walters delayed play. Fine forward work by Paul Roos, Raaff, and D. Morkel made Llanelly act on the defensive. It was patent that the Colonials' great object was to get the ball oftener to their backs, but the tackling of Lloyd and Gave was a strong preventive. The home team were properly penalised for glaring offside work by their halves. After a fine dribble headed by Raaff and Brink, Dobbin sent the ball to Loubser, who cross-kicked. First Gordon Thomas tried to field, but failed badly, and then Raaff simply had to fall on the ball, which was between the uprights, to score. Jackson converted, and the Africans led by two points. Play after this was a trifle vigorous, and the ball travelled at a great pace up and down the field. Once De Villiers passed to Hirsch when a pass to Stegmann would have meant a try. Hirsch was held a few yards out. The home forwards again showed their strength by carrying play down to Marsburg, but the great full-back was as cool and daring as ever, and picking up from the toes of the invading forwards, found touch at the centre. The interval then arrived. Half-time score:—

	Pts.
Llanelly (1 try)	3

Two points in arrear the Welshmen started the second portion of the game in grim earnest. Led grandly by Lieutenant Dobbs they rushed down the field. De Villiers was tackled in trying to save, and it looked as if a try had been scored; but there was an irregularity, and a scrummage five yards out was ordered. A minute later the ball came out on the Llanelly side, and Griff Rowe picked up and made a quick drop at goal, but the ball hit the crossbar. The Colonials seemed to wake up after these narrow escapes; and thanks to good kicks by De Villiers and Dobbin play was taken to the half-way line. Then the African forwards, with Burger, Millar, and Brink leading grandly, brought off a number of short, sharp rushes, and got quite close to the Welshmen's line. From a favourable position Roos placed the ball for Douglas Morkel to attempt to kick a goal from a mark. Premature charging by the Llanelly forwards was penalised; but Morkel's kick went wide, and a minor was conceded. The drop-out resulted in the Scarlets taking play to half-way. From here the ball came to Jackson, who passed to Dobbin, and the latter sent on to Stegmann. The African wing looked like getting over until Gordon Thomas came to the rescue. The Colonials were now playing better than ever, their heavier forwards staying better than their opponents. Llanelly had a free given against them for offside and Mr. Marsh came in for loud "barracking." Stegmann should have scored but for a bad foul on the part of one of the Llanelly three-quarters.

Plenty of short, sharp passing was now being indulged in by the Springboks, but for a time the defence of Llanelly prevailed. A. F. Marsburg, in following up a kick, came into contact with Dan Walters, the home captain, and both were injured, but resumed. The visitors were packing 4—3—1, and the ball was more often than not coming out on their side of the scrum. Thirty yards from the Welshmen's lines followed one of the most brilliant tries ever scored. Dobbin started the movement which ended in scoring. From him the ball went to Hirsch who beat Gabe nicely, and then Stegmann received. The latter passed back to Hirsch, and then De Villiers received after three forwards had handled, and after feinting to run inwards he passed to Loubser. The ball rebounded into the air from the latter's finger tips, but the referee concluded that it was not knocked forward, and so allowed a most brilliant try. Douglas Morkel, with a splendid kick, added the extra points, and thus the Colonials led by 7 points.

Dan Walters restarted for Llanelly, and play for a few minutes took place in the Africans' "25." Harvey Thomas was badly injured, but kept on the field. For offside play by Jackson, the Welshmen were awarded a free kick. The ball was placed for Watts, but the kick was charged down, and away came the Colonial forwards, and the homesters were forced to touch down—a very near affair for a try. Dobbin gave Stegmann a chance to cross, but Willie Arnold was too good for the African. In the Llanelly "25" the Colonials brought off several futile bouts of passing. Once De Villiers, receiving from Jackson, punted high to the mouth of the Welsh goal, where Willie Thomas ran across, and touched down just as Brookes was falling on the ball. From the kick-out by Gabe, Llanelly revived a little, and reached half-way. Gabe received from Harvey Thomas, and put in a kick to Dobbin, who marked, and found centre touch. From here the Colonials started passing, and after the halves and three-quarters had handled, the ball came to Loubser, who swerved past Gordon Thomas and scored a fine try. Douglas Morkel failed to convert. A few minutes later, with play on the Llanelly side of half-way, a free kick was given against the Welshmen. Morkel had the ball placed, and from the most difficult position scored a really magnificent goal. Only a few minutes more were left for play, which was quite uninteresting, the Colonials being quite satisfied with their 13 points' lead. Final score:—

MATCH vs. CARDIFF.—There would be at least 30,000 people present when the sides took the field. It had been practically raining since Sunday, and the result was that the ground was ankle-deep in mud. The only change in either team was that Burger took the place of Mare in the visitors' forwards. Early in the game Cardiff took up the attack, and it was only a knock-on by Gibbs that prevented them scoring in the first minute. Nicholls was early-on prominent with some sound defence, but before the game was ten minutes old, and whilst Cardiff were pressing in the South Africans' "25," there was quite a series of injuries. Nicholls had a nasty bump, and both Biggs and Millar were hurt, the last-mentioned being carried off. There was a considerable delay over this, but when they started again Cardiff immediately took up the attack, and Marsburg had to touch down to save, whilst Powell for Cardiff shortly afterwards saved a fine rush of the Africans' forwards by dropping on the ball in midfield. The first score of the match came from Nicholls, who coming out to the right, rounded the opposition in quite his old style. He had to go into the extreme corner for it, but eventually he got there, and it was a great kick of Winfield's, and close by the touch-line, that converted the point. After Morkel had tried and failed with a penalty, Bush started the next attack for Cardiff. There had been a long kick over his line, and Bush, instead of touching down, had rushed out with the ball. He kicked up the field, and Nicholls taking up a dribble after it, sent the ball over the line, Gibbs racing up and securing the try, but Winfield failed to convert. Cardiff were attacking strongly at this period, and Bush was well placed when he tried a drop for goal, the ball, however, not rising. Only once up till now had the Africans ever been near the Cardiff "25" line. Hirsch, however, brought them over with a strong run up the centre, but Gibbs tackled him in rare fashion. Then there was another delay through Smith, one of the Cardiff forwards, being laid out, and at this period Biggs, with his knee gone, limped off to the dressing-room, half-time being called a few minutes later with the score standing:—

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

For some years past Thacker's Reduced Survey Map of India has been looked upon as the most convenient and helpful Map of the Indian Empire extant. It possesses many points of superiority and convenience; the information is exhaustive, every name mentioned in the Government Survey being included. The great convenience of the Index of 10,000 names has always been keenly appreciated; it has, therefore, been a source of great regret to the proprietors that they have been forced to allow the Map to remain out of print for a considerable time on account of political changes in the internal provinces of India. The moment the new boundaries of Bengal were settled, fresh plates were put in hand, and the publishers are now pleased to announce the third edition of this important Map as ready for sale.

Size of plate, 38" × 34". Scale, 70 miles = 1 inch.

SPENCER & CO., Ld., MADRAS.

The Africans had a strong wind and a driving rain in their favour in the second half, and Cardiff, with only fourteen men, seemed to have a big task set them to maintain their lead. The visitors attacked strongly in the first few minutes, but the home forwards eventually relieved, only, however, to see Hirsch come through with a strong run. Nicholls, however, tackled him in decisive fashion, whilst a few moments later Gibbs, following up, caught Marsburg with the ball in his possession. There was a smart dribble by Bush after this and then the Cardiff captain beat Marsburg by crossing the ball over to the right, a near thing for a score. The attack settled on the "Boks'" line after this, and Marsburg brought off a great save. Then Winfield was twice called upon to save, and Morkel barely missed scoring from a penalty. Cardiff worked out of danger by a series of touch-kicks, and Nicholls turned defence into attack, Cardiff, being nearly over, whilst another great run by the Welsh captain saw his pass go astray when a score seemed inevitable. Still pressing strongly, Bush, Gabe, and Williams were responsible for some clever work that eventually put Williams in the extreme corner, whilst just towards the close Gabe raced over, and dropping on the ball after a follow up scored a try, which saw Winfield hit the upright in an attempt to convert. The game ended with the score :—

It was a positive disaster at Cardiff, the most severe blow of the tour. Cardiff's success was accomplished under much the same conditions as prevailed at Glasgow—the ground was ankle deep in mud; rain fell heavily throughout play. The home club played at the top of their form; the South Africans much below theirs. Their forwards were badly beaten, and for once in a way their gallant three-quarters, who had so often pulled the side through, did not come to the rescue. It was a sad and sorry day for the Africans, for Cardiff succeeded where the full strength of Wales failed.

BLACKHEATH vs. FETTESIAN-LORETTONIANS.—Sunday night's thaw operated so effectively on the Rectory Field at Blackheath that yesterday the snow had almost melted away, while the ground was soft enough for a match to be engaged in without danger to the players. Still the ground was very slushy, and it was a sporting act on the part of the teams to decide to turn out. There were several hundred spectators, and their enthusiasm was so great and the efforts of the players so strenuous that it was for all the world like a miniature International. Blackheath, who adopted the New Zealand formation, only made one change in their advertised team, F. W. T. Sawyer taking C. J. Newbold's place in the forward line. Considering the conditions, the game was contested at a great pace, and, although the forwards generally controlled the exchanges, there were some delightful bursts of passing, so that at no time was the play dull or commonplace. The outstanding feature of the match was the grand individual work of C. C. G. Wright, who failed to get into the Cambridge fifteen this year. He was quite the fastest man on either side, and displayed immense enterprise in following up, frequently breaking through the forwards and getting to the ball like a flash before anyone was aware of his presence. The forward play on either side was excellent. First one pack and then the other were on top, and really there was little to choose between them, though Blackheath perhaps used their feet with the greater skill. The start was sensational, Friday intercepting a pass by one of the Scottish half-backs and slipping the ball to Wright, who romped over within five minutes. Robson successfully took the kick at goal. The visitors speedily retaliated, and McLeod made a brilliant run for quite forty yards, and looked all over a scorer, but Robson pulled him down a couple of yards from the line. After a series of "scrums" Cunningham got possession and dropped a beautiful goal. Once again McLeod burst through all opposition, but he kicked on instead of picking up the ball, and Coopper, although a couple of yards behind, got up just as McLeod was shaping to fall on the ball and kicked dead amid great excitement. Friday, who was very useful at centre for Blackheath, then set Coopper going and the old Devonport man magnificently eluded three opponents before touching the ball down behind the posts. Robson again converted and the home side were leading by ten points to four at the interval. On restarting, McLeod made a nice opening for Harper close in, but the wing man fumbled the ball badly and sent it into touch. Then Robson misfielded the ball right in front of his goal, but danger was averted. Then in endeavouring to stem a rush by the home forwards Schulze faltered, Williamson smartly collared him, and Wright, picking up near the half-way line, outpaced all his pursuers and scored a grand try on the right. Robson's kick was wide of goal. The Scots now pressed hard, their forwards doing splendid work and Harper was given a capital chance by McLeod, but instead of running straight on he chose to drop at goal, but, although in a favourable position, kicked short. The visitors kept up the pressure, and at length Gowlland scrambled over. McLeod converting. Blackheath were now only leading by four points, but their forwards gradually got the upper hand and gave the visitors some anxious moments. Wright cleverly intercepted a pass by one of the visiting backs, and kicking over Schulze's head, enabled Sawyer to get in on the extreme left, although Schulze nearly prevented a score by a heroic effort. Robson failed at goal. The game was now as good as over, for, although McLeod made his mark, he missed an easy opening of dropping a goal. The result was a win for Blackheath by two goals and two tries (15 points) to one placed goal and one dropped goal (9 points). Teams:

Blackheath: C. G. Robson, back; S. F. Coopper, C. A. Friday, and C. C. G. Wright, three-quarter backs; D. O. Twining and R. H. Williamson, five-eights; W. K. Flemmer, half-back; J. E. C Partridge, F. W. T. Sawyer, R. Maclear, W. T. D. Craven, F. J. V. Hopley, J. R. Upson, H. F. Tuckett, and H. W. Stirling, forwards.

Fettesian-Lorettonians: D. G. Schulze, back; H. Harper, K. G. McLeod, G. Cunningham, and A. L. Purves, three-quarter backs: A. H. Gallie and J. E. MacIntyre, half-backs; W. P. Scott, H. G. Monteith, G. C. Gowlland, W. C. Currie, R. W. Cassells, J. A. Herriot, J. Ross, and W. H. Purves, forwards.

Referee: Mr. P. Gilliard.

BILLIARDS.

The huge success of the unique entertainment at Messrs. Thurston's Grand Hall on Monday last is still the subject of conversation whenever and wherever a few enthusiasts of the fascinating game congregate. The eulogiums passed on the committee who organised the affair have indeed been flattering, and it is a moot point who are the most pleased—Sergeant-Major Fitzgerald, in whose honour the event was held, or the committee, Messrs. G. Reid (Sporting Life), S. A. Mussabini, Harry Young, and V. M. Mansell—who promoted it. A great success was confidently anticipated, but no one even in the highest flights of his imagination ever dreamt it would be the success it turned out to be. Crammed from floor to ceiling as the Grand Hall was, there were as many people turned away as would have crowded the hall a second time.

And what a gathering it was, too! Despite the "crush," everyone was in the best of humour, and for more than three hours sat or stood watching the élité of the profession putting forth their very best efforts to entertain. And that the professionals were successful in this, ample evidence was forthcoming in the vociferous applause rendered them at the completion of each "turn;" while the laughter was uproarious whenever a humorous incident—and there were many such—occurred.

The only big match in town during the week proved an excellent attraction to holiday-makers, Messrs. Thurston's Grand Hall, where Weiss and Harverson are contesting a match of 12,000 up for £25 a side, being very full on each afternoon since the match began on Wednesday. Unfortunately neither player has, so far, been seen at his best, but signs are not wanting that it will be a "battle royal" all through the piece, and visitors to the Leicester-square establishment are certain to witness a determined struggle this week end for honours. They are exceptionally keen rivals, and do not give anything away when they cross cues, the Colonial supremacy being the ambition of both exponents.

THE "FIRST HALF" REVIEWED.

This being the closing day of the year, it appears to me to be a fitting opportunity for taking stock of the first half of the present season. The close of the first half of the season finds the leading exponents maintaining, and, in some instances—notably in those of Dawson, Stevenson, and Diggle—improving on the great form displayed during the previous season. When we remember what a record breaking season 1905-6 was, this seems a somewhat bold remark to make, but I hope to prove that this optimistic assertion has a sure foundation.

Really, though, the tabulated returns speak for themselves, and render comment almost a superfluity. I should, however, like to draw attention to the fact that Harverson, Inman, and Lovejoy are the only players who have, so far, created fresh individual records, while the "Twickenham Terror" has carved a further niche in the temple of fame by creating a fresh world's "red ball" records of 300, an honour of which he is pardonably proud. Quite apart from the great compilations referred to the sustained quality of Dawson, Stevenson, and Diggle's displays has been quite phenomenal. Averages of 375·00, 250·00, 200·00, 150·00, and any number between 100 and the last-mentioned figures speak far more eloquently than words of the wonderful—one might almost say miraculous—powers possessed by these "stars." With the 375·00 Stevenson takes pride of place while in the 250's he is joined by Dawson, and then a little lower in the scale, 200·00 and under, these players are joined by the famous Manchester exponent. There is only one fitting word to apply to all these great deeds—"Prodigious!" Should they ascend to greater heights in the closing half of the season—and one need not be surprised at anything these "magicians" may do—some other word in the English language will require to be invented to give an adequate description of their prowess.

Messrs. Burroughes and Watts' great tournament has more than realised the expectations formed that billiards of an exceptionally high class would be seen in the various heats. A reference to the appended table of results to date, to which is added a full analysis of all the games decided, will bear this out. Here, again, the figures are presented in such an interesting form that comment of any kind is quite uncalled for :—

	P.	W.	L.	Inns.	Points.	Aver.
*E. Diggle (rec. 1,000) ...	2	2	0	208	18,000	44·81
T. Reece (rec. 2,500) ...	3	2	1	827	26,940	23·42
H. W. Stevenson (scratch)	1	1	0	251	9,000	35·74
*M. Inman (rec. 2,250) ...	2	1	1	320	12,716	22·09
C. Dawson (scratch) ...	2	0	2	528	15,671	29·58
C. Harverson (rec. 2,000)...	4	1	3	924	34,384	27·37

Note.—The final column gives the average for every completed visit paid to the table. For this purpose the starts and misses have been deducted from the total points.

* Fourth heat abandoned, owing to illness of Inman. Game awarded to Diggle, with scores 3,716—3,666 in favour of Inman.

A cavalry sergeant was out of patience with an awkward recruit. "Never approach the horses from behind without speaking," he explained. "If you do, they'll kick that thick head of yours, and the end of it will be that we shall have nothing but lame horses in the squadron."

An officer, speaking of the orderly room clerk in his command, says the man spells like a broken typewriter.

First Man: "How do you do!" Second Man: "Beg pardon, but you have the advantage of me." First man: "Yes, I suppose I have. We were engaged to the same girl; but you married her."

Plumduff: "Has that charming widow any property?"
Ketchum: "Yes, considerable."
Plumduff: "Real estate or personal?"
Ketchum: "Personal. She has six children."

Hunting.

KARACHI HUNT.

10th January.—The hounds met at the Bunnia's Crossing at 7-30. Mrs. Travers and Mrs. Northen were the only ladies out. Mr. Graham commenced by drawing the guavas. The hounds picked up a line from the corner, and ran hard towards Rai Singh's wtll. But they were at fault before they had gone far—so the Master brought them back—and got them away nicely together.

Running with lots of music and dash they led us over the Bund country, past the Ruined Cottage to the One Tree Bund. Here the jack turned sharp left, setting his mask for the hills. He crossed some very bare pat—but the hounds hunted him beautifully and ran into him, after a good 30 minutes, near the bottom of the hills. The Master drew again near the Ruined Cottage—and a jack was viewed away—but there was no scent, so the hounds were whipped off homewards.

13th January.—It was a nice cold morning, as we left the Hunt Camp, and cantered to the kennels to pick up the hounds. But there was a dryness in the wind, which did not promise well for scenting. We drew Alladad Mango Tope and the Banana Patch Blank, and the Master was taking the hounds off to draw the Sugarcane at Gurahim's khete when the hounds picked up a line, going back towards the station. But it was obviously a "heel" line, so the Master lifted them and cast forward. A few minutes' suspense, and they were on again—going fast—and making the most of a catchy scent. They ran into their jack in the thick scrub beyond the khete—after a short gallop of ten minutes. Drawing the Subadar's khete, a jack was viewed away in the most approved fashion—breaking across the open—but the hounds could make nothing of him. We had several other short runs during the morning—but the scent failed us badly. The hounds were whipped off homewards at eleven.

THE fifth Meet was held at a late hour on Saturday morning on the Monsoon Ride close by Garipar Hat, where a larger field assembled and a fair number of spectators. The course was a long one, some four miles as I judged it. Starting away from the Monsoon Ride itself the paper ran to the left of the fish market and away east hugging the jungle and crossing an old wall and a new fence with a bit of a ditch on the near side before swinging in to the left over the "old" wall. From this point a new line was followed as the course swung right-handed on to the Monsoon Ride and almost straight across it into the jungle beyond. After a turn in the open over some country which has not been used for a year or two, a couple of fences lay in the space to the north of the Ride which is a favourite finishing ground. Thence the paper twisted through a village into the old footpath through the Plaintain Garden and so back to the Monsoon Ride close to Garipar Hat. Leaving the Market on the left the paper went straight forward by the usual route to the "Hollow" wall, and the finish was laid in the open by the New Tank with a couple of fences unexpectedly appearing round the corner to the right.

Cain being laid up with fever, Mr. Evers has lost a point on his stable companion in the Average Cup competition. Fairy now leads but will have to keep going all the season to hold her advantage.

Grief was very plentiful, the open ditch causing any number of refusals. It was really rather hard to place a new kind of fence so early in the chase, because some of the triers were carried out by the unschooled horses. The bush fence at the finish was also very disconcerting and Fairy who was finishing alone refused when first confronted with it. Mr. Ballantyne turned her round but not in time to stall off Mr. Evers, who was coming along easily on Solanus, a very smart horse belonging to Mr. Robertson. Mrs. Collin took a very nasty fall at the "Hollow" wall, Kildare making a mistake for once. No bones were reported as broken, but the shaking and strain are likely to keep this sporting lady out of the hunt for the rest of the season.

The official order was given as follows :—

1. Mr. Evers on Solanus.
2. Mr. Ballantyne on Fairy.
3. Mr. Levetus on Jorrocks.
4. Mrs. L. Walker on Detective.
5. Mr. Soper on a brown.
6. Mr. Birkmyre on Lady Fox.

A poor show of ponies began a very half-hearted chase and Mr. Evers again came along first on Branga, with Messrs. Antram and Ritson and a stranger in close attendance.

C.—The return match between these teams—a three days' fixture—was played at Ballygunge on the 18th, 19th and 20th instant and resulted in a win for Calcutta by 24 runs. The visitors batted first and scored 243, 82 by Guise and 35 by Low being the principal contributions. Ballygunge made 93 for the loss of one wicket when stumps were drawn on the first day. On Saturday the innings closed for 293, White 81 and Shallow 47, Nicholls, Tatam, Eddis and Gould all making useful scores. Calcutta went in again and when play was closed for the day had put up 254, of this Guise was responsible for 70 and Turnbull not out 116. The next day Turnbull carried his score to 155 before he was given out l.-b.-w. White, who was 37 not out overnight, added 56 to his score and was still batting when the inning closed for 379. Ballygunge were 330 runs behind, but in spite of good play by Bayley, Shallow, Nicholls, Eddis and Whiteley helped by Mr. Extras they were 24 runs short when the last wicket fell. Score :—

Wimbledon Camp.—Riddles of a slightly irreverent nature are the order of the night down here. Pattrel obliged us with one last night. The question is: "Why is Heaven a lonely place?" And the utterly indefensible answer is: "Because there is not a damned soul in it."

"Look here," said the well-known costumier to the less well-known mummer, "when are you going to pay me for those wigs you had from me two years ago?"

"My dear old chap," replied the mummer, "I am an actor: not a prophet."

GOLF AT KOLAR.

MADRAS vs. KOLAR.—A team of Madras golfers went to Kolar on the 11th instant and played two rounds of singles and a four-ball match. The conditions were two rounds of nine holes in the morning, followed by a four-ball foursome over nine holes in the afternoon. Each Club was represented by eight players. Although in places the course was a little rough through the green, the browns were in excellent condition. At the end of the first round Kolar were three matches to the good, but after the second round Madras had reduced the lead, leaving Kolar the leaders by one match. In the afternoon, the four-ball match was played, when the Madras team met with greater reverses, Kolar winning three matches and dividing the fourth thus winning the Cup by four matches.

The following are the details :—

4th January 1907.

USHERED in was the New Year by a determined drizzling drenching thaw, a state of affairs delightful to the golfers' heart and to the equine race, but disappointing indeed to those who have lately been taking their pleasures wildly in the variety of amusements afforded by a prolonged frost and a deep fall of snow. The many meetings promoted chiefly by sea-side clubs to entice town-bored, holiday folk proved due failures, although in one or two instances enthusiastic golf-maniacs sallied forth with scarlet balls, scarlet cheeks, and noses to play, at what they were pleased to call "golf," but which savoured more strongly of a declaration of spades, with niblicks and caddies as diggers. And so with little of interest to recount during the past sennight, let us go back in our thought "to the year that awa'" and give a brief reminder to readers of what befell in 1906, of which perhaps the most striking feature has been the extraordinary increase in the number of new courses which have been opened, some of which hold out very fair promise of, in the course of time, developing into happy golfing grounds of the first water (!). There is no doubt whatever, judging by the progress of events during last year, that the Royal and Ancient game is more popular than ever, and that there is absolutely no reason why 1907 should not witness a still further development in all its branches, i.e., Ladies' Amateur and Professional. By the Ladies' Golf Union players and members can always be kept cognisant of the changes and improvements, additions and "subtractions," in the lists of affiliated clubs, and indeed of all clubs, for it is not very long before a newly organised club joins the Mother Union and thenceforward finds all such minor details as handicaps and disputes (these are fortunately rare) relegated to the superior tribunal, but the men have no such Court of Appeal as yet (1907 may see this set on foot and established) and it is difficult for them to keep count of the new clubs started or of the progress in the older established ones. Another proof of the further development of the game is the flourishing state of the trade which deals with golfing paraphernalia and accessories. Of making many balls there is no end, and the innumerable brands which have sprung into use since the great Ball Case was settled, each claiming especial merit, are most confusing. In 1906, to see a man or a woman attired in the orthodox golf costume and carrying clubs any and everywhere was no unusual sight; no one turned round, or troubled to look; he or she elicited no comment except perhaps a muttered growl "golf-maniac," and before 1907 shall have sped away into eternity, to see a man or woman not carrying clubs will probably provoke comment, that is on a Saturday or (whisper this name) on Sunday. In spite of the strenuous efforts of Amateurs, the Professionals still rank first as players—though among the ever-swelling ranks of the great army of unpaid golfers, there are many who, had they the time, would probably run even the great quartette very close—such are Mr. James Robb, Mr. Robert Maxwell, Mr. John Graham, junior, and a host of others who, with youth and love of sport, will in all probability live to demonstrate their capability of holding their own even with James Braid, or Harry Vardon. To leave individuals for a brief space and turn to nations, the departed has certainly been Bonnie Scotland's year with all three great classes—perhaps I should say sections of the game. At Ranelagh and at Burnham the Scottish Ladies carried off both international honours and trophies at Hoylake. Mr. James Robb from o'er the border swept all before him; in far away New Zealand another braw Scot made himself champion, one E. Spencer Gollan, and the big big Braid has achieved marvel after marvel and shown himself beyond compare; and all the time so modest is big Jamie that to hear him talk (a privilege I often enjoy) one could imagine it was Ball and the Clubs who won the Open Championship, the Braid's Tournament, and all the big matches which are Jamie's scalps in 1906. Perhaps a list of the principal championship winners in the past year may be of interest, so presuming this, here they are, place aux Dames:—

Ladies' Open Championship	Mrs R. Kennion
" Scottish "	Miss Dorothy Campbell
" Irish "	" May Hezlet
" Welsh "	" Duncan
" American "	" H. S. Curtis
" Yorkshire "	Mrs. Swayne

1906 has indeed been an eventful one. Scarcely a day has passed without one or more, big events making its passage. Death alas! has robbed clubs of some of their most distinguished members. Marriage has played a conspicuous part in the lives of several golfing votaries, and we have yet to learn what influence the birth-roll will have in the ranks of golfers. That it (the game) has become a great factor, and a great industry there is no gainsaying, and that there is a still greater future for the Royal and Ancient sport there seems to be no doubt. Old men, young men, little men, big men, fat men, thin men, rich men, poor men, all in turn succumb to its fascinations, and its the same with the women, and will be so with those who are now children, and although a few decry the game, and say its influence is baneful and pernicious, of from the majority one heare nothing but eulogies and appreciation of the good work it achieves physically, mentally, and morally, and so we start 1907 with a toast "long life to golf, and health to all golfers, wherever the green may be,' and whether it be a green at all as some climatic eccentricities forbid. R. I. P. 1906, you have nobly done your work and can with a clear conscience take your rest and leave to your successors to follow your noble progressive example. Perhaps, however, before bidding 1906 a final adieu reference should be made to the legislation which has taken place, in the ordinary way. There is not much to record on this score, as golfers are for the most part an easy-going, pleasure-loving lot and there is enough strife in the world without going into the Links to encourage Law and Law-givers in anything beyond their rounds, but the great Ball Case excited unusual interest among thousands of golfers, and the decision of the three Judges was most eagerly and anxiously awaited by scores of firms ready, should the verdict go against the Haskell Company, to flood the market with rubber and other cored balls, all of which claimed marked superiority over every other kind ever invented. Of actual "cases" submitted to the Royal and Ancient Court of Reference there were only about two of importance; one was a proposal to change the date of the Amateur Championship and the other was a proposal voiced by Mr. W. Herbert Fowler that the Championships should from time to time be decided on Inland Greens. Both these propositions received but scant encouragement from the powers that be and the answer in the negative was curt and decisive, but in all probability like women's suffrage—it will come. Good-bye 1906. Bon jour 1907.

CANINE EDUCATION.

AS the puppy's mind is immature and undisciplined, it is better to begin with the simplest part of his education, both for the purpose of developing his mind and the establishing of mental discipline. It is extremely difficult at first for the puppy to understand the simplest teachings, and also it is impossible at first for him to concentrate his mind intently on any one subject, therefore the trainer, when he commences the training, will find great difficulty in holding the puppy's attention, and in particular if he makes the lesson at all uninteresting. He may not note this fact, and therefore may make the mistake of condemning the puppy as being stupid under such circumstances.

From play, wherein the puppy joins and romps as he pleases, hardly any fatigue follows; but when he is held down closely to the study of one idea for a continued length of time, he suffers a great deal of nervous loss, becomes more or less overheated, confused, and painfully wearied.

Being so extremely fatiguing, the first lesson should be short and simple. After a time the mental training will produce mental strength and stamina, and long lessons can then be given without distress to the pupil. The powers of the mind are then so well in play that the most difficult parts of the training are learned with greater ease then were the simple beginnings. In these traits of the puppy, as they relate to the matter of learning, they are not unlike those displayed by the child in its first similar attempts. Study is foreign to every instinct of the young, child or puppy, and, if study it must, the result is weariness, confusion of ideas to a greater or less degree and a pronounced dislike to studying at all. And yet, the studies of the child are for his own personal gain and advantage in life, while the puppy is required to learn things which will be applied solely to the advantage of his master.

When a lesson of any difficulty is ended, all further attempts at it should also be ended till such a time as the next lesson begins. If the trainer commands the dog to do something under circumstances wherein he cannot enforce obedience, and the dog then escapes or succeeds in disobeying, a troublesome factor is thereby introduced; for it being to his own profit he learns the advantage of disobedience to himself and generally refuses afterward whenever he can do so, sometimes permanently, but at least until such time as discipline has become habitual. Some of the lessons, therefore, need to be given in a room or other inclosure from which the dog cannot escape, as will be fully described in proper place.

During the months of the pupil's puppyhood, before formal training begins, a few of the more simple orders may be taught, such as "Come in" and "Go on." The latter is taught easily by associating it with the act of freeing the puppy from his kennel, or by taking him on a chain into the fields, then unchaining him and at the same time giving him the order, "Go on." He would "go on" then whether the order was given or not, and this is the reason why the order is so easy to teach and why it may be taught when the pupil is still a tender puppy. by associating it with the act of going on the puppy soon learns its meaning, and if he is good for anything he takes unbounded pleasure in a command which denotes that he is at liberty to romp at his own free will.

"Come in" is not so easy to teach as is "Go on." The will of the teacher as made known by this order comes in conflict with the will of the dog. The latter is rarely inclined to give up the pleasure of free romping or taking his pleasure in his own way, so concerning the command "Come in!" force is sometimes necessary to secure the required obedience. Still, force should not be applied till the formal training begins. It doesn't matter whether the puppy obeys perfectly or not before that time. However, it is necessary to teach thorough obedience to the order when the proper time has come for it. No slovenly or reluctant response to the command should be tolerated. The dog should be required to come in promptly and directly, and a pat on the head and a kind word when he does so will result in his coming in cheerfully if he has any amiability in his nature. And yet, easy as it is to teach a dog to come in promptly to command by voice or whistle, there are few orders so commonly disobeyed. At field trials where one would expect to see the greatest perfection in the matter of obedience, but where one doesn't see anything of the kind, it often is a most laborious task for a handler to get control of his dog in a heat or at the end of it, and many find it necessary to keep their dogs on chain constantly to prevent them from breaking away at such times as they desire them to cease work. All this shows rank neglect of the necessary discipline. The handlers of such dogs have been satisfied to get them to come in after such fashion as it could be done each time in any sort of slip-shod way, and neglected the more troublesome but efficient method of teaching the command specially till it was thoroughly established.

If the dog is self-willed or sulky or over-eager in his enthusiasm, he may require some punishment to make him come in promptly. Most trainers punish the dog in the field with the whip for disobeying this order, and thereby increase instead of lessen the trouble; for, if, when the dog comes in to order he receives a hipping, he will come in still more reluctantly the next time, when he fancies that to obey is an act which ends in pain. It is quite a stupid expectation on the part of a trainer that, after whipping a dog for not coming in with the desired decree of obedience, he will come in with greater promptness the next time, with a possible whipping in store as a reward for coming in at all. With some amateurs the whip is the first and last appeal. How dogs perform even so well as they do under such stupid treatment is a source of wonder, yet they, in time, seem to learn what is desired and what is the proper act to adopt to avoid punishment, if the trainer is not too severe or too muddled or too inconsistent to permit of any fixed method.

If force is necessary, nothing is better for the purpose than a spike-collar. The punishment, when the collar is used, is applied to the dog when he is in the act of disobedience and away from his handler. He associates it then with the act of disobedience. When he comes in and is whipped, he associates such punishment with the act of obedience. When he comes in from the punishment of the collar the trainer can pet and praise him, and thus distinctly indicate that he has done right. With whip, this is impossible. The collar, thus, is distinctly associated with the act of disobedience; the whip, with the act of obedience. As may be readily anticipated, the one is promptly effective, establishes intelligent obedience, and is lasting in its effects; the other is confusing, inflicts pain with no intelligent cause for it, and never accomplishes what is desired in the finished manner necessary for good performance.

If the dog will not come in with the promptness necessary put the collar on his neck. Tie 20 or 30 yards of rope to it. The dog may attempt to run away. Let him have his flurry at the end of the rope till he becomes convinced that he cannot escape. Make no attempt to teach anything till he has become quite reconciled to the collar being on his neck and till he has given up struggling. This may require two or three different lessons more, or less in itself. At length when the collar has ceased to alarm him, give the order, "Come in," and pull him in with the rope at the same time. Bring him quite up to within reach of the hand and pat and praise him as if he had done a fine thing of his own motion, and wait till he has recovered his composure. A proper calmness and deliberation adds much to the efficacy of the lesson. Hurry and unnecessary violence do much to retard the purpose of the trainer in this and all other branches; the trainer then should walk away to the length of the rope and repeat the order, and the act of pulling the dog in. In a short time the latter will observe that he is punished when away from his trainer, and he will follow him closely, so that he cannot walk away from him. This should not be permitted. The trainer can correct it by driving a short peg in the ground and tying the dog to it, 2 or 3 feet of the rope nearest the collar being used for the purpose. When the trainer orders the dog to come in he pulls on the rope thereby pulling the pin from the ground and if the dog obeys he thus is not punished; for the pin being pulled out he cannot be punished by pulling on a taut rope, and if he disobeys the trainer pulls him in as before. This is continued till the dog will obey promptly and till obedience has become habitual.

When the collar is taken off a number of lessons should be given in a room or inclosure where the dog cannot escape. So long as he shows the slightest hesitation to obey or inclination to escape so long should the lessons be persisted in.

At length obedience will become a habit and the dog will not have the slightest inclination to disobey. Next the lessons should be given in the open field. If there should be any disinclination at first to obey promptly in the field the collar should be applied in the same manner. Once this training is thoroughly done it is permanent and amply compensates for the little extra trouble required to do it right.

The reluctant and imperfect obedience given to noisy orders to come in are in painful contrast to the prompt, quiet obedience given to the lightest notes of the whistle or lowest tones of the voice which the dog can hear when he is thoroughly trained to come in with the aid of the collar.

Whose mother said, "Nelly, how bigua!"
She answered, "What rot!
I 'm sure that I 'm not,
I have really a very fine figua!"

STRAY NOTES.

"ALTHOUGH wild animals of all kinds are to be found in public manageries," says a zoologist, "it is remarkable how many delusions exist concerning them. Take serpents for instance. You hear snakes spoken of as 'slimy,' but a slimy snake is a thing unknown to Nature. You hear them spoken of as though it were their chief pleasure to attack human beings. This is a gross libel. The average serpent is a shy, timid creature, always inclined to shrink away from man, and never attacking him, except when provoked or driven to extremes. The supposed ferocious rattlesnake is the most timid and retiring of all the serpent tribe. Snakes are said to 'sting,' but that is another popular error. They don't sting; they bite."

A French scientist, M. de Farville, claims to have conclusive proof that fish are absolutely deaf. He placed a number of gudgeons, carp, pike, eels, etc., in a glass tank, and inserted a 5mm. rubber hose attached to a powerful siren. The siren was made to imitate the French vowels, o, a, e, i, and u. Although the sound transmitted into the water was 400 times that which could have been supported by a human ear, not one of the fish took the slightest notice of the noise, or gave an additional wag of the tail. The scientist considers that this is peremptory proof that fish have no sense of hearing whatever, and the precautions of anglers to avoid every sound are needless.

Crows do immense damage in New England cornfields, and about the only method of protection is to tar the corn before it is planted. The efficiency of this scheme was demonstrated by Professor Beal, who planted several acres to corn. Towards the end of the planting the supply of tar ran out, and he was compelled to finish without it. The areas planted to tarred corn were ignored by the crows, while the untarred patch furnished a glorious picnic-ground for the croaking banqueters. Though crows are ravenous corn eaters, it is stated that this fault is more than counteracted by their usefulness in destroying harmful insects. In one crow's stomach the investigators found the mandibles of 90 grasshoppers, showing that these birds are partial to such food. Robins steal fruit with a vengeance, and many an Eastern farmer has been near distraction because of the ravages of these birds. It has been discovered, however, that they prefer wild fruit, and that whenever it is obtainable they scorn fruit that is useful to man. In the stomachs of three hundred robins were found the seeds of forty-two species of wild fruits, and only four or five domestic. Because of this preference, the department suggests that wild fruits be planted in close proximity to orchards, so that birds may be attracted and kept ont of mischief. As many of these wild growths are ornamental, the advantages of having them about would be doubled.

A very important section of the New York Aquarium is the hospital for fish. The aquarium contains varieties of fish from nearly every country in the world, and amongst such an enormous number of captives disease and injury are fairly frequent. Unless the victim is a very hardy specimen the utmost efforts of the fish doctor to cure a patient are seldom successful, but in dealing with the ailments of strong varieties effective cures are frequently made. The hospital has its various wards—tanks of water—one being for fish with contagious disease, another for "surgical" cases, and a third ward being devoted to those progressing towards recovery. There is, of course, a special ward of suitable dimensions for the larger fish. One interesting fact has been ascertained with regard to curing fresh water fish. It was found that, for specimens suffering from various diseases and from sores incurred by collisions with the walls of the aquarium or with other fish, a few days' sojourn in salt-water proved an excellent remedy. On the other hand a bath of fresh water has often been found a valuable aid in curing salt-water fish. The salt-water used in the aquarium is obtained direct from the ocean, but is usually weakened by the addition of a certain proportion of fresh-water, and the temperature is regulated to correspond with that from which the patient was taken. It has been necessary at times to place many varieties of suffering fish in the same tank, but none of the various specimens endeavour to cause unpleasantness to their companions in misfortune by any display of antagonism. Healthy fish often indulge in serious fighting and sustain wounds necessitating a temporary residence in the piscatory hospital.

The sad story is well known of the American bison, which so nearly became extinct owing to its wholesale slaughter by the hunters; and it is feared by many that other North American animals, whose skin or fur is an important article of commerce, may share a similar fate. Canada has been called the world's last great fur preserve, and thus the fear of the extinction of many valuable fur-bearing animals which are hunted in that country may seem to be not unfounded. However, a reassuring report has been issued by Consul Raindal, of Dawson City, who says that there is no immediate danger of the fur-bearing animals being destroyed, and declares that there are vast unexplored regions in which they abound. The table purporting to show the annual sales of the Hudson's Bay Company at intervals of ten years shows that the most-prolific source of fur has always been the muskrat, the marten and beaver also contributing largely.

The Story Teller.

A SYNDICATE THAT FAILED.

PRIVATE SMITH, erstwhile White Chapel cockney and presently of the gallant "Buffs" quartered in Fort William, was refreshing himself with a glass of beer at the bar of a Bowbazar grog shop one sultry afternoon in June; the year is immaterial. Into the shop came a shambling, blear-eyed individual dressed in the shabbiest of clothes with a wisp of dirty white neck-cloth showing in lieu of a collar. His nose and pimply countenance testified to a fondness for strong drink, and the avidity with which he gulped down the peg of doubtful whisky, four fingers to about half that measure in water, with which he was served, bore still further testimony to this. He was accompanied by a fox terrier, smart and well bred by his looks, who sat on his haunches and yawned with a deprecating air as of one well accustomed to the place and afraid he was in for a long sojourn there.

Private Smith, who had an eye for a dog like most of his fraternity hailing from Whitechapel, cast an approving look over the dog and said to the owner, "Well, Matey! That's a nice lookin' dawg you've got there."

"Ah," said the man, proclaiming his Hibernian origin by a pronounced brogue, "Shure an' he's ivery bit o' that. Is'nt ye, Tim me bhoy, and a divil for sport." Then, suddenly ejaculating "Rats," he set the dog nosing into every corner of the bar with a zest that boded ill for any rats to be encountered.

A friendly conversation between the two men ensued. Private Smith paid for two more whiskies and water, which the seedy individual disposed of, each as a whole, without blinking, and treated himself to two more glasses of beer, more leisurely disposed of. It transpired that the Irishman, Timothy Murphy by name, was over 50 years of age and had formerly been in the army, a gunner in the Horse Artillery. He had never risen above corporal and had been reduced to the ranks again, finally taking his pension as a gunner, since when he had drifted about India in various employments on railways and so forth until his intemperance prevented his getting any more. He was now reduced to a precarious living, apart from his modest pension, by dog dealing, and incidentally, dog stealing though it was unnecessary to mention the latter to Private Smith in whose view the two were analogous, or at all events, incidents of the same profession.

The mention of Mr. Murphy's present profession brought up again the subject of "Tim" the fox terrier and Murphy with a cunning twinkle in his eye informed Private Smith that the dog was for sale.

"An' would there be iny officer in the Rigiment wantin' to buy him," added he. "Shure! There'd it be a bit in it for yeself." Private Smith brightened up, his own instincts in the dog trade asserting themselves, and said he thought he might get one of the officers to buy "Tim" who certainly was a class of dog not always easy to obtain in Calcutta.

Mr. Murphy's manner grew confidential and his tone low. "Shure an' if ye can find one that's a bit of a mug to buy him the better for the two of us" he said.

"Why," replied Private Smith "are you thinkin' a eofficer oo's a bit of a mug' would pay the most?"

"Not exactly" said Murphy. "It's another way me bhoy," and indulging in a pronounced wink with his left eye, which lengthened into a continual screwing up of that optic, he proceeded to explain as follows.

The dog, said he, had been with him from a puppy, and had been carefully trained to find his way home again to Murphy's abode, at present an unpretentious lodging in Bowbazar Street, as soon as he missed his master. When Murphy succeeded in selling him as he occasionally did, especially to visitors to Calcutta, the dog was sure to be let off chain within a few hours and at once bolted off to Murphy who concealed him till hue and cry was over.

If, he explained to Smith, an officer of the intellectual capacity denoted to them both by the term "mug" were to buy the dog he would be likely to "fork out handsomely" for the animal's return on the first occasion and might possibly part a second time without tumbling to "their little game."

Upon the "mug" declining to pay any more rewards for the dog's return the latter would, of course, resume his place in the stock in trade of Timothy Murphy and a new purchaser looked for in some other direction.

Mr. Murphy had, however, the instincts of the Company promoter sufficiently, if crudely, developed in him to point out to Private Smith the latter's interest in the prospective syndicate began with a commission of ten rupees if he could place the dog with the required "mug," and ended with a half share of such rewards as could be obtained by the return of the dog. Any future operations in other directions must, he indicated, be a matter of future arrangement.

Private Smith expressed himself quite prepared to take a hand in the "syndicate" though it occurred to neither of them to call their plan of operation by that name, and after some further talk they parted company, Murphy's address having been noted by Private Smith with a view to facilitating further meetings of the conspirators.

As Private Smith wended his way back to the Fort he was cogitating whom to select as the "mug." Any feelings of esprit de corps had been lost sight of during the settlement of the syndicate's plan of campaign owing, no doubt, to the attractive prospects thereby opened up to him, but he was bound to admit to himself in cogitation that the term could not fairly be applied to any one of the officers of his Regiment. Failing one who could be relied on to act as a "mug" the next best thing seemed obviously to be the selection of the most easy going officer amongst the Captains or Subalterns, and to trust to luck in the subsequent operations. Colonels and Majors knew too much, perhaps of the world and its ways thought Private Smith. Besides his Colonel and Major being married men with their wives with them in the Fort would be less likely than a junior officer to pay handsomely for a dog or to require canine championship.

Finally he pitched on the most junior of the Captains, Cotton by name and the Captain of his Company. One, moreover of a sporting turn of mind and much appreciated by the Regiment as Captain of their "rugger" team. How best to approach the Captain on the subject was the next thing and up to the time of his going to rest that night Private Smith had not made up his mind how to do it.

The next morning, however, he formulated his plans and the day being a Thursday, Tommy Atkins' weekly holiday, he proceeded in due course to carry them out. There was in the afternoon a game of "rugger" on the Fort ground between his Company's team and that of another Company and he was one of the forwards playing. Regimental games were always watched by a goodly number of the men accompanied by various dogs of sorts.

Watching his opportunity at half-time whilst the sides were congregated together by the touch line for a breathing space Private Smith bestowed a kick on a dog passing near him. The yelp elicited drew as he anticipated the attention of the Captain who was close by.

"Pity we 'aint got no decent dawgs in the Regiment, sir," said Private Smith.

The Captain smiled, 'Well, you men who have dogs generally seem to think a lot of them," he said.

Yes, sir. But begging your pardon, sir, we poor men can't get dawgs with much breedin'! Now I knows of a dawg, sir, a fox terrier, as a man 'as for sale in the town and a sort one don't often see. But lor! sir! 'e wants a big price for 'im 'e do."

"How much!" said the Captain.

"Fifty rupees, sir," replied Smith, "an' with it every bit, I never seed a better bred looking 'un."

The Captain rose to the occasion, fulfilling Smith's expectations.

"Well, my man," said he, "I wouldn't mind paying that for a really good dog, and you can tell your friend to bring him anp show him to me. But mind! don't go bringing me any rubbish."

No fear, sir. Once you sees the dawg you'll take a fancy to 'im" rejoined Smith.

So far so good, and, as may be imagined, Private Smith took the earliest opportunity of getting leave into town to hunt up his fellow plotter.

The conference between them resulted in Mr. Timothy Murphy presenting himself with his namesake, the dog, at the officer's quarters in the Fort the very next morning and enquiring for for Captain Cotton. The syndicate had decided that Smith need not be present and the two men were not to meet again until the dog was missing from the Fort. Private Smith would then be justified in going in search for the dog even if he was not specially deputed by the Captain to do so. His commission on the sale price was to be handed over on that occasion moreover. He felt some scruples about allowing his ten rupees to remain even for a day or two in the hands of an individual with such bibulous tendencies, but saw no other way out of it.

Captain Cotton did take a fancy to "Tim" and purchased him, paying over the Rs. 50 in notes to Murphy. The plans of the syndicate were further assisted by his keeping the dog chained up in his room and intending to keep nim on the chain for a day or two until accustomed to his new surroundings. Murphy had already told Smith that the longer the dog was tied up the faster would be his pace back to his old home. Private Smith, meeting the Captain, and being thanked for introducing "Tim" to his notice, felt that things were indeed shaping well, as the Captain mentioned that that he was keeping the dog on chain for the first few hours. This conversation took place on the morning "Tim" was purchased.

Subsequent events moved quickly; at all events for Private Smith. The very next morning, after parade, he was sent for by the Captain, told that the dog had been let loose that morning for a moment and had promptly disappeared, and was asked to go and see if the dog had run back to his old home.

The wily Smith, however, had no intention of finding the dog at once and intended to report at first that the dog had not found his way back to Murphy. A day or perhaps two might well elapse before the wanderer should be brought back by Murphy and himself, the former having, as they would say, met and recognized "Tim" at large on the maidan.

Now the Captain was interviewing Smith in the verandah of his quarters and, to the horrified gaze of the latter, there became visible below the approaching form of Mr. Timothy Murphy with the faithful "Tim" in evidence at his heels. Murpay was for him, resplendent in a new suit of slop clothes and had even mounted a collar, already limp and draggled, and tie.

The Captain hastily went downstairs followed by the crest fallen Smith and it became apparent at once to them both that Mr. Murphy was disguised in liquor. Habitual intemperance had no doubt schooled his legs to toe a line, but his tongue was not so much under control. The Captain, without paying very much attention to his mandlin utterances was satisfied with thrusting a couple of rupees upon him and conveying the unwilling "Tim" upstairs by means of a handkerchief slipped through his collar.

Private Smith was bursting with indignation but had sense enough to see that it was little use talking to his offending partner under present circumstances. Moreover the Captain might over-hear any references to his ten rupees or to the spoilt plot. He reserved what he had to say and it was likely to be in pretty strong language, for Mr. Murphy's private ear when he could next pay him a visit and collect his overdue share of profits earned. Unfortunately, however, he never got the opportunity of doing either. Murphy, on regaining comparative sobriety the following day found himself without any money at all, and for prudential reasons connected with an expected visit from Private Smith, transferred his few belongings to new lodgings in Bentinck Street.

Private Smith on finding he had disappeared from his former lodgings endeavoured to trace him but without success and not long afterwards the Buffs moved on to an up-country station.

The explanation of the plot having gone wrong was that Murphy spent about thirty rupees of the money he received on his new clothes and in settling some outstanding claims which had become troublesome and then started drinking. Having got through the ten that remained his own out of the original fifty, he encroached on the ten rupees that remained for Private Smith, and what change remained was extracted from his pocket before he was left in his lodgings by the grog shop attendant who conducted him home, he being in peril otherwise of arrest for pronounced drunkenness. The dog turned up in his room next morning when he was sleeping off his bout and with a hazy remembrance of things in general he started off with "Tim" to the Fort, priming himself first with some more drink at the grog shop and entirely forgetting that he was going to the Captain much too soon, and moreover, without Private Smith.

So came to grief the syndicate started with so much promise. And "Tim," well he remained with his new master, whether it was that being kept on the chain for nearly a week after his first escape he forgot his early training, or whether, like a sensible dog, he preferred the new life, and particularly the food, to the old, does not much matter. Private Smith enjoys the credit of having introduced the best bred dog in the Regiment into it, and for the rest, he is determined to do any further dog dealing he may indulge in without partner or partners but on his "bloomin' little own."

NAGA RAM.

Instances have frequently been given of the vagaries and eccentricities of racehorses. Very curious was the caprice of an American horse, who would never extend himself in his exercise gallops unless the rider was in full tog, and who had such an objection to bare-footed stable boys that whenever they approached him he would try to bite their legs. This horse was evidently an aristocrat, who stood upon etiquette and the proprieties. But horses have their likes as well as their dislikes. Some have a great love for cats. When the Godolphin, by mistake, flattened out his favourite grimalkin he pined with remorse, and was furious against any other member of the feline race that entered his stable. In Sir Edwin Lansee's picture of Voltigeur, the famous racer is painted with his head down caressingly to a tortoiseshell cat, which used to sleep on him at night. After he had been done for the night, Voltigeur would put his head to the rack, that puss might make a bridge of his nose and neck. Waxy and Camel were never happy unless they had the company of a rabbit in their stables, and Lanercost's pet was a dog. When the straight was divided, in 1841, Lanercost went to Pigburn, while another detachment was sent to Doncaster. The dog followed the latter by mistake, but having discovered hil error, rushed away, and was next heard of at Pigburn, whither he had found his way, although he had not been there before. There was great joy at the reunion, and when the dog was enticed out by the cry of "Cats!" he revenged himself by killing a number of ferrets that were kept in a loft of the stable, and then walked off. Gemma-di-Vergy was so fond of company that a boy had to sleep with him at night and sit with him all day. The habit began as a yearling, when he was found at a window, with his forefeet on the still, looking out into the yard where the stablemen were, having first climbed over a wall.

ANGLO-INDIANS AND HOME GOLF.

(CONTRIBUTED.)

THE game of Golf has taken such a strong hold on men now and the number of golfers has so steadily increased, that it has become quite a common thing for the home-going Anglo-Indian to plan out his well-earned holiday with special reference to visits being paid to certain golfing centres, and many an Anglo-Indian returns to this land of regrets with health improved mainly through the pursuit of his favorite game at home. The game in India is quite a different game to that in England; in lieu of the hard baked Indian ground with a minimum of real turf, with its tiny putting greens too keen from overcutting, or not greens at all but merely browns, one gets the springy English turf affording delightful lies, the putting greens large and undulating and of such a consistency that the ball has to be fairly hit not just tapped, and every opportunity is afforded for lofting shots right up to the proximity of the holes. In every way the game at home is paradise compared to the game in India.

And it is extremely interesting to the keen golfer to notice on each visit to the Old Country how the Royal and Ancient game is steadily progressing towards more common-sense conditions. It is not only that clubs are better made and that the balls fly further, the change that is coming over the game involves a new régime for golf courses. There has steadily grown up a greater appreciation for inland courses; a seaside course has generally to be laid out with special regard to existing natural bunkers and in some cases the courses have suffered thereby, to wit, the first nine holes at Sandwich, which has too many short holes. But nowadays a tract of inland country—even though covered with scrub jungle and dotted with fir trees—is boldly selected, a long course is planned out and everything is ruthlessly uprooted to provide a good line of play. The sides of the course are trimmed down for a few yards to punish a stray ball without losing it and then further on one side the higher jungle is left to punish a real bad shot. The new style of bunker is also quite different to the old style. On old courses one sees the bunkers right across the course to catch a bad second; these are now being objected to because it is impossible to place such bunkers in the right situations owing to the improvements of the balls and the vagaries of the wind. The long drivers (and their name now is legion) object to their long shots being punished. At the Amateur Championship at Hoylake I saw competitors play their tee shots so as so avoid running into bunkers which had in past days been placed to catch the second shot, and at one hole Ted Blackwell actually drove his tee shot clean over such a second-shot bunker. And it has further been recognized that with courses kept in fine condition the difficulty is not so much to loft the ball but to keep it straight; in other words, one can readily carry over the bunkers from good lies but with cross winds, etc., the difficulty is to keep your long shots straight. So the old cross bunker is giving way to lateral bunkers.

And, further, the new bunkers are being made in such a manner that the player has a fair chance of playing out of them. In the new bunkers a ball is always caught, but it runs down to the back of the bunker and thus the player has a fair chance of getting out at his first shot. In many of the old courses there are almost impossible places to play out of owing to the ball running and stopping right under high banks. On new courses the putting greens are very well guarded by pot bunkers at the sides and a player has to run up or pitch his ball very straight or he is punished. Such newish inland courses as Walton Heath, Sunningdale or Huntercombe have had immense sums of money spent on them lately to bring them into a state of perfection and modern golfers are far more fastidious than the older generation. Club houses are now small palaces, golfers' cheap railway tickets are issued by every line, and the great railways issue illustrated catalogues of the golf courses on their respective systems.

Scotland still retains the control of the game, but there undoubtedly exists a feeling of soreness in the South about this. The recent action of the Midland golfers in forming a Midland Golfing Association may have a great effect in the future towards the formation of an association recognized by all golf clubs as the ruling authority in the game. The dilatory ways of St. Andrew's, their hopeless unsympathetic conservatism, and their inability to keep pace with the requirements of the game (they have not recognized Bogey yet) will tell in time and the Southron golfers will be a powerful lot if they combine. It is quite common on Southern links to play friendly matches with stymie barred, but this is almost unknown in Scotland. The overcrowding at championships, the retention of only five courses on which championships can be played and other such items, all call for legislation. But the old game goes on splendidly, golf courses are kept in perfect condition, quite unknown in past years, and gradually the game is progressing and daily taking a stronger hold on men and women and benefitting them all greatly. Long may it flourish.

Sporting Notes.

IT is pleasing to learn that the response to the schedule put forward this year by the Calcutta Kennel Club, and which was considered rather ambitious, has quite come up to the expectations of the sanguine.

The entries which closed last week total 251 dogs divided up between thirty one odd separate varieties.

These figures compare favourably with those of Shows held in Great Britain at the smaller towns, and are not far behind some of the larger ones.

Also it must not be forgotten that the list consists of registered pedigree dogs and includes some that gained the proud title of champion at home and in point of general quality puts any previous local exhibition of dogs completely in the shade.

The general favourites, fox terriers, are first in numbers, there being thirty-four in the smooth variety and nineteen wire haired. Irish terriers come next, twenty-three, closely followed by the we are glad to see the "Die Hards"—Scottish terriers nineteen entries, have pushed themselves into increased recognition by sterling merit, Greyhounds total the same, nineteen. There are fifteen Cocker Spaniels, eleven Bbulldogs, ten great Danes, ten Airedale terriers, eight Hairless Mexican dogs, seven Foxhounds, seven Dachounds, seven Maltese terriers, seven Pekingese, seven Pomeranians, five Chow Chows only—this is difficult to understand as during a walk or drive any day ten to fifteen quite useful specimens may be seen in the streets. Four Bull terriers, four Pugs, four Lhassa terriers, four Japanese spaniels, four Retrievers, four Basset-hounds, three Kangaroohounds, three Collies, three Tibetan sheepdogs, two St. Bernards, two Poodles, two setters, one Schipperke one Borzoi, one Deerhound and one Wolfhound.

We may remind exhibitors that all dogs must be brought to the Show at 8-30 A.M. on Wednesday, the 6th February, so that they can all be in their places early and enable the judging to commence by 9-30 A.M. The Championship and Special awards will be made in the afternoon at five o'clock.

After all the Rev. H. W. Bush will not be able to judge. His coming was looked forward to with pleasure, but that particularly non-sporting gentleman, the Bishop of Lahore, has, we are told, so arranged that about the time Mr. Bush might have been judging dogs in Calcutta his services will be urgently needed for the saving of souls in Jullundur. The Committee, however, have been lucky in securing Dr. J. H. B. Martin, the well-known Australian judge, to take Mr. Bush's place. The other judge, Mr. Hood Wright, from Ceylon, should be in Calcutta now; he had started when last we heard of him.

The extension of the Calcutta racecourse on the Victoria Memorial side will effect a great improvement in the five furlong course which is at present marred by the sharpness of the turn at the Hospital corner. It is hoped that the track may be carried out opposite the milepost as far as the avenue known as Jail Road and continued alongside it over the site of the present Monsoon stand so as to make a much wider sweep of the turn than is at present possible. The idea is an excellent one but entails not only the demolition of the Monsoon Stand but also the filling up of the deep tank alongside it. This last operation should give the contractors a fine long job and even when they have filled it a considerable time must elapse before it will be fit to gallop over. If the scheme is pushed forward with the same vigour and at the same rate as the Memorial building itself, few of the present generation of Calcutta racegoers need expect to see its completion. In the meantime the Monsoon course will presumably have to be measured out from the new winning post to be placed opposite the lower of the two new Stands. The Hospital turn will then lie at a very dangerous point in the flat races and it remains to be seen whether it will seriously affect the size of fields at the autumn meetings.

All who can get away are on the move to Lucknow, while some of Mr. Apcar's horses and also Mr. Galstaun's have been sent direct to Bombay. The handicap for the Civil Service Cup is interesting reading. Claribell's immense success, in Calcutta has, of course, earned her a terrible weight and on her form at the end of the season she seems to be rather worse in the handicap than her stable companion Circus Girl. Whichever the stable fancies is sure to be heavily backed, but the Cooch Behar ponies are so well in that the race is a very open one.

At the Calcutta Fourth Extra Meeting all the top sawyers were absentees and the small Calcutta owners met with most encouraging success. Mr. J. D. Scott and Mr. Galstaun took a race each but the remaining four events were divided by Mr. McGeorge, Mr. Deakin and Mr. D. B. Myers. The last named won two races and has now had his fair share of the prize money. W. Kaesen and Bradshaw increased their total of winning mounts by two, while Melsom and Mr. Evers scored in the other races. In spite of the State arrival of the Viceroy and Lady Minto the attendance was distinctly disappointing and the Minto Fête profited to the extent of less than Rs. 5,000.

The Pony Race produced a field of seven (almost a record in these days) and strong competition between the Dehra Dun and Galstaun stables. Pat C. and Matalgia being backed down to 2 to 1. Mr. Scott's handsome little pony won quite comfortably and his stable companion, Duplex II., arrived in time to take third money.

In the Ganges Plate the Hastings stable apparently thought that they had a very good thing in Musette at 8st. 6lbs. while Swindle on his consistent running of late was also well backed. The privately trained Devil's Limit, one of the handsomest mares on the course, was quite forgotten. Her recent backward running had obliterated the memory of her English reputation and at one time she was on offer in the ring at 20 to 1. Mr. Evers got well out of the gate, went to the front at the half mile post and swung home unpressed in the respectable timing of one minute three seconds. Swindle ran second and Craig, Captain Holden's champion charger, caused some surprise by defeating the disappointing Musette for third place.

Some well informed enthusiasts had been backing Golden in the early hours of the morning, and the bookmakers began operations by chalking her up at level money. This advertisement enabled the filly to retain the proud position of favourite until the end, but in the race she made no show and Vespasia scored her first win for Mr. Myers. Sir Michael ran well and is a promising horse and will probably find an owner on the look out for a Moonsoon winner.

The big race of the day fell to Beaunero, to whom Annamulloch was quite unable to give the weight she was asked to do. Mr. Deakin's horse has come on very fast and should win a good race next year if not knocked about.

In the Selling Handicap Hande'ilian beat a very moderate field, Nirvana running second. In the Kedleston Plate the followers of Mr. Marshall's colours invested their winnings on Pat C. and Beaunero on the untrustworthy Galley Slave, who actually finished up favourite at 2 to 1, but this time they were disappointed, as Bradshaw scored cleverly on Bon Bon from Mr. Charles's Foy, the second favourite and the public fancy. Next Saturday will be a blank day, but the February week ends are to be filled with Extra Meetings in which the selling plate and hunter classes will figure largely.

The Ladies' Paperchase Cup was competed for with customary zest on Tuesday morning when Mrs. Lamond Walker added yet one more to her fine collection of paperchase cups and prizes. Detective has twice run second in this race, but was this year facile princeps. Mrs. Crocker made a great effort on Bluebell and hunted Mrs. Walker home in fine style, but the speedy little Detective was never really hurried and disposed of the last two fences at his leisure.

We see the Rev. H. W. Bush, Honorary Secretary of the N.I.K.A., is going home shortly; we unite with all Indian doggy men in wishing him a right good time at home; his work on the N.I.K.A. and his labours with the Gazette of the Association entitle him to a golden statue in our opinion. Mr. H. Arden Close, D.S.P., Peshawar, is to act for him as Honorary Secretary.

The Rawalpindi Spring Meeting dates have been changed from 26th, 28th and 30th March to 19th, 21st and 23rd idem, the closing dates for entries remaining the same—15th February, 6th March and 15th March. The prospectus is published in the usual place to-day.

Lord Delamere, a famous pioneer, explorer, and big-game hunter, has, it is stated, been committed for trial at Nairobi, Mombassa, under the Indian Penal Code. Lord Delamere, who is the owner of the Vale Royal in Cheshire, is one of the most famous of English hunters, and in one African expedition secured fourteen splendid lions. Accompanied by his wife, he left England last year to take up his residence in Nairobi, where he has built himself a splendid house, and has purchased 100,000 acres of land on which he has been successful in cotton growing and sugar planting. He once disappeared for months while in Africa, but returned at length, bringing with him a very fine collection of trophies. Soon after he met with a very bad accident while hunting in Cheshire, and it was then he fell in love with Lady Florence Cole, daughter of the Earl of Enniskillen, who helped to nurse him.

Mr. R. Ringley, of Inverness, is a fine rifle shot; he says so himself. In a letter to the Shooting Times he writes:—"Last year I shot at and killed a stag dead at 420 yards. Only the forepart of the animal was visible against the sky-line, and the bullet struck the vertebrae, smashing it and causing instant death. Returning home one evening, a string of geese passed over, and, holding on to the leader, I fired, and he came down with a rush, and the distance could not have been far short of 400 yards. The bird proved to be one of the pink-footed species. The remainder of the flock, contrary to my expectations, dropped some yards earthwards and, swerving, came back over me, when, aiming at the front bird, I brought him down also. Again, a rabbit, sitting lengthwise alongside a bluff, succumbed to a shot at 210 yards, measured distance. The weapon used was a 'Sherwood,' 300-bore, and the ammunition loaded with copper-capped bullets. I could give you some remarkable notes regarding seal-shooting with this rifle."

A Mysore correspondent sends the Madras Mail the following interesting account of the wonderful exploit of his fox-terrier, which ran all the way from Bangalore to Mysore, probably along the railway line, covering the eighty-seven miles in eleven hours and a half. The story seems almost too good to be true, remarks our contemporary but our correspondent, "T. D." says that it can be corroborated by several reliable people in Bangalore and Mysore:—On Friday, the eleventh instant, I took a dog in to Bangalore from Mysore by the night train to the City Station and then on by the Madras Railway to the Cantonment. He was left with his mistress, who had been in England for the past nine months. The dog seemed quite at home and at 6 o'clock the lady went out, but on her return at 8 o'clock he was nowhere to be seen. It was too late and dark to make enquiries that night. Next day at 10 A.M. a telegram was received in Bangalore to say that the dog had arrived in Mysore. On my return I found that he had come to my bungalow at 5-30 A.M., a full hour before any train arrives from Bangalore, in a thoroughly exhausted condition. He took nothing but water all day and for a whole week suffered from the effects of his extraordinary exertion. The distance travelled by him on foot must have been fully eighty-seven miles and this he covered in eleven and a half hours. He has done the journey repeatedly by train, but never by road, and I imagine he must have come on this occasion along the railway lines. It was a pitch dark night. Mick is a thick-set fox-terrier, standing 15 inch at the shoulder, and to look at him one would never think him capable of such an exploit.

Our Bombay correspondent writes :—Commencing with four runaway wins the last four were a great improvement and provided exciting finishes in a card of another eight events for the Seventh Extra. Although one hot favourite and two equal favourites secured brackets, the day was in favour of the pencil brigade, for the fact that a very large number of supported horses failed to place.

On his game finish behind Squire, Survey was made a very warm favourite for the opening event, Toy finding a pile of money for a place, but neither of these showed up. A bit of work has done Saeed an extraordinary amount of good, as coming early into the lead he held his field safe all the way after an inglorious exhibition over five furlongs run in 1min. 11⅘secs. Sirree, Scipio and Little John, all at tens, had a great race for places finishing as mentioned. Winning his five furlongs in the smart time of 1min. 9⅗secs. easy it was not surprising to see Tabriz go out well backed for the six furlongs in the FirstHopeful Plate. He was a hot favourite though an unknown quantity in Kalee Charan was supported late and displaced him. Neither of these again even ran 1-2-3, and the race was a hollow victory for Nazzar. The second two had their places assured at the bend, but the favourite could never get near.

There is nothing to say about the Mahim Plate than that it was a canter for Mudlool.

Royal Red was the disturbing element in the Matoonga Plate, he came away down the straight with a two length lead when Scarlet gave chase. It was a most exciting race as, both with whips going, Royal Red just stayed on to win by half a length. Scarlet was a warmish favourite, but neither Marvellous or Canter, who were backed, ran anywhere.

Even 10-3 is a feather weight to punters when they make up their minds an old favourite is to win and Tachreet carried the bulk of public money though the stable came strong at the end for Grey Falcon who was made equal favourite. Tachreet might have stayed at home and it seemed probable the other would do no good when Ashroft stuck to his guns so gamely. At the distance, however, Kamad was seen coming up and by the stand he jumped between the front two to win a fine race.

Four scratchings left only a field of five for the Epsom Plate and Chassepot on Poona form was heavily supported. Whether the stable expected the favourite to win by a street or not I do not know, but Williams took Chassepot with his 9-8 to the front at a great pace. He was followed by Baritone and Freelance, the latter coming outside and catching the leader whereas Baritone came fast and naturally went wide on the outside. Chassepot was absolutely done and was passed by every horse in the race and Baritone showed he had shot his bolt at the distance where Freelance held a nice lead with Shotover coming on the outside. It was a desperate finish between these two under the whip in which Dhondi on Freelance just stayed out by a mere head.

I think I mentioned, when last he ran, how well Great Shot was going when making the pace from Lailan and this has been fully confirmed as after a struggle with Sherlock, who made all the running, he landed the money invested on him. Lastly came a stirring finish between the three best fancied horses in the Second Beginners' Plate of half a mile. Rajput soon settled down with the lead with Squire in close company two lengths ahead of the field and at the bend the positions were reversed though the two were locked together for the rest of the journey. Caroon followed them and with Robertson hard at work put in a great effort and may have won in another hundred yards. As it was the positions were preserved and a verdict of a neck, all under the whip, shows the nature of the finish to which we were treated.

At the Yacht Club there were again three races sailed and all but the first were exciting. For this, the Challenge Cup, for which only three started and the scratch boat Turquoise had to come back for being over too soon and could never make this up though she passed Melody who beat her on time. Sapphire led the whole way and when Turquoise came up actually went away again in the run in.

For the "B" Class Handicap four started and Trixie sailed away followed by Yellow Peril who fell back on the windward tack and Trixie took up the chase and passing the other won a fine race by seventeen seconds.

Eight came up for "C" class, Tomtit Handicap, Coralie getting the best of a fine start, but Meg at Cross Island showed in front followed by Lapwing and the scratch boat Tomtit, who went ahead at North Karanja Buoy, but Meg again passed her at the Committee Vessel and a great race between the two scratch boats ended in Meg's winning by under a minute. Lapwing and Maud fought out third place which the former won ; but Jean on her big handicap of 23mins. 30secs. won the Handicap from Coralie and Maud ; Meg's being the class prize.

There is no kill to record this week though on Thursday the Bombay Hounds had a rare good run. On the 20th they were some time in finding, and when they did the jack crossed the railway and up the Ghats so the Master called them off.

Though he eventually gave them the slip a good jack provided a grand run on the 24th when he made over good galloping ground to Sahar. He was headed here and doubled back and once again crossed the Pipe and to the Backwater where hounds were at fault. They soon picked up again, however, and went up Hogg's Back Hill, but on the other side lost him completely after a great run of an hour.

Athletic Notes.

IF any of our readers are expecting detailed reports of the football and boxing tournaments in connection with the Minto Fête we may say at once they will be disappointed. We trust, however, our explanation will find acceptance. Those who are running these shows have not had the courtesy to invite us to witness them. If it is not worth while paying the sporting press the trifling compliment of a ticket for our representative, it is certainly not worth our while to devote time, space and money to reports. We are aware that it is "all for charity" and that under these circumstances we might pay at the gate and so be in a position to give our readers details. We trust we are never to be found behind the door when appealed to in the name of charity or asked to support sport in any form by putting our hands in our pocket ; it is the principle we object to and the slight to the press we protest against ; we trust our readers will find themselves able to give us their support on these points.

As a matter of fact this "charity" business can be overdone, in our opinion it is being overdone in connection with this fête. To quote an instance. Let us look at the Lucky Bag arrangements. The public have been called upon to exercise their charitable instincts in this particular direction. Many thousands of tickets have been sold, thousands of prizes have been collected. The tent in which these things are set out reminds us of a junk shop or a jumble sale. Surely the most casual glance around will convince any unbiassed person that the comparison is not inapt. Packets of tooth paste, rolls of crinkled paper, tins of patent food, pots of ringworm ointment (!) and a box of Doan's Dinner Pills can be acceptable to no one and how they came to be accepted passes comprehension. Grumbling was general on Tuesday and angry protests were frequent. So we say the "all for charity" idea can be carried too far.

Another instance. The Cyclist Corps are contributing quite a good turn to the programme of military displays. They were without passes and the application of their C. O. for passes was up to time of going to press, ignored ; so having been taken off the ground at the conclusion of their display they were unable to re-enter save on payment ! Now if all who are helping were treated alike there might be less cause for annoyance ; but when we find passes in the possession of singers, minstrels, stallholders, exhibitors et hoc why, we ask, are volunteers excluded from this little courtesy ? It may be urged that taking part in the Military shows they must be regarded as ranking with the ordinary soldier element ; but if this is the reason for the refusal to grant them passes those responsible can have but a poor appreciation of the position. These gentlemen have spent weeks in preparing their display, they have spent time and money on it, and have often been inconvenienced in business in order that they might acquit themselves creditably and assist in adding to the funds of the Fête. While they are actually in the arena, and only then, they may very rightly be regarded purely from a military point of view by the executive ; but their item concluded, they have a right to be treated somewhat differently to the regular who is there on duty all the time and in receipt of wage for what he is doing. At least they are entitled to all the privileges that other non-military helpers and performers receive. This is how it strikes us, and we may say we echo the feelings of not only the members of the Cycle Corps but of large numbers of the general public. And so we repeat the "charity" business can be overdone, the rules of ordinary business etiquette can be set aside it seems on occasions like this. It is most distinctly not playing the game.

The Western India Lawn Tennis Challenge Cup Tournament will be held between the 4th and 14th March ; entries closed on 28th February.

The meeting of the Northern India Coursing Club has been postponed till the 25th proximo.

The meeting between the East Surrey Regiment and the Customs teams in the Minto Fête Football Tournament produced a good game played in a sporting spirit throughout—very different from the time when the Customs played the H.L.I. This time the Customs succumbed to their military opponents, who won by 3 goals to 1.

On Saturday the Manchesters met the Royal Irish in the Minto Fête Football Tournament. The redoubtable Irishmen of whose prowess we in Calcutta have time and again had many exhibitions that linger in memory, were playing quite up to their form, but the Manchesters bringing with them a big reputation fully maintained it, and won, after a really superb game, by 3 goals to 2.

On Monday the Gordon Highlanders met and defeated the Durham L. I. by two goals to one : it was a fast game and in many respects an interesting display of science and skill.

The Americans are determined to be as well represented in the Olympic Games of 1910 at Athens as they were at the games held last spring. Of the 15,000 dollars raised to send out the 1906 team, there is a balance remaining of 2,889 dollars, and this sum has been placed in a savings bank to form the nucleus of a fund to defray the expenses of the next team. It is the intention of the United States to have particularly strong representation in the lawn tennis, fencing, and rowing competitions. President Roosevelt, who had expressed his strong approval of the Olympic Games movement, has accepted the honorary presidency of the American Committee.

Mr. James E. Sullivan, who has been congratulated by President Roosevelt for his labours on behalf of purity in athletics, speaking at a dinner in New York, is reported by the Tribune's correspondent to have said :—"The projectors of the international games to take place in England in 1908 have invited us to send a team. Cablegrams tell us that they propose to carefully scrutinise our list of competitors in order to see whether they are amateurs. I want to say that we will carefully scrutinise them before we send them. If a single athlete be rejected in England we will withdraw the whole team. Outside Oxford and Cambridge the English amateur athlete is a joke. We make laws and honestly enforce them. We honestly keep our athletics pure. We do not propose to accept the judgment of England of any other country upon the amateur, whose status as a man we guarantee. We believe in international athletics, and are desirous of fostering every international meeting ; but we do not propose to be stigmatised by self-constituted critics whose government is a far more lax one than our own."

According to a London contemporary, Mr. Edward Blackwell ought to win the English Amateur Golf Championship next year, and is likely to start favourite for that event. It is true that Mr. Blackwell is usually seen at his best at St. Andrews, where the tournament of 1907 is to be held ; but there are other amateurs who are partial to the classic course, and far further drivers and consistent in approaching though he is, Mr. Blackwell is too uncertain on the putting greens for his chance of winning to be highly considered. The time has gone by when the chief event of amateur golf lay at the mercy of a few famous player. Mr. Harold Hilton scored his last victory in 1901, and every year since then the Amateur Championship has been won by players who had not previously achieved a similar success. The tournament grows more open every year.

More motor racing lunacy ! Reuters Agency states that a noted English motorist, named Marriott, competing at Ormond Beach. was going at 125 miles an hour when he struck an inequality on the beach. The car turned somersault three times. Marriott was rendered unconscious, lost one eye and had a rib broken.

For the All-India Hockey Tournament already eleven teams have definitely sent in their names, a number of others from the nature of their enquiries showing a desire also to enter. The present holders, the Naini Tal Volunteers, have not as yet specified their intention of upholding their title to the Cup, but it is presumed that their name will be found among the list of competing teams. The entries at present received are as follows :—Queen's, Royal Scots Fusiliers, Royal Sussex, South Lancashire, 43rd Oxford Light Infantry, 85th King's Light Infantry, two combined teams—(6th Jats and 37th Dogras and 9th Infantry and 10th Jats)—1st Brahmans, United Provinces Police and the Allahabad Gymkhana. Mr. Ransford, 9th Infantry, stationed at Allahabad is Secretary.

As will be seen from the announcement among our notices of sporting events, the Calcutta Golf Club have fixed the 8th and 9th proximo for the Ladies' Challenge Bowl Handicap. On the 9th the Club will be "At Home" to the members of the Ladies' Golf Club.

The Shalimar Rope Works and Paulin Factory are familiar objects of the foreshore to all whose business on pleasure takes them down the river-side road between Howrah and the Botanic Garden. This large commercial enterprise is the property of Messrs. Ahmuty and Company, of Calcutta, well-known to our planter readers, our athletes and others whose requirements may range from a pruning knife to a horizontal engine, a few inches of Willesden canvas, or a tug of war rope, to a set of sails and cordage for a full rigged yacht. Our good friends of Church Lane have just favoured us with a copy of a brochure regarding the Rope Works ; we may say at once that we have seldom seen

Herein we are introduced to the various departments at Shalimar and with concise letter press helped by the excellent pictures we are placed in a few minutes in possession of a fair working knowledge of the mystery of rope-making with its "walks," its "hackling," spinning "fore-twining" and other curious and interesting matters. We heartily congratulate Messrs. Ahmuty and Company on this artistic production.

London Week by Week.

Friday, 11th January 1907.

MERE mention of the word winter, these last few days, provokes the smile of scorn. We have been sitting with open windows and allowing fires to go out (to regret it, I admit), and asking ourselves if we really need put on overcoats to go out of doors. The trees are budding all too previously as they are like, to find; and a few misguided sparrows and starlings have begun to bethink them of their domestic responsibilities. But we cannot trust the climate and they are wise who are packing up to go south. Italy does not seem to be much in vogue this season: people brought back such lurid accounts of railway mismanagement, of deficient train accommodation, of incivility and baggage robbery last year, that one can't be surprised at the avoidance of Italian winter resorts.

I was told last might by my neighbour after dinner that his revered leader, Sir Henry C. B., was not likely to remain long in active political life. Years are telling upon him and the old gentleman was always falling asleep in his place in the House last session. Conscious that this indicates failing powers, he is likely to retire ere long; which no doubt means the Upper House. By the way, I heard rather a quaint little story of His Majesty a few days ago. Somebody asked him how he liked C. B. "Very much indeed," said the King, "most agreeable, most thoughtful and pleasant: very much indeed." "But sir," urged the somebody, "you must miss Mr. Balfour's extraordinary acumen and ability." "Certainly I miss him," agreed His Majesty. "I certainly miss him: but you know," dropping his voice, "you know I always felt that I bored Balfour."

The winter exhibition at Burlington House opened on Monday and is voted the best collection of old masters seen for many years. The picture that attracts most interest is the Gainsborough which in its dingy condition was contemptuously refused by a Bond Street dealer about 18 months ago and was subsequently sold for 9,000 guineas at Christie's: to wit Miss Linley. Rather unkindly the authorities have hung immediately opposite this picture another Miss Linley by Gainsborough: and if you can discover any resemblance between these two portraits of the same lady you must be clever indeed. A picture of the collection is the show of Turner's water-colours made to illustrate Thomas Campbell's poems. The exhibition is particularly strong in Reynolds and Gainsborough.

Rarely I imagine has a funeral procession so simple brought together a crowd so enormous as that which collected on the route between Stratton Street and the Abbey on Saturday morning. The procession consisted of an open hearse and four mourning carriages: no wreaths were on the coffin; these I understaud may not be taken into the Abbey. On Thursday and Friday the house in Stratton Street was thrown open for that function called "lying in state" and, on each day, thousands of people poured in at the Stratton Street door and out by the rarely used door in Piccadilly. How many of the people who participate in a function of this kind are actuated by feelings of respect or regard and how many by morbid curiosity? I wonder.

Rumour of course busied herself at once concerning the will of the Baroness: wherefore Mr. Burdett Coutts wisely authorised her solicitors to publish the facts. From their letter in yesterday's papers it appears that Mr. Burdett Coutts is sole executor: that the enormous income the late Baroness enjoyed from Coutts' Bank was held in trust and the widower has now no interest in it: that at various dates between 1881 and 1895, the Baroness transferred to her husband nearly all the property she possessed including the Columbia estate in the East End, the Holly Lodge estate at Highgate and her interest in Stratton Street; together with such of the contents as she could dispose of. It is also stated that when the Baroness married, "to avoid litigation," she surrendered in 1881 the larger portion of the income she derived from the trust estate: a circumstance which makes the magnitude of her charities the more noteworthy.

The White Star Line has made arrangements to run its Wednesday mail steamer from Southampton instead of Liverpool as at present. The object is to obtain a larger share of the first class passenger traffic between the Continent and New York, which has fallen so largely into the hands of the German steamer companies. The White Star liners from Southampton will call at Cherbourg to collect passengers and, as now, at Queenstown for mails. The Homeward bound vessels will call at Plymouth, thence cross over to Cherbourg and finish the voyage at Southampton. The Liverpudlians will not much like the change, I suppose, but any step which makes for active competition with German enterprise is sure of popularity in the country at large.

"Nelly Neil" was produced at the Aldwych last night with Miss Edna May in the name part. Beyond the fact that Nelly was saleswoman in a fruit shop and is selected by Lady Rokeby (Miss M. Lowell) to manage her "simplicity farm" at Humpstead where peers and anarchists meet on common ground to live the simple life. I have but a vague idea of the plot if there be any. "Nelly Neil" in a word is a musical comedy of the very familiar sort; a succession of "turns" so weakly linked together that you might take out half a dozen and put in new one or transpose the scenes or play the whole thing backwards without touching its coherence. Mr. Ivan Caryll's music is as familiar as the rest, and Mr. McLellan's book and lyrics are very much what we look for. The piece is beautifully staged and the simple life taught by the countess does not extend to simplicity of attire; it would not, you know. We will put up with much eccentricity on the stage, particularly on the musical comedy stage, but we draw the line at commonplace clothes Therefore Miss Edna May and the rest are charmingly dressed and their socialism is mere lip service. Mr. Joseph Coyne as a motor-humourist was delightful and ran over people and transgressed all the bye-laws with the best grace in the world. "Nelly Neil" is just the sort of piece to run for years.

"The Bondman" did not greatly impress me when I saw it at Drury Lane, and I like it rather less at the Adelphi, though those to whom this glorified "penny gaff" appeals will no doubt like it much better, mourning only the Real Cow and the Real Haystack which have disappeared by reason I conceive of lack of stage space. Mr. Walter Hampden plays Michael Sunlocks and makes him the prig he is. Miss Wynne Mathieson is thrown away as Greeba, the "sloppy" heroine: what Mr. Hall Caine wants for this part is an old-fashioned actress versed in the traditions of what we used to call Surrey-side melodrama. The Adelphi audience was delighted with "The Bondman:" pit and gallery cheered themselves hoarse, and damp pocket handkerchiefs were much in evidence.

A "very light Comedy" by Mr. Cyril Harcourt was produced at the Court on Tuesday. "The Reformer" appears to be in the nature of a counter-blast to "Man and Superman," inasmuch as it represents the male animal's triumph over woman. It is very slight. The "reformer" is Mrs. Rockingham, who intends to marry Lord Crowborough, his money and position to the end that she may "reform society:" her qualifications would seem to be audacity and tactlessness. The Earl cries off, because she "dresses so awfully well" and Sir Rupert Yeld, whom Mrs. Rockingham had denounced very freely as a man she means to cut when she became a countess, takes it as a challenge and applies himself to win her; the lady fearing the ridicule of "all London," and glad of the chance to make it appear that she was the withdrawing party, accepts him. The excellence of the acting won acceptance for a play which is by no means up to the Court standard though brightly written in spots.

I imagine that the other piece, "The Campden Wonder," which followed, was meant to be tragedy. Heaven knows it is tragic enough in intention; a criminal lunatic, aided by a fool of a parson, swears away the lives of his innocent mother and brother. They die on the gallows and are scarce cold before the man they are said to have murdered turns up to the utter dumbfoundering of the parson (he has no name: perhaps Mr. Masefield thought he was not worth it). Unfortunately the playwright has no belief in his own characters; comic he is, without intention, in a music-hallish fashion, but tragic never; the most pathetic scenes only succeeded in being bathos for all the skill of the players. Some new turns at the Empire are very clever and amusing. Arthur Bendini as a clown conjuror is exceedingly funny. His idea of emulating William Tell's performance with the apple appealed to me: it occurs to him as he takes his revolver in hand that it would be dangerous to shoot an apple off his head direct so he fires at its reflection in a mirror to be staggered by the discovery that he has broken that without spoiling the apple. This is a fair example of Bendini methods, which are mostly of the destructive order. At the Tivoli Mr. Arthur Roberts has worked a skit on the Zancigs into "Robbing Hood," one of the objects involved being a compromising letter which the careless owner is fearfully anxious to recover before the contents are revealed.

* * * * * *

The turn which follows the Bendini performance is Mr. Hymack's. Mr. Hymack recites to an unappreciative pump, but his recitations are not the point: while reciting he divests himself of various articles of clothing: half a dozen pairs of gloves come off, one after another: he takes off about a dozen neckties, and several pairs of shirt cuffs: he throws aside his cane, to find another in his hand, he throws that away; another comes into his grasp and he breaks it across his knee only to find he has a third. The gloves and cuffs one can understand, but whence come the canes and whence the frock coat and tall hat in which he is finally arrayed is a mystery. The patter is poor stuff, but the sleight of hand which accomplishes the changes is very clever.

* * * * * *

By the way, the Zancig performance is more discussed than ever since the Sandringham visit. Observant persons have come to the conclusion that the man conveys information to his blindfolded and be-screened partner on the stage by an ingenious application of the time-signalling system: i.e., that the lacunæ in his talk stand for letters of the alphabet according to length and proximity something on the Morse principle. If this be the secret, I can only say it is more wonderful than telepathy or thought-reading: Herr Zancig's skill in determining the duration of tenths of a second is only equalled by Fru Zancig's. My recollection of the performance does not incline me to accept the time-signal theory.

Princess Estelle, the American wife of the Prince de Broglie, is the latest attraction at the Tivoli: a very handsome woman and tastefully dressed (though I confess that her conception of the allowable circumference of a hat errs on the extravagant side) she has a good voice if it lacks training. She sang American, French and English ballads to an appreciative audience, her husband conducting the orchestra.

The new tube from Hammersmith by Brompton and Piccadilly Circus to Finsbury has been doing good business. It is not a month since it was opened and the management joyfully announces that nearly a million and a half of passengers have already used it. At a rough guess made from personal experience I should say half a million of these have travelled as "strap hangers." Each trams consists of three coaches only and at the busy hours of the day these are literally crammed.

Rare, if unintentional, candour distinguished the defence put forward by George Cartwright charged at the Old Bailey with, among other things, stealing a coat. "As for stealing the coat which has been mentioned in the case, I would not do such a thing as it was not worth having."

If "Independent Labour" captures the London County Council next March, the growth of the metropolis would receive the check it requires; for the conclusive reason that it will become uninhabitable. The I. L. party has issued its manifesto wherefrom we learn that it proposes, among other things, to become sole valuation authority, to absorb all the suburbs, to build "garden" suburbs, to take over the port and docks of London, to take over ownership of traffic of all kinds; to assume monopolies of coal and milk (why not clothes and beef too?) and to acquire the hospitals. There are a few more things that Independent Labour proposes to acquire when it controls the Council; and to ensure really businesslike management it will include women; whether the women will look after the docks or the milk does not appear.

It is affirmed that the South African football team have received nearly £10,000 as their share of the gatemoney taken during their tour. From this sum the expenses have yet to be deducted. The net sum realised by the New Zealanders was nearly £9,000.

As examples of the fruit of the education for which we pay so heavily these cited by Mr. Eccles in a lecture a few nights ago are worth quoting. Local authorities have been trying to encourage the indition of essays on the evils of drink in the schools and these gems are extracted from the essays produced at Hull. "Another dangerous thing about alcohol is that should a person take too large a quantity of beer he would be taken or go to a very hot place," "Seafaring men who are in the habit of drinking are liable to collide with other vessels," "To-day many people are in gaol for committing suicide under the influence of drink," "Alcohol is a mocker. At last it biteth like a servant and stingeth like a hatter," "Doctors say that fatal diseases are the worst," "Medical men have found that there are more dead than there were," "Doctors say that the increased death rate shortens lives more." The quotation beginning "Alcohol is a mocker" seems to come from more guileful pen than that of a board school boy.

THE GROWTH OF A GREAT MUSEUM.*

IT was a happy thought that induced Professor Ray Lankester to instruct his subordinates in the Natural History Departments of the British Museum (commonly known as the Natural History Museum) to write historical accounts of the various collections under their respective custody; collections for the well-being of which, as a whole, Professor Lankester is, as Director, of course, responsible. The first volume which dealt with the palæontological, mineralogical, and botanical collections, appeared some years ago; the present one is devoted to the Zoological collections, which alone come under the designation of natural history in popular language, and are the most generally interesting of all the contents of the Museum. The volume contains a very large amount of information relating not only to the growth of the Museum itself, but likewise to the rise and progress of natural history generally in Great Britain, more especially from the point of view of exhibitions and museums. Much of this information, if obtainable at all elsewhere, could only be acquired with great difficulty and trouble; and a considerable portion, if it had not been published in this form, might have been lost for ever. The issue of the work is therefore fully justified.

On the title page it is stated that the accounts of the various collections are separate and disconnected. The information is perhaps a little superfluous, seeing that the most casual of readers would not be long in finding this out for themselves. A lack of editing and of bringing the various sections into some degree of harmony with one another as regards style and mode of treatment, is indeed the weakest feature of the volume. The most striking example of this is to be found in the inordinate length and rambling character of much of the section on birds, which is altogether out of proportion to the rest in point of length and detail.

Other evidence of the want of editing is afforded by the occurrence of various errors and of discrepancies between the different sections in regard to matters of fact. As an example it may be noticed that the authors do not even know the proper way of spelling Montagu House, the precursor of the present building at Bloomsbury, since they write it with a final e, which is, however, omitted in the official guide to the Museum. It is a little too absurd for a Government institution to have two ways of spelling the name of its own building in its own publications, even if the usage of the London County Council in spelling Montague Street with the final e may be held to justify (which it does not) the present method.

Again, it might have been thought that in the case of such a notable benefactor to the Museum as the late Mr. Brian Hodgson the proper way of spelling his name and the dates of the more important events in his career would have been known to all the officials, we find, however, his Christian name spelt in one place with an i and in another with a y; while in one section of the work he is stated to have settled in Darjiling in 1843 and in another in 1844. As a matter of fact, the real date was 1845, as might have been easily ascertained by reference to Sir W. W. Hunter's "Life of Brian Hodgson." A happy-go-lucky way of spelling the names of places is also noticeable throughout the volume, as witness Sudan and Soudan, and Katiawar and Kathiwar. Again Sir George Newnes, Bart, will probably not be but pleased to find himself mentioned in one place as though he was only an ordinary knight.

These and other trifling blemishes detract, however, but little from the general interest and value of this volume, which are undoubtedly very great.

As regards the early history of the collection it appears that in the mammal collection two specimens—namely, the record pair of Indian baffalo horns and a single horn of a white rhinoceros—alone represent the original Museum of Sir Haus Sloane, which was purchased by the nation in 1753. Still older, however, is a pair of dwarf African baffalo's horns, once in Grew's collection at Gresham College, and described in the Catalogue of 1681, and also figured by Penant in 1781. It is likewise probable that a pair of antlers of the American white tailed deer came under the same category, although this was not known to be the case when the volume was written.

As regard birds, it is stated that although the Sloane collection included considerably over a thousand specimens, not one of these now remains in the Museum so far as can be ascertained; all having been allowed to perish, or having been purposely destroyed. Apparently we are to conclude from this that such actual payments of the dodo as the Museum possesses were not a portion of the Sloane collection, although it would have been mere satisfactory had definite information been given with regard to this interesting point.

A fate very similar to that which befel the Sloane birds seems also to have occurred in the case of those collected during Cook's voyages;—a really lamentable circumstance, since some of these undoubtedly belonged to exterminated species, of which, as noticed later, little or no record remains. One specimen from Captain Cook's collection has, however, escaped the general fate, this being a tree-starling, Aplonis ulietensis, peculiar to one of the Pacific islands.

Several amusing stories concerning some of the officials of the British Museum during its earlier days are told, of which one may be repeated. It appears that Mr. G. R. Gray, of the ornithological section, although a "conscientious clerk" so far as Museum cataloguing were concerned, had no knowledge of birds in life; a type of Museum official now, it may be hoped, as extinct as the dodo. "A story is told of him that, as he was being continually twitted about his ignorance of birds in the field, he one day hired a gun, and went into Hertfordshire to shoot birds. He was promptly arrested by a keeper for trespassing." Much space—perhaps rather too much—is devoted to Bullock's Museum, a well-known collection which for some years previous to 1819 (when its contents were sold by auction) occupied the Egyptian Hall, London, recently pulled down. A large portion of the sale-catalogue, of which but few copies appear to be in existence, has been reprinted in extenso in the volume before us.

Among the most valued treasures of the ornithological section of the Museum is a collection of, mostly coloured, drawings of birds made by W. W. Ellis who accompanied, in the capacity of artist, Captain Cook during his third voyage. A complete list of these drawings is given, with the identification, so far as praticable, of the various species delineated. One of these represents an extinct species, Prosobonia ellisi from Eimeo, or York Isle, otherwise known only by a single specimen in the Museum at Leyden; while others depict almost equally rare birds, the identification of some of which is still doubtful.

To pick out even a tithe of the more interesting passages relating to the bird collection would, however, be an almost endless task; and we must content ourselves with stating that among the other treasures are the collection of British birds brought together by Colonel Montagu, the author of the well-known "Ornithological Dictionary," and General Hardwicke's collection of Indian birds. The last-named great naturalist also bequeathed his collection of Indian mammals and reptiles, and among other great Anglo Indian benefactors to the Museum may be specially mentioned Brian Hodgson and Mr. A. O. Hume, whose collection of horns and antlers adds so much to the attractiveness and interest of the mammal gallery.

The Volume before us may indeed be described as a perfect mine of information with regard to the Zoological collections of the Museum, and thus of natural history in general.

OUR OLD CHIPPED STONES.*

IN a concisely written booklet of some eighty pages Mr. A. C. Logan treats of the implements of the "Stone Age" as represented in India which should prove of interest to the archæologist. The compiler also notices the less known caves and deposits therein, taking us back, according to his computations, 300,000 years, when man first commenced to exhibit signs of intelligence in forming these crude weapons and implements. The speculations on the geology of the mountain ranges and their probable origin are also highly interesting. We commend the work to those whose inclinations lie in investigating prehistoric subjects.

OVIS AMMON IN THE ALTAI MOUNTAINS.

A MAN must have a constitution of iron, with nerves like steel and whip-cord, to spend the greater part of one year near the Equator, a few months in civilization and a congenial climate, and then penetrate into one of the coldest regions on earth, on the summit of the Altai Mountains in Mongolia. That is what I have done within a period of less than two years. It is an experience something like what it must be to jump from the frying pan into the ice box.

I went to the Altai Mountains solely because I was particularly anxious to get some good specimens of the hords of the Altai Mountain sheep, Ovis Ammon, coveted by all big game hunters. I succeeded beyond my expectations, getting, among others, a pair that measured 52 inches in spread and 21 inches around the burr, which are one of the largest ever obtained. But it was only through the great courtesy of the Russian government officials that I was able to cross Mongolia and reach the Altai Mountains.

I outfited at Tomsk, everything in the way of pack saddles, provisions in the way of canned goods, etc., and caught a small steamer going down the River Tom about fifty miles, where we turned up the River Ob, going to the south towards the Altai Mountains. After five days of the river trip, I came to the town of Biisk; there I bought tarataness (a Russian conveyance for travelling by post road) and three wagons. I now had all I needed. My tents, ammunition and eight guns, my photographic cameras and glasses, plenty of warm clothes and all kinds of things in tins, such as butter, preserved milk, sugar, tea, jamps and all that sort of thing. I had no use for meats for I relied on my gun to provide me with fresh chops and steaks, and I got plenty.

I left Biisk at night in an awful rainstorm, and crossed the River Bia on an oldfashioned ferry worked by horse-power paddle wheels; we traveled due south 400 miles, stopping every 15 or 20 miles to change horses at the different posts. As I was travelling with letters from the officials, I had no trouble in securing horses at the different stations or posts. We travelled with three horses abreast and made some days as much as 100 miles. In five days I reached Ongudai, and there I left my wagons and took pack horses, which I secured from some Tartars.

After five days of travelling across the foot hills of the Altai Mountains, I found myself on the border of Mongolia, and there I sent for the Zaissan, who is the chief of the Kalmuk tribes—a race of people who live on the frontier of Mongolia. The Zaissan did not want to let me have any horses, nor did any of his men want to go with me. At the time I did not known why he did not want to let me have the horses, nor why his men did not want to go, but he forced eight men into service after I had secured the horses, and they went with me as far as the border, where we camped for the night. The next morning I was surprised to find the men had all deserted me and the only men left with me were my personal servant, who was my Russian interpreter, for I did not speak a word of that language, and one man who spoke Kalmuk, and I had a Kalmuk who interpreted into Mongolian, and these were the only men left with me in the morning. I did not care so much about them deserting me, but I did care for the fact that they stole my good axes which I had brought to chop wood for fire. After asking my interpreter to find out from the Russian why these men deserted, I discovered that they were afraid of a tribe of Kirghiz bandits on the border between Mongolia and Siberia. The only thing left for me to do was to try to make 30 miles the next day to a frontier post, where there were about 50 Chinese soldiers. There I found a little old man who might have been 100 or 1,000 years old, in charge of these men. After making him presents of tea, biscuits, and a few odd pairs of gloves, I told him my troubles, and he let me have two soldiers and one sergeant, who accompanied me for the remainder of the trip. Having protection from the Chinese authorities, I had no trouble at all in securing men, as they knew their horses and they themselves would be safe from the Kirghiz. I never saw but eight Kirghiz and these rode up to my camp one day. I asked Joseph, my servant, who they were, and he said Kirghiz. I made them di-mount and sit around the tent, while I asked them a few questions, among others what they were doing in this part of the country. The leader said he was looking for some lost horses. I told him the chances were he was looking for some of my horses which were not lost, and I instructed my interpreter to inform them that I had authority both from the Chinese and from the Russian governments to kill all Kirghiz who come near my camp, or within range of my gun, and my interpreter—who hated the Kirghiz—was only too glad to repeat this to them. They jumped on their horses, rode away and that was the last I ever saw of a Kirghiz on my trip.

I then proceeded with my caravan across the Altai Mountains, leaving my wagons in camp, on the Mongolian frontier, until I could work my way around the mountains and get back. This was in June, and I shot through the Altai Mountains during the rest of June, July and August. The storms were very severe, and as I was out of the timber line with no wood, I found it very much of a hardship sitting in my tent, wrapped in furs, all day long with nothing to do but smoke my pipe. However, as every day wasn't a stormy one, I managed to get out and hunt in the high peaks of the Altais, where game is very plentiful. The particular animal I was after was the Ovis Ammon, the rarest and greatest specimen of wild sheep ever known in the world; shot by Prince Temidoff, St. George Littledale, Major Cumberland, the Earl of Ronaldshaw and myself, a few others and I am the only American who has hunted it. While these men did not shoot in the particular part of the mountains that I did, they shot in that same range. It snowed all the time in the mountains, but I had excellent sport. The Altai Mountain sheep is the highest liver I ever saw, and to get at these animals required a lot of dangerous climbing, crossing glaciers and hanging to cliffs by an eyelid, as it were. It is a picturesque country, that region. You could easily drop ten Switzerlands into it and not miss them, but it is of no earthly use. I shot 25 Ovis Ammon, 10 ibex, and four antelopes.

I had no very exciting experiences. I mean I never found myself in anything like danger, but I got plenty of very fine sport. It was hard work getting at these Ovis-Ammon, for they are most difficult to approach. You may stalk as carefully as you can, against the wind, of course, always against the wind, and then, when you get within a few hundred yards, just when you are trying to pick out your proposed trophies with your glasses, the wind suddenly changes. That is enough. Your game scent you. They get your wind, off they scatter, and all your labor has gone for nothing. On one occasion when this sort of thing happened, I had been stalking my game all day, and I had just got up on a big bunch, when I felt the wind blowing on the back of my neck. They scented me at once, and were out of sight quicker than it takes me to tell it. It was now drawing towards evening, and, as it was snowing, I thought of quitting for the night, when I espied the herd again about 1,200 or 1,500 yards away. My rifle was sighted for 1,200 yards, and looking through my glass, I picked out what I guessed was a fine specimen. I was not shooting for the sake of slaughter. I object to that. I was in search of the finest specimens of horns that I could get. So I always singled out my trophies in the midst of the herd by means of my glasses before shooting. I took aim at this one, but my shot went high. I readjusted my sight, and had the satisfaction of seeing that he had been hit in the hindquarters, but not killed. He got away, and I decided to let him go, as I thought he would not go far. He was badly lamed, and I expected to find his carcass by daylight. Early next morning I was out again. After a while I espied what I thought was the animal I had hit the night before and killed him outright this time. But a disappointment was in store for me. I was chagrined when I found, after nearly two days' stalking of this fine animal, that about seven inches of one of his magnificent horns had been snapped off by his falling down among the rocks It was provoking.

But let me give you an instance of a bit of good luck that I had. I espied a big herd of about sixty or seventy. What I wanted was to get a whole family of good specimens. I singled out a fine buck, the female, and a youngster. I got them all, just as I wanted, and splendid specimens they were. These, with a lot more, are now being mounted in London.

I found other game very plentiful, but I was looking for this particular animal, and very large trophies in the way of large horns, and I found this hunting very hard as many a day I would pass by bunches of from 60 to 100 sheep and not fire a shot. I saw plenty of ibex, and brought home some very good trophies of this specimen; I also saw, and killed some very good specimens of the Mongolian gazelle. The big, gray wolf was very numerous, but as it was very early in the fall for him to fur up, I found his hide was not worth carrying out of the country. Bears were also very plentiful, and so were the Roe deer, whose horns were in the velvet, so I did not kill any. Birds were few; some fish in the small streams, but they were very bony.

The wild mountain sheep, of Mongolia, are not any different from the wild mountain sheep of any other country in the way of hunting. They are considered the hardest game to stalk that we know of, and as the Altai Mountains are barren, the sheep can not only see a long distance but, as they also have very good noses, they soon get your wind and sometimes it will take all day traveling up one canyon, and down another, climbing over cliffs and glaciers, and sliding on the rock, to get anywhere within gun shot of them. The Ibex, which belong to the goat family, are much easier game to stalk. I found the ibex, like the Rocky Mountain goat, to be a rather stupid animal and he is always looking down, instead of up, therefore, if the hunter will get above the animal, he can lie behind rocks and wait until the animal feeds on the moss on the mountain side, when, provided they haven't got your wind, they are much easier to shoot.

The gazelle lives on the open plains, which you find between the ranges of mountains and they are very hard to stalk—in fact, I, and my men, had to get the animal's wind; then let the men get behind and give the gazelle their wind, so that the animals would run toward me, and in that way I was able to kill them. Wolves, when hungry, will hang around carcasses of game you have killed, and it is not hard to get upon them, as they are generally too busy getting something to eat to notice you, so with a good rifle like I had—one which was sighted to 1,200 yards, I managed to get within 300 to 500 yards, which made the work very easy.

For days I was snowed in my tent; I had no books to read, and found it rather lonesome; I had no big fires built in front of my tent door taking as I had no wood. I amused myself by all of my guns apart, oiling and cleaning them; taking my cameras apart and fixing them, and writing my notes; taking the elevations, reading the thermometer, smoking my pipe, and eating hot soup and drinking plenty of hot tea. My menu was not an extensive one. For breakfast I had prunes, then porridge with tinned milk, next a good, big chop from a wild sheep, and evaporated potatoes. Luncheon I generally carried in my saddle bags and consisted of cold meats; and, for dinner, I had about a gallon of hot soup, some more chops, boiled rice with tinned milk and coffee.

After getting all the game that I wanted, as the weather was getting very cold and stormy, and I was afraid that I would be snowed in for the winter, I turned my face towards the north and came across the Altai Mountains, striking my old trail. I packed up my wagons in the tarataness and, again, we left with some Russian peasants, coming on down the same road and striking the head waters of the River Ria; there taking a boat on down the Obi River to the town of Ob. After waiting there two days I caught the train on the Trans-Siberian Railroad.

OBSERVATIONS, ORIGINAL AND OTHERWISE.

THE variety of bamboo from which the modern bamboo rod is made is the "Calcutta bamboo." Its botanical name is Bambusa arundinacea. From other varieties it is distinguished by its charred marks on the yellow cuticle, without which none seems to be exported. Of course everyone who has become familiar with this cane has remarked the burns always present, yet never twice alike. To the split cane rod-maker they are a nuisance, forcing him to reject altogether many a cane otherwise excellent. So every maker is surprised that so much labour should be expended merely as far as is apparent to injure the cane, and naturally asks why this is done. Reasons of all kinds have been given, and there is a choice of about six, of which each seems equally probable. First a religious ceremony; second, roasted over a gridiron to kill an insect which bores into the cane; third, merely for purposes of ornament; fourth, the bamboo grows in jungles matted together with all manner of climbing and tenacious vines, that before they are separated and extricated they are fired to destroy these creepers; fifth, the canes are roasted over a gridiron to burn off the leaves and creepers, as the most expeditious way to get rid of these; sixth, this is done with a hot iron, each cane being treated separately merely to straighten them. My own idea is that the fourth and sixth processes are the most likely, and as I have been conversant with the use of the bamboo cane for at least forty years, either of these explanations would seem likely. A really good bamboo rod is the best one can have, but it is a very scarce article and necessitates a good maker.

The casting line or leader of the fly fisherman has for many years been subjected to experiment by the highest experts for the purpose of finding a perfect stain which should render the line practically invisible to the eyes of the fish. A light brown stain provided by the skin of the brown onion, or even that made from the decoction of coffee berries only, gives a brownish tint, and are useful mostly when the stream on which they are used is dark-coloured from rainfall, or from a brownish mud admixture or red-brown water. Others have used a diluted solution of ink of the bluish-grey color, and this is used by many anglers, being termed "mist colour" and presumed to resemble the tint of the cloudy day's atmosphere. This is more than likely to be the best of all the dyes for general use, for we know that the bluish-grey colour is the best for coloured or even clear water under ordinary circumstances. The shining of the unstained gut is without doubt at times very objectionable. I have stood on the banks of a stream and watched a fisherman below me fishing a pool with fine unstained gut in bright weather, and every curl of the casting line shone like a silver streak, bright the whole length; but, of course I was looking down upon it against the darkness of the bottom of the water which is not the position from which the fish would see it. At the same time I may mention that on the occasions I have observed this was when the water was unruffled by the slightest breeze or I should not have been idly watching another man fishing. I do not think when there is what we fisherman term a curl in the water that the glittering would be noticed by the fish, as each little curl shines as it disturbs the surface of the water. There is another thing I have noticed quite frequently—that in certain colours of the clouds all flies when held up are alike—I mean you cannot perceive the difference of colour between a light and dark fly, or between flies of several colours, and a simple fly of one colour. On those occasions you will always know when it is the case by looking at the water.

If the curl caused by the wind makes the water look to be a leaden colour, and the ripple be nearly white, you will have little chance of a fish; and then, if you doubt my statement, take some flies from your book of totally different colours, and hold them to the light and they will look like a plain printed fly on a light ground.

The prophet and psalmist David said in his heart, "All men are liars." He only said it; he probably did not mean it. I have heard it said by the pharisee fishermen who were not in the "know" and also by those who were not fishermen at all, that the angler was a "natural born liar" in matters pertaining to the size and number of fish, and the truth was not in him. I rejoice to note that in the latest book written by one of our angler statesmen and late presidents of the United States, Mr. Grover Cleveland, entitled "Fishing and Shooting Sketches," he ably takes up this question and keenly psychologizes the mystery of the whole subject. Here follows the passage to which I refer, and its profundity may be recommended to all my angler-readers who desire to preserve the innate truthfulness of the real followers of Izak Walton, who, like the "Father of His Country," never told a lie.

Mr. Cleveland thus explains his ideas:—"It is sometimes said that there is such close relationship between mendacity and fishing that in matters connected with their craft all fishermen are untruthful. It must of course be admitted that stories of large fishing adventures are sometimes told by fishermen, and why should this not be so. Beyond question there is no sphere of human activity so full of strange and wonderful incidents as theirs. Fish are constantly doing the most mysterious and startling things and no one has as yet been wise enough to explain their ways or account for their conduct. The best fishermen do not attempt it, they move and strive in the atmosphere of mystery and uncertainty, constantly aiming to reach results without a clue and through the cultivation of faculties non-existent or inoperative in the common mind. In these circumstances the fisherman necessarily see and do wonderful things. If those not members of the brotherhood are unable to assimilate the recital of these wonders, it is because their believing apparatus has not been properly regulated and stimulated. Such disability falls very short of justifying doubt as to the truth of the narration. The events narrated have been seen and experienced with fishermen's eyes and perceptions. This is perfectly understood by listening fishermen, and they to their enjoyment and edification are permitted by a properly adjusted mental equipment to believe what they hear."

I leave this passage to the readers of these pages for their consideration and comment. In my own opinion Mr. Cleveland has hit the nail on the head, as no other writter has done in the whole range of angling literature, and done as one might expect from so subtle a mind in the fewest of pen-strokes conceivable.

The vision of fish is the most important faculty that comes within the ken of the observant angler. Blind fish exist in subterranean waters, as witness those found in the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, and in the case of fishes feeding in very deep water, such as the barbel of Great Britain, and the cat fishes of the deep rivers of the West and South, the barbules or feelers are no doubt helps to the visionary sense. Trout and other fish undoubtedly make use of their eyes, and it is very surprising to what a state of education nearly all fresh water fishes may and do arrive under the pursuance of the angler and general fisherman. The formation of the eye of the fish does not materially vary, one species from another, amongst the angler's fishes. The cornea is somewhat flat in sectional outline, and the ground plan, so to speak, is virtually alike in all except the mysterious and exceptional grayling, whose eye pupil and orbit are pear-shaped, with the larger end toward the body and the pointed end toward the nose of the fish, giving it a somewhat sinister appearance. What purpose this particular configuration serves I do not positively know, but one thing is certain: the visual ability of the grayling is equal, if not superior, to that of the trout, as proved by its rising often from a great depth to the fly. I have noticed also that the normal waiting position of this fish is inclined towards the surface of the water, instead of being horizontal, as is usually the case with the trout. This being so, the greater mass of the rays of direct sunlight would fall on the forward part of the eye, and I offer as a conjecture based on the law of development, that this continued through many generations has evolved the peculiar oval shape in the English grayling. In the American grayling this peculiarity does not exist, the eye and orbit being circular, as is the eye of the trout. It is a general law observable through the whole range of animal life possessing vision that the eye is peculiarly adapted to the medium through which (and to the manner in which) it receives the light. The more closely we look into this truth the more apparent and wonderful is the adaptability. Indeed these premises are truisms, and would not need repetition did not we so habitually forget that design is the key to all the natural phenomena around us. Admitting this truth, it follows that the structure of the eye of the fish and its position are admirably adapted for seeing in a denser medium than air with great precision and certainty. Observation ratifies this conclusion in its entirety. The vitreous and crystalline humors of the organs are not different from those of mammals and other animals. The muscles moving the body of the eye are large and permit of great freedom, and the power of contraction and expansion of the irides is also distinct and pronounced. In air this latter feature is indeed very noticeable in the case of some fishes and the angler has only to accurately measure the breadth of the pupil of such fish in shaded water and compare this with the measurement of the same fish after the fish has lain in full sunlight a few moments to be at once forcibly convinced of the fact. The position of the orbit also needs a word of comment. In fish which readily rise and descend to feed, it is placed so as to command a large area around, in fact as large as in the nature of the creature is possible. In those that chiefly rise to their prey, such as the pike, pickerel and muskelonge, it is placed near the top of the head. In the British barbel (Gyprinus barbus), a ground feeder, the reverse obtains, and so also with the little ground-feeding gudgeon (Gobio fluviatitis). In the trout and salmon the orbit is more central, and the broad visual grip of both these are therefore the reasons why in due time the Salmonidae became so wary and capable on much-fished waters of protecting itself from its arch enemy—man. A pike cannot possibly see its ventral fin; a trout undoubtedly could if it felt so disposed. On the other hand a pike could undoubtedly see much farther behind and backward than a trout. Indeed, the practice of up-stream dry and wet-fly fishing, to which I record my own attachment as a matter of course, is based on the theory that the trout cannot see behind but to an exceeding short distance. Taking the trout as a fish not likely to seriously vary in regard to its faculties and their capabilities because of habitat, let us endeavour to ascertain the range of this power of vision both in the light of what has been said and what follows. First, one small but important fact has to be noted as bearing collaterally but interestingly on the subject. The fish is hard to frighten by any object it sees in the water only as separate and distinct from its cause or connection with its cause or connection in air if such exist. To make this clearer: If an object be presented so that another person besides the precentor can see its reception by the fish (himself unseen), that person will notice it seldom happens that the trout retires or darts away unless actually or positively touched—say with the point of a rod. Even then, so that the impact be gentle, he is not alarmed, and this fact is taken advantage of by the "groping" poacher of Europe who gently places his hand under the trout—lying with its eyes buried in the weeds, thinking its head secure, as does the ostrich that buries its head in the sand—and lifts it suddenly to the bank. Be the object presented a stone or fly, so that its connection with its arch-enemy of fishdom be not discovered, the fish fears not. Its brilliant, infallible visual faculty has apprehended the innocuousness of the object and no fear is aroused.

Try the experiment with the operator in full sight: what a difference in the result. The trout vanishes like a lightning flash, and be very certain that he will not again present himself to be fooled with, however good your intentions are.

A SAMBUR.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

Sir,—I got a sambur the other day and, as this is the first animal of the kind I ever got, I should like to know, if the horns, the measurements of which I give at foot, are worth anything. The deer stood just under 14 hands and was in splended condition.

Right horn straight	...	... 36¼ inches.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

Sir,—I see in your issue of the 10th instant, you mention Mr. Fergusson having gathered a 39 inch boar, weighing 280lbs. odd.

I quite forgot to tell you before the "Indian Field Shikar Book" appeared that I assisted in downing one of the heaviest boars ever speared in India, though I unfortunately did not get the first dig. I was then a member of the old Nagpore Hunt and after a ten days' meet three of us elected to stop on for another day and were fortunate enough to get this monster. He was not much of a runner, but as plucky and savage a boar, as it has ever been my experience to meet. Mine was the only unbroken spear eventually, and it then took another quarter of an hour to polish him off. We took him into the railway station, and weighed him three or four hours after his demise. He turned the scale at 350lbs., had 9 inch tushes and was 38 inch at the shoulder, 66 inch in length, and 60 inch in girth. For all round measurements, I think you will agree with me, that these will take a lot of beating.

THE SELFISH DISTRICT OFFICIAL.

Sir,—As the author of the article of the above title in your issue of 6th October 1906, I must, in justice to myself, ask leave to trespass on your columns with a short reply to the second article which appeared in the paper dated 6th December.

It would be well I think firstly to make it plain that the first article was inserted word for word as written by me, and that the second article is, as you have informed me, solely the work of the aggrieved sportsman, who has elected to break a lance with me in this matter; as the natural conclusion anyone would come to on a perusal of the latter is, that the body of it was written by the editorial staff and the insets by the gentleman above referred to.

This gentleman has obviously either not taken the trouble to read my article carefully, before sitting down to accuse me of "reckless partisanship" and "creating grossly erroneous impressions," or if he has done so, his reply can, I regret to say, only be termed very disingenuous.

He may have proved to his own satisfaction that "erroneous impressions have been removed," but that is I may say certainly not the verdict of those who know the whole ins and outs of the matter and who have read his article in the light of this knowledge. I can assure him that the feeling against him and his companion, amongst all classes in the districts he visited, is intense, and that public opinion universally condemns his actions.

To take his points as briefly as possible:—

1. His own eight bison were shot, in 2, not 4 districts, and 6 of them, not only in one district but in one division of that district.

2. He entirely omits any mention of his companion who shot 6, two of which were cows, also in this one division, so that the total between them was 12 for the one division. A reference to my article will show that I distinctly stated that there were two men shooting.

3. He also omits to say that the reason for the enormous numbers of bison he saw, was that he visited the very cream of the shooting country where all the bison assemble in the hot weather and early rains.

How does he, as a sportsman, justify the shooting of 14 bison by two guns in such a comparatively small area and under such circumstances?

5. I acknowledge and apologize for the incorrect statement about the size of the largest head which should be 36". The mistake occurred through my misreading 34" for 36" in a correspondent's letter, but I would ask why when he found, as he himself says that the "bison seldom run to record spread," he should have gone on slaughtering them at the rate he and his companion did.

6. Did he and his companion shoot cow buffalo or not? If they did, how many and were they shot in self-defence as he says or was the first, as is reported, shot while lying down in a swamp and the others as they bolted? They are reported to have shot 3 or 4, in the way described out of one herd.

7. Did they shoot a bull buff or not? He nowhere states definitely that they did though he insinuates it. My information is that they did not.

8 Is it true or not that they paid their coolies 2 annas apiece for taking their kit on a very stiff march up B—— Hill (I think he will recognize it without my being more definite) and eight pies apiece for the return journey, as is reported. If so, I can inform him that this is less than half what District officials consider fair for the journey.

9. With reference to the bolting of the 40 coolies he mentions; the report current is that "he marched in the evening from K—— to J——, 14 miles. The coolies were then given parched gram and sugar which did not appeal to them as they are rice-eaters. According to the coolies they asked for money to buy rice and were beaten by——'s men. In any case it is unusual to take coolies on 2 consecutive marches in those parts."

10. He held no communication whatsoever with the District officials concerned of one of the two districts he visited and was not accompanied by any subordinate, either Revenue or otherwise, and therefore did not pay for supplies and coolies or obtain receipts through them, and many complaints were made to the magistracy of non-payment and under-payment.

11. How does he justify his statement that he "broke no rules" when he shot in 3 separate Forest Reserves without a license? In the last one at all events he was perfectly aware that a license was necessary as he was told so on arrival by the Assistant Superintendent of Police, whom he mentions meeting, and his reply was that a mutual friend had written to the Collector and it would be "all right."

He has done enough shooting in India to know that no one can shoot in a Forest Reserve without a license, and that it is an offence under the law, and he is moreover perfectly aware that a Forest offence report was sent in against him in the first district he visited, and that he has been up to quite lately in correspondence with the Collector in the matter, which makes his denial of having broken any rules all the more astounding.

I leave it to all fair-minded sportsmen to decide whether my first article went beyond the bounds of fair comment on such actions

I have no personal axe to grind in the matter and had this gentleman not taken the matter up and accused me in polite language of being a liar, I should have said no more about it, but left it to his own conscience to decide whether he and his companion behaved as sportsmen should on this trip.

THE WORLDS' BOXING CHAMPIONSHIP.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

Sir,—The interesting details given in your last number regarding the forthcoming fight for the Championship of the World between J. J. Jeffries and Bill Squires prompt the enquiry as to whether you can give complete results of such contests. My reason for asking is that an argument has arisen as to the doings of John L. Sullivan therein. I shall be much obliged if you can furnish us with accurate details.

The three-ring-shaped ridges raised in casting on the peripheral surface make a friction tight fit in the barrel and ensure the bullet leaving the muzzle in a line with the axis of the barrel.

Fig. 2. Represents a sectional view showing the semi-circular steel vanes standing at right angles to each other which by their impetus on impact of the bullet create enormous expansion. THE TURF.

WINDSOR.

WHEN frost comes, with bright sunshine on top, it is doubly welcome, as hygienic in every way, killing the microbes, and bracing up the constitution. Such a glorious day as we had at Windsor on the 4th instant was worthy of a bigger muster, though the executive have no cause for complaint, while with a cheery, Christmas-like feeling pervading the ring, we had a jolly day's racing, the element of mirth atoning for the paucity of the field. The going, as at Gatwick, was simply perfect, coming as a general surprise, but then the banks of a river generally afford the dryest ground, and such was the case that afternoon. Details:—

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

For some years past Thacker's Reduced Survey Map of India has been looked upon as the most convenient and helpful Map of the Indian Empire extant. It possesses many points of superiority and convenience; the information is exhaustive, every name mentioned in the Government Survey being included. The great convenience of the Index of 10,000 names has always been keenly appreciated; it has, therefore, been a source of great regret to the proprietors that they have been forced to allow the Map to remain out of print for a considerable time on account of political changes in the internal provinces of India. The moment the new boundaries of Bengal were settled, fresh plates were put in hand, and the publishers are now pleased to announce the third edition of this important Map as ready for sale.

Size of plate, 38" × 34". Scale, 70 miles = 1 inch.

After another white frost it was a surprise to find the pavements damp in town, and though the change bringing up the clouds obscured sunshine at Windsor, the temperature was appreciably milder till, towards the finish, a turn in the wind to north-west caused it to blow more keenly. Strengthened by the Saturday half-holiday folk, theiattendance showed an improvement, particularly in the smaller enclosure, though we have seen more people here at a New Year's meeting. The executive cannot grumble, however, and, considering class engaged, can congratulate themselves on having provided two pleasant and sometimes exciting afternoons' sport, fields ruling larger, while, as was the case on Friday, two of the finishes raised layers and backers to enthusiasm. The going was a bit heavy, but not too soft for cross-country work. Details:—

BIRMINGHAM.

All round London on Monday morning a strong white frost silvered the earth, and far into Warwickshire the fields were powdered, but nearing Birmingham the grass showed green, and the railway sleepers were wet. We heard of rain having fallen in the country round, but it had not dispersed the thickish fog which shut out the view from "Brum" to Castle Bromwich, and brooded over the course in tantalising fashion, so that little beyond the start and finishes for barely a quarter of a mile radius were visible. Monday is as popular here as with the sons of St. Crispin and the Sheffield "blades," consequently the number of holiday makers was large, and supplemented by the enclosures the attendance was a particularly good one. Better going could not have been desired, but the mist proved a great drawback to full enjoyment of a capital afternoon's sport, in which by the bye, refusals and falls were more prevalent than of late. Details:—

With the non-filling of the Stayers' Selling Race, never very popular with owners, the card on the second day was reduced to five events. The race was kept open till the specified time, but had to be declared void, and this furnishes the only possible peg to bring an objection against that very necessary arrangement of publishing the order of running beforehand. A compensating balance in saving of the half-hour might have been effected by beginning that time later or finishing the same time earlier, and in such cases, which are likely to be of rare occurrence, an alteration overnight appearing in all the sporting papers should be permitted. The arrival list had been so materially increased that the defalcation's principal effect was to cause regret for the enforced waste of time, as of late three or four runners have been the strength for three mile contests. A rise in temperature banished the mist and clouded the sky, but no rain fell, and the going was in grand fettle. Another capital attendance was to be chronicled, and 'tis to be hoped that Birmingham, so keen on sport of other kinds, but which has in the last quarter of a century let three meetings die out, will rally round the last, which, struggling out of difficulties, is beginning to prove its value. FOOTBALL ASSOCIATION RULES.

The games in the three leading Leagues on Saturday emphasised the advantage of playing at home particularly when the turf is on the heavy side. In the 30 matches in the Southern League and the first and second divisions of the League only three visiting clubs won, and three participated in drawn games. The Second League clubs had the heaviest bag of goals, 42 being their total, 35 were scored by S. L. clubs, and only 30 by the competitors in the first division of the League. Seven S. L. teams failed to score, six League I. elevens could not find the net, and four League II. clubs could not penetrate the opposing defence. As compared with last season, Luton and Swindon each gained two points, and Tottenham Hotspur and Plymouth Argyle one, while Fulham and West Ham each dropped two, and Bristol Rovers and New Brompton were a point worse off. Two points went to Bury, and a similar number to Sheffield Wednesday that they did not get on the same grounds last season, while Sunderland and Newcastle each gained one point. Those who lost points were Derby County and Manchester (two), and Aston Villa and Birmingham (one.) The most pronounced reversals occurred in the second division, Clapton Orient, Barnsley, Burnley, and Leeds each showing a two points improvement, Hall City, Bradford City, Leicester Fosse, and West Bromwich Albion being the teams to provide them. Grimsby and Gainsborough obtained the single points dropped respectively by Lincoln and Stockport.

Saturday was not a happy day for Southern League clubs who were away from their own grounds. There was only one success to the credit of visiting sides, and in one case a home side gave a display of a sensational character. This was in the Millwall vs. Watford match at North Greenwich, where Stevenson, after an unexpectedly rapid recovery from his knee injury, was in his old position at left back. The Dockers were on business intent, and so well did they start that visions of a repetition of the Luton win of 10th November were conjured up. At half-time, Millwall were in possession of a three goals lead, and in the second half they smothered the Watford defence. Goal after goal came, and still the crowd clamoured for more. The players obligingly responded and, when all was over, eleven legitimate goals had been scored, of which ten went to the credit of the home team. It was more than a rout; it was a debacle. There is no explanation for it except that one set of players was on the crest of their form, while their opponents collectively floundered almost helplessly about in the trough of inefficiency. Everything went away for the visitors, who struggled hopelessly against the dash, the vim, the determination, the skill, and deadly sharp-shooting of the Dockers, who surpassed themselves. In their previous ten games Millwall scored eight goals, and now they come along with ten in one afternoon. It is far and away the biggest win in the season in the Southern League, it is the first double figure score, and five times as many goals were scored against the losers as in any previous away match in the present tournament. Watford had figured in nine out games previous to Saturday, and had given only nine goals away. Some things in football defy analysis, and Millwall's performance certainly does.

There are interesting features to be noticed in some of the other London contests. When [redacted] appearance at White Hart-lane a sturdy, stubborn contest may confidently be anticipated. On Saturday the Rovers were anxious to avenge the humiliation put upon them by the 'Spurs out West in September, and so well did they defend that they were only a goal down at the interval. Tottenham, however, were intent on a substantial win, and getting well into their swing in the closing stages, the Rovers were handsomely beaten by four clear goals, the only other occasion when a quartette was obtained against them being at Leyton, on 15th December, but 4—2 was then the final result. There was a ding-dong struggle at Leyton, where Reading also had to remember that in their home game they had gone under, and on Saturday they were beaten for a second time this season by Leyton by the only goal scored. The home side lost their brilliant centre-half before the game was ten minutes' old, but they played a hard game, and Hesham eventually defeated Whittaker, and obtained a couple of much-needed points for his side. The win was much appreciated, as Leyton had obtained only one point from three games during the holidays. Brentford are a most difficult team to overcome on their own ground this season, and the ten matches to date they have played at Griffin Park have yielded them 16 points. Northampton who are now showing vastly improved form, scored four goals without response when at home to Brentford on 8th September, but they had to play second fiddle on Saturday, the score of 2—0 rather flattering them. Crystal Palace had had such a poor time during December, four of the five matches played having been lost, that the players realised the importance of a convincing start for the New Year. Hence the grit and determination shown against the Rangers, who were engaged in an uphill struggle after the first twenty minutes. The home side thoroughly deserved their win.

By Royal Warrant to His Majesty the King.

The two Metropolitan teams who were in the country seeking points were both unsuccessful in their quest. West Ham, whose doings have aroused immense enthusiasm among their loyal and enthusiastic supporters, went to Swindon with high hopes, but they were not fulfiled. The railway men scored twice without response, and the Hammers were the ninth team to fail to find the net at the Wiltshire town. To date, Swindon have not been beaten at home, and as they exactly reversed the score at Boleyn Castle in September, honours are even. Fulham have not had much satisfaction from their games with Luton, so far as points are concerned, for four months ago the Strawplaiters returned from Craven Cottage with a point in their possession, and the return fixture has provided them with a couple more, Fulham had only lost one match on foreign soil prior to that under notices and that was so far back as 21th September. The champion, are not going well just now, but perhaps they have been lying low, like Brer Rabbit, for the forthcoming cup ties. Plymouth Argyle were successful at New Brompton, and thus bagged all the points this season, and Portsmouth, who had drawn when at Brighton, made no mistake in the return, their 3—0 win enabling them to go once more to the head of the table. Norwich City could not afford to halve the spoils with Southampton, at Newmarket-road, but the Sotonians compelled them to do so, and thus returned the compliment paid them by the Canaries early on. This is the second drawn game Southampton have played away, and the third Norwich have taken part in at home.

After having escaped defeat in their last five matches, the Arsenal went down at Middlesbrough in a heavy-scoring game. For the second time within a month the Arsenal defence was pierced on five occasions, but they responded in better style than at Birmingham on 8th December, three goals standing to their account when Saturday's game came to a close. This is a serious check for the Arsenal, and it is the more annoying because they were so exceedingly well placed on Saturday morning, and they now drop into fourth position because their goal average is decimally worse than that of Aston Villa. In considering the causes which led up to the Arsenal defeat, it must not be overlooked that the Gunners were without Ashcroft, and Bateup, sound that he may be under the bar, is not the equal of the incomparable Ashcroft. Middlesbrough were below full strength, but they had to encourage them the recollection that their visitors had never won a match at Ayresome Park, and one has to go back six seasons for the last time the Arsenal scored on the Middlesbrough ground. It was unfortunate to be on the losing side after scoring three goals, but the home forwards adapted themselves more readily than the Southerners to the treacherous underfoot conditions, and it was this, combined with the deadly accuracy of the shooting, that gave them the victory.

Bristol City are pursuing the even tenor of their way, and Stoke, at any rate, will have wholesome respect for the scoring abilities of the latest acquisition to the upper division of the League. The verdict at Stoke was 3—0 in favour of the City, and on Saturday the Westerners were successful by 4—0. Seven goals without response is a sorry picture for Stoke to gaze upon. Both Sheffield clubs have had occasion recently to condole with each other, but Saturday found them both on the winning side, the more meritorious performance of the two being that of Sheffield Wednesday, who overcame Manchester City, at Hyde-road, by a goal to love. [illegible] entertained Bolton Wanderers, and narrow though the margin was in [illegible] Junior Blades, it gave them the two points, and provided some consolation for the rout at Bolton on 8th September, when the Wanderers galloped home by 6—1. While Sheffield rejoiced, Manchester had, metaphorically speaking, to put on sackcloth and ashes, for the reinforced Clayton team, after keeping out Notts County in the first half, were thrice defeated at Trent Bridge in the concluding forty-five, and thus enabled the Midlanders to register their second win of the season, and their first before their own supporters. It was only a moderate performance for the Villa to draw with Sunderland, at Aston, nor did Preston North End, in halving the points with Everton, do quite so well as their supporters anticipated, for eight previous home games had provided the Proud Men with 16 points. Bury just got the better of Derby County, Newcastle United converted a last season's draw at St. James' against Birmingham into a 2—0 win, and they have thus taken the four points from the Brums this season. Liverpool were true to tradition in allowing Blackburn to defeat them at Anfield-road, and it is significant that this was the first away win of the Rovers this season.

LEAGUE II.

This is not the first time this season that the West Londoners have been in the van, as they went to the head of affairs on 29th September, but their tenure of the topmost rung of the ladder was of a fleeting character. The prospects are just about as bright as they could be. A team able to go on a holiday tour, play four successive away games, and obtain seven points from them, must, with ordinary luck, hold their own against all comers. The away record of Chelsea since the advent of November is remarkable. On the third of that month they lost at Burslem, but since then they have played seven games, of which five have been won and two drawn. This is the sort of form that spells promotion.

The results of the games in the second division of the League on Saturday were simply a story of home successes. The visiting clubs were quite out of the running, not one even capturing a point. Clapton Orient have once more struck a winning vein, and their reversal of the 2—1 defeat from Hull, at Homerton, immensely pleased their supporters. Saturday was a bad day for the leading teams, Chelsea being an honourable exception. Leicester Fosse were overthrown in dramatic style at Burley, the 5—0 defeat being the heaviest they have had this season; West Bromwich Albion were beaten by the odd goal in five at Leeds, and Nottingham Forest had to admit the superiority of Burslem at Burslem where both West Bromwich and Chelsea had previously been defeated. As Burslem played the Forest to a draw at Nottingham, the ex-First Leaguers will not have pleasant memories of their games with the Potteries team. Wolverhampton improved their position at Glossop's expense, Lincoln were outplayed at Grimsby, and Barnsley, Gainsborough, and Burton each won their match by 3—1, their respective victims being Bradford, Stockport, and Chesterfield.

THE AMATEUR CUP.

There were few surprises in the first round of the competition proper of the Amateur Cup on Saturday, and in all the Southern ties the clubs were well matched. Ilford, who have had a splendid run of success, found themselves unable to defeat the New Crusaders, who gave a display more in keeping with their last season's form, and they should win in the re-play next Saturday. Clapton won at Eastbourne only because they were more incisive in front of goal, and at Ealing, the Civil Service, who are playing a strong game, justified anticipations by advancing into the next round at the expense of the home club, who put up a stubborn fight. Cheshunt are not so good a team as last season, and they went down heavily at Barnet to the Alston Athletic. The 2nd Lincoln Regiment were much too good for Wandsworth and the 2nd Grenadiers, whose doings have attracted considerable attention in military circles, knocked out Wycombe Wanderers in a game in which the defence on both sides was beaten by the attack. The Dulwich Hamlet team, on their own ground improved after an indifferent start, and won comfortably against King's Lynn by 3—1. In the North, Stockton beat Blackburn Crosshill by 8—1, the Sheffield Club surprised students of form by knocking out Darlington, and Bishop Auckland former cup winners, easily qualified for the second round. The ground at West Hartlepool was not fit for play, and the tie was postponed. The other games do not call for special comment.

SCOTTISH FOOTBALL NOTES.

When the players left the fields in Scotland on Saturday they were covered in mud from head to foot, and it was by no means an ideal day for football. The frost which prevailed on Thursday and Friday gave way to thaw and heavy rain, and all the fields were soft and muddy; in fact, so bad was it at Aberdeen that the local club's League match with Clyde was declared off and a friendly played.

The surprise of the day came from Greenock, where Morton beat Rangers by two goals to one, and deserved their victory. The Rangers are, indeed, a curious lot, and after their great display on New Year's Day against the champions—the Celtic—their match with Morton was looked on as something approaching a walk-over. However, it was not to be, for Morton adopted the game suited to the day and the ground, and were always on top.

Falkirk's appearances in Glasgow are now looked forward to with interest, and when one sees the team at work it is not difficult to find out why they are so far up in the League table. They draw the crowd, and against Celtic they had a £490 gate, easily the best of the day in Scotland. The game was a stubborn one, and although Celtic got full points they had to go all the way, and it was lucky that Quinn was in such good form, he having two of the goals and big say in the third. Logan and Davidson were the best of the Falkirk forwards and each had a goal.

Hearts made a poor show against Dundee, and deserved to be beaten, the Edinburgh forwards showing the least possible idea of combination. The Airdrieonian-Motherwell match was an exciting tussle, and a goalless draw is a fair reflex of the game. Motherwell had the best of the first half and did most of the attacking, while in the second portion the story was reversed.

To go to Hamilton with a particularly weak team Queen's Park courted disaster, and of course the Academicals got the points easily. T. T. Fitchie was the only outstanding player in the amateurs' ranks, and but for him the home team would have had an increased score.

St. Mirren did a good stroke of business in defeating Third Lanark, and credit for this is due to the fine work of the Paisley defence, Jackson and Crawford never giving the home side much chance to do any serious harm.

RUGBY RULES.

ENGLAND vs. FRANCE.—Weather and ground conditions were excellent when England, having lost the toss, kicked off. The Englishmen at once attacked strongly, and Isaac only just pulled up Brikett (who, receiving from Lambert, was travelling at a great pace) a few yards from the French line. Then aided by a free-kick, the Frenchmen made some headway, but on their opponents quickly returning to the attack, Stoop kicked across when near the line, and Nanson scored a try. Hill taking the kick added the maximum points, and so at the end of just three minutes England led by 5 points.

From the restart the French forwards twice came down the field in brilliant style and in saving from one of these Lee, the English full-back, was badly kicked in the ribs. He pluckily continued for a time, but eventually retired. The Englishmen again became aggressive, and Lambert, picking up after a forward rush, sent on to Birkett. When tackled the latter returned to his clubmate and Lambert got over. The referee, however, properly disallowed the score, for Birkett's pass was undoubtedly a forward one.

From the ensuing scrum the French forwards, always on the move and dodging about in a somewhat bewildering manner, came right down the field with a splendid dribble, and nearly got in from a loose scramble, but at the critical moment Verges fumbled. The Frenchmen were not allowed to remain long in the English twenty-five, and from a run by Birkett and Lambert, Isaac saved grandly. From the line out Shaw was almost in, and a moment later Shewring, receiving from Stoop, who was playing magnificently, made a dodgy run, and outwitting all opposition, scored England's second try—this after but fourteen minutes. An easy kick at goal was badly bungled by Hill and the Englishmen were eight points up.

The wonderful way in which the French forwards kicked and intercepted passes was quite one of the features of the game. Wedge who worked the English scrum grandly, started a good movement, and got the ball out to Birkett. The latter, after a lengthy run, passed to Lambert, who scored easily. Basil Hill placed the goal, and thus after nineteen minutes the Frenchmen found themselves in a minority of 13 points.

Following the kick-off the French attacked, and from a penalty near the English line Maclos came within an ace of obtaining a goal with a well-judged kick. Lee now left the field, and the policy of playing without a full-back proved disastrous to the Englishmen, and cost both the tries scored against them. After a magnificent run by Maclos and Lacassagne, which nearly ended in the home side's downfall, and at the other end an unsuccessful attempt at a penalty goal by Hill, Vareilles, the French left three-quarter, who shared with Maclos the distinction of being the best of the quartette, literally tore down the wing, and an opportune pass to Muhr sent that forward over, to gain the visitors' first try. Maclos, with a fine kick placed the goal. Thirty-three minutes had now elapsed.

Vareilles shortly afterwards made another great run half the length of the field, but unaccountably slackened when clear of all opposition, and a splendid chance was lost. From some loose play in the English twenty-five Communeau got in, and Maclos kicked the Frenchmen's second goal. The English forwards and team generally appeared to be holding their opponents too cheaply, and at this time Mills was withdrawn from the pack to play full back. Just before half-time Maclos made excellent use of a penalty kick for off side, and placing a goal for the visitors made the scores level. Half-time:—

Lee did not reappear, and Mills still played back. One of the first incidents was a good run by Lambert, and an equally superb tackle by Isaac, whose collaring and kicking were alike excellent. It was seen that the Englishmen were now trying hard, and their heavier forwards, rid of their former sluggishness, followed better, broke up more quickly, and gradually wore down their lighter opponents.

Only twice or thrice in this half were the Frenchmen able to cross the half-way line, and their defence proved incomparable to their attack. They were demoralised by the skilful tactics of Birkett and Lambert, for whom Stoop acted as pivot, and the runs of these men were seldom pulled up. Batchelor was hereabouts playing badly, probably because of lack of opportunity throughout, Shrewing being very selfish.

In twelve minutes Lambert was over. He received from Birkett, and kicking over Isaac's head, beat the back for pace and scored. Hill just placed the goal with a poor kick. After Shewring had made a miserable attempt to drop a goal, Lambert again got in near the corner flag, the ball being kicked across from the right. Hill failed with the kick, and England led by 21 points to 13.

Following the drop out, Isaac saved splendidly from the feet of the English forwards, and within three minutes Birkett, given the ball by Wedge, was in. Hill converted, and England had doubled the visitors' score. Continued pressure was exerted on the French lines, and again Lambert was over, for Hill to fail from a difficult position.

Following one failure, Birkett shortly afterwards dropped a goal from about ten yards out, although two men were waiting for his pass. Later, a series of scrums took place on the French line, and Lambert from Birkett's kick across, ran in near the left corner flag. Hill's excellent attempt at goal just fell short.

England was now 23 points to the good, but before the close this difference was augmented to 28 points as the result of a good try by Slocock, after Kelly securing from a line out, had brushed aside all opposition. Hill placed the goal, and the whistle went for "no side," gaving England a decisive victory. Result:—

ROWING.

CAMBRIDGE CREW START PRACTICE.—The Cambridge University crew got afloat for the first time on the 9th instant, and is considered one of the strongest early combinations seen out for a number of years.

The candidates arrived in the town during the morning, and assembled at the Goldie Boathouse at 2-30. There was no tubbing, and the light ship was launched at once, and taken for a forty-minutes spin between the Victoria Bridge and the Red Grind. They paddled at an average stroke of 24, and began to settle down. Mr. F. J. Escombe coached, and was accompanied by Messrs. B. C. Johnstone, R. V. Powell, and D. A. Newhall. The last of these rowed for Harvard last August, and is now in residence at Oxford. Name and weights:—

BILLIARDS.

H. W. STEVENSON vs. M. INMAN.—There was a consensus of opinion that Inman's great break last Friday evening was a deciding factor in the result of the eigth heat of Messrs. Burroughes and Watts' great tournament. That this opinion was based on solid ground was amply demonstrated on Saturday, when the Richmond professional won with remarkable ease by no fewer than 1,879 points—the finish being a tame one.

Stevenson is quite a remarkable player, and has accomplished many phenomenal feats in his brilliant career, but it was asking too much to expect him to concede Inman a start of 1,307 in 2,432 up on the last day of a match, but this was exactly what he had to do on Saturday, the scores at the close of Friday evening's play reading :—Inman (rec. 2,250), 7,875 ; Stevenson, 6,568.

With the result practically a foregone conclusion, it was a decided compliment to Stevenson and Inman that the public should turn up in such large numbers to witness the penultimate session, the Soho-square salon being crowded before a ball was struck. Probably the majority came in the hope of seeing the brilliant Yorkshireman make a supreme effort to get on something like fighting terms with his determined opponent, but in this they were grievously disappointed. As a matter of fact, Stevenson had practically only one opening for the display of his matchless skill and touch, and consequently he only returned the poor aggregate of 226, averaging 28·25 compared with Inman's figures of 562 and 70·12.

Whatever chance Inman had of sending up a big break at his first turn was destroyed when he hit the object white at his second stroke. He afterwards made three scoring shots off the coloured ball, and then ran both balls below the line. The leader repeated the safety courtesy at his next two visits, from the last of which Stevenson scored a superb "loser," but he had hardly got going at the top of the table when all three balls ran in a dead line, and he failed to pocket the red with the object white. From this Inman got going and if striking rather more deliberately than the occasion warranted, he played splendidly for a contribution of 117, the end coming at a fairly easy cannon of the top cushion.

This failure left the scratch man with the opening referred to, but he had several difficult problems to solve before reaching the century. However, a daring and brilliantly executed screw back cannon half the length of the table set him in position for spot-end play, and he reached 182 without further trouble, when and awkward red winner pulled him up. Except for a minor item of 19 (half a dozen successive superb cannons faling to get him position), Stevenson did not again trouble the marker. Not so Inman, who followed his 117 with a brilliant 252—in which is gudgment and strength were alike excellent—56 (losing the white), 98, and 17 unfinished, the last mentioned item taking him to his points. Interval scores:—

Inman (rec. 2,250) (in play)	8,437
Stevenson	6,794

The final session, which again attracted a very full house, requires but little description, and not until near the close did the spectators witness anything over which to wax enthusiastic. Realising the utter hopelessness of his task, which the persistently exasperating treatment he met with from the balls in no way helped to lighten, Stevenson did little worthy of his great reputation. In the earlier stages he marked up two pretty items of 43 and 76, but not until Inman, who for once in a way was giving a moderate display, had tacked on 35, 37, and 99,did we see the scratch player engaged on a run that aroused the spectators' enthusiasm.

Backward and forward along the top cushion Stevenson manipulated the balls with a daintiness of touch that thoroughly delighted the company, until he had reeled off forty-seven of the most attractive cannons imaginable. The balls then splitting, the Hull man endeavoured to get them back towards the area mentioned but just when he had apparently succeeded in his object, he missed a cushion cannon by little more than a hair's-breadth. This was his last constribution of note in the match, Inman claiming attention for the remainder of the sitting, while registering a brilliant all-round 287.

The Londoner held such complete command over the balls throughout, that not once had he a difficult shot to negotiate. His play at the spot end was quite a feature, and on one occasion, on the completion of a small sequence of nine close cannons, he caused a roar of laughter by remarking in an audible tone. "That constitutes another record." He looked certain to reach game, until at the total named he unfortunately lost the object white, and came down at his next stroke—a difficult red winner. His next turn, however, gave him the necessary 16 points, and he retired an easy winner amid a round of well-merited applause. Inman averaged 46·91 and Stevenson 29·72. Final scores :

Inman (rec. 2,250)	9,000

WEISS vs. HARVERSON, FOR £50.—As was only to be expected the attendance at Messrs. Thurston's Grand Hall on Saturday afternoon was a very large one. All the essentials for a strenuous fight were in evidence in this instance for the respective scores were :—Weiss, 10,724 ; Harverson, 10,570.

During the earlier part of the session Harverson, though he only increased his suspended break from 69 to 74, made such fair progress in his next few hands, recording 60, 25, and 87, to Weiss' 24 (twice), that he got within 25 of the leader. But the Australian champion speedily showed that he meant to keep a tight hold on the leadership and by means of 92, 27, 37, and 38, while Harverson was adding 85 and 34 (twice) he again secured a three-figure lead.

Then came a serious misfortune for the leader, for he miscued at a simple short cannon, and let Harverson in with such fine position that the South African put up 163, the scores at his retirement being called :—Harverson, 11,075 ; Weiss, 11,018. Though keeping the balls running nicely at times, it was not one of the South African's happiest efforts. He was often in difficulties, and was only able to continue after scoring 82, through the medium of a fluke.

Three times during the subsequent play the scores were dead level, and try as they would neither player could obtain an advantage of any account. As might be imagined, breaks under these circumstances ruled very moderate, 55 by Weiss being the best. The Australian's further scores were so modest as 27, 36, 35, 23, 32, and 16 (unfinished). Harverson's compilations were 46, 42, 34, 36, and 25. The averages were low, Harverson's aggregate of 730 showing 18, and Weiss' total of 590 working out to 15. Interval scores :—

Weiss (in play)	11,314
Harverson	11,300

If anything, play was keener than ever at night, the result being in doubt for a considerable period. Weiss was very careful when he resumed his small unfinished break in the presence of a big company, the Australian champion taking plenty of time over each stroke. These methods served him so well that he had reached 82 when he went all round the second object ball in playing a cannon. However, fortune intervened, the object white dropping into a pocket, and Weiss then left the balls safe.

The next few innings were vain attempts by both to force an opening, but at last Harverson succeeded, and keeping the balls from getting to close quarters, he, by means of accurate hazard striking, put on 83, this taking him to the front by five points.

The game lost nothing in interest in the following hour, Weiss compiling 22, 121, 31, and 82, and Harverson contesting every inch of the way in rare fashon, marking up 20, 35, 49, and 130.

A bad stroke ended Harverson's three-figure break when he was going very strong—just a simple halfball red loser from the "D." This was the turningpoint of the match, for following on, Weiss contributed a grand 237, an item quite without fault. With three possible exceptions, the Australian champion manœuvred the balls so brilliantly that he was never extended, but on these occasions two wonderful screwcannons and an extra good run-through white loser got him through safely.

Subsequently Harverson made several desperate efforts to get up again, scoring 61, 47, 29, and 21 (off the red) without response, but Weiss always appeared to have the issue in safe keeping after his double-century effort, and at last ran out with 41, a winner 117 points. Aggregating 684, Weiss averaged 17, to Harverson's 583 and 15. Scores :—

Weiss	12,000

THE MADRAS HOUNDS.

ON Wednesday last week hounds met at the Amanjakarai Bridge, an old fashioned meet which has not been patronised much of late years. All the coverts along the river, on both sides of the road, were drawn without success until in a mango tope near the fifth milestone a jack was found, who, without much delay, broke in the direction of Kadambakam, a very good line, indeed, if he had been able to continue it. Our hopes of a gallop were, however, doomed to disappointment for hounds got so quickly away that they had their jack in view at once, and, giving him no chance of getting into his stride, ran into I killed him in a few hundred yards. The Master's efforts to find another jack were all unavailing. We drew on along the road for nearly a couple of miles and then back along the river, but this yielded nothing and we had to return home after a most disappointing day.

On Sunday, the meet was at the Nantambakam Bridge and again we had only a poor morning's sport. The Master first crossed the bridge to the left bank of the Adyar River and drew through the covert to the left of the road. Here it was not long before hounds spoke to a line, but this was apparently some what stalle and while hounds were puzzling it out a jack was viewed back by a member of the field. Hounds were laid on to his line after as little delay as possible, but so bad was the day for scent that they could not speak to it and could make nothing of it. This was a fair specimen of what we met with throughout the morning. Another jack was found in Sheepshead Covert, but here again it was soon evident that there was no scent. Hounds succeeded in picking out the line slowly out of the covert up the river, back to covert and again up the river bank At times they ran for a few yards but at others they were only just able to hold the line and this went on until the scent disappeared altogether.

Wednesday, this week, was another bad and scentless day. Hounds met at Kadambakam, but nothing was done and it would, therefore, be unless to describe their movements.

Sunday last, however, was a much better day. It was a nice, cool morning with some dew, though not as much as there should be at this season of the year. The meet was at the Lattice Bridge and there was quite a big field out for Madras, over thirty people being present. These included Mrs. Horne, Mrs. Miller, Mrs. Clementson, the Hon'ble Mr. Weir, Major Giffard, and many others. Sharp to time the Master moved off to the cocoanut tope from which we had a good gallop earlier the in season. This time, however, it held nothing and a draw across the paddy fields to Fox Hill and over the scrub on the hill was also fruitless. The outlying covert, from which many a good hunt has started, provided the needful in the shape of a brace of jacks. These separated in the fields beyond the covert and, a single hound being stopped on the line of one of them, the pack settled to the other. Close as they were to him, they could not run at any pace, and indeed, throughout the morning scent was never very good. Hounds managed to hold the line, however, and every now and again ran fast. The jack took a line to the south over the open parallel to the big coverts, but soon turned into them and then swung left handed towards the Lattice Bridge, hounds throwing up after a sharp ten minutes run. A cast forward resulted in another find, again of a brace of jacks, no dint of the first brace, who must have rejoined forces. Hounds divided for a few minutes, but were soon got together again and ran somewhat better than before up to the north end of the coverts and out on to the fields below the tank bund. Skirting this bund, the jack took to the open and went right across to Fox Hill, hounds never going very fast, but yet hunting very well. On a clump of prickly pear on the Vellacherri side, the jack lay up, but was ejected and went away in view of the leading hounds along the edge of the Vellacherri swamp. Here the pace was as fast as need be desired and the jack, keeping outside the covert where he was found, reached the paddy fields with hounds gaining fast on him. Here again they were brought to their noses, but ran well until they suddenly threw up near the bund of a small tank. We searched the crops and the prickly pear and the tank bund, but nowhere found any sign of him.

Crossing again to the big coverts we then drew across to the canal and on the far side near the latter hounds again picked up a line. This line was possibly stale or else scent had gone off, for though they hunted across to the other side of the coverts, up along the fields outside of them and back into the casuarinas for a mile or more hounds were never able to get on terms and we had to trot slowly after them. There scent failed altogether and hounds were sent home.

Paperchasing.

CALCUTTA PAPERCHASES.

No. 6.

THE Sixth Meet was held on the Monsoon Ride, the Jodhpur country being still unrideable, and very much larger fields set out in both chases. The pace was made very hot and those who wanted places had to ride hard for them, even in the pony chase and there was a renewed vigor about the proceedings generally. This is just as it should be and evidently the pendulum of paperchasing has not yet begun to swing backward.

The Honorary Secretaries had made a very nice course indeed, much of it consisting of last week's course reversed. with the worst bits omitted and rather more open galloping country substituted. The distance must have been well over three miles, but this is always hard to estimate on a very twisting course. There was plenty of jumping and an unusual number of bushed fences, but very few people came to grief in spite of the large number competing.

Messrs. Turner and Deakin laid the paper and when the word was given Messrs. Rees, Evers, Ballantyne and Levetus, a new recruit to the front rank, took them along at a real good pace. The jungle path after the second wall looked very awkward for pulling horses and Cymmerau slipped up with his fair rider while Jorrocks was badly interfered with and Mr. Levetus came also to grief. In the open they went along at a rare bat, Turk and his rider going along in front with a determination that would have done them both credit ten years ago. At the finish that wonderful mare Lady Gold swung past the veterans and won handsomely. Orphan Boy brought Mr. Evers in next while Fairy secured her place as did Detective, beating Posie pulling up.

The official order was :—

1. Dr. Hossack on Lady Gold.	4. Mr. Ballantyne on Fairy.
2. Mr. Rees on Turk.	5. Mrs. Walker on Detective.
3. Mr. Evers on Orphan Boy.	6. Mr. Pugh on Posie.

followed by Mrs. Crocker on Bluebell, Mrs. Morgan on Fusilier and a bunch of military thrusters.

The pony chase was a race throughout and Mr. Evers after starting late and getting off the paper in the jungle wore down the leaders, some of whom were not in very deadly earnest, and got home first. There should be a good race for the Pony Cup this year if Good Chap is fit to go, as Branga, Mistlebird and Mr. Bell Irving's Arab can all make Mr. Hamilton's pony gallop.

The order in the pony chase was :—

1. Mr. Evers on Branga.	4. Mr. Pugh on Mistle-bird.
2. Mr. Robertson on Gux.	5. Mr. Pauntley on Irish Boy.
3. Mr. Bell Irving on Samah.	6. Mr. Morshead on a Grey.

THE LADIES' CUP.

On Tuesday morning this time honoured trophy was again won by Mrs. Lamond Walker, who had the easiest of victories on her good little horse Detective. Mrs. Paris and Mrs. Crocker rode with the greatest possible determination and dash, but could not cope with the speedy lightweight. The following ladies started, and with the exception of "Posie" all completed the course. They finished in thir order.—

Mrs. Walker on Detective.	Miss. Sukis on Scisnara.
Mrs. Crocker on Bluebell.	Mrs. Morgan on Fusilier.
Mrs. Paris on Jorrocks.	Mrs. Collin on Molleen.
Mrs. Forryth or Corydon.	Miss Peck on a Bay.

TOTALIZATOR FOR ENGLAND.

SIR WALTER GILBEY'S SUGGESTION.

SIR WALTER GILBEY writes to The Times :—The "Street Betting Bill" which has been passed by the present Government encourages me to ask for a small space in your paper in order to advocate the introduction into this country of the "totalizator" (pari mutuel) which has been such a success in France and the other leading countries of Europe, as well as in all our Colonies and the United States.

As regards street betting, the objects of the Bill may be laudable enough, but in my opinion it only touches the fringe of the question, and it would be idle to suppose that it will altogether extinguish betting.

It is well known what a large sum is yearly derived in France from the percentage levied on the money which passes through the totalizator. I have not the figures since 1901, but in that year the revenue derived by the State was £632,681, which sum was applied to the encouragement of agriculture and horse-breeding and to assisting the hospitals.

To take our furthest and yet most up-to-date colony—New Zealand—as an instance, where the laws of temperance and morality are most strict. There, with a population of only 700,000, they realize £80,000, per annum by their "totalizators."

To abolish betting on horse-racing would be as impossible as to close the Stock Exchange.

Wagering is inherent in all classes of society, and the Legislature does not declare betting in itself to be illegal.

The great danger of betting is doing so on credit, and the immense advantage of the totalizator would be that it would have the effect of making gambling on horse-racing a ready money transaction.

Thus, the argument of the working and middle classes against Lord Davey's measure would fall to the ground, and our great voluntary institutions could be benefited by the funds derived from this system. Efforts are continually being made to induce our Government to give an adequate grant towards the encouragement of light horse-breeding with a view to securing the necessary supply os horses for our Army; but I fear there is little likelihood of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's complying with this request.

As I have previously pointed out, the remedy is at hand in the legalisation of the totalizator on racecourses.

Mr. John Hawke, Honorary, Secretaty National Anti-Gambling League, writes to the same journal :—

May we ask space for a few lines to reply to Sir Walter Gilbey's letter in your issue of to-day?

If we may say so, without offence to that gentleman and his equine friends, he apparently suggests the Chinese plan of roasting the pig (improving the breed of horses) by setting fire—in a moral sense—to the house, involving the State as a partner in a vast gambling system.

He says that the legalized "totalizator" has been successful in the Colonies and eleswhere, but omits to notice the tremendous and sweeping legislative efforts which are now being made in the countries in question, and particularly in the Australian continent, to grapple with the demoralization caused by the so-called success' and to put an end to the "tote shops."

Apparently Sir Walter Gilbey thinks that the vast amount of legitimate business undoubtedly transacted in the Stock Exchange of the world is no more needful to the community than is betting upon horse races, so that this latter must be a necessary institution. Has he ever read the following paragraph from the report of the House of Lords' committee of 1844, which was drawn up after a very full consideration of the "breed of horses" argument' which Sir Walter Gilbey reverts to :—"The Committee would consider the advantages of horse-racing more than problematical if they were to be unavoidably purchased by excessive gambling and the vice and misery which it entails?"

Is he cognisant of the evidence as to this entailed vice and misery given before the Select Committee of that House in the Sessions of 1901-2? Does he know that Lord Durham presided over its deliberations, and that Lord Derby and Lord Harewood were members of it? That its report was a unanimous one, and that it deplored betting "as opposed to the true interests of sport, injurious to the community, and degenerating into one of the worst forms of gambling.!"

He says that it is inherent in all classes of society. This is too wide; but were it not so does he advocate it in place of the suppression or curbing of all practices "injurious to the community" or a profit-sharing policy on behalf of the State? To what would this lead us in some other directions?

We should welcome Sir Walter Gilbey's assistance in dealing with credit betting, which he condemns as the great danger; but, in full recollection of Artemus Ward's caution to those who, in these modern times, venture upon the regions of propuecy we are yet disposed to think that there is not the smallest chance of the establishmens of "tote shops" in Great Britain either in the near or remote future.

"Is this my train?" said a man at Newmarket. "I don't know, but I fancy not," said the stationmaster, doubtfully. "I see it's got the name of the Great Eastern Railway Company on the side, and I rather suspect that it belongs to them. Have you lost a train anywhere?"

Saturday, 26th January 1907.

THE twelfth annual meeting of this Association was held on their ground on the Calcutta maidan this afternoon in unseasonable, sultry weather with a strong south-west breeze blowing across the track. The track arrangements were as good as the nature of the ground would permit, though a ditch near the start for the hurdles rather spoilt the handicap in that race. In other respects the handicaps turned out very well. The running was not particularly good and the over eagerness of some of the backmarkers in the 100 yards—heats and final—spoiled the starts : in every other race they were sent away well together. The prizes were presented by Lady Fraser. Appended is a list of the winners.

Without number are the coups that have been landed at Goodwood. For the Stewards' Cup especially have horses been "readied" and heavily backed by stables confident of success. Not always, however, has the good thing "copped," for the best laid of plans occasionally go wrong, and the unexpected turns up once more.

Mr. Rolt had two horses entered for the race under notice in 1847. They were Collingwood and The Cur, with either of whom the owner felt confident of winning this much-coveted prize. Bob Pettit was engaged for Collingwood, while George Whitehouse was put on the second string. Pettit's mount was first favourite. Having backed the horse for a large sum, Mr. Rolt, of course, declared to win with him.

After the usual delay the flag fell. As the horses passed the lawn, backers of the favourite rejoiced to see that Mr. Rolt's pair were the only ones who had any chance. Despite this, however, Whitehouse kept at work on The Cur, who gained a head verdict from his stable-companion.

When the numbers went up, the owner's face was a study. He and all the stable connections had dashed the money down on the good thing, which had been upset by one of their own horses. Much enraged, he laid the case before the Jockey Club, and Whitehouse was asked to explain his conduct.

Very ingenious was the offending jockey's defence. The colours of Campanile were very like those of Collingwood, and Whitehouse asserted that he did not know which he was racing against. As there was no evidence to disprove this statement, the case was dismissed. Pettit, however, always asserted that Whitehouse intended winning on the non-favourite, if possible, in revenge for not being on Collingwood himself.

HOW I MADE THE WORLD'S AUTOMOBILE TRACK RECORDS.

PEOPLE call me a dare-devil, and say that I am reckless of the peril of death which ever pursues, often close at hand, the racing chauffeur. Nothing, however, could be further from the truth. As a matter of fact, I am sometimes badly frightened when I start in a race, or try to lower a record. It is not that I am afraid of being killed, but I have a great dread of being broken to pieces and left to linger out my life in such a condition. Occasionally, when I see a cripple on the street, I shudder, and wonder if I shall ever be like that. Of course, such a thing might easily happen. Realizing which, when I take my seat in the motor-car for a big event, now and then, I am seized with a feeling that is almost one of panic, saying to myself : "This is your finish, Barney!"

I suppose that I can afford to make such a confession, holding as I do all the world's records for speed on the circular track from one to fifty miles. And, though afraid sometimes, I am not daunted. Three times in the last three years I have been nearly killed in accidents which, incidently, wiped out the lives of three other men. Yet, immediately after each one of these unfortunate occurrences I did not hesitate to start again, and succeeded in beating records.

People often ask me how it feels to go a mile a minute, and it puzzles me to reply. I might say that it comes natural to me to go fast. The bicycle was a slow machine, relatively speaking when I began to ride it. After a fashion, I grew up with it ; and in the same way I tackled motor cycling in its early beginning. When the automobile first appeared I transferred to it my attention, and have kept on with it as it has become faster and faster. The mile-a-minute feeling amounts to nothing more than a cutting wind with a sensation as if somebody were trying to tear your clothes off. You do not lose your breath, as is popularly imagined, and, whatever your tremors before starting, you are altogether too busy to be afraid while running the course.

I was born twenty-seven years ago in a little Ohio town called Wauseon, not far from Toledo. I was only fifteen years old when I first went into bicycle racing, as an amateur, and for some years thereafter I rode the wheel in summer and travelled in winter as salesman for a firm that dealt in machine supplies.

I won the championship of Ohio, as an amateur, in 1895 and 1896, and rode in contests also in Indiana, Michigan and Kentucky. Such exercise, in which every muscle of the body is used, furnishes most admirable training, and to this early experience I attribute in large degree the development of my physique. In 1901 I went into motorcycling, having meanwhile become a professional rider of the wheel, and it was at that period, during my last season as a cycle racer, that, finding myself in Salt Lake City, I took notice for the first time of gasoline engines. No body out in that part of the country seemed to know anything about such engines and so I thought it might be worth while to make a study of them.

I am a born mechanic. Though I have never served an apprenticeship to the trade, I could go into a shop now and build an automobile from start to finish. That, indeed, was why Tom Cooper, the famous bicycle rider and my closest friend, thought of sending for me when he wanted somebody to help him. He was engaged at that time with a Detroit man in an attempt to build two high-power motor-cars, and, the job proving too much for them, Tom wrote to me to come on from Salt Lake and lend my assistance in finishing the machines.

In those days it did not occur to me that I would ever have a chance to drive an automobile. I was the man with the oil-can—the helper in overalls. Nevertheless, deep down in my mind there was a determination that, if ever I had such an opportunity, I would make a showing. In response to Tom's letter, I went to Detroit and started in to work. His partner by this time had became discouraged with the machines, and declared that they could never be made to go. Tom and I felt more hopeful, and so we decided to buy them, becoming the owners of both for less than $2,000. We tinkered at them for quite a while, and at length they seemed to be in pretty fair shape ; but, when we shipped them to Dayton (Ohio) to take part in a race there, they obstinately refused to run.

We were not easily disheartened, however. A great contest for the national championship—the most important automobile race ever held in this country—was to take place in Detroit, in the summer of 1902. Alexander Winton, who at that time held the world's record for one mile, was to be the star of the occasion. As for myself, I had never taken part in a race of the kind, and nobody supposed that I had the slightest chance. Nevertheless, having no reputation to lose, I was undeterred by any such consideration from entering. I drove, and won, beating Mr. Wilton by half a mile over a course five miles in length.

As might be imagined, this exploit attracted a good deal of notice. Tom's former partner, who had sold to us the winning machine (and who, before the race, had stipulated that his name was not to appear in connection with our entry), hugged me and actually wept for joy, saying that we would build a motor-car to challenge the world. All at once I found myself the object of much flattering attention—a circumstance gratifying for the moment, but which proved to be decidedly a misfortune. For, being thrown into the company of men of means much greater than my own, I was obliged to spend too freely the little money I had, and soon was reduced literally to my last dollar.

Though I had defeated Alexander Winton, he still held the world's record for a mile on the circular track, having made the distance in a minute and two seconds. To beat it was a step in the direction of my ambition, and so, choosing a day when the road was frozen hard (rendering it less liable to be cut up on the turns), I undertook the task. It was necessary for me to win, and I did so, my time being one minute and one second. Nevertheless, though the feat was applauded, the glory of it did not fill my pockets, and, being flat broke, I decided that I must do something immediately by way of earning bread and butter. Going to Toledo, I secured a job in the assembling shop of an automobile factory, and there I was glad to work for a while at $2 a day.

Often it happens that when things look their very worst the clouds, if one could but know it, are really just on the point of breaking away. In the spring of 1903 I was engeged in tinkering at those two old machines when I got a letter from Alfred Reeves, offering me $250 and a third of the gross gate receipts to come to New York and drive on the thirtieth of May. Of course, I accepted with alacrity, and with a determination to do something worth while or perish in the attempt—knowing as I did that New York was the greatest place in the world (as has often been said) to make a good showing, and the poorest place to make a poor showing. If I succeeded there, it would put me on my feet.

The first thing I did was to buy a red sheepskin, which I came across accidentally, and to get a tailor to make me a coat out of it. Then for two days I worked at painting my machine, which Tom and I called the "999," with the reddest paint that I could purchase What I wanted to do was to render my performance spectacular, and in this aim I fully succeeded. Auto speed racing at that time was new in New York, and I perceived that there was a great chance to do something sensational. The affair was pulled off at the Empire City track, between Yonkers and Mount Vernon, and I drove a mile in one minute flat, beating all previous performances on the circular course.

The New York newspapers made a great sensation of it, and what they said was copied by the press all over the country. My method of driving was entirely new, and much space was devoted to discussing it. It was remarkable chiefly by reason of the fact that it converted the track, practically, into an ellipse. To understand this, one should realize that the so-called circular track is not really circular, but oblong—the sides of the oblong being called the "straights," while the rounded corners are the "turns." The path being 100 feet wide, my plan (which was my own invention, though since adopted by others) consisted in veering outward as far as possible on two of the turns at opposite ends of the oblong, so as to make the course almost an oval. By this means I got rid of the corners in a measure, and was enabled to obtain a proportionately greater speed.

This event marked the turning point in my career. People in Indianapolis who were interested in the sport asked me, soon afterwards, if I would try to drive a mile in less than a minute. I replied that I would make the attempt, and, going to that city, I did the trick in fifty-nine and two-fifth seconds. It was, of course, the first mile ever covered by an automobile under one minute on a circular track. Straightaway racing is something entirely different, and the records, for obvious reasons, are much lower. When I have accumulated a million dollars, I may take up straightaway motoring as an amusement ; meanwhile, my business is driving on circular tracks where there are gate receipts.

When, four or five years ago, I ventured to predict that some day I would drive a mile in less than a minute, people said that I was crazy. In flying around the [illegible] tremendous a centrifugal energy is developed on the turns that, it was formerly supposed, a machine going at such a rate must either be upset or be thrown through the fence. Since the time of which I speak several men have done a mile under a minute : but I did it first, and for that I claim the credit. To attempt it was believed to be equivalent to facing almost sure death, and yet I made the experiment. That was what took the nerve.

When, in running around the so-called circular track, you go down one of the long stretches at the rate of a mile a minute, the turn ahead of you looks so narrow that you feel as if, in trying to pass around it, you would shoot literally off the earth. It had been customary for drivers to shut off the power on approaching a corner, lest such a fate befall them, but I kept on at full speed, and lived to tell the tale. After that it was easy. On the fourth of July, in Columbus, I did a mile in fifty-six and two-fifths seconds, and drove ten consecutive miles in less than a minute each. There is much in learning how to perform such a feat. At the present time I can drive a mile in fifty-nine seconds as safely as I could cover the same distance three or four years ago in a minute and five seconds.

Next, I was asked to make an attempt to lower the mile record still further in New York, and I did it in fifty-five and four-fifths seconds—which stood quite a while, until I myself broke it. That ended the days of my driving on "999"—the good old machine which owed its efficiency so largely to my own tinkering. In many ways it was so primitive and lacking in up-to-dateness, so to speak, that people often laughed at it, declaring that it could not possibly start in a race without being pushed. It did not possess any tranmission gear to change speeds, and it had no "differential"—the mechanical arrangement by which the wheels on one side of a car are made to go slower than those on the other side in rounding turns.

By this time I had acquired the reputation of being a dare-devil of the first water, and incidentally I held all of the world's records. An automobile manufacturer hired me at a handsome salary, and told me that, as a part of the bargain, I was expected to beat every one of my own records on his machine. The value of this for advertising purposes was obvious. Thereafter I won races all over the United States, but broke the records only for five, ten, and fifteen miles. On the third day of October, 1903, I tired for the mile at Empire City, but got only fifty-six seconds—my previous record having been, as I have said, fifty-five and four-fifths seconds. After subsequent failures in the West, I smashed it at last, at Los Angeles, with fifty-four and four-fifths seconde. Since then I have made the distance in fifty-three seconds even.

In January 1904, I went to Florida and took part in a straight-away race for the world's championship against the fastest machines in existence, the distance being one mile. One of my competitors was W. K. Wanderbilt, junior, who on the previous day had broken the world's record, his time being thirty-nine seconds. Nobody seemed to think I had a chance in the contest. Nevertheless, after the preliminary heats, I started with two competitors and won, beating Mr. Vanderbilt in forty-three seconds. There were other races, but I could not engage in any of them because of an accident to my machine.

I consider that my best achievement up to the present time was a record that I made at Fresno, Cal., last winter, where I drove fifty miles in a few seconds over forty-eight minutes. But I have made up my mind to be satisfied with what I have accomplished, and to make no further attempt to lower records—unless, of course, a temptation should be offered in the shape of an extraordinarily large purse. Meanwhile, my reputation enables me to command $1,000 for taking part in a race, and, with a share of the gate receipts added I sometimes receive as much as $3,500 for a day's work. Formerly such races were organized by automobile associations, but nowadays, in most instances, I send my agents, who are called "promoters," to a city, and they make the arrangements, in co-operation with some local club.

As for being afraid, I may confess that I am somewhat of a fatalist. Though hurt many times I have escaped death thus far, and some confidence in my luck has been engendered in my mind. My principal rivals, the first and last of them, have come and gone; they have left the game and I remain. Webb Jay, who beat me once or twice, went through the fence at Buffalo last August, and has not yet fully recovered. For fifteen days it was not known whether he would live or die. His skull, an arm and leg, and six or seven of his ribs were broken. A week before the accident to Jay, Earl Kiser, an old bicycle rider, went through the fence with his motor-car at Cleveland, and one of his legs was torn off above the knee.—BARNEY OLDFIELD, in Illustrated Outdoor News.

TURFITES vs. JOCKEYS AND TRAINERS.—This match was played on the Hornets' ground last Thursday: it was interesting and at times not lacking in humour. The Turfites won on the first innings, their opponents' grand total for two innings, curiously enough, just equalling theirs. Mr. "Edwards" a well-known local smiter, was largely responsible for this victory with his 96 and C. Simpson backed him up well with 53. Score :—

CALCUTTA vs. RANGERS.—This two days' fixture terminated on the C.C.C. ground on the 27th instant in a run away victory for Calcutta by an innings and 159 runs. G. Turnbull was seen at the top of the fine form he has exhibited this season and made 103; J. D. Guise and E. Horncastle with 80 and 65 and S. C. B. Lee with a well played 50 helped to run up the C.C.C. score to the very respectable figure of 393. The visitors' reply to this was 126, the brothers Hodges being the only ones to stand up to the C.C.C. bowling. In their second innings they fell off still more, Calderwood heading the individual contributions with 29 and the total being but 108. Score :—

BALLYGUNGE C.C. vs. THE GARRISON OFFICERS.—Ballygunge received a visit from a strong team of the Officers of the Garrison, got together by Major Fishbourne, and won easily by no less than 154 runs and 7 wickets, a margin that would have been considerably increased had the match been continued until the usual hour for the drawing of stumps, instead of only until about four o'clock.

Winning the toss, Major Fishbourne decided to bat, and sent in Captain Hill and Lieutenant Walker to face the bowling of Eddis and Cowdrey, 19 were scored without loss, but then a series of misfortunes overtook the side, and the first three wickets all fell to Eddis at that total. Captain Hill and Lieutenant Temperley and later, the latter and Major Burlton improved matters somewhat, but the whole team were out shortly before lunch for 148, a total far from indicative of the batting strength of the side. Eddis bowled extremely well, capturing 9 wickets (6 clean bowled) for 76 runs, but none of the others tried met with much success, in fact, considering that the home team were without the services of any of their regular bowlers, Gould, Mander, Wood and Nicholls, they did extremely well to get rid of their opponents for anything under about 300.

White and Eddis opened for Ballygunge, and runs came fast from the beginning, White being the first to leave, bowled off his glove by Stockley, Shallow then joined Eddis, and the bowling was flogged all over the field, a dissolution not being effected until the score had been taken from 55 to 212, Eddis at that total deliberately allowing himself to be stumped by Hill off Temperley. His 107 was one of his best displays and was all but faultless; he scored at a tremendous pace and treated all the bowlers alike Shallow went on gaily, until when he had made 141, he followed Eddis' example; the old Brighton College boy's innings was a brilliant one, his strokes all round the wicket being clean, hard and well timed, and put together without a mistake.

After he left, Sherman and Whiteley kept together until stumps were drawn, the total then being 302 for 3.

During the 4 hours or so that play was in progress, no less than 450 runs were made, over 280 of these being made between half-past two and four o'clock; in four days at Ballygunge, no less than 1671 runs have been scored, a fact that speaks well for both the wicket and the out-fielding. Scores :—

The Naturalist.

THE TAKIN AND THE MUSK-OX.

YEAR by year the number of species of big game animals which have never yet fallen to the rifle of the European sportsman is becoming smaller and smaller ; and if one of our intrepid explorers is ultimately successful in bagging an okapi, even the heart of Africa will not have many novelties in the way of sport left to offer. Strange to say, there is, however, a comparatively large ruminant living actually within sight of British Indian territory, and known to naturalists for more than half a century, which has up to the present altogether escaped the attentions of the European shikari, for the very sufficient reason that the country where it is found is closed to the white man. We mean, of course, the takin (Budorcas taxicolor), which was first described by Brian Hodgson in the year 1850 on the evidence of specimens obtained by Major Jenkins from the Mishmis inhabiting the hills to the north-east of Sadya. The name "takin" (which is of Tibeto-Chinese origin and akin to bantin and thamin, and, like both the latter, might be spelt with a terminal g) is, by the way, a terrible stumbling-block to the ordinary Cockney, who instead of pronouncing the a in continental and eastern fashion, will insist on dubbing the creature a "take-in." And some time ago, when a specimen had been received by the British Museum, a certain London journal wanted to know why such a fuss was made about it, seeing that "take-ins" are by no means unknown in museums generally !

In addition to having never hitherto been shot, till quite recently the Mishmi takin had never been seen alive by a European. Some time ago, however, Mr. J. Claude White, the Commissioner of Sikhim, had a young takin in his camp which it was hoped might be transported alive to England, although the fates willed it otherwise. Of this specimen a photograph appeared in our London namesake for 11th October. Apart from this single immature example, the takin in a living state still remains, so far as I am aware, unknown to Europeans, at all events in the territories bordering British India. Since, however, the range of the takin extends from the country north of Sikhim and the Mishmi Hills through Eastern Tibet into Sze-chuen and not improbably still further eastward in China, it is just possible that Europeans may have seen (and perhaps even killed) the animal in some part of its Chinese habitat, although I have never heard of any testimony to that effect. The Tibetan and Chinese race of the takin, it may be mentioned, is a brighter-coloured animal than the typical Mishmi animal, much of the long hair been golden yellow ; and its horns seem to be less massive.

Although, as we have just seen, practically nothing is known of the takin in the living condition, it is fairly well represented in the museums of both London and Paris, the former possessing several skins and skeletons, as well as skulls ; while there are at least skins in the Indian Museum. No description of the animal is therefore necessary, although attention may be directed to a few of its chief characteristics.

The most striking feature of the adult is formed by the sharply angulated blackish horns which are present in both sexes, although rather smaller in the ewes than in the rams. In the young they form simple spikes, while in the full-grown animals constitute that portion above the bend. Very characteristic of the animal is the highly arched region of the nose, or chafron, which is specially conspicuous in the skull. The muzzle resembles that of goats and sheep in being vertically grooved ; the ears are very small and almost quadrangular ; the tail is little more than a stump ; and the limbs are very short and thick, with the lateral pair of hoofs remarkably large. As regards the teeth, it must suffice to mention that these are of the general type of those of the sheep and goats, and therefore quite unlike those of oxen. In the skeleton the most remarkable feature is the shortness and width of the front and hind cannon-bones ; the breadth of which approximates to half the length. The female has four teats, like the serow and one species of thar.

The little we know concerning the habits of the creature is all derived from native reports. The small size of the ears is sufficient to indicate that takin, unlike serow, do not live in jungle. Mr. John Cockburn, in Sterndale's "Mammalia of India," has stated that when at Sadya he was shown by a Mishmi the open spurs inhabited by these animals, and also that their range extends from about 8,000 feet to the Alpine region which forms their true habitat. This is confirmed by Mr. White, who, as recently stated in the Field, has ascertained that takin inhabit the zone immediately below the snow-line ; and likewise that they are exceedingly fierce in disposition, so much so indeed that the natives (who have to get within short range) find them very awkward customers to tackle. They generally go about in pairs, each of which may be accompanied by a kid.

Turning now to what naturalists have written regarding the affinities of this strange ruminant, we find the following statement (with the initials J. C.) in Sterndale "The takin," it is there written, "is essentially a serow with affinities to the bovines through the musk-ox, and other relationship to the sheep, goat, and antelope."

In suggesting affinity with the oxen (bovines) the author was clearly on the wrong tack, seeing that the teeth of the musk-ox (like those of the takin) are of a totally different type, and much nearer those of the sheep and goats. This was recognized by Dr. Blanford, who in the "Fauna of India," observed that the takin is "allied to both goats and antelopes ; I cannot see the bovine affinities attributed to it."

Some years later (1898) Dr. Matschie, of Berlin, strongly supported the relationship of the takin to the musk-ox, basing his conclusions on the shortness and width of their cannon-bones, the shape of the skull and horns, the small and peculiarly formed ears, the nature of the muzzle, the shortness of the tail, the stout, short legs, and the relatively large lateral hoofs. He might have added that, as in the serows, the females of both have four teats.

The next to enter the arena was Dr. E. Lönnberg, of Upsala, who, in a paper published in the Zoological Society's Proceedings for 1901, disputed these alleged resemblances, Dr. Lönnberg, it should be mentioned, does not regard the musk-ox as a near relative of the sheep and goats, but as the sole living representative of a comparatively primitive group, which has become specialized after its own particular style. He points out that the muzzle of the two animals is different, that of the takin having a downward prolongation of the naked area to divide the upper lip after the fashion of sheep and goats, and still more the serows. To the form of the ears, tail, and lateral hoofs he attaches little importance ; while as he truly remarks the home of the two animals are strikingly different, although he forgets to mention that, as in the serows, those of the females in both species are relatively large. He also challenges the statement with regard to the proportions of the cannon-bones ; but the measurements given (although no doubt exact) are misleading. When compared with the other bones of the legs, the fore and hind cannon-bones of the musk-ox are indeed remarkably short and wide, although not quite to the same extent as in the takin. And since it is only in these two ruminants and the Rocky Mountain goat (Oreamnus) that this very marked shortness of both cannon-bones occurs, it must surely be regarded as a feature of some importance. The wild goat, it is true, has a short front cannon-bone, as Dr. Lönnberg remarks ; but then the hind cannon-bone is very long, actually longer indeed than in a wild sheep (Ovis gmelini) in which the front cannon-bone greatly exceeds the corresponding element of the goat in length.

In connection with the relationships of the takin it is important to refer to two extinct ruminants, Euceratherium and Preptoceras, of which the remains have been discovered in certain Californian remains. That the ancestors of these animals came from Asia is practically certain ; and their describers, Messrs. Furlong and Sinclair, are of opinion that they present resemblances both to the takin and the musk-ox, although not nearly related to either. Probably, writes the former, Preptoceras "bear somewhat the same degree of relationship to Ovibos that Budoreas does ;" which is perhaps not a very lucid way of putting matters when the nature of the latter relationship is just what we don't know. However, there seems a considerable probability that the two extinct American ruminants together with the Rocky Mountain goat and the musk-ox, are all the descendants of an Asiatic assemblage of ruminants of which the takin and the serow are Old World survivors. There is, moreover, the further possibility that an extinct ruminant from the Pliocene Tertiary deposits of Samos known as Criotherium which has curiously bent horns, may be a member of the same assemblage.

On the whole, despite the criticisms of Dr. Lönnberg, I am disposed to agree with Messrs. Cockburn and Matschie as to the existence of some kind of kinship between the takin and the musk-ox, although it is impossible to formulate the nature of the affinity. Possibly the fact that both animals dwell on or near the snow may be additional evidence of their relationship. By means of the Rocky Mountain goat, the takin is probably connected in some way with the serows, which are themselves relations of the goats and sheep. This whole assemblage of ruminants over inhabited north-eastern Asia, whence the Rocky Mountain goat, the musk-ox, and the two extinct genera referred to above wandered into the New World, while the takin and the serows remained in the old family home.

It should be added that any information sportsmen may be able to obtain with regard to the habits and food of the takin and the exact limits of its habitat would be of the greatest interest and value to naturalists at home.

THE GRAMOPHONE CO.

GENTLEMEN,

The Gramophone of to-day I find is such an improved instrument for recording the human voice to the older machines with which so many of us are familiar, that my hitherto objection to allow the thousands who cannot hear me sing personally to listen to the reproduction of my voice through the instrumentality of your Gramophone is now quite removed, and the Records which you have lately made for me I think are natural reproductions of my voice.

Yours truly,
ADELINA PATTI (Baroness Cederström.)

19. Kt. to R 4	Resigns.

(a) This certainly appears to give the second player a marked advantage if the firs. player attempts totake the K Kt P in reply.

(b) Had White taken the Pawn with his Kt, Black would have replied with P to Q 4, and, in answer to P takes P, obtained a winning advantage by Q to K 2 ch, &c.

(c) An excellent conception, although the sacrifice appears in some measure compulsory; for, had White retreated, the Kt Black would have replied with Kt takes K P followed by R to K sq, &c. The attack which White now obtains by giving up his two pieces for the R is full compensation for his loss.

(d) This move, by which White secures the menacing position of his centre Pawn, seems not to have been foreseen (nor, indeed, as the event shows, when seen understood by his adversary). White now threatens to play Q R to K sq, and afterwards post his Kt at Q 5, or to check with the Q at B 4 followed by P to Q 5.

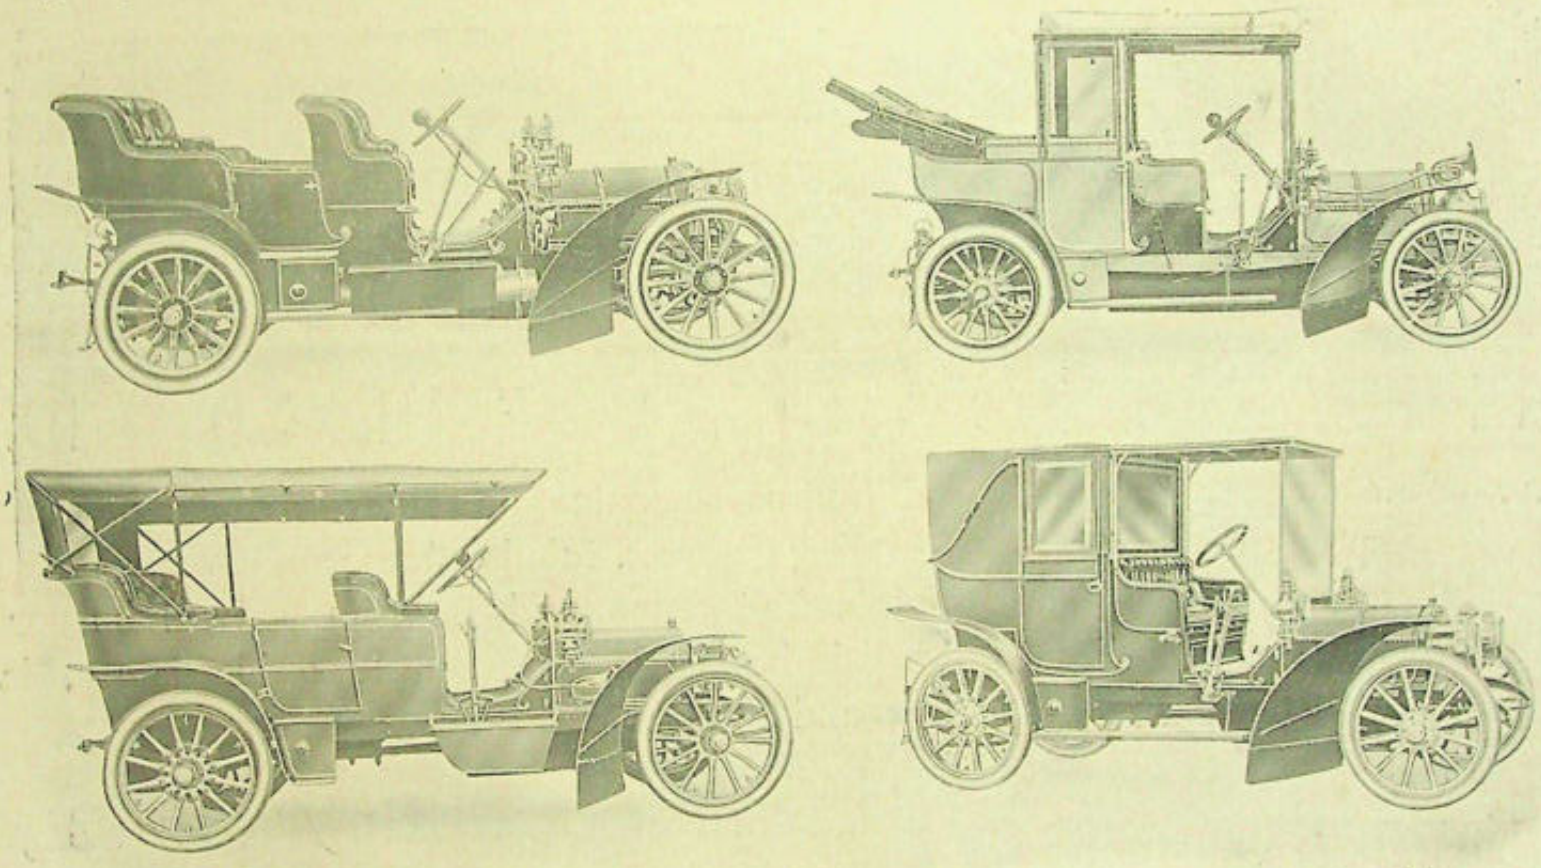
(e) Had he taken the P with Kt, White would still have gained a piece by Kt to Q 5, Q takes Kt, &c.

When a man's wife comes in and sees him razor in hand and with his face all lather, and asks him, "Are you shaving?" it's a provoking thing for him to answer, "No, I'm blacking the stove," but it's human nature so to reply.

Sub-Editor: "Here's another letter from that man who signs himself 'Vox Populi.'" Editor: "What has he got to say now?" Sub-Editor: "He writes to inquire if we will kindly inform him what 'vox populi' means."

He was a young man from the country, but he was of an inquiring turn of mind, and liked to find out all about new places. Visiting London for the first time, he told the waiter from whom he ordered his dinner to bring him the local paper.

They had a very sad affair down at Woolwich. A young lady at an evening party happened to mention that all the cadets wore white pants. A bashful young man, stricken with the "Pinafore" mania, thereupon exclaimed, "So do their sisters, their cousins, and their aunts."



Wife: "You must send me away for my health at once. I am going into a decline." Husband: "Why, whatever makes you think so?" Wife: "All my dresses are beginning to fees comfortable."

The Daimler. Naturally the Coventry Daimler Cars have attracted great attention, partly owing to the phenomenal success of the Company, and also owing to the long list of prominent British Motorists who have adopted this make. The 1907 Cars possess many improvements on former patterns and these embody a considerably larger radiator and more efficient circulating pump. The position of the engine and gear shafts is now reversed, thus allowing the frame to be placed lower while the clearance from the ground is as large as formerly. The sparking plugs are now placed somewhat differently. The external camshaft is retained, and the system of lubrication is also as before. An extremely clever addition to the levers of the gate-change has been made, by which it is not possible to put in the reverse unless the forward speed lever is in the neutral position. A particularly attractive feature of the Daimler Cars is the hinged bodies, which permit of all the gear being examined with the greatest ease. An improved radius rod is now added which facilitates tightening the chains. Altogether these Cars are a credit to British industry and they combine careful design, excellent materials and perfect workmanship.

F. I. A. T. Experts say that 1906 has been a "Fiat" year, and truly the success of these Cars has been remarkable. The Italians started their Motor Car building some years after France and two or three years after English manufacturers had got some excellent Cars on the market, yet in the opinion of many, they have surpassed all other nations. While taking the "Mercedes" patterns to work upon, they have so improved upon them as to make the "Fiat" Cars even more popular than the famous German make, while the cheap labour market in Italy allows the Italians to place their Cars before the public at a price Germany cannot touch. Recognising the demand for a small four Cylinder Car at a reasonable price, the Fiat Company have this year brought out their 14-16 model, which is a replica of the larger patterns while it can be purchased complete with a handsome body for well under £600. Despite its 14-16 Engine the Car is not under-powered, and it tackles hills in a way which would put to shame many Cars of higher horse-power. The Cars have not been altered to any great extent from 1906 models, though all the gear wheels in front of the engine are now enclosed, with the result that the engine is quieter than ever, and vies with the "Renault" for first place as regards silence. The gate-gear for the change speeds works with great ease and facility The chain lubricator driven by a small belt is still retained and appears to give no trouble. The petrol tank is carried at the rear of the car, and is under pressure. This system not only has the advantage of safety, but precludes the necessity for removing a front seat each time the petrol has to be replenished. The Fiat Company evidently are not going to be content with satisfying the European market, they are already opening up and pushing agencies abroad and are reported to be doing an enormous trade with America. Of course there are many other Italian makes to the fore, and it may be generally stated that all these Cars are of good design and soundly made.

Types of well-known Cars.

Argylls. A sensation was caused at Olympia by the Argyll Company deciding to reduce the price of their cars by £100 as soon as the Exhibition opened Many people have considered that the 14-16 four-cylinder Argyll at £475 was as good value as could be obtained, and naturally many were in doubt as to whether Argylls, Limited, could make the same car at £375.

To understand how such very large reductions are possible, it must be kept in mind that motor car production at Alexandria is carried on under the most advantageous conditions for securing the minimum cost and maximum quality of workmanship.

The factory covers 15 acres of floor-space, and requires 3,000 employés. The capacity for production exceeds forty cars per week. A large section of the machinery has been specially designed and made to turn out Argyll parts at minimum cost and in minimum time. The conditions under which the employés labour are of the best, and the factory—situated as it is in a picturesque valley within easy reach of Glasgow, that great centre of engineering activity—has at its command the very best of engineering skill.

Thus it comes about that cars which could only be produced at the old works on a small profit at £475, are now offered at £375, and those previously listed at £550 now appear at £475, while equally startling reductions are being made in the other models.

It must be clearly understood that the cars offered at the new prices are the 1907 models, and that they, while listed at lower prices than the 1906 cars, are by no means inferior to, but are really an improvement on the old patterns, and the finish and workmanship will, where possible, be improved rather than cheapened; for, paradoxical as it may seem, in motor manufacture if you turn out cars on a large enough scale, the better the workmanship, the lower the price

A report about Argylls would not be complete without a reference to the excellence of the body work now put on the cars. The Glasgow firm are evidently making a bold bid for Indian and Colonial business and we find the bodies of the car being made of metal throughout, the shape is pleasing, there is plenty of room and a wide side entrance. The brasswork with which these cars abound is always an attractive feature. To anyone requiring the best value for money we can safely say "Buy an Argyll."

De Dion-Bouton. It is practically impossible to tour anywhere without coming across the "De Dion" cars which like the brook appear to go on for ever. Gradually the firm is falling into line with up-to-date practice, while not in any way sacrificing the excellent points of their cars which have contributed so largely to the great name earned by this make for downright reliability. We find the 1906 model in the 8 h.-p. size with expanding clutches being still made in 1907, although a new model with mechanical valves and side lever gear is now added A small double cylinder car 8-10 h.-p. is to be manufactured, while the 15 and 28 h. p. will represent the larger models. The continued demand for these cars is remarkable, and the factory is always months behindhand with its deliveries. De Dion Bouton are now paying considerable attention to the commercial side of the business. They have some 60 omnibusses running on the streets of London, and are busily engaged in turning out lorries and parcel delivery vans. One particularly interesting vehicle is the De Dion convertible wagonette, in which the seats can be removed at will and the vehicle converted into a 30 cwt. lorry.

A Small Car Worth Noting.

The letter continues:—"Small car folk should keep an eye on the 1906 8 h.-p. (engine 100 mm. by 120 mm.) De Dion with expanding clutch gear. It is lighter and faster than the Model V of 1904 (my last car but one, and a very excellent affair.) This new car should be almost perfect of its kind, most durable (no wear on the meshed gear) and full of 'life.' For a one-cylinder small car there can be little doubt that the expanding clutch is enormously superior to the foot-pedal business with sliding gear; a crude device that, no doubt, will ultimately have to go in the case of all cars alike. It has been found that 100 mm. by 120 mm. is a particularly effective type of engine dimensions for the work wanted. Pending the evolution of the ideal four-cylinder small car (which I hope will be all-British) I feel safer on the 8 h.-p. De Dion, with which one can go anywhere with confidence."

De Dion-Bouton.

"All visitors to the De Dion Stand seemed to know the reputation of these cars, absolute reliability. A great deal of interest was taken in the new models, and for the man of moderate means the 8 h.-p. model is undoubtedly the car to consider. It is, curiously, a replica of the 1904 type. The expanding clutches are retained, the size of the wheels reduced, while the new contact breaker and other features of the 1905 models are added. The car can be had as a 3-seater or with a neat tonneau. It is admitted that De Dion-Bouton have constructed this model largely for the Colonial market, and it is a significant fact that so long ago as last August the Bombay Motor Car Company, who are the Indian Agents for De Dion, booked an order for a considerable number of these cars. The large radiator and water tank, the simplicity of drive and the general foul-proofness of these cars render them suitable for India."

SECONDED OFFICERS AND THE BURMA BATTALIONS POLO TOURNAMENT.

AT the recent Burma Battalions inter-regimental polo tournament, a full description of which will be found elsewhere in our columns, the most pronounced topic of discussion was, whether seconded officers should be eligible to play for their respective regiments, or whether they should be debarred from entry. The bone of contention proved to be one which produced many diversified opinions. Some members of the Burma Battalions Polo Association maintained that seconded officers should undoubtedly be given a footing, whilst others asserted that it should be confined entirely to those officers actually doing duty at the time with their regiments. The entries for the tournament produced five teams. Out of these Battalions the 93rd Burma Infantry possess no seconded officers, and in consequence the team was composed solely of officers with the regiment. Of the remaining four teams, the 72nd claimed the services of an officer in the Burma Military Police, whilst the 90th and 92nd were each playing one member from the Police and another who has obtained civil employ in the Burma Commission. The 1/10th Gurkhas have no polo-playing seconded officers, so their team also comprised a choice of those at Head-Quarters only. Those regiments that have no seconded officers on their books, we think quite justly, point out that those that have gain a distinct advantage, for nowadays the places of those seconded do not remain vacant, but are promptly filled up. As a result of this the regiments, some of the officers of which have found employment in outside billets, have a larger total from which to elect their teams. The arguments in favour of the admission of seconded officers in teams would seem to be that were such not eligible several regiments could not raise four players, and that in consequence the tournament, if not completely, would very nearly fall through.

Let us take a perspective of the situation. In the 90th to our certain knowledge there are several polo players, the 72nd could have easily substituted an officer in place of the seconded one whom they claimed from the Military Police. Of the 92nd we have no authentic facts. There can be no gainsaying the knowledge that had the 90th been obliged to exclude their two seconded officers they would not have won the tournament by a very large margin, and the 72nd would have been immeasurably weaker, but the question pro and con the discussion is certainly not whether regiments can put in strong combinations, but whether they will be able to compete at all. We have pretty conclusively demonstrated that as far as this recently contested fixture is concerned two out of the three battalions could have placed four players in the field without having to fall back on the services of those employed in perfectly separate departments. Let us examine the case of Military Police officers. Their tenure of office, and period of absence from military duty usually extends to five years and may be prolongated to seven. If such are allowed entry year after year, there is very little inducement held out for the younger generation to attempt to make themselves expert in the game, for their chances of ousting the seconded officer are very few.

Now from every point of view this state of affairs is most undesirable. If a regiment wants to excel in polo the junior officers must receive every encouragement to make the game a hobby, and to take it up in real earnest, instead of in a half-hearted, station-game, fashion. Regimental teams at polo have one great advantage, putting accidents on one side, the movements of every officer are known for a practical certainty for the ensuing twelve months. Is there any definite obstacle to prevent any one of the Burma Battalions deciding at this moment the composition of their team for the tournament in January 1908, taking care, of course, to embrace two substitutes. Let us imagine that there are two junior subalterns who are both anxious to represent their Battalion. If they were given to understand now that the downing in January next of the Regimental polo team colours depended entirely on the progress each individually made during the next nine months, we think that the keenness of competition would be engendered. Yet it so happened this year that within 48 hours of the first match a telegram had to be despatched to Simla to ascertain whether an officer was eligible to play or otherwise! That a Regiment had not decided within a couple of days of an important tournament the composition of its team would seem incredible, yet this statement is correct. Furthermore is there any tangible reason to prevent a regimental team, provided it is restricted to officers serving with the regiment, from playing together regularly. The Battalion that furnishes the detachment in the Andaman Islands, of course, labours under a disadvantage in this respect, but our argument holds good as far as the other regiments are concerned. We feel sure that Honorary Secretaries of Station Polo Clubs in places where Burma Battalions are located would have no objection to providing such teams with one chukker together, and we are equally certain that the majority of the other players would also welcome this introduction. The game against a team or with a team is of far more interest to all concerned than the hazardous scramble for possession of the ball, the subsequent leech-like voracity with which the player sticks to it regardless of all combination, and the final belt into space, when an opponent is approaching, without the slightest heed as to the locality of the goal-posts. This is too well-known a feature of station polo to require description. The Captain of the regimental team would have, if the course we suggest were adopted, ample opportunity of coaching the other members, provided, of course, he is capable of doing so and of studying their play. He could point out errors in judgment and faulty strokes. Moreover, instruction coming from that direction would be much more readily digested, remembered and acted upon, than words, perhaps heated, and let slip during the excitement of the moment, by some player wholly unconnected with the regiment.

The difficulty expressed that if seconded officers are excluded from competition several teams would fall through is in our opinion not an insurmountable obstacle. If it were proved to the satisfaction of the Committee of the Burma Battalions Polo Association that it was quite impossible, without the aid of a seconded officer for a regiment to raise a team of any description, then that officer mi ht be permitted to play, but this concession would only have to be allowed after the fullest enquiry.

At a general meeting a question of such vital importance leads to much talk, and we all know that on such occasions much talk leads as a rule to nothing except perhaps to unpleasantnesses. We would therefore take this opportunity of opening our columns to those of our readers who are interested in this controversy. In this manner we hope that suggestions and arguments that have not yet been formulated may be given expression to and that the opinions set forth through the medium of our columns may lead to a satisfactory solution of this somewhat knotty problem.

THE B. P. A. A. SPORTS.

THE attention of athletes all over India is drawn to the announcement made by the Honorary Secretary of the Bengal Presidency Amateur Athletic Association, especially with reference to the closing date of entries for their forthcoming championship meeting—this year the closing date is fixed for Wednesday, the 20th February.

This meeting, now in its fifteenth year, is far and away the most important athletic gathering in India, and it is pleasant to reflect that the efforts of the executive continue to meet with a yearly response which cannot but advance the excellent objects for which the Association exists. No less than seven championship shields are offered.

1. The Sir George White Shield for the British Army.
2. The Sir Allan Arthur Shield for the Native Army.
3. The Apcar Shield for the British Army Tug-of-War.
4. The Macleod Amateur Hundred Yards Shield.
5. The Indian Field amateur quarter mile Shield.
6. The Schools' Challenge Shield.
7. The Quadrant Company's Shield for the 3 miles Army Bicycle Championship.

Besides the above, a sum of nearly Rs. 5,000 is allotted for handsome prizes and medals, and money is lavishly spent in making the meeting worthy of the position it holds, the executive wisely considering that the encouragement of sport should take precedence of the accumulation of funds.

We are in a position to say that entries are coming in steadily, and from distant parts of the country; but it is as well to be in good time, hence this reminder regarding the closing date. The Eden-Garden ground by the courtesy of the Calcutta C. C., is now available for training. Monday, the 4th. Competitors should note that they must not use the track before practice at the nets is over, and they must not repay the C. C. C.'s hospitality by walking or running over the cricket pitch.

Sporting Notes.

THE Civil Service Cup has again been lost and won. Lorette started at fifteens as the public followed the lead of the Galstaun and Dehra Dun stables in backing Circus Girl and Wal while another contingent went for the handsome Matin Bell. Lorette pulled off the good thing for the layers of odds by a short head while Robinson on Circus Girl could barely struggle home in front of the Cooch Behar pony, the verdict being a neck between second and third. Fraser, who rode the winner, had an afternoon out, scoring three times in all.

On the first day Robinson and Baichan notched a couple of winners apiece, but the event of the day was the collapse of Coin II. who was backed at 2 to 1 on in anticipation of another victory in the Cup.

The jump races fell to three horses well known at Tollygunge, Daphne, Wales, and Look Out; the last-named was reported very severely injured after his fall at the drop fence in the National, but he has recovered in time to recompense Mr. Charrington for his shaking and to give his owner one of those wins which have been going in his direction very frequently of late.

The original scheme for the new stands and paddocks on the Calcutta course will probably be carried out with very few alterations, the experience of the past season having more or less confirmed the ideas of the architects. When the third and middle stand is completed, the present club stand will be reserved throughout. If the newly proposed rules regarding "Stand Members" go through as anticipated, the club stand will still be well filled and a great deal of dissatisfaction done away with among that large circle of Calcutta race-goers who feel keenly their exclusion from the "front seats" while realizing that they are scarcely justified in asking for all the rights and powers of voting which belong to full members of an influential Racing Club.

As usual, at the end of the season, there are plenty of likely horses for sale in Calcutta, and with the heavy list of prize-money nowadays issued for the Monsoon Meetings, there should be buyers for anything that has shown good form during the cold weather. Lord Boyne, Trenayr, and Mallinyook are advertised while Mr. Bell has a very promising lot at Garden Reach; Botha, Bell Dhu, Dramatic, and Mount Dare amongst others. In the hunter class Mr. Pugh has two very nice mares in Manon and the pony Mistlebird which may be in the market as he is going home in March.

The entries for the Calcutta Extra Meeting on Saturday are quite satisfactory. The Lansdowne Plate has drawn twenty-six, of which Annamulloch is about the best performer, while there are eighteen in the six furlong Outram Plate, and eleven in the one mile and a quarter race, including Mr. S. Margrett's Spero. For the Hunters' races a fine entry of thirteen has been beaten up in each class, but a number of names look as if they had been given more for the entertainment of the handicapper than for real business.

Lord Harry's weight must, of course, be very crushing, and he will probably be reserved for his big engagement, a month hence, in the Paperchase Cup, for which he should be a very hot favourite. Of the others Tiritiri has great ancestry, and Trilby is said to be very speedy, but neither are in strong enough training to seem dangerous. Fred is a handsome little horse and in clever company, and may run well, but neither Fusilier nor Orphan Boy seem to have recovered their hard work in the Monsoons. Queen of Hearts, if nicely weighted, should carry plenty of money in this race.

The ponies are a very level lot with the exception of Branga and Mistlebird. Goodchap has been laid up since his fall at Tollygunge, but Zigzag is very hard and well. A very good-looking one in this party is The Result in Mr. Deakin's stable but the touts will know more about all these amateur race-horses than the majority of their owners before the winding-up gallops are half over. It is a good plan to back the favourites in these hunter races.

The first, and let us trust the last, serious accident of the paperchasing season befell Mr. Archy Birkmyre last Saturday morning, and he has suffered a great deal of pain and discomfort from the broken collarbone and bad bruises he sustained. His fine English hunter, Lady Fox, made a bad mistake, as the best of jumpers will sometimes, at the first hurdle, and turned completely over.

This fence, for no apparent reason, proved very disastrous, and it was here that Mr. Bell-Irving came to grief in the pony chase. When a good jumper falls, the owner and onlookers always try to find some excuse for his mistake and draw attention to difficulties, light, shadow, etc., which would never have occurred to them under happier circumstances. Such falls are really quite unaccountable just as it is impossible to give a logical reason for 90 per cent of the falls in a two-day steeplechase meeting occurring on one or other of the two days.

The Native Cavalry Polo Tournament, at Umballa, begins on Saturday.

The Lucknow Spring Polo Pony Fair will be held from the 18th to the 25th instant.

We have to thank Messrs. Samuel Fitze and Co., Ld., the Agents for Messrs. Mackie and Co., the big distillers of "White Horse Cellar" and other famous whiskies, for two very neat and useful pocket diaries for this year.

There is an excellent entry of sixty-five for the Grand National Steeplechase, now increased in value to three thousand pounds, and, as might have been expected, the unbeaten steeplechaser Hack Watch is engaged and will be very difficult to handicap out of the race. Two previous winners, Mr. Morrison's Drumcree and Prince Hatzfeldt's Ascetic's Silver, are also nominated, and the King can be represented by Flaxmon, who was a good horse once, but of whom nothing has been seen for two years. The favourite last year, John M.P., is again entered, but is no more likely to stay the course than he did then; among the other entries are Mr. Hannam's Cinders, who has been running so well this winter, Seisdon Prince, and the three which finished second, third, and fourth to Ascetic's Silver a year ago.

One of the most tragic and adventurous of the incidents of the late great storm in Scotland was the death of two gillies on the island of Pabba, off the outer coast of Harris. The two men put out on Christmas Day in a small boat, and owing to the terrible weather were taken out of their course, and eventually landed on this small island. For days their smoke signals were seen, but the rough state of the sea made it impossible to communicate with them; and when more than a week later, it was at last possible to reach the island, both men were found to have perished of exposure. A generation ago Pabba was inhabited by fisher families and used sometimes to be made the starting-point of a voyage to St. Kilda by adventurous tourists; but it has since become a typical "desert island" of the Atlantic, and no place for winter castaways.

It is a very obvious conclusion that when one is riding in an open-air vehicle smoking is not nearly so enjoyable as when indulged in under ordinary conditions writes The Field. It is very difficult to make a cigar burn evenly and steadily in a motor-car, as often the draught will catch it more on one side than another, while, too, the sense of taste seems somewhat impaired, because the smoker draws harder than usual in the attempt to keep it alight. The cigarette is generally quite useless for smoking in such a case at a fair speed, as it is blown right out of the smoker's mouth, sometimes tearing the skin of his lips in its hurried departure, while the ash from it is blown backwards into his face or those of the passengers behind him. For this reason the attention and ingenuity of many have been directed towards a solution of this problem, so that, by means of a shield or some similar device, the pipe or cigar may be smoked at a normal rate and with as much comfort and enjoyment as at any other time. Owing to the wind pressure causing most smokers to draw harder, an evil has crept in here. As a rule, medical men are agreed that it is less harmful to smoke a good deal in the open air than indoors, yet, on the other hand, as the cigar or pipe lasts a shorter time on a car, it generally follows that more tobacco is smoked in a given period when motoring than at any other time. There are some who prefer not to smoke at all in an open motor vehicle, maintaining that they cannot get sufficient enjoyment out of the practice under these conditions. A medical man has just been experimenting in this connection, and found that the effect of tobacco in an appreciable quantity was to accelerate the action of the heart. In moderation this is harmless, but even then there are few smokers who realise what the exact effect is. One cigar was smoked after dinner when the heart was beating at 82 per minute. The cigar lasted forty minutes, after which the pulse was again tested, and the rate per minute was 120, an increase of thirty-eight beats in the minute. Next evening, when the heart was beating normally again, a run was taken on a fast open motor-car, and the experimenter sat on the front seat by the driver. He smoked again for forty minutes, in which time he had consumed two cigars and a third part of another. On testing the heart a further acceleration of fifteen beats per minute was noticed, while there was apparent a slight irregularity as well, and in addition the state of mind was not nearly so restful nor the sense of enjoyment so strong. Another case, which occupied four weeks in the experiment, showed, after continuous daily smoking while motoring for this period, such a bad effect as to necessitate complete abstention from this practice for a period of three months. It is always advisable, therefore, to smoke as little as posssble under these circumstances; otherwise the undoubted benefits derived from motoring will be annulled and the car erroneously blamed.

Messrs. Steuart and Co., the well known and old established carriage builders of this city, have just been favoured with the appointment of carriage manufacturers to H. R. H. the Prince of Wales. Messrs. Steuart and Co. built all the carriages used by their Royal Highness and Staff during the Indian tour last year. We congratulate our friends on this latest addition to a very long list of successes.

The prospectus of the Lahore Spring Meeting is published in our issue of date.

The advertisement in our Sporting Columns regarding the sport and gay doings to be held concurrently with the Jorhat Race Meeting will interest a good many of our readers.

Judging by ancient chronicles, England was a most wonderful game preserve some hundreds of years ago. Here is an account of an archiepiscopal banquet described by Father Fuller in his "Church History." George Nevill, brother of the great Earl of Warwick, was being installed into the Archbishopric of York, and, in accordance with the practice of the times, gave a big feast to all the nobility and many of the principal clergy and big landowners. At this prodigious banquet there were provided three hundred quarters of wheat, three hundred and thirty tons of ale, one hundred and four tons of wine, one pipe of spiced wine, eighty fat oxen, six wild bulls, one thousand and four wethers, three hundred calves, three thousand geese, three thousand capons, three hundred pigs, one hundred peacocks, two hundred cranes, two hundred kids, two thousand chickens, four thousand pigeons, four thousand rabbits, two hundred and four bitterns, four thousand ducks, two hundred pheasants, five hundred partridges, four thousand woodcocks, four hundred plovers, one hundred curlews, one hundred quails, one thousand egrets, two hundred roes, above four hundred bucks, does, and roebucks, one thousand five hundred and six hot venison pasties, four thousand cold venison pasties, one thousand dishes of jelly parted, four thousand dishes of plain jelly, four thousand cold custards, two thousand hot custards, three hundred pike, three hundred bream, eight seals, four porpoises, and four hundred tarts. At this feast the Earl of Warwick was steward, the Earl of Bedford treasurer, the Lord of Hastings controller, with many more noble officers; servitors, one thousand; cooks, sixty-two; kitcheners, five hundred and fifteen. Just imagine what this meant in those far-away times, when no game was shot with a gun, but had to be secured by crossbows, longbows, nets, springes, and trapping. Glance at the items, "Two hundred and four bitterns, four thousand woodcocks, one thousand egrets, three hundred pike." Bear in mind all this stock of game had to be caught within a few days, and it was bound to be got locally, as there was no rapid delivery nor any cold stores in those days. Game must have abounded and fish and fowl were ready for any man's hand.

The Rawalpindi Dog Show is fixed for the 20th March and, at present, Captain Martin, the well-known Scottish terrier exhibitor, is at the helm.

Chamois hunting in the Alps and Pyrenees, except to the favoured few, is all but a thing of the past. In places where little bands of ten or fifteen head of this European mountain antelope were formerly to be found, it is impossible at the present time to come across one. Yet when we go to Switzerland we can still buy various fancy articles made of chamois horns as souvenirs of the Alpine village where we have been passing some happy weeks. A Swiss correspondent has explained this seeming anomaly by stating that in most cases the chamois horn of commerce never grew on the chamoi's head, but was manufactured on the turner's lathe to meet a continual demand. The chamois, or isard, as it is called in the Pyrenees, is the only native antelope of Western Europe; in addition to the above mountains, it is found also in the mountains of the Abruzzi, in Greece, in the Carpathians, and in the Caucasus. About the size of an ordinary goat, it is covered with long grey hair, the shade of which varies with the season of the year; its head and neck are of a much lighter colour, the face being white. It makes its home on the confines of perpetual snow—never deeming itself safe nearer the abodes of man—whence it descends during the day to the pine woods and more open grounds to browse on the young shoots of the firs, on Alpine roses, and other mountain plants. In winter-time it feeds on mosses and lichens. During the greater part of the year the males live solitary lives, and it is only in autumn that they join the herds of females and young ones. Once collected together they become very pugnacious, often joining in deadly combat with a rival on the very brink of a precipice, the vanquished frequently being hurled head-long to destruction. Then for a short period each couple separates from the others, but by Christmas the females once more collect together, leaving their partners to solitary bliss. The young are born in April or May. Chamounix was formerly one of the great centres for chamois hunting, and Saussure, the writer, tells us that so ardently were the men of the district attached to this kind of sport, notwithstanding its perilous nature, that it was no uncommon thing in families for all the men to lose their lives while in pursuit of this quarry. He relates that one hunter assured him that both his father and grandfather had met their doom in this manner, and such was the fascination of the difficulties and dangers involved by following the game to the most inaccessible mountain fastnesses, that he had but little doubt he would perish in like manner—a prophecy a year or two later fulfilled to the letter.

In connection with what we have written and quoted, the views of the Kynoch Journal on the recent prohibition of certain arms into India will be interesting to all who are affected thereby: we reproduce the remarks of our contemporary in our Shooting Columns.

The amount received at the entrance gates to the Calcutta race course on Saturday, 26th January, was Rs. 7,975-12-0; this comfortable sum the Calcutta Turf Club very generously handed over to Her Excellency Lady Minto as a donation towards the funds of the fête.

Englishmen pride themselves, and generally with some reason, on their humanity towards animals, remarks a London paper, but there is little sign of any such national trait in the traffic in worn-out and miserable horses, which are exported from London, Hull, and other ports to be sold as food in Belgium. The repulsive scenes when these wretched animals are landed on the quays at Antwerp in a half-dead state have again lately called forth protest and appeals from Englishmen in that city. There is no doubt that the traffic is one of which the English people ought to be by no means less ashamed because its worst features are seen beyond our own borders. It is impossible for foreigners to be much impressed with the sincerity of the English efforts to found societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals in their midst, when every week England inflicts on its worn-out horses the final misery of a North Sea passage and a death in a foreign knacker's yard!

Signs of the big meeting are making themselves very evident, writes our Bombay correspondent, and on Saturday, with those who have arrived from Calcutta, the Paddock looked quite busy. Watson was first to come with the Hon'ble Mr. Apcar's string and it is with great satisfaction we note the entry of the Viceroy's Cup winner. Ferguson, with Mr. Galstaun's string, has brought the promising jockey, his son, who had several mounts during the day. Taylor has come with Messrs. Dartmoor and De Soysa's, and Bleach has all his charges including his own Clear Artist who, however, is suffering from the injury to his hock he suffered in the Cup race.

Two new lads have arrived from Australia whose names should be well known, J. Trenoweth and W. H. Ross, the former from the Hon'ble Mr. Saunders' stable and the latter Mr. Scobie's. They were both riding on Saturday and others down from your parts were Melsom and Vining.

Lucky Shot, who gave way to Caroon in the Stable fancy last week, scored a very easy win in the first of the Beginners' Consolation Plates and was followed by Sirree who still fails to stay. Liberal continues to disappoint after being all the rage when the new ponies were first spoken of. The second saw Salanic win very comfortably at nice odds, Rackhan, who does not like the bend at all, was made a warm favourite, but at no part of the journey did he flatter. Mirdas at the bend dashed right out on to the tan where Vining got him going and, had he kept to the course, would have troubled the winner.

The Bandora Plate left punters in doubt about Mudlool, Ashroff, and Vedas, the first two eventually going out favourites at 5 to 2. Whether the stable were trying something new with Vedas or whether the others hung on to him I do not know but it was a furlong before he took the lead and then only by a length. At the bend Ashroff caught him, going very easy followed by Mudlool and the finish was a farce. Ames eased Vedas though I doubt if he could have beaten Osborne. It strikes me that those seven furlong trials have taken a bit of the brilliancy out of him.

The nine furlong Andheri Plate was a game run by Eed on whom Heeroo rode a very nice race. He came up to Bandit, who had led till then nicely within himself, at the distance and soon had him beat to the satisfaction of onlookers. There was a run on Ajax in the ring and had he come earlier he would certainly have secured a place, gamely as Mukhool stuck it out.

Though only just arrived from Calcutta, Presbyterian looked in fine trim and was steadily backed whenever anything over evens was offered. A great rush came on Vocalist but he could not shake the confidence on the chestnut. He made the running to the bend where the race was the favourite's. On rounding Vocalist went wide and Ames like a flash jumped in on the rails on Balayeuse and Presbyterian came across on to the rails. Vocalist bumped Balayeuse badly, the mare, however, soon got going again and staved off Harpist's late run. Many expected an objection and Vining came in for some examination but Ames declared the cross to have been at a distance of quite two lengths.

Running into a good fourth coming late last week Kalee Charan, with Melsom up, won the New Comers' Consolation in a common canter. Krushan and Maftakhar were backed on reported gallops, the latter ran nowhere but the former who was favourite was well up till the distance told on him. For the Vehar Plate, Plassey was well backed and had Gaucho and the rest beat at the bend though Heeroo used the whip from there onwards. Zurriff, after a sharp burst at the start, came again gamely and justified place support.

The last race, the third of the Beginners' Consolations, was an upset, the favourite, Toy, never showing up.

The Bombay Gymkhana cricketers had another very easy win on their ground against the R. I. M. Dockyard. Going in first the Dockyard found Coombs troublesome and were all dismissed for 170. Commander Wilson played a good innings of 31, Kapadia 25, Dandekar 22, Hallett 15, and Janardon 12. Coombs took 5 wickets for 40, Stileman 2 for 57.

On the Gymkhana going in Major Wigram gave a grand display of sound and free cricket, hitting all over the field and when stumps were drawn had completed his century, 105. Cecil Burns was first in and put up 38, the first wicket falling for 85. Monteath followed and after a pretty knock of 28 the opposing total was passed 189 for one wicket and left the Gymkhana handsome winners by nine wickets.

The Bombay Hounds on the 27th had a long run with a satisfactory ending. A good field met them at Parla. Hunting fast to Sahar and across the Andheri Road and after a check, to the Marole caves. Here they went through some thick jungle but hounds were not to be put off and after going over the hill pulled him down in the open in full view after an excellent run.

On the 31st Hounds met at Santa Cruz and after two very fast runs, effected two kills. First a jack was put up that made straight across the Andheri Road and towards the Pipe but after a run in the open was brought down. Another was put up by the Pipe and over some tricky ground doubled back to the original meeting place. Had the pack not been so close on him, he would probably have crossed the line but they rolled him over as he turned.

With the conclusion of the Handicap at Pyrke's Billiard Saloon which was won by Mr. Johnson (+30) from Mr. Asper (+30) by 50 in the game of 250 up, the Amateur Championship comes up for consultation. The winner will have to play Mr. Pyrke for the Cup and the drawings for the first round which has to be played off by the 14th instant are as follows:—

Mr. Sawle, Bye, Mr. Murray vs. Mr. Edmonds, Mr. Hargreaves vs. Mr. Gray, Mr. Meyer vs. Mr. Binning, Mr. Louth vs. Mr. Muir, Mr. P. Fisher, Bye, Mr. Carnall vs. Mr. Avery.

I learn with regret that, owing to a sad bereavement, Mr. Meyer will scratch.

The proposal to have a fourth day's racing at Lucknow has fallen through for lack of sufficient support.

Athletic Notes.

THE Poona Boxing Tournament will be held between the 22nd and 27th April and Captain H. K. Umfreville is Honorary Secretary. Last year's programme will be followed in most respects; but there is to be a special attraction in the shape of the competition for the heavy weight championship of India which has remained undecided since the departure for fresh fields of that persistent person "Tiger" Smith whose clamorous attempts to get on a match with Moir have lately been causing amusement in English boxing circles.

The late Mr. William Whiteley made many large bequests for all sorts of good purposes, among them £5,000 for the promotion of football, cricket, rowing, and swimming;—a generous and useful bequest indeed.

At the annual general meeting of the Calcutta Rowing Club the following officials were elected for the current year:—President—Mr. F. G. Dumayne; Vice-President—Mr. C. W. N. Graham; Captain—Mr. F. E. H. Power; Honorary Secretary and Treasurer—Mr. W. S. Burke; Committee—Messrs. J. A. Tassie, J. M. LeCocq, C. W. H. Taylor and A. P. Cameron.

The annual Athletic Sports of the United Club, Howrah, take place on Saturday, 16th instant, entries closing on the 9th. Our sympathy and admiration we respectfully tender to Mr. G. Ribbins—he continues to be Honorary Secretary.

One of the biggest treats for us personally at the Minto Fête was the tug-of-war final between the Wiltshires and the "gay Gordons." It was a real good pull, though as an old tug-of-warsman we were confident of the issue from the moment they took the strain: the Wiltshires pulled in better style and got much more back work on the rope and, maintaining their form to the end, won handsomely after a pull of nearly 5 minutes. As the holders of the Apcar Challenge Shield they will put in appearance at the forthcoming meeting of the Bengal Presidency Amateur Athletic Association and will, doubtless, render a good account of themselves: other teams so far entered are the gunners from Rawalpindi and the "Fighting Fifth" now in Fort William. Half a dozen entries are expected.

The following were the awards in the Minto Show Motor Exhibition:—

In the Minto Fête Football Tournament last week the Royal Scots beat the East Surreys by 4 goals to 2. There was a miserable attendance to look on at what was quite a good game. The Manchesters defeated the Glosters by 2 goals to nil.

The semi-final match in the Minto Fête Football Tournament between the Royal Scots and the Manchesters was played before the biggest crowed that has yet assembled on the Dalhousie ground during the fête. It was a tough struggle from end to end, the Royal Scots just winning by a goal to nil.

It will probably be of interest to cricketers who know how the game is ordinarily played in South Africa to learn that the South African Cricket Association has decided to raise the height of the stumps by a quarter of an inch. Hitherto the wickets have been 27 inches out of the ground, and the bails had not to project more than one inch above them. "Umpire," the cricket critic of the Natal Mercury, points out that bowlers had not had 27½ inches of wicket to bowl at, as the surface of the matting had been quite a quarter of an inch above the foot of the stumps.

Concerning Indian cricket, Lord Harris remarked in a recent interview to a home paper :—"It has improved, undoubtedly, since I was out there. It has been taken up far more in schools and colleges than it was ten or fifteen years ago, for it is now generally recognised that it is better for boys in their leisure to be in evidence, as in cricket, than idling or mis-spending their time. Indians have a good eye and rather long arms, but do not possess the patience and resolution of the Anglo-Saxon. They are very easily excited, and what always militates against sending their best team over here is caste custom, caste prejudice, and racial prejudice."

A general meeting of the representatives of Clubs affiliated to the Indian Football Association will be held to-day at 7 P.M., at the Y.M.C.A. Hall, 25, Chowringhee, to elect the office-bearers of the above Association.

The final tie for the Madras Rugby Cup, which had ended in a drawn game between the Calcutta F.C. and West Ridings Regiment last September, was replayed on the Minto Fete Football ground on Tuesday evening. It was a well contested match but the soldiers were superior on the day's play and scored a win by 12 points to 3. They attacked all through the first half. Morris dropped a splendid goal and McCormick got over with a try which Hylands converted. Calcutta improved when they changed ends and had as much of the play as their opponents. Harty crossed the line with Calcutta's only try, Arthur just failing to convert. But before the whistle for "no side" Lieutenant Liddle got over for the Dukes, the attempt to majorise failing. The West Ridings thus won by 2 goals (1 dropped) and 1 try to 1 try.

London Week by Week.

Friday, 18th January 1907.

HIS MAJESTY has notified his intention of opening Parliament in person, the Queen also taking part in the function. The King has also promised to open the New Bailey Courts as soon as they are ready : the speech for the occasion would, I imagine, tax even the resourceful tact of the first Diplomatist. His Majesty presided on Saturday at the Duke of Abruzzi's lecture describing the ascent of Ruwenzori : the occasion was too great for the theatre of the Geographical Society and not great enough to require the Albert Hall : the result was that Queen's Hall was rather inconveniently crowded —either to hear a remarkably interesting and well delivered account of an hazardous enterprise or because this was the first occasion on which the King has been present at a meeting of the Geographical since his accession.

Without doubt you know as much about the Jamaica earthquake as we do and probably have been spared the sensational and contradictory reports which have flooded the papers the last few days. Mr. Henniker Heaton's long message to the Times this morning gives the reliable account of one eyewitness ; but it cannot be possible yet to take stock of the situation generally and give even an approximate estimate of the loss of life and damage done. No two telegrams give the same account, which is only to be expected. The only thing that is clear is that help is needed, and by result a Mansion House Fund has been opened, the King, Queen and Prince of Wales leading the way with even more than their usual liberality.

Mr. Haldane's new plan of Army Organisation was given to the world on Monday. Soldiers generally appear to think well of it, holding the method of grouping by Divisions more suitable and handier than the Army Corps arrangement. Those who know detect in the new arrangement the hands of General Douglas Haig. It is admitted that the new organisation is only a framework. The Secretary for War has yet to reveal to us the sources whence he proposes to obtain the men for his purpose, and his guarded utterances at volunteer functions have only served to stimulate curiosity concerning his intentions with reference to the auxiliary forces. We know the volunteers are to be asked "to accept higher training," but no more. The idea among soldiers is that the auxiliary forces will be utilised on lines of communication, the regulars doing the work in front : and though soldiers approve this as a general scheme, how, the mere looker-on enquires, will the volunteer regard the prospect ? The patriotic volunteer who seeks active service wants to see the fun. I mean wants to use his rifle in defence of King and country—and duty on lines of communication is apt to be dull. We cannot hope to have always an obliging foe like the Boer who made a point of giving the troops on lines of communication frequent fun for their money. I would volunteer with enthusiasm for the fighting line ; but if I were to see the fun only per telegram—I would as soon stay at home and do it.

With the advent of Mr. Haldane's new grouping plan—the soldiers decline to call it an "Army Scheme," appears the new National Defence Association with a number of distinguished names on its committee. The N. D. A.'s programme is at once modest and ambitious : modest because it does not aim too high, ambitious because it aims at the exceedingly desirable but not probable. Here is its programme :—

The objects of the association are :—(a) To assist, by the action of its members, in the maintenance and co-ordination of the land forces adequate to the needs of the Empire. (b) To support such expenditure upon the land forces as the security of the Empire necessitates. (c) To promote continuity in our military policy, and to assist in removing military questions from the arena of party politics.

Object (c) is the one that impresses me as ambitious. If it could only be achieved ! But then how many, many are the great subjects which should be rescued from that same arena of wilful distortion, cant and folly.

Dr. Haig Brown, of Charterhouse, was one of the great headmasters of his time, and deserves all the eulogia that have been poured out upon his grave. One never knew a Carthusian, young or old, who spoke otherwise than with respect of Dr. Haig Brown : small boys held him in wholesome awe ; big ones in respectful admiration ; old boys in the esteem and affection which comes of mental vision sharpened by contact with the world. He never appeared to greater advantage than when fighting the battle of removal from the purlieus of Smithfield to Godalming : with sincere veneration for old traditions he was far too wise to make them paramount in so momentous a matter : and he worked for the removal as earnestly as though he would turn his back on the old place without a pang. His death at the old Charterhouse was thus curiously—almost dramatically—appropriate.

Inasmuch as the Sovereign sent to their relatives the Victoria Cross which would have been awarded men killed in performing acts of valour during the last South African War, it is only consistent that the Crosses won by men who did not survive to wear them in former wars, should be sent to their relatives. big crop of first fruits, as the Times remarks in the opening lines of a column-long leader : indeed the old-fashioned Times reader asks himself if the occasion is one that requires a leader. If the movement spreads it should check the over-production of indifferent novels, but I do not know whether this would be a national benefit : compositors and binders would not think so, and they are really the people most interested. By the way, have you read "Signs of the Times or the Hustler's Almanac for 1907," by the authors of "Wisdom While You Wait"? If not, do so : it is every whit as clever and humorous as their first venture.

The New Workmen's Compensation Act, providing as it does that employers are liable for the consequences of accidents to domestic servants, is giving masters and mistresses, especially mistresses, furiously to think. The Insurance Companies have risen to the occasion, and before the Act comes into force on 1st July next, every one will be able to insure servants against accident, fatal or insignificant, for a nominal sum. Servant insurance is a business which must be conducted with a good deal of elasticity when people are often obliged to change maids about once a quarter, if not oftener. An active and discerning Agent informs me that his company will get over the difficulty by issuing policies for so many servants, without regard to name, until an accident occurs when the name will be recorded : a very necessary precaution against blackmailers.

"Lady Huntworth's Experiment" has been very successfully revived at the Haymarket. It is admirably played with Miss Compton in the name part, Mr. Charles Hawkey as Captain Dorvaston, Mr. Weedon Grossmith as Mr. Crayll and Miss Polly Emery as Keziah. Mr. Fred Lewis took the part of the vicar at short notice, Mr. Henry Kemble being ill, and gave a capital reading of the unctuous parson through whose clerical manner human nature now and then appears. I do not know that I like Mr. Grossmith's Crayll (otherwise Lord Huntworth) as well as I did Mr. Dion Boucicault's : Mr. Grossmith makes him at once repulsive and grotesque. Mr. Boucicault gave him—what I take it he would have—something of the air of a man decently well bred.

"Her Grace the Reformer," a curtain-raiser by Mrs. De la Pasture is a bit thin, and has too much of the knock-about farce to suit the tastes of some of us. The Duchess of Berlescombe is surprised at night by a burglar who proposes to give practical application to her grace's platform principles by helping himself to her jewelry. He is collared by the Duchess's secretary, but escapes leaving the secretary to be arrested by a preposterous groom of the chambers, though these two half an hour (stage time) before had been members of the audience of five compelled to listen while the Duchess rehearsed her speech for to-morrow. A weak play and not very well acted, but the gallery was immensely pleased with it.

There is a boom in Zancigery. Maskelyne and Devant have introduced a clever thought transference turn, and the Nassaus at the Oxford Music Hall have also one which they call "mental telegraphy." The pièce de resistance at the Maskelyne show is a player called the "Magician's Heart" which is certainly one of the most baffling illusory performances I have ever seen. The beautiful princess is turned into a very ugly young woman and the magician, in full glare of the lights, suddenly restores her beauty. Another mysterious bit of necromancy occurs when a girl comes bothering the magician : he waves her away and she vanishes : vanishes while in our full view, close to the footlights and with no possible place of hiding near. It is a very uncanny performance.

Much more impressive than the Maskelyne or Nassau "thought transference" turns, is the performance of "Svengali and Trilby," at the Hippodrome. They do not resemble du Maurier's characters, but their performance is very stimulating to the enquiring mind. Trilby presides at the piano on the stage and Svengali moves about among the audience. Anyone who likes whispers to him or gives him in writing the name of some opera, operetta or song, and Svengali, speaking no word one can hear, Trilby instantly plays a few bars from a song in the opera, or the song named singing in the language of the original. Old operas or new, Italian, German or English, grand or comic, did not matter : Trilby was equal to every occasion. So impressed was a man in the audience on the first night that he got up and offered £100 to any hospital if the Zancigs round the corner at the Alhambra could achieve the same feats. Meantime the Zancigs pursue their way. Suspicion attaching to the white coat Mr. Zancig used to wear he now appears in an ordinary black one : a few evenings ago some sceptic raised a question concerning Mrs. Zancig's glasses and was promptly floored by the performer's ready acceptance of the pair of blue goggles that sceptic had brought with him. People who have yielded to the Zancig spell show much ingenuity in providing unexpected objects : on Tuesday a man created more sensation among his neighbours than difficulty for the Zancigs by producing a small living snake. The most remarkable feat was Mrs. Zancig's prompt and correct repetition of a paragraph chosen at random from the pages of a novel by a member of the audience. This puts the "time signal" explanation quite out of court.

Profitting by the example of the Kopoenick cobbler, Private Morgan of the Welch Fusiliers has been trying how far an enterprising Tommy can carry the rôle of an officer. When he went on furlough about Christmas time Morgan, who was an officer's servant, took his master's uniform, or so much of it as he required, and went to Stafford where he enjoyed himself after his own fashion ; which was to parade the town in uniform and pitch into any private whose appearance did not come up to his high ideal of smartness. He seems to have made himself a terror to slovenly Tommies for a while, but carrying the game too far was found out : and now this ambitious soldier-servant has to answer for "conduct prejudicial, etc.," and with being in possession of his master's uniform.

Messrs. Kynock, the Birmingham ammunition manufacturers, announce the adoption of the metric system in their offices, the accepted English notation of money, weights and measures being retained for inter-communication with other firms. It will be interesting to know. how the novelty works out in practice : considerable saving of clerical labour is anticipated.

The Darracq Motor Company has accepted an order for 4,000 motor-cabs to be placed on the London streets ; and the first batch will appear very soon. The hackney motor-cab-man should thus be brought to his bearings in the matter of fares : you can rarely induce a motor-cab to leave the stand without a promise of much more than the statutory shilling. It may be that it is this new invasion which has induced the ordinary cabby to revise his views of the taxameter.

THE ROYAL TOUR.*

A VERY interesting and delightful souvenir of the Royal Tour in India will be found in the pages of the handsome volume, profusely illustrated, published by the proprietors of the Times of India. The preface is written in the kindliest spirit by Sir Walter Lawrence, Bart., G. C. I. E., Chief of the Staff, and that experienced and popular journalist Mr. Stanley Reed, special correspondent of the Times of India, is responsible for the letter press. Than these gentlemen none are more qualified to write, intimately associated as they were with the Royal progress, from the first moment that the Renown arrived in Bombay Harbour to the last when the same vessel cast off from her moorings at Karachi, and their Royal Highnesses said good-bye to India. Throughout the exhaustive record of over five hundred pages, which include appendices and the Prince's shooting record, the details of the tour are given in the simplest directest way. There is no striving after effect, no highly coloured pictures, and yet the touch is no unsympathetic one, for the Royal couple—judging by this record—possess to perfection that happy gift with which the English nation may flatter itself the present reigning family are all blessed, of bringing their Staff thoroughly en rapport with themselves and their interest. The book is delicated by permission to their Royal Highnesses, and no doubt the special beautiful edition de luxe they were graciously pleased to except will hold a precious place amongst many other valuable souvenirs of a happy time fraught with pleasure to themselves and blessing to others. It opens with two remarkably good likenesses of the Prince and Princess, beautifully toned, on art paper, and the get up, printing, binding, etc., are all that can be desired. The only defect that strikes us, is perhaps an unavoidable one in this country, where we are unable to compete with the promptitude and despatch that characterises the production of books of this kind at home. We refer to the fact that the volume lies before us for review nearly a year after the completion of the tour. It will, however, be none the less an exceptable gift to friends at home—more specially to those who know their India, and can appreciate the skilful effort Mr. Reed has made to get below the surface of things, and an interesting souvenir to residents out here, while as a record for the future, should other Royal Tours be planned hereafter, it must prove an invaluable guide.

A BEAR CHARGE.

THE fact that some sportsmen have stated that a bear does not charge when wounded, has induced me to record the following account of the experience I for one have had of a charge which might have ended a good deal worse than it did.

It was in the month of August, and some four marches into the heart of the Himalayas from the nearest hill station, that the incident took place. I was in charge of some extensive timber felling work at the time, having quite a respectable colony of sawyers and carriers under me to keep in order, and look after. In me were combined the duties of judge, surgeon, physician, and superintendent ; and in addition to these duties it was incumbent on me to rid the forest of as many bears as possible to keep the men from running away. The Himalayan black bear is an artful dodger, with a keen sense of humour, and a large appetite. These qualities make him painfully annoying when work has to be done in the jungle, for he takes no heed of the presence of man if food is to be found near his habitation, knowing full well that he has nothing to fear from the unarmed Pahari, and that his mere presence will leave the coast clear for his repast. True, the villagers light fires near their fields and throw firebrands at him, and shout, but he merely laughs at their impotent rage, and choosing a time when they are fast asleep, tired of their vigil, he eats his fill and goes away chuckling. As for the sawyer, Bruin has only to show himself and he is monarch of all he surveys. This sort of thing had been going on for some time, and almost daily reports were brought to me of men bolting and refusing to return until the sahib had cleared the locality of vermin. Strange to say, up to this time I had not had the good fortune to come across a bear although there were many signs of his presence ; but then I suppose this only goes to prove the truth of the assertion that he is an artful dodger. A man with a gun, seeking whom he may devour, is a source of danger, and danger must be avoided, ergo keep out of his way. It therefore, behoved me to play him at his own game ; artifice was necessary. In the month of August the fruit of the Mora oak ripens and falls to the ground. There was a splendid grove of these trees on the top of a ridge close to my camp, and being fully aware of the fondness of the bear for this fruit it was only a question of time and opportunity to obtain a chance of a shot. The opportunity came one afternoon. There was a break in the rains after an incessant downpour of over a week, only too welcome after my enforced imprisonment in a forest inspection hut, so without losing any time Jogi was summoned, my faithful companion in many a ramble with rifle and shot. It did not take Jogi long to throw down his axe and change it for the rifle ; it was always a welcome change for him to go with the Sahib for a shoot and leave chopping wood for the camp to some other menial ; moreover, he was a keen sportsman. We made straight for the top of the hill disdaining to loose off at the pheasants we disturbed frequently. Somehow we felt we should bag nobler game this day. A little before arriving at the top of the ridge a smart shower came down from which we took shelter under an over hanging rock. It did not last long, however, and the sun came out again brighter than ever. The effect of the shower was to soften the leaves lying on the ground and nothing could have been more opportune. Knocking the ashes out of my pipe and putting it back in my pocket, we shouldered our guns, and once more set out for the Mora grove. The ridge was gained, along which there is a forest line running right through the grove we were making for. Giving instructions to Jogi to keep a sharp look out on one side of the line whilst I took the other, we proceeded noiselessly in this manner for a considerable distance, until a low whistle from behind brought me to a sudden halt. The forest here was composed of nothing but oaks, and the ridge being wide at this part and beautifully carpeted with turf, the effect was park-like. None of the branches grew lower than ten or twelve feet from the ground, so that any sudden movement meant instant detection by the quarry. From long experience I knew the valne of keeping still, and when I heard the whistle I waited for my man to come up to me. Another step and he whispered in my ear to look to the left. Turning my head slowly round I saw a black mass not fifty yards away, right out in the open under one of the trees, a bear utterly oblivious of our presence. Telling Jogi to sit down I took a tree between me and the bear, and gaining the stem peered cautiously round. There he was still feeding away, so close now that I feared to breathe. The bear has a keen sense of hearing, but his sight is comparatively poor. The shower had helped us, for the only sense that was of any use to the quarry now was a negligible quantity—the advance had been absolutely silent. Before firing I looked round to see whether Jogi was obeying his instructions, and it was well I did so ; his excitement had evidently carried him away since he had risen on his hands and knees, and had I not skaken my fist at him there is no doubt he would in another second have shouted "maro Sahib, maro." To run no further risks I tapped the rifle significantly with my hand to show him what his fate would be if he moved again, and being satisfied that all was now right turned my attention to the object of our quest. The pantomime just described was a very short act, and, as the stem of the oak was broader than I, there was no fear of the bear seeing what I did. He was still there munching the luscious morsels, picking them up one by one in his right paw and filling his capacious maw; it seemed a pity to spoil his feast and I allowed him, like the condemned criminal, to have a good last feed.

After some time when it seemed as if the provender was getting scarce, I thought it high time to harden my heart and pull trigger, and the thought of this ruffian's pranks with my sawyers came to my aid Drawing a bead just over the region of his heart I pressed, at the same time stepping out from behind cover to fire the second barrel, if necessary, at his retreating form. The cloud of smoke obscured my vision and before it cleared away the bear had disappeared over the khud making a tremendous noise as he went Going up to the spot where he had been a few moments before we took up the trail, and after a few yards found blood. That was all right, so allowing him plenty of time to stiffen, I lit my pipe again before taking up the trail once more. Tracking was child's play. The rains had forced up the weeds on the khud side and his track showed up like a path far ahead of us. Following up as rapidly as possible we got to a point where the tracks grew fainter, and there being some cover ahead caution was now necessary. We peered into every bush, and hurled billets of wood at all likely places that would hold him, but receiving no response we proceeded. The going was by no means good here by reason of the steepness of the hill side, rendered slippery also by the shower. Getting through the cover, I was on one knee examining the ground for tracks leading out, and had just uncocked fearing to slip and let the rifle fall muzzle to stomach, besides there seemed no chance of the bear being anywhere near, as the next cover was some distance away. I had not reckoned with a small bush on the right, however, from behind which out came the beast in a manner which left no doubt of his intentions. This bush was only some ten yards away and on the same level as myself. Here was a predicament. I was on one knee rifle uncocked, and the bear charging straight on to me at top speed. It is curious how calm and collected one is on such occasions, a fact to which doubtless many who have had similar experiences will testify. The only thing that impressed me at the moment was the curious grunting noise the brute made and the manner of his charge, which was certainly nothing like the stories I had heard about the method usually employed, viz.: that bears get up on their hind legs. This bear came at me on all fours. Another thought which flashed through my mind was that it would be good now for all those who had dubbed the bear a coward to be present. Any how action was imperative. To cock the hammers, get off one knee and chuck the rifle up to the shoulder, draw a bead and fire, must have taken an incredibly short space of time when it is considered that the bear was only some ten yards off, and was probably doing his 100 yards in even time. The shot took effect, and I had the satisfaction of seeing him roll down the khud right into the nullah below, and after crashing through a bed of wild balsams in the nullah through which the momentum of his fall made a young tunnel, he was finally hitched up by a fallen log. This business only took a few seconds, but it will give some idea of the steepness of the hill when I saw it took us a good half hour to get down to him on account of the numerous crags which had to be circumvented, and the bad going. The life must have been crushed out of him, if life he had long before the log stopped——him poor brute! His pelt now adorns my room and makes a rare good rug to step on to getting out of bed these cold mornings.

Fishing.

THE KING OF AMERICAN GAME FISHES.

BUILT like a torpedo, endowed with the greatest strength, pound for pound, of any creature that swims the sea, gifted with what seems at times to the tired angler an almost human brain, weighing anywhere from 90 to 700 pounds, the tuna of the Santa Barbara channel must be awarded the palm as the greatest game fish known to modern man.

No shark, tiger of the deep though he may be, is a match at fighting game, either in point of strength or of intelligent use of his powers, for the leaping tuna. As a separate species, the "leaping" tuna is, of course, a myth. It is the same fish which is known to the market fishermen of Naples and Solferino as the tunny, and to Atlantic sea goers as the horse mackerel. Out here on the west coast it has taken to itself the habit of leaping after the flying fish of which the greater part of its food is made up, and thence comes its local name.

The powers of endurance of this fish almost surpass belief, unless the angler has once gone against even a mediocre member of the tribe. Then he knows, and, knowing, has little respect left for all the fishes in the sea, no matter what their size.

After hours of the most terrific of fighting by skilled fishermen, the tuna, brought almost to gaff, will catch sight of the boat, mayhap notice the shadow of one of his enemies therein, and will dash away for two or three hundred yards at the top of his speed. Then the battle has to be fought all over again, and many are the anglers who have succumbed to the gruelling mill.

Nowhere but at Catalina and Coronado do the tuna take the hook. In the Mediterranean they are caught in huge nets of enormous strength; on the Atlantic I am told they are sometimes harpooned, more often taken in nets similar to those used by the Italian fishermen. Even trollers with hand lines, long the only method by which these huge fish could be taken on the west coast, have failed to get a single rise to their lure in the Atlantic and in the Mediterranean; fishing for these creatures for sport seems to be practictally unknown.

The tuna is a mackerel, typical of the tribe, but powerful out of all proportion to the small mackerel caught from wharves or from boats moored close inshore. The color is the same rainbow blend of blues and blacks and palest grays seen on the flanks of all the mackerel. The same vivid streaks of shimmering blue wander down the back, magnified many fold, while the fins and the white belly all add to the mackerel-like appearance. But it is the tail, powerful engine of propulsion and of grip on the water, in which the tuna differs from all other fish of this age.

Swinging in the arc of a crescent, such a tail as no other fish may boast, this mighty propeller turns out to end in two delicate tips slender and small, yet powerful to do the thing their master expects of them. And by nature the tuna is a living, breathing bundle of electric shocks. He travels like an exaggerated albicore, and all those who have ever fished inshore along the west coast know what that means.

The speed of the tuna under water has been variously estimated; in all probability any healthy tuna could leave the fastest motorboat at the post, certainly he can run away without trouble from any of the launches which carry fishermen to his haunts.

Tuna, as a rule, appear in the Santa Barbara Channel between the first and the fifteenth of May of each year. In some summers, however, they do not come to the channel at all, and all the lures offered them by anglers fail to draw one from the depths. Food supply is probably responsible for this condition of affairs, and not seismic disturbances under the sea as is commonly supposed.

June and July, however are the prime months for the tuna hunters. With the coming of August the big fish begin to decrease, and by the end of that month all have disappeared. Where they go the best ichthyologist in the world cannot tell you; it is supposed, however, that they seek warmer and deeper waters off more southern coasts. The flying fish do not go south; possibly there are hordes of them already in equatorial seas, in any event they are almost as plentiful around Avalon and the Magic Isle in winter as in summer.

Beginning with the coming of the tuna—the first of May to be a bit more exact—the Tuna Club of Avalon opens a free-for-all tournament, with prizes for catchers of other fish as well as the tuna. The first tuna of the season usually wins an elegant rod, of the type which long experience has proved the best for the purpose of landing the big fellows.

The result of this active competition for the prizes the club offers is that a fleet of launches is scouring the channel for a week before the tournament opens and for a week thereafter every day. By this time some one usually has landed the coveted prize for the season and there yet remains only the prize for the biggest tuna taken. The largest fish taken in the six years just prior to 1905 were as follows, together with the names of their captors:

1899—C. F. Holder, 183 pounds.
1900—C. P. Morehouse, 251 pounds (the world's record).
1901—F. S. Schenck, 158 pounds.
1902—J. F. Stearns, 197 pounds.
1903—Smith and Alden, fishing together, 94 pounds.
1904—A. W. Barrett, 131 pounds.

In 1905 no new record was set, as all the fish were so small as to be unworthy of niches in this piscatorial temple of fame. From the list given above, however, the wide range of this giant mackerel in point of size is plainly evident, and that Colonel Morehouse's record fish has stood so far unchallenged shows that the real monsters of the tribe do not come so close inshore as the smaller tuna.

In the articles of the aforesaid club a great deal of attention is paid to rods, lines, reels, hooks, and general tackle, so that no one of the contestants shall have any advantage over any other one of his fellow competitors. Among other things these articles declare:

"Rods must not be less than 6 feet 9 inches in length, the tip of which must not weigh more than 16 ounces. By tip is meant all that portion of the rod from the reel seat to the end of the rod. The line must not exceed twenty-four threads or strands and be capable of sustaining a dead weight of not more than 48 pounds. Every angler must bring his or her fish to gaff unaided, a broken rod, either before or after gaffing, disqualifies the angler. All fish must be brought to the club scales and weighed thereon. No allowance will be made for shrinkage. Tackle must be shown when the fish is weighed."

This rule, or rather these rules, are very rigidly enforced and the result is a contest which, even though one be no fisherman himself, is worth going miles to see.

Inasmuch as I am on the subject of tackle—and practically all the chances the angler has of landing a tuna, once he hooked him, rest with the tackle, I may be permitted to say a word regarding the hook and the leader. A 10-0 O'Shaugnessy hook is the one most commonly used, though any good hook of tarpon size and of standard make will serve the purpose equally well. The leader is either of brass chain of variable length or of piano wire. The writer prefers the latter as less liable to foul the line in some of the backward rushes for which this fish is famed, and as a trifle stronger and less liable to kink, which chains occasionally, though not often, do.

The line, of the size given above in the rules of the club, should be not less than 1,000 feet in length, sometimes much longer. The first rush of the tuna frequently will carry out as much as 600 feet of this line, sometimes his last rush, just as he comes in to the gaff, will be a third of this distance; in either event the angler must be ready with plenty of line.

The only bait—so the boatman will tell you—for the leaping tuna is the flying fish. But despite all this, tuna have been taken on smelt, though, because their food during the greater part of their stay in Catalina waters is flying fish, the best bait for them is this gauze-winged, misnamed creature of the deep.

To properly adjust the bait to the hook, no matter what lure is used, the barb should be run down the bait-fish's throat, turned inside, and the point brought to protrude a slight distance through the belly. Then the mouth of the fish is closed on the shank of the hook, and carefully wired so, the wire sometimes extending up to meet the chain or piano-wire leader, as a precaution against the bait coming off.

It is worthy of note that practically all the tuna caught this year (1906) were taken with smelt instead of flying fish. The big mackerel came into the little bay at Avalon in hordes—but alas for the anxious fishermen, all were comparatively small, few ranging above 75 pounds, and many below fifty. Most of these were albicore of one sort or another, and while there were dozens (possibly hundreds) of fish called "tuna" taken during the run, I very much doubt if a half dozen of the real tunnies were hooked.

Within the past five years seems there to have been an invasion of these big Japanese albicore, from across the Pacific, and while they satisfy the boatman and the man who knows nothing about the real, simon-pure tuna, their weak fighting is little sport to the trained tuna angler who has taken the real thing. They are not easily differentiated from the tuna, and most of them pass as tuna, though there are some very radical differences in fins, and, so I am told, in their internal structure.

The Japanese fish are much like the albicore except, of course, that they are larger, some of them rivaling the real tuna in point of weight. They are absolutely useless as food, and in small demand for bait Unlike the tuna, they do not appear in Channel waters when small, but presumably they are about the same fish then as is the ordinary in-shore albicore, bonita and skip jack.

In going after this fish as after no other, extra tackle is almost an absolute necessity if one expects to stay out long or to land more than one tuna. Usually not only two or three sets of lines and leaders are carried, but extra poles as well, for many times the dropping of a rod across the thwarts of the boat as the tuna breaks from the side for his last mad rush will result in a broken tip—and "tip" in the case of the regulation tuna rod, means all the rod above the reel seat, where the one joint in the rod is placed.

Probably the early morning is the best time to take tuna in Catalina waters, but when the regular runs are on, the fish may be seen jumping in all parts of the little bay and as far out in the open channel as the eye can reach. Guests at Avalon hotels can sit in their porch chairs, and with good marine glasses, watch many a battle royal which is taking place just outside the fringe of kelp tapestry that surrounds the Magic Isle.

Usually that is the first step in the making of the tourist angler; the second is a trip as the guest of some angler who does all the fishing while the man who is gradually acquiring the fever does nothing but watch. Then, when he gets back to the island, he goes down and fingers the catch of the day as it hangs on the rack for all to view. Next day he is getting a boatman of his own, and away he goes for the banks. Sometimes he gets the disease right. Then he buys all his own tackle, the best that money will provide—and pays about three prices for it to the island dealers—and goes out on his own hook.

Men whose business it is to sell you tackle, will tell you that to be perfectly sure of your fish you must put from $75 to $250 in tackle—and there are many sets of rods and reels and leaders which come to Avalon each year that are worth as much and cost more than the latter sum. But this is largely salesman's talk. A very good outfit can be had for $50; one which will do if the angler is careful for $30—but there are many reels alone which cost more than either of these figures.

Yet the fact remains that there is very little use going after this king of American game fishes with cheap and untrustworthy tackle. As long ago as 1895, Charles Frederick Holder, than whom no one has written more interestingly of Catalina and the Santa Barbara Channel, said:

"The tuna is the magnificent and mysterious fish of these waters (Catalina) attaining a length of five feet or more, and a weight of from 100 pounds upward. I have hooked but one in my experience, and the single rush took 300 feet of line and a part of the rod before I recovered. A tuna of the largest size—and I have seen one in the Atlantic that attained 1,000 pounds—has been known to stop a large sailboat in the Santa Catalina Channel, when hooked on a heavy hand line."

But this was eleven years ago and now-a-days hand-line fishing for tuna, or infact any other fish in the channel, has been given up unless it be by the few market fishermen that come over from the mainland. It is all rod and reel now and the game has developed a class of fishermen all its own, wealthy men who do nothing but fish through all the tuna season and then return to their homes in the East and North to spend the remainder of the year in devising and making rods and tackle for their own use and the use of their friends.

I am not at liberty to give his name, but each tuna season there comes to Avaton a rich wagon-maker from the Middle East. With him he carries two or three trunks full of tackle. How many times he is a millionaire he won't tell, but he makes all his own rods, and leaders, just as he makes his own flies for his trouting trips into the North woods—not because he has to, but because he wants to.

He takes especial pride—this old-young fellow of fifty—in his rods, many of them made from one piece of hickory or ash that grow on his own farm back in the "States." All of his rods are made by hand, from wood seasoned in his factory, and cured by the best of known methods. Their resiliency is wonderful, and occasionally he remembers some friends with one that is practically priceless, for no such rods can be bought even at top prices from professional makers. He declares he was fifteen years learning to make a rod that would withstand the rushes even of the albicore and yellowtail, let alone the tuna, which he has since taken on his own make of rods. After all the fifteen years, having fished in Florida, along the gulf and in the salmon rivers of the North, he yields the palm to Catalina and the first prize for gameness to the tuna.

Among the tuna anglers of Catalina just now, however, there is a movement on looking to the abolition of the 16-ounce rods and the adoption of light—nine-ounce affairs, together with even lighter lines and leaders than those used heretofore. Several tuna of from 40 to 50 pounds weight have been taken under the new order of things on the nine-ounce rods but no one has as yet had the opportunity of trying them out against a record-size fish.

What the result will be is only conjecture, but it is probable that, up to a certain weight, the greater skill, coupled with the intelligence of the man will triumph over the undeveloped faculties of the fish, giant though it be.—STILL HUNTER. In Western Field.

THE IMPORTATION OF ARMS INTO INDIA.

ON the 15th July 1899, the Government of India issued an order prohibiting the importation into India of—

(1) Arms taking Government rifle or carbine ammunition whether of ·303, ·450 or ·577 calibre.

(2) Of ammunition which could be fired from Service rifles or carbines of these calibres.

It has been generally understood that the prohibition was framed to prevent the border tribes of India from obtaining large numbers of rifles and stocks of ammunition to enable them to carry on their tribal raids and campaigns against the Government of India.

If this were the case, the manufacturers of the prohibited arms and cartridges, and the workpeople employed in their manufacture, could have no cause to complain of this prohibition, whatever loss of employment it meant for them.

As a matter of fact, however, the manufacturers concerned have continually and emphatically denied that the arms of these calibres imported into India by private firms or supplied for the Persian Gulf market found their way into the hands of the border tribes. On the contrary, they have affirmed that the war materials obtained by these tribes have been acquired either by theft of the complete rifles and ammunition from the Government arsenals and regiments on service in India, or by obtaining the component parts of rifles ordered to be broken up by the Government, but which, in fact, were so improperly destroyed that native artisans were able to repair and sell them to the belligerents in question.

From the 15th July 1899, to now, the Government have brought forward no evidence to show that their view was correct; on the other hand, there has been a great deal of evidence, much of it given in the English Law Courts, to support the view of the manufacturers.

The authoritative statement made by the Central News Agency, dated Calcutta, 8th February 1898 and the special report which the authorities of the Government Arsenal at Rawalpindi were called upon to furnish upon arms captured or surrendered in the Mohmund and Malakand Expeditions, reveal an extraordinary state of things. It was proved that with the exception of only 13 weapons, all the rifles obtained from these tribes were either stolen from our regiments in India or were re-constructed locally from component parts of Indian Government rifles which were supposed to have been destroyed in accordance with the standing regulations.

The Government have not been able to bring forward any evidence to support their views, nor have they attempted to deny the statements of the English merchants, manufacturers and workpeople formerly engaged in the trade.

Intimately connected with the prohibition was the notorious seizure of arm sin the Persian Gulf in January, 1898.

This action was equally unjustifiable, and has been equally unjustified by the Government. This act was very serious in its consequences to British trade, as may be recognised when it is stated that in 1897 the value of British shipments of arms and ammunition to the Persian Gulf was rather more than £105,000. It has been conclusively shown that the importation of all these arms, although officially prohibited by the Sultan of Muscat, was openly carried out with the knowledge and consent of not only the Sultan and his advisers, but also of the British Custom House officials. It has also been shown that these arms do not get into the hands of the tribes with whom the Government of India have been brought into conflict.

All these facts have been put before the Government, and have not been controverted, and yet, not only does the old Order in Council of the 15th July 1899, still stand good, but the Government have refused any compensation to the firms who suffered heavy losses in the Persian Gulf trade owing to this unwarrantable seizure.

The result has been as predicted by the English manufacturers from the first. The trade has not been stopped, but has been offered to and taken by the Belgians and French, who before had no stake in this market, but who to-day command the trade.

It is by such methods, and not by the apathy of the British merchant and manufacturer, that trade is lost to Great Britain and acquired by her competitors.

Bad as this record is, it has been followed up by another Indian Government order, which appears to be still more perverse, unnecessary, and unwarrantable. On the 25th September 1906, the following letter was issued by the Home Department of the Government of India to all local governments and administrations:—

"SIR,—In continuation of the Home Department letter, dated 20th November 1902, I am directed to forward for information a copy of a notification dated the 11th September 1906, making certain amendments in the rules issued under the Indian Arms Act (II) of 1878, from which it will be seen that the Government of India have now decided, in suppression of all previous orders on the subject, to prohibit, subject to narrowly defined exceptions, the importation of all rifles, of ·450 and ·303 bores, irrespective of the size of their chamber and action, and consequently of all ammunition which can be fired from such weapons. These exceptions are (a) in the case of ·303 rifles single barrelled weapons sighted to over 1,000 yards imported bonâ fide for match shooting purposes, and brought on to the equipment list of the regiment or corps to which the importer belongs by the persons mentioned, and subject to the conditions laid down in Home Department notification No. 3992, dated the 14th May 1903; and (b) in the case of ammunition such reasonable amount as is required for use with weapons of the prohibited bores which are already in the lawful possession of persons in this country. I am to request that this change in the rules may be made widely known to the public and to dealers in arms and ammunition. The change now made in the rules will be embodied in the revised rules under the Arms Act which will shortly be issued.

"The notification runs:—In the exercise of the powers conferred by Sections 17 and 28 of the Indian Arms Act (II of 1878) the Governor-General in Council is pleased to direct that the following further amendments shall be made in the Home Department, dated the 6th March 1879, as amended by subsequent notifications:—Paragraph 1: For the words 'Rifles of ·303 bore or rifles of ·450 bore of the Martini-Henry pattern, if such rifles have been imported into British India subsequently to the 20th February 1901, without the special sanction of the Government of India, balled ammunition which can be fired from rifles of the bores and patterns aforesaid,' substitute the words 'rifles of ·303 or ·450 bore and balled ammunition which can be fired from such rifles.' At the end of the first clause of Paragraph 1, after the words 'carry or possess' add the following proviso 'provided also that no prohibition or direction contained in Sections 13, 14, 15 or 16 of the Indian Arms Act, 1878, shall apply to persons in possession of rifles of ·303 bore or ·450 bore which have been lawfully imported into British India before the date of this notification.'

"Paragraph 6, Note to Rule 5.—For the words any rifles of ·303 bore or rifles of ·450 bore of the Martini-Henry pattern substitute the words 'rifles of ·303 or ·450 bore.'"

From this it will be seen that in future no rifles of the prohibitive bores, whatever the size of their chambers, may be imported. Apparently it is considered that the "mistri" is now so skilled that he can alter the chamber size of rifles to take the Government cartridges. Granted that it is possible, though very tedious and costly, to bore out a chamber that may be smaller than the Government cartridge, surely it is not likely that any artisan will attempt to reduce the size of a chamber that is already larger than the Government cartridges. Yet the Government have prohibited the importation of any rifle of the prohibited bore whatever the chamber size.

They might as well prohibit the importation of every rifle. It has always been understood that when it is to the advantage of the nation as a whole a minority should suffer some hardship, the hardship must be undergone, although in many instances compensation is paid to the sufferers.

In this instance, however, not only have the people interested in the trade not been compensated, but the Government have utterly failed to show that it is to the interest of the nation as a whole that the trade should be prohibited.

Rather, it appears, that the action on their part is taken to attempt to put on the English manufacturers' and merchants' shoulders the blame that should be borne by themselves for negligence in the care of arms and ammunition in the arsenals under their care in India.

We, therefore, on behalf of all the English workpeople employed in this trade, and on behalf of the merchants and manufacturers, who openly and with the knowledge of the Government have invested capital in this business, protest as strongly as possible against these prohibitions and particularly against this latest and uncalled for restriction of legitimate British trade.—The Kynoch Journal.

THE UNITED PROVINCES SHOOTING RULES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—I note S. J. S.'s letter of the 13th instant in your issue of the 24th, and should like to say a few words in reply. My criticisms, as everyone can judge for himself, were directed against Rules and Department, NOT against individuals and I purposely avoided all personal criticism except in so far as it was necessary to quote instances that had come to my notice, of rulings or orders or acts of officers of the Forest Department to give point to my arguments.

But what does S. J. S. do?

Instead of pointing out the fallacy of my arguments, if such exist, except in two instances which I shall deal with hereafter, he descends to personalities and instead of attacking my arguments accuses me of want of bonâ fides and attacks me personally in an acrimonious manner, which seems to me to be altogether foreign to the points at issue. The very heading of his letter would seem to indicate that he had taken his pen and sat down for motives best known to himself, not to criticise my arguments but to criticise me and to make innuendoes and insinuations against me. Had I descended to such depths I could have told a great deal, but that is quite another story. I can well afford to ignore S. J. S.' personal insinuations against myself and leave it to the public to decide whether the uncalled for introduction of such personal matters is playing the game, and shall only say a few more words on this subject.

S. J S. says that I am attempting to make a stalking horse of the "general public" for the purpose of getting within range of the only forest game now left me, "The Forest Department itself." If that is his opinion after "careful perusal and perusal" he is welcome to it, but I doubt very much if the general public will confirm it. Again he says "The Forest Department are well able to defend themselves and will probably do so at the proper time and in the proper manner." Such being the case, was it not eminently desirable that S. J. S. should have awaited that event instead of busying himself in defending a Department (which on his own showing does not require his assistance) by making personal insinuations against me?

Now to look at the only part of S. J. S.' letter which even verges on criticism. He begins by admitting that the rules picked to pieces by me "are certainly defective in many respects." Such being the case does not S. J. S. out of his own mouth afford ample justification for my criticism of the Rules?

Lastly he points out two instances of the "unfairness and misleading nature" of my criticisms.

The first is as regards Rule 2.

S. J. S. seems to think that the words "spearing and running with the dogs is absolutely prohibited" do not include spearing from off horseback because he says the horse is not referred to at all. But one does not usually spear a chital or anything with a horse nor yet with a dog but with a spear, and S. J. S. has entirely misunderstood the meaning of the rule. I have very good reasons for believing it was introduced to put a stop to legitimate "sticking" from off horseback!

Again he takes me to task for my criticism of Rule 5 and argues that my views are all wrong and that there is a limit fixed for all, including exempted officers. He has entirely missed the point of my arguments. Exempted officers do not, except when desiring to shoot with friends in permit periods, require to take out a permit at all, and it is obvious, therefore, that no such limit can be prescribed in writing for them in a permit (except as referred to above). No general limit is, so far as I am aware, fixed by the Conservator for any specific shooting area or group of areas. If it is, at least it has not been communicated to those concerned, and it follows therefore that Gazetted Forest Officers, under which category (though apparently S. J. S. is not aware of it) I also for the purposes of these Rules fall, might, as alleged by me, shoot up to the full limit which the Conservator had fixed on in his own mind or otherwise, but had not communicated to the public and that thus the public when applying for permits would be met with the answer that the full limit had been reached. Again I am aware that in some permits in Form A for the same area, one number of animals has been entered for one sportsman and another for another sportsman, and I contend that such distinctions should not be possible.

In brief my argument is that a fairly liberal and general limit should be fixed and publicly notified to all concerned for a group of shooting areas, or for each particular area according to the circumstances of each Let the number of animals so fixed be divided equally amongst the number of sportsmen exempted, or otherwise who COULD shoot in those areas during the year and which number can easily be ascertained. Then, and not till then, will all, whether exempted or not, be on the same footing. It is true that the Conservator can impose a general limit, but so far as I am aware he has not done so and still less has any been notified to the public. The result is that exempted officers are not really under any special limit. They are merely under an unknown limit, which if it exists at all is hidden away in the recesses of a Forest Office, and in consequence of which it is possible for an exempted officer to shoot during periods of rest, a practically unlimited number of heads and for a permit in Form A to be issued to one person allowing, e.g., two sambur and two chital stags from one area, and either before or after the issue of such permit another permit in Form A to be issued for the same area to a different person for only one chital and one sambur or more or less as the Forest Officer concerned chooses.

It is to be regretted that people like S. J. S. either cannot or will not understand the rules and the criticisms on them, before endeavouring to set others right by making charges against them of "unfair and misleading criticism."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—In a vast country like India, where small game shooting is so varied, the ordinary 6¾lb. 12 bore game gun is by no means equally well suited for all purposes. By losing sight of this fact many sportsmen are heavily handicapped in their favourite pursuit. A more thorough appreciation of the immense increase in power, which can be attained in a gun of slightly greater weight than usual, would no doubt lead many men to provide themselves with an extra weapon. Another quality, probably not widely known, of the powerful full choke 12 bore, is its extraordinary effectiveness with slugs. If buck shot are selected of such a size that they will fit in the muzzle of the gun in perfect layers, and the gun is a well bored, full choke, one can rely on obtaining fine close patterns, with these heavy pellets. Sizes from eight to sixteen to the ounce are suitable; always provided that when tested on a wad pushed a little down the muzzle of the gun, they settle down into exact layers of three, four or five. Heavy 12 bores vary in weight from 7¼ to 8½lbs., according to the cases they are bored for, and the charges for which they are regulated. If extreme power is desired the gun should be 8¼lbs. or a little more, and should be chambered and bored for 3 inch "Perfects." A gun bored for perfects is of larger calibre than one adapted for paper cases. The reason for this is that paper cases are much thicker than the perfect brass ones, so their OUTSIDE diamaters being the same, it follows that the INSIDE of the perfect is wider than the inside of the paper. The bore of the gun is made to correspond with the interior of its cartridge case. Thus the 12 bore brass case gun is nearly as large in the bore as a 10 bore paper case one. Paper cases can be used in brass case guns, but there is a little loss of power owing to the wads being rather too small to thoroughly develop the energy of the powder charge. However brass case 12 bores perform very creditably with paper cases, and will be found quite satisfactory at ordinary ranges. A 12 bore regulated for the three inch perfects will shoot 3½ to 4 drachms of powder and 1¼oz. shot. I used a gun of this description for several seasons' duck shooting, and was often quite astonished at its powers. I used constantly to kill golden plover at 100 yards, firing into flocks. The two most useful sizes of shot for a heavy full choked 12 bore are Nos. 1 and 4 chilled——104 and 172 to the ounce respectively.

From personal experience I consider that an 8¼lb. gun can be handled by a man of ordinarily good physique quite quickly enough for snipe shooting. There are, however, no doubt many people who will object to the weight as being too great; and I will therefore set forth what can be done with a lighter gun chambered for the 2¾ inch paper cases. A weapon of this sort, weighing 7¼lbs., will shoot 48 grains of a bulk smokeless powder and 1¼oz. shot, quite comfortably.

If full choked it will give excellent shooting up to 60 yards; in fact, will be very much better at this distance than an unchoked gun at 40 yards.

A gun of ordinary open pattern (i.e., 120 to 140 pellets on the 30 inch circle at 40 yards, with 1⅛oz. No. 6 shot) is a severe handicap to a man when duck shooting. Many of the birds,——pintail, duck, and grey geese, for example——come over very high, and apart from this require very hard hitting to bring down on account of their vitality and closeness of plumage. On the Sind jheels the average of birds gathered to cartridges expended, has always been small, and this I consider to be far more due to the unsuitability of the guns used than to poor shooting. A cylinder bored gun of the type so generally seen in in the hands of Indian sportsmen, is a weapon quite incompetent to tackle a high duck with.

In these days the purchase of an extra gun is not a very serious matter, for sound reliable weapons can be brought at very reasonable rates. Every shooter should know what his gun, or guns, are capable of, with the usual charges of smokeless powder, and 1⅛oz. of No. 6 chilled spot, 270 pellets to the ounce, a full choke 12 bore should make a pattern of 210 to 215 on the 30 inch circle at 40 yards. With 1⅛oz. No. 6 the pattern should be 230 to 240. Occasionally guns will do better than this, but the above is an average performance. In the same way with guns regulated for heavier charges, 70 per cent. or more, of the shot should be placed in the 30 inch circle at 40 yards. A choke bore gun which makes close and regular patterns at 40 yards is certain to have good penetration and to perform well at long ranges. There is no necessity therefore for the ordinary shooter to do more than satisfy himself regarding pattern at 40 yards: if that is good and STEADY, the other desirable attributes follow as a matter of course.

I am rather against 10 bores for use in India, for if bored for brass cases and regulated for heavy charges, they weigh from 9½ to 10lbs. and the cartridges are rather big to expend on single birds. The chasm of the heavy 12 bore is the ability to use it comfortably on single fast flying birds, and also when desired to shoot from it the ordinary paper cases. Directly one goes to a larger, heavier gun, these great advantages are lost. I trust that this letter may induce some of the numerous Anglo-Indian devotees to the shot-gun to pattern their weapons carefully, and then consider seriously whether their favourites are quite up to the work they are called upon to perform.

First Day, Saturday, the 2nd February, 1907.

THE opening day's racing was witnessed by a large and fashionable gathering, and the success which attended it augurs well for the remainder of the meeting. Sir John Hewett, Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces, who has consented to become the Patron of the Lucknow Races, arrived before the first event, accompanied by Major Gordon, Private Secretary, and evinced a close interest in the racing. The fields were larger than anticipated owing to the almost entire absence of scratchings, and the sport was of a high order. Several favourites succumbed, among them Coin II., who was not even placed in the Maiden Plate. The most sensational result was in the Martinière Plate, in which Chance, a complete outsider, came up near home and won with comparative ease by two lengths. Among the visitors from Calcutta for the Civil Service week is his Highness the Maharaja of Cooch Behar, whom everyone was glad to see. The afternoon was cool and cloudy, and was an altogether ideal one for racing. The only fear now is that rain will come and spoil the rest of the Carnival, though a shower would do a deal of good, and lay the dust, which is excessive. The course was in fine condition, and speaks well for the labour bestowed on it by Major J. H. Ensor, the Race Secretary, who is earning golden opinions. The Civil Service, the Oxford Light Infantry and the Somerset Light Infantry were "At Home" to their friends. The band of the latter played. Details:—

THE PONY HURDLES.—Rs. 1,000 to the winner, Rs. 300 to the second, and Rs. 200 to the third. A handicap hurdle race for ponies 14-2 and under. About 2 miles over 8 flights.

Time—4mins. 5secs.

Wallace increased his lead, but half way round Spectacles began to come up, and at the six furlongs drew level with the leader, Wales in the meantime had improved his position, and the three took the last hurdle in company. A pretty race home ensued, Wales winning by five lengths; eight lengths separated second and third. Time—5mins. 8secs.

Second Day, Monday, 4th February 1907.

The attendance on Cup day was in every sense a record one, a number of people having availed themselves of the special trains run by the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway during race week. His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor and Staff and General Sir E. and Lady Locke Elliot were among those present. All the clubs were "At Home" and dispensed hospitality on a generous scale. The day was a most disastrous one for backers; it would be necessary to go back many years in the history of Lucknow sport to find a parallel to the series of misfortunes which overtook unwary punters. "Mr. Locke's" victory with Lookout in the opening event was deservedly popular; it was, however, the only case in which a favourite came in. One after another outsiders secured the spoils and the climax was reached in the race for the Civil Service Cup, in which the favourite was beaten by a head by a rank outsider. There was little or no enthusiasm when the issue became known. It was pre-emenently a jockey's race, Frazer, one of the cleverest light-weight riders in India, had been specially brought up from Calcutta to ride Lorette, and well indeed did he steer the pony to victory. Frazer held his field safe two and a half furlongs from home and the race from this stage was a foregone conclusion. The winner is by Predominant out of Quantity Fair and was bred and imported by Powell Brothers, of Australia. Lorette has won several races in Rangoon, including the Merchants' Cup, 1½ miles last March. He ran in Calcutta in December, but finished nowhere. Lorette was purchased a year ago by Mr. B. N. Barjorjee and has since run under his colours. It must be the first time this Cup has been annexed by a Parsee turfite. The day was a triumph for Frazer, who rode three winners. Details:—

THE TURF.

MANCHESTER.

WE heard fairy stories of sunny skies in the Peak country, but in Manchester a gentle rain was falling, while the temperature was mild enough for April. The said mild weather was all against the day's sport, as while a waft or two of air just shifted the mist at Castle Irwell to and fro it had not the strength to send it over the bank, and for want of a brisker breeze we had to witness racing through a fog that once looked like clearing, but came again. Considering that two big Association Cup matches were in full swing hardby, the Executive are to be congratulated on a capital attendance, while good fields were the rule, but the going was a bit soft, and as at Wolverhampton several contretemps in running thinned the fields, but on the whole backers did well, and we are pleased to notice the harmlessness of the tumbles, all the falling jockeys getting off lightly.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

For some years past Thacker's Reduced Survey Map of India has been looked upon as the most convenient and helpful Map of the Indian Empire extant. It possesses many points of superiority and convenience; the information is exhaustive, every name mentioned in the Government Survey being included. The great convenience of the Index of 10,000 names has always been keenly appreciated; it has, therefore, been a source of great regret to the proprietors that they have been forced to allow the Map to remain out of print for a considerable time on account of political changes in the internal provinces of India. The moment the new boundaries of Bengal were settled, fresh plates were put in hand, and the publishers are now pleased to announce the third edition of this important Map as ready for sale.

The following are brief particulars—

Size of plate, 38" × 34". Scale, 70 miles = 1 inch. Mounted on Linen and folded, in cloth case, with Index of 10,000 names	Rs. 5-8-0
Mounted on Linen and Rollers, Varnished, with Index in book-form	,, 6-8-0

A very fine performance for a double rifle, very hard to beat. Shooting was conducted in a manner somewhat out of the ordinary routine, that is to say, the shots were not fired by a professional expert, but by one who had enjoyed no previous opportunity of acquainting himself with the idiosyncrasies of the weapon.

Eight shots at 100 yards with open sights from Lang's double barrel ·360 No. 2 nitro express rifle, using right and left barrels alternately. Centres of shots contained in parallelogram 2·15 in. wide by 2·2 in. high. All the shots cut a circle 2·1 in. diameter. Reproduced full size.

After a rainy night, a colder spell freshened up the morning, but the sky was again sombre and lowering, and the absence of wind permitted the mist to brood over the lower end of the course. The view, however, was extended further afield, a circumstance to be grateful for as runners could just be discerned coming into the entrance of the straight, and instead of suddenly flashing at you, the features of the race at its most interesting stage could be followed. The going was still a bit soft, a fact that recommended the old adage of horses for courses. The football furore having subsided did not leave so wide a margin for an increased attendance of the first day's big muster as would have been expected, for it must not be forgotten that Wednesday is a half holiday. Still, the muster was again an excellent one, including many influential supporters of cross-country sport.

It is not often that the public lets itself go on a racecourse by a pronounced expression of opinion, but the Castle Handicap furnished an opportunity of which, with no fear of libel before their eyes, they availed themselves. Since an Irish jockey was pelted with clods, brickbats, and débris on the old New Barns course years ago, there has not been such an outcry against one of the Emerald Islanders. At Dunstall Park Jenkinstown started an equal favourite with Marmaduke in the Staffordshire Handicap, and his owner was running him more with a view to getting the course and acquiring confidence after several previous mishaps, and there he did badly. Hence yesterday he was allowed to start a 6 to 1, the least fancied of the five, but having acquired confidence he beat The Sheikh (the favourite) in such easy fashion that J. Walsh, junior., was lucky in that the hostile crowd restricted itself to a vocal demonstration, or he might have fared badly.

FOOTBALL ASSOCIATION RULES.

AMAZING in the extreme is the verdict that must be passed upon the happenings in the Cup tie struggles on Saturday, judged as a whole. Of the 32 games played, there was a definite result in only 19 instances, leaving 26 clubs to battle this week for the right to participate in the second round. After four months of league contests, the Cup contest provides a most welcome change, and how keenly the football public are interested in the competition was shown by the great crowds which assembled in all parts of the country. So far news of two records has reached me in the matter of receipts, the 24,339 who paid for admission at Portsmouth exceeding by over 1,000 the crowd that assembled when Derby County visited the dockyard town, while the £1,100 1s. 10d. gate money of Saturday easily takes precedence. At Oxford, the City Club, the only amateur side taking part in the ties, have only limited accommodation, and the admission fee was advanced to one shilling, but nearly 5,000 paid, and the receipts amounted to over £270, which is far in excess of any previous takings at the ground. The aggregate attendance at the 32 matches approached 500,000, with an average of 15,000 per game, an extraordinary fact, and a convincing proof of the remarkable hold which Association football has upon the affection of both the classes and masses.

All the critics will be in agreement as to the sensation of the afternoon. Here it is:—

Newcastle United	0

When the result was flashed over the wires I was incredulous. The information was astounding. Was it possible that the United, unquestionably the finest team in the country, with the advantage of playing on their own ground, before thousands of their loyal followers—and no club has a more sporting crowd at its back—had gone under to a lowly placed Southern League club? Confirmatory messages came through, and it is established beyond the possibility of doubt that the club that for two successive years had appeared in the Final Tie, that this season has not dropped a point in the League on its own ground, and is the favourite for the League championship, had been knocked out by a side that was not supposed to have a thousand to one chance of making even a draw. It beggars description, confounds the prophets, and dramatically emphasises the oft-quoted sporting maxim that nothing in games is so certain as their uncertainty. In their mushroom-like progress towards the highest circles of football, the Palace have done many smart things, but nothing comparable to their latest achievement, and their further doings in the competition will be watched with keen curiosity.

The visiting teams did well on Saturday. Only three won outright, but thirteen others prevented their opponents from registering a victory, and that means it will be possible for 16 clubs playing away from home in the first instance to enter the second round. That which is possible is not, however, likely, and in this connection it must be borne in mind that Fulham will, for the second time, meet Stockport County at Craven Cottage, as the fact that the latter sold their right to choice of ground does not rob Fulham of the re-play at home.

In the Cup ties a rough and ready line is always drawn between North and South, and an examination of the results shows that the South has every reason to be satisfied with the way in which events have shaped themselves. The clubs that have been dismissed are Brighton and Hove, Oxford City, Watford Northampton, Plymouth Argyle, Reading, and Hastings and St. Leonard's, but of these seven, three have been given the conge by other Southern clubs, three by First League teams, and one by a Second League club. On the other hand, seven Southern clubs have passed into the second round, including the Crystal Palace, who have the proud distinction of numbering as their victims the only First League club which went under to a Southern organisation. West Ham., Bristol City, and Brentford each triumphed over a Second League club. Of the drawn games to be re played, Southern teams figure in eight of the 13, and in one instance Southern League clubs are in opposition. Tottenham Hotspur and Portsmouth have to travel respectively to Hull and Manchester, but as against this Luton, Chelsea, Fulham, New. Brompton and Woolwich will be on their own grounds, and the chances are in favour of the South having a dozen or more teams in the Second round.

Of the 19 clubs who have already made good their title to appear in the second round on 2nd February, nine survived the first stage last year, and they include Everton (cup holders), Aston Villa, Bradford City, Brentford, Liverpool, Millwall, Norwich City, Southampton and Sunderland. West Ham. have made history by surviving the first round in the competition proper, and the other clubs who took no part last season in the second round, but who have successfully taken the first step in the current campaign, are Bolton Wanderers, Bristol City, Burslem Port Vale, Bury, Crystal Palace, Middlesbrough, Notts County, Oldham, and Sheffield Wednesday. The meed of praise due to the Crystal Palace has been paid, and both Brentford and West Ham. deserve hearty congratulation on their success. Blackpool were fortunate to be let off so lightly at Upton Park, for the home team played sparkling football, and with a fair measure of luck they should make considerable progress in the competition. They play just the kind of game that commands success in Cup ties, and they have only to maintain their present form to hold their own with any club in the country. Brentford have given much better exhibitions of football at home this season than that they served up on Saturday, the defence not being altogether satisfactory, and the forwards missed chances, but they were the better team, and had no more than they were entitled to on the run of the play. Bristol City were brilliant, Bury were too clever for Oxford City. Southampton had to fight hard for victory against Watford, Millwall gave a great display against Plymouth Argyle, especially in view of their serious handicap through Stevenson's enforced retirement, and Norwich City won in comfortable style against Hastings, who worked hard, but were not class enough for their formidable opponents.

The persistent failures of Aston Villa on Lancashire grounds in the Cup—they had not won a tie in the County Palatine prior to Saturday,—caused some uneasiness in the minds of their followers as to the result of the game at Turf Moor, for Burnley had shown capital form in many of their home games. The Villa, past records notwithstanding, were confident of success, and class told its tale. Brighton and Hove worthily upheld the reputation of the Southern League at Bolton, and although the latter won 3—1, they were a goal to the bad during a considerable portion of the game. Reading fought pluckily at Bradford, but had to succumb at the finish, and a similar tale has to be told of Northamoton's visit to Middlesbrough, only a couple of goals separating the clubs at the close. Sunderland were much too good for Leicester Fosse, and Irthlingboro and Kidderminster were always fighting hopeless battles at Burslem and Oldham respectively, the Port Vale players putting up the biggest score of the afternoon. Everton won somewhat luckily, the only goal of the match coming from Johnson, a Sheffield United player, who put through his own goal, in endeavouring to pass back to his goalkeeper. Sheffield Wednesday did not have anything to spare against Wolverhampton Wanderers, and Liverpool scraped home after a stern tussle with Birmingham, while a game in which no quarter was asked or given between Notts County and Preston North End, at Trent Bridge, saw the home side successful.

Twenty-six clubs, at the first time of asking, were unable to settle the question of supremacy, but all these matches have been replayed during the week with the following result:—Bristol Rovers beat Q. P. Rangers by a goal to nil; Woolwich Arsenal beat Grimsby Town by 3 to nil; Luton beat Gainsborough Trinity by 2 to 1; New Brompton and Burton United played another draw—pointless; Portsmouth beat Manchester United by 2 to 1; Fulham beat Stockport by the same margin; Lincoln City beat Chelsea by a goal to nil; Derby County beat Chesterfield by a goal to nil; Blackburn Rovers beat Manchester City by a goal to nil; Accrington Sunday beat Crewe Alexandra by a goal to nil. The match between Hull City and Tottenham Hotspur ended in another pointless draw; Barnsley beat Notts Forest by 2 to 1; and Stoke and West Bromwich Albion played a draw—2 goals each.

RUGBY RULES.

ENGLAND vs. WALES.

One has to go back many years to recollect such small interest being taken in an International match at Swansea as in the twenty-fifth encounter between Rose and Leek at the famous St. Helens Ground. At the kick-off there were not more than 12,000 spectators present. No doubt the lack of "home" interest was caused by the Welsh collapse on the same ground some weeks ago against South Africa, by the want of faith in the chosen Welsh fifteen, and the dislike of the average Taffy to the new formation of eight backs and seven forwards.

During the morning a drizzling rain fell, and a heavy mist promised a poor light for the encounter. The turf, however, was not greatly affected, for its sandy nature invariably allows rain to immediately drain off. Depressing as matters were during the morning, the scene prior to the start on the ground was rather worse. For once the Welsh enthusiasts failed to raise a single Welsh hymn or music-hall ditty. The only bright part was the music discoursed by the band of the 3rd Battalion Glamorgan Rifles. The usual optimism of Taffy was absent, whilst the prophets who predicted a win for the invaders were in the majority.

Just before lunch it was announced officially that Stoop would play with Jago at half, and this dispelled the rumour current that there was a change in the English side. There were no further alterations in the Welsh team beyond those announced previously. The railway officials report that only 4,000 persons visited Swansea by train in comparison with the 17,000 who were carried by rail to witness the African match. After undergoing the usual ordeal of being photographed, the teams fielded. The rain had a few minutes before ceased.

Owen won the toss, and elected to play with the wind. Basil Hill kicked off for England, and the ball went into touch. From the line out, Neill tarew back to Trew, and some passing by the Welsh backs resulted in Gabe kicking to touch near the half way. Wales was penalised for legs up, but the penalty did not gain much ground. Owen kicked down the field, but Jackett fielded splendidly, and kicked back to Trew. The latter made his mark, but failed to find the wished for touch. Hill and Slocock heading a loose rush, got under way, but Gibbs prevented any great headway being made by turning the ball smartly into touch. Another fine dribble, in which Hill, Shaw, and Kelly participated, looked dangerous, until Bailey Davies dashed up, fielded, and ran into touch just in time. Coopper picked up in a loose scramble and punted well into the Welsh half, but the kick was replied to with interest by Davies, who also found touch. Several short, determined rushes were made by Hopley, Hill, Mills, and Shaw, but each was nullified as far as scoring was concerned by the extraordinary smart footwork of the Welsh "rover," Gibbs, and the clever fielding at close quarters of Owen and Trew.

A passing movement by Gibbs, Trew, and Owen looked promising for Gwalia when the last named infringed slightly the touch-line. Immediately afterwards the Welsh halves got off again. Owen quickly gave to Trew, who beat Jago and then passed to Gabe. The Welsh left centre cut out a capital opening, and was about to pass to his wing when Shewring, with a tackle that reminded one of one of Gamlin's best, had ball and man. A free kick to Wales was taken by Gibbs, but his attempt to obtain a goal failed, although the kick was a good one. Wales continued the attack, but for some time the handling of the new centre, Evans, was faulty; added to this, Birkett was at this stage perfect in defence, and never failed to earth the opposing centre. Owen was well served by his forwards, and from a clean heel he set Trew in motion. The outside half passed to Maddocks viz Evans, and the London Welshman was going all out for the line when he slipped two yards out, and Coopper hauled him into touch.

Fast and furious the game was contested in the Saxon quarter, and in repelling one of the many attacks made by the Welsh forwards, Jackett had a severe kick on the arm, and play was stopped whilst he was being attended to. He retired for some time, and was evidently in pain. A badly given pass by Gibbs allowed Jago to start a dribble which was taken up by Gibbs allowed Jago to start a dribble which was taken up by Gibbs allowed Jago to start a dribble which was taken up by Stoop and Hill. Down the field the Rose wearers dashed, Bailey Davies was passed simply, and it looked when there were no opponents in front a certainty of England scoring. However, Maddocks, with unexpected speed, dashed back, and taking a flying kick, saved the situation as far as Wales was concerned by turning the ball into touch. England failed to make use of the territorial advantage, for, despite poor passing by Evans, the home men got once more across the half-way line. Birkett, Stoop, and Jago were very prominent at this point. The fortunes of play quickly changed, and a passing movement initiated by Owen saw Trew handle, and then a chance being given to Gabe, the last named reaching Shewring drew also Scott's attentions, and then passed to Williams, who scored. The kick at taken goal by Gibbs from a difficult angle went wide.

The drawing of first blood evidently whetted the appetites of the Welshmen, for they were on the attack at once. Greeted by loud cheers, Jackett at this stage returned. Once Owen was held five yards out, and then Gabe's failure to hold the ball when he had a walk-in prevented a score. Passing among the English backs had been little and of poor quality, but at last Stoop, Birkett, and Coopper gave a display which equalled any of the game. It removed play well down the field, and looked dangerous until a punt gave Trew a chance to mark. Gibbs took the kick and found touch. Rarely has better footwork been witnessed than that which followed by the Welsh rover. Gibbs broke through with one of his renowned dribbles, and cross-kicking with fine judgment, he was on the ball just as it crossed the line. The English backs were absolutely nonplussed by the manœuvre, and were hopelessly beaten. It was as fine an individual try as ever was scored. Gibbs also converted.

In stopping a rush by the English forwards Trew was injured, and play was delayed for the regulation three minutes. Headed by Hill and Shaw the Saxon eight got to the Welsh twenty-five line, and here they at last succeeded in heeling from several scrummages. Jago up to this had had few chances in attack, but now he was able to set Birkett and Coopper thrice in motion. The defence prevailed, thanks to a great tackle by Trew who was again injured and retired. Stoop kicked over, but nothing resulted. Seldom has an International eight packed worse than did the Rose wearers at this stage—in fact, the most elementary principles of scrummage work were ignored. Just before half-time another score came to Wales. Owen passed to Gibbs and he to Gabe. The ex-London Welshman, finding the defence was being attracted to Evans, passed wide to Maddocks, who took the ball finely and gave the defence no chance. From a difficult angle Gibbs converted. On play being restarted by George Travers, it was observed that Trew had returned to his position in the Welsh team. The English forwards, led by Slocock and R. A. Hill, rushed ahead, and Bailey Davies was reached. The Dark Blue saved in dasing fashion by falling on the ball and allowing his forwards to get round. The Saxons attacked strongly, when Trew burst through and kicked to Jackett, who fielded finely and kicked back in the same movement. For off-side play by Owen, Birkett took a free kick, and punted to Baily Davies, who held the ball grandly near its own line, and punted back to centre touch. Grandly led by Hill, Slocock, and Hopley, the English eight were trying hard to break through the scrum, instead of heeling to the backs. Once they came away grandly, and looked like scoring, only a foolish kick sent the ball into Trew's hands, and he made a mark, and kicked to touch, and saved the danger to his side. The English eight were having by far the best of matters with the Welsh seven, but it was apparent that the wearers of the Rose lacked finish to allow of scoring. At last the English forwards gave their halves a chance, but Stoop had not gone far when he was tackled by R. A. Gibbs. Then the crowd got excited with a fine breakaway on the part of the Welsh forwards. They took the ball at their toes up to the English "25," after Shewring, Scott, and Jago had failed to stop them. Owen, running round on the "blind side," punted into touch ten yards from the Saxons' line. This attack was short-lived, as fine intercepting work by Birkett and Shewring helped the English forwards to take the ball right up to the Welsh full back. Davies again was safe and finding himself unable to get in his kick, showed excellent judgment in passing back to Trew, who found touch with his kick at the centre. The play of the Swansea captain, especially in defence, was an eye-opener to his friends and critics. England then made a series of short attacks on the Leeks' line. From one of these Jago received from the fringe of the scrum, and some nicely-combined play between Shewring and Scott ended in the Bristol player making a fine dash for the line. His progress was stopped ten yards from the Welsh line by an equally fine tackle on the part of Gabe.

Try as they would the Welshmen could not get out of their own quarter for some time, but the English team never looked like scoring, as the forwards were not sending the ball out. The Welsh defence was also good. Eventually the English "ups" did heel, and Jago again started his three-quarters by passing out to Shewring, who put in a commendable straight run, but again Gabe was prominent with grand tackling, as he stopped the English centre about three yards from the line. Wales at length gained relief by a free kick for off-side play on the part of the English forwards. Gibbs, the rover, found touch at the centre. Then Wales put in a great rush, forwards and backs participating. Jackett was at fault, and for once a scrummage was found near the English line. The Welsh seven heeled out in splendid fashion to Owen, who beat Jago and sent the ball to Trew, and after Gibbs, Evans, and Gabe had handled, the ball was sent to Williams, who beat Scott, and scored a corner try. It was got in thorough Welsh fashion, as all the backs handled except Bailey Davies. Gibbs failed to add the extra points.

This score made the Welsh "ups" play harder, and with Tom Evans at their head they rushed over the English line, and a minor was conceded. Jackett touching down in time. The kick-out helped England to relieve. Birkett put in a nice run after receiving from Stoop, but he was knocked over by Gibbs on the centre line. Owen got the ball away to Trew, who ran grandly, but Stoop ran back and brought off a fine tackle, and when the ball became loose, kicked into touch at the centre. The English eight were tiring, and the Welsh seven, led by Evans and Pritchard, dribbled to the English "25," where Watts cleverly crossed-kicked the ball to Brown. The latter made a splendid dash, and then passed to Maddocks. The London Welshman had only to fall over the line and score the fifth try in the corner. Gibbs again found the angle too difficult. Brown, in the movement which led to the scoring, was injured, but pluckily resumed. England was now a badly beaten side, and scoring from them looked very doubtful, especially as a couple of their three-quarters were limping—Birkett being practically a spectator. Jackett's hand was also very painful. S. F. Coopper came into prominence for once with a long drop at goal, which Bailey Davies easily fielded, and found touch with his return kick. Ten minutes was now wanting for the final whistle, when Travers came through a loose scrum with the ball at his toes and with the help of Pritchard and T. Evans went over the Rose's line, but Jackett pluckily fell on the ball. The Welsh forwards were beating the English "ups" anyhow now, and after a fine dribble by T. Evans, Pritchard, and Watts, the ball was passed to Gibbs—who seemed to be everywhere—who sent it on to Maddocks. The latter, after a burst, passed forward to Pritchard. Thus a fine chance of scoring was spoilt. A moment, later, after Stoop and Shewring had tried hard to stop them, the Welshman again came away, and Brown getting to the ball first scored the Leek's sixth try, in the corner. Gibbs failed to convert. Final score :—

UNIVERSITY BOAT RACE.

OXFORD.

Captain Willis was an interested spectator of the doings of the Dark Blues yesterday afternoon, when the work was again confined to the home water. Mr. H. Gold coached, and on the first outing the President also accompanied them. No tubbing was done, but three journeys were made in the eight.

The first time down Wednesday's order was adhered to, but on the second trip the President tried his hand at No. 4 thwart in place of the Blue, J. Dewar. The latter, however, went into the boat again when the final spin was taken, Hope making way for him at No. 3. The amended order was :—

CAMBRIDGE.

Probably owing to the fact that the Light Blues are to be given a week-end holiday, very heavy work was undertaken yesterday. All except stroke and No. 7 were given preliminary advice, and the President and G. L. Thomson, the Hall "Fresher," also had an outing. After lunch Mr. Johnstone went for a sharp scull to keep himself in condition. The only change was that a fresh coxswain was included. W. P. Ainley is a Jesus Freshman, and has only taken to the river this term.

The ship was launched at the usual time, and accompanied by Mr. Escombe, the crew pulled down to Baitsbite Locks in five or six stages of paddling at 24. The work was interspersed with a number of short bursts of rowing at an average stroke of 28. On the return journey they had two sharp bursts at top speed. This landed them at the Little Bridge, and as the men were already stripped, Mr. Escombe ordered a row to the Ditch. After starting rather badly they recovered in a few strokes, and Stuart succeeded in getting in 33 strokes to the full minute, reaching the Ditch in fairly good time. They then paddled on to Ditton, and stripping again, went back to headquarters with only one easy.

After being out at 10-45 this morning they will not be afloat again before Monday. Order and weights :—

BOXING.

NATIONAL SPORTING CLUB.

With everything indicating a fine night's sport, the members of the "National" assembled in great force on Monday evening when the curtain was rung up on the New Year. Of the various contests down for decision, that which created most interest was the meeting of Joe Fletcher (Camberwell) and Jack Turner (Glasgow), who were matched to box fifteen rounds at 9st. 8lbs. for stakes and a purse aggregating £150. Although both lads have only been boxing three seasons, their respective records are of a very lengthy character.

The Londoner, who is twenty-three years of age, and stands 5ft. 8in., has participated in fifty-seven battles, including victories over George Moore (Barking) (twice), Seaman Hayes (Hoxton) (twice), Bill Chester (Mile End), Alf. Reed (Canning Town), and Joe Goodwin (Spitalfields). He has also won the 9st. and middle-weight championships of France, while his most important contest was with Young Joseph at headquarters on 1st May 1904, when he contested a fifteen rounds draw. Recently he has met Dick Lee (Kentish Town) three times in contests limited to six rounds. The first encounter resulted in a draw, while the decision in the others went against him on points. For his present contest he was trained at the New Inn, Farnborough, in Kent, under the care of Bill Gibson, the well-known feather-weight boxer and runner. Not being overburdened with superfluous flesh, the Londoner was soon down to weight, and yesterday scaled 9st. 7lbs.

The Glasgow representative was born in 1883, and stands 5ft. 6½in., and generally boxes at 9st. 6lbs. In his most important engagements he has defeated Tom Marner (Greenock) in three rounds for £50 aside and the light-weight championship of Scotland, Private Baker (light-weight champion of India) in two rounds, Jim Waldie (Glasgow) in one round for stakes and purse amounting to £230, and Joe Riley (Aberdeen) in five rounds for the heavy-weight championship of Scotland, which title he recently lost at the Queen's Music Hall, Glasgow, when he was defeated by Pat McDonald in four rounds for £50. He has only boxed once at headquarters, when he easily defeated George Cook (Deptford) in two rounds. Upon articles being signed he repaired to Blantyre, having for his mentor Andrew Jephtha, while during the last week he concluded his preparation at Jolly Jumbo's establishment at Willesden, and had the assistance of Joe Palmer (four miles ex-champion). Yesterday he looked in the pink of condition, and was a couple of pounds within the prescribed weight.

It was past eleven o'clock before preparations were made for the chief event, for which Fletcher was installed a very warm favourite. During the early stages it appeared as if the Londoner would bring the bout to a premature conclusion, but the visitor put up a very game resistance, and after half a dozen rounds had been contested the exchanges became somewhat more even. In the tenth round the Scotsman raised the hopes of his partisans by scoring heavily on the head, which for a moment somewhat staggered Fletcher. He, however, quickly shook off the effects of this and gradually wore his opponent down, the referee stopping the bout midway through the thirteenth round, and declaring Fletcher the winner.

A series of six rounds contests was also included in the programme, which was supplemented by several "trials."

Alfred Shaw, the celebrated old Notts County cricketer, who has been lying seriously ill for some weeks past at his home at Gelding, near Nottingham, passed away quietly shortly after nine o'clock on Wednesday evening.

Shaw was in his sixty-fifth year, and for the past two or three years had been in enfeebled health, as the result of an apoplectic seizure. He was the surviving partner of the well-known firm of sports outfitters, Shaw and Shrewsbury, his famous cricketing colleague, Arthur Shrewsbury, coming to a sad and tragic end. Shaw had lain in a comatose condition for many days past.

"Halloa, George! What's everybody crowding out of the drawing-room for? Have refreshments been announced?" George : "No ; but Aunt Matilda is getting ready to sing."

"You understand," said the captain, that we want a secretary who is thoroughly accustomed to managing men." "In that case," answered the applicant, sadly, "I am afraid its not me you want, but my wife."

Hunting.

THE KARACHI HUNT.

THE hounds met on 17th January at Rai Singh's Well. We had barely got to the meet, when the hounds were away, running with lots of music towards the Guavas. After crossing the Rai Singh Bunds they swung sharp left and crossed the Maggir Pir Road about quarter mile above Rai Singh's Well, and on in the direction of the Windmill. A long line of camels checked them temporarily, but they were soon on again, and making the most of a catchy scent finally worked the line out to the big nullah near the Police Rifle Range. Here our jack had evidently been turned, and had retraced his steps. After some slow hunting, he was found lying up in Graham's spinney. He made a fine dash to save his brush and gave us a sharp gallop over the Long Bund, where the hounds finally ran into him, after a run lasting 1 hour and 10 minutes. The hounds ran fast to start with, but the scent gave out badly on the bare country to the left of the Maggir Pir Road, which made hunting slow and difficult.

A field of nineteen including Mrs. Travers and Mrs. Northen turned out at the Bunnia's Crossing at 7-15 A.M. on the 20th. Crossing the river and proceeding parallel to the Maggir Pir Road, the Master made one or two wide casts, and was fortunate in soon finding. The hounds got away nicely together, and ran fast towards the Chokidar's Khet. They checked on the banks of the river, but a cast on the far side soon put them right. The hounds got away very sharp out of some thick cover and took us unawares, so we had a fast gallop to get with them again. They were at fault again in the Pinjarapol fields, and owing to the field having pressed on too close to the hounds, the Master had some difficulty in regaining the line. He hit it off again at the spinney near the Jail end, and after that the hounds never checked till they ran their quarry to ground in the hills above the Malir Railway Crossing, after a grand run lasting about 57 minutes. Mrs. Travers, Mrs. Northen, Col. Travers, Capt. Northen and Messrs. Demetriadi, Wren and Stewart were up. As the earth was only a shallow one, Col. Travers and Mr. Demetriadi got to work with their crops, while the hounds were whipped off. The fox was soon unearthed, and it was a very pretty sight to see him coming down the hill. He was given a fair start, and then the hounds were laid on. But as soon as he found them getting on even terms with him on the flat, he turned back up the hill, and gave us a fast run of 20 minutes to the Rifle Butts where he got to earth again, and there we left him.

The field, who met the hounds at the New Jail at 7-15 on the 24th were rewarded by a capital morning's sport, and the longest run in the annals of the Hunt. Mrs. Graham, Mrs. Travers and Mrs. Northen represented the fair sex. The Master commenced by drawing the orchards near the Jail, and it was soon evident that there was a jack about. But the hounds were too quick for him, and we chopped in covert. Drawing along the river bank, we found again and got away after the straightest necked jack we have ever struck. The hounds hunted with a fine "spread" and were never at fault from start to finish, and went a tremendous pace. After leaving the river bed, the hounds carried the line past the Ruined Cottage and on towards the One Tree Bund. Leaving the One Tree Bund on our right, we had a long gallop over good going until we recrossed the river again, and then on, into country unknown even to our Master. With hounds and horses dead beat we finally ran into our jack on the Godat plain after a run lasting about one hour and a quarter, in which we covered about 15 miles. It was a magnificent run, hard to beat anywhere. It took the hounds, walking and trotting, four hours to come back to kennels, and the fact that they covered about 34 miles in the morning and were none the worse for it, speaks a great deal for their stamina, and for the excellence of their kennel management.

On the 27th we met at the Hunt Camp at Landhi. The thick mist prevented hunting until the sun was up too high. We left Camp about 7-45 and after drawing the Camp covert blank, had to stop for two hours owing to the denseness of the mist. We went on as soon as it was possible, but as soon as the mist lifted, it became very hot, and the hounds could make nothing of the scent.

SINDHI.

THE MADRAS HOUNDS.

THE weather was delightful last week the mornings being cold and crisp, with plenty of dew and a heavy mist until the sun was well above the horizon. Wednesday was not a good day. A small field, of perhaps a dozen riders, met the Master at Saidapet, fully half of them being ladies, and a new line was tried. Instead of crossing the river as usual, the Master drew up through the scrub and topes on the left bank. Hounds spoke doubtfully to a line about a mile up the river, but the scent gradually improved until we were going at a good, steady pace. The jack kept to the river bank, where the cover is thick and the field, being too eager, galloped up the side of the, coverts in the open and so headed the jack where he had to cross a patch of open ground. He turned sharp back, but hounds flashed on, and it was some minutes before the Master could get them back to the line. When this was accomplished it was found that the line was fouled and, though the jack had been viewed back, hounds could only speak to his line occasionally and he finally ran them out of scent. Then we crossed the Poonamallee Road and drew through the covert beyond it, afterwards crossing the river and drawing Scavenger Covert without finding anything but a stale line, which was followed slowly across the river and soon afterwards lost.

There was a field of nearly forty people out on Sunday, the 27th, among those present being Mrs. Horne, Mrs. Henderson, Miss Cornwall, Mrs. Branson, Mr. Yorke, Colonel Brownrigg, Major Elliott, Major Giffard, and many others. The meet was at the Mount, a venue which has so far this season always yielded sport. The Master took us, as usual, to Sheepshead Covert, but there was so much mist about that there was at first some difficulty in finding it. Here there was no jack, but hounds picked up a stale line, which they hunted cleverly round the covert, out on the Pallavaram side, back and then across the maidan to the back of the Cantonment. They never succeeded in getting near enough to the jack to make things interesting, and were at last stopped on a rocky hill on the Saidapet side of the Mount. They were then taken back and found a line by the edge of Sheepshead, running fast for a quarter of a mile through some crops, when they checked. The Master, however, viewed their quarry, which turned out to be a fox, and as it is useless trying to hunt these little beasts, which leave practically no scent, hounds were taken on towards the river. They were drawing the scrub on the bank when some of the field saw what turned out to be another—or perhaps the same—fox. The Master not knowing this, had none is laid on and they again ran at a good pace for a time, but were soon brought to their noses. They were eventually taken across the river and put into the big Porakapillay Covert, where they found a jack and bustled him around merrily. He broke towards Poonamallee, in view of hounds, but unfortunately,

In stopping a rush by the English forwards Trew was injured, and play was delayed for the regulation three minutes. Headed by Hill and Shaw the Saxon eight got to the Welsh twenty-five line, and here they at last succeeded in heeling from several scrummages. Jago up to this had had few chances in attack, but now he was able to set Birkett and Coopper thrice in motion. The defence prevailed, thanks to a great tackle by Trew who was again injured and retired. Stoop kicked over, but nothing resulted. Seldom has an International eight packed worse than did the Rose wearers at this stage—in fact, the most elementary principles of scrummage work were ignored. Just before half-time another score came to Wales. Owen passed to Gibbs and he to Gabe. The ex-London Welshman, finding the defence was being attracted to Evans, passed wide to Maddocks, who took the ball finely and gave the defence no chance. From a difficult angle Gibbs converted. Half-time score :—

	Pts.

On play being restarted by George Travers, it was observed that Trew had returned to his position in the Welsh team. The English forwards, led by Slocock and B. A. Hill, rushed ahead, and Bailey Davies was reached. The Dark Blue saved in dashing fashion by falling on the ball and allowing his forwards to get round. The Saxons attacked strongly, when Trew burst through and kicked to Jackett, who fielded finely and kicked back in the same movement. For off-side play by Owen, Birkett took a free kick, and punted to Baily Davies, who held the ball grandly near his own line, and punted back to centre touch. Grandly led by Hill, Slocock, and Hopley, the English eight were trying hard to break through the scrum, instead of heeling to the backs. Once they came away grandly, and looked like scoring, only a foolish kick sent the ball into Trew's hands, and he made a mark, and kicked to touch, and saved the danger to his side. The English eight were having by far the best of matters with the Welsh seven, but it was apparent that the wearers of the Rose lacked finish to allow of scoring. At last the English forwards gave their halves a chance, but Stoop had not gone far when he was tackled by R. A. Gibbs. Then the crowd got excited with a fine breakaway on the part of the Welsh forwards. They took the ball at their toes up to the English "25," after Shewring, Scott, and Jago had failed to stop them. Owen, running round on the "blind side," punted into touch ten yards from the Saxons' line. This attack was short-lived, as fine intercepting work by Birkett and Shewring helped the English forwards to take the ball right up to the Welsh full back. Davies again was safe and finding himself unable to get in his kick, showed excellent judgment in passing back to Trew, who found touch with his kick at the centre. The play of the Swansea captain, especially in defence, was an eye-opener to his friends and critics. England then made a series of short attacks on the Leeks' line. From one of these Jago received from the fringe of the scrum, and some nicely-combined play between Shewring and Scott ended in the Bristol player making a fine dash for the line. His progress was stopped ten yards from the Welsh line by an equally fine tackle on the part of Gabe.

Try as they would the Welshmen could not get out of their own quarter for some time, but the English team never looked like scoring, as the forwards were not sending the ball out. The Welsh defence was also good. Eventually the English "ups" did heel, and Jago again started his three-quarters by passing out to Shewring, who put in a commendable straight run, but again Gabe was prominent with grand tackling, as he stopped the English centre about three yards from the line. Wales at length gained relief by a free kick for off-side play on the part of the English forwards. Gibbs, the rover, found touch at the centre. Then Wales put in a great rush, forwards and backs participating. Jackett was at fault, and for once a scrummage was found near the English line. The Welsh seven heeled out in splendid fashion to Owen, who beat Jago and sent the ball to Trew, and after Gibbs, Evans, and Gabe had handled, the ball was sent to Williams, who beat Scott, and scored a corner try. It was got in thorough Welsh fashion, as all the backs handled except Bailey Davies. Gibbs failed to add the extra points.

This score made the Welsh "ups" play harder, and with Tom Evans at their head they rushed over the English line, and a minor was conceded. Jackett touching down in time. The kick-out helped England to relieve. Birkett put in a nice run after receiving from Stoop, but he was knocked over by Gibbs on the centre line. Owen got the ball away to Trew, who ran grandly, but Stoop ran back and brought off a fine tackle, and when the ball became loose, kicked into touch at the centre. The English eight were tiring, and the Welsh seven, led by Evans and Pritchard, dribbled to the English "25," where Watts cleverly crossed-kicked the ball to Brown. The latter made a splendid dash, and then passed to Maddocks. The London Welshman had only to fall over the line and score the fifth try in the corner. Gibbs again found the angle too difficult. Brown, in the movement which led to the scoring, was injured, but pluckily resumed. England was now a badly beaten side, and scoring from them looked very doubtful, especially as a couple of their three-quarters were limping—Birkett being practically a spectator. Jackett's hand was also very painful. S. F. Coopper came into prominence for once with a long drop at goal, which Bailey Davies easily fielded, and found touch with his return kick. Ten minutes was now wanting for the final whistle, when Travers came through a loose scrum with the ball at his toes and with the help of Pritchard and T. Evans went over the Rose's line, but Jackett pluckily fell on the ball. The Welsh forwards were beating the English "ups" anyhow now, and after a fine dribble by T. Evans, Pritchard, and Watts, the ball was passed to Gibbs—who seemed to be everywhere—who sent it on to Maddocks. The latter, after a burst, passed forward to Pritchard. Thus a fine chance of scoring was spoilt. A moment, later, after Stoop and Shewring had tried hard to stop them, the Welshman again came away, and Brown getting to the ball first scored the Leek's sixth try, in the corner. Gibbs failed to convert. Final score :—

The hounds ran fast to start with, but the scent gave out badly on the bare country to the left of the Maggir Pir Road, which made hunting slow and difficult.

A field of nineteen including Mrs. Travers and Mrs. Northen turned out at the Bunnia's Crossing at 7-15 A.M. on the 20th. Crossing the river and proceeding parallel to the Maggir Pir Road, the Master made one or two wide casts, and was fortunate in soon finding. The hounds got away nicely together, and ran fast towards the Chokidar's Khet. They checked on the banks of the river, but a cast on the far side soon put them right. The hounds got away very sharp out of some thick cover and took us unawares, so we had a fast gallop to get with them again. They were at fault again in the Pinjarapol fields, and owing to the field having pressed on too close to the hounds, the Master had some difficulty in regaining the line. He hit it off again at the spinney near the Jail end, and after that the hounds never checked till they ran their quarry to ground in the hills above the Malir Railway Crossing, after a grand run lasting about 57 minutes. Mrs. Travers, Mrs. Northen, Col. Travers, Capt. Northen and Messrs. Demetriadi, Wren and Stewart were up. As the earth was only a shallow one Col. Travers and Mr. Demetriadi got to work with their crops, while the hounds were whipped off. The fox was soon unearthed, and it was a very pretty sight to see him coming down the hill. He was given a fair start, and then the hounds were laid on. But as soon as he found them getting on even terms with him on the flat, he turned back up the hill, and gave us a fast run of 20 minutes to the Rifle Butts where he got to earth again, and there we left him.

The field, who met the hounds at the New Jail at 7-15 on the 24th were rewarded by a capital morning's sport, and the longest run in the annals of the Hunt. Mrs. Graham, Mrs. Travers and Mrs. Northen represented the fair sex. The Master commenced by drawing the orchards near the Jail, and it was soon evident that there was a jack about. But the hounds were too quick for him, and we chopped in covert. Drawing along the river bank, we found again and got away after the straightest necked jack we have ever struck. The hounds hunted with a fine "spread" and were never at fault from start to finish, and went a tremendous pace. After leaving the river bed, the hounds carried the line past the Ruined Cottage and on towards the One Tree Bund. Leaving the One Tree Bund on our right, we had a long gallop over good going until we recrossed the river again, and then on, into country unknown even to our Master. With hounds and horses dead beat we finally ran into our jack on the Godat plain after a run lasting about one hour and a quarter, in which we covered about 15 miles. It was a magnificent run, hard to beat anywhere. It took the hounds, walking and trotting, four hours to come back to kennels, and the fact that they covered about 36 miles in the morning and were none the worse for it, speaks a great deal for their stamina, and for the exellence of their kennel management.

On the 27th we met at the Hunt Camp at Landhi. The thick mist prevented hunting until the sun was up too high. We left Camp about 7-15 and after drawing the Camp covert blank, had to stop for two hours owing to the denseness of the mist. We went on as soon as it was possible, but as soon as the mist lifted, it became very hot, and the hounds could make nothing of the scent.

SINDHI.

THE MADRAS HOUNDS.

THE weather was delightful last week the mornings being cold and crisp, with plenty of dew and a heavy mist until the sun was well above the horizon. Wednesday was not a good day A small field, of perhaps a dozen riders, met the Master at Saidapet, fully half of them being ladies, and a new line was tried. Instead of crossing the river as usual, the Master drew up through the scrub and topes on the left bank. Hounds spoke doubtfully to a line about a mile up the river, but the scent gradually improved until we were going at a good, steady pace. The jack kept to the river bank, where the cover is thick and the field, being too eager, galloped up the side of the coverts in the open and so headed the jack where he had to cross a patch of open ground. He turned sharp back, but hounds flashed on, and it was some minutes before the Master could get them back to the line. When this was accomplished it was found that the line was fouled and, though the jack had been viewed back, hounds could only speak to his line occasionally and he finally ran them out of scent. Then we crossed the Poonamallee Road and drew through the covert beyond it, afterwards crossing the river and drawing Scavenger Covert without finding anything but a stale line, which was followed slowly across the river and soon afterwards lost.

There was a field of nearly forty people out on Sunday, the 27th, among those present being Mrs. Horne, Mrs. Henderson, Miss Cornwall, Mrs. Branson, Mr. Yorke, Colonel Brownrigg, Major Elliott, Major Giffard, and many others. The meet was at the Mount, a venue which has so far this season always yielded sport. The Master took us, as usual, to Sheepshead Covert, but there was so much mist about that there was at first some difficulty in finding it. Here there was no jack, but hounds picked up a stale line, which they hunted cleverly round the covert, out on the Pallavaram side, back and then across the maidan to the back of the Cantonment. They never succeeded in getting near enough to the jack to make things interesting, and were at last stopped on a rocky hill on the Saidapet side of the Mount. They were then taken back and found a line by the edge of Sheepshead, running fast for a quarter of a mile through some crops, when they checked. The Master, however, viewed their quarry, which turned out to be a fox, and as it is useless trying to hunt these little beasts, which leave practically no scent, hounds were taken on towards the river. They were drawing the scrub on the bank when some of the field saw what turned out to be another—or perhaps the same—fox. The Master not knowing this, had hounds laid on and they again ran at a good pace for a time, but were soon brought to their noses. They were eventually taken across the river and put into the big Porakapillay Covert, where they found a jack and bustled him around merrily. He broke towards Poonamallee, in view of hounds, but unfortunately, turned a moment later back into the covert. Here hounds had more hard work, but at last he broke again, this time to the east and ran a perfectly straight line to an earth where he was marked to ground. This is the same earth in which a jack from the same covert took refuge earlier in the season. Efforts were made to get the jack out but a couple of hounds got into the earth and killed her there.

Hounds were now taken across the river to the mango tope by the railway line, and here it was not long before the field had a very welcome gallop. Hounds soon found a jack, who broke on the side opposite to the railway and swung round until he was facing for the Pallavaram Hills. He made for these in an absolutely straight line and over the best of going. The jack gained the first ridge of the hills, crossing only about a hundred yards in front of the leading hounds, who got a view on the top of the saddle and went after him at a great pace. He swung to the left along the foot of the next ridge, and then made an attempt to get up them but was too late, and hounds killed him in a gravel pit. It was now very late and the field having had the gallop they wanted, hounds were sent home.

Last Wednesday morning we had another excellent day's sport, for the hot weather and dewless mornings of the first three weeks of February seem to have left us, and we again had perfect weather and a heavy dew. The meet was at the 6th milestone on the Poonamallee Road, and though the field was not large we had quite as many riders out as is usual on Wednesdays. These included Mrs. Clementson, Mrs. Horne, Mrs. Miller, Mrs. Marjoribanks, and several gentlemen. The Master lost no time after the field had assembled, throwing hounds at once into the Casuarina tope by the side of the road This was empty and we then crossed the river, drawing some scrub on the left bank without result. Then another Casuarina covert was tried, further up the river, and here hounds opened on a line almost as soon as they were put in. The covert was too small to give the jack a chance of eluding hounds and he broke without delay, swinging to the left, and crossing a long stretch of rather wet paddy, evidently pointing for the thick coverts that fringe the river bank. Hounds were running very fast, gaining rapidly, and before the jack reached his point they got a view and nearly caught him. He reached the coverts, however, and here hounds were brought to their noses, but they continued to run him prettily up the river bank for some distance, having eventually to give him up. The Master was informed by a man who was certain he had seen the jack, that he was still forward and so hounds were held on, but no trace of his line was found and a cast back was tried. This was successful, and the line took us back the way we had come, then, turning again, continued up the river, parallel with the bank. Here the pace was very fast and the going all that could be desired. The heavy mist, which has been a feature of every morning this week, was so thick in places that it was difficult at times to see the hounds, but they gave tongue freely or we might have missed them. At last hounds ran into their jack in a mango tope near the 8th milestone and killed him after more than half an hour's fast run—quite the best hunt of the season. The brush was presented to Mrs. Branson.

We then crossed the river, drawing some of the coverts to the south of the road without success; then back again to the left bank and began to draw towards home. We had not yet finished the day's sport, however, for a hound spoke to a line in some prickly-pear and the rest of the pack coming up they hustled the jack through some very thick cover and forced him into the open. Then followed a very fast burst across the fields to another dense prickly-pear clump on the river bank, where the jack went to ground. He bolted, however, as hounds were being called off and tried to get across the river. He was headed by the natives who had turned out to watch the sport and made for the covert where he was at first found. Here he was again headed by the villagers who, however, soiled the scent and he had to be left. This ended what was certainly one of the best days of the season.

CALCUTTA PAPERCHASES

No. 7.

IT was a pleasure to return after so many days to the Red Road country. Last year, owing to the heavy cold weather rain, only one chase could be laid west of the Gurriah Hat Road and we were perforce treated to a full course of the monotonous Salt Lake country. Last Saturday the meet was on the Red Road itself. Starting on the near side of the Railway the paper led over the crossing and away south by an old route to the Molia Hat Road, only one mud wall intervening. Crossing the Tollygunge Lane and two more walls, the course curled through the Durzis' Village and at last turned north again past the big burial ground to the Sandy Lane and the Old Man's Crossing; thence through the jungle to the open ground, where a four mile course finished over its first fence.

Mr. Turner on Bluebell and Mr. Deakin on Trilby laid the paper and on their return found a very large field awaiting despatch. Some fifty horses were sent away and there was much crowding at the first hurdle; this in spite of a false start due to the anxiety of the Average Cup and other thrusters to get a clear run through the Railway Gates. Mr Birkmyre on his English mare turned over at the first hurdle and brought down a bay, and unfortunately himself counted a broken collarbone, a sprained wrist and a lot of bad bruises At the first wall the refusal of Great Hart caused dire confusion in the front division, six or seven horses stopping behind him. Mr. Evers on Orphan Boy turned over at a nasty drop just before reaching this fence. Mr. Rees on Turk with Detective, Myrene, and Lord Harry then took a tremendous lead, but the long jungle that followed enabled Fairy, Great Hart, and Ruddigore to get on terms with the place hunters. The rest of the chase was more or less of a procession, but anyone who wanted a place had to shove along pretty fast, as Turk went at a good pace throughout. The order was:—

1. Mr. Rees on Turk.
2. Mr. Ballantyne on Fairy.
3. Mrs. Lamond Walker on Detective.
4. Mr. Pugh on Great Hart.
5. Mr. Halliday on Ruddigore.
6. Mr. Pauntley on Ledbury.

The ponies were in great force and Mr. Bell-Irving on Samah took them along almost as fast as the horse chase. Mr. Muir and Mr. Antram with Puck and Pathfinder lay next, with Mrs. Paris and Mrs. Stokes also well up. At the last hurdle Branga came with a rush and Samah being flurried took off too soon and turned clean over. The order was:—

1. Mr. Evers on Branga.
2. Mr. Wm. Muir on Clarice.
3. Mr. Antram on Blazes.
4. Capt Holden on Pathfinder.
5. Mr. Macdonnell on Ziz Zag.
6. Mr. Barrow on Puck.

BLARNEY.

Jones: "Well, come along in to lunch."— Robinson: I'll be in directly, I just want to wash my hands." "Wash your hands! What on earth for?"— "Cleanliness, I suppose. Don't you" —"Rather not." "Why?" —"Absolutely ruins your grip for the afternoon round!" (Left maculate.)

Polo.

THE BURMA BATTALIONS INTER-REGIMENTAL TOURNAMENT.

FIVE teams in all entered for this popular fixture, which was played off at Mandalay on 5th January and subsequent days. Before the commencement of the tournament opinions differed very markedly as to what team had the greatest chance of carrying off the handsome trophy that is annually put up to the challenge. The following Regiments were represented, viz.:—72nd, 90th, and 92nd Punjabis, the 93rd Burma Infantry and the 1st-10th Gurkha Rifles. Victory eventually fell to the 90th Punjabis after a hard-fought game, and the 92nd in whose possession the cup has remained for the last three years in succession and five times since the vase was first introduced, had, perforce, to relinquish their claim to it this year. One special, feature noticeable throughout the tournament, was the great improvement, taken as a whole, in the quality of the actual play, as compared to what was witnessed during the contest that took place precisely a year ago. On occasions strokes, rigidly condemned in first class polo, were exhibited, but these errors of judgment were not conspicuous for their extent. Many of those competing have made considerable strides on the high-road to proficiency.

FIRST ROUND.

The first round commenced at 4-30 P.M., on 5th January, and consisted of one match between 1st-10th Gurkha Rifles and 93rd Burma Infantry, victory falling to the Gurkhas.

1ST-10TH GURKHA RIFLES vs. 93RD BURMA INFANTRY.

GURKHAS.			93RD BURMA INFANTRY.
Mr. Simpson	...	1	Mr. Summers	... 1
Mr. Atkinson	...	2	Capt. Simpson	.. 2
Mr. Higgin	...	3	Major Whitehead	... 3
Mr. Ainsworth		(back.)	Major Strickland	(back.)

Umpires:—Major Townsend and Mr. Lakin.

First Chukker.—The match starts with even play in midfield, neither team claiming an advantage. Ainsworth, however, seizes a chance, and getting through the 93rd defence, scores a goal for the Gurkhas. The latter still maintain the upper-hand and a shot at goal goes wide. The 93rd now take the ball up the field, but Ainsworth saves in good style, and play is once more brought back to the 93rd quarter, where the whistle blows for a dangerous foul against the Gurkhas. Strickland takes the hit, but no score results. The 93rd now attack, but Whitehead misses a good opportunity. Ainsworth sends a hard drive up the ground and Strickland in attempting to meet it misses, thereby letting Simpson of the Gurkhas in, who gets clean off and places the ball between the posts. The rest of the chukker is all in favour of the Gurkhas, and Higgin adds a minor point to their score. Score: Gurkhas, 2 goals 1 subsidiary; 93rd, nil.

Second Chukker.—The second period was conspicuous for the very heavy scoring put up by the Gurkhas, who literally smothered their opponents. Strickland starts the game from the 93rd back line, but the hit out is cleverly met by Simpson, who notches up a neat goal for the Gurkhas. The latter continue to harry the 93rd, and a good centre gives Ainsworth his opportunity, who contributes another well placed goal. Play is still restricted to the 93rd quarter, and Strickland in clearing the goal drives the ball behind. Ainsworth takes the 60 yards hit, but no score results. A scrimmage, however, ensues in front of the 93rd goal, and another major point is recorded for the Gurkhas. The ball, on being restarted, passes into possession of the Gurkhas, who hustling it down the field in excellent style score a subsidiary. Some sticky play ensues, Ainsworth enlivens matters by a long attempt at goal, but the shot crosses beyond the subsidiary marks. The 93rd now remain penned in their own 50 yards, and once more in self-defence Strickland drives the ball over the 93rd back line. Ainsworth takes the penalty, but again fails to profit by the free hit. From the hit out Simpson intercepts neatly and puts on a good goal for the Gurkhas. The 93rd now rally their somewhat scattered combination, and forcing their antagonists on the defensive, Simpson scores the first point (subsidiary) for the 93rd from a long shot near the side line. The Gurkhas, however, promptly retaliate by Ainsworth notching up yet another goal. Score: Gurkhas, 7 goals 2 subsidiaries; 93rd, 1 subsidiary.

Third Chukker.—In the third period the 93rd played with far greater dash and neither team could claim the advantage, play being of a far more even character. At the commencement of the chukker some fast up and down runs are seen, but Ainsworth slipping in puts up another goal for the Gurkhas. The 93rd reply with a subsidiary from Simpson, after which the ball remains in the vicinity of the centre flags. The 93rd now get the upper hand, and Whitehead shoots, but the ball striking the goal post remains in play, and is cleared by the Gurkhas. Some loose galloping is indulged in, but the Gurkhas press and another goal is waved up in their favour. A long shot by Strickland which fails to score ends the period. Score: Gurkhas. 8 goals 3 subsidiaries; 93rd, 1 goal 2 subsidiaries.

Fourth Chukker.—The fourth period is productive of even play for both teams, a slight advantage accruing to the 93rd. Play opens with an attack by the 93rd and a minor point is recorded by that team. The ball is kept travelling up and down the field, but the defence on either side proves too strong to break down until Atkinson puts in a fine run and scores a goal for the Gurkhas. Just on the close of time the 93rd retaliate and score a goal. Final Score: Gurkhas, 9 goals 3 subsidiaries; 93rd, 2 goals 3 subsidiaries.

The Gurkhas played an excellent game all through, and Simpson as No. 1 showed up conspicuously in the manner in which he met the ball from the hit out. Ainsworth, as back, played with excellent judgment. Had the opposing team been stronger his thrusting tactics might have led to disaster at times, but it is half the battle for a captain to size up the calibre of his opponents, and suit his play accordingly. Though he played what many would have called a No. 3 game, yet when the necessity for defence arose, the pace of his ponies always enabled him to be in the right place at the right moment. One feature of his play was most marked, that of hitting out across his own goal. This practice is dangerous, unless the back never bungles his stroke, and the opponents are not over-quick on the ball. It also tends to upset the combination of the team. There are, however, times when such the procedure is justifiable, and if bought off as a surprise frequently leads to great success. The final score will show that the Gurkha back could not be accused of misjudgment in practising this manœuvre. Its success alone justified its occasional adoption.

SEMI-FINALS.

Two matches were on the programme for the second round, which was played off on Monday, 7th January. The outcome of the two contests was that the 90th Punjabis beat the 92nd by 4 goals and 3 subsidiaries to 1 goal, and the 1st-10th Gurkhas knocked up 2 goals and 5 subsidiaries to the 72nd Punjabis 1 goal and 1 subsidiary. Both games were very evenly contested, and play was interesting throughout.

90TH vs. 92ND PUNJABIS.

Mr. Apthorpe	...	1	Mr. Lakin ...	... 1
Mr. Thyne	...	2	Mr. Burne ...	... 2
Mr. Butterfield	...	3	Major Harrington	... 3
Major Baldwin		(back.)	Mr. Bigg	(back.)

Umpires:—Major Whitehead and Captain Headlam.

First Chukker.—Play opens by the 90th commencing to press their opponents, but the ball goes out behind the back line. Butterfield puts in a good run but no score results; shortly afterwards the 90th have another shot at 92nd goal, but again fail to send either flag waving; this attempt is immediately followed by yet a third essay to draw first blood but without success. From the hit out, however, Butterfield meets in good style and opens the score by a subsidiary for the 90th. The 92nd now play up hard, but though the ball is constantly being driven towards the 90th goal. Butterfield returns it with equal interest, and the 92nd fail to probe the defence. The period ends with no further addition to the score. Score: 90th, 1 subsidiary; 92nd, nil.

Second Chukker.—On the resumption of play the 90th immediately attack. Butterfield shoots, but the ball goes wide The 92nd then press, but Butterfield's defence is still unbreakable, and the 90th turning the tables on their adversaries notch up another subsidiary. The ball is kept in midfield for some time till Lakin enlivens matters with a smart run which, however, is cut short, but the ball bumping whilst Butterfield takes a near side back-hander lets Burne in who scores an easy goal, thereby putting his team ahead of the 90th. This success seems to have put new dash into the 92nd, for they press their opponents in a most determined fashion, and come within an ace of snicking another goal, but whilst the ball is within a few feet of the posts. Butterfield dashes in brilliant style, clears the goal by a powerful drive to the side-line, and following up makes a very fine run along the west side, and passing to Apthorpe, the latter shoots a good goal. This splendid save and run by Butterfield and his subsequent well-timed pass to Apthorpe was undoubtedly the feature of this particular match. Score: 90th, 1 goal 2 subsidiaries; 92nd, 1 goal.

Third Chukker.—From the throw in the ball passes into the possession of the 90th; Butterfield centres to Thyne, and the latter puts up a subsidiary. The remainder of the period is characterized by fast up and down play. Each team in turn attacks, a shot by Apthorpe is saved excellently by Lakin, and Rigg intercepts a useful run by Butterfield. A long try at goal by the latter, which fails to score terminates the chukker. Score: 90th 1 goal 3 subsidiaries; 92nd, 1 goal.

Fourth Chukker.—Excitement runs high as the players emerge for the final chukker. A goal to the 92nd will land them victors, Suspense however, is not endured long. From the hit out. Thyne blocks the ball, and very cleverly manœuvres it between the posts thus putting the 90th ahead by a goal The 92nd now do their utmost to equalize goals, and matters look dangerous, but the situation is saved by Baldwin at back. The 90th strive to put victory beyond question. Apthorpe getting on to the ball in good style in 92nd quarter, dribbles the ball up most successfully, and scores another goal for 90th. Shortly after the game is restarted the whistle blows and a dangerous foul is given against 90th. Rigg takes the shot, but the ball is blocked by Baldwin, and the goal cleared by Butterfield. Some fast galloping takes place till Butterfield meeting a smart back hander, drives it in first class style towards the 92nd goal, where Thyne picking it up carries it on through the posts. Even play ensues till the bell rings proclaiming "time." Final score: 90th Punjabis, 4 goals; 3 subsidiaries, 92nd Punjabis, 1 goal.

The result of this match came to some as a great surprise, but not to those who had been previously playing in Mandalay. Out of the 92nd team three were recruited from the most Northern, Eastern and Southern boundaries of Burma, one member came from Mogaung in the Myitkyina District, one from Lashio in the Shan States, and one from Port Blair in the Andaman Islands. A team concentrated in this fahsion at the last moment, however high a reputation each individual player may enjoy, must be weak in combination. Under such circumstances it would be preferable, if possible, to select a team with lesser reputation, and perhaps smaller experience, but which could practise together beforehand. Such a quartette would probably have an equal chance of winning. Butterfield was the mainstay of the 90th team. He played throughout with excellent judgment, feeding his No. 2 from a distance with his clean forward drives and his hard back-handers, and at the same time always ready to help, or to take the place of his back when the necessity arose. Thyne, as No. 2, played a pushing game, and the manner in which he interchanged with his No. 1 was conspicuous and emphasized the excellence of the 90th combination. Apthorpe, at No. 1, played a sound game, and worked with his brains, and contributed greatly to the success of his side.

72ND PUNJABIS.			1ST-10TH GURKHAS.
Mr. Adam	...	1	Mr. Simpson ...	... 1
Mr. Burnett	...	2	Mr. Atkinson	... 2
Mr. McCormick	...	3	Mr. Higgin ...	... 3
Capt. Bredin		(back.)	Mr. Ainsworth	(back.)

Umpires:—Major Townsend and Major Whitehead.

First Chukker.—The Gurkhas claim an advantage at the start, and rushing the ball down the field send it over the 72nd back line. The latter retaliate, but fail to score. The Gurkhas once more take the offensive, and a shot at goal just dribbles over the subsidiary line, McCormick being too late to save. Fast up and down play characterizes the rest of the period. At one time the 72nd look like scoring. Bredin meets the ball well, and drives it smartly down the field, but Ainsworth saves, and the ball goes out of play. Score: 72nd—nil. Gurkhas—1 subsidiary.

Second Chukker.—From the throw in the Gurkhas gain possession, and shoot, but the ball goes wide; after some even play, enlivened by a sharp run by Adam, the Gurkhas have another long attempt, but this also fails. The hit out, which is topped, is blocked by Atkinson. who takes the ball towards the goal, but at the critical moment drops a very easy chance. The game is now restricted to the neighbourhood of the centre flags, but Ainsworth getting smartly on to it notches a good goal for the Gurkhas. The latter still maintain the offensive, but Bredin saves in brilliant style. Adam puts up a fine run, the ball subsequently passing to McCormick, who, however, fails to take due advantage of a favourable opportunity to score. A rush by the Gurkhas terminates the period. Score: 72nd, nil; Gurkhas, 1 goal; 1 subsidiary.

Third Chukker. The Gurkhas immediately assume the offensive, and Ainsworth, from a well-placed centre, slips through and scores a fine goal for the Gurkhas. For the next two minutes play is all in favour of the Gurkhas, who continue to harass their opponents and keep them actively employed in the defence of their own goal till Ainsworth, picking up a good pass, spurts up the field, and adds a minor point. Shortly aferwards Simpson follows suit, but without success. Two more subsidiaries for the Gurkhas are, however, flagged up in rapid succession, and a third follows within a few seconds from a scrimmage in front of the 72nd goal. This ends the chukker. Score: 72nd, nil; Gurkhas, 2 goals; 5 subsidiaries.

Fourth Chukker.—The last period is all in favour of the 72nd, who seem to have settled down to their game better. The 72nd begin to press, and Burnett has a good shot at goal, but Ainsworth saves well. Fast play continues until McCormick, getting clear, puts up an excellent run, which results in a subsidiary being recorded. On the game being restarted play is confined to midfield. Burnett centres well to McCormick, but the attempt at goal is frustrated. His chance, however, comes quickly, for slipping Ainsworth, he takes the ball on and a goal is waved up for the 72nd. Few seconds of time only remain, and when the bell rings no further points have been added to the credit of either team. Final score: 72nd, 1 goal; 1 subsidiary; Gurkhas, 2 goals; 5 subsidiaries.

MABIE, TODD and BARD, 79 and 80, High Holborn, ondon. W.C

The 72nd were labouring under an undoubted disadvantage. Owing to the rigours of up-to-date military energy, and the worries of General's inspection, practice before the tournament had been rendered impossible. Burnett seemed off-colour, and was not playing with his customary dash. Adam, at No. 1, worked hard throughout, Bredin's defence was excellent, but the ponies on which he was mounted, considerably handicapped him, and consequently he was unable to do himself full justice. The Gurkhas were, on the whole, better mounted than their rivals. Ainsworth desisted from hitting out across his own goal. The risk, with the game hanging in the balance till the very end, of carrying out this manœuvre would not have been justifiable. The shooting of the Gurkha team might have been more accurate.

FINAL.

The final between the 90th Punjabis and the 1st-10th Gurkhas were played off on 9th January and resulted in a win for the 90th by 4 goals to 1 goal.

Umpires :—Major Townsend and Major Whitehead.

Everyone contemplated a keenly contested match and the spectators were by no means disappointed.

First Chukker.—From the throw in the ball goes to Ainsworth who takes it smartly down the field, but his run is stopped. The Gurkhas, however, continue to press, and Ainsworth has a shot which goes wide. The game is transferred to midfield, but after some attacks and counterattacks by both sides, Baldwin passes the ball to Butterfield, who scores the first goal for the 90th. The Gurkhas make every effort to equalize matters but the ball crosses the 90th back-line. The latter again come to the fore with a smart run by Butterfield, who passes to Thyne, enabling him to put up another goal to the credit of his side. From the throw in the ball passes on to Butterfield, who has a long attempt at goal without success. A sharp run by Apthorpe, without scoring, closes the chukker.

Second Chukker.—The second period opens with some hard galloping, till play stops on the whistle. A dangerous foul is given against the Gurkhas. Butterfield takes the penalty, but tops the ball, and no score results. From the hit out Butterfield meets the ball well and again drives it over the Gurkhas' back-line. Play now becomes fast and furious, and Apthorpe opens out with a good run, but Ainsworth saves with dash, and the Gurkhas take the offensive. The attack is soon driven back, and the 90th look like scoring. Ainsworth saves splendidly picking the ball up in front of goal in capital style, clears, and following up, contributes a fine run up the side-line, but the ball bouncing, he misses the pass. Even play now ensues, but the 90th eventually press, and drive the ball over the Gurkhas back-line. The hit out is cleverly blocked by Butterfield, who shoots at goal; Ainsworth again saves in excellent fashion, but forces the ball beyond his own back-line. Butterfield takes the 60 yard shot, but it is successfully stopped and play is confined to the centre flags. Here the Gurkhas get an opportunity. A good centre gives Atkinson the ball, and he manages to score the first goal for the Gurkhas. Score : 90th Punjabis, 2 goals; Gurkhas, 1 goal.

Third Chukker.—This period appeared to be of very short duration. Nothing noticeable occurred, and neither team claimed an advantage; play was of an even character throughout. No additions to the respective scores were recorded. Score : 90th Punjabis, 2 goals; Gurkhas, 1 goal.

Fourth Chukker.—At the commencement of the final period the 90th have the advantage of 1 goal, but victory is still undecided. From the start the Gurkhas attack vigorously and steadily, but they cannot send either flag waving. The 90th gain the upper hand, and carrying all before them notch up another goal. From the throw in the 90th get the ball, and Thyne looks like scoring, but Ainsworth again comes to the rescue of his side. The 90th, however, are not to be denied, and close on the call of time. Apthorpe puts up a good run, and adds another major point to the 90th total. Final score : 90th Punjabis, 4 goals; 1st-10th Gurkhas, 1 goal.

For the winning team Butterfield's defence was impenetrable, and his back-handers on both sides as often as not went right through the play. His judgment was sound all along, and he never missed or gave to the opposing side an opportunity. He was ably backed up by Baldwin. The forwards were busy the whole time, and marked their men well. For the losers Ainsworth did yeoman service. The clever manner in which he saved goal after goal was specially commendable. Had he obtained a little more support from his No. 3 victory might have fallen to the subalterns. The Gurkha team had been carefully coached, and moreover on sound principles. It is frequently noticeable that a back on the defensive, on principle, and without troubling to look where his own side are situated, invariably back-hands towards the side-line. If it were remembered that the game is from goal to goal, and that the object (except, of course, in the immediate vicinity of goal), should be to bring the ball into the centre again as soon as possible, better all round play would result. The touch-line policy is against all the fundamental principles of any contest, i. e., to obtain, retain, and work on the "inner-lines." The Gurkha team should congratulate themselves on their excellent play throughout the tournament.

LUCKNOW POLO TOURNAMENT.
XV. HUSSARS CUP.

FIRST TIE.

THE Agra Polo Tournament and the Minto Fancy Fête have both conspired to interfere with the success of this Tournament, the opening tie in which was played on the Mahomed Bagh ground on Friday afternoon the 1st instant, in the presence of a fair gathering. Only five teams have entered. The opening game was a most disappointing one, owing to the disparity between the sides. The Gymkhana were outplayed at every point, and were eventually defeated by the Crusaders by the big margin of 11 goals, and 7 subsidiaries to one goal.

First Chukker.—The Crusaders from the outset showed their superiority over their opponents, at once carrying the ball to the Gymkhana's end, where they scored two subsidiaries in rapid succession. Play continued in the Gymkhana territory, where Morland got on the ball, and hit a goal from a fine long shot. From the re-start the Crusaders again got possession and working the ball down, made a minor point. A foul was then given against the Gymkhana, out of which the Crusaders were successful in adding another goal to their total. Score : Crusaders—2 goals and 3 subsidiaries Gymkhana—nil.

Second Chukker.—The Crusaders continued on the attack, the want of organisation on the part of the Gymkhana being very noticeable. Some splendid play was witnessed on the part of the Crusaders, who broke through the defence and obtained a goal from a neat shot in front of the flags, and followed it up with two more major points. Score : Crusaders—5 goals and 4 subsidiaries. Gymkhana—nil.

Third Chukker.—The success which attended the Crusaders' efforts began to grow a little monotonous for the on-lookers. The Crusaders were, however, not so sure on the ball, and many of their shots were misdirected. Play was confined to the Gymkhana almost throughout and just before the conclusion of the chukker, Watson hit a fine goal. Score : Crusaders—6 goals and 4 subsidiaries. Gymkhana—nil.

Fourth Chukker.—From a mêlee in front of the Gymkhanas flags, Farran hit the ball over the heads of the players, and obtained a goal. From the re-start the same player, who was in great form, secured the ball, and hit a goal from a magnificent shot, amidst applause. Score : Crusaders—8 goals and 4 subsidiaries. Gymkhana—nil.

Fifth Chukker.—The Gymkhana played up and Scott made a goal for them soon after the commencement of the chukker. The Crusaders retaliated with a major point. Score : Crusaders—9 goals and 4 subsidiaries. Gymkhana—1 goal.

Sixth Chukker.—The Crusaders were evidently giving their ponies a rest, and did not press. No score.

Seventh Chukker.—The Crusaders made a goal.

Eighth Chukker.—There was no scoring although the Crusaders were on the defensive almost throughout. The Crusaders won by 10 goals and 4 subsidiaries to 1 goal by the Gymkhana. Teams :

The Birmingham papers tell us of a citizen who, being taken suddenly ill, was attended to by the local fire brigade in the absence of a doctor. This certainly seems a little premature but Birmingham was ever a goahead city.

"It is jolly cold just now," remarked Lushington. This morning as I was getting up I could see my breath." "How horrible!" shuddered his patient little wife.—

First Reporter: "Why are you so nervous; got a hard job?" Second Reporter "Yes; I'm writing an article on oysters, and I was told not to use once the expression 'succulent bivalve.'"

"In Germany and many parts of England the mistletoe is hung over the doorway to keep away the witches.' This was the sentence the dear old schoolmaster wrote on the blackboard; but while his back was turned a nice little boy altered the first letter of "witches," and so caused a good deal of trouble.

Rowing.

THE MADRAS B. C. REGATTA.

THE annual regatta of the Madras Boat Club took place on the Adyar River on Saturday and proved a great success. The day was only pleasantly warm and there was a large and fashionable attendance. The river was at a very low ebb, but this did not interfere much with the rowing, which was good all round. The first event was the final heat in the Intermediate Sculls, in which E. S. Lloyd met G. K. Gillon, the former leading all the way and winning easily by three lengths, in 3mins. 55secs. In the Service Fours there were three entries, the Mercantile boat beating the Service Four in the first race, much to the surprise of everybody as the winners had had very little practice. The result of the final between the Mercantile and Volunteer crews was a foregone conclusion, as the Volunteers were only a scratch lot. The Mercantile set the pace from the start, Faith, their stroke, rowing a long, clean stroke and the Volunteers went all to pieces, pulling in very bad time before the race was half over. They spurted splendidly at the end, but the Mercantile won without difficulty, covering the course in the good time 2mins. 52⅘secs.

There were six entries for the Junior Sculls and the final was won by Coles, who beat Chessal without much trouble. The Senior Sculls drew four entries, Wilson beating Mullins and Sandeman defeating Sell in the first round. The race between Wilson and Sandeman was a good one, but Sandeman was outclassed, Wilson winning a fast race by about a length in 3mins. 10secs. This is the seventh year in succession in which Wilson has won this race, which surely constitutes a record. Lloyd and Wilson had no difficulty in beating Steele and Irwin in the Pair oar. The prizes were afterwards handed to the winners by Lady Benson.

GOLF IN THE BRITISH ISLES.

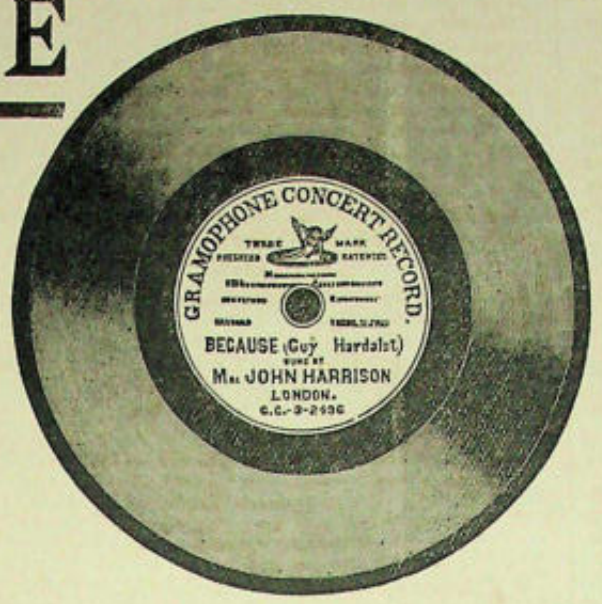
THINGS are certainly looking up, the awakening has begun, the scarcely perceptible lengthening day is perhaps not quite so largely responsible for this as the absence of frost and snow, but whatever be the reason for the reveillée, there it is. Try a course within a 30-mile radius of the Metropolis on a fine Sunday such as the last two have been, and it is one constant congestion from start to finish. Last Sabbath at Walton Heath over 50 men couples started forth, and this does not include the crowd of artisans and working men who are tolerated on the green at certain hours; nor the half dozen or so of women who are permitted to play after 11-30 and after 3-30 o'clock ! ! By an oversight on the part of the man in the starting box, contrary to the rule which boldly stares every applicant for a starting time full in the face, a very slow 3-ball match got away in the middle of the throng; they must have enjoyed themselves hugely, for while at the fifth tee (a short hole) there were no less than 10 couples awaiting their turn to drive, the 3-ball match could be discerned going leisurely to number 7 with a perfectly clear green in front of them, and yet none of the impatient men on the fifth tee had the courage to suggest going through the happy trio.

Prophets with or without honour in their own country are already foretelling results of heats in the Championships. St. Andrew's is to be the venue of the "Amateur" this year, and among all the possible winners Mr. Blackwell has been selected as Champion. He is particularly at home on this historic green, but the United States are sending over their Amateur Champion (so it is whispered), Mr. E. M. Byers, and one is never sure, after Mr. Travis' exhibition, what the Yankees may not do, besides who knows there may be some young blood who has developed and matured to an extraordinary degree during the past few months, who may accomplish wonders.

Very sad was the death of the Scottish Professional Golfer, Robert Dunlop, whose body was found in the Lake in Van Courtland Park, New York, about a fortnight ago. Although he had taken part in open events Dunlop had never succeeded in doing very much.

There is a great deal being written and talked about Royalty's play just now; they seem keen about the game, both men and women, and Prince Albert of Schleswig-Holstein has whole paragraphs to himself in several of the weeklies, as well as a full page frontispiece portrait of himself putting, which is certainly his weakest spot, but whatever space the weeklies and dailies can afford to consecrate to Royalties we must pass on to the unanointed who toy and trifle with the Royal and Ancient Sport. There is among scores of others a society called the Cricketers' Golfing Society, and every spring they hold a tournament: hitherto this has been decided by Singles under handicap; this year there is to be an alteration in the tactics and the contest is to be by foursome, each county being represented by 2 players, not under handicap, and each match to consist of 18 holes. No less than twenty-three counties have entered and some close and interesting matches are bound to arise. Lancashire, for instance, play Yorkshire (the holders), Gloucestershire vs. Kent, Middlesex vs. Somersetshire, and Notts vs. Liecestershire being among those already drawn to play.



It seems a bit late in the day to chronicle events which were advertised to take place at Xmas. But the unlooked-for, unwished-for snow and frost necessitated the postponement of many pot hunts, which were all put off until more propitious climatic conditions should arise. In Ireland most of these took place on Saturday, 12th instant, but this choice was equally unfortunate in a way for the wind blew and the rain rained, and it was poor fun playing even Golf. At the Royal Dublin Club, Mr. Stafford Paffney won the handicap prize, and Mr. D. M. Wilson took the Scratch trophy with a fairly good 84. But the most interesting golfing event in Ireland lately was the match between the Portmarnock Club and the newly formed Bar Golfing Society of Ireland. The fine Links of Portmarnock were stretched to their full extent, both teams consisted of unusually strong players, and the fun waxed fast and furious, most matches being decided at the end of the round, and the majority of the holes themselves were fought for on the green. As the "component parts of the teams were men of mark and note they are here appended."

RECORDS.

Craig y Nos Castle, Ystradgynlais R.S.O.,
Breconshire, South Wales.

THE GRAMOPHONE CO.

GENTLEMEN,

The Gramophone of to-day I find is such an improved instrument for recording the human voice to the older machines with which so many of us are familiar, that my hitherto objection to allow the thousands who cannot hear me sing personally to listen to the reproduction of my voice through the instrumentality of your Gramophone is now quite removed, and the Records which you have lately made for me I think are natural reproductions of my voice.

Yours truly,
ADELINA PATTI (Baroness Cederström.)

The Gramophone & Typewriter, Limited,

4, Esplanade East, CALCUTTA.

The foursomes arranged in numerical order resulted in a win for Portmarnock by 3 to 1, the top match being halved. It may be interesting to give the reasons for the formation of the Society, pre-supposing that any existed. It is a sort of combination (the society) of legal luminaries on the lines of that already existing in England and brings a new feature into Irish golf. There can be no doubt that the formation of these professional and business societies does much, more perhaps than one realizes, towards strengthening the grip (not of the club) of the game, and making it even more popular than it is at present, and tends greatly to the further advancement of golf. Just a line or two in conclusion to give an irrefuitable indicationo f the extent of Golf over here and of the determination displayed in connection with it, a well-known player wished for some games with James Braid, and was informed by him that he had no more free days from then (the first week in January) till the end of June. Not only Braid, but most of the leading professionals, have their time equally satisfactorily filled up. What a money making game it must be, and how nice to be a Braid or a Vardon or a Taylor!

The Horse.

WHEN BUYING A HORSE.

THERE are said to be tricks in the horse dealing business, but whether that be true or not, it is certainly important for the would-be purchaser to understand that he wants, what the work to be done requires, and what constitutes a sound, serviceable horse for the place to be filled. It is also absolutely necessary to consider every horse unsound until proved the contrary, no matter from whom he is to be purchased. Friends and relatives, when it comes to a horse deal, are to be considered the same as strangers until the business has been completed. Even the deacon is not to be given any credit unless the horse he has to sell corroborates in appearance and performance the qualities he claims for him. There is to be no sentiment in the matter—simply business sense.

For the above reasons, when the neighbour has a horse for sale, and our reader goes to inspect the animal, he should go unawares, if possible, and see the horse, first in the stall, and afterwards in action. This is necessary for the reason that when a horse is at rest in his stall some things will show up that could disappear when he is trotted, or be overlooked were he first seen out of doors. For instance, when looking at a horse in his stall his flanks should be watched for abnormal breathing, indicating "heaves"—a trouble often temporarily alleviated by drugs when the visit of the intending purchaser has been anticipated, and at the same time a glance will show whether strap is buckled tightly around the neck back of the ears, indicating that the horse is a "wind sucker."

We next step up beside the horse and exmine the manger, which is always chewed a great deal if the animal is a "cribber" and, finding such evidences, it is but a moment's work to upen the mouth and find if the incisor teeth corroborate the suspicion. Next the horse is made to "stand over" in his stall. If he has a spavin and is lame from it he will jerk the affected leg as he steps, and this may also be done as an evidence of "chorea" (shivers or crampiness). The latter disease, which is incuratle is still better seen as the animal is made to back out of the stall. For the first few steps the hind legs will be jerked higher than normal, but when he is trotted or even walked, there may not be a trace of this unsoundness to be seen, except, possibly, when he is suddenly turned.

After the "at rest" examination he should be placed on a level floor. Watch him for a few minutes and if he is sore-footed, the foot that causes pain will be stuck out in front of him, or the hind feet will be eased, turn about, persistently. Walk around him and form a general idea of his shape and quality and suitability in size, weight and bone.

If all these things are satisfactory, next have him walked and trotted, and note his gait, with any departure is from normal, free, open or sound action.

If he stands these tests, the serious examination commences, and this must be a most critical one if the price asked indicates a valuable animal and absolutely sound. If a cheap horse, and only sold "serviceably sound," the examination need only be for wind and lameness, and then a search for anything that will be likely to make him useless, either temporarily, during busy seasons, or permanently, at once, or in the near future.

Commence at the head and examine the teeth for age; parrot mouth, which makes a horse unable to graze; diseased molars, which are indicated by foul odor; discharge from the nostrils or a wad of food in the cheek; injured bars where the bit presses on the floor of the mouth; lacerated tongue or ulcerated tongue and gums. Glance at the nostrils for discharge, red spots, ulcers or tumors in the false nostrils. Now test the sight by slightly lifting the hand, as if to strike the eye, wich will make him wink if he can see. Look at the eye and the lids. Where a horse has had several attacks of periodic ophthalmai (moon blinders) the lids will be wrinkled and a bluish tinge appear over the eye, or irregularity of the cantour of the cornea; while white spots may tell of cataract or merely of injuries that have not affected the eyesight. Examine the bones of the lower jaw for departures from normal, also those of the face under the eyes for enlargements, possibly showing disease of molar teeth or chronic catarrh.

Abcesses under the jaw will be easily found, if present, and indicate "strangelers" in quite young horses, but are suspicious in old ones, indicating diseased molar teeth and possibly something worse. The hand is runover the poll, where "poll evil" is locatad, under the name for skin disease along the jugular groove and at the throat latch, for abnormalities. Then the withers are examined for "fistala" or sores, and the shoulder for sweeny, collar boils of fibroid tumors, and the elbow for shoe boil. The fore limb is next examined carefully for broken knees, splints, bowed tendons, grease or scratches, and any other things that depart from sound condition. The foot has to be exmined very carefully for departures from good shape, founder, thrush, corns, quarter cracks, quittor, sand crack, ringbones, sidebones and nail prick or stone bruise.

Never accept a horse with leather sole on foot. Have him unshod before deciding that there is nothing wrong. This applies to fore and hind feet, and as a general rule it is safest to have the shoes removed where the horse is valuable. The body is next looked at carefully for ruptures, sore back, weak back, sagged back, and washy coupling. The state of the scrotum is to be looked to in geldings and the udder in mares. Lift the tail to see if it is strong not false, and not newly docked or affected with melanosis tumors in white animals. At the same time the anus is inspected and the vulva in mares. Paralysis of the anus is not uncommon, and lacerations of the perineum in mares constitute "gil flirt." The hind limb is next to be gone over for unsoundness similar to those in the fore limb, including spavin, ringbone, thoroughpin, etc., while the stifle will come in for a careful look and the cantour of the hips be noted for injury to the points of the illum caused by running in at a narrow door.

Next test the animal thoroughly for wind, and the work will be fairly complete. In conclusion, it may be added that each limb must be examined in succession, as above advised.

The Story Teller.

A LOVELY LEPPER.

"COME here to me, now" said Terry Mulligan, the steeplechase jockey; "and bedad it's no fairy tale I'll be after telling ye. You know me for a jewel of the truth."

He looked at me then with such a comical twinkle in his blue eyes that it would have been a sin not to laugh. My mirth was not expressed boisterously, but with sincerity and discretion. There are men who, with a smile on their face, look as if they had just escaped from somewhere.

One of the best in his way, Terry Mulligan is a friend whom I delight to honour, and many are the good stories he has told me. He has plenty of humour and persiflage. He is a fine rider on the flat or over a country. He is thoroughly game, and very honest—for a jockey, that is to say.

When, therefore, he promised, as intimated in the opening lines of this romance, to relate what he termed (probably with inaccuray) "no fairy tale," I was eager to listen. What is verisimilitude, bedad compared with piquant revelations?

So I said, "Drive on Terry, my boy, and don't spare my feelings. The doctor says that I have a weak heart, but that with care it will last as long as I do. Don't shock me too violently all at once."

"Shure and be aisy now; it's only about ould Game Fox I'm going to tell ye," said Terry, with his delightful brouge, to which my pen can do no sort of justice. He added quickly, "You remember the ould 'oss of course?"

"Well," I replied; "and backed him many a time. He was, in my opinion, an ideal chaser. He could go fast and stay; he was a safe jumper with the heart of a lion; he could carry weight, and was as good through the mud as on the top of the ground. You couldn't put him out of his place."

The jockey was delighted by those words. His cheeks flushed and his eyes brightened in the true Irish manner.

"Game Fox was all that, and more," he said—"a real champion in his class, which was not parliamentary. He could gallop with the others, and had always a bit to pull out at the finish to whack 'em with. That's what you want in a chaser—the power of running on while the others collapse one by one, or two by two, in the straight run in."

"Exactly. It is wise, when possible, to keep a bit up one's sleeve when the other Johnnies have shot their linen."

Then Mr. Mulligan, with his tongue so brisk, told me about a certain performance of the great Game Fox which was rather curious.

"As you may recollect," pursued the jockey, "the ould 'oss was just a lovely lepper—a fairy over fences. Yet he had an eye knocked out at Leopardstown. Another 'oss was down in front of him; he tried to jump the other one and the fence, couldn't quite do it, got a severe blow on the head, and lost an optic. I was riding him at the time, and begorra we were in the air so long that I began to wonder where he would land—in England, Scotland, or Ireland. Neatish, eh?"

He glanced at me sideways with considerable play of feature, as if to see how I was bearing the results. It appeared that the statement made to him concerning my weak heart had wrought no appreciable influence on his mind. It is possible that he regarded the assertion (with reason) as being of appocryphal character. What the medical gentlemen say, when they cease to indulge in platitude, is often unfit for, and unworthy of publication.

I took up the running again with some degree of spirit. "And so it was at Leopardstown that the old horse lost his eye?" I said. "And what very bad luck, to be sure, for such a lovely lepper! How did he jump afterwards, Terry? I mean with the light on one side gone?"

"Better than ever," answered Terry, emphatically; "he was taking no more chances. He had always jumped big, and after his glim was doused he jumped bigger than ever. It was like coming down a fire-escape to ride him over some of the owdacious ditches. He couldn't see very well, and left a margin for all sorts of contingencies."

Here the jockey took a long breath and rattled on briskly. "The ould 'oss at last got a bit slow and bad to be run in selling and farmers' races. It was anno domini that was beating him; he had still the heart of a lion, the manners of a lady, and an idea that the fences were twice as large as they were. He could only see half of them, perhaps, and imagined the other half to be up there."

Terry pointed to the azure firmament, and made a pretence to fly thitherward having no compunction, apparently, in leaving me on earth alone. But I could not have gone with him in any case, by reason of an arrangement to meet my mother-in-law by the 3-40 train, as the lady was coming to stay three weeks without an invitation, and bringing her own gin.

Then Terry resumed his narrative as thus: "After a time Game Fox got into the hands of old Mickey Garron, the farmer, who, it was said, could live on potheen longer than any of his neighbours; and they were all grand stayers with a pot of something in their fist. Garron had been running the horse at small local meetings; there was one race of unusual value in his own district, which he was particularly anxious to win, not so much for money as for the honour and glory. You know how these sporting farmers love to whack each other near home. So Mickey wrote to me asking if I would go and ride the Fox for him at Ballyfooney, and he promised me a nice little 'touch' if I could get him home all right. 'It's a cop for him with you up,' he wrote, 'for the old horse is as fresh as a two-year-old, and sees as much with his one eye as many people do with double the number."

"Well, that seemed good enough, you know; things were not very lively just then in our racing world; so off I popped to Ballyfooney, pleased to think that I was to ride the lovely lepper once again. He was a treat of a horse, as I have told you, and if all horses were like him we should nearly all be jockeys.

"When I arrived at Ballyfooney, Mickey had a car to meet me at the station; we drove to the course together. He could talk of nothing else but the old 'oss. He talked loudly, his face was very red, and he kept thumping me in the ribs. I was obliged to give him one back on the chest to put him straight. It was plain to see what was the matter with him. He had evidently been living on potheen for a longer period than usual, and the diet had got into his head. He was not absolutely paralytic, but nearly so.

"When it was time to get ready for our race I was careful to saddle Game Fox myself, although his owner quarrelled with me for not allowing him to do so. I told him he was not fit to saddle a pig, whereupon he wept bitterly with his arms round a whisky jar in the refreshment booth, and he partly emptied it before he would consent to dry his tears. Very warm he was, with the bung out.

"As I was just about to have the leg-up, he staggered towards me and gave the riding orders. 'If there's not much of a pace,' he said, holding himself straight by the Fox's tail, 'come along, and give the bleaters no rest. The ould 'oss aint so speedy a he was some years ago, and it's no use for you to wait him. You might wait too long, and he wouldn't be able to come at all. And, Terry, me lad'—he tried to put his arms round my neck but I countered on the bosom as before—you'll hear me shouting long before yo've won.'

"'All right, guv'nor,' I said, 'shout away as much as you like after I've gone out of the paddock. I'll bring the ould biler along for all he's worth never fear. But what's this patent arrangement you've got on his eye?' I pointed to a sort of black patch he had placed there.

"'That's for the animal's comfort,' he hiccoughed; 'it keeps all the dust and mud out of his poor old eyeball, and makes him look fiercer, don't you think, when he comes storming up the course?'

"I said nothing more, but mounted and cantered to the post. The flag fell at once, and we raced merrily to the first fence, over which I came one of the most tremendous croppers ever recorded in history. Game Fox never rose an inch, and turned topsy-turvy on me without an apparent effort?"

"Why?" I asked, breathlessly. "He was such a lovely lepper!"

"You may easily guess why," replied the jockey, "poor Mickey in his drunkenness, had covered up the wrong eye!"

WESTMINSTER GLEE SINGERS.

THE Westminster Glee and Concert party who toured India years ago under Mr. Edward Branscombe's direction with such success, are again visiting this country and are booked to appear at the Opera House, Calcutta, on Wednesday, the 20th February. Upon the completion of their last Australian and New Zealand tour, this popular body of singers returned to England giving concerts en route through the United States and on reaching London Mr. Edward Branscombe reformed his company. Amongst the boy choristers accompanying this party are no less than three lads who are ranked amongst the most celebrated boy soloists in England and special mention must be made of Master Albert Hole, the smallest boy soloist in the world. The soloists include several names who have already established their popularity throughout India, amongst whom may be mentioned Madame Marie Hooten, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. Sterndale Bennett. The party only remained in London about three months, almost immediately again setting off on their travels, and they have just completed most successful tours through Canada and the Far East. The English, American, and Colonial press are unanimous in their opinion that the perfection attained in this class of singing by these highly trained vocalists, and their skill in the rendering of a lengthy repertoire of madrigals, glees, part-songs, etc., far exceeds anything previously heard. Mr. Edward Branscombe, under whose direction these singers are touring, is to be congratulated on having got together a party so well able to maintain the highest traditions of English part-singing. For those who take an intelligent interest in that most beautiful of all forms of vocal music, the unaccompanied performance of part-singing, a musical treat is in store. Mr. Harry Ivimey, who holds the highest position as a society entertainer in England will contribute two humorous musical sketches in each programme. The plan is at Messrs. T. E. Bevan & Co.

Drawn.

(a) It is not unusual to defend the dangerous attack in this form of the Allgaier Gambit by Kt to K 2 and B to Kt 2; but the course selected by Mr. Morton is quite sound. The opening indeed is well played by him.

(b) Black retains his piece, and the blindfold player has no compensating advantage.

(d) Again an effort ought to have been made for the disruption of the centre Pawns.

BRIDGE.

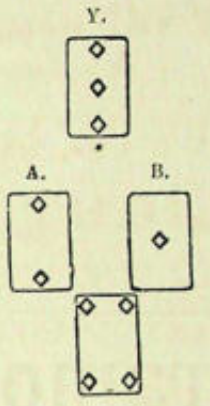
Solution to Problem No. 22.

TO win the game Z must only lose two more tricks, viz., the ace and king of trumps. He must get rid of his diamonds before leading trumps, or his opponents may exhaust Y's trumps, and so make certain of at least one trick in that suit. Accordingly, he puts the ace or king of spades on B's 7, and leads a diamond for Y to ruff. Y then leads the ace, followed by the king of clubs, and Z discards his third diamond. Z now proceeds to get out trumps as fast as he can, and unless ruffed in spades will win the game. B's 7 of spades, though obviously a weak lead, is not necessarily a singleton.

Problem No. 23.

Score: A B, 0; Y Z, 0. Z deals and declares no-trumps. A's and Y's hands are as follow:—

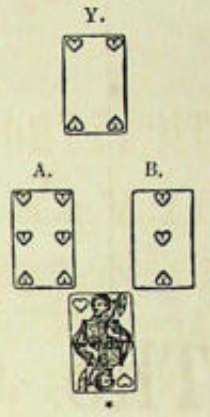
Y's HAND (Dummy).



Hearts, king, 5, 4; diamonds, king, 3; clubs, 10, 9, 5, 2; spades, 8, 5, 4, 3.

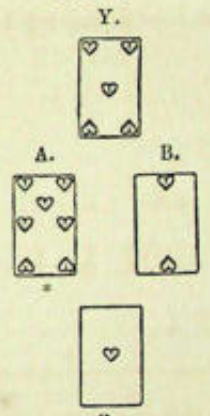
A's HAND (Original Leader).

Hearts, 10, 7, 6; diamonds, queen, 10, 8, 2; clubs, king, queens 4, 3; spades, 10, 2.



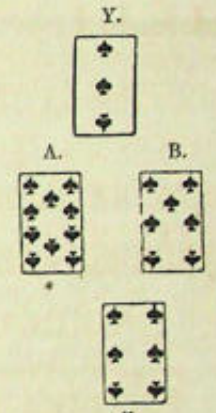
The first seven tricks are as follows:—

Trick 1.



Tricks: A B, 1; Y Z, 0.

Trick 2.



Tricks: A B, 1; Y Z, 1.

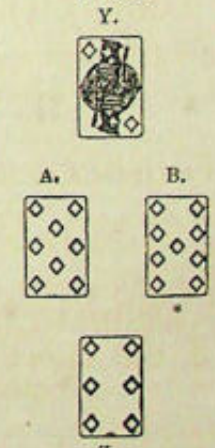
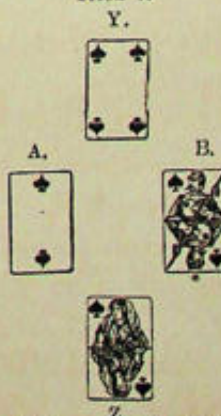
Tricks: A B, 1; Y Z, 2.

Trick 4.



Tricks: A B, 1; Y Z, 2.

Trick 5.



Tricks: A B, 2; Y Z, 3.

Trick 6.

Tricks: A B, 2; Y Z, 4.

Tricks: A B, 2; Y Z, 5.

Z now leads the ace, followed by the 9 of spades, B's king falling to the ace. What should A's discard to these tricks be? Place the unplayed cards, and forecast the play of the last four tricks.

OLD TIME ATHLETICS.

IT is curious, when we glance over the pages of old sporting journals and magazines, particularly those of George III's time, to note the extraordinary number of matches in which our forefathers indulged, more especially in the shape of trotting matches for horses, cobs and ponies on the road against rivals or against time, and running and walking matches between men over varying distances. Such private events no doubt take place now, but the outside world seldom hears of them and they excite no interest beyond the circle of intimates of the parties engaged. It is impossible to take up any sporting publication of a century back without finding such reports as the following: "On Tuesday, September 23, a pony was engaged to trot fourteen miles within the hour for 30 guineas staked by Mr. Harding, the owner, with some amateurs of the sport: also thirteen miles within the second hour, for the same sum;" with particulars of the performance which in the case mentioned was accomplished by the 13-hand pony with four minutes to spare in the first hour and two in the second. In the adjoining column we have particulars of "a running match which has been spoken of a length of time between Messrs. Salter and Beaumont—the competitors were to run three measured miles on turf—the match was for 100 guineas." Again "a wager has been laid in Dublin by Mr. Battersby with Mr. Gore for the sum of 150 guineas that Collier, the pedestrian who accomplished some time since a remarkable journey from Athlone to Dublin, shall run on the Curragh next April 100 English miles in nineteen successive hours." Elsewhere in the same periodical we find particulars of a foot race against time, 20 miles to be covered in two hours and a quarter, done with 5 minutes to spare by "the celebrated pedestrian Wood" who, by the way, is mentioned as having, a few days later, for a wager of 40 guineas "run a quarter of a mile in a minute and performed it with apparent ease about a second within the time," a feat that compares very favourably with modern performances when we consider that carefully fitted running shoes and other aids to good timing were probably wanting. Such matches as these frequently attracted large numbers of spectators and furnished opportunity for much wagering; they served the same function as athletic meetings serve nowadays, and indeed may be considered as the original parents of the organised athletic meeting. The horse matches on the road owe their extinction partly to the adoption of macadam and partly to the intervention of the police, whose duty it was made to see that the public highways were used only for their legitimate purpose of traffic; but the foot race, whether running or walking, seems to have survived the trotting race for equines as a road spectacle by a good many years, and they lost their vogue with the gradual development of athletic clubs and associations when these began to come into existence about fifty years ago. When the athletic club with its well organised meeting came into being, it was inevitable that the isolated race should disappear: generous supporters prepared to put down a stake of from twenty to a hundred guineas were not always forthcoming even in those days of bold speculation: and the pedestrian discovered that more fame and more profit could be earned at the old time athletic meeting than by adhering to the time-honoured practice of making a match through some sporting publican who brought patron and performer together and arranged the business. No doubt the modern system is very much better than the old want of system under which amateurs and professionals alike ran for money: we say "amateurs and professionals" though there was really no defined line between them, beyond the known fact that one did not run for a livelihood and the other did: and between the two came such pedestrians as the famous Brighton Shepherd who, a century ago, it was the fashion among the Regency sportsmen to back against all comers for heavy wagers.

While declaring approval for the modern system it may perhaps be conceded that we have lost something in the shape of variety in athletics. Our races nowadays are pretty well stereotyped as regards distances. The executive of a sports gathering does not venture to offer prizes for unorthodox events and it would probably receive small encouragement if it did do so. In the old days as much was left to the ingenuity and taste of the patrons or competitors as is left now to the ingenuity of the deviser of a gymkhana programme in this country. We should be rather surprised and, orthodoxy would certainly be shocked if a serious athletic meeting were made the scene of such a contest as that recorded at Leeds just a hundred years back. "A wager was offered by one gentleman that he would run one hundred yards while another of the party ['in a respectable company'] ran fifty carrying a person on his shoulders weighing fourteen stone six pounds." Or if such "an astonishing effort of human exertion" as the following were included in the programme: "A man of about 50 years of age, for a wager of a guinea, drew a town cart with five sacks of flour from Beech Street, Barbican, to St. Martins-le-Grand. The flour without the cart weighed 12 cwt." These old athletic performances were almost invariably tests of speed, endurance or physical strength: now and again we find a wager concerning a man's ability to pick up so many potatoes laid at such distances or similar feat; but we never find evidence that jumping, either high or long, was practised; pole jumping was equally ignored, though in the eastern counties the pole was in everyday use among the people who had to cross the fen ditches and drains in the ordinary course of their vocations. The only thing involving a jump seems to have been the feat known as "hop-skip-and-jump," which, by the way, more than a century ago is referred to with ponderous irony as the "most ancient and honourable science." Throwing the hammer and other exercises were equally unknown: a fact which suggests the reflection that any one who should trace the history of athletic exercises to their origin would find the enquiry both instructive and entertaining.

Sporting Notes.

THE recent big pigstick given by Mr. M. M. Crawford, the well-known Nuddea sportsman, was an unqualified success, though the boars gathered did not equal last year's huge total. Still eightynine in two days with eight spears out is good enough, and the average worked out better, for every one out was an old hand at the game. In spite of this eleven horses out of forty were cut and one of the party managed to break a thumb. Never were more savage pig seen we hear.

The Calcutta Kennel Club achieved an instant and pronounced success in their first Championship Show last week: a full report appears among our Kennel news to-day.

Some fresh evidence of our canine friends' intelligence is always coming to light. In a recent issue of The Rural World the story of a shepherd's dog is told. One night a North of England shepherd brought in his flocks and hurried to his cottage to have his supper. But he missed the dog which usually followed him of an evening for her own food. The man thought it rather strange, but made no search for the dog that night. When the shepherd went down to the corrals next morning he found the gate open, and his dog standing guard over the sheep. In his haste the night before he had forgotten to close the gate, but the dog had noticed how remiss her master had been and remained at her post throughout the night, though she suffered from hunger and thirst.

Says a writer in Nature Notes: "At the risk of being severely hauled over the coals, let me say that the intelligence of the horse seems to be of a low order, and that in a civilised country like England it has little or no chance of improving. The one thing above all others required in a horse is obedience. A horse that has a will of his own, and is determined to show it, is seriously handicapped. Those horses that give up thinking, that submit to their masters' orders, and carry out his requirements as to beauty, strength and speed, are the most useful and most highly prized, and therefore the most likely to be allowed to live and carry on the race. Under such conditions the brain of any animal must deteriorate. When, however, the horse runs wild, as in Australia, he has to think for himself, and to work out the problems of self-preservation. The change soon shows itself. He becomes as intelligent as the wild creatures among which his lot is cast, but generally at the expense of beauty, and many other qualities valuable to man. Most wild horses are large in the head, and bodily speaking, inferior to the English animal. The brains of cattle, sheep and the domestic duck have also suffered from subjection to man."

The writer of "Indian Gup" in The World says,—"It is a well-known fact that during the cold weather season the population of Calcutta, floating and permanent, includes all that is brightest and best in the Indian Empire, but this year she has attracted two personages who are so remarkable that they demand special mention. They have both achieved pre-eminence in their own particular lines. The first, who in the intervals of making centuries at cricket is rapidly climbing to the dizzy eminence of a seat among the gods in Olympus, is notable as being the most silent man in Asia; and the second, who is a guest at Government House and has an hereditary handle to his name, has acquired much merit and fame as the 'Beau Brummell' of India and as the recognised sumptuary authority of our gilded youth. As a faithful chela always assimilates the likeness as well as the utterances of his guru, he follows in the footsteps of that talented expert in the hair industry, Mr. Frank Richardson; and consequently his latest and most momentous aphorism calls for publicity, especially as it is bound to revolutionise the future aspect of our promising young men. 'A strong and violent moustache is the invariable concomitant of a weak character.'"

The Bhopal Cup Polo Tournament is postponed until the week beginning 10th March, entries closing on the 7th idem.

It is said that nearly 2,000 partridges were shot by the King and his party, driving at Flitcham, Norfolk, last month. His Majesty was accompanied by the Prince of Wales, Prince Arthur of Connaught, Lord Stanley, Lord Savile, Lord Suffield, Mr. Montague Guest, and Sir Allen Young.

For many years Messrs. P. Orr and Sons, of Madras, have held a pre-eminent position as designers and manufacturers of sporting trophies, racing and athletic plate. A testimonial appearing on page vii of our advertisements to-day conveys a correct impression of the enviable reputation held by the firm in this particular branch of their extensive business. Now they have opened a branch in Calcutta, sportsmen in this part of the world are afforded an opportunity of seeing—and acquiring—specimens of these specialities. Quite apart from the novelty and attractiveness of nearly every one of the examples shown us the other day, we could not help being struck by their remarkable "finish," even the smallest detail bearing traces of infinite care coupled with the highest class of workmanship. Very interesting were the silver specimens exhibiting the famous "black polish" which is not often seen on imported articles and very seldom attempted in this country, we believe. One of the firm's specialities is Indian silver work. Beginning years ago on the now world-renowned "Swami" work, they have steadily progressed till now, in their "Lakshmi" work they are as far ahead of the old "Swami" designs and treatment as it is possible to imagine. The effect is rich and striking; delightfully original in conception and treated by silversmiths of the highest skill, the Indian scenery, the figures in high relief and the surrounding Indian enrichments which characterise this work arrest and hold the attention in a way that leaves little doubt as to its merit. Until quite recently this work was entirely confined to the Burmese, but having been taken up by Messrs P. Orr and Sons it has, we should say, now reached perfection. They adopted these designs, taught them to the Southern Indian workmen, educated these people up to the standard testified to by these examples and all the while they have adhered to the general idea of never applying Indian ornamentation to anything the shape or lines of which are not absolutely Indian. For instance we see nothing in a cup which is not thoroughly in harmony from rim to plinth—the effect is in some respects almost startling. Messrs. P. Orr and Son's contention is that nearly all their designs are new and they continue to add to them, while the largest pieces of plate in any design can be reproduced in any size down to miniature. Sports promoting and race Secretaries would do well to visit the newly opened branch in Chowringhee.

Among a gruesome collection of little human heads recently offered for sale at Stevens's auction-rooms was one of surprising interest. It was a man's head no larger than a hen's egg, and is unique in every way. No one has seen anything like this relic before. It was obtained from Mexico, where from time immemorial there has been a tradition of a race of miniature pigmies who inhabited the northern part of the country hundreds of years before the Aztecs were conquered by Cortes. They were said to have buried their dead in the rocks. This particular example had long been in possession of an old Mexican ranchman in a remote part of the mountains, and had, he explained, been in possession of his family for years and years, descending from father to son. It was acquired by a mining engineer engaged with a prospecting party, and has been examined by a number of eminent ethnologists, who have seen nothing like it.

The Rifle Brigade won the Lucknow Polo Tournament, beating the Crusaders in the final by 4 goals and 5 subsidiaries to 1 goal and 1 subsidiary. Details will be found in the usual place.

The party accompanying H.E. the Viceroy on his Assam shoot will consist of Her Excellency Lady Minto, Lady Eileen Elliot, Colonels Dunlop Smith, Adam, and Crooke-Lawless, Major Feilding, and Captain Bulkeley. The party leaves Calcutta on the 16th instant.

From the severe weather reported from the Western Himalayas—Dalhousie registering a snowfall of four feet—it would seem that the arctic wave which swept over Central and Southern Europe at the end of January came within twelve degrees of the tropics. Should the Eastern ranges have experienced a like visitation, big game will be forced down into the terais in more than usual numbers, so success may be anticipated for the Viceregal shoot next week. Such of our visitors of a sporting turn who contemplate jungle jaunts in search of trophies ought to take the opportunity of attempting to gratify their ambition. Stags' heads, however, will not be in their prime for another month, but March—bar nor'westers is a pleasant and healthy enough month for an outing.

Speaking of the pigeon-shooting of Lord Bury at Boulogne, "Nimrod" says that "he never saw it excelled, even at the Red-house." The terms of the match in question were these—20 birds at 21 yards; 20 at 25; 20 at 27; total, 60 birds. Lord Bury killed 16 out of the first lot: 18 out of the second; 14 out of the third; total killed, 48 out of 60. Here "Nimrod" was mistaken (I read further) in supposing that the said performance was "never excelled at the Red-house," as it sinks into insignificance compared with performances of the celebrated Captain Ross, and others of the once-celebrated Red-house Club. In 1829, Captain Ross killed 79 birds out of 80, at the distance of 30 yards from the trap; while Mr. Shoubridge and others several times killed 11 out of 12 at the same distance, and Mr. Osbaldeston killed nine out of 12 at 40 yards. The number of traps is not stated. But probably only one. But as a set-off, we must bear in mind that the guns employed by these crack marksmen were not only muzzle-loaders, but also flint-locks!

Racing at the Calcutta Fifth Extra Meeting was not particularly exciting and the Paddock looked very empty in the absence of the Christmas crowds. It is difficult to imagine the effect of a third large stand and increased paddock room at the Extra Meetings, but perhaps we shall grow into them as the years roll on. Favourites went down on Saturday with unfortunate regularity, but Botha brought off a very good thing for any one who happened to have studied the form of his best opponents.

The Hunters' Hurdle Race started the card and Lady Gold took most of the money for the books, only to come to grief at a regular mêlee that took place at the third flight, where Jacinth also fell. This left Queen of Hearts at the head of affairs and she led Bluebell and Orphan Boy into the straight. Here condition told and Bluebell, quietly ridden by Mr. Kenneth Robertson, came to the front and won easily. Orphan Boy was first and Posey last. Bluebell's win was well deserved since Mr. Deakin's mare has borne the burden of much good work throughout the paperchase season. She has carried the paper before nearly every chase and in the Ladies' Cup made a great effort to beat the speedy Detective. Mr. Deakin is in luck all round just now, and they say that his other little mare, Trilby, is a big slice the better of the pair.

Botha won the Outram Plate, with Craig struggling home behind him and another outsider in Trencherman filling the third place. Blitzen had sufficiently recovered form to be well backed for the seven furlong Lansdowne Plate, but she only added to her debit balance in spite of a very determined run at the Hospital Corner. Foy, a great stayer, hunted her along and gradually wore her down until opposite the stands where the mare collapsed and he rolled home the winner of a very resolute race.

Mr. Margrett recovered some stable expenses in the next race by winning with Sir Michael; now here is a Monsoon horse that will surely pay his corn bills. Two other outsiders filled the places and the favourites, Vinolia and Child Adopted, ran nowhere worth mentioning.

In the Pony Hunters' Race there was no difficulty in picking out the first three and the totalisator odds worked out at ten to one on for each and all of them. Mistlebird and Lady George wound up equal favourites but were outstayed by Pathfinder on whom Captain Holden rode a nice waiting race. Mr. Pugh was no doubt waiting in front from the mile post but his mare probably felt the effects of her scurry over the first portion of the journey.

By this time punters were desperate and both Mr. Galstaun and Mr. Walmesley were dogged by a long trail of seedy looking speculators who wanted to know "which it was" in the last race. This is a form of nuisance that is the special privilege of the wealthy and is one of those drawbacks, which give the ungilded ones food for philosophy, however. Those who wanted to see the race left the crowd still hovering, but it seems that the others who persevered eventually got an indication, because Pendred finished up a favourite at two to one. He also finished first in the race and gave Bullock a second winning ride. This ended the proceedings and another page in the last chapter of this season's racing in Calcutta.

The Calcutta paperchasing season is drawing to a close and only three more regular chases remain in the programme. Mr. Ballantyne seems to have the Average Cup well won and though he has been fortunate in the mishaps to his two nearest competitors, his victory will be thoroughly well earned since he and his stout old mare have been presenting an enormous allowance of weight to Detective as well as to Cain.

Good Chap has, it seems, broken down again and will not be seen out again this season. His absence removes Mistlebird's most dangerous opponent since neither Branga nor Pathfinder are particularly reliable on a paperchase course and the only other runners of note are Clarice and perhaps Samah.

Good Chap's misfortune is the more regrettable since his stable companion Pretender has likewise been out of action since Xmas and Mr. Kenneth Hamilton has in consequence been altogether an absentee from the paperchase field.

Our Bombay correspondent writes:—There was a very large attendance on the racecourse for the last Extra before the big meeting and not many up-country stables now remain to come down. One cannot say the racing was very good though a number of classy ones were seen out; the terms races usually find one horse made a very hot favourite and with some upsets the honours were fairly evenly divided. Byramji, with his powerful string, had quite a day out with four successive wins, Williams, his jockey, performing the hat trick from the third race, Ross winning the second race, his first bracket in the country and a nicely ridden race too.

Proceedings opened with a Selling Plate for new Arabs and the time, 56⅘secs., for the half mile shows the class of ponies running. An excitable chestnut, Flicker, was made a warm favourite, but his light went out at the distance: he should look well in a tum-tum in future. A pig fat grey, Glass, made all his own running and won easily to be bought by Mr. Vaid for Rs. 1,150, a rather tall price, though he may train on. A bit of Russley Rose's true form was seen in the All-Pony Trials though her poor form earlier and in Poona found her very little money to win. Gun Metal is known to be so thoroughly fit that she was made a very warm favourite, but the bay held her very safe on entering the straight. Poor Florrie, the broken-winded, showed a bit of her marvellous sprinting powers for half a mile but there was little left in her to fight with in the run home and her only two rivals left her easily.

That grand sprinter Killua went out a four to one on favourite for the Short Trials and justified the amount of money put on him though I think he was lucky in finding Metal Maid had to come from the ruck right round her field at the bend. The mare was the only other one under fifteens and, though Williams took it rather easy on the favourite, had Ross come a bit earlier she would have given punters a more anxious time even than she did. From three lengths behind on entering the straight she crept up to within a half on the post. Precious has more than a few times been quoted as a "cert" and the last occasion was disastrous, but so palpably did he stand out that the best was fours on at the rise of the barrier. His stable companion was fancied next at sevens and made the pace warm to be comfortably passed by the grey at the distance with nothing less nearer than four lengths.

The Arab Pony Trials was a check for the public who naturally sent the champion, Bay Middleton, out at odds on in a field of twelve. Byramji's pair, Rose and Hermit, were well supported for place, but anything else at twenties. The start was a straggly one with Rose getting away nicely but the favourite whipped round and must have lost a dozen lengths. At the bend Shanwar came up to the leader and kept hard at him but Williams had something in hand and won comparatively easily. Bay Middleton ran like the game pony he is and joined the leaders, coming between them, in the straight, but the effort had been too much and he did remarkably well to get placeed.

The last race was the Long Trial Plate and the betting was the most open of the day as also was the finish the best. Primerole, whose first outing it was since her accident, and Presbyterian commanded most attention. The pace was made a cracker by a very racy-looking English bay, Lord Barrymore, who instead of shutting up came into the straight going finely. Apology and Presbyterian drew up and going grandly, nicely handled again by Vining, the latter came into the lead. He bored towards the inside and undoubtedly hampered his stable companion who failed to displace Lord Barrymore who should turn out a top notcher before long.

The Bombay Gymkhana put up a very inglorious performance on their own ground on Saturday when they went under to the B. B. and C. I. Railway though on paper the team was a strong one. They dismissed the opposition for a poor total of 131 of which Date made 34, Polishwalla 30 and Baloo 26. To Coombs once more go bowling honours, he took 4 for 33. Major Wigram 3 for 37, Stileman 2 for 28 and R. E. A. Elliott 1 for 15. It was in batting the home side broke down and despite a very steady innings by Cheetham, 32, followed by Major Rich 21, and Gillett 17, they were all out for 99, thus losing by 32 runs. Baloo is as good as ever with the leather and took 5 for 25, Date 3 for 38 and Shete 2 for 25.

The European Amateur Billiard Championship I mentioned last week was started on Tuesday and three games of a rather poor description have now been played. Nervousness and exaggerated caution have marked all the games so that the biggest break to record so far as a 38 by Mr. J. Beatty. Two who "have a chance" played off on Tuesday, Messrs. Avery and Carnall, two in whom there is very little to choose. Avery started out promisingly with a 31, but after that it was a plodding sort of game with any amount of double baulks with Carnall about 50 behind till the last hundred when his opponent went away. Though playing some very nice shots Carnall's play was by no means as well engineered as Avery's who twice missed good breaks by miscueing on passing 20. Throughout the game the latter put the red down with remarkable accuracy and only really missed one "pot" of any ease. He ultimately ran out by 500—401.

Messrs. J. Beatty and A. Bird met on Wednesday and the latter was found clean off form. Beatty is not of the brilliant order but a great plodder and with a 38 his best effort he led throughout comfortably by nearly 140 points.

On Friday Messrs. Hargreaves and Gray played and the game was little short of a "frost." The former always the better, with a nice touch and knowledge of the game, put on breaks of 24 and 22 and the loser 23. Hargreaves won anyhow by 500 to 358.

Athletic Notes.

THE Eden Gardens these evenings are the rendezvous of many local athletes training for the approaching sports of the B.P.A.A. In a few days the big military contingent will appear on the ground and then the preparation will be both lively and interesting. Besides a good entry for the tug-of-war we hear that some real good performers are coming from long distances to take part in the amateur events.

The Calcutta Football Club are early in the field with hockey; the first practice game is fixed for next Saturday, as per details in the advertisement elsewhere.

The only public address the Amir has so far condescended to receive is that tendered by the Bombay Mahomedans. It will, of course, be enshrined in a casket, in this instance the work of Messrs. Barton, Son and Company, of Bangalore, a superb specimen of the finest description of silverware turned out by the firm. It is of solid silver ornamented with gold, and its measurements are extreme length and breadth at base $19\frac{1}{8} \times 10\frac{1}{4}$ with extreme height 11 inches. The entire design is Sarasenic in order to make it appropriate as coming from the Mahomedan community of Bombay. The lid is ornamented with an embossed design of fluted and net work, and is surmounted by a gold dome, with similar ones on either side also of gold. The front of the receptacle shows a dome-shaped panel bearing on it an embossed view of the Anjuman-i-Islam Buildings in Bombay, on either side of which are pierced Arabesque screens of gold. The design on the opposite side is exactly similar except that the view given is that of the Taj Mahal at Agra. The two sides show panels with views on them, one of the Amir's Palace at Jellalabad, and the other a typical bit of mountain scenery in Afghanistan. The base which is capped at the four corners with gold is of pierced Arabesque design, above which is a running design of leaf and bud-like forms so often seen in fine Turkish or Bokharan embroidery.

The casket is fitted on to an ebony base ornamented at each of the corners with silver clamps. The inscription which is in Urdu is on a burnished silver plate, the letters being inlaid with blue enamel. On the opposite side of the plinth is an exact miniature of the Star of the G. C. B. in gold, silver and enamel.

Mr. Henry Leach gives in Fry's Magazine some surprising statistics relating to a year's golf in the United Kingdom. It has been reckoned that at the height of the summer golfing season, when the players are busy everywhere, not less than 500,000 balls are used up every week. It was semi-officially stated in June that one firm of makers, and that not by any means the biggest, was working night and day, turning out 100,000 balls a week. Decidedly the half million is well within the mark. Taking the whole year round, if you say one ball per golfer per week, that is surely a very modest reckoning. At that rate we have a grand total of 15,000,000 balls used up every year by the British golfers on British links.

Now, what can be done with these 15,000,000 balls? Bring out the 80,000 caddies that there are in the country, and set them to work teeing the balls up right against and touching each other in a line, beginning with the first at Charing Cross, or to be more appropriate, on the Mid-Surrey course at Richmond. Then proceed northwards. There will still be a few balls left in the pockets of the caddies when they have continued that long line of one year's balls right away through Rugby, Stafford, Carlisle, and over the border range to Edinburgh, and on to the Braid Hills course. We can join the premier courses of two capitals with the balls of one year, for the line we make is 405 miles long, and at 11s. or 12s. a foot it would be considerably more expensive than the ordinary permanent way.

Walter Lovejoy, the ex-amateur billiard champion of England, brought off a double event and made another of his "sensations" on the 20th ultimo in his match against Haverson. He got the balls in the position favourable for what is sometimes called the "equilateral triangle cannon" and made six hundred and three in a shade under seventeen minutes. Prodigious! The most remarkable sequence of cannons ever recorded in the game as we know it. Details in our London Sporting Letter.

"Tiger Smith," the Indian Army hurricane fighter, has reaped the reward of his persistence and is now matched to meet Gunner Moir for the Heavy-Weight Championship of England. Details are given in our English Sporting Letter. We should say Smith has at last met his match—something better than the odd and end boxers on whom he has built his reputation.

The Bengal Lawn Tennis Championship will be held between the 6th and 16th proximo, as usual on the Calcutta C.C. ground in the Eden Gardens. Mr. Danger, we are glad to see, is again engineering the competition, and in his announcement, appearing among our sporting notices to-day, intending entrants will find all particulars.

London Week by Week.

Friday, 25th January 1907.

WE have got winter with a vengeance this week. I do not know when I have felt an east wind so penetrating as that which cleared the streets on Wednesday. Towards dusk in that afternoon you might have supposed the hour to be nine o'clock on Sunday morning, so empty were the streets in the West End. There is a rush for the south of France, but it looks as though those who go south should find themselves in worse case. When trains between Rome and Naples are snowed up, and frost and east wind are searching out every corner on the Riviera, it seems safer to stay at home—unless indeed you go to East Iceland (Segdisfjord), where on Wednesday the thermometer stood at 59 degrees F. which was 31 degrees warmer than Nice and 25 degrees better than Biarritz. I do not understand anticyclones or their method of operation, but obviously the latter are utterly subversive of discipline and good order in the matter of climate.

Sir Alexander Swettenham's letter to Admiral Davis has quite overshadowed the calamity out of which the missive had birth. Of course the letter was a mistake; hastily written, framed in singularly ill chosen language and unworthy of a man holding such an office as Governor of a Colony: but was the American Admiral's line of action so delicately tactful that he should go unblamed? He was particularly requested not to fire a salute, for the very sound reason that the scared inhabitants should mistake it for another earthquake: a salute was fired nevertheless owing to some unpardonable blunder. His next proceeding was to land an armed force to protect the archives of the American Consulate from a perfectly quiet and well behaved populace: then he landed men to practically take charge of the town! and started a field hospital under the American flag!! then he proceeded to justify the landing of an armed force by informing Sir A. Swettenham that he judged the police surveillance of the city to be inadequate for the protection of private property!!! It is doubtful whether a more amazing display of officiousness—to use a mild term—was ever forthcoming at the wrong time even from an American source. And when we remember that the United States have for long cast the eye of cupidity on Jamaica while the colonists have no affection at all for America and things American, the dangerously overcharged atmosphere in which Admiral Davis operated becomes clear to us.

* * * * * *

The letter was a monument of indiscretion: the ironical references to the American Vice-Consul, to private storekeeper's use for free assistance and that American millionaire parallel dragged in by the ears show human irritation divested of all official restraint. I am told that it does not require an earthquake to evoke a letter of this kind from Sir Alexander's pen; but under normal circumstances his robust good sense and natural courtesy prevail and the letter is not sent. In my microscopic judgment the error committed in sending this outburst was as nothing compared with the error committed in publishing it. The missive was despatched in haste: it was given to the public at leisure and by whom? Certainly not by the writer. Our man has put himself in the wrong and I suppose will be called upon to commit official Hara Kiri. How many good men have come to grief over fences so insignificant!

Evidently the Home Office was only waiting for the cabmen's approval to introduce the taximeter system. Tuesday's Gazette contained the draft of the new order the Home Secretary proposes to make. The changes are many but the more important are :—introduction of a six penny fare for a one mile or 12 minutes' drive (within the 4 mile radius) in a horse cab; and an eight penny fare for a mile or ten minutes' journey in a motor: introduction of the taximeter, compulsorily as to motor cabs after 1st July and optionally for horse cabs. The proposed new regulations recognise quarter miles (at 3d.) for taximetered cabs. It will be interesting to see whether the instrument prove an advantage to cabby or the reverse.

The "Association for the Promotion of Flight" has been formed with Mr. E. Cæsar Hawkins as temporary Honorary Secretary. As a certain latitude of interpretation as possible it had been said at once that Mr. Hawkins' association does not propose to aid absconding debtors or to aid politicians in little England schemes. It is simply an endeavour to organise experiment with aëroplanes and dirigible balloons. Sir Wm. Crookes, Sir Herans Maxim, Mr. S. F. Edge, Major Baden Powell and Mr. C. A. Parsons are on the provisional committee and the aim of the Association is to systematise experiment in the interests of progress that the privilege of flying may the sooner be man's. The Honorary Secretary claims that aviation is a matter of national importance, but I think he is perhaps a little previous in giving it place in the same range of importance as motoring: but the whole scheme is aglow with hope.

A curious slander case has been occupying Mr. Justice Kennedy and a special jury in the King's Bench Division. In January 1906 Mrs. Isabel Wilson exhibited a chinchilla kitten at the Bath Show: Mr. T. B. Mason, connected with the journal Fur and Feather, was judging long haired cats and he disqualified Mrs. Wilson's kitten assigning "cut tail" as his reason; a card to this effect was put up over the kitten and subsequently Mr. Mason referred to the disqualification and its cause in Fur and Feather. Mrs. Wilson read into this an association of "faking" which is held in abhorrence as a crime among cat fanciers and brought action against Mr. Mason to clear her character. She admitted damage to the kitten's tail but stated that the blemish resulted from an accidental burn and called veterinary evidence to support the plea. The jury found for Mrs. Wilson with £50 damages, but a stay was granted in view of appeal. If the decision is upheld, the judge of livestock will find his occupation a dangerous one.

Nothing more has transpired to explain the murder of Mr. Whiteley in his shop at Westbourne Grove yesterday. The murderer, a very well dressed young man, had no connection whatever with Messrs. Lewis and Lewis whose name he used to procure access to the Universal Provider's private room: Mr. Whiteley's sons know nothing about him and he could not be recognised as a dismissed employé. He claimed, as you no doubt know, to be a son of his victim, but as he has lain unconscious in the hospital whether he was carried no more information has been forthcoming.

It is a melancholy end to a remarkable career. William Whiteley was a Yorkshire farmer's son and was apprenticed to a draper in Wakefield, he served afterwards in various shops in London and when 32 years of age having saved about £700, opened a small shop in Westbourne Grove, then called "Bankruptcy Avenue" by reason of the many failures in the region. The story goes that on the morning he opened his shop 11th March 1863, a lady came in and, the comparative unreadiness of the place being explained to her, said "I suppose I am your first customer?" receiving an affirmative answer she requested permission to offer a prayer, which was granted. Whiteley used to tell this story with great unction—to the right people; and it did him no harm! The annual turnover of his concern is said to be over a million sterling.

"The Gondoliers" was chosen to follow the "Yeomen of the Guard" on Tuesday night: or rather to be given on alternate nights with the latter opera. The Gilbertian atmosphere seems to have established itself at the Savoy: the points were taken by the audience from the very start and there was no trace of the disconcerting stiffness which distinguished the attitude of the house towards the Yeomen on the first night. The piece is admirably acted: Mr. C. H. Workman is really excellent as the Duke, he scores every point and gets the utmost out of his part: the two Gondoliers Marco and Guiseppe were played in the true Gilbertian spirit by Messrs. Pacie Ripple and Richard Green: I liked them quite as well as my recollection of Mr. Courtice Pounds and Mr. Rutland Barrington. I am not sure that the distaff side of the cast was as strong as the other; but this may be because one's recollections of Misses Rosena Brandram, Geraldine Ulmar and Jessie Bond exacted a very high standard. Miss Marie Wilson as Casilda was very excellent, and Miss Lilian Coomber who played Gianetta has a charming voice. Miss Jessie Bond's Tessa was such a lasting joy one sympathises with Miss Jessie Rose for that she has to follow her.

It is to be hoped, by the way, that there is no friction behind the scenes at the Savoy. Mr. W. S. Gilbert wrote to the papers on Tuesday to say that "in the present series of revivals my responsibility is confined exclusively to the ordinary duties of stage manager;" in correction of the announcement that the plays are produced "under the personal direction of the author."

"The Stronger Sex," a play in three Acts by Mr. John Valentine was produced at the Apollo this week. The plan of the play is neither agreeable nor elevating and the audience applauded the actors who made so good a job of the thing rather than the thing itself. The Hon'ble Warren Barrington is in love with Ivan Forsythe who won't marry him, he being a poor man: he tells Joan that he marries Mary, the rich American, for her money and Mary overhears it. Mary marries him with the sole object, apparently, of showing the man that he is not going to get her money. She gives him an allowance, docks it when he breaks anything, and humiliates him even to the extent of telling the servants to obey her orders and not his, before his face: she does not even spare him before the two (18th century) Jew money-lenders who hold the "paper" she takes up on strictly business principles. Mary in short, is what I suppose Americans would call real smart—a little underbred cat, while the Don Warren is one-third bounder, one-third bully, and the rest fool. Can you imagine a man in such a position threatening his wife with violence? and can you imagine his being completely cowed for ever by the exhibition of a revolver—when you have imagined the wife resorting to a "six-shooter"? Having been cowed the Don Warren falls in love with his wife. The pit applauds that: it would, you know: so true to life! Mr. Leonard Boyne made the best of the improbable husband and Miss Nina Boucicault contrived to give the improbable wife semblance of vitality.

I liked much better E. M. Bryant's bright and clever little comedy, "The Peacemaker," which served as curtain-raiser to the "Stronger Sex," and by its sincerity made the staginess of the main dish the more glaring. It is a mere trifle: Elizabeth Lavendar (Miss Brathwaite) gets up a little dinner to which she invites Dr. Burton, and Mr. and Mrs. Harford who have separated and living apart: the desired reconciliation is effected naturally and neatly between the two wrong-headed young people. Not the least notable feature of this little piece was Miss Ella Tarrants delightfully clever rendering of the part of a stupid maid. The "Peacemaker" is worth a dozen "Stronger Sexes."

The Music Hall strike will do more to shape public opinion on the subject of Trade Union methods than strikes of a much graver character. Three bodies, the Variety Artists, Federation, the Amalgamated Union of Musicians and the National Association of Theatrical Employees combined to "go for" Mr. W. Gibbons who controls six suburban music halls: they made certain demands concerning the conditions of employment, the chief being that he should dismiss all non-Union employees which he refused to do. The bodies above mentioned thereupon "called out" performers and employees at the six halls. Mr. G. A. Payne who controls the Tivoli, Oxford and Canterbury, also the Euston, Paragon and other suburban halls came to the aid of his brother-manager and helped him to sufficient "turns" to keep some of his halls open on Monday night. Thereupon the three bodies attacked Mr. Payne and gave him half an hour to accept their conditions or take the consequences. He of course refused; and by result the Tivoli, Canterbury and Paragon, were among the houses closed on Tuesday night. The attack was planned to bring about this result and the result was that the usual audience was assembled in the evening when Mr. Howell, the acting manager, appeared on the Tivoli stage to say there could be no performance and money would be returned at the doors. Mr. Arthur Roberts, Mr. A. Hurley and Miss Marie Lloyd are named as three of the leading spirits of the "Artists" strike as they draw salaries of £85, £80 and £80 per week respectively from Mr. Gibbons and have other engagements besides they cannot be considered underpaid.

It is a great opportunity for undiscovered talent: the advantages of Trade Unionism are not universally recognised in the profession and there is little doubt but that the proprietors must win. Mrs. Brown Potter was promptly engaged to appear at the Holborn Empire and plenty of offers were forthcoming from other artists. At those halls where a scratch programme was given as the alternative to closing the Holborn Empire for instance—the audience was distinctly sympathetic. On Wednesday night all the Halls were open and if the performances were below par the public in each case was distinctly friendly. To avoid the attentions of the pickets at the stage doors, the artists came in at the audience entrances.

MOUNTAIN SPORT IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.*

MR. W. T. HORNADAY is a naturalist first and a sportsman afterwards; and his trip to the Canadian Rockies in British Columbia was made rather with the view of studying the "White goat" at home than with the object of procuring trophies. The greater portion of his very readable book is therefore devoted to this animal; and with reason, for it must be admitted that he and his wives and daughters repay study with the binoculars as well as attention with the rifle. He is a curious beast, this North American mountain goat: wary like all mountain game, extraordinarily agile and clever as a rock climber; and, unlike any Himalayan species, so far as our knowledge goes, willing to fight when brought to bay by man. It is this last trait which lends the White Goat peculiar claims to notice. Heavier than the markhor, specimens killed by Mr. Hornaday or members of his party were weighed and scaled 258lbs. and 276lbs., respectively, and armed with short but smooth and very sharp horns, the white goat is well equipped for battle under the conditions where and where only he elects to give battle; and when a big male makes up his mind to fight on some narrow cliff ledge with death waiting the loser in the abyss below he is as likely as not to come off the victor. It is this trait which enabled Mr. Hornaday's plucky companion Mr. Phillips to secure the remarkable photographs which enhance so greatly the attractions of this book. From a purely rock-climbing point of view Mr. Phillips' achievements are sufficiently notable; but when we consider the nature of the animal he thus stalked with the camera and mark the nature of the in[illegible]rviews, we recognise that the man who took these pictures p[illegible] have nerves as steady and heart as stout as any who f[illegible] the wounded tiger on foot or receives the charge of the c[illegible]ged gaur.

[illegible]e region whereof Mr. Hornaday's book tells, is that which lie[illegible] between the Elk and Bull Rivers: a vast tract of mountain and forest country where the hill game would seem to be rarely disturbed and where the grizzly is still to be found more frequently than in any other part of the North American continent. The white goat has been described as a stupid animal by some writers, but we think on very insufficient grounds. Dwelling as it does at lofty altitudes where stone falls and the like are of hourly occurrence it surely argues no stupidity in the animal which fails to discriminate between the echoing crack of stone falling on rock and the by no means dissimilar crack of the rifle. It is well recognised by men who have experience with markhor, ibex and the wild sheep of the Himalayas that the report of the rifle is the disturbance least to be dreaded; but the American sportsmen who have noted the indifference of the white goat to the report cannot have considered the not very obscure reason for it. In a region where the game is seldom disturbed the goats show little fear of man by comparison with more sophisticated species; but the rapidity with which they learn the lesson proves them to be very far from unintelligent. Mr. Hornaday tells us that during the first three days he was encamped in "Goat land" his party saw and were seen by 115 goats. "On the fourth day it was remarked with surprise that all the goats had left the country. This was literally true. Word had been passed round among the ten or twelve flocks orginally living there that there was danger afoot; and, as if by magic, one hundred and ten of the one hundred and fifteen goats we had seen simply vanished. The only bunch that remained was a flock of five nannies and kids which were isolated on a rugged mountain that ran off due westward from the main chain of peaks on which we were. Evidently they did not get the word which alarmed all the rest. We had fired our rifles in one spot only, which was at the extreme northern end of that goat-infested area." This does not bear out the allegation of stupidity: and indeed when we regard the conditions of the white goat's life, we must agree that, like other mountain denizens, continued existence is compatible only with a degree of intelligence not far removed, if removed at all, from reason. There is one point in which he is heavily handicapped, namely, in his colour: the snowy whiteness of the animal's coat makes him clearly visible at a distance of three miles or more; a circumstance which gives the eagle an advantage over the kid even as it gives man an advantage over the full-grown beast.

White goat hunting has much in common with Himalayan shikar; but if Mr. Hornaday's experiences are representative, the climbing and walking are very much harder work than we usually encounter in this country. In this, however, we will emulate his sound course, and attempt no comparison between those matters of which we have knowledge and those of which we have none.

Mr. Hornaday deserves infinite credit for his action in obeying his own idea of a fair bag instead of taking full advantage of the terms of his fifty dollar license. This sanctioned the killing of five goats, sex not specified: he thinks that three males should be the limit and accordingly he stayed his hand when he had killed three males, though fortune put in his way chances which might well have tempted him from the line of inaction he laid down for himself. He holds the killing license of the British Columbian authorities too liberal throughout. For example, it sets no limit to the number of grizzlies that may be killed, in accordance with the British principle of regarding any dangerous animal as wholly noxious and to be killed whenever possible. Mr. Hornaday sees good in grizzly bears: and we entirely concur with his opinion that they are a valuable asset to the country: men will come from afar to spend money on the pursuit of the grizzly which they would not spend to obtain mountain game, caribou or deer; and inasmuch as the sportsman is wanted in the country as an employer of labour and source of revenue, he holds it a mistake to place the greatest temptation to sportsmen on a list of outlaws. The grizzly finds a more capable advocate in Mr. Hornaday than does the tiger in Mr. Rees!

Mr. Hornaday's "notes" on the grizzly bear, one of which he included in his bag, are extremely interesting. Tradition has done something to amplify the true proportions of the animal no doubt; but the author's opinion that few of them are permitted to survive the seven years necessary to reach full development deserves weight. He says he has never seen and never expects to see a 1000lb. grizzly; and holds one which weighs 750lbs. a very large bear. Necessarily opportunities of fairly weighing grizzlies killed in their habitat are few and far between as the fur hunters who kill most of them are not sufficiently concerned with such a matter as to spend hard-earned money on large spring balances: but the thickness of the fluffy coat, standing out as it does, naturally enhances the apparent bulk, and an illuminating instance of its deceptive power is given in the case of a bear that died at Chicago. The weight of the carcase was guessed by old hunters at 1,800lbs: it actually scalled 1,150lbs. This is the largest grizzly known to Mr. Hornaday. The character of the beast has undergone a change since it became acquainted with fire-arms: according to the writers of an earlier day the grizzly disturbed would charge a man on sight: now "nine grizzlies out of ten will run the moment a man is discovered, no matter what the distance may be from bear to man. The tenth will charge you fearlessly, especially if you make your attack from below." He attributes this to the better information acquired by grizzlies concerning the connection between man and rifle. We have left ourselves no space to consider the author's remarks on big-horn sheep, and the "small neighbours of big game," but perhaps we have said enough to show that his book is one particularly well worth reading, as the book can hardly fail to be when the writer is a keen, discerning and experienced naturalist. Mr. Hornaday's opportunities of study in the great Zoological Park of New York, of which he is Director, have served him in excellent stead. To Mr. Phillips' photographs we have already made passing reference: those taken of white goat at close quarters would lend distinction to any work.

YARNS OF AN OLD FOGEY.

SHOOTING IN BURMA.

COMPARED to India shooting in Burma is distinctly poor, except in parts. The game is there but the forests are generally too thick and trackers are bad. The Burman, too, as a rule, is extraordinarily disinclined to give "khubber," partly on account of religious scruples and partly because, if a tiger kill for instance, the "thakin" (sahib) will probably not let the carcase be touched until he has sat up over it for a night or two, whereas he wants to eat it now. I have known at least two cases of tigers killed within a mile or so of my camp and nothing was told me of it until the remainder of the beef had been consumed. The subsequent beats were unsuccessful as in each case the tiger had only eaten a few pounds and been disturbed. Yet each of these tigers used to come down yearly from the hills, and for about two months levy a regular toll on the village cattle and are doing so now as far as I know, as I have never heard of their being killed.

In Upper Burma especially I have come across some excellent trackers, but not one, so far, with the instinctive knowledge of animal habits which several Kurumbars, Gonds, Mulcars and other Indian jungle tribes possess. This knowledge is an absolute gift and is only possessed in full by a man here and there, even among Indian hill tribes. In Burma, too, there are practically no real jungle dwellers except Karens. Some of these are good trackers, but are, my experience has been, generally very chicken hearted and inclined to chuck up the sponge too soon. The one man whom I have found facile princeps in Burma was Mg. Hmo in the Chindwin. His great ground was the Mahamyaing forests on the left bank of that river. He also knew all the forests of the country it seemed to me, including those round India and on the Myittha and Kale rivers.

These forests have been much shot out I fear now. To my knowledge there have been several good sportsmen and true, who have taken regular heavy toll out of them notably Harry Thompson, now in Nigeria, Bruce, who has alas crossed the Great Divide and Moggridge of the B.B.C. In all my experience I have never seen a forest so full of game as the Bôn Reserve, on both banks of the Bonchaung. I am talking of 10 to 11 years ago. In a short trip, during which I was full of work too, crossing over from Tasagyo to the head waters of the Bôn, and so down it to its mouth, where there was a village and a P.W.D. Rest House. I bagged, I see by my diary, two hill bison, a bear, a sambhur stag and three gyi, besides quite a lot of pheasants and jungle fowl. Now, I hear, there is little or no game in this Reserve, all having been driven away by the B.B.C. timber firm and their numerous gangs of men and elephants all busy extracting teak. The country through which the Indian-Falam road now runs had not then been opened up at all, and was full of tsine and other smaller game. In fact the Chindwin country generally was full of game which, however, has now been very much shot out.

I suppose however quite the best shooting grounds in Burma are in the Tavoy and Mergui Districts. The Forests, here, however, are so thick, and many of them so inaccessible that very few ever go to shoot there. In the best of all the grounds, for instance, viz., up at the head waters of the little Tenasserim river a regular "bunderbust" would have to be made for transport of all necessaries, as there are absolutely no inhabitants and, of course, no paths of any kind except those made by elephants and other big game. Siamese hunters go up and poach there yearly, and do a certain amount of execution, but not much. The whole forest reeks of game of all kinds and description, but is also very unhealthy and has a worse reputation than the Mysore Forests round Kakenkotha and Bandipur had 30 years ago. The Pegu Tomas and the Hazada Hills, and so on along the Tomas through Thayetmyo and Minbu Districts, are all good grounds and fairly easy to get to, but many of them are much worked for timber and consequently game is scarce or very shy in parts. Still excellent sport is to be had provided the sportsman has a fair knowledge of the country and keeps his temper. A Burman or Karen has very little use for any one who cannot understand him and to "lose your wool" over a blank day or two and at any of their numerous stupidities or foibles is fatal.

In the plain country excellent para (hog deer) shooting is to be had in parts also thamin pig, gyi, and sambhur especially in foot hills, but this I fear will soon be a thing of the past. Yearly regular holocausts of game take place when the rains are on, and nearly all the country is flooded. The games are then all driven on to isolated hills and knolls, surrounded with nets and butchered wholesale by the villagers, who turn out in hundreds for the occasion, and live royally, on more or less high meat for two or three months afterwards.

Little or nothing appears to be even done to stop these massacres. I remember three or four years ago seeing accounts in at least three newspapers of one of these slaughterings at which the figures varied from 150 to 250 head of game destroyed sambhur para gyi, pig, chiefly, but never heard that any of the perpetrators were brought to book.

A game law was proposed some three years ago, and a draft was sent round to all District officers for remarks and suggestions, but nothing more has been heard of it so far. This is only what might be expected in Burma where the Legislative machinery, like the wheels of God, and grind slowly.

All we have at present as game laws are the inadequate rules and regulations of the Forest Act, which afford a modicum of protection, but as the establishment is absolutely inadequate even to carry out necessary Forest works and general protection I fear the rules as to protection of game and fish receive very little attention. It would be interesting to know for instance how many cases have been prosecuted throughout Burma for breaches of rules relating to game and fish. I am prepared to lay a little of the best that not more (if so many) than 20 such cases per annum have been detected and punished throughout all the Forest Divisions in Burma. In the meantime we all live in hope and Micawber like, await something to turn up soon in the direction of game and fish protection.

Fishing.

BIG FISH IN ENGLAND IN 1906.

THOUGH the past year has not been generally a good one, from an angling point of view (says the Westminster Gazette), it has been associated with the capture of some remarkably fine fish in fresh and salt water. The heat wave and summer autumn drought greatly interfered with river fishing, and swollen rivers and Arctic conditions marked the closing days of the piscatorial year. Trout fishers have also had to lament a bitterly cold spring, which resulted in the failure of the May fly rise. In the Thames numbers of good trout and other fish have been taken. Landed by Mr. A. E. Hobbs, in the Henley waters, the largest trout scaled 9lbs. 1oz. Pike up to 22lbs. have been captured; also chub of 5½lbs and 5lbs. 5oz., and 8lb. carp (Egham), and some fine barbel, the season for these fish showing an improvement on 1905. Thames roach fishing has not been up to the average. The largest authenticated roach of the season—one of 2lbs. 7oz.—has been captured in the Lea at Ponder's End by Mr. Strickland. The best pike hail from Ireland and Wales—two 30-pounders. One was taken in the Wye, near Hereford. The past year will be memorable among club anglers as yielding the largest specimen of this fish ever known to have been taken with rod and line. Scaling the remarkable weight of 7lbs. 6½oz., it fell to the rod of Mr. F. W. Smith, fishing in the Avon (Hampshire). Needless to say, it now ornaments a glass case. Wargrave-on-Thames and the Witham, near Boston, Lincolnshire, have each yielded specimen bream of 6lbs. 2oz.—fine fish—and some large perch and dace have been met with in various waters. Grand roach up to 2lbs. 4oz. have been caught by London anglers in the tidal Arun, at Amberley, Sussex. With reference to captures with the sea-rod, the Californian waters are an easy first for big fish. One angler at Santa Catalina Island has landed a black sea-bass of 327lbs. on a light rod. Mr. Holcombe, of the British Sea Anglers' Society, has probably taken the largest fish in English waters—a huge skate of 183lbs., landed at Bally-Cotton, Co. Cork coast. Here a splendid cod of 30lbs. has fallen to the rod of Mr. J. N. Hearn, another member. Fine pollock, bream, and bass have been taken in Sussex and Kentish waters, and one of the catches of the season here was a 34lb. angler-fish (Lophius piscatorius), which fell to the rod of Dr. FitzGerald, at Folkestone. The autumn and winter silver whiting season has been a disappointing one in a general way. One of the finest salmon landed in Scotland was a specimen of 43lbs., which was secured by Mrs. Arthur Sasson in the Earn. The Wye and Usk have furnished some good salmon this season, and near Ringwood (Hampshire), Mr. A. G. Campbell established an Avon record for one day's fishing by landing six salmon, scaling 143lbs.

FLY FISHING FOR DACE ON THE ADUR.

SUSSEX is noted for its pretty villages. Many of the cottages and inns are ancient, dating from the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Brighton is within easy cycling distance of a great deal of charming country.

The roads are for the most part good, though of course, in this land of downs, there are many hills, some of them far too steep to be ridden up.

The nearest stream is the Adur, which runs into the sea at Shoreham. This little river is ugly and uninteresting in its lower portion, which is tidal. One has to go above Upper Beeding, a village some five miles from its mouth; and even there the stream is only beginning to get pretty. Still further up at Henfield, five miles above Upper Beeding, the Adur has become really charming; and moreover is interesting to the angler as it contains plenty of coarse fish.

The pleasantest way of cycling to Henfield, from Brighton, is to take the Upper Shoreham road. Six miles off one turns north on reaching old Shoreham; and three miles beyond, a second turn is made just outside Upper Beeding. Thence there are six and a half miles of pretty country road, where motors are rare!

The first part of the road beyond Upper Beeding is amid rolling downs: great stretches of stubble and clover lie on either hand. After that the scenery changes; the country is wooded, and the hedges are one tangle of blackberry bushes. One passes many a merry party of blackberrying children: their cheeks red with the country air, their mouths and hands purple with juice.

Henfield itself is rather a large village, but the part first reached from the Upper Beeding direction, is old-fashioned and quaint. Some of the cottages have overhanging upper stories, while all are covered with roses and creepers while their little gardens are wildernesses of sweet old time flowers.

A mile and a half beyond the village one turns through a gate into a sandy rutty lane, which a quarter mile down ends in meadows through which the Adur runs. The stream is delightful here, reminding one of the Ouse at Huntington on a small scale.

The meadows are of the greenest, fat sleepy cows chew the cud contemplatively, and down this sweet English valley winds the brook. Here its waters run quickly, there they slow into a pool. Rushes and flags clothe the banks. The only sounds that break the stillness of the summer evening are the scutter of a moorhen or the splash of a feeding pike.

I had a fly rod and spent a charming hour casting for the dace and bleak whose rises dimpled the water here and there.

A group of big cart horses, their day's work done, had been turned loose in the meadows opposite. One of them had walked into the brook, where the bank shelved, and was standing knee-deep in the cool water. This horse did not however seem to frighten the dace and bleak for I saw several rising quite near him. I had a single fly on my fine cast: a hare's ear dun tied on tiny double hooks. Wherever I saw the surface dimple to a rise I cast my little midge just above the circle.

I kept my fly dry by making a number of false casts, before allowing it to alight on the water. I got in this way plenty of rises, but as most of the fish were tiny bleak I did not hook many.

Every now and then, however, I would rise and sometimes hook a dace. Unluckily the steep banks and high flags made it necessary to lift the fish out, for I had no landing net, and so several of the better ones fell off. Nevertheless during the short evening hour, I managed to bring out a few silvery little beauties.

These have rather whetted my appetite and I am making plans for one or two whole days to be spent by the Adur, when, with the help of gentles and paste, I hope to be able to catch some of the better sized fish.

THE MANNLICHER-SCHÖNAUER RIFLE.

FROM the days when the "Gibbs and Pitts" gun first convinced sportsmen of the practical possibilities of the hammerless system the firm of George Gibbs, of Bristol, has had a reputation rather international than provincial. Sporting and match rifles have for many years past been a leading feature with this firm, but their shot guns, both of best and plain quality, have always ranked with the productions of the most highly reputed English makers. A Gibbs side lock ejector, with single or double triggers, whether of first or second quality, is a weapon of the best workmanship embodying the most approved mechanisms of the day, while in detail and finish neither gun leaves anything to be desired. Body locks, with and without ejectors, are also produced by the firm, and in the lower grades they represent singularly sound weapons, of good appearance, at very moderate prices.

High Velocity Expresses, both single and double, are made for India in ·360, ·375 and ·500 bore. In ·450 and ·303 calibres they are also made, but these sizes, of course, are not available for use in India. The rifles are chambered for the modern H. V. Cordite Express cartridges, and are fitted, if desired, with steel plates for the protection of the "hand" of the stock. This device is also used in the various calibres of the Gibbs-Metford falling block single Express, a weapon which has long enjoyed high repute in all parts of the world as a favourite type of black powder Express.

In relation to small bore magazine rifles designed primarily for military use but widely adopted for sporting purposes, Mr. George Gibbs has done very much to popularise the Mannlicher ·256. At Bisley for many years this rifle outclassed the ·303 in the Match Rifle competitions, and although improved ammunition has latterly brought the British service calibre to the premier position the superlatively fine shooting qualities of the ·256 remain beyond all doubt. The calibre being one that is not subjected to special restriction in India, may be expected to increase its already extensive popularity.

The Mannlicher ·256 adapted for sporting purposes, as issued by Mr. Gibbs, is fitted with a chequered pistol-grip stock and short fore-end. It has a shallow projecting magazine under the action, and takes the ·256 Mannlicher rimmed cartridge. The Mannlicher-Schönauer takes the rimless, clip loading cartridge, and as the magazine does not project, is a particularly neat looking weapon. The sporting pattern may be made with detachable barrel, and the stock, fore-end and butt are all chequered. In the pistol hand of the stock, there is a capped box, to contain spare front sight. The rifle is fitted with a safety slide, engraved in gold, and has leaf back sights. Each rifle is shot and regulated for the ranges marked on the sight. The price of this model is £18, but cheaper models at £15 and £12 are also made.

For fuller details of these and other rifles, the lists and catalogues issued by Mr. Gibbs should be consulted. They may be obtained on application either to 39, Corn Street, Bristol, or 35, Savile Row, London, W., where a branch establishment has recently been opened.

THE RECORD CHITAL HEAD.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—In the early part of January last Captain Pope, of this regiment, shot a chital near Jubbulpore, which carried a record head, I believe. There were 8 points, the horns measured 39¼ inches. Have you heard of a bigger one?

C. E. ROBERTS, Lieut.,
Northamptonshire Regt.

JULLUNDUR 5th February 1907.

[Yes: this is the record, the next best being a thirty-nine inch head, with 9 points, credited to Major W. Radcliffe and shot in Northern India.—ED.]

BRIDGE QUERIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—To decide an argument will you kindly say who is right in the following case in Bridge and oblige very much. A and B vs. X and Y. Score immaterial. Trumps spades, doubled and redoubled until it is 64 a trick. A and B get 4 by tricks, but B revokes, X claims 3 by tricks and game. A says "no you have only got 3 tricks and if you add three to those it only makes you six and not game, and if you take 3 from ours it still leaves us the odd and game." Which, if either, is correct. What could X and Y have done, and can A B win after a revoke? X says they cannot. No book on "Bridge" available so we refer the matter to you for favour of a decision.

BURMA.

THANAWAD, DY 4th February 1907.

[X can take 3 tricks from A's pack but this only makes him six, so he cannot score anything. A is left with one odd trick, but as B has revoked they cannot score more than will put their score to 28. A and B cannot score game in any circumstances after a revoke.

X should have added the value of 3 tricks to his score, viz., 142 and scored game. A and B would have scored 28.—ED.]

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—If at the end of a game dummy's partner finds one card short in dummy's hand, can the opponents claim a revoke and look through the pack to find it without knowing the suit.

II. Should dummy or dummy's partner play twice to the same trick from the same hand and it has not been noticed till the end of the deal when a card is found short in either hand does this constitute a revoke?

III. If a player being neither dummy or his partner expose a card and the same card being neither called nor played before he gets a lead, can his opponents make him lead that card; we know that in a lead out of turn a suit can be called, but this is not supposing a lead out of turn, but simply an exposed card, the penalty for which is that it may be called at any time.

BRIDGE.

[I. Dummy cannot revoke, his opponents have just as much opportunity of seeing his cards and if they use the right number as his partner.

II. The same applies: Dummy's opponents should see that Dummy plays one card and one card only to each trick, just as much as his partner.

III. The exposed card can, of course, be called when it is the player's turn to lead, just as much as at any other time.—ED.]

Third Day, Wednesday, the 6th February 1907.

DESPITE the heavy rain which fell during the morning and the lowering skies in the early afternoon, the assemblage on the course to-day was by no means small, many doubtless hoping to retrieve their fortunes after the disasters of Cup Day. It, however, proved to be another bookmakers' day, and these gentlemen again scored heavily. Punters, nevertheless, had a look in in two of the events, namely, the Open Pony Chase, which Daphne won, and the Handicap Horse Chase, where Wales flattered his supporters. The place betting was also profitable to several lucky individuals. The biggest upset of the afternoon occurred in the sixth handicap, when Avatar romped in, seconded by William Rufus, with Sheikh third. Undoubtedly Hazard should have had a chance in this race, had he not been carrying a declared 6lbs. overweight. The Ranger won the Arab Handicap easily; Circus Girl ran well in the Goomtee Plate, but the race went to First Bell, who secured fourth place in the Cup, and was generally considered a "dark" horse for that event. In the last race of the day, Coin II., closed a strong favourite, but was beaten by Red Shot, ridden by Frazer, the latter's excellent riding snatching the victory near the winning post. In this short race of five furlongs the winner had two stone from Colonel Stisted's Forget-me-Not.

His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor was present during the afternoon, and was possibly in sympathy with the losers in the seventh race. The band of the 8th Rajputs was in attendance, and hospitality was dispensed by the members of the United Service and Royal Army Medical Service Clubs.

The going was heavy, and was responsible for three spills, but fortunately none of the jockeys were hurt.

The acknowledgments of the racing public are due to all who contributed to make the meeting the great success it undoubtedly was. The presence of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor is an indication that Sir John Hewett intends to take more than a passing interest in the turf here, and augurs well for the future of Lucknow racing. To the Stewards and to the various officials, including Major J. H. Ensor, the Race Secretary, the thanks of the public are also due, for the smoothness with which the whole meeting went. Details:—

Saturday, 9th February 1907.

THERE was a good attendance this afternoon, among those present being the Amir who on this occasion was not permitted, or didn't find an opportunity to behave rudely to the Calcutta public. His boorish refusal of the Corporation's proffered casket and address, the unpardonable dilatoriness which kept thousands of the Calcutta public waiting one night at the Minto Fête, his churlish attitude towards his own co-religionists, his eccentricities at the fête and elsewhere and the crowning act of discourtesy associated with his departure from Calcutta (when he kept the special train, the guard-of-honor, many officials and others waiting several hours and threw the E. I. R. arrangements entirely out of gear) will long be remembered and resented. How the bear leader of this barbarian permitted such conduct we cannot imagine, and how it was tolerated we cannot conceive, save that more than ordinary toleration was extended to the proverbial capriciousness of a semi-savage by those who sit in high places. However this is a race report not a review of the recent Afghan visitation which we are all thankful is over: we will only repeat that at the races the Amir did not add to the vagaries that have amused and annoyed Calcutta of late, and sportsmen were not disturbed in the discussion of the business which brought them together. We had perfect weather and big fields, good racing, in spite of the absence of many horses from Calcutta, and on the whole the public were fairly successful in spotting winners. We deal with the racing in our Sporting Notes, and here append details.

HUNTERS' HURDLE RACE.—Rs. 500 to the winner, Rs. 200 to the second, and Rs. 100 to the third. A welter handicap hurdle race for bonâ fide Paperchase horses. G. t.'s. R. C. and a distance over seven flights of hurdles.

Sport in England.

LONDON, Friday, 25th January 1907.

HURST PARK.

AN anxious crowd of sportsmen thronged Waterloo Station on Saturday, the 19th instant, in two minds on the great question—to be or not to be. The information to pin one's faith upon lay in the announcement: "If it's no worse than at present, we shall race," but how bad it might be to be qualified by a "worse," we had only the London data to go upon, and the aspect was by no means rosy. However, the departure of the officials by the 11-35 train gave a lead generally followed, and the further we got afield the lighter grew the air, until at Hampton Court Station we reached the brightest stage, and all doubts were at once banished. Having to feel their way across the Waterloo points, the specials lost a bit of time, which a subsequent clearer run failed to make up, and with everybody late, and the doubt as to racing prevailing, the refreshment staff had to scurry round, as everyone at once went for Messrs. Bertram's hot lunch. We ought to be thankful for getting a day's sport, but, at the same time, the fog had marred the meeting, as the attendence proved comparatively meagre to what we are accustomed to at Hurst Park, with a general air of sport on sufferance about the proceedings. The going was capital, but the fog seemed to have an affinity for the course, particularly along the riverside, and therefore it is impossible to give anything more than a mere outline of the running. WINDSOR.

Few sportsmen depressed by the fog in town—particularly that pea-soupy portion thereof that lies south-east—could have imagined that Windsor Castle, on the 21st instant, was figuratively "a palace lifting to eternal summer." Yet behind that cough-compelling curtain were bright skies flooding the big pastures with spring sunshine. Here one could breathe freely, and a few such days would do more to loosen the strings of the light catarrh than all the cough mixtures ever invented. In the absence of wind it was as mild as April, and, despite the deterrent effects of the early morning, a goodly company thoroughly enjoyed a day's outing on the Rays Meadows. Several prominent supporters of cross-country sport were present in the members' enclosure, in which the fair sex was numerously represented. Details :—

That the times be out of joint is suggested by the American prediction of a long snap of cold weather. On the 23rd, however, gave colour to the prophecy, as the wind that's good for neither man nor beast whistled cold up the reaches of the Thames, with the only redeeming feature of its blowing with instead of against the visitor to the course, while before the second race it whirled the snowflakes down into Tattersall's whose occupants blessed the abutting members' pavilion for the partial shelter it afforded. Another good attendance is to be chronicled in the further enclosures, one, perhaps, of the compensations of the Street Betting Act, but the weather kept many holiday makers at home. To everyone's surprise the wintry morning changed to almost as bright an afternoon as on Monday, but brought signs of frost with it, as the course, from softness worked to stodge, the hoofs cutting clods out, and a frosty outlook greeted sportsmen, who gladly gained the shelter of the stations. FOOTBALL. ASSOCIATION RULES.

Although the fog was general throughout the country on Saturday, and particularly thick in some parts, only two matches in the leading Leagues were abandoned, Bradford and Chelsea being unable to try conclusions at Bradford, and the West Bromwich Albion vs. Barnsley game at the Hawthorns was brought to a summary close in the second half while the score sheet was still a blank. In the ten S. L games the home teams had a glorious time, eight of them winning both points, and the remaining two sharing them with their opponents, Thirty goals were obtained, and of these the large proportion of 24 were credited to home elevens, a paltry half-dozen being the aggregate of visiting sides. Six clubs failed to open their account, but Queen's Park Rangers vs. Brentford, at Park Royal, was the only game in which there was no scoring. In the First Division of the League the tally of goals was 31, of which ten were contributed by one game. The scoring was more fairly distributed between home and visiting clubs than in the S. L., the numbers in favour of the former being 18 as against 13. Five home clubs won, three visiting sides captured all the points, and there were two drawn games. The teams who unsuccessfully endeavoured to find the net numbered six, two more than in the Second Division of the League. Here home clubs were put through their paces, as only three won, while four lost, and one game was drawn. Thee ight games produced 29 goals, 16 being scored by home elevens and 13 by visitors.

CHAMPIONS WIN; LEADERS LOSE.

The tit-bit of the afternoon in the Southern League was the game at Craven Cottage between Fulham, the holders of the shield, and the Crystal Palace, the proud conquerors of Newcastle United. Under ordinary circumstances the game would have been most attractive, but a fortnight hence the same clubs have to meet at Craven Cottage in the second round of the F.A. Cup. Fulham had had a hard game on Wednesday against Stockport County, whereas the Palace had been able to take things quietly, but their win at Newcastle did not leave them unscathed, and both Woodger and Ryan were absentees. This was a serious handicap for the Palace, but they entered upon their work in earnest style, and it was a thousand pities that the fog fiend shut out from view so much of the game. It was a struggle worthy of the teams—at least, that is the verdict of those who were able to follow the play from the field. The balance of the exchanges was certainly easily in favour of Fulham, but the Palace defence was of that worrying, terrier-like kind, which nipped the well-meant efforts of their opponents in the bud. Thus at half-time there was no score, and in the second section of the game fortune so far smiled upon the visitors that they took the lead, Astley coolly placing the ball past Fryer. This was sufficient to rouse the Cottagers, and to the finish they were the better team. A couple of goals quickly scored gave them the lead, and they never looked like losing it. The points went to the side which deserved them, but the Palace were not on top of their form, although they struggled splendidly to the close. As Portsmouth went under at Reading by a couple of goals, Fulham return to the head of affairs, but they are only a point to the good, and have played two more matches than Portsmouth. The latter found Reading in better form than when they were at Portsmouth in September. There is no doubt, however, that the severe games with Manchester United had robbed the visitors of some of their sting, and Reading, playing with much determination, won their fourth successive home game. This was Portsmouth's first defeat since 1st December, when they were beaten 1—0 at the Crystal Palace.

INTERESTING LONDON GAMES.

Tottenham Hotspur put a somewhat unfamiliar team in the field against Swindon at the White Hart ground, but it was more than equal to the occasion, and it emphasised what a rich reserve of strength the club possesses in players usually unable to find a place in the first eleven. At least a half-dozen of the side which took the field against Hull were missing, but there was no perceptible weakening of either the attack or the defence as the game went. Swindon had shared the points with Tottenham in September, but on Saturday, although at full strength they could not keep the insistent, thrusting North Londoners at bay, and the 3—0 defeat inflicted upon them is the heaviest of the season, the only other club to score three goals against them being Crystal Palace, who won at home on 13th October by the odd goal in five. When Norwich City last visited West Ham. in search of S. L. points they were defeated 6—1, but in the opening month of this season the Citizens won at home 3—2. Only twice had they been beaten on opponents' grounds prior to Saturday, the last time they lost two points being nearly three months ago at Brentford. West Ham. are now playing in irresistible style, and the powerful defence of Norwich could not hold out against the skilful display of the home forwards, backed up by excellent work in the other departments. Norwich lost on their merits. Last season Brentford captured three points from the Rangers, and they have repeated their performances in 1906-7, the only difference being that in the present campaign they won at home and played a drawn game away, while in 1905-6 they were all square at Brentford and won at Park Royal. On Saturday the defence was superior to the attack on both sides, but the Rangers should have converted some of the chances which came their way.

IN THE COUNTRY.

Luton and Southampton have each won on their own ground this season, and each have scored a couple of goals. True to their traditions when at the Dell, the Beds team, who were without Hawkes, their brilliant, amateur half and skipper, made strenuous attempts to at least share the spoils, but the Sotonians were bent on victory and they had no more than their deserts when they scored just before the interval. Both sets of forwards subsequently made many ineffectual efforts to break down the opposing defence, but without avail, and Luton were worsted. Watford were in a rampant mood at Cassio-road. This was their first League game since their humiliation at Millwall, and Leyton were the unfortunate victims of their evident determination to show they could score goals as well as give them away. The defeat of 6—2 is not the worst defeat of the East Londoners, but is the first time that a half-dozen goals have been scored against them this season. The Bristol Rovers had their revenge at home on Plymouth Argyle for last season's sensational result in the corresponding game, and in a lesser degree for the 3—0 defeat at Plymouth four months ago. The Rovers, who have had only one goal scored against them on their own ground in their last five League games, showed capital all-round form, and have only to reproduce it on foreign soil to improve their position in the table. Brighton and Hove gave further evidence of their ability by the comfortable way in which they disposed of New Brompton, whose Cup tie replay had greatly discounted their chances of success, never of a rosy character. Millwall earned their first point away from home since 14th November, and the result at Northampton is similar to that of last season. This partial success will give much-needed encouragement to the Dockers in their forthcoming away engagements.

S. L. TABLE.

Saturday's games have caused a considerable shuffling of places in the table, particularly among the first four Clubs. Reading have made a welcome advance, and West Ham. are in a strong position. Northampton and New Brompton will have to do something heroic if they escape from their present unenviable positions.

THE ARSENAL SUCCEED AT HOME.

Preston North End have not shown superlatively good form away from home this season, but they were particularly anxious to make the prophets look stupid with regard to their predictions of the result of the game at Woolwich. On 15th September the Arsenal had the temerity to go to Preston, and defeat the team of the Proud Town by three clear goals. Preston naturally did not like it. No other club has scored three goals at Deepdale this season against the home side, and it is understandable why the Lancastrians were so anxious to follow Sunderland's example, in returning from Plumstead with two points safely in their possession. The public were evidently doubtful whether the game would be played, as they did not roll up in the usual numbers, but there were some few thousands, and they waxed enthusiastic over the pretty footwork of the home forwards, and the effectual spoiling tactics of the halves and backs. The forwards in the early stages were most conspicuous, and the Gunners always looked like a winning side when eight minutes from the start Coleman slipped between the backs and found the corner of the net with the ball. Against a less resolute defence the home forwards would have scored heavily, but Rodway and Lavery tackled and kicked as if their lives depended upon their efforts. Their policy was to clear at any price, and it would have been better for their forwards had they at times been more deliberate in their methods. Judged as a whole, the Reds were masters of the situation throughout, and the goal to love victory does not adequately represent their superiority.

BRISTOL CITY BRILLIANT.

One of the features of the League tournament of late is the remarkable consistency of the Bristol City team. On 1st December they lost by the odd goal in five at Aston to the Villa, but since then they have played eight games, and not once have they been on the losing side. The value of their performances is enhanced when it is borne in mind that four have been away matches, and of these two were won and two drawn, their latest achievement being the defeat of Blackburn Rovers, who have been recently playing, especially at home, in a manner reminiscent of their palmy days. Taking five successive home League fixtures prior to Saturday, I find that they won four and one was drawn, two of the defeated teams being Newcastle United and Aston Villa. The representatives of the Western City are the surprise of the season. Those responsible for the management of the team have had the courage of their convictions. They took the view that the men who had so brilliantly piloted the club through the troubled waters of the Second Division would be able to steer it through the shoals and quicksands of the premier division, and the results to date have abundantly justified their confidence.

OTHER LEAGUE GAMES.

The great game in Saturday's list was that at Everton between the leaders and Newcastle United. Much depended upon the result. A win for the visitors would have meant the deposition of Everton from the head of the table, and as the F. A. Cup-holders had no intention of vacating this giddy eminence they had wound themselves up to concert pitch, and Newcastle had to submit to a three clear goals defeat. Everton are not likely to retain the lead, as the United have much the easier programme, and a big balance of home games to play. Derby County were expected not to unduly exert themselves, in view of their second replay in the Cup on Monday, and the Wanderers from Bolton beat them by the only goal scored. Manchester United found their form against Sheffield United, who have evidently struck a bad patch, and Bury followed up their last week's success with a fine win over Manchester City. The game at Sunderland was remarkable in the extreme. At half-time the Liverpool had the apparently winning lead of 4—1, but at the finish honours were even at 5—5. It was the heaviest score of the season both for and against Sunderland, but thrice previously Liverpool have scored five goals, and on another occasion six. Sunderland are to be congratulated on their pluck in pulling an apparently hopelessly lost game out of the fire. The two Birmingham teams renewed acquaintance at St. Andrew's, and Aston Villa had to submit to the inevitable the ex-Heathens obtaining three of the five goals scored. Middlesbrough paid Sheffield Wednesday back in their own coin, the 2—0 win of the Tees-siders being a Roland for the Oliver of September last at Ayresome Park. I have frequently urged that Middlesbrough would be well clear of the eighteenth place when the table was finally made up, and they may yet find themselves in an eminently respectable position. Stoke and Notts County, in halving the points, did not do much damage to each other.

LEAGUE I. TABLE.

It will be noticed that the two Southern teams are now third and fourth in the table, and that Everton with a three points lead over Newcastle, have played two more games.

THE SECOND DIVISION.

To Southerners the most interesting fixture on the list in the Second Division on Saturday was the Bradford vs. Chelsea game, but a pall of fog compelled its abandonment, and it will now be played on 19th March. Barnsley appear to have held their own against West Bromwich until play was perforce stopped, and in the other eight games there were some unexpected results. Gainsborough, after seven successive defeats away from home, won at Hull by 4—2, and the merit of their performance is emphasised by the fact that only one team has previously scored so many as two goals on the City ground in one afternoon. Stockport, too, by beating Chesterfield by a couple of goals, did something that was unexpected, and the successes of Grimsby at Burton, and the Wolverhampton Wanderers at Blackpool were mild surprises. Another curiosity of the afternoon was the draw at Leicester between the Fosse and Leeds City, as this was the first point the Midland team have given away at home this season, their 13 previous games having provided them with 26 points. The only club to obtain every possible point from home matches is Chelsea, who also hold the record for away successes to date. Clapton Orient were most disappointing at Glossop, Burslem were outplayed at Lincoln, and Nottingham Forest helped themselves to a couple of points at the expense of Burnley, who have now lost seven matches off the reel away from home.

LEAGUE II. TABLE.

Although they did not play on Saturday, Chelsea and West Bromwich retain first and second places respectively. Clapton Orient are much too near the foot to be pleasant, but they should escape the last three places.

SCOTTISH FOOTBALL NOTES.

Scottish clubs are busy getting ready for the Cup ties on Saturday, and several clubs are on the look-out for new recruits. Going by Saturday's League matches, we may expect a few surprises for the clubs which did best in this competition have recently slowly but surely gone off. The most notable cases are Celtic, Falkirk, and Airdrieonians. True, the Celtic have won their last two matches, but the games have been about the worst exhibitions they have given this season, and they only got the better of Morton by the odd goal. Falkirk are disappointing their supporters now, and the easy manner in which Hamilton Academicals beat them gives little hope of their getting further than the first round of the Scottish Cup. They meet Rangers, and the Ibrox Club are getting back to something like their old form. Between accidents and influenza they have had a hard time of it, and it is expected that on Saturday they will have the assistance of George Livingstone, late of Manchester City.

At Airdrie, Rangers gave a very bright display, and have to thank their veteran Alec Smith for the victory.

One of the best games of the day was between Queen's Park and 3rd Lanark, and the division of the points was fair to all concerned. The opening dash of the amateurs took the 3rd Lanark men by surprise and T. T. Fitchie's beautiful pass in was good to watch. It was one of the best displays the ex-Woolwich Arsenal player has given in Glasgow, and it was especially welcome in view of the Cup tie at Attbroath.

Hamilton Academicals have made a good capture in Garret, late Glenbuck Juniors, an outside right with a rare turn of speed. He gave the Falkirk defence a busy time of it.

Hearts travelled to Port Glasgow without Thomson and Walker. They managed to get one point, but had great luck, the only redeeming feature being the saving of Allan, their goalkeeper.

At home both Aberdeen and Dundee were too strong for Kilmarnock and Motherwell respectively, and both games were remarkable for the goals that were missed.

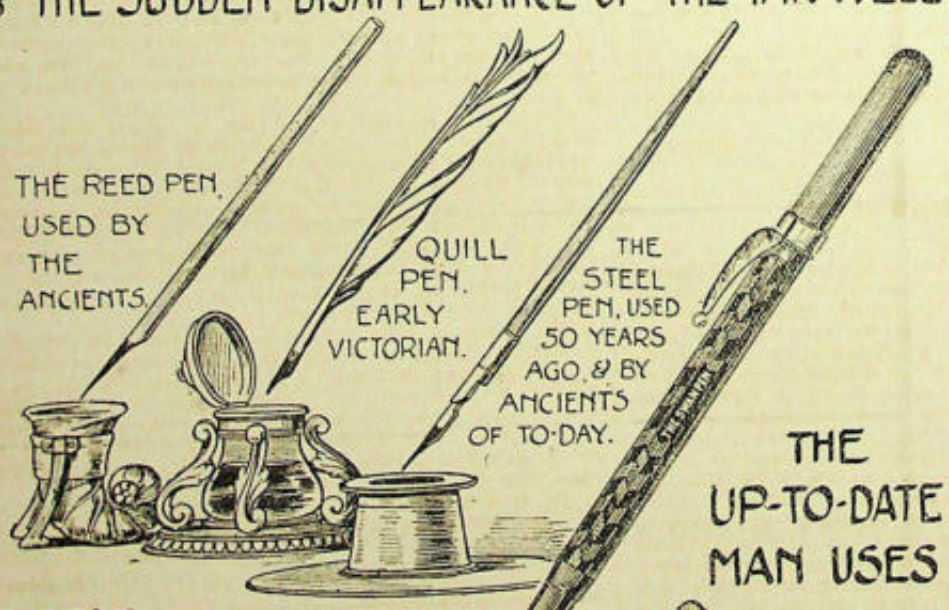
SWIFT CYCLES.

It was in 1859—nearly 50 years ago—that the first bicycle, or as it was then called velocipede, was manufactured in Great Britain by the Swift Cycle Co., Ld., at that time the Coventry Machinists Co., Ld. This was made in a small factory by an equally small number of hands; now the factory of the Company is one of the largest in the world engaged in the manufacture of cycles, and is fitted up with all the latest machinery, embodying the most up-to-date labour-saving devices.

Our reason for mentioning the date the first Swift Cycle was made, is simply to call our customers' attention to the fact that when purchasing a "Swift" they are buying the result of nearly half a century's experience, and a machine which will invariably, and under allconditions, give entire satisfaction. This is no empty boast, but an established fact, as the numerous testimonials received by the "Company" prove.

By Special Appointment to His Majesty the King.

We would specially call our customers' attention to the prices of Swift Cycles, which are arranged to suit everybody. The cheaper grade of bicycles is only cheap in price, the material and workmanship both being excellent.



We also would emphasise the fact that with all our Cycles we supply Tool Bag, Spanner, Inflator and Clips, Lamp and Bell, free of charge.

BILLIARDS.

LOVEJOY'S DOUBLE RECORD.

Saturday was a day long to be remembered by those who were fortunate enough to witness the conclusion of play at Messrs. Cox and Yeman's Billiard Hall, Brompton Road, S. W.

Long before the start the hall was packed to its utmost capacity, and there was not even standing room in any part. A big crowd had come to witness the continuation of Lovejoy's remarkable break, and a great number went away disappointed at not being able to gain admission. A few minutes after three o'clock the players made their appearance, and Lovejoy received quite an ovation.

Excitement ran high as he was seen to drop into position at the top left-hand cushion section of the table, having previously satisfied himself that the balls had been replaced by the referee in the exact position that they were when he left off play overnight. The merest fraction of an inch would have made all the difference in his not being able to continue with the stroke that has created such immense interest in the billiard world.

With his "bridge" firmly made, and the cue evenly balanced, he proceeded to make the first stroke that was to continue the break. He carefully struck his ball, and the cannon was safely made.

Then it was apparent that his previous record would be safely passed, as he only wanted two more cannons. Passing his previous record break of 463 (which included 146 cannons), made against H. W. Stevenson at Oldham on 5th October 1906, he kept in position with this identical cannon stroke till at 15,081 he momentarily hesitated. The break at this time had reached 572 (272 cannons). A little later the striker was observed to be very apprehensive, a twitching of the fingers denoting that he was in a state of great nervous excitement.

The strain eventually proved too much for him. Playing ten cannons more, and reaching 15,101, he lost touch, leaving his ball midway between the red and Harverson's ball. Playing two more close cannons, he then potted the red into the top left corner pocket, played another ball-to-ball cannon, and broke down at the next stroke—an attempt to run through the white into the top right corner pocket. The full break amounted to 603, including a run of 284 consecutive cannons.

This, of course, is Lovejoy's record break under the Billiard Association rules with ivory balls upon a Standard table, and, in addition, creates a new cannon record, the previous highest being a run of 159 consecutive cannons by W. Cook, on 23rd October 1905, at the Grand Hall, Leicester Square, W. C. The time occupied by Lovejoy in making the full break was a shade under seventeen minutes, the last 145 points, the number added on Saturday afternoon, occupying four minutes.

A storm of applause burst from the spectators in recognition of Lovejoy's extraordinary performance, and so ended what is unquestionably one of the most remarkable breaks known in the history of the game.

Singular to remark, Lovejoy did nothing of note afterwards; his best breaks during the session, which was a very lengthy one, being 25, 54, 41, 76, and 44 respectively. In justice it must be said that he was blessed with none the best of the leaves, but at times he had opportunities for scoring, of which he certainly did not avail himself.

Harverson, on the other hand, came along at a terrific rate and in compiling breaks of 113, 122, 219, 90, 50, 194, 152, 83 and 71, showed of what stubborn fighting material he is made, and what he is capable of doing when he is behind. As evidence of the remarkable pluck Harverson possesses when he apparently is hopelessly in the rear, and the odds look like a hundred to one against him, he aggregated 1,794 points to Lovejoy's 515.

The evening play of Lovejoy was quite a reversal of the afternoon's display. His first effort was 143, and then he faced four safety misses, going out at his eleventh and last visit with a magnificient break of 312 (unfinished) principally compiled at the top of the table.

Lovejoy thus won the match—which was 16,000 up Harverson conceding 3,600 start for £25 a side under B.A. rules, with ivory balls—by 732 points.

ROWING.

THE UNIVERSITY BOAT RACE.

OXFORD.

There were twelve degrees of frost on Tuesday night at Oxford, and throughout yesterday the thermometer was never above the freezing point, while the bitter east wind did not improve matters. Mr. Gold coached, and had the company of the Leander oarsman, Captain Willis, who was also on horseback.

The work was not of a very arduous character, tubbing being entirely dispensed with, and they only had a couple of spins over the short course in the eight at a stroke varying from 26 to 27 per minute.

On both occasions they came through in one piece, and if the rowing did not greatly impress the few onlookers who braved the weather, there was some excuse, for the wind gave the crew a lot of bother, especially at the crossings. The order on the way back was the same as on Tuesday, but the second time down Heard resumed his place at bow, vice Somers-Smith. This, however, was the only alteration. Names and weights:—

CAMBRIDGE.

Again yesterday bitterly cold weather prevailed at the Light Blue 'Varsity, and the work was confined to the eight. The crew got afloat at the usual time, there being no changes from Tuesday's order.

The work undertaken was of a heavy character, and what few easies were taken were very brief. The water was not quite so rough as on the previous day, but the crew did better, and were several seconds faster over the same stretch of water. When they were fully exposed to the wind they rolled very badly and were noticed to be down on the bow side a good deal.

Getting away from the Goldie Boathouse at a stroke of 24, they pulled to the Chesterton Horse Grind, and then on to the Pike and Eel. From here to the Locks, a distance of about a mile and a half, they paddled without a stop. The average rate of striking was 25, while in the various reaches they rowed for a few strokes, but never attempted more than 28. As the crew got tired they lost their life and rhythm.

Having turned, they paddled and rowed to Grassy Corner, where without stopping they rowed for half a minute at 32. They pulled to Ditton Corner, and then rowed right through to the Horse Grind at an average stroke of 29. After a brief rest they paddled home at a lively stroke. Mr. Escombe coached, and was accompanied by Sir W. B. Savory. Order and latest weights:—

BOXING.

HEAVY-WEIGHT CHAMPIONSHIP.

The much-discussed match between Gunner Moir (champion of England) and "Tiger" Smith (champion of India) is at length made, and should create a tremendous amount of interest. It will be remembered that after "Tiger" Smith's lucky victory over Seaman Kelly, the winner's partisans at once signified their intention of supporting their man to meet the holder of the championship for the title. Owing, however, to the proposed meeting with Jack O'Brien, the match for a while hung fire.

Now that negotiations have been broken off with O'Brien, Moir has consented to meet Smith, and yesterday the pair attended headquarters for the signing of articles. Smith, the ex-miner, who, since his return home from India, has been residing at Merthyr Tydvil, journeyed up to the metropolis. It was soon apparent that each was anxious to clinch matters, and with very little controversy articles were signed.

The outcome, therefore, is that Gunner Moir (London) and "Tiger" Smith (Merthyr Tydvil) agree to box twenty rounds for £500 a side, and the £3,550 purse given by the National Sporting Club, where the contest is fixed to take place on 25th February £100 a side was deposited upon signing articles, and the second and final deposit of £100 is due on 11th February. In addition, 25 per cent. of the profits derived from the cinematographic pictures of the contest will be divided between the contestants.

Hunting.

THE KARACHI HUNT.

31st January.—The hounds met at the Chaukidar's Khet at 7-15 A.M. It was a nice cold morning, and the Master had 10 couple of hounds out, all the picture of keenness and health. Drawing the scrub, at the end of the khet, the hounds found and went away smarly, in the direction of Oomer Dosal's Khete, but the jack was turned by some labourers, and doubled sharp back towards the river bed which he crossed. We had a short check owing to the hounds over-running the scent, but a cast back put them right, and they worked out the line, hunting beautifully together, past the Ruined Cottage, and along the Long Bund. Hunting with a fine spread they crossed the bare path, and on across the nullah, finally killing near the foot of the hills after a good 30 minutes.

3rd February.—The hounds met at the Bunnia's Crossing at 7-15 sharp, when a good field turned out, notwithstanding the wet. Mrs. Travers and Mrs. Graham were the only ladies out to face the elements. The Master commenced by drawing the orchards on the far bank, and then drew the Guavas, and the Rai Singh Khetes, all without finding. However, better luck was in store for us in the scrub near the Ruined Cottage, where a jack broke away towards the Chaukidar's Khet, but was turned near the village, and then set his mask for the Maggar Pir Hills, giving us an almost straight point of 3 to 4 miles. The hounds hunted fast and well, and pulled their quarry down at the very foot of the hills, when he had all but won his sanctuary. It came on pretty wet, but several of the keenest sportsmen, including Mr. Lucas, stayed, and were rewarded by a nice hunting run of 20 minutes, but the jack got away into the hills, and the hounds were whipped off homewards. The rain continued all the morning and we were all pretty wet by the time we got home.

SINDHI.

THE MADRAS HUNT.

THERE was a very large field out on Sunday, the 3rd instant, when there was a breakfast meet at the Kennels. Among those present were Mrs. Horne, Mrs. Miller, Mrs. Marjoribanks, Mrs. Branson, Mrs. Gifford, the Hon'ble Mr. Weir, Mr. A. G. Yorke, Colonel Brownrigg, Major Elliot, Mr. H. Irwin, and many others. With the meet at the Kennels we did not expect very much in the way of sport, for though there are plenty of jacks in the neighbourhood, especially in the sugarcane fields near the Adyar River, they have nowhere to go to when hounds are after them and are not accustomed to travel. All the same we had a very pleasant morning and hounds were busy all the time, the big field out having plenty to amuse them.

Hounds were first thrown into a sugarcane field near the Cenotaph Road and this and several others were tried without success. In the Government Farm, however, a jack was found in a field of grain and hounds soon opened on his line. For over an hour they hunted him industriously, up and down the Farm, which he seldom left and never for far, dodging round the grain and sugarcane and then round the clumps of guava on the banks of the Adyar. He proved a good and fast jack, though unenterprising, and whenever hounds got a view, which they did fairly often across the open fields, he was always too fast for them and invariably got to covert again. In the end, however, they wore him down, and racing him in view over the open country behind the Collector's office, rolled him over on the bank of a small tank into which he and the hounds fell together. The water was fairly deep and hounds either killed him in it or drowned him, for he sank and could not be got at. Hounds had moved off before his body was got out of the tank by some coolies and the brush was presented to Mrs. Marjoribanks.

It was now growing late, but it was too soon to stop, although hounds had had already a good deal to do, so they were taken across the road above the Long Tank and then into the thick and trying jungle behind the Collector's house. It was not long before they opened on a line, as these coverts are always full of jacks, but they are the worst of all possible places to hunt in. Hounds gave their jack no rest, bustling him round and round until he at last broke across the Railway. This was no improvement, unfortunately, for a stretch of country worse, if possible than that we had come from lies between the Railway and the Adyar. This he never left and shortly before nine o'clock hounds were stopped, as the sun was getting far too hot for them.

The field then adjourned to the Adyar Club, where the Hunt staff were "At Home," for breakfast.

On Wednesday last the meet was at Vellacheri, and as there had been a dance the night before and other functions, the field was a very small one, only about half a dozen men and two ladies being present. There were also a few horses out whose owners failed to turn up and one belated sportsman found hounds on their way home. The jack, too, was a small one, hounds having had a hard day on Sunday and the Master deciding to give many of them a much needed rest. Hounds were sent first into the Vellacheri covert, then across the swamp, to Fox Hill and then to the outlying covert where, last time we met in this direction a brace of jacks had been at home. All efforts to find a jack were unsuccessful and the Master then moved across to the long coverts where also it was sometimes before anything was discovered. Hounds at last opened on a line in some long grass down on the far side near the canal and held it. Slowly, with frequent checks in a northerly direction across very dry and sandy fields. The line pointed for a thick plantation of young casuarinas, so hounds were held forward to this and pricked up the line in it almost immediately. The jack broke after running a couple of rings round the plantation, the leading hounds being in view, pointing in the direction of Vellacheri. There were many small plantations and much scrub about and in these hounds soon lost their view but they ran a very good pace right to the Lattice Bridge end of the coverts. Then bending right handed, the jack made for canal across the open and nearing the canal, hounds got another view and, his heart failing him, the jack turned from the water and made straight for the cocoanut tope near Lattice Bridge. This gave us a mile of hard galloping over flat, open ground, with the jack in view and hounds straining to come up with him. He was just fast enough to hold them, however, and gained the covert, but here his strength ran out and they rolled him over. This was a good and fast gallop of fifteen miles' duration and had been preceded by some pretty slow hunting. It was quite early when they killed, but there was nowhere handy where they could draw again, so it was decided to take them home.

Paperchasing.

No VIII.

FOR the eighth chase the Honorary Secretaries had found a capital course through the heart of the Jodhpur country, although some of the best bits are still impassable. Starting behind the Thannah the course circled round on the near side of the railway, crossing the site of the new cemetery and afterwards following the main road for a short distance before turning into the jungle right handed. The journey through the enclosed country to the Tollygunge Lane was most enjoyable and after just crossing the line to make use of an old mud wall the paper turned for home, running back viâ the Ladies' Wall to the old finishing ground beside the Garia Hat Road.

H. E. The Viceroy with Lady Eileen and the Hon'ble Edmond Elliot went round with the paper which was again carried by Messrs. Deakin and Turner. The course must have been a trifle over four miles long and there were some eight or ten fences only en route.

Cain having returned to the fray Mr. Evers was able to pilot the large field through all the difficult places, but the pace was necessarily so steady that the leading dozen were close on each other's heels all the way. With the exception of a heavy weight, who succumbed to the first wall and was thoroughly well galloped over like Blucher at Ligny, nearly every one got the course in safety. I did meet one sportsman tramping it home to the finish but he seemed very cheerful and his horse was duly captured and restored to him later in the morning. The order in the Horse Chase was:—

1. Mr. Evers on Cain [tive
2. Mrs. L. Walker on Detec-
3. Mr. Ballantyne on Fairy
4. Mr. Robinson on Ryong
5. Mr. Halliday on Ruddigore
6. Mr. Levetus on Jorrocks

followed by Dr. Forsyth on Corydon, Lady Fox, Lord Harry, and others of the nobility and gentry too numerous for mention.

In the Pony Chase Mr. Kenneth Roberts on took a heavy toss at the first wall and after that Clarice led them all the way and came home cantering. The final order was:—

1. Mr. Muir on Clarice
2. Capt. Fitzmaurice on Brownie
3. Mr. Antram on Blazex
4. Mr. Barrow on Puck
5. Capt. Elgee and Mr. Bitson.

LUCKNOW TOURNAMENT.

THE SEMI-FINALS.

THE two games in the semi-finals of the Lucknow Polo Tournament which were played off on the Mahomed Bagh ground on Tuesday, the 5th instant, were both splendid exhibitions of polo, in which the sensational element was not lacking. There was a well filled gallery, nearly the whole of Lucknow society being represented. A high wind blew almost throughout the afternoon, and the ground was often enveloped in clouds of dust.

The game between the Durham Light Infantry and the Rifle Brigade was full of excitement from start to finish. The Durhams gave their opponents a hard task, but the splendid combination and accurate hitting of the Rifle Brigade gained them a somewhat easy victory by three goals and two subsidiaries to one goal by the Durham Light Infantry.

First Chukker.—The Rifle Brigade scored their first goal within a minute from the start.

Second Chukker.—Very fast play, the Rifle Brigade, who had the advantage almost throughout, scoring a subsidiary. Score: Rifle Brigade, 1 goal and 1 subsidiary; Durhams, nil.

Third Chukker.—The Rifle Brigade again had the best of this chukker, and made a goal from a well-directed shot. Score: Rifle Brigade, 2 goals and 2 subsidiaries; Durhams, nil.

Fourth Chukker.—The Durhams were unfortunate in not scoring at the opening of the chukker. The Rifles attacked, but the ball went out wide. No score.

Fifth Chukker.—The Rifle Brigade scored a goal. Score: Rifle Brigade, 3 goals, and 2 subsidiaries; Durhams, nil.

Sixth Chukker.—No score.

Seventh Chukker.—The Durhams scored their first goal amidst great applause.

Eighth Chukker.—No score. The Rifle Brigade won by 3 goals and 2 subsidiaries to 1 goal by the Durham Light Infantry. Teams:—

In the second game, between the Crusaders and the Royal Dragoons Subalterns, the Crusaders were superior in combination though the final score hardly represents the respective strength of the two teams. A high wind blew during the latter half of the game.

First Chukker.—No score. Though the Crusaders had two shots at goal, which missed the mark.

Second Chukker.—The Crusaders scored a goal, followed by two subsidiaries.

Third Chukker.—The Royals retaliated with a goal.

Fourth Chukker.—No score.

Fifth Chukker.—The Crusaders hit a subsidiary. Score: Crusaders, 1 goal and 3 subsidiaries; Royals, 1 goal.

Sixth Chukker.—The Crusaders scored a goal from a magnificent shot by Farran.

Seventh Chukker.—No score.

Eighth Chukker.—No score. The Crusaders won by 2 goals and 3 subsidiaries to 1 goal by the Royal Dragoons Subalterns. Teams:—

THE FINAL

The final took place on the 7th instant in delightful weather. The rain that had fallen overnight had effectually laid the dust, and the turf was in fine condition. The Crusaders were placed almost entirely on the defensive throughout the game, which was a fast and interesting one, and in the end the Rifle Brigade won the Tournament by 4 goals and 5 subsidiaries to the Crusaders' 1 goal and 1 subsidiary. Lady Locke-Elliot presented the handsome Challenge trophy to Captain Bassett, on behalf of the Rifle Brigade, and congratulated the team on their fine play.

The public are indebted to Captain Jeffreys and Mr. Charrington, the organisers of the tournament for the success which attended their efforts.

First Chukker.—The Rifle Brigade quickly galloped away and scored 2 subsidiaries, the second from a free hit.

Second Chukker.—The Rifle Brigade were pressing nearly the whole time. The Crusaders then got away, and Farran hit a fine goal. Score: Rifle Brigade, 2 subsidiaries; Crusaders, 1 goal.

Third Chukker.—The Crusaders secured the ball and running down hit a subsidiary. The Rifles retaliated with a minor point, and towards the close of play, succeeded in obtaining a goal after a continuous attack on their opponents' flags. Score: Rifle Brigade, 1 goal and 3 subsidiaries; Crusaders, 1 goal and 1 subsidiary.

Fourth Chukker.—The Rifle Brigade scored two subsidiaries. Fast up and down play followed, in which the Crusaders were always on the defensive. Score: Rifle Brigade, 1 goal and 5 subsidiaries; Crusaders, 1 goal and 1 subsidiary.

Fifth Chukker.—The Rifle Brigade made a goal.

Sixth Chukker.—Play was in the Crusaders' ground, the Rifles returning again and again to the attack, but no score resulted.

Seventh Chukker.—The Rifles confined the play throughout to the Crusaders' territory, Watson once getting the ball away and carrying it up the ground. The Rifles returned again to the attack, and from a mêlee in front of the flags, scored a subsidiary. Score: Rifle Brigade, 3 goals and 5 subsidiaries; Crusaders, 1 goal and 1 subsidiary.

Eighth Chukker.—A little over three minutes remained for play. The Rifles made a goal, and were attacking when the final call of time sounded. Final score: Rifle Brigade, 4 goals and 5 subsidiaries; Crusaders, 1 goal and 1 subsidiary. Teams:—

UMBALLA STATION TOURNAMENT.

THE two new polo grounds at Umballa were opened on Wednesday, the 30th January, when the semi-final ties of the local tournament were played. Lieutenant-Colonel Eastwood, Commanding the 12th Royal Lancers, presented four cups to be played for by teams made up of regular players in the station. The 12th put in four teams, the 8th Cavalry and R. H. A. one each, and the Rovers (a scratch team from the station) made up the seven entries. The new grounds proved a great success, and by next year should be among the best in India, as by the untiring efforts of Captain Panet, R. E., and the support of that well-known sportsman Major-General Clements, D. S. O., Commanding the Sirhind Brigade, a permanent supply of water has been obtained—a thing which is so important for all polo grounds in India. The 12th Royal Lancers were "At Home" on Monday, the 8th Cavalry on Wednesday, and the Hon. Mrs. Eastwood on Friday, when Lieutenant-Colonel Eastwood in an appropriate speech wished success to the new polo grounds, and, having congratulated Major Hobson and his team on their success, presented the Cup. The results of the matches were as follows:—

First Match:—First round.—"D" Team, 12th Royal Lancers (Mr. Counop, Captain Fane, Mr. Ollivant, Major Hobson) beat the 8th Cavalry (Mr. Kay, Mr. Lane, Captain Beecher, Captain Fetherston Haugh) by 1 goal and 2 subsidiaries to 2 subsidiaries.

Second Match.—"B" Team, 12th Royal Lancers (Mr. Leathan Mr. Badger, Captain Pricewood, Major Clifton-Brown) beat "The Rovers" (Mr. Gay, Mr. Curtis, Mr. Reynolds, Major-General Clements) by 3 goals and 5 subsidiaries to 1 goal and 1 subsidiary.

Third Match.—"A" Team, 12th Royal Lancers (Mr. Manning, Mr. Maydon, Mr. Truman, Mr. Wood beat the R. H. A. (Mr. Scarlett, Mr. Usher, Mr. Roberts, Mr. Lascelles) by 3 goals and 1 subsidiary to 2 subsidiaries.

Semi-final round.—"D" Team, 12th Royal Lancers, beat "B" Team, 12th Royal Lancers, by 3 goals and 1 subsidiary to 1 goal, "A" Team, 12th Royal Lancers, beat "C" Team, 12th Royal Lancers (Mr. Bryant, Captain Michell, Captain Milvain, Lieutenant-Colonel Eastwood) by 1 goal and 6 subsidiaries to 1 goal and 2 subsidiaries.

Final Tie.—"D" Team, 12th Royal Lancers, beat "A" Team, 12th Royal Lancers, after a most exciting and equal game by 1 goal and 1 subsidiary to 2 subsidiaries.

The umpires were Major Chesney, 18th Cavalry, and Major Campbell, 9th Lancers.—Pioneer.

CRICKET IN CALCUTTA.

CALCUTTA C. C. vs. CUSTOMS C. C.—This match in the Eden Gardens resulted in an easy win for the home team by 109 runs on the first innings, in spite of the fact that the Customs men who had first use of a plumb wicket, put up the very respectable total of 257. Quiterio was the principal contributor with an excellent innings of 71, and he thoroughly appreciated the numerous full pitches to 69 which he was favoured: most of the others also scored fairly, but were more or less lucky. F. H. Stewart who made his reappearance for the C. C. C. after his trip home took five wickets for 54 runs. When Calcutta went in Guise and Turnbull soon rattled up 71 when Quiterio threw the latter's wicket down very smartly from cover point. C. M. Pope hit very freely, but seemed to bear a charmed life, and next to Guise's fine and practically faultless innings of 119 which included 15 fours and 6 threes and which occupied him nearly two hours and a half, H. V. Low's 39 not out was the best display, his cutting being very clean. Stewart also did well, and was out to a brilliant left-handed catch by Marsden in the deep field. With this exception the catching of the visitors was faulty, but the ground fielding was keen and good. McCready was the most successful bowler, but Brown was much the steadiest. At their second attempt the customs failed signally with the bat after McCready and Harcourt had made a good start, and lost eight wickets for 103 runs, five of them falling to C. M. Pope's slow right hand bowling, which might well be utilised more frequently, at a cost of less than three runs apiece. Full score:

CALCUTTA GOLF CLUB.

THE LADIES' BOWL.—Saturday last was Ladies' Day at the Club Pavilion on the maidan on the occasion of the annual competition for the Silver Bowl presented to the Calcutta Golf Club by the Ladies' Golf Club some fifteen years ago; and there was a large gathering of members and their guests, playing golf and looking on and listening to the fine band of the Northumberland Fusiliers which was in attendance throughout the afternoon. Mr T. Drimmie, the captain of the Club, won the Bowl and is to be heartily congratulated on this fresh success on the eve of his departure for home; his scratch score of 80, too, excellent as it was, might easily have been a stroke or two better. Colonel MacRae and Messrs. Sandes and Dewar, all handicap players tied for second place with 82 nett. The prize was presented to the winners with a few well chosen words by Mrs. Lamond Walker, who has just won the prize presented to the ladies of the Calcutta Golf Club, who invited those present to the Ladies' Golf Club "At Home" Day on the 22nd instant. The proceedings then terminated with three hearty cheers for the ladies, and a list of the best scores returned in the competition will be found below. During the afternoon there was a Ladies' Approaching and Putting Competition which resulted in a win for Mrs. Lamond Walker, after a tie with Mrs. H. C. Begg.

PLACE AUX DAMES.

DO our sisters in far-away India care one jot or tittle what we are doing over here, where the thermometer keeps persistently zero-wards, and a cutting Nor-Easter, reminds us that we do not live in the tropics! A glance forwards at the many delights in store for the lady golfer may bring us in touch with those, many thousands of miles away, and in glancing forwards we shall forget that our fingers are stiff and dead, our noses a brilliant red, our feet two frozen lumps. We shall not remember that the ground of the Links is hard as iron, but that ere long the golfing woman will have embarked on the busy season of 1907 which holds we know not what in store for golfersand others alike.

The first intimation we receive that the closing season is over is the meeting of the Council of Associated County Clubs. This takes place in January when rules are revised, the officials are elected and the fixtures arranged. County golf is now, by the Divisional system, made quite a plain, sailing affair. We hope we have settled, once and for all, the number which constitutes a team, the various greens authorized for play in the different counties, the rules which deal with every contingency that may or may not occur, but the Central Committee never seems quite certain what is the best time of year for the finals to take place. This knotty point will be settled in time, and meanwhile County Golf is a very satisfactory and popular section of the L.-G. U. administration.

Beyond a few divisional matches no great event disturbs the golfing horizon until the Ranelagh Meeting, a function exclusively monopolised by the Union and for which the price of admission is fixed at a hard and fast rate—a handicap of 12 or less certified by the Managers of the Ladies' Golf Union! The great "Annual" is to take place at clear, delightful, picturesque Barn Elms on 16th and 17th, April and the following days, the eagerly snapped up by hospitably inclined clubs in the Metropolitan area for open meetings on their greens, at which the many golfing celebrities who come from Ireland, Scotland and Wales to compete in the International Competition at Ranelagh are the paramount attraction, second only to the bait of sundry valuable prizes. Following closely on Ranelagh, comes the Irish Ladies' Championship and on the 6th May and following days, the crème de la crème of lady players will assemble at Newcastle, County Down to do battle for the Blue ribbon, viz., the Ladies' Championship. To add to the many great attractions this year a strong and representative team from America are to try conclusions and measure their strength with England's, Ireland's, Scotland's and Wales' best, and though by the rules the Americans may not compete in the International (Inter-British they should be called) matches, there is nothing to prevent the Ladies' Amateur Championship being carried over the Atlantic, as it was when Mr. Walter Travis won the Men's at Sandwich, not many years ago. With the holder (Mrs. R. Kennion) in Persia and unlikely to defend her title, much to the disappointment of those who witnessed her victory last year at Burnham, the result of the championship heat is very open. A great many pin their faith on Miss May Heylet, whilst others "plump" for Miss Dorothy Campbell or of Miss Bertha Thompson. Its an open question and would be a sporting bet. In a month's time there should be interesting incidents to chronicle, but for the present there is nothing, but prophecies, and so farewell.

PUNJAB NATIVE ARMY TOURNAMENT.

23RD PIONEERS vs. 25TH PUNJABIS.—This game which was played in the morning of 6th instant was in every way superior to any matches that had previously taken place. Both teams were well trained and were capable of opening up the game when they got chances to do so. The result was very even play up to within 15 minutes of time, after which the 23rd got the best of the opening play and Nicolas missed a very difficult shot, a thing which he did very shortly afterwards, but he was fouled when striking by an opponent coming in on the left. The 25th then took a turn and the 23rd goalkeeper showed great judgment in running right up to the edge of the circle to stop an absolutely clear shot. The 23rd transferred but the 25th came back again, and thus the game went on up and down, each goal being in danger in turn. From an excellent run by the 25th outside right Hunt put in a very hot shot which was just saved, the play round the goal being most exciting. Hunt shortly after missed an easy chance. Score at half-time nil, with the play in favor of the 25th.

Immediately on restarting the 23rd forced a corner and from play near the circle the ball was hit from outside slowly to the 25th goalkeeper who should have left it, instead of which he gave a feeble kick in the direction of Nicolas who banged the ball into the net. From the bully the 25th pressed and Hunt again missed an easy shot at goal out of a scrimmage. The 23rd transferred and the 25th goalkeeper had to stop a hard shot from Nicolas and immediately afterwards a still harder one from Ricketts. The 25th made one more effort without avail and the game settled down in the 25th half. Two penalty corners were cleared but Rickets getting the ball gave a short pass to Nicolas who scored with a very quick shot. Time was called almost immediately leaving the 23rd winners 2—0.

For the winners Nicolas and Ricketts played well and were given great aid by all their team; while for the losers Penton at full-back played a game that was an example to anyone.

14TH SIKHS vs. 26TH PUNJABIS.—Played 4 P.M. on 6th instant. Play at first was very even and then the 26th, by a good run by Turnbull and the outside right, nearly scored and from a bully in the 14th circle the centre forward shot over the goal. The 14th then got away and were dangerous, the 26th goalkeeper saving brilliantly. Turnbull transferred and was unlucky in not scoring. Half-time came with no score.

On resuming Cargill got well away but his inside right shot wide. The 14th then got off and from a scrimmage in front of goal Wilmer put the ball into the net, the point, however, was disallowed owing to his fouling an opponent. The 26th then went away to the other end but Cargill's shot was well saved at the expense of a corner which was not improved upon. The 14th then attacked with a good combined run, in which Pennington and Channer were conspicous, the former scoring with a good shot. From the bully at half-way the 14th were off again and this time Channer improved the lead. Cargill for the 26th made one more effort but failed to score, the 14th leaving the ground winers by 2—0. The 26th, the lisher team, were handicapped owing to the heavy state of the ground after rain.

36TH SIKHS vs. 84TH PUNJABIS.—This game which had resulted in a draw yesterday was replayed at 4 P.M. to-day. The ground was heavy owing to rain, and this helped the 26th Sikhs considerably as they are not nearly so light and active as the 84th. However, this fact would hardly have saved the 84th from the defeat they suffered, i.e., 3 goals to 1. Play at the start was even, and at the same time sticky, the only man on the ground capable of opening it up being Wilson-Johnson. This player did yeoman service for his side and was most energetic. The 36th were the first to score from a scrimmage, the result of a corner. Shortly afterwards the 84th equalised the result of the best piece of combined play, during the match. Half-time one goal all. The 36th had the best of the game on resuming and the 84th were scarcely ever dangerous again. Wilson-Johnson had a shot at goal which was stopped but the ball was netted by the inside left. Shortly afterwards these two players made a good combined run and the inside left shot a third goal. The play was more even after this till "no side" was called. The 84th lost their opportunities by inaccurate passes and losing control of the ball otherwise they might have made a much closer fight of it.

Wednesday, 6th February 1907.

The Dog Show held at Calcutta on the 6th February last is memorable in more ways than one. It was a new departure from that series of Shows held at Tollygunge in connection with the annual Horse Show; it was the first Calcutta Kennel Club Show; it was the first Show held in Calcutta under the Rules of the 'Northern India Kennel Association" affiliated to the English Kennel Club; it was the first Championship Show held in Calcutta; it was the first Show at Calcutta at which up-country kennels have been represented in any real strength; it was the first Show in India at which a judge of home reputation has undertaken a long journey to officiate; and it was held as a feature of the highly successful Lady Minto's Fête.

This combination of circumstances, coupled with the pronounced success of the Show in itself, will certainly cause the first of the new series of Dog Shows in Calcutta to be remembered as an important movement in advance of all previous exhibitions in the Metropolis. To Mr. E. A. Lyon, the founder of the new movement, and Mr. F. S. Kerr, the Honorary Secretary, and the management generally, are due the strongest congratulations on their successful undertaking. The criticisms that follow are not passed in any captious or cavilling spirit, nor are they intended to detract in any way from the success of the venture; on the contrary they are penned in the hope that they will be accepted as friendly suggestions for consideration when the subject of the next show of the series is approached.

The benching of the exhibits was very satisfactory; but if the Calcutta Kennel Club has, as is hoped, come to stay, the management might consider, when they are in sufficient funds, whether they might not import the usual benching plant from home. The initial cost would be appreciable, but in the end there would be a saving, as the material could be stored and utilised for each succeeding show for at least fifteen or twenty years. Until that time comes, it would be as well that the mat partitions should be discarded in favour of some stouter material, otherwise a dog might easily force its way into an adjacent compartment, and two pugnacious and valuable exhibits might injure each other past redemption. Wider gangways between the benches are also desirable. Nothing tends so much towards the success of a show as promptitude in judging, and friends who meet in amicable rivalry at these gatherings like, at the conclusion of the judging, to wander around inspecting and discussing after the contest is over. Narrow gangways mean delay in bringing up exhibits for their classes, and the more space that can be afforded the better for all concerned.

It is fully realised that, held in connection with the fête, the management did not possess a free hand in arranging their ground, but in future the judging rings should be much closer to the benches to avoid delays. The rings should be enclosed to prevent encroachment on the space provided. On this occasion the rings were not ready when judging ought to have been in full swing; and with no enclosures, the bystanders closed in so that the judges, when the Specials were being judged, had scarcely room to move, and one nasty fight between two exhibits occurred, as well as a complaint from one exhibitor that he was prevented by the crowd from being up to time. Judges have a difficult enough task without being impeded by such considerations, they should have ample elbow room on which it is impossible for the public to encroach, and exhibitors should be able to approach the rings unhampered by the crowd.

The catalogue was quite the best we have seen at any Indian Show, indeed it surpassed most home catalogues, it was an admirable production; but the working staff was insufficient for the prompt posting of the cards and awards, and it was lamentable that the prizes should have had to be unpacked after dark instead of being grouped in appropriate order on tables early in the day ready for the prize-giving at the close of the proceedings. The prizes were good, but we have seen better at far less important exhibitions. To follow the home principle of high entry fees and comparatively small prizes is out of place in India. In England, prizes are a small consideration because the value of a winner rises with its wins by leaps and bounds. A dog, which in the absence of shows might be only worth a fiver, may sell for £500 by virtue of its show reputation. In India, there is no such fancy value, wins increase a dog's marketable value to a very inappreciable extent, and if exhibitors are to be tempted from a distance they must be tempted by prizes in return for the trouble or expense they have incurred. If there is one other consideration that will tempt them, it is the chance of winning Championship certificates. The present show was a Championship one, and it is hoped that this may continue. Brace and Team prizes encourage exhibitors to turn up in force and not merely bring their best specimens for competition. And to further encourage entries, some alteration of the Limit and Novice definitions seems desirable, the present definitions are too stringent and only lead to exhibitors leaving many dogs at home which they would otherwise be glad to exhibit.

A wise selection of judges is, of course, of the highest importance; nothing will induce some owners to show at all unless they have confidence in the judges. In this respect, the management, in securing the promises of the services of Mr. R. Hood Wright and the Rev. Mr. H. W. Bush, were very sound in their selection; but unfortunately Mr. Bush was prevented from attending, and the subsequent distribution of the classes between Mr. Hood Wright and Dr. Martin left a good deal to be desired. With Mr. Wright for the large dog classes and Mr. Bush for terriers and Eastern breeds, the judging would probably have been beyond all cavil; but as it happened the awards in some instances gave ground for discontent. Dr. Martin took the large breeds and in some classes went astray. In Smooth Fox-Terrier dogs, the placing of Indigo over Induna by Mr. Hood Wright was scarcely justifiable. In Wire Bitches, the selection of Dusky Gleaner for the first place over Jind Glory and Norfolk Venus was still more extraordinary. In Puppies Dil Pasand should have beaten Rex Crumpet. Rampant Royalist should have won in open Irish Terriers. Charnock Lassie should most undobtedly have won in Scottish Bitches. The placing of the Lhassa Terriers was lamentable; and how Indigo, first in the hottest class of open Fox-Terriers Smooth, was passed over in the N.I.K.A. Novice Special is unintelligible. If Indigo won rightly, placed in his own class, he should have had a brisk look in for the best in Show, and failing thatthe Novice Special should have been certainty for him.

Both judges were for too hard-worked and were often called upon to take breeds with which they were insufficiently familiar. In his own line, Mr. Hood Wright is one of the best judges in the world, but few men can undertake to pronounce on any or every breed, and the management would be wise to consider whether a relaxation of Rule 23 would not be desirable. The Rule is, after all, only a playing to the gallery. Shows in India are so few and far between that exhibitors very naturally do not care to stand out at the few they can attend. It is rarely that owners can manage to be present at more than one or two shows in a year, it is different in England when there are almost as many shows as there are days in a year, and the distances are short. There seems to be no reason why a man who is exhibiting in Fox-Terriers should not judge Lhassa Terriers if he is the best Lhassa judge present and has no sort of interest in the class, such action must surely be preferable to giving the class to a judge who has absolutely no knowledge of the breed. It is admitted that the Rule is one that it is desirable, and more than desirable to observe; but it is still more important to obtain the services of specialist judges whether exhibitors for not.

And that is the point of these remarks, for it must not be gathered from what has been said that the judging as a whole was extraordinarily erratic, it was quite the other way, and if we have criticised it is only because the show was such a good one that it can bear criticism. The public recognised that in Mr. Hood Wright they possessed a judge far superior to the ordinary Indian amateur, and if they did not always agree with him they took his awards like sportsmen and would always be ready to show under him again. Judging is a difficult and thankless task, and the thanks of all who are interested in dog shows are due to Mr. Hood Wright who undertook the long journey from Ceylon, solely for this purpose, and to Dr. Martin who was kind enough to accept office at the eleventh hour when Mr. Bush was unable to obtain leave to attend.

One more "wheeze" and we have then done with criticisms. The Show Specials were insufficiently advertised, in fact they do not appear to have been advertised at all. Some up-country owners said that if they had known there were Specials confined to members of the C. K. C., they would have joined the Club in order to be eligible to compete; and similarly with regard to the N. I. K. A. Specials. It is the very object of such Specials to encourage members and so add to the strength of the Association and the Club, and it is important at future shows that all Special Competitions should be freely advertised for the information of the public.

Both in the matter of numbers and of quality of exhibits the show compared more than favourably with any Show previously held in India, and Lahore will have to look to her laurels if she is to retain her place as the premier show of India. There were 247 actual exhibits with 384 entries in 82 classes, and the management may be said to have inspired the confidence of the public from the fact that so many kennels from a distance were represented. Sergeant Miles, now Superintendent of the Sangrur Kennels, brought down the pick of H. H. the Maharajah of Jind's Kennels, Colonel William Dawson came with his Cocker Spaniels from Parkhi, Mr. Priestley sent a strong team of Pekinese from Cawnpore, Mr. Fleming from the same station exhibited some splendid specimens of great Danes, Captain Martin came all the way from Rawalpindi with his Scottish and Irish terriers, Mr. Law sent two excellent wire Fox-Terriers from Jubbulpore, and Major Impey who owns perhaps the strongest kennel of smooth Fox-Terriers in India turned up with some good ones from Bharatpur in Rajputana. Besides these there were exhibitors from Sylhet, Assam, the Chittagong Hill Tracts, Lucknow, Bhagalpore, Raneegunge, Umballa and Mainpuri

The strongest classes in the Show were those for smooth and Wire Fox-Terriers, Great Danes, Greyhounds, Cocker Spaniels, Scottish Terriers, and Pekinese. There were 33 smooth Fox-Terriers in the Show with scarcely a bad one among them, and such fine exhibits as Major Impey's Induna, Indigo and Infanta, and the Maharajah of Jind's Champion Raby Huntsman, Delberta, and Donna Phillipa. The Wire classes contained 40 entries and included Mr. Lionel Jacob's Corney Grain, the Champion of the Show, and Dil Pasand, the Maharajah of Jind's Champion Dusky Gleanor, Jind Glory, and Don't Hit Hard, and Mr. Law's Sherbrook Vanguard and Norfolk Venus. The Scotties were a particularly interesting group in which Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Burke's and Captain Martin's exhibits were conspicuous. But the average quality was so high that it is almost invidious to make distinctions. The Bull dogs were much above average, Colonel and Mrs. Wardroper's exhibits being first class: the Greyhounds were far above the average seen at Indian shows, and in this connection we must congratulate Mrs. Cuthbert Edwards who bred and took too Specials with The Only Way, a magnificent pup and a worthy exhibit from the kennel of a sportswoman who has devoted attention to this class for nearly twenty years. She was successful in other greyhound exhibits and showed a really fine Cocker Spaniel as well.

The judging commenced at 10 o'clock and was not concluded till nearly dark when Her Excellency Lady Minto distributed the principal prizes and closed the proceedings of a most successful exhibition. We append the list of awards :—

The Naturalist.

BIRDS IN THEIR NESTS.

JUST as every Englishman is of opinion that his house is his castle, so does every little bird resent all attempts at prying into its private affairs in the nest. For this reason we really know very little of the home life of birds. It is not that there are no seekers after such knowledge. Practical ornithology is a science that can boast of a very large number of devotees.

Many men spend the greater part of their life in endeavouring to wrest from birds some of their secrets, and such must admit that the results they obtain are as a rule totally disproportionate to the magnitude of the efforts. At present we know only the vague generalities of bird life.

We know that the hen lays eggs, that she, with or without the help of the cock as the case may be, incubates these eggs, that the young which are at first naked are fed and brooded until they are ready to leave the nest, when they are coaxed forth by the parents who hold out tempting morsels of food to them. But these are mere generalities. Our ignorance of details is very great. The nests of most birds are scrupulously clean. Young birds have enormous appetities and much of the food which they eat is indigestible and must pass out as droppings, yet in the case of many species one never sees any sign of these droppings either in the nest, or on the leaves, branches or the ground near the nest. What becomes of these droppings? Ornithological treatises are silent upon this subject. Again, young birds are born naked and in India are frequently exposed to very high temperatures, so that much liquid must pass from their bodies by evaporation. How is this liquid made good. Do the parents water the birds, if so how? I have never seen any mention of this in an ornithological treatise.

Let us to-day consider these two subjects: the sanitation of the nest and the method of assuaging the thirst of young nestlings.

As regards the first we have some knowledge, thanks to the patient labours of Mr. F. H Herrick, an American naturalist, whose book The Home Life of Birds, I commend to every lover of the feathered folk. Although Mr. Herrick's book is to some extent spoiled for Englishmen because it deals with birds with which they are unfamiliar, its general results apply to all passerine birds.

Mr. Herrick is a very keen bird photographer. As every one knows, he who wishes to obtain good photographs of birds has two great difficulties to overcome. The first is to get near to his subjects and the third is to find them and their nests in situations suitable for photography.

The former is usually overcome by the photographer concealing himself and his camera in a tent or other structure. At first the birds are afraid of the concealing object, but soon maternal affection overcomes their fear.

Mr. Herrick's method of overcoming the second of these two difficulties is to remove the nest to be photographed from the concealed situation in which it is usually built and place it in a more open place. If the nest be thus moved when the young are some seven or eight days old, the parents will almost invariably continue to feed their young in the new situation, for at that particular period the parental instinct is at its zenith. In addition to obtaining a splendid series of photographs, Mr. Herrick has observed, from a distance of a few inches, the nesting habits of several American birds. As the result of these observations he is able to declare that nest-cleaning follows each feeding with clock-like regularity. "The excreta of the young" he writes, "leave the cloaca in the form of white opaque or transparent mucous sacs. The sac is probably secreted at the lower end of the alimentary canal, and is sufficiently consistent to admit of being picked up without soiling bill or fingers. The parent birds often leave the nest hurriedly bearing one of these small white packages in bill, an action full of significance to every member of the family . . . . . Removing the excreta piecemeal and dropping it at a safe distance, is the common instinctive method not only of insuring the sanitary condition of the nest itself, but what is even more important, of keeping the grass and leaves below free from any sign which might betray them to an enemy." These packets of excrement are quite odourless and they are often devoured by the parent bird instead of being carried away. The digestion of very young birds must be feeble and doubtless much of the food given them passes undigested through the alimentary canal, so that it is capable of affording nourishment to the parents. Birds are nothing if not economical. Of course all birds are not so careful of the sanitation of the nest. Everyone knows what a filthy spectacle a herony is. According to Mr. Herrick the instinct of inspecting and cleaning the nest is mainly confined to the great passerine and picarian orders. It is of course not necessary in the case of those birds such as fowls, of which the young are able to run about when born; nor is it needful in the case of birds of prey who take no pains to conceal the whereabouts of the nest. Young raptores eject their semi-fluid excreta over the edge of the nursery thus the nest is kept clean, but the droppings on the ground betray its presence to all the world.

Coming now to our other question: How do young birds obtain the water which they require, we have no help from Mr. Herrick. He makes no mention of this in his most interesting book. It is possible that nestlings are not given anything to drink, that the juicy, succulent insects or fruits with which they are supplied contain sufficient moisture for their requirements. We

THE GRAMOPHONE CO.

GENTLEMEN,

The Gramophone of to-day I find is such an improved instrument for recording the human voice to the older machines with which so many of us are familiar, that my hitherto objection to allow the thousands who cannot hear me sing personally to listen to the reproduction of my voice through the instrumentality of your Gramophone is now quite removed, and the Records which you have lately made for me I think are natural reproductions of my voice.

Yours truly,

must remember that the skin of birds is very different from that of man. It contains no sweat glands, so that a bird, like a dog, can only perspire through its mouth. But even allowing, for this, a considerable amount of moisture must be given out in expiration, so that it seems probable that young birds require more moisture than they obtain in their food. Drops of water have to be administered to hand-reared birds. Many birds fill up the crop and then discharge the contents into the gaping mouths of their young. In this condition the food must be mixed with a considerable quantity of saliva and possibly with water. The crop of a bird is a receptacle into which the food of a bird passes and remains until actually utilised. There seems no reason why water should not be stored for a short time in this receptacle much as food is. Perhaps birds bring up water as they do solid food and thus assuage the thirst of their young. Such a process would be very difficult to detect; it would be indistinguishable from ordinary feeding to to the causal observer.

The Story Teller.

A MEMORABLE CHRISTMAS EVE.

LUCY GRAY was suddenly awakened out of the light sleep into which she had fallen by the sound of a distant gun-shot, followed by faint, spasmodic cries for help. She recognised the voice at once. It was her father's—Lord Ellisfield's oldest and most trusted gamekeeper. But although an old man, Gray was strong, hale, and hearty. A widower, he lived alone with Lucy, his only child, in a small thatched cottage on the outskirts of a large and desolate pine wood, a mile or so above the little village of Ellisfield.

It was Christmas Eve, and some hours before the old man had gone down into the village to renew acquaintanceship and exchange seasonable greetings with certain old cronies over a glass of ale in the little inn. It was only on occasions like Christmas Eve that Gray went beyond the wood.

Lucy guessed what had happened when she heard the gun-shot and cries. On his way back from the village through the wood her father had undoubtedly come across some poachers, poaching some of his lordship's pheasants for their Christmas dinner, and was having a tussle with them. Indeed, it was not unlikely that he was being murdered, if he had not been shot down already. The girl sprang from her warm bed, merely slipped on a petticoat, and ran downstairs. She felt relieved when she noticed that her father had taken one of his guns with him. She also took one from the rack, slipped a couple of cartridges into the barrels, and then went out into the night.

There was a full moon creeping up into the murky heavens; snow was falling fast and thick. She set off in the direction from which the voice and the gun-shot seemed to have come; that is, she went along a wide "ride," the way by which her father generally went to and fro from the village.

When she had covered some two hundred yards she saw the figures of two men lying motionless in the snow a few paces ahead. One of the figures was half a dozen yards or so beyond the other. The snow around the bodies was stained with large purple blots. Coming up to the first, she knelt down, raised the head, and looked closely into the very white face. It was the face of a man whom she knew to be a notorious poacher. She put her lips close to his. He was still breathing, and freely; but he had a severe shot wound on the right side just below the armpit.

As she knelt by him he opened his eyes. They were bleared, dull, and watery. Death was dragging his wicked soul from his body slowly and painfully. It made Lucy sick to look into his distorted face. She let his head fall back with a flop. The man groaned, and his eyelids fell over his eyes.

Lucy moved on to the second figure. She had recognised it some moments before. It was lying face downwards. She rolled it over and placed her hand over the region of the heart. The heart was still. She felt the pulse; that was still, too. She touched the lips with her lips; they were cold and bloody. She raised one eyelid, but the blue eye she looked into saw her not. Life had gone out of the man. He had not been shot; his skull had been battered in. "My poor, poor old dad!" Lucy exclaimed, but showed no emotion. It was not in her nature to do so. Sorrow with her pent itself up in the heart, and but rarely showed itself on the delicate features of her face.

The mastiff, alternately whining and growling, crouched down by his master's side. The wounded and dying poacher sat up, though not without an effort that caused him severe pain. "I hit him accross the head with the stock of my gun, he said. As I did so the gun went off and shot me—damn him!"

At the same moment there was a sudden noise in a thicket close by as of a person breaking though the brushwood. Barely a couple of seconds later a young man sprang out and ran madly along the "ride." Lucy raised her gun and fired. The man run on as fast as ever for a few more yards, then reeled, threw up his arms, and fell on his face. The poacher, cursing dreadfully, struggled to get on his fest that he might fly at the girl, fell back exhausted.

"My son!" he gasped. "He had no hands in it—I swear it!"

Lucy went to look at the man whom she had shot down. The poacher was right. The man was his son, and Lucy's lover. He had been wounded badly.

"False lover and murderer!" the girl shrieked, and raised the gun for the second time.

"Oh, mercy, mercy!" cried her lover. "I didn't—"

"I believe you, Bill," she said at last. "Yes, it was your wicked father who did it."

And she glanced towards the spot where she had left the poacher grovelling in a portion of his life's blood.

"Goodness gracious!" Lucy exclaimed. The man had disappeared as though by magic, and Lucy started carrying her lover to her home. As she passed the spot where the poacher had been lying, she saw the man crawling away on all fours into the brushwood, leaving a trail of blood behind him on the snow.

Lucy bound up her lover's wounds, which, as stated, were severe, but, as it subsquently proved, not dangerous. Then she tucked him up in her own bed, put on some more clothes, and started for the doctor.

"Loo, Loo, girl, where are you?" shouted his lordship from the back of his dappled grey mare. It was barely eight o'clock, but Lord Elisfield was an early riser. He had ridden up from his home in the village to the cottage in the wood to wish John Gray and his daughter a Merry Christmas and give them a present each. He was a good-natured, jovial old gentleman, with a red smiling face.

It was an ideal Christmas morning. The ground was covered with snow a foot and more deep. It was snowing no longer, and the sun was shining. The great wood looked like some fairy land in its white, glittering mantle.

"Here I am my lord" faltered Lucy at last coming from the wood with what at first sight looked to be a huge bundle in her arms.

"What the blazes—" began Lord Ellisfield riding towards her. "Well, well!"

"'Twas Bill Adams, my lord, who did it," Lucy went on. "He smashed his skull in with a gun-stock. Oh, dear, her face with her hands and sobbed softly. The old lord helped her to carry her dead father inside the cottage, and cover up the body. Then by degrees Lucy told him the story of the dreadful tragedy.

Afterwards she led the way upstairs to her lover's bedside. The young man looked little the worse for the shots Lucy had fired into his back, and was apparently in no dangerous condition.

"I know your father was a dead wrong 'un," said his lordship to the poacher's son, "but I did not think he would stoop to murder; and I am surprised you were weak enough, young man, to allow him to make a confederate of you. One who has been a bad poacher, however, makes a good keeper and, for Loo's sake, you may take her father's place—that is to say, when the police have finished with you. I don't know if they can imprison you; one thing you can rest assured of—you will not be summoned for poaching."

"You feel quite certain, my dear, he did not have a hand in the murder?" Lord Ellisfield continued, when he and Lucy had left the bedroom.

"Quite certain, my lord," the girl answered.

"And the murderer, you say, crept away into the brushwood?"

"Yes, on his hands and knees. He must be dead by this time. He was wounded severely and bleeding freely."

Lucy held his lordship's horse whilst he got into the saddle. He was about to ride away when a noise just inside the wood, as of the snapping of brittle twigs, arrested his attention.

"Look! There, there, girl!" he cried, pointing with his whip to the figure of a man hurrying deeper into the wood on his hands and knees.

The poacher turned his white, blood-smeared face, with its big bleared eyes towards the couple.

"Ugh," his lordship muttered, and rode slowly away with his head on his breast.

The police searched the wood from top to bottom, as the saying is, but the murderer could not be found alive or dead. Rabbit and fox-holes and hollow trees were looked into, but to no purpose. The snow that fell after the man's departure from the scene of the crime had obliterated all tracks that he left behind him in the snow that then lay on the ground.

But a portion of a sheet of note-paper was picked up, on which the poacher had smeared the following words in blood: "He didn't do it—my son. I swear it."

After the wood the district was scoured, but with the same result, and, after the lapse of a few weeks, the search was practically given up.

Lucy married young Bill Adams about two months later and a few days afterwards Lucy happened to be lighting a fire in the parlour of the cottage in the wood, where she was still living. She was expecting a few friends in to tea. She could not remember when a fire had been lit in the room last, and was not at all surprised to find the chimney blocked. She conjectured that a jackdaw's nest formed the obstruction. She ran a pole up the chimney, and felt a mass of something. She prodded away with a right good will, and then the unexpected happened.

A man's leg came tumbling down into the grate, followed by another, and then the rest of a body. She called her husband and told him of the gruesome discovery.

"There!" he said, "I told you, Loo, I thought I heard him downstairs on the night of the murder, when you had gone for the doctor, calling to me, asking if I was upstairs!"

The Theatre.

THE SOCIETY PIERROTS.

THE first appearance of this party who come from the Alexandra Palace, London, was not hailed with that enthusiasm which so energetic and conscientious an entertaining party deserve—at least so one might judge from the rather spare audience which greeted them in the Concert Hall on their opening night. The party contains a splendid baritone in the person of Mr. Walter Rayner, and Mr. Arthur L. Cowen, who is a tenor performer of great ability, delighted his hearers with a very sympathetic rendering of Good Night Beloved. The concerted pieces went well, especially the Torpedo and the Whale; (Olivette) while the Swanie River with its simulated banjo effect which, though in itself not so artistic a morceau, seemed to "take on" immensely. The artistes may be congratulated on the possession of an accompanist of the first order—Mr. W. F. Pits—who also displayed his talents as a piano soloist in his beautiful interpretation of Mattei's Grande Valse. This being the eleventh year of uninterrupted success, for Pierrot Party have distinguished themselves in the principal pavilions, concert halls, and theatres of the United Kingdom, it is to be hoped that the Metropolis of India will accord them a hearty reception, and this no doubt we shall not be slow in doing, particularly if the seats be let at more popular prices.

Fare (just alighted): "As you are impudent, I must ask you for your name and your number." Cabby: "'Ere's my number, Miss; but I can't offer you my name, as that is promised to another young lady."

"Papa," she said, as the old man came in late, "young Mr. Sampson offered himself to me to-night and I refused him. And, oh, papa, I am afraid his heart is broken." "He told me about it," said her father. "Then you met him?" "Yes; he is down at the Eagle playing billiards."

At a certain fair, in one of the side shows, the principal performer was a knife-thrower, who made a speciality of throwing knives all round a lady into a board at the back of the stage. The partner of this artist was middle-aged, stout and well, very plain, and when she came on the audience gasped. They had not thought it possible for anyone to be—Well, so plain and live through it. The man arranged her to the board, and at the critical moment threw the knife. It flew through the air and stuck quivering in the board. Voice from the back "Great Scot? you've missed her."

FLAT RACING IN ENGLAND IN 1906.

II.—GOODWOOD TO MANCHESTER.

AS a fashionable rendezvous and one of the chief social functions of the year, "Goodwood" is as much in evidence as ever it was; but from a racing point of view, it is to be feared that it is deteriorating. The meeting in the Ducal park on the Sussex coast used to be regarded as the proper place for the higher class of two-year-olds to make their début, and for the contests of such giants of the turf as Isonomy, St. Simon and Merman; but it all seems very different of recent years, for Goodwood hardly ever brings out any unknown juvenile of high rank, and the Cup and other races so often resolve themselves into little more than consolation prizes for very indifferent performers. This is not the occasion to enquire into the cause of this sad change, or to discuss possible remedies, and one must perforce get on with the matter in hand.

The popular scramble, the Stewards' Cup, for some reason or other secured but very scant patronage, the total number of entries being 31, or 14 less than the number of starters in 1861, when Croagh Patrick gained such a surprising victory. Even this poor lot was reduced considerably by scratching, so that on the day of the race, although all those left in were found at the post, there was a field of only a "baker's dozen," the smallest number by far that has ever started. Nor was the paucity in number made up by any particular quality of class, as may be judged from the fact that the top-weight was Bend Or's son, Golden Gleam, a most moderate animal, while 8 out of the 13 were three-year-olds. Undoubtedly the best animal in the field was Captain Greer's three-year-old Rocketter, by Gallinule out of Volant, and his weight, including a small penalty, was 7st. 6lbs., which certainly he was entitled to be honoured with, considering that he but shortly before won the valuable Salford Borough Handicap at Manchester, with the same impost. Admirable Crichton, another three-year-old, by Isinglass out of Pretty Polly's dam, was also of the field, as were Foresight, a Carbine colt who had won the last race at Ascot, Golden Gleam, the grey Bass Rock who carried the popular dark blue and yellow of Mr. L. de Rothschild, and Athleague, one of the leaders of last season, but a disappointment of this. There has rarely been such an easy victory over this fast sprint course, for Rocketter, the favourite, ridden by the champion, W. Higgs, starting at 5 to 1, came right away from the tapes, and won "all the way" by three lengths, the only excitement being the struggle which resulted in the well-backed Twelvebore beating Admirable Crichton a short head for second place. On the same day, Gallinule had another winner in Weathercock, the property of Major Eustace Loder, the colt winning the Richmond Stakes; Weathercock had run poorly before Goodwood, and later only appeared in colours once, when he was an indifferent fourth in the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster. Of the other juvenile performers at Goodwood not a great deal is to be said; on the first day, Sir Edgar Vincent's Auber (Islington—Umbrosa) beat Lord Wolverton's colt by Florizel II out of Marsh Marigold (subsequently named Prince of Orange), and on the Thursday the latter won the Prince of Wales' Stakes from Lord Rosebery's hitherto unbeaten Traquair (Ayrshire—Chelandry), upsetting the odds of 6 to 1 laid on the bearer of the "primrose, rose-hoops." Of these three would-be cracks, only Auber was capable of winning a race after Goodwood. Bellavista, however, and My Pet II were also two-year-old winners, the former taking the Rous Memorial Stakes, and the latter (to whom reference will be made later on) the Molecamb Stakes.

The only other important Handicap at Goodwood is, of course, the Goodwood Plate (2 miles), for which quite a reputable field turned out, considering the hardness of the ground and the natural reluctance of owners to risk their best animals being ruined, if not altogether, at least for the remainder of the season. Mr. Buchanan's Golden Measure, of whom more will have to be written, was installed favourite, and Hammerkop, last year's heroine of the Cesarewitch, who carried 9st. 3lbs., was also heavily supported, while Mr. Singer's aged mare, Pradella, the Northumberland Plate winner, Outbreak, St. Wulfram, who had won race after race last year, but this year did nothing till Doncaster, and some others, made up a field of 12 runners. The winner was provided from the ranks of the "25 to 1 others," Lord Ellesmere's four-year-old, Winwick, carrying 6st. 13lbs. and ridden by Plant (the "pocket Hercules," as one of the sporting writers always dubs him), though hitherto unknown to fame, proved too good for his opponents and won somewhat cleverly, with Sandboy second and St. Wulfram third. Later in the season, poor Winwick met with an untimely end; a great fancy for the Cesarewitch, as on his Goodwood running he was entitled to be, he was going as well as anything in the race when suddenly he slipped and fell, so injuring himself that he had to be shot, for mercy's sake.

From Goodwood to York is a jump of a month, but during the interval nothing takes place of any account worth recording, though it may be noted that the meetings at Stockton seem to be coming more and more into favour, not only with the fashionable world, but even with the most conservative members of the Turf world. Well, here we are at York, where sights and sounds, and the very names of the races, remind one of the days of the Wizard of the North, when such marvellous results were achieved by horses bred and trained on the Yorkshire moors; times which, there are not indications wanting, are likely to be once again. The York Meeting of course is chiefly celebrated for three races, The Great Ebor Handicap, The Great Yorkshire Stakes, and The Gimcrack Stakes, all of which have histories second only to the classic races. The Great Ebor Handicap is generally regarded as a kind of preliminary Cesarewitch, and this year, indeed, it furnished the clue to the long-distance event at Newmarket. There was a fair field of 12 runners, comprising a previous winner in Mr. Sullivan's The Page, and such well-known stayers as Sandboy and Whinbloom, with Golden Measure as favourite at 7 to 4. The latter, the property of Mr. Buchanan of "Black and White" fame, had also been made favourite for the Goodwood Plate a few weeks before, but met with some mishap in running and fell, though on the Knavesmire he retrieved his reputation by a very clever win from Mintagon, to whom he was giving 18lbs. The Great Yorkshire Stakes fell to the lot of Lord Derby's Bridge of Canny, the aptly named son of Love Wisely and Santa Brigida, who has been more than a faithful slave to his noble owner, having won over £10,000 in stakes during the season. One must leave the Gimcrack Stakes with the mere observation that Colonel Hall Walker, for the second year in succession, was the owner as well as the breeder of the winner, Polar Star by name, as we shall have to refer to the latter's performances when summing up generally the two-year-old form of the season.

Doncaster to wit! The St. Leger fortunately did not crack up altogether as was the case last year. The Derby winner, Spearmint, had not been nominated, which was rather peculiar, considering that as a Carbine he might have been expected to prove a stayer; but the winner of the Oaks, Lord Derby's Keystone II (Persimmon—Lock and Key), was very much in evidence, and indeed was made a very warm favourite, partly, no doubt, as she was to be ridden by the almost invincible D. Maher. The small but most genuine Beppo, who was so unfortunate in the Two Thousand, the Frenchman, Storm, who was the only horse to really tackle Spearmint in the Grand Prix, Mr. James' Gorgos, the winner of the first classic, Gingal to represent Carbine, Malua, a half-brother of Beppo, and a few others, made up a fairly good class field of 12 runners, and yet the winner's name has not been mentioned. Of all the competitors of the season, none has been more consistent than the Duke of Westminster's Ladas colt, Troutbeck; previous to the St. Leger, he had won all the 9 races in which he had taken part as a three-year-old, with the exception of the Derby, in which of course he was third to Spearmint and Picton, and his last race on the historic Yorkshire moor was his best, for he struggled and fought as gamely as possible, and succeeded in gaining a head victory from the little-thought-of Prince William, with Beppo a head away third, and Lord Derby's mare only just beaten out of a place. Troutbeck was a very general fancy for the race, and started a sound second favourite, at 5 to 1, notwithstanding that his jockey was G. Stern, brought over specially from France for the occasion. Beppo was a little later rewarded for his many misfortunes, for in the Jockey Club Stakes, favoured by a pull in the weights with Keystone II of 12lbs., he was able to place the valuable stake of over £7,000 to the credit of his owner, Mr. J. A. de Rothschild. To win the Champagne Stakes has often been the prelude to success in the Derby, as witness Rock Sand, Ladas and Ayrshire, though more often the high promise has not been fulfilled, as in the case of Democrat, Velasquez and La Fleche, and we must wait another six months before we can know what the fate will be of Slieve Gallion, who beat his six opponents in the Champagne Stakes of 1906. His chance was so highly thought of that 4 to 1 was laid on him, and he won easily by 2 lengths, though the owner of My Pet II, who was the runner-up, had good cause to complain of terrible ill-luck at the start. Slieve Gallion, a son of the wonderful Irish stallion, Gallinule, is a whole black, and no one needs reminding how rarely an animal of that colour wins the Derby.

It is often observed that when a horse who has been unlucky or a disappointment to his owner is sold, the buyer obtains a really totally different animal to what he was in his former owner's hands; it may be, of course, that one only notices the rare cases in which this happens by chance, and passes over the multitude of sales where no such wonderful regeneration occurs; or it may be that change of training-grounds or an alteration in the mode of treatment may be the natural and direct cause of the improvement. However, whatever may be the explanation, Polymelus affords an excellent illustration of the often-noticed fact. This colt, a son of Cyllene and Maid Marian, foaled 1902, was originally owned by Lord Crewe, and then was turned over to Mr. David Faber; for the latter, the colt never won a race, and Mr. Faber accordingly decided to get rid of him, and Mr. S. B. Joel became the purchaser at 4,000 guineas, and in a few days' time the son of Cyllene carried his new owner's "green and pink stripes" jacket first past the post for the Duke of York Stakes at Kempton, thereby placing a sum of £1,700 to the credit side of his balances-heet. Three days later, Polymelus was out again, and won the Champion Stakes of £900 at Newmarket, and later was destined to achieve another and more important victory.

To most of us, the Cesarewitch is the race of the year, and stands out by itself much in the same way as the Grand National Steeplechase; every sportsman loves the courage and strength, which are as necessary as speed for victory in the Cesarewitch, and no horse ever yet won over this punishing 2½ miles that was not on the day a "good 'un" in every sense. There are always a number of mysterious horses associated with the Cesarewitch; "rods-in-pickle," shuttle-cocks in the betting, and horses that are supposed to have been "readied" always abound, but in nine cases out of ten the winner's victory is not only justified, but actually forecast by his previous public performances. A good entry, followed by a quite exceptional acceptance, resulted in a field of 24 runners, including last year's winner, Major Loder's sterling good Gallinule mare, Hammerkop, who was top-weight with 9st. 2lbs., Whinbloom, a Great Metropolitan winner, Feather Bed, who had won both the Chester Cup and the Great Yorkshire Handicap, Winwick, who had come to the rescue of the Ring at Goodwood, as already narrated, and the three-year-olds, Beppo and Spate, the latter a son of The Rush. Then there was the Yorkshire-trained Mintagon (Martagon—Mimi) who had been beaten but a short head by Golden Measure in the Great Ebor, and Noctuiform, an importation by Mr. Buchanan from New Zealand; the latter of course was trained by Major Edwardes at Ogbourne, and for a long time he was practically favourite for the race, notwithstanding that he had had nothing like the time for acclimatisation which Merman had when he won in 1897. Noctuiform was "walking over" for a mile-and-a-half race at Windsor a couple of weeks before the Newmarket meeting, and odds were eagerly laid on him against the field, but he showed neither speed nor stamina, and was beaten out of a place. Still, he had champions among the ante-post speculators, who agreed that his owner and trainer could not have made such a terrible mistake; but notwithstanding, he gradually drifted out in the market until those who had snapped up all the sixes and fives found, to their chagrin, on the day of the race that they could get 33 to 1 for the asking. The Yorkshire Mintagon, however, always went well in the market, and observant students noticed that he was galloping two miles and over three or four times a week, a fact which was also to be noted with regard to another north-country candidate, the four-year-old daughter of Childwick and Gold Mine, named Bibiani. Well, they are off at last, and the raucous voices of the Ring die away; not half the journey is done before it becomes obvious that public form is to be vindicated, for Mintagon is leading, going easily, and yet gaining ground every furlong, until he romps in, a winner by six lengths, with Bibiani second, and the three-year-old Royal Dream third. Mintagon at the start was second favourite at 6 to 1, the post of honour being occupied by Feather Bed at a point shorter odds. In a way, the honours of the race rested with Mr. J. de Rothchild's Beppo, who, small horse as he is, carried 8st. 6lbs. on his three-year-old back into fourth place.

The Frenchmen, having made no attempt to win the long-distance handicap, contented themselves with but a half-hearted attack for the Cambridgeshire, for although they sent over two representatives, Camisard and Ganelon II, neither of them was backed at all to speak of, indeed, the latter was included in the 50 to 1 others. The field fell far short of that for the last great handicap, and interest was not a little abated, owing to the outstanding chance of Polymelus who, including a 10lb. penalty for Kempton, was only set to carry 8st. 10lbs.; here and there, however, there was an idea or a suspicion that the fortunes of the Joel family might be entrusted to the City and Suburban winner, Dean Swift. In fact, however, both horses started, but the pronounced run on Polymelus showed clearly that he was the real representative, and at flag-fall it was hard to get even the smallest rate of odds against him; even 11 to 10, however, was worth having, for this, the hottest favourite on record for the Cambridgeshire, in the hands of D. Maher, won as he liked, Kaffir Chief, a 10 to 1 chance, being second, and the three-year-old Malua third, at 12½ to 1 for a place. There have thus been five consecutive years in which the favourite has won the Cambridgeshire, so that if there is anything in the law of averages, 1907 should witness, without doubt, the victory of a Georgie or an Indian Queen.

To most of us, the close of the Houghton Meeting is really the end of the Session, so that it must suffice to note that Gourd, a Goodwood disappointment, unexpectedly revelling in soft, muddy going, took the Derby Cup at the S.P. of 25 to 1, and that the three-year-old Spate, who was fifth in the Cesarewitch, made amends by winning the Manchester November Handicap. It must, however, be added, as an item of particular interest to all who follow racing in India, that the Viceroy Cup winner, Great Scot, ran second to Gourd and third to Spate; it is said that this sterling representative of the Prince Charlie line is to be kept in training for another season, and one can only "faintly trust the larger hope" that ere he is retired to the duties and pleasures of the stud, he may achieve a great and meritorious victory as the seal to his fame as a race-horse.

And now to deal with the rising generation—it is a far from easy task, for during the year many a reputation has been nobly earned, only to be ignominiously forfeited. One alone of all the two-year-olds has proved equal to all calls and tests, and that is Colonel Hall Walker's colt, Polar Star, who has won all his twelve races during the season, among them being the Criterion and the Gimcrack Stakes, without having been hustled. The colt is a son of Pioneer and Go On, and so, like his owner's champion of the previous season, Black Arrow, represents something quite out of the ordinary run in breeding, but, alas, he has not been entered for any of the classic races in 1907, though fortunately he is one of those who may perhaps meet the winner of the Derby in the Ascot Cup. After Polar Star, there comes the black Slieve Gallion who has already been referred to, though he had to play second fiddle to Galvani in the Middle Park Plate, Galvani next time out not being able to get within two lengths of Polar Star in the Criterion. Then there is My Pet II, the property of Mr. Raphael, and this stupidly named son of Perth and My Mary, after some very inconsistent performances, managed to finish up the season with two very good wins, the latter of which was achieved in the Dewhurst Plate, where the opposition, however, was by no means strong. On the whole, it really looks as if 1907 was to be a year for dark horses or outsiders in the classic events, and among such one may refer to Bezonian by Velasquez out of Cicero's dam, Candahar, an Ayr-shire colt, and Baltinglass by Isinglass out of Sibola; but, truth to tell, it is impossible to "reach a hand through time" and pick the winners of the Guineas or the Derby or the St. Leger with the slightest degree of confidence, and perhaps it is as well it should be so, for the uncertainty cannot but add a deal of interest to those who can and will follow the training and performances of the three-year-olds of 1907.

Sporting Notes.

THE proposal of the C. T. C. to introduce a new class of members to be called "Stand Members" who will not exercise the full privileges of the club and will pay a reduced subscription, has been carried.

The prospectus of the Quetta Spring Meeting is published to-day.

The Viceregal party has begun well. The first shoot, splendidly organised by H. H. the Maharajah of Cooch Behar, produced no less than seven tigers in about five hours' beating. His Excellency got two, Lady Minto one, Lady Eileen Elliot one, Colonel Adam one, Mr. Hammond one, and Mr. Gupta one. Besides this a good deal of other game was bagged. H. H. of Cooch Behar directed the beat (which included about seventy elephants) throughout the day.

With the main body of the racing army away at Bombay the Calcutta paddocks looked very empty last Saturday afternoon. The racing was anything but exciting, there being not a single close finish throughout the afternoon. The Pony Hunters' Hurdle Race was somewhat of a fiasco, Geebung and Pathfinder having the race much to themselves in a field of four. The prices laid by the bookmakers in this race were not unnaturally cramped and gave rise to another howl from punters and their literary representatives. The answer to these perennial complaints seems to be a simple one. The sellers of bets, like salesmen of every class, are bound down by the rigid rules of supply and demand. If there are no buyers at their prices they must offer more attractive rates or cease to do business. So long as they can find buyers they will naturally offer prices as favourable as possible to themselves. The natural remedy of the punter, like other buyers of good or bad things, is to refrain from purchasing at prices which he regards as prohibitive or unfair. That seems to be about the last word that can be said on the matter.

First Bell and Mademoiselle were installed favourites in the rather inferior pony race that followed, but the latter ran very disappointingly and Colonel Stisted's smart pony had no difficulty in winning from Esmeralda. The unlucky Galley Slave came home in the Selling Race and his connections seized the opportunity to get rid of him no doubt in hope of forgetting the many monies he has dropped for them into the whirlpool of the ring since his advent to India.

In the next pony race none could discover which of the Dehra Dun pair was really fancied by the stable authorities, Mr. Scott's ponies being both well in at the weights. The bookmakers mastered this difficult situation with great address, chalking them both up at 6 to 4. At the last moment Kathleen II. went out to threes and people rushed across to the rails to see Yankee Boy rolling home from Belle Cole with Kathleen third. This pony did not seem to get a very good start and also appeared to encounter some difficulty in rounding the hospital corner, but these accidents often happen in well regulated families.

Botha scored yet again from a second rate lot of horses in the Esplanade Plate and fairly laughed at the handicapper's attempt to stop him even though his parcel amounted to 10st. 7lbs. Mr. Bell has a real good horse here and he should soon find a buyer. In the R. C. race Baichan rode with good judgment on Nirvana and scored decisively from Bon Bon. Blitzen in blinkers cut out all the work, but stopped as soon as she was collared at the hospital corner and was beaten out of a place.

In the Hunters' Race Trilby started a hot favourite and gave her owner a very pleasant ride as nothing could live alongside her as soon as she started to gallop. Lady Gold finished it out rather better than usual but carried Mr. Bell-Irving across the course as she is very apt to do when running between rails. The Monsoon Hurdle Race course is evidently her happiest hunting ground. The despised Posey ran on very gamely and displaced Sylvia for third place. The latter was well backed to win, but seemed to be stopping all up the straight in a manner new to her, as she has always been a trier among triers.

These Hunter races at the end of the season are still very popular; there are closed Club races for horses and ponies next Saturday and there is also to be yet another Paperchaser's race on the following Thursday as well as the annual scurry for Light Horse Chargers.

The Paperchase season is fast drawing to a close and already complaints are rife as to the hot and muggy weather. The Pony Cup is advertised for Friday, the 29th, and the Paperchase Cup Chase for Saturday, 9th March. Among the ponies there is nothing to compete with Mistlebird and barring accidents Mr. Pugh should easily annex this little Cup. Pathfinder, with all his failings across country, is next best, and of the rest Samah, Zig Zag, Clarice, Blazes and Geebung are perhaps the most likely ones. For the big race Lord Harry stands out very much alone but Mr. Evers and Cain will assuredly make him bustle properly before it is won. Cain is quite a different horse out in the country and runs game right up to the flags. Queen of Hearts will also run well if her owner hardens his heart and sticks close to the leaders throughout; the little mare is a great stayer. Turk is ineligible, Lady Gold unreliable and Fairy, Jorrocks, Ruddigore, Sir Walter, Cobbler, Myrene, and Warrior, are not fast enough to trouble the cracks at the finish. There is still old Corydon to reckon with, but the Doctor will have to keep well with his field this year so long at least as Ruddigore and Mr. Halliday are swinging along in the front division, if he means to take away the Heavy-weight Cup.

First entries for the Jubbulpore Races are published to-day.

The Native Cavalry Polo Tournament was concluded at Umballa on Saturday when the 26th Cavalry met and defeated the 10th Lancers by the narrow margin of a subsidiary: details among our Polo news.

With regret we learn that the Rawalpindi Dog Show has been cancelled: the reason is that the N. I. K. A. refused to allow it to be a "Championship" one.

The Indian Polo Association holds its annual general meeting at Meerut on Thursday, 7th March. We have already published the agenda of business to be put before the members. To these items must be added one in the name of Captain Heseltine of the Carabineers who will propose that in future the Hurlingham Rules for polo be adopted in toto in this country, with two exceptions, viz., the height of ponies and the duration of play. Colonel Macan will propose that at stations where polo is much played, the Polo Secretary should keep a list of those competent and willing to umpire in matches and tournaments; their names to be sent to the Honorary Secretary, I.P.A., for registration, and that in all important tournaments umpires to be selected from this list; umpires to be nominated, and umpire throughout; umpires not to belong to any of the competing teams.

An observant fisherman writes to an American sporting contemporary:—"I read somewhere not long ago a most spirited account of the salmon coming back from its salt water travels to its fresh water birthplace, and jumping the falls to reach the goal. Now I have observed the salmon where ft does most abound, and its way of making upward over falls, appeared to me not jumping but plain, hard, furious swimming.

I remember in Alaska on one occasion to have had a most excellent opportunity to observe this magnificent fish make progress through prodigously swift water and up a fall of about six feet. The stream was an extremely rapid one, having, when I saw it, a width at most points of some thirty to fifty feet. Where the fall came down this was narrowed to ten. At the foot of the fall a little pool of more quiet mien spread out, where the salmon swam so thick as to seem almost a solid mass.

I lay down by the side of the little cascade over which the water poured as clear as plate glass. A bright sun made everything in the downpour of perfect plainness. This is what I saw the salmon do: each one after coming to the impediment retired as far as possible down stream and then rushed forward at full speed. Entering the fall itself the impetus of the first rush seemed to carry the fish about half way up. From here it was a case of slowly winning the balance of the distance by frantic swimming, or a failure to gain upward, which, when it occurred, ended by the poor struggler being hurried tail first back to the foot again. Not over one in twenty succeeded in cresting the torrent. While swimming in the fall itself the fish was apparently moving every muscle in its body, not only fins and tail but the whole body was a-quiver. Many were dashed to death against the rocks below the fall when defeated, seeming then so tired out as to be scarcely able to move.

Fish jumped below the falls and rose clear of the water, but those which won up, scaled the obstruction, and did not leap over it."

Many polo players in India will read with regret of the death at Lucknow of Major S. H. B. Hobbs, of Murray's Jat Lancers. He was specially well known in the U. P. as a smart soldier and clever polo player.

An Australian paper makes the astounding statement that "in India tigers are protected by Government!"

After the outspoken letter from Mr. Harry Storey, Honorary Secretary of the Ceylon Game Protection Society, and after his absolute declaration, with a full sense of the responsibility entailed by the same, that if the present system is continued the extinction of game in Ceylon in the near future is certain, —we must say that we cannot see how His Excellency the Governor can delay taking immediate action writes the Ceylon Observer. That action might well be, in our opinion, a special Commission of a couple of officials, with Mr. Storey or some other qualified unofficial to take evidence, travel, inspect and report by the earliest possible date. For instance, the evidence not only of all Agents and Assistant Agents and Headmen in the provinces concerned should be taken, but also of members of the Forest, Survey, P. W. D. and Minor Roads, and even the Medical Departments. Then again, that of selected members of the cocoanut, tea and rubber planting community and of any intelligent unofficial natives acquainted with our forests. Such a body of evidence could not fail to command respect. We trust February will not be lost without the enquiry being started; for certainly, when the Legislative Council meets early in March, questions will have to be asked and motives formulated and pressed, if nothing is done.

The question of the status, breeding, and origin of the fish liar has often been discussed. As to his status, I place the liar on a very high pedestal remarks a writer in a London sporting contemporary, as he is at least a much more interesting person than the man who sticks to the plain, unvarnished truth. A gentleman who descends to poetry without a blush writes thus:—

Some poet asks the question,
And an answer seems to wish,
If fishing makes men liars,
Or if liars only fish.

I have it. They're not liars—
No doubt they'll be relieved—
For a story's not a falsehood,
If nobody's deceived.

With regard to the origin of the fish-legend provider, I fancy that the habit will go back to the first great fish story of Jonah and the whale. People seem to have been trying to beat that ever since. Some have succeeded, but not many.

For a pleasant little yarn, this would go a long way when garnished with parsley. It emanates from Australia:—

A black-and-tan smooth-haired terrier, belonging to a young man of Hotspur, distinguished itself the other day. In company with other lads, its owner was angling for perch in the Crawford river, when his bamboo rod was pulled into the water by a fish that had been hooked. The river at the spot is 30 or 40 yards wide, and about 12 feet deep. The fish darted across to the other side, taking the rod with it, and the terrier was sent to recover it. When the dog reached the rod it attempted to bring it back, but the struggle of the large fish prevented this. The dog, however, touched ground on the opposite side, and hauled out rod, line, and fish to land. The dog was then told to bring the rod across, but the fish became unhooked on the bank. The terrier immediately caught it by the head, jumped into the stream, and swam across, bringing the fish with him to his master. Then he went back for the rod and caught another fish by trolling on the way across.

It would be distinctly hard lines to be potted by a stray bullet while travelling in a railway carriage. This fate nearly befel Surgeon-General Gubbins the other day. The Pioneer gives the following details:— "On Saturday last just as the 15-39 train from Jullundur to Umballa have passed the Sirhind station a bullet whistled through a first class compartment of the train. It entered through an open window from the western direction, breaking the glass of a closed window on the opposite side. It is supposed to have come from the rifle of some sportsman out buck shooting. The occupants of the carriage were Surgeon-General Gubbins, and Colonel Woodhouse, R. A. M. C., who were travelling on inspection duty. The former, as shown by the marks of bullet, escaped being struck in the head by about four inches."

The Great Punjab Horse Show will be held at Rawalpindi on the 1st, 2nd and 3rd April, first entries closing on the 13th March.

The daily press has told us that at Kingston, Jamaica, vultures have rendered gruesome assistance in recovering the dead bodies of those who have been killed by falling buildings, by perching in flocks on the ruins beneath which the prey they seek is buried. This species of vulture is usually called the "Jim Crow" vulture on the island. According to Gosse, though found commonly also in Cuba and Trinidad, they are unknown in Hayti and in all the intermediate islands of the Caribbean chain. Not only do they act as scavengers—their principal food being carrion—but they will even kill any small animal, such as young pigs, &c. They will also attack larger animals if wounded or in ill-health, rendering their prey helpless by first tearing out the eyes; then they will begin to gorge themselves even before their victims are dead. It has been frequently a matter of dispute whether they find prey by sight or smell or by both. Most modern naturalists are of the opinion that it is by sight alone. Yet the fact that these birds are seen hovering over the ruins under which the dead are buried would lead one to suppose that at close quarters, at any rate, smell gives them no inconsiderable assistance.

The following story quoted by Gosse, corroborates this in no small degree:—A poor German immigrant who lived alone in a cottage, rose from his bed after a two days' confinement by fever, to purchase in the market some fresh meat for a little soup. Before he could do more than prepare the ingredients and put his meat in the water, the paroxysm of fever had returned, and he laid himself on his bed exhausted. Two days elapsed in this state of helplessness, by which time the mass of meat and pot-herbs had putrefied. The stench becoming very perceptible in the neighbourhood, vulture after vulture as it sailed past was observed always to descend to the cottage of the German, and to sweep round as if it had tracked some putrid carcase but failed to find exactly where it was. This led the neighbours to apprehend that the poor man lay dead in the cottage, as no one had seen him for the last two days. His door was broken open; he was found in a state of helpless feebleness, but the room was almost insufferably offensive from something putrefying, which could not immediately be found, for the fever having deprived the German of his wits, he had no recollection of his uncooked mess of meat. No one imagining that the kitchen pot could contain anything offensive, search was made everywhere but the right place. At last the pot-lid was lifted, and the cause of the unsupportable stench discovered.

At the beginning of the year 1906 I wrote an account to the Field of a fox terrier's escape from the jaws of a crocodile which I personally witnessed in Ceylon, but more extraordinary still is a boy's escape from an animal of the same species, but in a different part of the world remarks a writer in our London namesake. A friend, who has been abroad and only recently returned home, related the tale to me only the other evening, so I will tell it in his own words:—

"It was at the latter end of the year 1904 that I was coming down the Upper Niger in one of the Government stern-wheelers (capillie) from Bruna to Lokoja, where I was to change steamers and proceed up the Benue River, when the following occurred. We were in hopes of reaching Lokoja at about 8 P.M., but on passing a place called Barrow were signalled by some white men on the bank to stop. This we accordingly did. The white men turned out to be a party who had just completed the survey of the proposed railway from Barrow to Zungerie, the headquarters of the Protectorate of Northern Nigeria. This caused a little diversion, and, as I was the only white man on board the capillie, I decided to put off my dinner hour and have it a little later with the surveyor and his two assistants. After dinner we all turned in, and arrived at Lokoja a little after midnight. The next morning, my early tea not appearing, I called for my boy (an Ejau, Southern Nigerian), and was told by the cook that he had not been seen since the previous night. I naturally concluded that the young beggar had gone down to the native town on the spree, and was somewhat surprised, as he was a very good and quiet boy.

At 1-30 P.M. a native canoe came alongside, and I was told my boy was in it, and on going to see I found him, or what was left of him. He was an awful sight, being covered from head to foot in clotted blood and sand. He told me that while passing Jamitar he had fallen overboard, but could make no one hear; the current being very strong, he had some difficulty in reaching the shore, splendid swimmer though he was. He was just getting into shallow water, when a crocodile caught him by the legs. He fought the brute, and managed somehow to free his legs; but the brute went for him again, and caught him by the head, but he again freed himself, and managed to crawl on shore.

Considering he had no weapon, I could not quite see how it was possible for him to protect himself in any way. He, however, explained the mystery to me. It was done by pushing his thumbs into the brute's eyes; but in doing this he had both arms bitten to rags, but no bones broken. The wound in the head was the most curious. One large tooth had gone in just behind the left eye ball, and several others on the top of the head. Six broken teeth were taken out of the top of his head, and the eye was not injured.

I sent him to the native hospital at Lokoja, with instructions to the Niger Company to advance him money up to a certain sum if necessary. This, however, they failed to do, and, after waiting for me for about a month, he went down to his own country in a Niger Company's boat, which took all his savings. After another month he worked his way up river again, and found me. Although I had then an excellent boy in his place, I took him on again out of pity, and, after a lot of trouble, got the truth out of him.

It appears that after he had cleared away our dinner he went to the galley to get his rice; but my cook Sambo would not give it him, as he had none of his own, and wanted to steel the boy's. When the boy insisted Sambo pushed him overboard. About twenty niggers on the lower deck saw this happen, but would not say a word, as they were Northern Nigerians and the boy a Southerner."

A lady's dress caught fire on an Australian race-course recently, when an important race was being run. A carelessly abandoned cigar-butt was responsible for the flare up, and great was the rush of gallant sports not to mention whisperers and gents who lay a little double, to put the lady out. This was accomplished without difficulty, and the arduous exertions of willing helpers (as the daily papers say) succeeded in doing likewise for the fire, leaving the lady a picturesque study in charred chiffon and tears.

Lady Lawley, writes the Madras Mail, is anxious to emulate the exploits of Lady Minto as a hunter of big game. She went out more than once during the Governor's shooting trip, and before returning to Madras she sat up over a "kill" for tiger at Thekady. Two tigers visited the kill, but too late in the evening for accurate shooting. Lady Lawley fired at one of the brutes, but did not get it. The champion Lady Nimrod in India is Lady Jenkins, wife of the Chief Justice of Bombay, who has shot several tigers in her shooting excursions in the Hyderabad jungles and elsewhere.

A hungry tiger last week caused a mild flutter among the worthy people of Bassein in Burma. He got into Captain Guy's garden and was dislodged with difficulty and brought to bag by Sergeant-Major Hughes who ultimately potted him while he was crouching under a Burman's house close by.

The way in which British red deer and British trout flourish and grow to an unusual size in the New Zealand climate is one of the most notable features in the history of the naturalisation of game. Now the attempt is to be made to acclimatise a new species in the islands in the shape of the chamois. Several of these handsome animals have been received from the Imperial Austrian menagerie, in return for certain zoological specimens presented by the New Zealand Government. The chamois should arrive in New Zealand in two or three months' time, if they survive the critical experiences of the voyage. There is plenty of mountainous country in New Zealand of the kind which the chamois require, and the great success in the acclimatisation of the red deer gives good ground for hoping that once landed and turned loose in their new haunts they will prosper and breed freely.

The Guzerat Cup Meeting, pigstickers should note, begins at Dholka on Friday, the 29th March, first entries closing on the 7th idem. The programme embraces the Guzerat Cup for horses, the Salmon Cup for ponies, and the Point to Point Races for the Tully and Pony Cups. Mr. T. J. B. Thatcher, District Superintendent of Police, Ahmedabad, is the Honorary Secretary.

The following letter has been addressed to the Secretary, Indian Polo Association, by Major G. A. Leslie, R. E., Kirkee, in explanation of his proposal for measuring polo ponies, owing to the fact that a great many polo players have been misled by the announcements in Indian papers of the proposals :—"Para. 4 of your printed circular of business to be brought before the annual meeting of the I. P. A. in March formulates two separate proposals made by me. My intention was to make the second proposal dependent on the success of the first. My proposal 4 (a) is to introduce a rule for holding up a pony's off four foot while he is being measured. Such a rule I hope may lead to a uniform method of measuring polo ponies and offer no opportunity for transgression. Rule 14 (b). I. P. A. Calendar, rules for height and measurement of polo ponies makes the position of a pony's legs dependent on his conformation. This position is so variously interpreted by measures that uniform measuring is almost impossible. I do not wish to bring forward my proposal 4 (b), to raise the height of polo ponies to 14-2½, unless my proposal 4 (a) is approved of, in which case the raising of the height from 14-1 to 14-2½ will not, I maintain, introduce into the game ponies any bigger than a very large number now playing as 14-1."

Our Bangalore correspondent writes :—There are now beginning to be a few horses in Bangalore, but scarcely any work is being done at present. Mr. Apcar's string, with the exception of the Viceroy's Cup winner, Airlock and another are here, but J. Watson has not yet arrived and the horses are under the charge of Evans. Colonel Desaraj Urs' stable is weak at present, Trenton being apparently something of a "has been" and Red Coral was lately blistered for that unfortunate leg. Lucretia, Little Admiral and Minimus, all of these, of course, in the pony class, make up nearly all the animals of any pretensions which the sporting colonel now has, but he has, I hear, sent a commission to Australia for the purchase of two or three more, and they may be expected about the end of March or beginning of April. Thompson has charge of some horses belonging to Mr. P. Hannygton, a local owner, who is very keen, and a colt called King's Mirror is a particularly good looking one. This colt was, I fancy, bought out of Ferguson's string. So far as can be seen prospects for our racing season here are not too bright, but it is early days to talk.

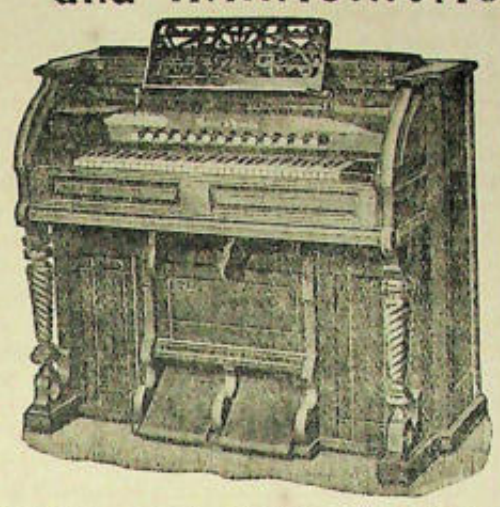
A skittle polo tournament, for which six teams have entered, is being played on the American system, and is providing lots of fun. As I write only one day's play remains to complete the tournament, and it is just a question whether "A" team, Captain the Hon'ble H. E. Joicey, Major Tickell, D.S.O., and Mr. Bruce (King's Hussars), J. and Mr. Naper, R. A. or "F" team, Mr. A. G. S. Astley, and Mr. H. Maddick (King's Hussars) and Captain Muspratt and Mr. Walker (Gordon's Horse) will prove finally successful. The latter side have scored four wins against their opponents' three wins and one loss, but if "A" beats "F" on Monday next, they will make a draw of it on tournament points and a deciding game will have to be played. However personally I fancy "F" team will remain unbeaten, for they are well together and quite above average "skittle" form.

Major Hayes and the officers of the Mounted Infantry School were "At Home" on Tuesday last, on the occasion of their sports, and H. H. the Maharaja of Mysore was amongst the guests. The competitions were more military than sporting, but were good to watch, and very keenly contested. Seven sections competed in the sectional events, and there were representatives from the Royal Fusiliers, the Cheshire, the Manchester and the Devonshire Regiments. Of these the Fusiliers were the most successful, scoring 26 points in all, against 11 points (Cheshires), 8 points (Devons) and 3 points (Manchesters). A ball and bucket competition for members of the Gymkhana went to Miss Mouat-Biggs and Major Tickell (14th Hussars), and Mr. Hill of the Royal Fusiliers won the officers' race. The non-commissioned officers' race produced a great finish, the conditions requiring the competitors to dismount at a point and lead in, being the cause. One champion threw himself off when going at about twenty miles an hour and was dragged for some way. He hung on to the bridle like a brick, and, finding his legs, sprinted for home, only to be beaten on the post. There were heaps of ladies present, and everyone was delighted with the fun and the generous hospitality of the M. I. officers.

Our Bombay correspondent writes :—With one exception, the Exeter Plate, our big meeting opened on Wednesday with a card of terms races and punters did not have the good time one expects when the handicapper has no finger in it.

The new ponies let us in again in the opening event. It was a large field of fifteen and common talk that the equal favourite Lucky Shot had gone lame, bandages further proclaiming the fact, but he was well backed as was also Saeed. The race, however, was a walk away for Sirree, whom Ames took in front and waiting there came away as he liked at the finish, Maluan just beating Yatim for second place. The Fort Plate followed with a warm favourite in Ashroff, who seemed in such good form, but now he got away in the ruck and after coming up promisingly at the bend fell away again. Wadi made the running, but Osborne drawing ahead on coming into the straight had them all beat and landed odds of fifteens, with another outsider in Caravan beating the favourite.

So much has been said of the capabilities of Posco since she ran a promising third at the Second Extra that nothing else was wanted for the Importers' Plate. Meadow Saffron got away in front, but Posco simply left her standing and, with Trenoweth having a good hold of her, won very comfortably from a game effort by Primerole in good time, 1min. 14⅗secs. Precious in the Dealers' Plate was another good thing and he went out at twos on with Eed and Bandit II. next at sevens against. Egypt made the running, apparently for Eed, who drew up with Precious by him at the bend, but had no chance with the favourite in the run home, in fact also gave way to Young Kohinoor, who came late very full of running.



Then came the handicap, the Exeter Plate, and betting was brisk with Sermon steadily shortening to evens, fully justified after a glance at this beautifully built chestnut in the paddock, with Sacristan and Presbyterian for places. It was a good start in which Sacristan got away in front, but was shortly joined by Sermon and these two were about a length and a half in front of Saloon on the rails and Killua about level with him. Till the half mile the positions were about the same, but then Sermon went ahead and Saloon drew up to Sacristan, Killua giving way to Royalist and later to Ferndown. Sermon entered the straight nearly two lengths ahead with plenty up his sleeve and easily stayed Saloon out and Presbyterian, who came with a late run on the outside, beat Ferndown for a place.

We finished up with a bad upset when Bay Middleton went out a warm favourite for the Paddock Plate of five furlongs which looked a moral for him. He gave another display of temper at the gate and though he got away with a slight lead fell away again and never tried a yard. Creditor made the pace a cracker, followed by Derby, who, coming away at the bend, won his race comfortably. Gaucho followed him into the straight and Rose coming very late dead heated with him for second place.

For the second day on Saturday what must have been very near a record crowd turned out. It was a good day's racing with a dead heat thrown in, but punters had rather a bad time of it.

The Tom Le Mesurier Plate came first and Oriental and Tachreet fought for favouritism, eventually going out level. Zurriff made all the running and seemed to be going well in the straight when Tachreet came up to him at the distance and simply waltzed past him to win very easily, Eed beating Little Joker for a place behind Zurriff. A field of a score went out for the Melton Plate and of these Nazzar and Commander went out most fancied at twos, tens and over the rest. Sirree led the latter of these by a good two lengths to the bend when he fell away and Commander looked good till Yatim cut in and coming through the middle on entering the straight had the favourite settled and won at the long odds of twenties.

The Importers' Handicap looked another good thing for Posco till a rush came for Ferndown, who was said to have the race to himself. Vocalist made the pace very fast with Posco waiting behind till the bend when she came away in the same grand style as before and had her race won before Bray came up on Ferndown with a rattle. Ferndown, though not left, got away none too well and had to come round her field at the bend when she came at a great pace. It is, however, doubtful if she could have beaten Posco who, as it was, won comfortably in 1min. 1⅗secs.

A field of eight went out for the Bombay Derby with Precious at evens and a run on Young Kohinoor bringing him to 3 to 1. Hampstead as usual gave a deal of trouble at the post and considerably delayed the start from which Eed took the lead followed by Ajax and then Soheil, Egypt, and Young Kohinoor. The last-named came up into second place followed by Precious at the mile and caught Mooreed at the half mile, where he apparently had the race won. Precious and Hampstead had a great fight down the straight and eventually dead-heated for second place, Young Kohinoor winning comfortably.

There was naturally tremendous speculation on the Grand Western and on the boards the race was very open. Sermon stood favourite at 5 to 2, Paddy's Darling 3 to 1, Saloon 4 to 1 and Ballark 5 to 1. Saloon made all the running, but though he was still going well at the distance, Ballark had him very safe and won easily. Ames rode a nice race on Sacristan and coming up at the bend had the legs of Kipling in the run in.

Once more the last event on the card was an upset as Russley Rose did not move from her position in the ruck throughout. Virballa, Gun Metal, and Koko were in front almost level and then Koko went slightly in front, but Gun Metal in the final effort just came up and dead heated with Lady Avon passing Virballa on the post. In the run off Koko led throughout and won in a canter. Both of these went out at 12 to 1 and the race was quite an extraordinary reversal of form.

The European Amateur Billiard Championship at Pyrke's Saloon has reached the end of the first round. On Monday a most peculiar and very exciting game was played between Messrs. Murray and Edmonds. The latter went clean away and led by no less than 120 points, but being perhaps over confident saw Murray come up and snatch the game after a most sensational finish by 500 to 484. The winner's best breaks were 46, 24, and 20 and the loser's 24.

Messrs. Muir and Louth met on Wednesday and after playing with barely a difference of 30 to the last hundred Louth went clean away and won easily by 500 to 408. The winner made 39, 28, 25, 22, and 21 and the loser 23, 22, and 20 twice.

"You've no idea how careful a girl has to be nowadays. I thought he must be an awful swell, with a motor-car of his own because he smelt so strongly of petrol. But he was stony, and the scent was the benzine perfume on his hired dress-suit."

Cholly Nowitt: "D'ye know, Miss Smart, though I've only just met you, there seems to be a sort of intellectual sympathy between us? You know just how to appeal to my tastes, you see. Are you a literary woman."
Dolly Smart: "No; I'm a kindergarten teacher."

Kitchen-maid (at china shop): "What; only a half-crown tip? During the last year I have broken three soup tureens, twenty-six cups, thirty-five saucers, five meat dishes, and fifty-six plates."

Athletic Notes.

LOVEJOY'S recent record cannon break has apparently incited the big guns of the billiard world to activity: Fred. Weiss, we see, has just issued the following novel challenge:—"Weiss will play any man in the world—Dawson or Stevenson preferred—a match of 1,000 cannons for not less than £100 a side, winner to take all the gate receipts after expenses of hire of hall, &c., are paid. The cannon to be made from ball to cushion first, i. e., after striking the first ball the cue ball must then come in contact with a cushion before making the cannon."

Smithson had been having in many ways an exasperating round. His ball had selected all the worse possible spots in which to come to rest: he had scarcely dared to take his mashie owing to a sudden fit of "shanking," and his caddie, a small youth of inhuman aspect, had not only committed every known crime during the round, but, in response to anathemas, had only hiccupped. However, on the last green, Smithson, despite his misfortunes, still had a two-foot putt to halve the match. He missed it: and, turning upon his caddie, he wrathfully exclaimed: "I believe you willed that, you little devil!" and stalked off to the club-house, followed by his consolatory opponent and the caddies, the loser's being heard to remark to his mate, "bloomin' Zancig, ain't 'e?"

In the second round of the Murray Football Tournament the Durham Light Infantry, after a close and exciting game, defeated the Royal Dragoons by one goal to love. The Somerset Light Infantry from Cawnpore scored a somewhat easier victory over "O" Battery, R. H. A., by two goals to nil. The games, which took place simultaneously, were watched by large crowds of spectators composed of soldiers of the garrison. Several officers and ladies were present.

Some of our readers may perhaps remember some enterprising American motorists—Mr. and Mrs. Glidden—who not long ago ran over many of our Indian roads in the course of a round-the-world tour. We see by a Mexican paper they had very bad luck in smashing up after a journey of 6,675 miles and within fifty miles of the Mexican capital. The report says:—"A small rock wedged between the main rail and the guard rail at a road crossing on the National road brought the Glidden automobile trip from Boston to Mexico City to a sudden end yesterday morning when the point of destination was just fifty miles away, the machine running smoothly and on time almost to a second according to the arranged schedule, and the members of the party in high spirits at nearing the completion of the most remarkable trip undertaken in an automoblile.

The accident occurred at kilometre 80 at 11-30 o'clock. The machine was gliding smoothly along at a speed of 28 miles an hour when it struck the small rock wedged in between the rails. The front wheels jumped into the air, and the rear wheels followed. When the dust cleared away the machine was turned on its side against an embankment of rock and dirt, both front wheels demolished and the occupants occupying space on the track and right of way, while a path through the rock ballast for a distance of 90 feet showed the trail of the machine after it left the track.

The car was occupied by Charles J. Glidden, Mrs. W. S. Hills of El Passo, Miss Martha Waldron-Barron, Charles Thomas, the engineer, W. S. Page, trainmaster of the Mexico division of the National, and a Herald reporter. Almost miraculously the entire party escaped injury with the exception of bruises and scratches and hardly had the machine stopped before the party had recovered and were making the best of the accident."

There was some very interesting rowing at the recent regatta of the Royal Connaught B. C. at Poona: a full report appears further on.

Sam Newman and Powell have fixed up a match for the Heavy-weight Championship of Calcutta—a Rs. 1,500 purse and a side bet of Rs. 1,000 at catch-weights. It is down for the 28th instant at the Columbia Rink.

Considerable interest is being taken in the forthcoming cricket match this week in the Eden Gardens between the English and the Indian Schools, and it is expected that two very fairly representative teams will be got together for it, while should the weather remain unbroken there should be plenty of good scoring on both sides. Major Hedley, who has not yet found time to play cricket in Calcutta, and Major Stockley are likely to be the principal absentees from the English side and A. Razzak, who is up-country, from the Indian side. The elevens are not yet definitely decided upon, but are likely to be selected from the following:—

English Schools.—F. H. Stewart, J. D. Gnise, B. E. G. Eddis, A. C. Von Ernsthausen, R. R. Pope, G. H. Walker, C. B. Nicholls, R. C. R. Hill, A. C. Tatam, C. P. Bartholomew, G. Turnbull, H. V. Low, D. S. Shallow, E. L. Salier and E. O. Elliott.

Indian Schools.—A. B. Rosser, S. Boo, M. Quiterio, H. A. Bayley, A. McCready, B. Mukerji, H. R. Mehta, H. Cooper, E. Templeton, H. Vaughan, G. Hodges, and A. M. Price.

Entries for the B. P. A. A. A. Sports closed last night: they are very good indeed save in respect of the jump and shot events. There should be some fine sprinting in the amateur races and an excellent display by the military runners in the long distance races for the Army Championship.

London Week by Week.

Friday, 1st February 1907.

THE sharp frost lasted long enough to give the London public a few hours' skating. On Sunday the Round Pond was crowded as was the upper part of the Serpentine; and the fact that a west wind brought thaw and the ice was water logged by three in the afternoon did not deter the crowd. Passing the Round Pond on the previous day I could not fail to remark the evidence of self-denial presented by the ice: you might have swept half the surface without getting more than a bushel of stones for your trouble. Perhaps it was that the severity of the frost did not permit the usual tests to be applied for a time sufficiently prolonged to ruin the ice.

Sir Alexander Swettenham has "withdrawn" his letter to the American Admiral after telegraphic correspondence with Whitehall which was no doubt of an aminated description. It is generally acknowledged that the unfortunate missive was intended to be private: and it is generally acknowledged that Colonial Governors should not write private letters on public affairs, at all events to men who may be regarded as representatives of another state. Sir Alexander seems to have "got himself disliked;" the body mercantile in Kingston has fallen foul of him as heavily as if he had been the primary cause of the earthquake: in public meeting assembled it complains of unchecked pillage among the ruins and that the Governor is "out of touch" with the community. It looks as though the nervous strain inevitable after such a disaster had affected everyone.

It is difficult to avoid the feeling that Mr. Walter Long and Mr. John Burns owe to their exalted position their immunity from the consequences attaching to contempt of court. Mr. Long, speaking in Dublin in December last, made strong remarks upon a case in which the jury had refused to convict, the case being one which is to be tried again. The Lord Chief Baron was strongly of opinion that it was contempt, but the three learned brethren who sat with him, while regretting the speakers' indiscretion, held otherwise. Mr. Burns made a speech in which he denounced the Standard for that it had made damaging reflections on a dozen members of the L. C. C. and maintained that the untried charges were untrue: it may have been no more Mr. Burns' intention to bias the London jury that will hear the actions than it was Mr. Long's to bias the Leitrim jury; but my dear editor, I rather think that if you or I had spoken in a similar sense an expression of judicial regret at our indiscretion would not have closed the incident.

Mr. Whiteley was buried at Kensal Green on Wednesday, the funeral bringing together a crowd that could hardly be exceeded by any but royal obsequies. The murderer remains in hospital; since his right eye was removed and fragments of the bullet were extracted from his skull, there is every prospect of his recovery for legal uses. His claim to be an illegitimate son of his victim is denied by the members of the latter's family, though their authority to speak on such a matter may fairly be questioned. The Mr. Rayher who acknowledges intimacy with the man's mother has stated publicly that he has grave reason to doubt his responsibility for the existence of the murderer though he has had him educated. The mother was employed at Whiteley's. If the murderer recovers to stand his trial revelations are expected.

is notified on authority this morning that the deceased has left one million sterling on trust to provide and maintain homes for the aged poor: this after paying £19,000 to certain specified charities, and providing annuities of £1,000 each for his two daughters after their mother's death and £50,000 each, in trust, for his two sons and "residue (if any)" in trust for his two sons.

The interior of The Playhouse does credit to the designer; it appeared to me that the scheme of decoration, orange and gold (not over-much gold) is the most tasteful in London; what is more important the stalls and dress circle seats are particularly roomy, well upholstered and comfortable with ample space between rows to let the inevitable late comer reach his or her seat without colliding with the knees or punishing the toes of the punctual.

The opening performance on Monday night was a great success. Mdme. Clara Butt led off with the National Anthem, then came "The Drums of Oude" with Mr. Kenneth Douglas. Mr. Charles Maude and Miss Nancy Price in the leading parts. Thereafter Mr. Cyril Maude, supported by Mrs. Maude otherwise Miss Winifred Emery, addressed—or tried to address the audience in terms thought out by Mr. Bernard Shaw. The "address" proved to be quarter of an hour's most witty fooling: the manager proposed to review the history of the play house site since the date of Doomsday book: he was stopped by the orchestra which obeyed Miss Emery's signal: he turned away in a huff turning the address into a speech of welcome. Then Mr. Maude growing nervous knocked over a desk with a crash that made him "think it was the station again," a point at which the house laughed consumedly and after further discussion about Hamlet and Toddles and Mr. Maude's fitness to play the name parts in each, the curtain rose on Toddles: which was followed by Mr. Whitmore's smart little "misunderstanding" called Sixes and Sevens played by Mr. Bourchier and Miss Violet Vanburgh. Then a little speech from Mr. Tree and one of thanks from Mr. Cyril Maude and so home in the small hours.

When "Knights were Bold" is a farcical comedy at Wyndham's by Charles Marlowe (Miss H. Jay) who seems to have borrowed the main spring for her very amusing play from Mark Twain's Yankee at the Court of King Arthur. Sir Guy de Vere (Mr. James Welch) dreams himself back 700 years and in Act II. finds his friends and servants in the dresses of the 12th century with ideas and manners to match. His Jewish friend Isaacson, of the Scotch Exchange, is the prey of every one: Rev. Peter Rottlebury is become Father John; Sir Guy's aunt and cousins are a prioress and novices and they and all the servants loudly demand the burning of Isaacson as a heretic at the stake. The humour at some stages is rather of the knock-about order, as when Sir Guy "goes for" his mailed adversary Sir Brian Ballymote with his fists and bangs him into astounded submission; but on the whole the piece is cleverly written and was very cleverly played, particularly by Mr. Welch; and it was most cordially received.

Because, I presume, the mainstay of things dramatic could not come nearer the pronunciation than "Mervellooses," the name of the piece at Daly's has been changed to "The Lady Dandies." Not that it much matters; the play by any name would draw as well, more especially when the change coincides with the addition to the cast of Mr. Huntley Wright. He takes the part of St. Amour! Prefect of Police which was written for Mr. George Graves but has been played and well played heretofore by Mr. W. H. Berry. New songs have been added to suit him; needlessly to say they would fit as well into "San Toy," "The Orchid" or "Amasis" as they do into "The Lady Dandies;" but what of that? Mr. Huntley Wright, above all actors enjoys the Freedom of the Stage and may sing anything he pleases sure of applause.

Saturday night is the night at music hall, as the patrons assemble in greater force than on any other of the week. In most of the fourteen music halls which have been boycotted by the artists, the attendance last Saturday night was much below the average, proving the magnetic qualities of the popular "Stars." The performers have ventilated their grievances with much freedom, and it cannot be denied that they have cause of complaint. As things now are, a manager who has several halls can require a man to do one turn at a Chelsea house and another within an hour or less in the north or East of London: whether managers often do this or not does not appear. Also the performers complain that when they are engaged direct, the manager deducts the 10 per cent. the performer would pay an agent if engaged through the latter. They also object to being called upon to give two free matinées instead of the customary one, and to performing twice a night at "two show" houses for the salary they were paid for six performances and matinée.

The managers did not lose time in meeting the attack and in carrying the war into the strikers' country. They have banded themselves together to help one another by lending artists and musicians and have undertaken to come to no arrangement with the strike leaders without reference to their fellows. This active policy of retaliation rather staggered the Alliance which promptly indicated its intention to oppose the granting of licenses by the L. C. C. Theatres Committee next November. That Committee sat yesterday and the Alliance sent a deputation to point out certain facts for its guidance. For instance that the managers contract out of the Employers Liability Act, a proceeding with which one would suppose the L. C. C. has as little to do, as it has with the agreements which restrict performers from playing within a specified distance of the house at which they may be engaged. Which form of agreement the deputation suggested the L. C. C. ought to forbid as a condition of granting licenses! The L. C. C. Committee said it would take legal opinion on the point.

The union of performers, musicians and employés called the National Alliance announced early in the week that it had taken the Scala Theatre and would give a performance last night for the benefit of their strike funds. They had, they said, the option of a 20 years' lease or purchase of freehold and the owner of the Scala was with them heart and soul—ingrate he if otherwise, since they were to pay him £300 a week rent! I see no notice of the performance in this morning's papers and it is probable that the strikers have discovered that their agreements, including as they do clauses stipulating that they shall not perform within a given distance of halls where they are engaged, forbid their enterprise. Whatever view the L. C. C. may take of such clauses there can be no doubt that the courts would hold them binding.

After a long absence in America Miss Vesta Tilley appeared at the Palace on Monday night to be received with rapture by a large audience. Every music hall singer has her own train of admirers and Miss Tilley's train is a big one. She sang her old songs in the old style with the old success; the Palace is a larger house than the Tivoli where she sang aforetime, but she found no difficulty in filling it. She gave "The Gay Bachelor," "The Girls who love the Soldier" and that rather questionable "Following in Father's Footsteps" with a clever new song about the despotism of a baby by way of encore. Trixie, the performing mare, has been "resting" for a few days: she is suffering from cold or the result of over education.

The popularity of the "living statue" turn has induced the Empire to revive the Living Pictures which were so popular, and made work for the lawyers learned in the copyright law, some ten years ago. The new pictures are admirably done. Among the best was Millais' "The Huguenot Lover," Leighton's "Athlete struggling with a Python," and Watt's allegorical "Hope." The Empire has selected some remarkably fine looking men and handsome women for the purpose: artists models I conceive for the names are unknown to the music hall patron.

Miss Gertie Millar has lost her case against Dunn and Company. She sued them for libel in that they sold picture postcards which showed her in dresses she did not approve, notably one in a "nighty" which it was admitted consisted of Miss Millar's head and some other sitter's body. The plaintiff was rather closely cross examined in the witness box and had to admit that if a manager required her to appear in her "nighty" she supposed she should have to do it: but she would not suffer herself to be photographed in that garment. Mr. Powell for the defence made a point of Well's famous picture of our late Queen receiving the Lord Chancellor and Archbishop of Canterbury when they brought her news of her accession: but as Mr. Justice Darling remarked "if you are going to inherit the British Empire you might strain a point." In the defence also it was urged that it might well be libellous to publish photographs of a middle aged vicar's wife in her nightgown but it could not be considered a libel to thus photograph an actress. The jury to its credit as I think—for juries are not reliable where a popular and attractive actress is on one side and a mere tradesman is on the other—took this view and found for the defendants. The "nighty" postcard had gained considerable acceptance, over 30,000 having been sold.

A case of very serious importance to officers commanding volunteer corps was decided by Mr. Justice Walton on Tuesday. Samuel Brothers' tailors sued the executors of the late Colonel Whetherly for £2,300 odd due them for uniforms supplied to the East London Engineer Volunteers under his command. The judge admitted that it was a very hard case for the deceased man's heirs, but he had no alternative but to find that Colonel Whetherly's estate was legally liable for the sum claimed and he gave judgment accordingly. Execution was stayed in view of an appeal.

The Edalji case threatens to blossom into another Beck case. George Edalji, son of a Parsee clergyman of the Church of England, you would remember, was awarded seven years for brutal mutilations committed at night on horses and cattle. He was released some months back after spending three years in prison, and Sir A. Conan Doyle and Mr. Yelverton took up the matter, convinced that there had been a grave miscarriage of justice. They maintain that there is a vast deal of evidence, ignored at the trial, of conspiracy against the Edalji family; that George Edalji's sight is so defective he could not possibly have perpetrated such mutilations especially at night; that an absolute alibi was established on the night on which the prosecutions relied, and that the police evidence, which comprised the whole case against Edalji was extremely suspicious. The papers bearing on the matter are now under consideration at the Home Office, but Sir A. Conan Doyle threatens to enlist the public sympathy unless an answer is forthcoming by the end of next week.

The British Constitutional Association has resolved to attach the Battersea County Council for having exceeded its powers in establishing a recreation hall where billiards, bagatelle, and other games are played at the rate-payers' expense. They have everyone's best wishes for their success. It seems to be within the power of the auditor to surcharge the councillors and I devoutly hope he well do it.

Review.

THE CANARY IN INDIA.

THE Rev. Isa Tweed (not a lady as many good people and some of our contemporaries think) whose books on the keeping of domestic animals and poultry are well known, comes again before the public with an exhaustive treatise on canaries of which there are no less than fifteen varieties obtained by crossing through a long series of years. The well drawn frontispiece explains the process of evolution from the pretty little wild bird of genuine linnet shape to the somewhat uncouth Belgian and Scotch hybrids with their hump backs and elongated necks. Every detail that prolonged experience in the breeding line furnishes is touched upon and valuable hints upon the treatment of diseases to which these pretty little song-sters are liable are given. Few people are aware of the high prices readily paid for canaries, chiefly by Yenani ladies who allow these pets full liberty instead of confining them in small cages, for though they will warble incessantly in such for some months, the want of exercise soon begins to tell. A bird that exhibits failing lung powers invariably recovers itself when permitted to fly loose about a room and although not every fancier has such accommodation at command every opportunity should be given to ensure a flight at least once a day. With care and kindness the canary can be trusted to flit about the verandah or drawing room, (when Cornus Spendens is rigorously excluded) and is easily trained to come at word of command, for he or she is no romer. Isa Tweed is a great stickler for variety of food and the remarks on this head should be studied with care, for many fill the boxes with the orthodox seed day after day, generally putting in more than the birds can comfortably consume, with the result that staleness is set up, the birds moping and dying. Interbreeding is a prolific cause of deterioration; it is far better to introduce fresh stock each season. The numerous illustrations will be sufficient guide for mating, and they are so admirably drawn and true to life that the novice could hardly make a mistake. Green food is a necessity, as also attention to clean liners and strict elimination of the many kinds of vermin that find their way into the nests and cages. Dried moss is the best material for the former, but the author enters so fully into the subject that any further notice is unnecessary on our part. An excellent treatise and exhaustive book by an educated and enthusiastic expert.

Canary Keeping in India. By Isa Tweed with numerous illustrations. Thacker, Spink and Co., Calcutta, 1907.

"I think I have said enough," bellowed the grimy orator at the Hyde Park idlers, to convince the most sceptical that the reason why England is going to the wall is because the privileged and the socially high-placed persist in poaching what the working man produces. Would anyone around me like to ask any questions?"

For a few seconds there was silence; then came from the fringe of the crowd:—

"How long is it since you had a barf?"

One of the articles in the N.R.A. Museun is a rifle used by Mr. C. F. Lowe in 1869 at a rifle meeting at Spa, in Belgium. Mr. Lowe was in the prize-list until the last day with a single hit!

"Hugless Dancing" is being taught in the Chicago public school. The pupils are being taught all the popular dances, but they have to do all the steps with a chair, dressmaker dummy, or something equally inanimate as a partner. It is proposed to introduce "hugless dancing" in the British Army.

SPORT IN NEW ZEALAND.

ONE of the first questions that the British sportsman asks, when he goes to New Zealand, is, "What is there in the shape of game?" The answer, according to "N. C. P." in the County Gentleman, is a simple and a satisfactory one. There is practically everything that a reasonable man can wish for. If he is an angler he can cast his fly on almost every river throughout the length and breadth of the country, and catch trout such as he has never seen in the old country; if a lover of the gun, he has wide choice of imported and native game; and if a deer stalker, some of the finest sport in the world with the red fallow deer, which now number thousands in both islands. The hunting, of course, does not come up to that in England, but there are packs of hounds, with clever hunters and straight riders in many of the counties and the traditions of a noble sport are loyally upheld.

I will start with the deer. The red and the fallow, like everything else imported, have enormously improved on their original form; the stags are of splendid size and weight, and the superiority of their antlers in spread and points to deer in England is remarkable.

In 1862 a batch of red deer was sent out from Windsor Forest, but only three—a stag and two hinds—arrived living. They were liberated in the Maungaraki Range in the North Island, where they found a perfect shelter in the dense forests which clothe the mountain sides, and abundance of food and water in the English and native grasses and the many ever-running streams. They throve and increased enormously, and now can be counted by the thousand. The red deer of the South Island were started by a small herd sent out from Scotland in 1871, being a present from Lord Dalhousie and they have done equally well.

The shooting season starts on the 1st of March, and lasts until about the 10th of May. The licenses run to something over £1, but the stalker is restricted to four heads in one season. The reason for this is that pot-hunters abound, and the deer must be protected against their ravages.

Fallow deer are more plentiful. In fact, in parts of the North Island one may shoot them as often as one likes and at any time, with no restrictions whatsoever. It is said that one sportsman in the last three years has shot 750 fallow deer, which will give one some idea of their numbers.

Parts of New Zealand seem positively made for deer; the dense forests are indeed often not fit for anything else, and it is probable that some day, with the importation of fresh sorts, New Zealand will become, par excellence, the deer stalker's paradise.

As to birds, a good shot can always have capital sport, and plenty of pleasant companions; for strangers (especially from home) are always made welcome, and a shooting party will be certain to be made up for him if he is keen. Imported hares, pheasants, plover, and quail may be had, and any quantity of native duck, teal and pigeon.

Now for the fishing. Forty years ago there was not a single trout in all the length and breadth of New Zealand. To-day New Zealand trout are famous all over the world for their size and numbers, and thousands of fishermen come every year simply and solely to fish—to fish all the time and do nothing but fish. There is no doubt at all about New Zealand being the angler's paradise. Everything possible is done to help him and encourage him and make him comfortable. Hotels in some parts exist solely for him, hotel managers are always ready to give advice, and in every town and village fishing tackle shops abound, where polite proprietors are ready with rods, flies, baits, and information of all kinds about the state of the rivers, the fish in them, the sort of fly to be used, and everything else that the would-be fisherman may want to know.

The fish vary. In the big snow rivers and in some of the lakes they grow to an enormous size, and one needs a very strong tackle and a spinning bait to take them. These are usually the brown trout, Scotch burn, and salmon trout. In the smaller rivers the rainbow trout have been acclimatised, and they do exceedingly well, ranging often from two pounds to as much as ten pounds. Perhaps the finest and most exhilarating fishing is to be had at the mouths of the big rivers, where the trout are big (6 to 12lbs.), lusty, and fresh run from the sea, and afford the grandest sport, leaping and rushing in the swift currents; but the fishing on some of the lakes is very good fun, and one is sure of a good basket—perhaps 50lbs.! and plenty of sport. I remember we had one capital day on the Lake Rotorua, in the Hot Lake district. We started early and were provided with a luncheon basket from the hotel—New Zealanders certainly understood the art of picnicing to perfection, and their luncheon-baskets are models of completeness—knives, forks, plates, salt—nothing is forgotten, and, of course, the "billy" for tea is the invariable accompaniment, for no one would dream of picnicing in New Zealand without the means of providing quantities of tea. We got tackle from a shop on the edge of the lake—very stout rods, and spinning minnow baits, and set off in a small motor boat, in charge of a weather-beaten, taciturn boatman, who was saturated with oil and seemed depressed by the overpowering smell of petrol which came from the engine. However he unbent in time, and turned out to be really a very good fellow, with plenty of experience, and well up in the habits and vagaries of the fish. Our first run was an exciting experience—such a jerk as nearly tore the rod from our hands, and then a slackness as the fish dashed forward, and we reeled in for all we were worth. Soon we could catch a gleam of silver, and the boatman got out his hook in readiness to gaff the struggling fish. Leaning far over the boat's side he waited till it was close alongside; then he plunged in his gaff, and the great glistening thing fell into the bottom of the boat. It was a good-sized fish, eight pounds, but it looked far larger than it really was; we thought it must be at least a twelve or fourteen pounder! We landed and lunched at a charming spot at the edge of the lake—a clearing in the bush, which lay tangled and pathless behind us, while a big tree left standing cast a grateful shade, and thick soft grass made an inviting seat. A huge army of mosquitoes sallied our to meet us, so we lost no time in making a big fire to boil out "billy," and lighting pipes, and so managed to keep them at bay, or at least to cripple their attack a little!

The afternoon's fishing was more successful than the morning's, and about four o'clock we were getting as many runs as we wanted. We got back to the hotel with a heavy basket—one ten-pounder, a nine-pounder, eight-pounder, and several smaller ones—after a thoroughly enjoyable day. Of course, we had some of our fish for dinner, and very delicious it was, pink in colour, and tasting more like salmon than trout.

The smaller rivers yield beautiful trout, rainbow and brown averaging often from two to six pounds, and affording excellent sport. The scenery is lovely and romantic in the extreme, the only drawback being the multitudes of mosquitoes and sand flies, which do their best to devour the unfortunate fisherman. The heat, too, in summer is almost tropical, and a shady sun hat must be worn, or "a touch of the sun" may be the result of a day on the river. The fishing season starts in October and ends in April, and the license costs £1. Although the English fisherman will come out with all his experience at his back, and probably thinking that he knows all there is to know about the art, he will find that he has a good many things to learn about New Zealand fish. For example, it is said that New Zealand trout do not feed so much on the surface and therefore rise less quickly to the fly than English fish. However, he will find plenty of people to tell him all about it when he gets there, for in the angling community all are brothers.

An account of New Zealand sport would not be complete without some mention of wild boar killing, which is one of the most exciting, and often dangerous, parts of station life. Captain Cook introduced pigs on the island, and they took most kindly to bush life, and multiplied enormously. To-day they are the greatest possible nuisance to the settler, for they not only eat or destroy as much as would support two or three sheep, but they even attack and eat lambs [illegible] doing a good work in helping to diminish their number. The boar gives grand sport, and the sportsman is certain of an exciting time, but he needs skill and nerve, and great endurance, for the bush is [illegible] thick and difficult to get through, and the boars are as wild as can be, and at close quarters as fierce as buffaloes.

I have said nothing about the wild bush-cattle and goats, which are well worth the hunting, but the subject of sport in New Zealand is almost inexhaustible, and instead of writing any more, I think I cannot do better than recommend people to go and try it for themselves.

LAKE FISHING IN NORTH WALES.

HEAVY baskets are not to be expected from any of the Welsh lakes, except on peculiarly favourable days: in fact from a fish getting point of view none of them can be compared with the best Scotch and Shetland lochs. Wales, however, besides being very lovely is eminently accessible. Then, too, fishermen in these days are not gross materialists whose happiness is dependent on the number and weight of their captures. There is the charm of exploring fresh waters, the delight of long tramps across heathery moorland, with the expectation of sufficient sport to give a zest to these expeditions. Such refined pleasures as these, beautiful Wales can afford in plenty.

Some of the lakes alas! are trout-less. Near Bettws-y-Coed among the pine woods which clothe the hill tops, above the old Llanrwst road, is Llyn-y-Parc, a winding picturesque sheet of water, about a mile long. One shore is fringed with firs which grow to the water's edge, along the other bank which is loftier, are oak clad glens, alternating with heathery bluffs. Years ago a mine at the head of the lake killed all the fish with its poisonous washings: but like all Welsh mines it soon failed to pay, and has now been long in disuse. A local fisherman told me that he had seen trout rising in Llyn-y-Parc. This spring I went up there and walked right round the lake, to try and discover whether there was any truth in his story of the water having restocked itself: I did not, however, see a single fish rise. As my visit was in April, which is very early for mountain lakes, I daresay the fish might not show in any case; and I hope soon to visit the Llyn again armed with a rod so as to investigate the matter more thoroughly. I have no doubt the water is now thoroughly fitted for trout, and only requires restocking.

On the moor on the opposite side of the Llugwy Valley there is another lake, Llyn Elsi. This, in its desolate wildness, is an extraordinary contrast to the Sylvan beauty of Llyn-y-Parc. Elsi has been deepened of late years by a dam at its lower end, and now instead of the one island which originally existed, there are three or four, for two promonteries have been cut off from the shore by the rising water. This lake contains plenty of large trout, but they are bad and uncertain risers. The water is full of leeches, and on these the fish feed freely, and so are seldom at the surface. When one does get trout in Elsi they are pretty certain to be over the pound, and there are some extremely large ones. One Angler told me how he had been broken by a monster through not having enough line on his reel. I have fished three or four times in Elsi, and one day rose and hooked two fish, one I got out was rather over a pound and a half, the other which I lost looked a trifle smaller.

There are numerous other Welsh tarns which hold lots of trout. The twin lakes at Capel Curig used to afford good fishing, but of late years, though the trout are more numerous than ever, they have given up rising and the fishing has fallen off very much.

Ogwen, of is course, celebrated for its fishing. There bags of two or three dozen are quite common. I have an Uncle who used to devote a good deal of time to Ogwen: he frequently got excellent baskets there. The lake is shallow and clear, and the great secret of success is to use fine tackle and small flies.

Above Ogwen is that strange and wild mountain Tarn Llyn Idwal: its savage grandeur has been made famous in more than one well known painting. The hills round Idwal form an almost complete amphitheatre, and this cauldron is occasionally the scene of terrific storms. One painter whose heavy wooden hut had been carefully pinned down at every corner with rope guys, had all his fastenings torn up, while the hut was rolled over and over for several yards, like a football. Waterspouts, too, have once or twice been seen overhanging this lake, and sucking up its waters. No doubt the circle of mountains was the cause of this phenomenon. The fishing in Idwal is occasionally very good, and the trout have been improved there by restocking, and so introducing fresh blood.

Crafnant and Cwlyd are two other fine lakes where good sport may be had at times. I have heard specially good reports of Cwlyd lately, but do not know either of the lakes well enough to be able to describe their ways. On the hills above the Lledr Valley, close to Pont y Pant, there is an artificial reservoir which holds a fair number of trout. I have paid several visits to this dam. I used to walk over to it from Bettws-y-Coed across the moor; taking the old Roman road which goes from Pentre Dhu (a little hamlet near the Miners' Bridge) over the mountains to Pont-y-Pant. I invariably got some fish in this reservoir and there was usually a half pounder or two among them. The walk to it is a particularly pretty one, first one goes up through the birches which are everywhere so plentiful along the Pentre Dhu stream, and then after a stiff pull emerges on the open moorland, getting a fine view of the Lledr Valley en route. The Pentre Dhu brook holds trout, and I have more than once taken a dozen out of it with the worm. It is too small for fishing in any other way.

On the slopes of Siabod are several lakes and reservoirs which are well worth trying. One must be prepared, however, for a long tramp to reach them.

No doubt the fish would rise far better in these Welsh lakes, were it not for the diabolic skill with which the Welsh miners use that poaching artifice the otter. It is not so much the number of fish the otter catches, but the quantity it pricks, which does the mischief. Trout which are periodically ottered become very shy risers.

The Welshman, too, is an extraordinary expert with the worm, and though he cannot do much harm in lakes in this way, he very effectively thins out the rivers whenever there is a spate. Still however, in spite of all, the fisherman who uses his head, and is not afraid of long tramps across the heather, can still get a good deal of sport in gallant little Wales.

PROOF.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—To decide an argument will you very kindly state exactly what is meant by "proof" in connection with testing of guns and rifles!

O. S. N.

CALCUTTA, 17th February 1907.

[By "proof" is meant the testing of a firearm undertaken by a properly constituted authority to determine the ability of the weapon to withstand the stresses to which it will be subjected in use. Proof Marks.—The marks applied to proved guns. Definite Proof.—The proof applied as the second proof to barrels which require two proofs, also that applied to barrels which require one proof only. Nitro Proof.—A supplementary proof carried out with black powder, in respect to guns in which nitro-powders are intended to be used. Nitro-Proved.—Term used to indicate proofs undertaken with a specific nitro-powder, as distinguished from the nitro-proof with black powder, which covers all nitros. It is one of the best heads obtained in the district and is a beautifully shaped one too.

SOME CANNON RECORDS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—I was much interested in reading the remarks in your London Sporting Letter this week regarding the wonderful performance of Mr. W. Lovejoy in his match against Harverson. He made 603 by nursery cannons and inside seventeen minutes! Is this a record?

J. K. F.

CALCUTTA, 16th February 1907.

[The nursery cannon record, till broken by Lovejoy, was 159 in a break of 847 made by W. Cook on 23rd October 1905, at the Grand Hall, Leicester Square, when playing against Lovejoy.

The authenticated record for consecutive cannons is held by H. W. Stevenson who made 195 cannons in a break of 458 on 29th January 1896 when playing against C. Memmott at the Billiard Hall, Argyll Street, London.

T. Taylor, on 24th April 1891, also made a break of 1,467 under somewhat similar conditions to those under which Lovejoy compiled his huge score, except that the balls were worked into the jaws of the pocket and secured there, 729 consecutive cannons being scored.

Frank Ives, the American player (since dead), in a memorable match against John Roberts 1st and 2nd June 1893, also scored a run of 1,267 cannons in a break of 2,539.—ED.]

A RARE BIRD VISITANT TO SOUTH INDIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—On the 24th November last, my two sons were out shooting at a place called Giribet, nine miles east of Mysore (City) on the Mysore-Kollegal Road. They were lucky in getting a fairly large bag of duck, snipe, partridge and grouse: amongst the latter I noticed three birds that were strangers to me and being interested in ornithology, I worked out the birds and found they were the "Large or Black-bellied Sand Grouse" (Pterocles arenarius). This bird is only a cold weather migrant to North-Western India, and as far as I can make out has never before this been recorded in South India. During the whole time I collected birds for the late Mr. Allan Hume and for myself, I never came across a single specimen of it. It would be interesting to know if any other sportsman has shot this bird in South India.

BIG GAME IN BURMA.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—I am pleased to be able to allay "Burma's" fears with regard to the forests he mentions (in your issue of 14th February) having been shot out.

I have, as he says, taken a heavy toll out of them, but the following will show that big game is still to be found in those parts. I went out for my first tour for last rains at the end of June and was in Rangoon by the first week in November, and in these four months I shot five bison, three bears, one tiger and a few bucking deer and pig. These were all shot on marches between my timber camps. I did not go on a "shoot."

The Burman is undoubtedly poor as a hunter, but I have never met Mg. Hpo as far as I can remember. Except on one occasion these rains I did all my own tracking, etc., and had no hunter, and I think I know quite as much about the game as an ordinary Burman hunter, which is not saying much for them as they have probably been jungle wallahs more or less all their lives.

The Upper Chindwin does not, I think, require any more stringent game laws than at present exist, unless something could be done towards laying out a few of the wild dogs which seem to have increased so much lately.

All our Forest Officers up there are keen sportsmen, and keep their eyes well skinned for defaulters, and I think that if there are less than 20 cases of prosecution for breaches of game laws occur per annum, it is due rather to the keen supervision of the Forest Department than to their slackness in detecting such cases.

C. B. M.

"THE SELFISH DISTRICT OFFICIAL."

SIR,—With reference to the abovenamed correspondence in the Indian Field of 31st January, those interested will find the other side of the question already quite clearly stated in your article of 6th December, with the exception of certain points which, although inferred, have not as yet been published in detail. These are corroborated by the letters in original which I sent you last November, and are as follows:—

All arrangements for my trip were made, not by me, but by a friend, a former official of those parts, who corresponded with the Collectors concerned, and with another senior (Police) official, and then informed me that everything regarding my shoot had been settled. The rout, be it noted, had been clearly indicated. In fact it was suggested, as suitable, by the policeman mentioned.

I then wrote to the latter and to the Collectors, in order to let them have clear data regarding the time, duration, etc., of my visit, in the usual way.

I had no replies from the Collectors; but on arrival at R.—, whence I entered the shooting grounds, found, as was to be expected, that the Deputy Collector there had received due intimation about my introduction to those jungles. To the best of my recollection, by the way, he was, I think, officiating as Collector at the time.

He and the Deputy Collector of another and contiguous division of that district now kindly gave me every aid. In addition to this, I, a stranger to the country, was very kindly recommended to visit B— Hill, and was sent up there under their own personal arrangements. No license was issued; and I was given to understand that none was required.

After leaving B— Hill, and, later on the country administered by that Collector, I continued to follow the route which had been arranged for me, naturally feeling assured by what had gone before, by a letter received from the Police official already quoted, and by the absence of all information to the contrary, that the arrangements made for me at R—, my starting point, had likewise been made in the other country, through which it had been arranged that I should shoot my way back to the railway.

At the very end of my trip I arrived at a place C—, where I met an Assistant Superintendent of Police. He informed me that the surrounding jungle was Forest Reserve; and that he believed a good deal of the rest of that country was Reserve—which was news to me. However, considering that this particular place had been specifically named and included in my route; that I had now been in the country for two months; that the responsible officials knew all this, and had, had ample opportunity of either sending me a license originally, or else requesting me not to shoot, it is clear that there was every justification for my assumption that I was at liberty to shoot in the Reserve.

If any sort of misunderstanding existed or exists—which I much doubt—it is plain that the onus of setting it right rested and still rests solely on the district or Forest Officials concerned; and if there was, or now is, the shadow of anything to clear up, their duty is obvious. But to this day I have not had a line from them.

With the Collector of the district embracing B— Hill I have had a strange correspondence—of which you have had a copy.

He, one of the Collectors addressed by my friend, and who himself had passed on the arrangements to be made for me to his Deputy at R—, wrote and made what I can only describe as very peculiar attempt to brand me as a trespasser on B— Hill.

On being shown—and it seems strange that he did not know it—that his own officers had, as it were, taken me by the hand and led me there, this official had not even the manners to let me know that he regretted his error!

I am at a loss to account for the confusion which is indicated by the various facts which I have quoted, and I can only imagine that such muddles are attributable to an absolutely chaotic state of affairs—that is to say if your correspondent is correct in his statement or inference that the officials interested consider me a trespasser.

A Police official in those parts, by the way, to whom I wrote seven months ago, has not even troubled to acknowledge the receipt of my letter.

Taking up your correspondent's letter, I note that his instances of the "numberless complaints" of non-payment and under-payment have shrunk to two. Those two have been quite incorrectly reported; as I shall be glad to show to the interested officials from whom I still await communications regarding those and any other instances about which they may have anything to say.

Before leaving R—a list of rates for coolies and supplies was received from the Deputy Collector, and payments were made strictly in accordance with it. In some cases extra payments were made, over and above the rates.

I am justified if I confine the question to myself and omit mention of my companion, especially as he left me about half way through the trip.

Had your correspondent confined his remarks to the shooting, I might have met him half way; for nobody could regret more than I do the killing of cow buffalo, under whatever circumstances. And, had he approached the subject in a different spirit, perhaps I might even have allowed that a bag of eight bison to one gun may seem rather on the side of excess, notwithstanding their enormous and extraordinary numbers—for the country was positively swarming with them, not only in a few favoured spots, but almost everywhere.

As it is, however, in his anxiety to "break a lance," or for some reason best known to himself, he has elected to add statements and insinuations the character of which can only bring him into the gravest discredit; and I shall be surprised if on investigation they do not earn him an epithet compared with which my way of putting it will be found studiously polite.

If he is, actually, the accredited mouthpiece of the District Official concerned—which, in the absence of a definite assurance, I find it difficult to believe——I hope he will bring my remarks to their notice.

THE Gorakhpur Spring Meeting of 1907 opened to-day under very favourable circumstances. The efforts of the Joint Honorary Secretaries, to secure entries and to make the meeting a success, have been well rewarded and they are to be congratulated on the result of their exertions. Never did racing in Gorakhpur want such a fillip and it must have been extremely gratifying to all concerned that the meeting went as it did. Not a hitch or a mistake from start to finish.

Slight rain fell during the night of the 12th and on the morning of the 13th. This, however, was no hindrance, the course was in most perfect order and the going good. The police of Cincinnati state that there are two lovers in that city who have been engaged to be married for the last sixteen years. This postponement of the fateful plunge, however, is not due to the prospective bridegroom being laggard in love still less is it due to the bride being unduly coy. The simple explanation is that no time has occured during the above period when they were both out of prison at the same time.

THE TURF.

GATWICK.

THE dull, dreary sky of the 30th ultimo was innocent of a gleam of sunshine, but after an enforced idleness sportsmen, none the more sorry for their exemption from Nottingham, came down in force to appreciate the excellent service of trains put on by the L.B. and S.C. After all his eccentricities, January departed in satisfactory style with a day that can be called breezy—bittingly breezy, but the sun, whose rays in sheltered places convey a sensation of warmth, was in evidence, and the surface ice pools began to melt towards 12 o'clock. The going—absolutely perfect—was even better than on King Charles' day, and so altogether the executive can pat themselves on each other's backs on the strength of a most successful meeting, as both fields and company were of that length that conduces thereto. FOOTBALL ASSOCIATION RULES.

The programme in the big Leagues on Saturday was completely carried out, although the Arctic severity of the weather in some of the districts would have warranted the abandonment of the fixtures. The anxiety not to get in arrears is very great among professional clubs, as their list of engagements is so heavy, hence the perseverance of the officials in bringing games to a close under conditions which, where there were blinding snowstorms, were a most serious handicap. Where there was not snow, the grounds were frost bound, and the goal totals reflect the disadvantages under which players laboured. In the Southern League the forwards, with two notable exceptions, were strangely inept in front of goal, the ten games yielding only 22 goals, a dozen of which were scored in two games, leaving ten for the other 16 teams. The home clubs did remarkably well, six winning outright, and the other four divided the points. Nineteen goals were placed to the credit of home teams, and only three were obtained by visiting elevens. Altogether, nine teams failed to score! This is very ominous in view of next Saturday's Cup ties, and has, for the time being, a chastening influence on the buoyant spirits of Southerners.

LEAGUES I. AND II.

The forwards in the First Division of the League found it equally as difficult as their S. L. rivals to defeat the opposing defence, and their total amounted to 23, of which 15 were scored by home teams and eight by visitors. Victory went to six clubs playing before their own supporters, two home clubs were worsted, and the remaining two games were drawn. Although the aggregate of goals was so small, only five clubs have a cypher opposite their names. The Second Division clubs, not for the first time this season, take the lead in goal scoring, the combined efforts of the twenty teams producing 28, of which 17 were registered by home teams and 11 by the teams playing on foreign soil. Half the games were drawn, one home team went, and in four instances the visitors were sent away empty-handed. Five of the twenty teams failed to open their account.

SOUTHERN LEAGUE SURPRISES.

There were two surprises in the Southern League. They were not surprises so far as the actual results were concerned, but the severity of the defeats administered to Tottenham Hotspur and Queen's Park Rangers by Norwich City and Millwall respectively, make one gasp with astonishment. The heaviest away defeat which the famous 'Spurs had inflicted on them prior to Saturday was by Queen's Park Rangers at Park Royal, on 22nd December, when the Royalists won 3—1. West Ham, it is true, scored four goals against them a week later at Boleyn Castle, but Tottenham replied with a couple, and no other team had scored more than two against them in one afternoon home or away. On Saturday they were much below strength at Norwich, but in the opening half they did well, and were unfortunate to be a goal down at the interval. Even when facing heavy snowstorms in the second half they did well for some time, and looked uncommonly like equalising. Then came a sudden change, and in a few minutes Norwich had a big lead. The Citizens, playing with the confidence begotten of success, were irresistible, and before the finish scored five goals without response. This is the first time this season Norwich have scored five goals in a S. L. match, their previous best win being the 3—0 win over Millwall on 3rd November. The second surprise was provided in the Millwall cs. Queen's Park Rangers' game at north Greenwich. The Rangers are experiencing a big streak of bad luck, and the Dockers had no mercy on them. Four goals in the first half and three in the second indicate an all round superiority, and on the play there was great disparity between the sides, Millwall being just as lively and incisive as the Rangers were dull and inert. I do not know how much training they have done recently, but when I last saw them they had done too little or a great deal too much. Seventeen goals in two successive home S.L. games look healthy for Millwall.

PORTSMOUTH AGAIN ON TOP.

No matter the kind of opposition they offer to the more lowly place clubs, Watford invariably make a big fight against the top weights, and they maintained their reputation in this respect on Saturday, when they played Portsmouth at Fratton Park. In the corresponding game last year Watford lost 4—2, but goals were more scare last week end, a solitary one, scored in the opening half, giving the home side the victory. It was a most valuable goal to them, because it carried with it a couple of points, and reinstatement at the head of the table with a lead over Fulham, and two matches in hand. There was great rejoicing at Griffin Park on Saturday, for Brentford retained their unbeaten certificate revenged their last season's humiliation from Fulham, and captured two most valuable points. If Brentford had shown in their away games form approaching that to which they have treated the habitues of Griffin Park they would now be engaged in a Homoric struggle with Portsmouth and Fulham for the shield. The Cottagers tried hard to avert defeat, but just failed. At Sydenham, the Crystal Palace were visited by Southampton, always a dangerous side, notwithstanding their poor away record. They provided keen opposition, but were a trifle fortunate to divide the spoils as the play went. The other Metropolitan game resulted in a win for Leyton, after Northampton had led at half-time. These points are of priceless value to the East Enders, for they remove them from the danger zone, towards which they were travelling at too consistent a pace.

SWINDON'S HOME RECORD.

The Bristol Rovers did not succeed in accomplishing that which other teams had found beyond their powers—lower Swindon's colours on their own ground. The railway men prevailed by only a goal, but it reversed last season's result, and consequently afforded immense satisfaction to the home club's supporters. The Rovers who have been singularly unsuccessful in their foreign engagements since November, are now quite out of the running for honours. New Brompton must be written down as a disappointing team. Occasionally they show form worthy of the fame of the stars in the side, but more frequently they fail to realise expectations, and on Saturday it was not a convincing performance to draw with Reading. The chief fault lies among the forwards, who do not appear able to get into their stride. West Ham United had a hard tussle with Luton at the Beds town, and after being a goal down at the interval they drew level—a capital performance. It was an equally smart effort on the part of Brighton to play Plymouth on their own ground to a goalless draw. The Argyle have provided the Albion with three points this season, as the first game at Brighton in September was a 4—1 win for the latter.

S. L. TABLE.

There have been some important changes since last week, Portsmouth having jumped over Fulham, and Norwich City take precedence of Tottenham. It is not satisfactory to find four London teams in the last eight.

THE ARSENAL GO UNDER.

The match at St. James' Park, Newcastle, on Saturday, was of tremendous importance to both clubs. Newcastle have for some time been marked out as the probable champions, their most dangerous opponents having been Everton and Woolwich Arsenal. Both clubs had played 23 games prior to that under review, and the Novocastrians held an advantage of a couple of points, and a much superior goal record. Last season the Gunners took three points from Newcastle by winning at home and drawing away, and in the first game this season at Woolwich, the Reds won by two goals to love. They thus had every reason for confidence, but the conditions under foot evidently did not suit them so well as the home side, who scored in the opening half, and maintained this advantage for the remainder of the game. At times the Arsenal half-back work was weak, and the forwards were slow and uncertain when opportunities came their way. It stands, however, to the credit of the Gunners that only one other team has been allowed to depart from St. James' Park this season in League matches with a single goal debited against them, Everton being beaten 1—0 on 15th September. Newcastle have obtained every possible point from their home matches, but they have not been consistent in away games, and this weakness may yet cost them the championship.

OTHER LEAGUE GAMES.

Of the other League games there were two of more than usual interest—the meeting of Bristol City and Sunderland, at Bristol, and the opposition of Everton to Aston Villa at Birmingham. It is about six years ago when Sunderland knocked Bristol City out of the F.A Cup in the west, and this was the first visit since that memorable occasion of the team which once boasted the name of "all the talent." At Roker Park earlier in the season the Citizens halved the points in a heavy scoring game, and they could not do any better than divide the spoils on Saturday. The rivalry between the Villa and Everton is of long standing, and as the latter went down at home before the Midlanders in September, they were intensely desirous of paying back the Villans in their own coin. They failed, and Aston Villa have for the second time in its history secured the four league points from Everton in one season. Manchester United, who have not been doing at all well, provided the sensation of the afternoon by defeating Bolton Wanderers at Burnden Park, and as Manchester City, at Hyde Road, effected a draw with Derby County—much less than was expected of them—the Manchester folk are on pretty good terms with themselves. Stoke were not able to avert defeat at Bromall Lane, and as Notts County only obtained one of the three goals scored at Trent Bridge in their game with Blackburn Rovers, they keep the Potters company at the foot of the table. It really appears that Nottingham will not have a team in the First Division next season. Preston North End scrambled home against Sheffield Wednesday, at Deepdale, and Liverpool showed by their 2—0 win over Birmingham that their Cup tie win over the ex-Heathens was not a fluke. The resuscitation of Middlesbrough is now an accomplished fact, Bury being their latest victims and the Tees-siders are now well clear of the chance of a Hibernian promotion.

CHELSEA ADVANCING.

The directors of the Chelsea Club did not conceal their anxiety as to the possible outcome of the game on Saturday with West Bromwich Albion. A defeat for the Pensioners would not have placed them in serious jeopardy, but it would have aroused a sense of uneasiness, because the great battles with Leicester Fosse, at Leicester, and with Nottingham Forest, at Stamford Bridge, are to be decided on successive Saturdays. It will be remembered that in the last tournament Chelsea won at home and drew away, but they improved on the latter in September, the Throstles being worsted 2—1 before their own supporters. The Albion consequently had an additional incentive to do well on Saturday, but they caught Chelsea on top of their form. The last sentence ought perhaps to be modified, because sparkling and convincing as the home team were in the open, they did not quite complete their work. Had they done so, the visitors would have had a heavy goal margin against them. The exhibition given by the winners was of such a character that if it be repeated during the next few weeks they will establish so pronounced a lead in the table that their promotion, now apparently well on its way, will be practically a certainty. It may be, after all, that the dismissal of the Pensioners from the Cup was a fortuitous circumstance, for they will now devote their undivided attentions to the League.

OTHER SECOND DIVISION GAMES.

There was one surprise in the Second Division of the League on Saturday, Nottingham Forest finding their form with such vengeance that Leeds City, on their own ground, were defeated 4—1. Leicester Fosse must be well satisfied with the one point they brought away from Barnsley, and Hull City and Bradford City were also good value for a division of honours at Stockport and Wolverhampton respectively. Clapton Orient did not give one of their best shows at Homerton against Blackpool, one point from a home match against so lowly placed a club not being satisfactory. Burnley again ran up a big score at home, Lincoln City being their victims, and Gainsborough Trinity and Grimsby delighted their followers by victories over Glossop and Grimsby in the order named. Burton United played and Chesterfield in the order named. Burton United played pluckily at Burslem, and brought away a point from a ground where teams with greater reputations have failed.

THE AMATEUR CUP.

In spite of the wintry conditions, seven of the eight games in the second round of the Amateur Cup were played, the postponed tie being that between the New Crusaders and Oxford City, certainly the most interesting of the four down for decision in the South. I stated on Saturday that Civil Service on the season's results, should win at Champion Hill, against Dulwich Hamlet, and they fulfilled my prediction, but by a much heavier goal margin than I expected. The Service are playing so well that they will have to be seriously regarded as possible winners, and if their efforts should be so rewarded it would be most popular, for they have been keen supporters of the competition. Clapton had to work hard to win against the 2nd Grenadiers, but the other military team are still in the running, Barnet Alston being beaten by the 2nd Lincolnshire Regiment by the odd goal in five. In the north, the Stockton cs. Stanley United, and Northern Nomads cs. South Banks games were drawn, but the Rotherham Amateurs defeated the Sheffield Club, who were regarded as having an excellent chance to reach the final. Bishop Auckland easily defeated Grangetown, and their win was in accordance with previous results.

A little BOVRIL added to soups and made dishes renders them more appetising and nutritious.

NORTH vs. SOUTH.—The match on the 30th ultimo at Chelsea between the chosen representatives of the North and the South was a capital exhibition of football, especially in the first half, when there was a great struggle for supremacy, but in the concluding forty-five minutes the South died away to a pronounced extent, and thus paved the way for an easy win for the North. Changes were necessary in both teams, Vivian Woodward not having recovered sufficiently from the injury he received in the Hull match to be able to turn out, and Hilsdon, of Chelsea, was brought in. Stokes, the Bolton forward, was too indisposed to play, and Stewart, of Sheffield Wednesday, was absent through injuries. The teams were as stated in yesterday's Sporting Life six internationals appearing for the North and two for the South. That considerable interest was taken in the match was shown by the attendance, which approached 15,000, and the gate-money was £435. The arrangements were excellent, and the suitability of the Stamford Bridge ground for a match of this description was abundantly demonstrated.

It was fortunate that the severe frost broke in sufficient time for the bone to be taken out of the surface of the ground, but the players found it difficult to maintain their foothold. The majority surmounted this drawback extremely well, and the game served up was of a character that was well worth watching, for it was punctuated by clever combination, varied by individual efforts of pronounced brilliance. It was, too, played in a splendid sporting spirit, not more than two or three fouls being given, and these were not of a serious character. The players were keen, very keen on proving their possession of the requisite ability for further distinction, and it speaks well for the teams that, with so much anxiety to appear to advantage, there should have been no features in the play to which the most fastidious critic could take exception. What advantage there was in the crosswind went to the North in the first half, as Crompton beat Herbert Smith in the choice of ends, but the South were first prominent in attack, Wallace early giving a glimpse of his sprinting abilities, clever dribbling, and accurate centring. Coleman kept him well supplied with the ball, and for a time Bradley and Carr had a lively time. They were untiring and judgmatical, but at length they were outwitted, and Coleman provided Hilsdon with an opening which the centre-forward endeavoured to run to account. Hardy, however, cleverly anticipated the shot and his clearance set Rutherford on the move, an electric sprint on the right threatening considerable danger, but the irrepressible Wedlock intervened when the Novocastrain swung a centre across. The exchanges certainly ruled in favour of the South, the forwards being well together and they were well supported by the halves, the deft passes of Hawkes being particularly noticeable. Threlfall and Ross were working well together, but the dogged pertinacity of Warren prevented them becoming really dangerous. The play was fast and spirited, and for a time it was a grimly earnest struggle between the South attack and the North defence. Hawkes brought Hardy to his knees with a powerful drive from 40 yards out, and a moment later Wall and his partner were worrying Cross who could not prevent Bridgett swinging the ball across to Simpson, whose career towards goal was summarily closed by Hawkes. A better understanding was developed among the North forwards, with the result that more work was thrown upon the opposing defence, and from an opening which Bridgett made, Wall got in a left-footed drive, which Ashcroft smartly dealt with. The game once more settled in the North half, and incat individual work by Ross left Hilsdon in possession, but the Chelsea man missed the uprights with a shot which went in at express speed. Up to this point the South had had decidedly the best of matters, but the scoring opened at the other end, Smith letting Rutherford through, and the outside right worked in towards goal, and concluded with a shot which Ashcroft was unable to deal with, opinions being divided whether he should not have rushed out and tackled the Newcastle man. The goal was thoroughly well deserved, but the lead was not long retained, a lovely pass by Wallace to Coleman enabling the latter to give the ball to Hilsdon, who was favourably placed, and in a flash it was past Hardy in the net. So encouraged were the South by their success that they made strenuous efforts to obtain the lead, but the North defence was very solid, more so than the South, for after a lot of passing and repassing well in the neighbourhood of the South goal, Rutherford fastened on the ball, and for a second time defeated Ashcroft, the score at the interval being :—

	Goals.
South	1

The first half had provided brilliant football, and the game in the second half never became mediocre, but it suffered by comparison. To put it shortly, the North improved and the South deteriorated, particularly forward. This was more noticeable after the North had scored their third goal eight minutes from the restart, as the result of a movement in which all the forwards took part, Wall concluding the effort with a smashing shot which Ashcroft could not possibly cope with. Jones looked uncommonly like increasing the lead a minute or two later, but Ashcroft deflected the ball behind, and he next got rid of a most awakard shot by Bradley. Hardy was seldom troubled at the other end, and had not anything so difficult to dispose of as the long shots which Threlfall got in during the first half. Now and again the South forwards would work their way down, but the defence opposed to them was ever on the alert, and possible openings were few and far between. They returned to the attack frequently, but good though they were in the open they were not incisive enough when in the neighbourhood of Hardy, though this was probably due less to their lack of vim than to the vigour and determination of the North defence, in which Crompton, Warren and Carr were ever prominent. Under pressure the Blackburn Rover twice miskicked, Hardy having to have on each occasion, and after a free-kick had been given against Carr for illegally bringing down Wallace, the crowning misfortune came to the South, a timely pass by Rutherford to Jones giving the latter a chance which he promptly seized, and the score stood 4—1 in favour of the North. The South continued to struggle against untoward fate, but they could not reduce the adverse margin and the game ended :—

BOXING.

THE WORLD'S FEATHER-WEIGHT CHAMPIONSHIP.—The New York Herald of 19th January has the following account of the contest between Attell and Baker on 18th January at Los Angeles :—

Abe Attell retained his title to the feather-weight pugilistic championship of the world by forcing Harry Baker, of California, to throw up the sponge in the eighth round of what was to have been a twenty rounds fight at the Pacific Athletic Club. Baker put up a game battle, and in the second round sent Attell to his knees. In the seventh round Attell sent Baker down and he took a count of seven. Then Attell punished him so severely that he went down again. Finally Baker's seconds threw up the sponge at the beginning of the eighth round.

The pavilion was crowded to the doors, and the receipts will probably reach 8,000 dollars. Attell was the favourite at odds of 2 to 1. Baker was the first to enter the ring. His seconds were Frank McDonald, De Witt Van Court, "Eddie" Webster, and Eddie Menny. A few minutes later Attell jumped through the ropes, attended by Jack ("Twin") Sullivan and "Kid" Dalton. Neither principal tipped the beam at 122lbs. James J. Jeffries was the referee.

Round 2.—Baker missed a hard left. Attell stopped a left for the jaw. Baker landed a left on the jaw and Attell sent a right to the jaw. Then Attell ducked a hard left swing. Baker got away from Abe's right. Baker was short with his left and right for the head, but he landed left and right on the body. They clinched. Baker led with his left and Attell rushed him to the ropes, sending left and right to the body. Baker escaped without injury. The crowd hissed Attell for his kidney punches in the clinches. Attell seemed master of the situation. Baker was strong, but it was Attell's round.

Round 4.—Baker took the aggressive and landed his right on the body, and followed with a left to the face. Attell got away from a right and then rushed Baker to the ropes. Baker's shiftiness saved him in two fast rushes. Attell then landed a left uppercut to the neck, and worsted Baker with short-arm work in clinches. Baker stopped Attell with a stiff left to the jaw Attell countered with a right to the face. He shook Baker up a second later with a hard left to the jaw. A clinch followed, and Baker was worsted as usual. Attell waited for Baker after the breakaway. The Californian led with the left and got away, bringing cheers. The gong sounded with honours easy.

Round 5.—Attell rushed, but Baker blocked a lead for the head. Baker missed two lefts. They sparred. Attell landed a right to the ribs, but Baker came back with fast work, and landed some hard blows. Attell, in a furious rush, landed terrific short-arm punches to the body. Baker sent a hard left to the jaw, and Attell swung a stiff left to the jaw. In a spirited rally Baker landed three short-arm rights on Attell's body. Attell retaliated with left swing on the jaw, sending Baker against the ropes. Baker quickly came back full of fight. The boys were sparring at the gong. It was Attell's round.

Round 6—Baker went down from a right to the jaw, but was up quickly. Attell showed cleverness in clinches by his quick work. Baker sent a right to the neck. Attell followed Baker around the ring, covering up and taking every punch Baker sent. Baker seemed unable to shake Attell, and appeared tired for the first time. In a clinch Attell uppercut Baker's face at will. Baker rushed into a right that took away a lot of his steam. Attell sent a right to the kidneys and punched Baker to a standstill in the centre of the ring. The round was in Attell's favour.

Round 7.—They opened by sparring, Baker covering up, but Attell walloped his head in a clinch. Baker appeared tired and fought on the defensive. Attell finally got the range, and sent a right to the face. He quickly followed with a rush, forcing Baker to the ropes. Attell then sent a right to the stomach and received a right to the head in return. Baker was severely punished on face and body. Attell swung a hard left to the jaw and Baker went down, but he came up at the count of seven, and walked to the other side of the ring. Attell quickly went after him, and scored another knock-down with a left swing. The blow sent Baker under the ropes. Baker was up before the count of ten. Hot infighting followed, Attell punishing his opponent with right and left swings. Baker was all but out, and his seconds threw up the sponge. Attell was strong at the end.

The referee promptly declared Attell the winner. Baker was very groggy, and was revived with difficulty after reaching his corner.

ROWING.

THE UNIVERSITY BOAT RACE.

OXFORD.—The Oxford president last week had his arrangements upset by the ice blocking the river, and as misfortunes never come singly, yesterday he had to alter his programme owing to the indisposition of Southwell, who was unable to row. The vacancy was filled by H. R. Barker (Christ Church), who rowed No. 7 in the winning trial, but otherwise the order was unaltered.

Only a limited amount of work was done in the eight, one journey being made to the Lasher and back at a slow stroke under the supervision of Captain Willis, who, however, gave tubbing instruction to Heard and Bucknall, Hope and Peat, and Gillan and Kirby. Names and weights :—

CAMBRIDGE.—Mr. B. Carruthers-Johnstone, the president, yesterday proceeded to his B.A. degree. The weather all day was most boisterous, and prevented any tubbing before luncheon. The preliminary work was to have started at 2 o'clock, but snow falling heavily, it was decided not to expose the candidates more than absolutely necessary. However, they made up for it in the eight, the men being called upon for hard work.

Getting afloat at the usual time, they took matters easily on the outward journey, which consisted of a number of easy stages of paddling at 26. Swinging round at the Little Ditch, they were ordered not to remove their sweaters, and they went right through the return journey—a distance of about three miles—without an easy. Alternate rowing and paddling was the order, the former at the rate of 32 and the latter at 28. The work, under the conditions, was satisfactory, the men being well rowed out at the finish. Mr. F. J. Escombe coached, and the order remained unchanged. Names and weight :—

MOTORING.

GOOD SHOW OF BICYCLES AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—The annual motor exhibition at the Crystal Palace was opened today under rather depressing conditions, the central hall being not nearly filled with exhibits, whilst there was only a sparse attendance of spectators.

The display is largely made up of second-hand cars and motor-bicycles, although some Humbers, Leaders and Pengeots provide good examples of first-hand cars.

The second-hand cars include a six-cylinder Napier, a powerful Darracq, and Mercedes, Panhard, Daimler, Siddeley, Royal Enfield, Oldsmobile and Scout cars.

Amongst motor-bicycles a good show is made with the Rip, including a twin-cylinder bicycle with side car. There is an extremely light looking motor-bicyle on the N.S.U. stand. The engine is only one and a quarter horse-power, and is in an inclined position in the frame. It is fitted with magneto ignition.

Other motor-bicycles are the Brown, G.B., F.N., Roc, Rex and Vindec Special. The last-named also have a three-wheeled runabout, which is formed by putting a front attachment to either the three and a half or five horse power models.

GOLF.

ENGLAND vs. SCOTLAND IN THE LONDON PROFESSIONALS' TOURNAMENT.—What has been generally regarded as the most interesting tie in the first round of the London Professional Foursome Tournament, namely, Rowland Jones (Wimbledon Park) and A. H. Toogood (West Essex) vs. W. Hunter (Richmond) and J. Hepburn (Home Park), was replayed to-day, over 36 holes, on the Mid-Surrey Club's course at Richmond.

When the couples met at Wimbledon Park last week they halved. Jones and Toogood are English internationals, while Hepburn and Hunter are Scottish internationals.

Jones and Toogood took the lead at the third hole, and playing a fine game, they stood 5 up at the eleventh hole, where Jones laid Hepburn a dead stymie.

Hepburn retorted by laying Jones a dead stymie at the seventeenth, but at the end of the morning round Jones and Toogood stood 7 up.

THE MADRAS HUNT.

SUNDAY morning last week was and will most likely remain, the best day of the season. There were nearly thirty people out, including Mrs. Horne, Mrs. Branson, Major Giffard, Captain Ross, Captain Kirkpatrick, Captain Symons, and others. The meet was at the 7th milestone on the Poonamallee Road and at first we had no luck, many of the usual coverts being drawn without result. Things were, in fact, beginning to look rather depressing when we moved over to the belt of casuarina trees which lies north of the river, opposite the 9th milestone. As it was, it was 8 o'clock, and becoming very warm when a jack was viewed and halloaed by some of the field and simultaneously hounds crossed his line, picking it up at once, running well from the start. The jack turned at first in the direction of Madras and hounds hunted him from covert to covert—all casuarina trees. At first he ran short and his course was never straight, but hounds gradually made the pace too hot for him and he decided to leave for pastures new. He turned back, parallel with the river, going in the direction of Poonamallee, and ran the row of plantations, hounds travelling at a very satisfactory pace. Then a second jack got up in front of hounds and for a time they divided. The smaller lot were, however, stopped by the Master and done of the whips and held them on to the main body, which were bustling the original jack along at his best pace. After making a short trip in the direction of Avadi, the jack turned back to covert for a time, but was not given a moment's peace and was soon forced out and at last made up his mind to run straight. A single hound, unluckily, got away on his line, but was stopped until the rest of the pack came up and they then went on at a good pace. The jack turned right handed and took us across a stretch of open country, straight for the Madras Railway line, and from this point the field had a hard gallop to keep up with hounds. The jack was only a little way in front of hounds, but they had not viewed him. At last one hound got a view and raced for him, getting a long start of the rest of the pack, which was carrying the line through standing crops. She ran the jack single handed for quite a mile and at last caught and held him until the rest of the pack came up and finished the work for her. This is a very plucky performance, for there are very few hounds that will tackle and hold a big dog jack single-handed. The hill was about half a mile from Avadi Station close to the Poonamallee-Avadi Road. The run had lasted for 45 minutes and the point, making no allowances for turns and rings, over five miles. Then came a weary walk back to the van, which was reached at 10-30 A.M. Most of the run was over excellent going, but there was a lot of nasty, pitted ground between the casuarina woods, which had to be negotiated with care.

Paperchasing.

CALCUTTA PAPERCHASES.

No. 9.

LAST week's chase was run, like its predecessor, through the Jodhpur country and the usual run down to the Old Man's Crossing and back again was requisitioned. This big curve puts a good two miles into every course that includes it and it was rather too much of a good thing to have to tackle the long run round behind the Durzi's village in addition. With the Bund Country a closed book as it seems to be at present, it is perhaps difficult to find the happy medium and course laying must be a work of considerable magnitude under prevailing conditions. On the whole the going was good, but the heavy places told visibly on the horses. In the horse chase the leading division ran out of sight of the main body while the ponies finished very deliberately.

Mr. J. M. Turner, who has been confined to his room with a concussion sustained in his fall last Saturday week, was much missed. Mr. Pauntley and Mr. Deakin officiated in his absence and carried the paper, the latter on his mare Trilby, regardless of her engagement in the Hunters' Race next day. The race she won in spite of her hard work and it is a fact that she and Bluebell deserve their share of these Hunter Races as well or better than any paperchasers of the year.

Mr. Rees on Turk again cut out all the work in the Horse Chase, but he was unable to run away from the others in the close country and at the finish found Cain upon his heels. Mr. Evers executed a very dashing finish and won cleverly by half a length. Mr. Ballantyne and Fairy were close behind and so secured the Average Cup. The order was :—

1. Mr. Evers on Cain
2. Mr. Rees on Turk
3. Mr. Ballantyne on Fairy
4. Capt. Holden on Lord Harry
5. Mrs. Walker on Detective
6. Mr. Pugh on Great Hart.

In the Pony Chase all the leaders ran off the paper and Mrs. Stokes, Mr. Evers and Mr. Maude alone kept the course among the front division. Irish Boy was pushing along gamely right up to the finish and won very easily from his very weary companions. It was a long and hard ride and Mrs. Stokes may be well pleased at scoring her first win over so difficult a course. The order was :—

1. Mrs. Stokes on Irish Boy
2. Mr. Evers on Riff Raff
3. Mr. Maude on a bay
4. Mr. Barrow on Puck
5. Mr. Buckland on Blazes.

NATIVE CAVALRY TOURNAMENT.

SECOND ROUND.

FOUR games of the second round of the first ties in the Native Cavalry Polo Tournament were played off on Tuesday, the 12th instant. General Clements, a well-known devotee of the game ,and all Umballa society, besides numerous visitors and friends of the playing regiments were present. Majors Chesney and Lecky, and Mr. Reynolds were responsible for the smooth working of the arrangements. One of the first couple of games was between the 10th Lancers (Captain Strong, Messrs. Chambers, Foster, and Goldie, back) and the 11th Lancers (Messrs. Gatacre, Hastlay, Captain Anderson and Mr. Rennick, later replaced by Captain Rose-Price, back). Umpires: Colonels Eastwood and Rivett-Carnac. Result :—

10th ... ... 5 goals, 1 subsidiary.
11th ... ... 3 goals, 1 subsidiary.

The game played concurrently with this was between the 1st Lancers (Messrs. Chamberlayne, Muirhead, Hinny and Pott, back) and the 14th Lancers (Mr. Sutherland, Captain Souter, Mr. Hewlett and Captain Hughes, back). Result :—

14th ... ... 10 goals, 3 subsidiaries.
1st ... ... 2 goals, 1 subsidiary.

Of the next series, one game was between the 8th Cavalry (Mr. Kay, Captain Becher, Mr. Fane and Captain Fetherstonhaugh, back), and the 18th Tiwana Lancers (Mr. Risley, Major Chesney, Captain Fitzgerald and Mr. Mills, back). Result :—

18th ... . 4 goals, 3 subsidiaries.
8th ... ... 2 goals, 2 subsidiaries.

The other game was between the 9th Hodson's Horse (Captain Rowcroft, Major Crocker, Messrs. Fraser and Atkinson, back), and the 26th Light Cavalry (Messrs. Clayton and Griffith, Captain Popham and Mr. Moor, back). Result :—

26th ... ... 5 goals, 1 subsidiary.

SEMI FINALS.

The semi-finals for the Native Cavalry Polo Tournament were set down for the 14th instant, but the one between the 10th Hodson's Horse and the 14th Murray's Jat Lancers fell through, as the 14th scratched, owing to the lamentable death at Lucknow of Major Hobbs. Thus only one game was played, the first to be played on the new polo ground, in the presence of a very large assembly of spectators. The weather was cold, windy, and cloudy, but the attendant discomfort was recompensed by the spectacle, the splendid game and the hospitality of the 36th Cavalry, who were "At Home," and their band further enlivened the proceedings. The teams engaged were the 18th Tiwana Lancers—Mr. Risley, Major Chesney, Captain, Fitzgerald, and Mr. Mills (back); and the 26th Cavalry—Messrs. Chaytor and Griffith, Captain Popham Mr. Moir (back). The umpires were Majors Lecky and Hobson.

It was a splendid galloping game; both teams were splendidly mounted. The 26th who have graduated in the Golconda Polo School, have only lately moved from Secunderabad to Poona and then were regarded as winners and this anticipation proved correct.

In the first chukker, from the throw-in the Lancers ran the ball to the Cavalry flags, but their attack was averted, and the Cavalry carrying the ball to opposite end, the 36th confined play to the Lancers' ground, where they scored a subsidiary and at the call of time had a goal. The second chukker was a very busy one. Soon after play was renewed the Lancers, out of a penalty shot, got a subsidiary, and retained the ball in the Cavalry ground, where shortly they scored a goal and equalized, but the Cavalry, forcing the play into the Lancers' ground, scored a minor point. Soon the Lancers by fine play again equalized. Scores: one goal two subsidiaries all. In the third chukker there was fast up and down play. The Lancers were hot on the attack, and they got the ball into the proximinity of the Cavalry flags, and crowned the attack with a goal. After this the Cavalry held the ball in the Lancers' ground, and pressing round hit a goal out of a mêlée.

In the fourth chukker, the keenest excitement prevailed, and this bout opened with very level up and down play with hard hitting and galloping, till the Cavalry by a long shot hit a goal. The same order of play continued till the Cavalry getting the ball into the Lancers' territory, by a concentrated attack, hit a goal, and ere the chukker closed had supplemented their score with a subsidiary. The Cavalry were now one goal one subsidiary ahead, and there were barely six minutes left for play. In the fifth chukker the Lancers brought the ball into play, but it was met, and the Cavalry pressing on hit a goal. From the throw-in, play continued about midfield, till the 26th forced the ball along to the Lancers' end, and shortly by a clear shot hit a goal. The Lancers now assumed the offensive and were hot on the attack in front of the Cavalry flags, when off-side was given against the latter. The free hit accorded to the Lancers was unproductive, and shortly after final time was called, leaving the 26th Cavalry winners by five goals three subsidiaries to two subsidiaries.

(By Special Telegram.)

THE FINAL.

26TH CAVALRY vs. 10TH LANCERS.—The game played on Saturday, 16th instant, began in a depressing drizzle, though there was a big turn out to watch its progress The ground was soon very soft and play gradually got cautious and at times rather slow. It was a very level and well fought game, and the closing score was:—26th Cavalry, 3 goals and 3 subsidiaries; 10th Lancers, 3 goals and 1 subsidiary.

Rowing.

POONA ANNUAL REGATTA.

A REAL good afternoon's racing marked the first day of the above fixture. The grounds of the Royal Connaught Boat Club were looking their best, and the view looking down the river, with Parbutti in the distance, with a slight evening haze hanging over it, would be bad to beat anywhere in India. All the (Poona) world and his wife were there, and the band of the 121st Pioneers gave us a well selected programme. There was a feel in the air which told us of a hot weather not far distant, but a fair breeze got up just before proceedings opened which kept it cool enough, for spectators whatever it may have been for competitors.

The entries were very fair on the whole, though it is to be regretted that only one crew came from outside to compete for the challenge fours. Is not this event with its accompanying trophy worthy the attention of the C. R. C.? The crew that did turn up, however,—from Secunderabad—were real hot stuff. Their stroke, C. P. Rowley, stroked the Oxford boat in 1900, and their No. 3, H. H. Sanderson, a First Trinity man, represented the Sister 'Varsity twice on the Putney to Mortlake course. Add to this that their bow oar, Tudor, rowed in the Radley College boat, and it will be seen that Poona had something to beat. That they failed to do so is nothing to their discredit. They were "beaten but not disgraced," and though outclassed, rowed their race through pluckily and well. The first event, the Junior Sculls, was started a bit before the advertised time, but it was just as well for even so darkness closed down soon after the eights were rowed, and had there been any entries for the Canoe race, it would have been paddled in the dark. Moreover the Junior Sculls did not provide anything very exciting from a spectacular point of view, as the race resulted in a procession headed by Carlisle and followed at a long interval by the other two boats who, finding themselves distanced, wisely did not struggle for second place, but "easied," and finished together quite amicably.

The Secunderabad crew were first afloat for the big race of the day, and drew a round of applause by the workmanlike way they settled down to their stroke. They were shortly followed by the Poona boat, and paddling down to the mile post the two boats took up their stations, Secunderabad having drawn the outer, or Poona side. At first it was difficult to see what was happening, but as they came to the bend it was seen that Secunderabad had assumed a lead and this they held throughout, and gradually drawing away won by two and a half lengths. Four crews turned out for the Mixed Double Sculls, and after a great race Mrs. Fooks' crew scored from Mrs. Mortimer's by a bare half length. Bow of the winning boat was Miss Fooks, the lady who, with Colonel Hale, scored a win at the last regatta after an equally punishing race.

Miss Kemp's crew were unfortunately deprived of any chance they might have had by bow's slide being out of order.

The best race of the day, however, was undoubtedly that between the Sappers and the Doctors for the Regimental eights. The doctors' crew started at a disadvantage in that both stroke and No. 7 had already had a regular gruelling in the challenge fours, in addition to which their gallantry had impelled them to take part in the Mixed Doubles also. Stroke, of the Sappers boat, had also stroked the Poona four, but had wisely stood down during the second event. The doctors drew the Kirkee Station and at once assumed a slight lead which they maintained throughout a regular hammer and tongs race. Up to the quarter mile it was anybody's race, but there the Sappers narrowly avoided fouling their opponents and lost a lot of ground in consequence. They made a plucky effort to recover it however and were only beaten by a short half length, after as close a race as one could wish to see. Details :—

A great race, the Engineers being defeated by a short half length. Time—3mins 51secs.

The second day of the regatta was well up to the level of its predecessor, and the energetic Honorary Secretary is to be congratulated on a thoroughly successful regatta. The attendance was even fuller than on the first day and the lawns of the club were covered with a crowd of smart frocks. This was partly accounted for by the fact that Colonel Aplin and the officers 107th Pioneers were "At Home" and their friends were able to beguile the intervals of racing with strawberries and cream and many and varied drinks, there was subsequently an al fresco dinner at the boat club followed by a dance, to which over a hundred remained. The afternoon's proceedings opened with the Senior Sculls for which there were two competitors, R. H. Sanderson frightened out two of the entrants, but J. K. Spanow pluckily opposed the erstwhile winner of the Colquhoun Sculls. The two boats kept together to the quarter mile, but it was then evident that the old blue was merely playing with his opponent, and could come away when he liked, which he did when opposite the lawn, eventually winning by one and a half lengths. Three crews turned out for the Service Fours, the race providing somewhat of a surprise, as while the 114th Mahrattas were commended for their sporting spirit in making up a crew, the race was popularly supposed to be between the Sappers and the Doctors. After a great race, however, the doctors just landed the verdict from the 114th with the Sappers third. It was a bare half length victory and as was the case in the Regimental Eights on the first day "it was the steerers as did it." The Sappers drew the Kirkee Station, which was all against them on account of the shallow water on that side, the 114th were in the centre and the doctor on the Poona side. The centre boat maintained a slight lead, though steering erratically, until opposite the lawn when the doctors came with a well-timed spurt and beat them on the post by half a length.

The Khalassis' race was the closest thing of the day, in fact it was impossible for anyone but the Judge to separate the first and second boats. The verdict, however, went to the boat on the Poona side, by the margin of a foot.

The biggest surprise of the day was the result of the Oxenham Double Sculls in which Messrs. Graham and Noke looked to have "no earthly" of beating Sanderson and Rowley. Whether the half mile course was not long enough for these five oarsmen, or whatever the cause, the local boat led throughout and won comfortably by three lengths. Two crews turned out for the Scratch Fours, and the race being rowed practically in the dark, the distance was shortened to quarter instead of half mile. Miss Kemp's crew winning somewhat easily by two and a quarter lengths. Details :—

CRICKET IN CALCUTTA.

CALCUTTA C. C. vs. CALEDONIA C. C.—This match in the Eden Gardens resulted in another very hollow victory for the home team, by 246 runs on the first innings. Stewart won the toss, and Guise and Turnbull again put up over 70 for the first Calcutta wicket before the former was run out by his partner when he was thoroughly set. Turnbull reached his half century before being easily caught and bowled, and then came a very long partnership between White and Bartholomew: neither scored at all fast, but Bartholomew's innings was by far the more attractive to watch; both had a fair share of good fortune, but it was very hard lines on White to be caught at the wicket when for the second time quite recently within seven runs of three figures. After these two players had left, the remaining Calcutta batsmen took matters very easily though C. M. Pope and Nicholes made some good hits before the innings was declared with nine wickets down for 351. R. R. Pope not batting. The Caledonians on their turn to bat coming made a very feeble show against the bowling of F. H. Stewart, and were all out in just over an hour for 105 runs, the Calcutta captain taking eight wickets, six clean b wicket for only 29 runs, a good performance on a perfect wicket. Lawrence, Hodges and Elliot alone reached double figures, and only the first-named gave any real trouble, following on, the visitors scored 150 for six wickets, the C.C.C. men taking matters more easily. Durant, who hit out hard at every thing, soon knocked up 54, and Lawrence and Hodges again made useful scores. A word of praise, by the way, is due to Elliot for his steady bowling throughout the long Calcutta innings.

RALLYGUNGE vs. THE SCALLYWAGS.—A good match, the chief feature of which was a first class exhibition by that seasoned cricketer, Mr. H. V. Low, who carried his bat for 126 and thus enabled Ballygunge to win easily by five wickets and many runs. The bowling of Coulthard and Whiteley was destructive and the latter's fielding was brilliant; both men batted well too. Sergt. Wilkinson did best with the bat for the Scallywags with a well knocked up 40. Score :—

Football.

MURRAY FOOTBALL TOURNAMENT.

SECOND ROUND.

ON Thursday, the 14th instant at Lucknow, two games were played off in the second round of the Murray Football Tournament. The soldiers of the garrison turned out in force to witness the games, while a number of officers and ladies were also present.

Chief interest centred in the meeting between the Durham Light Infantry and the Royal Dragoons, on the ground of the former, and the game was splendidly contested throughout. Play was level for the first twenty minutes, when the Royal's goal was successfully invaded. Their goal-keeper left his post in order to save, when Surtees, the Durhams' centre forward, sent the ball into the net, scoring the first and only goal of the match. The arrival of half-time saw the Durhams still on the offensive, but after the interval the Royals got away several times and the Durhams goal was often in imminent danger. The ball was in midground when the whistle sounded for the final call of time. The Durhams, who had the best of the play towards the close, gained a well deserved victory by one goal to love. Teams :—

DURHAM LIGHT INFANTRY :—Winterfield, (goal ;) McCoy and Varvil, (backs) ; Blue, Mutson and Boyle (half-backs) ; Surtees, Burrows, Wilson, Dolan and Berry, (forwards).

ROYAL DRAGOONS :—Page, (goal) ; Halliwell and Elder, (backs) ; Corpl. Jaffreys, Ptes. Moss and Seaton, (half-backs ;) Messrs. Holt, Styles, Moore, Corpl. Pitkin and Duchworth, (forwards).

Referee : Pte. Madeley, Oxfords

The second game, which took place simultaneously on the Oxford Light Infantry ground, was between "O" Battery, R.H.A. and the Somerset Light Infantry, who had defeated the Bedfords a week previously in the first round of the Tournament. But for the opening five minutes, when "O" Battery were having decidedly the best of play, the Somersets held the advantage almost throughout, the pretty, combined passing of their forwards being a feature of the game. There was no scoring in the first half, but five minutes after the re-start, Sergt-Chambers made the first goal for the Somersets. The Cawnpore regiment scored again ten minutes later, from a melee in front of "O" Battery's goal, and from this stage onwards their victory was a foregone conclusion. No further addition wasmade to the score, and the Somerset Light Infantry defeated "O" Battery, R.H.G. by two goals to love. Teams :—

SOMERSET LIGHT INFANTRY —Sergt. Hinton, (goal) ; Sergt. Hellin and Pte. Mundy, (backs) ; Pte. Bishop, Sergt. Tadd and Pte. Coles, (half-backs) ; Ptes. Dorrill and Norman, Sergt Giggins and Chambers, and Pte. Millard, (forwards).

"O" BATTERY, R.H.A.—Sheffield, (goal) ; Hastings and Smith, (backs) ; Davison, Martin and Taylor, (half-backs) ; Townsend, Roberts, King, Allen and Bale, (forwards).

Referee : Sergt. Muddle, Oxfords.

TOLLYGUNGE CLUB.

This Club's annual medal play competition for the Club Scratch Silver Challenge Bowl with which was coupled a Handicap competition under medal rules, took place at Tollygunge this week end, and attracted over fifty entries. The course was in excellent order, though the putting greens were naturally very fast, and the scoring was on the whole fairly level, though hardly so good as might have been expected. Mr. Stapleton, a previous prize winner on these links, proved easily successful in both events, and is to be congratulated on his good round of 83, which is handicap of three strokes reduced to 80 nett. Mr. E. H. Townend, with 84 scratch, came in second, and Major Wolfe Murray was third for the scratch prize. A gratifying feature was the improvement in the number of returns made, in response to the appeal of the Handicapping Committee. Scores :—

Hockey.

PUNJAB NATIVE ARMY HOCKEY TOURNAMENT.

36TH SIKHS vs. 23RD PIONEERS.—This match, which resulted in a pointless draw on Saturday, was replayed on Monday morning on the 38th Dogras' ground—the other grounds being too wet for play. At the very outset of the game the 23rd made a rush and Ricketts shot a goal. The 36th replied to this with a most determined attack and nearly scored twice. The ball was cleared eventually to the other end of the ground, and the 36th goalkeeper making a bad mistake let in Croslegh who shot the second goal for the 23rd. The 36th now began to press very hard, and from a penalty bully in the mouth of the goal Wilson-Johnston scored a goal. From this period up to half-time the 36th were all round the 23rd goal line but no further score was obtained. On resuming the 23rd began at once to press and looked very dangerous for some time. The 36th backs were tried very hard, but at length got the ball away and from a melée in front of the 23rd goal Wilson-Johnston scored with an excellent shot Both sides now played with the utmost vigour and attacked in turn. Just before the call of time the 23rd had bad luck in losing Ricketts, who received a blow in the face and had to retire. Extra time had to be played. The 36th playing with great vigour attacked the 23rd goal time after time, and Wilson-Johnston on one occasion netted the ball, but was penalized for "sticks." They continued the pressure up to the call of time. However, nothing further was scored and again the game resulted in a draw. The match was replayed on the 13th instant. For the first 15 minutes the ball was continually in the 23rd quarters, the backs and goalkeeper having to do their best to keep the ball away. The 36th all bat scored on two occasions and forced corners from which nothing resulted. After this the game became more even, nothing of importance happening for some time. The 23rd, however, then began to assert themselves and their forwards combining well got the ball down to the circle, and from some rather scrambly play in front of goal their inside left jumped in and shot a goal. On starting after half-time play was fairly even being characterised by roughness. The 36th worked down to the circle and from a scrimmage equalised. The 36th goalkeeper committed a bad error but from the resulting corner nothing occurred. The 23rd then took charge, and pressing hard had bad luck in not scoring, the 36th goalkeeper making amends for his previous mistake. Time was called with the scores equal. On resuming for the extra period the 36th had a free hit near their opponents' goal line and Wilson-Johnston cleverly glanced the ball into the net. Nothing more occurred and the 36th were left winners by 2—1. There was much hard hitting and roughness, and little skill, but both teams put their hearts into the game.

30TH PUNJABIS vs. 40TH PATHANS.—Played on the 13th instant. At the start of the game the 30th pressed, but shortly the game became more open and the ball travelled up and down the ground by good combined play of the forwards on both sides. The 40th backs were playing a particularly good game, and their forwards by a good rush scored their first point by means of their outside left. Shortly after the bully Moss for the 30th made a good run but failed to score. Good combined play on both sides ensued, the 30th having perhaps the best of it. Macpherson for the 40th relieved with a good run, and shortly afterwards his forwards enabled him to put the ball into the net. The 30th then got off and carrying the ball down to the 40th circle Moss put the ball through, the point being disallowed for offside. Half-time. On resuming the 30th got straight into the 40th circle but Webster failed to score. The 40th responded and from a mêlée in front of the 30th goal Macpherson scored their third point. The 40th continued to them in their opponents up to the call of no sides, but their frequent shots went wide. The 40th are a wonderfully improved side, their forward combine well and are quick, while their backs are sure. The 30th forwards were straggly and their backs uncertain. Macpherson for the 40th played an excellent game.

15TH SIKHS vs. 34TH PIONEERS.—Played on the 13th instant on 38th Dogras' ground. The 15th pressed from the start and their forwards by a good run got to the circle, the shot was stopped by the goalkeeper who was unable to clear, and the ball was put into the net a few minutes after the commencement of play. The 34th then took their share of play and each goal was visited in turn, both sides conceding corners which were fruitless. Give and take play continued, the 15th on one occasion shooting over the 34th goal. After half-time the 34th pressed for a short time, but the 15th returned to the attack and succeeded in scoring their second goal. Immediately after the ensuing bully they got away again and from a mêlée in front of goal added yet another point. After this the 15th pressed nearly continually, the 34th getting away on but few occasions, the game ending in a victory for the 15th by 3—0. There was much hard hitting on both sides and "sticks" were frequent. The 15th are strong behind and their forwards are fast and combine well, but their outsides are almost invariably offside. Muir at half played an excellent game. The 34th passed inaccurately, thus spoiling all their runs. The semi-finals, i.e., 15th vs. 40th and 14th vs. 36th will be played at 4 P.M., 14th instant.

The final will be decided at 4 P.M., Saturday.

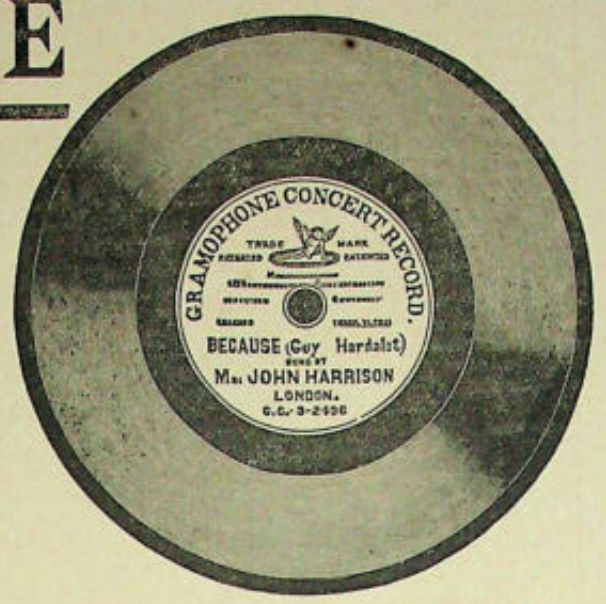
14TH SIKHS vs. DEPOT 47TH SIKHS.—Played at 4 P.M., 12th instant. The ground was still suffering from yesterday's downpour and the surface in parts was slippery, but considering all things was in fair condition. Play for the first fifteen minutes was rather slow, the men not getting a good foothold ; then the 14th got the upper hand and the 47th custodian was called upon more than once to save his charge. Twenty minutes from the commencement Channer for the 14th got away and Pennington from the pass scored a rather lucky goal, the ball rising slowly and dropping just underneath the bar. This woke the 47th up and they made several determined rushes but failed to equalise up to half time. On resuming play both sides attacked in turn, the 14th left wing and the 47th right wing being most conspicuous ; eventually from a corner well stopped and placed by Browne the 47th scored from a very hot shot. The 47th then pressed very strongly, several quick shots just missing the goal ; then Channer got away but was fouled in the circle, nothing resulting from the bully—up and down play followed till Browne got away and after a good run put in a hot shot from an acute angle, the ball hitting the upright and going out. Shortly afterwards the whistle blew for time with the score at one goal all After the usual five minutes the extra ten minutes each way commenced. One of the 47th backs made his one and only mistake and let in Channer who put the 14th ahead with a good shot. The 47th tried hard to equalise and just before time almost succeeded, the 14th thus winning a very good game by two goals to one. Both teams were well trained, and in comparison with the ordinary game the whistle was but little heard. Channer and Pennington for the 14th were the two who won the game for their side, while for the 47th all the little men played with great heart and thoroughly earned the sympathy and applause which was freely accorded to them by the onlookers. When the 47th Sikhs return from China it will need a very strong side to hold them.

SEMI-FINALS

14TH SIKHS vs. 36TH SIKHS.—Played on the 14th instant. Rain fell incessantly during the game and the player found some difficulty in keeping their feet. At the start Wilson-Johnston made a good run but from the place he had to take his shot it was impossible to score and a fruitless corner resulted. The 36th continued to press, but the game was constantly interrupted for fouls and sticks. The 14th then transferred to the other end and from a corner put in a hot shot which was well saved by the 36th goalkeeper. The 14th continued to attack strongly and only the good play of the 36th back averted a goal. Eventually after several shots at goal had been made, Pennington scored. Within 20 seconds of time the outside left scored a second point for the 14th with a very fine shot. On resuming the 14th pressed continually, the 36th backs having to resort to hitting out—Channer and Pennington for the 14th were playing very well together at this time, but the shooting was erratic, though one effort by the inside right deserved success. The 14th never let go their advantage and their outside left notched their third point. The refereeing in this game was strict and the whistle was continually in evidence. The coolest and best player on the ground was Bishan Singh, one of the 36th backs. The 14th meet the 15th Sikhs in the finals on Saturday and a good game may be expected.

15TH SIKHS vs. 40TH PATHANS.—Played on the 4th instant. The ground was slow owing to the rain in the morning but this seemed to have but little effect on the players who showed great dash all through. The 40th Pathans, though they lost the game in the last minute, played in much the best style, and once they got away went at full speed keeping the ball well under control ; their halves also were good but their backs failed them. The 15th on the contrary were strong in defence but their forwards lacked combination, and trusted more to the hit and rush style than to science. At the start the 40th got away and forced a corner which was saved by the 15th goalkeeper. The game was very even for some time till Macpherson, the centre forward of the 40th, made an excellent run, but on arriving inside the circle hit the ball extremely hard against the goalkeeper's pads who cleared. Half-time was called shortly afterwards. On resuming Macpherson again got away but his shot was cleared, the 40th, however, continued to attack and some good passing among the forwards resulted in their scoring a goal with a high shot. The 15th then warmed up and were unlucky in not scoring, but they stuck to it and their inside left equalised. Play was now very keen, Macmullen made a good run and pass into the centre, but his forwards failed to accept it. The 40th then pressed, but owing to the heavy ground failed to get in any hot shots though they had many opportunities. The 15th made a great effort just before time, and a good centre was improved upon with just 30 seconds to spare. Nothing more occurred, and the whistle was blown leaving the 15th rather lucky winners by 2—1.

"No," said Mrs. O'Riley, "I don't like my daughter having incandescent meetings with young men."



Could she have meant clendestine ?

Waitress: "You needn't make such a fuss about a fly in your tea."

Customer: "But there are two. I object to mixed bathing in my cup."

THE GRAMOPHONE CO.

GENTLEMEN,

The Gramophone of to-day I find is such an improved instrument for recording the human voice to the older machines with which so many of us are familiar, that my hitherto objection to allow the thousands who cannot hear me sing personally to listen to the reproduction of my voice through the instrumentality of your Gramophone is now quite removed, and the Records which you have lately made for me I think are natural reproductions of my voice.

Yours truly,

UNITED CLUB, HOWRAH.

THIS Club held its annual sports meeting on the Howrah maidan last Saturday, the 16th instant, and, from all accounts, a fair measure of success attended the efforts of the executive. We were not represented at the meeting, the Honorary Secretary having unkindly overlooked us in respect of the usual invitation to be present—an omission we feel keenly in view of the times gone by when it was our privilege to actively assist at these gathrings. Tempora mutantur dubbless. However, though we were not there we are able to give the names of the winners which we believe to be as follows :—

A SKITTLE GYMKHANA IN BANGALORE.

BANGALORE, 15th February.

ONE hundred and thirty-four entries! That was the total in a Skittle Gymkhana that took place at Bangalore on the 14th instant, and whilst it easily beats our own "best on record," I think it would take some beating in any Indian Station Society. Mr A. G. Gwyer, of the Carabiniers, who has been filling an acting appointment here since his regiment left for Mhow, but who—alas! will have to follow them in a few days, have fairly made things hum during his tenure of office as Gymkhana Secretary. Moreover our new cavalry corps, the 14th (King's) Hussars have now been with us long enough for more than an initial acquaintance, and they have made it very clear that if they can assist sport in any way they will do so. Going back to our muttons, attention must be drawn to our riding ladies. Only about seven or eight were competing on Thursday last, but we have at least a dozen fair equestriennes at present in Bangalore who could hold their own any where. The names of Mrs. Heycock, Mrs. Bertholomew, Mr. Wortabet, Miss Mouat-Biggs, Miss Goodricks Mrs. Muspratt, Mrs. Stephen, Mrs. Loveson Goucen, Mrs. Pinkney, Mrs. Forster and Mrs. Grant occur to one at once and there are several other good lady riders. As to the entries and conditions on Thursday last, they must be cut very short, for fear of occupying too much of your space. Put briefly, they are as follows :—

POSTILLION RACE.

Capt. G. B. N. Foster, (Mounted Infantry School) ... 1
M. W. H. P. Hill (Royal Fusiliers) 2
Ten competed.

AFFINITY LLOYD-LINSDAY COMPETITION.

Mrs. Heycock and Major Hayes 1
Miss Mouat-Biggs and Major Ticknell 2
Four pairs competed.

BENDING COMPETITION.

Mr. Gwyer's Tam Ring (Mr. Hill) 1
Mr. Hill's Firefly (Capt. Palmer) 2
No less than 26 ponies competed.

Mr. Hill's Greyler, ridden by Captain Joicey, came in second, but unfortunately knocked down a flag and was disqualified.

V. C. RACE (Barebacked.)

Mr. W. P. Hill (Royal Fusiliers) 1
Six competed.

THE ROPER'S STAKES.

Mr. Belgrave 14th (King's) Hussarsars 1
Mr. Mason 2

Thirty-one competed, and the conditions of the event, in which the third competition to arrive was adjudged the winner, naturally caused much amusement.

POLO BALL RACE.

Mr. Hill (Royal Fusiliers) 1
Mr. Astley (14th Hussars) 2

Nineteen competed.

THE MILLINER'S STAKES.

Mrs. Leveson-Gower and Mr. Hodgson 1
Mrs. Forster and Capt. Forster 2

Seven pairs entered, and the differently coloured ribbons presented a terrible puzzle to the mere man. It was an astonishing fact that a bachelor should have assisted in winning a competition of this description.

CHATTY RACE.

Mr. Maydwell (Gordon's Horse) 1
Capt. G. P. N. Foster (Mounted Infantry School) ... 2

Nineteen competed, and the safe convoy of the chatties was increased in difficulty by the fact that those who broke their chatties furiously pursued those whose burdens were still intact. Amidst great merriment Mr. Maydwell woon. Mrs. Stuart-Fraser presented the prizes and a record Skittle Gymkhana ended.

THE Lucknow Horse Show, held in the Martinière Park to-day, was a most successful affair. It was attended by a fashionable gathering, which included Sir John Hewett, General Sir E. and Lady Locke-Elliot, Sir Ralph and Lady Gore and Colonel and Mrs. De Lisle. The number of entries for the various events was a record one. Some very good jumping was seen, also some good driving in the Ladies' Turnouts. Lady Elliot won in class for Ladies' Hacks. The Story Teller.

A BIT "PREVIOUS."

PROBABLY nine people out of ten when they discuss young Mr. Pinkerton's Turf career, will be most hard upon him in regard to that affair of the Stewards' Cup at Goodwood. How just they are in coming to that conclusion this story will tell. Young Mr. Pinkerton was not a popular man with any sort or description of Turf society. Where he began to get together his stud it was said that he had made a huge fortune first by keeping a bucket shop, and then by promoting companies, but the majority of racing men were not any the worse disposed to him on that account. It has before happened that the shadiest of financial geniuses have been particularly straight as racing men—probably because in the City they have found a more profitable field for their predatory qualities. Young Pinkerton's rascality in the City had not really been, quite as successful as it was reported to have been, and instead of going on the Turf as people believed, with the object of making fashionable friends, and advertising himself, his main object happened to be to make money. Of course when the people who had crowded round him found this out—as some did to their cost—they could not say enough against him. As a matter of fact he probably had the distorted ambition to be thought, and to be, a very clever man on the Turf, and though he was pushing and vulgar, this wish was stronger than any of his social ambitions. Certainly any one who wanted to get on in society would not have made an enemy of that most popular of men, Sir Peregrine Langley. That genial, though not very affluent baronet, has one weakness. He would be friendly with his Satanic Majesty if he thought that potentate could give him any information about a race. That year at Ascot Mr. Pinkerton had two horses in the Stakes, and he advised Sir Peregrine to back the one with which he did not win. He probably got a longer starting price against the winner by doing this, for it is not only a question of the modest "pony" which Sir Peregrine puts on for himself, there are his numerous pals, some of whom bet very heavily, whom he usually tells about a good thing.

Sir Peregrine after the race declared that sooner or later he would be even with the ingenious Mr. Pinkerton, and those who knew him best believed that he would be as good as his word. The Goodwood after this occurred, Sir Peregrine was staying for the week with his old friend and ally, Major Baxter. Sir Peregrine is a Sussex man, but his place is let, and for Goodwood he generally stops with the Major, whose training establishment is near his old home. That year the Major had a horse in the Stewards' Cup which he and Sir Peregrine fancied. The Stewards' is a race which Major Baxter has always shown a fondness for. There is a generally received idea that when he means business in it he is especially hard to beat. That year he had one of his good things, and as it happened that there was a better market than usual, he had backed the horse Monopole for a good stake the week before. On second thoughts the Major and Sir Peregrine, who generally stood in with his friend, were inclined to believe that there was one horse that could bet them, namely, Mr. Pinkerton's Lame Duck. This, however, was rather doubtful, for the public had backed that horse, and rushed him up to a very short price before Mr. Pinkerton had got his money on. The Major and Sir Peregrine were sitting over their wine the night before the race talking over their chances of pulling it off, when the servant announced that a person who gave his name as Sam Perkins wanted to see Major Baxter.

"Who is Perkins?" said the Major.

"Well, he is a tout and something more," answered Sir Peregrine, "for he is as good at watching men as horses, and he is wondefully clever at finding out any thing. I did him a good turn once, and I don't think he has forgotten it."

"No, I daresay he is broke and come to get you to do him another," replied the Major.

Mr. Perkins was an unremarkable looking little man, until one caught his eye, which was a very searching one.

"Good evening, gentlemen," he said. "I took the liberty of calling because I've learnt something that might interest both of you gentlemen."

Sir Peregrine smiled encouragingly at the little man, and the Major took a good look at him, and summed him up as "anyhow, no fool."

"Well, Sir Peregrine," said Perkins, "I was at the station when I caught sight of Mr. Pinkerton. He wanted to see the station master, and I guessed it was something particular for he went into his private room. Now I happened to have noticed that the window of the station master's room was open, and being of an inquiring turn of mind about some people, I just stepped along the platform, and heard what they were saying. Of course what they said might not have been interesting, but it happens that it was. Mr. Pinkerton had arranged for a horse-box to be ready by the 12-40 train to-morrow. The 12-40 is an express, and don't stop for another twenty miles, but it could slip the horse-box at Blankley Station, and Mr. Pinkerton arranged that it should do this; only it was very particular that no one should know anything about what was to be done."

"Well," said Sir Peregrine, as the little man came to a stop, "and what does that come to?"

"Don't you put two and two together, Sir Peregrine? You see, Mr. Pinkerton has his horses near here, and don't you see what he means to do? Why, to-morrow he sends Lame Duck home. Leastwise, the horse is seen sent down to the station, and boxed, and taken off by the train. That will make the bookies on the course bet against him for the Stewards' Cup. Then Mr. Clever and Co. get their money on. Then the horse comes round from Blankley, where the horse-box has been stopped, and runs all right. It ain't a very new dodge; I've known it done in the old days more than once."

"The cheek of the young rascal's trying a game like that at Goodwood," said Major Baxter, "but it might give us a chance of backing Lame Duck."

"Not for a penny," exclaimed Sir Peregrine, who had been staring intently at the rings he had been making with his cigarette smoke. "Lame Duck won't win or start, I believe," and then, with the explanation that he was going to Blankley Station to make some more inquiries, he left the room.

It is needles to say that the news—that the favourite for the Stewards' Cup, Lame Duck, had been taken to the railway station and sent off home—created some sensation. The bookmakers, however, were half suspicious, and Lame Duck's price only went down to about 10 to 1. At that price it seemed that there was some one willing to back the horse.

Mr. Pinkerton had not even had the good taste to scratch his horse, to give the public warning that he was not going to run. Several people of some position on the Turf, who had never before spoken to him were very anxious to give him a piece of their minds. Mr. Pinkerton, however, was nowhere to be seen, and the general opinion was that he dare not face the public indignation that his conduct had caused. The backers of Lame Duck, however, would have been somewhat reassured if they had known that the horse was being backed for his owner for all that could be got on at long odds, and that worthy gentleman was waiting at a station—which we will call Blankley—for the horse box that would contain the noble animal whose destinies on the Turf he controlled. Presently a train dashed through the station, but he did not stop, or unslip the horse-box. Mr. Pinkerton was inclined to feel nervous, but he looked at the station master, to whom he had spoken about the horse-box, and noticed that he showed no signs of anything being wrong. Presently he went up to him quietly, for their were several people about and asked if the train that had passed was not the one that ought to have left his horse-box.

"Well, sir," answered the official, "it seems it wasn't the one, 'cause you see it didn't."

"Can you telegraph and find out?"

"Don't see how I can telegraph to the train," was the answer.

"No, but to the station, to see if the horse was sent off," said Pinkerton, getting more and more angry. Man alive, look sharp. The horse has to run in the Stewards' Cup to-day."

"Then I don't see what you want humbugging him about on the railway," said the station master, but he went off and sent some telegraphic message to the next station. The answer seemed a long time coming, in fact half an hour passed, and it was within an hour and a half of the race when the man drawled out, "That horse of yours was on the train that passed. The guard has probably made a mistake between Blankley and Blankby, a station of the line. It ain't likely that he'd understand your sending a horse a journey by rail for nothing." Then Mr. Pinkerton's fury broke out and he cursed and swore, and wanted to know how the horse could be got back, threatening all sorts of legal proceedings if the horse d d not appear in time.

"You will have to do what you like about that, but there ain't no means, as I knows on, for getting the horse back here before half-past four at the earliest."

Mr. Pinkerton wasted another five minutes in threatening, storming, and cursing, and then he sent off a telegram to a friend on the course who was backing Lame Duck for him.

He found out afterwards that if he had sent the telegram five minutes sooner, instead of swearing at the station master, he would have saved some £500, which his friend had put on Lame Duck for him.

As a matter of fact he never brought his action against the company, and he accepted all the opprobrium of the Stewards' Cup business, rather than let the world know that he had been hoisted with his own petard.

Monopole won, and Sir Peregrine and Major Baxter had a very good race of it. Sir Peregrine believes that they owed their good fortune to an interview he had had with the station master at Blankby, whom he had known as a boy. Certainly the latter and the guard of the train, which failed to set down Lame Duck, divided a hundred pounds between them.

OTT'S VICTORIA CIRCUS.

ONCE again this clever and amusing troupe of entertainers is in Calcutta with that excellent horseman and successful ring-master Mr. Emil Ott, as usual, at the head of affairs. They have pitched their tent rather late in a season that has been somewhat overcrowded with divertissement, and with the koel, that raucous harbinger of the hot weather shricking among the new foliage on the maidan it may be that our thoughts turn rather towards the punkah than the arena; yet one is glad to see good houses at Ott's, for the present Company puts on an all round good show. Mr. Ott's contributions to the bill are of sterling merit; his haut ecole turns, jumping acts, and the trained horses and ponies he introduces are naturally popular, for we seldom see as good out here. There is a capable clown named Adolf, though he is rather prone to reiteration, and in Miss Bella and Mrs. Dicky we have two first class acrobats whose work exhibits marked improvement on what they put before us last year. The entertainment is rather strong in dancing, the Carollis, the Bells and the Cake Walkers all acquit themselves well, and though the "light fantastic" items are not usually expected to be found particularly prominent in a Circus bill of fare, yet they are both pleasing and novel and as such acceptable to the majority we believe. Mdlle. Walbourge we saw last time Ott's were here; she and her equine companions play quite as strong a hand as before and treat us to many graceful and admirable feats. As this fair equestrienne has a nice way with a horse, quite apart from her ability as a horsewoman, the result is usually presented to us in a way that is charming. The performing lions are good, though we do not consider the show in this respect equal to what we saw before. Mr. Schultez, the "looper," makes a bigger bid for popularity than he did on the occasion of his first appearance here. He now loops an open loop, eighteen feet of the top of the loop being unboarded, so that he takes a jump while actually upside down and landing on the down grade rushes to the end of the risky ride, the whole being carried out in full view of the audience—and uncommonly well he does it. On Saturday the management announce a matinee.

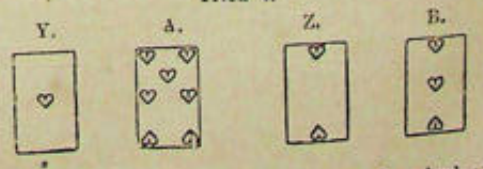
Solution to Problem No. 23.

A and B have to win three out of the last four tricks to save the game. Z is marked with the knave, 7 of diamonds, and probably holds the ace and another in clubs. A cannot afford to discard a diamond, or Z will lead a third round making his knave good. If he discards his two small clubs, on the other hand, and keeps his king and queen, Z will most likely continue with his ace and remaining club, and A will be forced to lead up to him in diamonds. He should, therefore, discard the 3 and queen of clubs, keeping the king and 4. Then, if Z goes on with the ace, he throws his king under it, trusting to B for the knave. This is practically his only chance of saving the game, unless B holds the ace of clubs, in which case A's discard of the queen can do no harm.

Problem No. 24.

A and B are partners against Y and Z. Score: A and B, 24; Y and Z, love; in the last game. Z deals and leaves it to Y, who makes no-trumps. Y's and Z's hands are as follows :—

Y's Hand (Dummy).



Hearts: Ace.
Diamonds: Queen, knave, 3.
Spades: 5, 4.
Clubs: Ace, king, 10, 9, 6, 3, 2.

Z's Hand (Dealer).

Hearts: King, 6, 2.
Dimonds: 8, 5, 4, 2.
Clubs: 8, 4.
Spades: Ace, queen knave, 2.

The first trick is as follows :—

THE COUNTY CRICKET QUALIFICATION.

THE "county qualification" has been a fruitful source of argument and difficulty, we might say ever since county cricket has been played. The question as to what constituted a player eligible to play for his county was first taken in hand so far back as some 1873 when representatives from Surrey, Middlesex, Kent, Sussex, Gloucestershire, Yorkshire and Notts met in the Oval pavilion and drew up a brief and simple code of laws, which at their request were adopted by the M. C. C. The spirit of these rules was sufficiently clear: they provided (1) That no cricketer should play for more than one county during the same season; (2) that every cricketer born in one county and residing in another should be free to choose at the commencement of each season for which of the counties he would play; (3) that a cricketer should be qualified to play for any county in which he was residing and had resided for two years: or he might elect to play for the county in which his family home was situate so long as it remained open to him as an occasional residence; and (4) that any question as to residential qualification should be left to the Committee of the M. C. C.

These rules covered the ground and made the way of the county cricketer whether amateur or professional plain, so long as their spirit was obeyed. There was no getting round, or through, clause 1 and the meaning of clause 2 was sufficiently obvious. "Residence" in ordinary language can only mean the place where a person lives, and it was taken for granted that cricketers would accept the ordinary meaning of the word. The spirit in which the rules of 1873 is well shown by the proviso that recognised family ties to a county, it was entirely in accordance with the spirit of county cricket as then accepted that a member of a family, who had left the paternal dwelling to seek his livelihood in some profession or calling in London or elsewhere, should still be regarded as a county man and as such eligible to play for his county provided he still maintained such communication with his relatives as most sons do maintain. It was a liberal rule; and Rule 2 left the player free to continue playing for his own county if he pleased even after he married and settled down in another county establishing new ties to the soil. In a word these rules recognised the claims of the county upon a county family, or if the reverse be preferred, the claim of members of a county family to play for their own shire: it did something to establish the intimate connection between the upper middle class and the national game. With increasing competition between counties, however, the spirit of the residential rule began to be ignored: endeavours were made to find means of evading it while complying with the letter. We need not mention names in this connection; but it is a matter of common knowledge that certain players of greater or less prominence led the way through the rule by taking a lodging, seldom if ever occupied, in a county town or village, and basing their claim on possession of that pied a terre, made good their right to play for a county with which they had no other connection. It may have been good common law but it was not good cricket law. The practice increased until it became recognised, and the Rule was rendered nugatory : it became a farce.

We are notoriously slow to amend the rules of any sport or game and it was not until December 1898 that a meeting of county representatives met at Lords and after discussion resolved to leave the rules of County Cricket to the M. C. C., which had offered to form a committee to deal with them. We say "them" though the only rule which required recasting was that relative to residential qualification. The new rules as to residential qualification were adopted after prolonged deliberation and were eventually framed to come into force in the season of 1900. Under these rules (which remained unquestioned until the meeting held on 16th December last) the residential qualifications were made much more drastic. As they now stand the mere acquisition of hering of a tenement, unless used as a bonâ fide home : the use of such tenement during the cricket season only does not constitute residence. These definitions of residence are clear enough, but the new rules went farther. If the holder of residential qualification leave the country for the winter months his title to play for his county becomes impaired and he must prove it to the satisfaction of the M. C. C. Five consecutive years' play for a county constitutes qualification for life, and two years' residence—genuine residence—is necessary for qualification : little enough unless indeed the player produce proof that he has bonâ fide established a tie with the county by the purchase or long lease of property therein, or by engagement in professon or business of a permanent character. The flow of cricketers from the Colonies to the old country, which has been a feature of recent years, has compelled the revision of the county qualification rules to meet their case ; and this was the principal business transacted at the meeting of 16th December to which we have made passing reference. The question was what period of residence in a county should be required of a Colonial cricketer? Essex proposed five years. Kent at its own meeting held a week before approved four years, but at the meeting at Lords merely proposed "that the time for qualification be extended for the man who comes to this country for the purpose of making a livelihood out of cricket." Surrey moved that the term proposed by Essex should not apply to a player who had already taken up his residence with the object of qualifying under the two years' rule. There was a strong minority in favor of extending the period of residence in the case of Colonial players, seven representatives approving and eight opposing : by a majority of one therefore the Colonial players—the rule practically applies to professionals—only are placed on the same footing as home players. We think this is as it should be : no sound reason can be urged for penalising the Colonial born cricketer who elects to take up his quarters in the old country : and it is quite out of harmony with imperial ideas, which should prevail in the cricket and football worlds quite as strongly as in others, if not more strongly, to place a British subject who hails from Australia or South Africa on a footing different from that accorded the home bred man. It is also politic to make the qualification rules impartial : for home bred players going to take up their residence in the Colonies might otherwise find themselves debarred from participation in the game by rules framed in a spirit of retaliation.

THE BENGAL PRESIDENCY ATHLETIC SPORTS.

WITH two exceptions the entries for all the events on this year's programme are good, the exceptions being in the high jump and shot items. The amateur competitions should be interesting especially as several men are coming from up-country to try conclusions with our local athletes. As usual the British Army Championships have attracted big entries ; among the regiments represented are the Wiltshires, Umballa ; the Cheshires, Bangalore ; the Cameronians, Meerut ; the Dorsets, Wellington ; the 15th Hussars, Muttra ; King's Royal Rifles, Jubbulpur ; Middlesex, Regiment, Lebong ; Highland Light Infantry, Dum-Dum ; S. Staffordshires, Allahabad ; Royal Dragoons, Lucknow ; the Gunners from Bombay and Barrackpore ; the King's Liverpool Regiment, Nasirabad ; the Devons, Rangoon, and others. In the Native Army Championships there are the 91st Punjabis from Bhamo ; those popular sprinters from the 27th L. C., Jubbulpore ; the 93rd Burmans, Mandalay ; the 13th Rajputs, Alipur ; the 17th N. I., Barrackpore, who are all known to Calcutta sportsmen. The schools are represented at full strength.

Her Excellency Lady Minto has graciously consented to present the prizes ; and H. E. the Commander-in-Chief has signified his intention of being present. The Colonel and officers of the Northumberland Fusiliers have kindly lent their fine band for the occasion and a strong picket to keep the ground. Messrs. G. F. Kellner and Company will cater at an inclusive charge of one rupee a head as at the races. In all other respects the arrangements will be the same as in other years. The prizes, Challenge Shields and medals, a handsome collection, are on view in the show room of Messrs. Walter Locke and Company, Limited. The preliminary heats will be run off to-morrow afternoon beginning at 4 o'clock.

THE HEAVY-WEIGHT CHAMPIONSHIP.

LONDON, Tuesday, 26th February 1907.

THE fight between Gunner Moir (London) and J. Smith (Merthyr Tydvill) erstwhile of the 10th Hussars for £500 a side and the purse of £3,550 given by the National Sporting Club took place last evening. It was a hollow affair ; Smith's hurricane tactics and rushes had not the least effect upon the Gunner who made a veritable punching ball of his opponent, hustled him round and round the ring, had him three times on the ropes, never ceased punching him and in the easiest fashion disposed of the "Tiger" inside of three minutes.

Sporting Notes.

IN Calcutta interest in local racing during the last few days was a bad second to that taken in the telegrams from Bombay. The successive victories of Ballark enable us all to point out how clever we were in observing that this horse's best form was yet to be discovered. Here he was not asked to compete in the big open races, merely because his stable was already so strongly represented in that class. As a matter of fact when he met with his railway accident fifteen months or so ago people used to say that he was every bit as good a horse as Mallard. The Handicapper seems to have triumphed in the Byculla Club Cup ; Kipling has had no luck at all this season, his wins notwithstanding ; such a good horse as he has shewn himself to be might very well have won at each and every time of asking. In the Grand National more particularly he was unfortunate in running second. Sermon's success was also to be looked for on his running over here, and his sporting owners have had the good time their courage deserves.

The lucky travellers who can get away to England this week should arrive in nice time for Aintree. The non-appearance of Cinders in the list of acceptances for the Grand National will disappoint those who hope to see this marvellous daughter of Cinder Ellen competing in the great steeplechase. The mare is still young, however, for so bold a venture, and Mr. G. B. Paris may yet see his favourite old mare's offspring rolling home in front over the Aintree course. Ascetic's Silver is, of course, top weight, but the handicapper has astonished most people by allotting him 12-7, thus placing him in the same rank as Cloister and such like mighty chasers.

The alteration of the definition of "Maiden" so blithely passed by a small meeting of the Calcutta Turf Club a few weeks ago seems to have caused some little bitterness in military circles, and no wonder. A correspondent of the Pioneer complains of such changes being made in utter disregard to the interests of up-country racing, and points out that under existing conditions it is quite impossible for any authoritative representation to be made to the Stewards of the C. T. C., in cases of this kind on behalf of the small military owner. The only persons who could make their voices heard would be the Stewards of the few up-country meetings that still struggle against an adverse fate. Unfortunately nowadays it seems to be the fashion to head race programmes with lists of ex-officio Stewards ; Generals, Officers Commanding, and what not ; with a racing man as Honorary Secretary to do all the work. The said ex-officio Stewards probably know little about the value of maidens in horseflesh, and certainly care less.

The Calcutta Seventh Extra Meeting produced one good finish, owing to a surprising effort by Clodian, most determinedly ridden by Mr Evers. For the rest there were runaway victories one after another the whole afternoon long. Geebung was the first to spreadeagle a field of paperchase ponies, winning by eight lengths ; probably he has at last convinced people that he can gallop a little among this class. Mount Dane, another outsider, beat a big field over a mile and a quarter, the favourite running second, and old Loyal third. The Selling Handicap looked a good thing for St. Michael and he beat everything but Clodian with great ease. His owner refused to part with him, however, and another good horse is still for sale.

For the closed Club Race Downland and Recoil were well backed, but neither had any chance against Mr. Pugh's Manon, who should have been remembered on her running at Tollygunge where she was asked to meet very much better horses. The last two races were won by Baichan, and with Solace he upset a very hot favourite in Mr. Scott's Tightlace, whose supporters had not reckoned with Mr. Field's present run of luck.

On Thursday comes the last Extra of all, after which we shall fold our wings thankfully and watch for the coming of the beautiful Indian summer that is now so close at hand. The two closed races have filled well. Among the Light Horse chargers Fairy looks best; Myrene and Salad Dressing both prefer to race under a very much lighter weight, and although there are said to be one or two fastish horses in the entry, the old chestnut mare will probably find little difficulty in pulling it off.

The Paperchase Cups now afford the chief topic of interest among riding people in Calcutta. The Pony Cup will be won before these lines appear in print, and there seems to promise better competition than was expected a week or so ago. Mistlebird should be favourite, but Pathfinder, after his win last week, will run her very close. Also there will be Josephus, Clarice, Samah, and perhaps Envious, all speedy enough to take advantage of any slip made by the leaders.

For the big Cup the prospects are still better. Taking the heavy weights first, Dr. Forsyth on Corydon will be hard to beat, but still we fancy Mr. Myers on Sir Walter or Mr. Halliday on Ruddigore, who have both shown good form in recent chases. Messrs. Macdonald, Euler and Leggatt will proabbly join in the hunt. Of the light weights Captain Holden and Lord Harry are facile princeps on form, but Mr. Evers and Cain will surely worry them not a little. Besides these there are many possibilities, chief of which is Mr. Deakin and Trilby, and in all the field should muster about fifteen.

Poor "Tiger" Smith! erstwhile the pride of the 10th Hussars, and the relentless smiter of many mediocrities on whom he built up his fistic reputation out here. From ourintimate knowledge of Smith and his methods—and we had a good deal to do with his early appearances in Calcutta as most of our readers are aware—we always predicated that if he ever went home and tried conclusions with the quality he would shape but poorly. He went, and the first man he met was Seaman Kelly, whom he was lucky enough to beat. But this gave us absolutely no line whatever: both were sloggers pure and simple and Smith managed to get there first. Then vaulting ambition led him on to challenge the Champion of England, with what result our special telegram acquaints us! Here he met a scientific giant who, with lumps of weight in hand, put him out in three minutes—there could not well have been any other result unless a miracle had occurred. And we must not forget that Moir is by no means a top-hole man.

The first entries for the Great Northern Spring Meeting are published to-day; second entries close on the 6th proximo.

We believe the Calcutta Light Horse Sports, last Saturday, were very successful. A friend who was there has given us the following statement of results:—

Leading Horses.—Open to sections of four horses. No. 3 will fall in mounted and will lead the three led horses round a flagged course. The section making the fastest time to win. Won by Corporal Morgan, Troopers Dods, Sidey, and Pearson.

Victoria Cross Race.—Competitors fall in mounted and ride over a couple of fences, pick up a dummy, and return over two fences, to the winning post. Sergeant-Major Fogarty first, Trooper Ballantine second.

The Moorghy Race.—Competitors fall in on foot and each man runs to a lady, who will hand him a coloured ribbon, and he runs to a crate containing moorghies, each moorghy having a coloured ribbon tied to it. The competitor arriving at the winning post first with a moorghy matching his ribbon to win. (N. B.—Moorghy to be sound in wind and limb.) Won by Lieutenant Westmacott and Mrs. Dods.

Jumping Competition.—Points will be given for pace, seat, hands and dressing saddles. Won by Sergeant Antram, Corporal Pugh and Trooper Bletsoe second and third respectively.

Geography Race.—Each man falls in mounted, carrying an envelope containing the name of four towns and rides over a fence to a lady, who enters the names of the continents to which the towns belong in the slip, and the man rides back over the fence to the winning post. The first in with the correct answer to win. Won by Mrs. O'Kenealy and Trooper Levetus.

Swimming Competition.—Members fall in mounted on barebacked horses on the west side of the Serpentine Tank and swim their horses across and finish at a flag about 50 yards from the bank. Won by Sergeant Harvey. Trooper Morgan second.

The first week in February saw the conclusion of the shooting for the Grand Prix at Monte Carlo. One hundred and forty-seven competitors entered. The Italians were in great strength, numbering sixty-eight, whilst there were twenty-five Englishmen, twenty-three Frenchmen, and competitors from Belgium, Russia, Spain, America, Austria, Australia, Germany, and other countries. On Wednesday, the concluding day, there was a big crowd and splendid sunshine, and the competitors numbered one hundred and fifty-four. In the fifth round Roberts, H. Grasselli, Trauttmansdorff, Villaviciosa, Schiannini, Journu, Davies, Robinson, Hall, Bradley, Gagliardi, Glioilanda, Moncorge, Lazzara, Urzaiz, Artet, Avial, Interdonato, F. Thellusson, Carter, and Polastoi killed all their birds. In the next round Roberts' bird dropped dead outside the barrier, and Vilvilaciosa, Davies, Gagliardi, Glioilanda, and Moncorge missed their birds, but Grasselli, Trauttmansdorff, Schiannini, Journu, Robinson, Hall, Bradley, Urzaiz, Avial, Interdonato, F. Thellusson, and Carter bagged theirs. In the seventh round Grasselli missed his bird, as did Journu, Carter, Urzaiz, and Avial; Trauttmansdorff, Schiannini, Robinson, Hall, Bradley, Interdonato, and Thellusson killing. In the eighth round only Trauttmansdorff, Hall, Interdonato, and Thellusson killed all. The excitement became intense, Bradley having to deal with an impossible bird; the next to miss was Interdonato, whose ninth bird got away. Mr. Thellusson broke down in the tenth round, when the result was left to Trauttmansdorff and Hall, the former being the first to kill. Both killed their eleventh birds, but Trauttmansdorff missed his twelfth, and Hall, crumpling up his bird, won the Prix amid the plaudits of the company. His victory gives seven in favour of the Englishmen, against six won by Italians. The official announcement of the result was as follows:—Hall first, with 12-12; Roberts and Interdonato dividing second and hird with 14-15; and Trauttmansdorff and Schiannini fourth with 13-15. Mr. Hall, whose victory was an extremely popular one, is a very well known pigeon shot, both here and abroad. He shot with a Woodward gun and used cartridges loaded with Curtis's and Harvey's Smokeless Diamond powder. This powder, by the way, was used by the competitor who took second place in the Grand Prix last year. It is a wonderfully quick powder, and from what we hear gave much satisfaction to sportmen last season.

In accordance with the wish expressed at the last General Meeting of the Ceylon Fishing Club, a consignment of fish ova has been ordered from England, and is due to arrive in Ceylon before the end of the current month. About 20,000 ova, half of which will be of brown trout, and the remainder rainbow trout, will thus arrive there at a season which is considered the most favourable for hatching them out. It will be remembered that the importation of ova by the Fishing Club was discontinued for a long interval, the brown trout ova being the first stopped owing to the very small percentage of results. It was found that the trout were breeding locally, and the Club thus discontinued the regular stocking of the up-country streams, but, latterly, a growing scarcity of fish has been noticed and the Club is taking action to remedy matters. Mr. Herbert Campbell, who has kindly undertaken the work connected with the hatcheries since Mr. H. C. Wilson, the fish expert, went to Madras, says that the present season is the most suitable for the hatching out of the ova, and that there is every reason to hope that good results will be obtained from the expected consignment of ova.

With sorrow we received the news of the death of Mr. Henry K. Beauchamp, late editor of the Madras Mail; the cause is said to have been appendicitis. He retired but a few weeks ago, and died, poor fellow, within a few days of his return to England on retirement from India. For sixteen years he edited the Mail with extreme credit to himself and much benefit to the country; he was a sound and brilliant journalist, a prominent personality in public life in the Madras presidency, a kindly man and a plucky. As a sportsman he will be long remembered, for he was a good oarsman and rider and took an active interest in most outdoor pastimes. Years ago we were connected with his paper in the capacity of Calcutta correspondent and our recollections of those somewhat distant days contain nothing but the kindliest feelings for an appreciative chief and a clever brother journalist with whom it was a pleasure and a privilege to be associated. He will be hard to replace.

WHY DID YOU BUY A PIANO?

Presumably for the music that is in it. But—how much of that music do you and your family get? The average piano gives about one-tenth of the pleasure which, under ideal conditions, it is capable of. In other words you are missing 90 per cent. of the music that you might get from your piano.

Ideal Conditions prevail where there is a NEOLA Player-Piano. It enables everybody to play all kinds of music with equal ease and artistic completeness. It gives you the missing 90 per cent. of enjoyment lying dormant in the ordinary piano.

We will take your dead piano and put a living one in its place, allowing you all that your present Piano is worth in part payment, if necessary.

At the annual meeting of the Indian Polo Association, which commences at Meerut on the 7th March, in addition to the bu-iness already announced, Captain Heseltine, of the Carabiniers, will propose that in future the Hurlingham Rules for Polo be adopted in toto in this country, with two exceptions, viz., the height of ponies and the duration of play. Colonel Macan will propose that at Stations where polo is much played, the Polo secretary should keep a list of those competent and willing to umpire in matches and tournaments ; their names to be sent to the Honorary Secretary, I.P.A., for registration, and that in all important Tournaments Umpires be selected from this list.

C. J. Lee, the Bombay bookmaker, is again in trouble. Since the Key West episode which marked his exit from the betting ring he has been carrying on a starting price business ; his premises were raided by the Bombay police on Friday last and he and his assistants were arrested on a charge of keeping a common gaming house.

Well printed, well arranged, well illustrated and comprehensive are the adjectives which occur to one when perusing Messrs. W. Newman and Co.'s latest general catalogue and we may say that the full detailed index at the end thereof is a useful and noteworthy feature of an altogether first class publication of its kind. Any item of stationery, any particulars re printing, binding, and lithography can be readily found in this smart and up-to-date catalogue.

Our Bangalore correspondent writes :—Eheu fugaces !—especially from the point of view of Bangalore racing. The first day of the February meeting was a complete frost, and it is doubtful whether the authorities would not have been wiser to cancel the meeting. Five races on the card and four of them reduced to matches ! Except during June and July, when there are a lot of outside stables summering here, it would seem that Bangalore has now no use for any racing except that of the Gymkhana variety. There are plenty of local animals, but they are almost all of the charger, hunter or polo pony class, and the few that stand out are not in themselves sufficient to furnish fields. Besides their very presence spoils sport. Owners of polo ponies see one or two of a class which they know to be better than their own entered, and say at once " What is the use of running against a racing pony." Or the said racing pony gets thirteen or fourteen stone clapped on his back and his owner quite naturally says :— " I am not going to break a good pony down for a hundred and fifty rupees."

The second day's racing was a degree better than the first, although it was only a couple of substitution charger races that produced even fair fields. There are few remarks to be made which are worth making and the only extraordinary feature was the running of Ping Pong in the Little Plate. Certainly he was giving three stone to each of his two opponents, but considering their class, one would have expected him to " do it on his head." The time was not good and 4 to 1 was laid on Ping Pong when he went out. The brief account sent you of the racing supplies quite sufficient additional comment.

The skittle polo tournament here has ended in a win for " A " Team (Captain the Hon'ble H. E. Joicey and Major Tickle, D. S. O., 14th [King's] Hussars ; Mr. T. R. Bruce, R. A., and Mr. Naper, R. A.), after a great struggle with " F " Team (Mr. A. G. L. Astley and Mr. H. Maddick, 14th [King's] Hussars, and Captain Muspratt and Mr. H. T. Walker, Gordon's Horse). These two sides each won four matches out of five and consequently a deciding game was necessary. This was played on the morning of the 21st instant, when " A " Team won by 2 goals to a subsidiary. Naper played particularly well for the winners.

That good sportsman and polo player, Lieutenant C. F. Pike of the Royal Dragoons, accidentally shot himself at Lucknow last week and, to the regret of all who knew him, died on Saturday last at the Station Hospital.

The Infantry Polo Tournament was won by the Rifle Brigade team who beat the Seaforths by 4 goals and 3 subsidiaries to 3 goals.

A correspondent of our contemporary "down the street" gives the following details of a brisk little incident in which a Chief Commissioner and an angry elephant played the leading parts :— "Mr. S. M. Fraser, Chief Commissioner of Coorg and Resident in Mysore, met with an adventure in Coorg near the Canara border during his recent tour. Mr. Fraser, accompanied by Mr. Harris, I.C.S., Assistant Commissioner, Mr. McCarthy, Forest Officer, and Mr. Haller, Assistant Director of Agriculture, was riding along a narrow zigzagging path through an almost impenetrable jungle, when he heard an elephant moving parallel with them. Mr. McCarthy rode to the next bend to see if the coast was clear. At the moment Mr. McCarthy turned the bend a tusker came out on to the path above him, without a moment's hesitation gave the usual squeal and charged down the path. Shouting 'ride,' Mr. McCarthy galloped down the path, and, with this flying start, passed Mr. Fraser, who had not got up much pace, not fully realising the danger. The rest of the party disappeared round the next bend. Mr. Fraser turned into an opening in the jungle, only to find it a regular trap of impenetrable growth on all sides. The rogue elephant was within a few yards of the horse's tail. Without an instant's hesitation, throwing an armround a tree while passing, he let the horse gallop from under him, fell to the ground on all fours, flung himself to one side clear of the charging elephant's path and springing to his feet took refuge behind a larger tree some paces away. No sooner did the elephant miss his man than he pulled up, turned round and proceeded slowly to hunt for him. Mr. Fraser in the meantime moved silently round the tree, keeping it between himself and the elephant. Fortunately after some minutes, the elephant moved off and disappeared. Mr. Fraser emerged from his place of concealment, not damaged in any way and as cool as though such hair-breadth escapes were a matter of every day occurrence. The whole party was unarmed."

It is some time since we had the pleasure of drawing attention to the patent "Sandown" fleecy horse bandages, a stable appliance which we consider has superseded all others of a like nature. It is satisfactory to note that the use of these splendid bandages is getting more general ; they are now to be found in many racing and private stables in India, and wherever they have been adopted we believe they have given complete satisfaction. In several cases sportsmen have waxed quite enthusiastic over them and declare they possess all the qualities claimed for them by the makers. As will be seen from their advertisement on page X the "Sandown" bandages are now stocked by several leading firms in India.

Probably a postal irregularity is responsible for the fact that our Bombay correspondent's interesting budget of notes has not come to hand this week.

A chance of picking up some really cheap fox-hounds is offered in Mr. Bazley's advertisement further on.

Athletic Notes.

THE Punjab Native Army Hockey Tournament was won by the 15th Sikhs who beat the 14th Sikhs in the final : this is the third victory of the 15th in this competition.

The Staunton Chess Club has once again blossomed into activity, vide the announcement of an open Tournament to be found among our special advertisements to-day.

The following gem, addressed to the Honorary Secretary by a disappointed entrant for a handicap in the forthcoming Presidency Athletic Sports, is too good to be lost :—

"DEAR SIR,—I have been given to understand that you have given me 3 yards handicap only for 150 yards flat race. If it is so, I do not see there is any use of me running when I stand no chance. I saw yesterday that Saker has got 10 yards handicap wnen he can run faster than me and he beat me in the 220 for the school challenge shield. And may I also mention that Mr. Watts who won the 100 yards in the Howrah sports this year has got 8 yards which I think is unfair. I thank you very much if you will kindly give me the same handicap or at least 8 yards, if not kindly refund my money. Hoping no offence."

By his magnificent innings of 134, which fairly won their match for the English schools against the Indian schools in the Eden Gardens the other day, J. D. Guise set the seal on probably quite the most successful batting season which a Calcutta cricketer has ever known. He has scored in all something like 1,300 runs with an average of something over 60, we believe, and as he always goes in first with the responsibility of the batting success of his side resting very largely on his shoulders, and has only one not out innings to help him, it will readily be realised what a tremendous amount of good work he has done. For the Calcutta Cricket Club alone he has scored well over 1,100 runs, which must be several hundred more than any other player has previously accomplished, and it must be noted the quality of the attack of the other local clubs is much improved of late years. Add that he is perhaps the best and keenest field with the most reliable pair of hands on the C. C. C. side, and that his bowling, though much of its sting of seven or eight years ago has gone, is still often of considerable use, and it is not difficult to deduce his value to any team for which he plays. We hope that he will have a chance of figuring in some really good cricket at home during the coming summer.

The abovementioned match between the English and the Indian schools has clearly come to stay, and with the batting strength available on both sides, we should like to see three days allotted to it another year. The increase in the hours of play and the improvement in the wickets has made a most marked difference in the scoring in the Eden Gardens, and during their last four innings alone the home side have put up some 1,400 runs for the loss of some 30 wickets, a good many of which have really been thrown away. And yet out here we have had no wails from the bowlers so far as to the need for legislation to improve the game !

In the final match of the South Indian Athletic Association Football Tournament, played on Monday, the Sherwood Foresters beat the Cheshire Regiment.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

HIS MAJESTY opens Parliament on Tuesday : and Parliament, if rumour be an honest woman of her word, will open with an attack on the Upper House. Mr. Keir Hardie says it is unlikely there will be a General Election this year, but he is certain that next year will see it : and what the member for Merthyr Tydvil does not know on these matters is not worth knowing. I heard a few days ago that there is little hope of Mr. Chamberlain's return to active political life ; physically he is very well, but his recent illness left him with memory so greatly impaired that he will not again be able to resume his place in the fighting line as a leader at all events. This is the worst blow the country could sustain ; Mr. Chamberlain for long past has been for the country as distinguished from Party.

As the fog of early charge and countercharge bred by panic clears away we get a clearer idea of the situation at Kingston and the actions of Sir A. Swettenham : and the clearer the picture, the better the figure made by the much abused Governor. He seems to have offended the succeptibilities of some "low down" journalist who seized the opportunity to blacken him. The Times published the abuse, but it has also published the saner and better founded accounts. Nothing, of course, can explain away the ill considered private letter to the American Admiral ; but it seems certain that if any proceeding could have brought about trouble among the Negroes it was the landing of an American force under the American flag which stands for everything most loathed and feared by the black man in the West Indies : and it was well to get rid of this display of force as quickly and completely as possible.

Have you read the Aga Khan's article in the National Review? If not, do so: it is the best answer to shrieking political baboodom I have seen. He proposes for India what others have urged for Ireland; release from the political arena by the appointment as Viceroy of a near relative of the Sovereign who, being above party, should become the nucleus of all the best men, native princes and European Civil Servants in India. He wants to get rid of the party-political change of attitude towards India which mars the existing system; even as we would get rid of it in Ireland by appointing real Heads in a Prince and Princess of the Blood and dispensing with the raving politicians. The article is that of a very able and thoughtful statesman who can, and does, take large views.

The Book War has entered upon a new phase. The publishers, whose books the Times asks its readers not to order if they can help it, have refused to sell books to the Times Book Club at any price at all and only supply "the trade" on condition that the trade refuses to sell to the club even at full retail prices. The publishers further put a secret mark in books sold to the trade and send spies to Oxford Street to see if these books find their way to the library. Mr. Eden Phillpotts, having fallen foul of the Times for prefacing a notice of his last work with a request to readers not to order it, is given a leading article all to himself wherein he is told that he and his publishers do not know their business. The Times is ready to buy 2,000 copies of his book if the publishers will supply them at wholesale prices. I am sorry for Mr. Phillpotts, but it seems to me that he ought to "go for" his publishers rather than the Times. There was a lull in the interminable correspondence this week, and we fondly hoped the dreary squabble was at an end.

People at Selsey had their bucolic peace disturbed in an unusual way on Tuesday afternoon. A 9-in. shell—2ft. 9in. long—fell in a field near some houses, causing broken windows and other unpleasantness, as it buried itself with a tremendous dirt splash two or three feet in the plough. The uncanny thing was that no ship was in sight and it has since transpired that the nearest battleship was ten miles away. Luckily the projectile was a practice shell: had it been a "live" one it must have gone hard with the Fisherman's Joy inn close to which it alighted.

A curious and interesting question has been recently raised. Where are the Gretna marriage registers? Gretna Green marriages began in about 1754 to provide means of evading Lord Harwicke's Marriage Act of that year: and they continued until 1856 when Lord Brougham's Act made them illegal. The whereabouts of some of these registers are known: a firm of Carlisle solicitors have several volumes, others are in private hands, while others are known to have been destroyed. It is urged with great propriety that these books should be collected and placed in national keeping, before some American millionaire gets hold of them. It is an excellent chance for Mr. Carnegie. Years ago I remember seeing one of these registers at the King's Head at Gretna: it was hired by the host as an attraction from a very old man named William Lang, who was said to be one of the last survivors of the small knot of the Gretna "priests" who celebrated these marriages.

The accident which cost Lady Dorothy Cuthbert her life has been investigated by the Coroner with the anticipated result. The discharge of her husband's gun was the result of half frozen fingers touching the trigger: Captain Cuthbert was carrying it over his left shoulder and was in the act of bringing it forward and releasing the safety bolt when he pulled the trigger. Lady Dorothy was walking near him a little to his left rear. The statements that he tripped over roots hidden under the snow, or that the trigger caught on his coat have no foundation. The fatality was one of those deplorable accidents which demand sympathy for the survivor more than for anyone else.

The marriage of an Englishwoman to an Aryan is always to be profoundly regretted, but the case of Hall vs. Wadia does not seem to have grown directly from the fundamental error of the high contracting parties. The arrangement made was bound to end in disaster if all concerned were whites and angels of amiability to boot. When Cursetjee Nowrojee Wadia married Miss Hall in 1903 he contracted with the lady's grandmother for £900 a year to provide a home for himself and his wife: and induced her to leave Cromwell Crescent for 196, Cromwell Road, a much larger house. C. N. Wadia was much in the East whither for obvious reasons neither he nor his wife were willing she should go: and Mrs. Wadia lived with her 70-year old grandmother and an aunt. When the husband was in London matters did not run smoothly and at last he endeavoured to break the seven years' contract and turn out his grandmother-in-law. The old lady would not go: she brought an action for breach of contract and got a verdict for the better part of her claim, £3,500. There is to be an appeal.

"The Philanderer" is not one of Mr. Bernard Shaw's best plays. It was written and published a good many years ago and he has done much work superior to it in the interval. The story depends on a scientific man's mistake. Dr. Paramore has made a great reputation by discovering a new disease and has given Colonel Craven two years to live: Colonel Craven, who has lived a gay life, has turned serious, goes to church regularly, forgives his enemies though he still hates them, and generally prepares for his end. Then after a year of this, to him in the Ibsen Club, enter Dr. Paramore paralysed by the discovery that his famous disease does not exist at all. Utterly oblivious of all this means to Craven his mind is monopolised by the loss of his own reputation. The scene is worked out in the best Shavian manner and is the cream of the play. Apart from this the comedy does not greatly appeal. We cannot take much interest in Leonard Carter's love affairs; his entanglement with Julia Craven what time he woos a new love, Mrs. Tranfield; nor do the vagaries of the two ladies hold us: even though Miss. Wynne Mathieson was the widow and Miss Barton played Miss Craven excellently—wonderfully, considering she took the part at a few hours' notice. They are vague shadowy creatures. Mr. Eric Lewis was first-rate as Colonel Craven and Mr. Harben was properly forbidding as the self-centred doctor who thought his vivisection work on three dogs and a monkey had established his proof of that disease.

I omitted last week to refer to the new "Dutch Musical Incident" at the Prince of Wales' Theatre. The programme was promising: I do not refer to the fact that it bore the names of Mr. G. P. Huntley, Miss Isabel Jay, Mr. Geo. Barrett, Miss Gracie Leigh, and others of good report: but to the description:—"Chatter by Paul A. Rubens and Austen Hurgon, Jingles and Tunes by Paul A. Rubens." Chatter and jingles just fits the average musical comedy, but "Miss Hook of Holland" is at least one cut above that variety entertainment. There is a distinct thread of story; not a very strong one perhaps, but at all events a clear idea running through it. Mr. Hook of Holland has made a vast fortune by distilling a certain liqueur for the recipe of which there is only one copy: he takes the unique document out for a walk to give it or himself a treat because it is its or his birthday, and loses it. It is found by Simon Slinks, loafer, and by him sold to Captain Paap of the Artillery who thinks to use it as an instrument for gaining the hand and fortune of Sally, only daughter and right hand of old Hook. After much ado the recipe is recovered by Bandmaster Van Vupt, also of the Artillery, with whom Sally is in love.

Allowing for the manifest absurdities essential to the story—as the non-existence of even one duplicate of the famous recipe with its 63 ingredients—the story is quite reasonable; but, of course, the play depends far more upon the "chatter and jingles" than coherency of plot, and it was admirably acted. Mr. Huntley as the doddering amiable old distiller is delightful; his fussiness and his omnipresent dislikes—a list of which he keeps in his note book for ready reference—underlain by his natural drollery kept the house in a roar. Miss Isabel Jay is Miss Hook; her's is the master hand in the distillery, for she invented that wonderful liqueur and she it is who keeps the business going: she has some songs that suit her excellently well, the best of them being perhaps "Little Miss Wooden Shoes" with a chorus of little girls seated on kegs whereupon they kick time with their sabots. The hit of the evening in "jingles" was Miss Leigh's song, "The Flying Dutchmen," with a picturesque chorus of market girls. The secondary parts were well done; particularly Slinks by Mr. G. Barrett, Ludwig Schnapps, foreman of the distillery, and Mina, Miss Hook's maid, by Miss Leigh. The music is tuneful: not remarkable for originality, but such music as pit and gallery can pick up at first hearing and whistle going home. The play is very well put: Act I is a Dutch market place and Act II, the interior of the Distillery, has the attraction of novelty.

possession of a theatre, and much denunciation of music hall managers and all their works. The audience consisted largely of strikers and the rest of a not overfull house of languidly interested members of the public. The "performance," if it can be called so, has not been repeated: agreements with managers preclude the giving of anything but speeches by the music hall planets: and those planets or some of them met the managers for five hours at the Trocadero on Monday with the object of arriving at an understanding. It is eminently desirable that an understanding should be reached because the present situation can do no good to any of the parties involved. The music hall firmament is a howling voice without stars and stars cease to be stars unless there be a place for them in their native space. The foes of settlement seem to be the officials of the National Alliance—always look to officials who have least to lose for the motive power of a strike. The managers flatly refuse to recognise the alliance or its officials at all preferring, wisely, to treat direct with the stars themselves. A modus vivendi was reached at Monday's meeting, and now a Conciliation Board has been formed to adjust differences and set matters on a sound footing. We shall no doubt be admitted into the confidence of the Board ere long: its members at present are disinclined to say anything for publication.

A new turn at the Oxford is called the "Stunning Grenadiers" in allusion I presume to the terrific din accomplished by six able-bodied young women armed with cymbals. They go through evolutions and drill unknown to the red book, and wind up with a wild parody of Sousa's method of conducting an orchestra which has disastrous results on their clothes: the stage is strewn with fragments after the display is over.

The Telepathic boom continues. The latest notable turn at the Palace is that of the "Mysterious Howards," two young Americans—if accent go for anything—who achieve precisely the same results as the Zancigs. In one essential particular the Howards are even more remarkable: the man on the stage, blindfolded and with his back to the audience, writes on a blackboard the date of a coin, number of a cheque or note or name of a card shown to the other man moving among the audience, the other man saying not a word. [We have the same sort of show now in full swing in Calcutta.—Ed.]

I give this report, which has been going the round, for what it is worth:—When the Zancigs arrived in this country they were welcomed by Maskelyne and Devant, who asked whether their performance was a trick or if they called it telepathy. The new-comers said it was a trick: whereupon Maskelyne and Devant hailed them as brothers, saying that had occultism been claimed they would have got up a rival show at Queen's Hall and exposed the trickery. There is honour among conjurors, no doubt: but somehow I do not find it easy to accept the story.

The Great Wheel is gradually dissolving into its original parts. A huge scaffolding of wood, like a St. Andrew's Cross, fills it from hub to rim: the great driving chains have been cut into 60-foot sections and removed, and this week a gap appears at the top of the wheel. A curious incident of the work is that to ensure safety to the workmen during demolition, an enormous quantity of old bolts and rivets have been removed and replaced by new ones, whereby the structure has been made as good as new merely to be pulled to pieces. The legs which carry the axle are to be cut and allowed to fall: if the Earl's Court people are wise they will make an afternoon's show of that final scene.

Strange indeed are the troubles of them who seek advice in London police courts! On Saturday appeared before Mr. Grant at Willesden a woman distraught: during the past week she had noticed a change in the partner of her joys and had arrived at the disturbing conclusion that he was not the man to whom she had been married for 14 years: this man was stouter and not so kind. On the other hand he gave her exactly the same amount for housekeeping as her real husband did. Nevertheless in spite of his amazing personal resemblance she was perfectly sure he wasn't the right man: and she wanted "a warrant for her real husband." The woman appeared to be perfectly sane and was apparently satisfied when Mr. Grant advised her to bring the changeling to the court that the matter might be enquired into. She has not been back yet.

AN OLD GUNNER.

On the jut of the Norfolk coast which runs due east from Hunstanton to Cromer is a tract of shore unlike any other on the English seaboard. From Holkham Bay to Blakeney Tower the land has, in the course of a few centuries, gained as much from the shallow Northern sea as it has lost where the coast once more faces eastward. In place of lost towns and submerged churches, there extends, as far as the eye can reach, a wide fringe of saltmarsh, protected from the sea, first by an ever growing barrier of sandhills, and secondly by an outwork known as the "High Sand," an immense sandbank, rising like the back of a sole, uncovered, except at high tide, studded from mile to mile with ancient wrecks, and the nightly resting place of the celebrated wild grey geese of Holkham, which come there yearly in October from the Lapland marshes "to pay their rents," as the fishermen say, for last year's food and lodging. The inner tract of marsh, between the sandhills and the original line of shore, has been reclaimed along the whole face of the Holkham estate as far as the mouth of Wells Harbour. Thence it stretches eastward in an apparently limitless plain not of mud or sand, but of land almost reclaimed by nature, covered with thousands of acres of sea-lavender, crab-grass, rosemary, and samphire, intersected by creeks large and small, which figure on the map much as the arteries of the body do in an anatomical drawing, and cut by one or two deeper channels, running up from Wells Harbour, which are navigable by boats at high tide. The high springs or "marsh tides," as they are locally called, cover these flats twice or thrice a month. But the whole expanse offers a feeding ground and resting place for wild fowl almost unequalled in England. The sands and the muds outside the sandhills are visited in winter by thousands of stints, knots, curlews, and grey plover, and the marshes inside the "hills" are by night the feeding ground of all the wildfowl which rest by day on Holkham Lake, while red-shanks, green plover, golden plover, and curlew haunt them at all hours.

It can scarcely be matter for surprise that these marshes, which are so attractive even to the stranger who visits them for the sake of sport or natural history, are regarded with an almost passionate attachment by the old "gunners" who have spent all their lives upon their borders. They eagerly welcome the chance of a whole day upon the marshes as an agreeable change from their daily work of mussel and cockle fishing, and their keenness to do the honours of their native marsh to a stranger is as great as that of any great proprietor to show sport to his guests in his fields and covers.

The writer's last visit to this delectable land was made with the object of seeing, and perhaps shooting, some of the wild geese on their morning and evening flight from and to the great sandbank. For guide and attendant he had an old "gunner" who, by general consent, had a more intimate knowledge of the methods and history of wildfowling in these marshes, and of the habits of the creatures which frequent them, than any man now living upon this coast. His back was bent from long nights spent sitting in "duck holes." He knew the effect of every shift of wind and weather on the fowl, the devious ways and paths across the marshes, and the hours at which the creeks could be crossed at all states of the tide. His keenness for the sport was inexhaustible, as the following anecdote shows. He is an adept at "calling" the different shore birds, and in the earlier part of the season can whistle single golden plovers and curlew down from the sky with an art which looks like magic. On one occasion, in September he called a single golden plover, which descended from a great height and alighted within twenty yards of a party who were lunching in the sandhills. But he was so unfortunate as to lose a front tooth, and found that he could "whistle" the birds no longer. This was not to be borne, so he extracted (with his knife) the corresponding lower tooth, in the hope that he would whistle as well as ever if he "made things ship shape." The result of this experiment was that he could not whistle at all. So he contrived a "stopper" of tin which could be adjusted to fill the gap, and thus equipped, found that he could once more practice his lost art.

Our "wild-goose chase" presented more than the usual difficulties. At night they flew back too high over the sandhills for a successful shot. In the early mornings the winds were light and adverse, and the weather clear. But, like Charles St. John's keeper Donald, the old man had set his heart upon our shooting a goose, and was determined that no slackness on our part should be encouraged.

Each night he appeared, nominally for orders, really to give them, and then discoursed in fluent East Anglian phrase on the whole duty of the wildfowler.

"I ha'brought some swan-shot up to load a few of your cartridges for them geese we're a-going after in the morning, he would observe, on entering the inn parlour after dinner had been removed.

"Oh, we are going after them, are we? the writer would answer, half in inquiry, half in resignation.

"You must; can't you hear the wind? That's blowing half a gale from the west'ard, and them old geese, when they come o' the morning, they're bound to fly low. I lay a penny they'll come straight in past the beacon, and in over them highest sandhills. That's were we're bound to be afore light if the wind don't shift. Like as not that'll blow harder then. You'll come all the same if that snow or rain! Then I'll call you at half-past five. Dark? no; that o'ont be dark—not dark enough to si'nify. That's never rightly dark unless there come on a thick" (a fog). "Moonlight nights on the marshes, I've known when that looked as light as day. But that isn't. I never cared what time that was when I was out, whether that was day or whether that was night; and I've set out in 'duck-holes' all hours and all weathers. But moonlights are the carousest. The birds can see; you can't see, or not a quarter so much, or see things wrong; and though they can see everything else, there is just one thing they can't see, and that's you. Anyway, if you keep still they don't pay no regard to you—not no more than if you was a piece o' wreck—not so much sometimes, for they'll a'most walk over you.

"I was setten one night in a 'duck-hole' near where that goose-net stands, just off the hills. That was bright moonlight half-full. Two stints come flying along over the mud, and lit down against me, on the edge of the hole, and I catched one with my hand.

"I said to the man who was with me, setten, in another hole close by, 'Gracious heart now me, what do you think I done? I catched a stint with my hand, and very near had the other!'

"When we dig a duck-hole that fare as if the birds like to come and see what it is, and often that won't mind you a mite—not if ye keep setten still. When you dig one of them holes, you go and gather two or three armfuls of marrum-grass, and put that in the hole to set on, and be comfortable and dry. When I've been set there I've had an old owl pitch in by me and stop so, pricked up upon the marrum. So I have seen them when first I come to the whole, setting pricked up upon the seat where I was going to sit. Old brent geese too, will get into the holes, and set on the dry marrum where you laid it.

"One night I had forty or fifty of the grey geese come walking and talking within twenty yards of me. They were all scattered about, not arranged anyhow so as I could shoot along the 'ringe,' and I kept waiting till they got nearly too far to shoot. Then I only got a couple.

"Moonlight nights I was waiting for them knot, when a brace of widgeon dropped right into the whole where I sat. They didn't stop to shut the door before they were off! Another night I found the hole I had dug was full of water, so I made another alongside of it. While I sat there two mallards flew up behind me, and dropped slap into the water-logged hole that was a little behind me, and I had to turn round to shoot. My heart went thump! thump! thump! as I waited for them to come out of the hole, for the water wasn't up to the top, and I couldn't see them, and they were so close under the side that they couldn't see me.

"At last I crawled out, and up they got, but I never killed but one.

"Old Jimmy Catchpole and I sat out one very sharp night by the edge of the long sand. The tide was too high to dig a deep hole, but Jimmy scraped out a 'laying-hole,' and lay there on his back, just so as his head and body were level with the sand, but his feet and legs lay out. He allus swear an old mallard drake come and washed the'self and cleaned the'self between his two feet. That night, while I lay there on my back, a mallard come walking past me not four yards off. I had the gun lying with the muzzle resting on my toe down along my leg. Thinks I, 'I'll tak' yar head off,' for that was too near to shoot it anyhow else. I fired, and that lay on the ground. But when I come to pick it up, it wasn't touched by the shot, though it was as dead as a herring. Not a drop of blood anywhere. That must have been killed by the wind of the charge just over its head.

"Well, while I ha' been talking I ha' filled these dozen cartridges with swan shot, and these others with BB; and if we don't kill one of them old grey geese in the morning they'll have sore bones anyhow."

Punctually at half-past five next morning the rattle of gravel against the window aroused us from bed, and a brief interval saw us tramping by starlight over muddy roads towards the sands of Holkham Bay. As the dawn cleared the way for daylight across the marsh the geese came in in lines and companies from the High Sand. Flock after flock passed over, with steady even flight and flute-like calls. But the gale had dropped, the lightening sky was cloudless and though our shot could be heard rattling on the feathers of the geese, the elastic cuirass of down saved them from injury. We were consoled by the beauty of the dawn on the marshes, and the walk home in the fresh winter morning between the sandhills and the sea. Not so our guide. He felt that his reputation was at stake. In the evening he once more appeared, to urge us to further enterprise by tales of the shore and marsh.

"You say that you can only half see by moonlight, I remarked; 'but you can see a great deal more than most men—than myself, for instance, when I am out at night.'

"Perhaps I can, but it is all happy go-lucky work. When the moon is about nine days old no man can believe his eyes. It is like sleep-walking. When the moon is about that size I have shot little stints thinking they were curlew. Then I had a fair rake with big shot at a man, thinking he was a duck; and one night off Brancaster I see a rare lot of widgeon feeding, and pulled my punt up well within range, and pulled right off into them. It was nothing but a row of stakes; the widgeon were the other side, and the shot went on and I killed a brace. When you are lying as still as still on the muds, with nothing bigger than a mallard near you, you make bigger mistakes than that. An old duck will go walking splash! splash! splash! past you, so loud and heavy that you would think it was a man.

"I was lying on the bank called 'Old Shells' one bright night, and a gentleman with me was lying a hundred yards off in a shallow hole on the mud, when a pair of mallards walked in between us.

"After we got up to go home I said to him:—

'Didn't you see nothing?'

'No,' he said.

'What, nothing at all? Not that pair o' ducks?'

'No,' he said: 'only I see a man and a boy go past.'

"It was them two mallard he saw. That was a capital place to make a duck-hole. Soon as you'd taken a bit of the jelly off the top you could dig down five feet if you liked.

"Once I was sitting there when a man I was 'in Co.' with had a fair shot at me. His hole was full of water when we come. So I baled it out for him, and went off to mine. I lost sight o' him, and he o' me. Presently off goes his gun and the shot come plump into the mud alongside o' me.

"Luckily it catched the mud where I had scooped it out of the hole; it sent great lumps over my head, and the top of my old water-boots rattled. A lot hit my side; but I had thick clothes on and that never got through.

"That ain't so dangerous at night as when you are crawling down a creek with another man behind you. Once I was squated down in a narrow creek, so narrow that my side bag would not fit in, but was hitched up against the bank. Off goes the gentleman's gun, and all, that charge of shot went between my back and the bag. I felt so bad that I lay down for ten minutes, and then I walked off home.

"Only once I came near to bringing a man into real danger.

"I was out by night in a gunning punt, and a young fellow who was 'in Co.' with me, and I heard those old grey geese 'talking' on the sand. The tide was high, and we thought we could get right into them.

"I said:—'Whatever you do, do you keep me in sight. We will work up together, and pull when I flash a match.' Well we sat up, but he got separated, though I new he must be pretty close by, because we could see the line of the sand, and hear just where the geese were 'talking' on the edge There they sat gabbling and splashing, though I couldn't quite see them. Then I made out a body of them to the right, so I backed my paddle and looked along my big gun to see how to take them. They seemed a bit too quiet for geese. Then I thought it was a piece of wreck, but I couldn't see any break in the line of it. However, I see it move, so thinks I, 'Well, here goes,' when part of a cloud cleared off from the moon, and there lay his punt, with him in it. Another two seconds, and I should have killed or sunk him. Instead, I backed my other paddle, and, without waiting for him, I had a good rake at the geese and shot four."

Wild birds were not the only creatures which fell to the old man's gun at Wells. Seals visit the harbour from time to time, and are often shot before they can regain the sea. They swim up the harbour stream following the fish; before the embankment was made to the west of the entrance they were more commonly seen. Grey mullet were then very plentiful on what is now the new reclamation on the Holkham side; flat-fish—plaice, dads, and flounders—also afforded a plentiful dinner to exploring seals.

Nothing could be prettier or more interesting to watch than these friendly visits of the seals. Unfortunately, the poor beasts were looked upon as game of rather a high order, and seldom escaped being shot or caught.

Their habit was to come in with the flood-tide; and often a seal could be watched swimming below water just against the wall of the big quay. The "gunners," who had never seen the seals at the Zoo, were "stammed" by the agility they showed in the water.

"I ha' seen one," remarked my old friend, "when the water was right clear alongside the quay, keep-a-popping his head out, just for a moment, and then down that would go again, and tarn oover on the back, and swim so, ten feet down, a-looking up at us while we kep' a-looking down at him, and a-rubbing his face and working his tail just like a merrymaid" (mermaid). "When the tide ebbed that would goo on up the crick, and crawl out, and lay on the mud asleepen. One day I was comen home across the marshes with my gun, when a see right a great 'unlying by one o'them pounds where you shot the redshank a-flighting. I see him afore he see me, and down I backs into a crick. The crick was so narrow that it wouldn't hardly hold me and my 'side bag," too, but I sleeped down till I was within twenty yards of him, and then I peeped over the rab-grass and let fly at his head. He walloped away a bit towards the water, but anyhow that settle him. When he was dead he kep' sliding down the mud to the crick, where that was deep. He was to big to lift into the boat; so I got some boards and sloped them up, and rolled him up like a pig, till he fell in to the boat. I flayed him, and had the skin tanned. I sold that to a curate. Once a sea-lion came and sat on the bar. He was asleepen, and one of the men got quietly up across the sand and threw a coat over his head, and then the others ran up, and the whole lot got hold of him, and so they 'copped' him. They used to keep him in the docks—that was some deep holes of water inside the quay—and haul him in with a rope to show him to folks. Soon he got right tame, and would come to the man that owned him when he called."

Almost every year an eagle used to be seen in the marshes. These were in nearly every case young white-tailed eagles going south. The projection of this north Norfolk coast is the natural alighting place of all birds travelling south along the shore, as well as of those which cross the sea from Norway and Sweden. I have seen peregrine falcons on passage come in from the North Sea in a line straight as an arrow for Holkham Park, and the eagles were once so common in Norfolk that they were known as "Fen eagles." My old gunner stated that he had more than once seen an eagle come up from the coast and fly over the lake at Holkham when it was covered with wildfowl.

"When the ducks see him that make'em muster. Off they go to see in a hurry; they can stand a hawk, but they don't want telling to go if an eagle come. One day I was coming home from shrimp-catching, and when I come to the side of the big crick there sat an eagle within twenty yards off me. Another day, when I was crossing the marshes with my gun, I shot an eagle against the marsh head. I slipped up to the bridge, and when I fired he fell with one leg broken. I caught hold of him by the neck, and he caught hold of the mud and crab-grass with his sound foot. Didn't he pull out a great lump o' mud and grass with his foot!—almost as big as a brick!"

Inside the line of the sea wall which embank the last piece of salt-marsh west of Wells is a reed-bed of at least two hundred acres, with one or two pools of water. Towards evening this reed-bed is certain to attract any buzzard or marsh-harrier in the neighbourhood. They sit about on the bundles of cut reed, or flap along the dykes, looking for rats. Sometimes one comes out on to the open marsh east of the harbour. On one occasion one of these big hawks was attracted by the sight of dead ducks lying by the side of our old gunner who was crouched in a "duck-hole" on the mud, near the harbour month.

"The pake o' my cap," he said, "came out just so as the edge catched my eye, and I kept thinking something had latched in it and was flickering in the wind. I put up my hand once or twice to brush it off, but the flicker went on, and when I looked up there was that great hawk, flickering his wings just over my head, looking at them dead ducks that was lying by me I upped my gun and brought him down. I sold him to a schoolmaster, and he ate him."

A succession of high tides rendered it dangerous to lie up at night for the geese upon their sandbank, and though rabbiting in the sandhills, with excursions along the mud and marshes, gave plenty of sport and amusement by day, we seemed fated to return without shooting a single goose. On the last evening fortune relented so far as to enable us to kill one. A little observation had determined the exact line at which the main body of the geese left the marshes, and after waiting till after dusk, the birds came out in a long line extending for more than a hundred yards, with their usual flute-like calls. One bird was hit, and fell at a distance in the shallow water of the bay. There was no doubt that it was down. It fell, as our gunner remarked, "just as if you had hit, the water with a malt-shovel." Malting being one of the surviving industries of Wells, the metaphor seemed appropriate. But it was too dark to see, and though we were assured that if we waited another hour it would wash up on the point, the prospect of a long wait in the dark and cold was not inviting. We made a compromise, by arranging with a fisherman who had also been lying up for the geese, armed with a muzzle-loading eight-bore as long as an Afghan matchlock, to come round at dawn next morning and pick up the goose before the grey crows discovered the body. The bird was duly recovered, and proved to be a fine pink-footed goose, killed by a single No. 1 shot which had pierced from breast to back. The greater number, or more probably all, of the birds at Wells belong to this species, and though not so large as the grey-leg, our specimen was a handsome and gracefully proportioned bird. The pink legs and beak are exactly the shade which a modiste would select to set off the smoky greys of the plumage and after hanging a fortnight, and roasting—care being taken not to baste the bird with its own gravy—it was as good as a stubble goose at Michaelmas. Its weight was 5½lbs., though the expanse of the wings makes it appear a vastly large bird when flying high across the levels of the sands.

RIVER AND LAKE FISHING IN INDIA.

XI.

ANY mention of the more sporting kinds of fish to be found in India would be incomplete without some reference to the trout fishing in the Neilgherry hills, especially near Ootacamond. I regret that I am unable to give information on this subject, but I believe that the waters in those localities have been successfully stocked with English trout, and that in spite of recent misfortunes, such as the destruction of nurseries of young fish by unusual floods, the fishing promises to become very good indeed within the next few years, and that the fish obtained from imported ova give indications of attaining a size more approaching that of fish similarly bred in Canada and New Zealand than that of their English progenitors. It is to be hoped, however, that they will not follow the example of their Antipodean brethren, in refusing to take a fly after attaining the weight of 8 or 10lbs.

Coarse fish are to be found in all rivers in the plains, as well as in those tanks or large ponds which are fed, or have at some time been fed, by streams, natural or artificial, communicating with rivers, and have not since run dry, however small these streams may be. The keen fisherman generally has within fairly easy reach a certain amount of sport with these fish, and though he cannot have the accompaniments of scenery and a comparatively mild climate in following his favourite pursuit, this sport is by no means to be despised, forming, as it frequently does, the only recreation to be obtained in the long weary summers of the plains. Many and many a time in the earlier part of my official career, when posted to small stations wanting in social surroundings, have I discovered the solace of excellent sport with the rod (the previous existence of which had been apparently unknown, or at any rate untried) by enquiring into the history of the formation and maintenance of artificial or natural pieces of water, and my advice to any brother angler, whose lines are cast in such places, is, never to be without a rod and tackle at hand, when moving about in his district.

It will be sufficient to give one instance out of many, in which my enquiries resulted in my getting excellent sport in water which had been unfished until I tried it. I was once staying for a few days, on inspection duty, at an out-of-the-way place where I was quite alone, and as the hot weather was then at its height, shooting was out of the question. I discovered two fairly large ponds, both within half a mile of the bungalow and both swarming with "mulleys." Using sometimes a spoon and sometimes a natural bait, I took on the first day over thirty fish, weighing nearly 140lbs., and on the two following days from fifteen to twenty fish each day. These fish ran from 2lbs. up to 14lbs. This is, as I say, only one instance, quoted by way of illustrating the resources one often has within reach, for passing away pleasantly the spare time which would otherwise hang heavily on one's hands. I have found similar sport in scores of other places, and there is no reason why every fisherman should not at some time or other be equally fortunate. In tanks and ponds fed by channels from a main stream, mahseer will rarely if ever be found unless they have been placed there by human agency. It has not yet been proved whether the young fry do not run down water-courses, to a distance from the parent river, in the same way as the young of other species of fish, or whether having once entered the pond, they find the surroundings unfavourable and die off Taking the analogy of the Kumaon lakes, the former theory seems the more probable, since these lakes held no mahseer until they were stocked with these fish. Whatever the cause may be, the fact remains that they are not there, but there are, however, many species of fish, predatory and otherwise, which will increase and multiply freely in such waters without any care being taken as to creating the supply in the first instance, and the same sorts will, it goes without saying, be found in rivers below the usual habitat of the mahseer. Among the predatory species which will be found in numbers are, the mulley, also called bawali and lanchi. (scientific name, "Wallago attu"), the Tengra ("Singhara," or "Macrones Singhala"), and the murrel, three sorts, viz.: Ophiocephalus marulius, O. gachua, and O. striatus. Their comparative prevalence is in the order above given. With the exception of the Ophiocephalus gachua, which rarely exceeds one pound in weight, these run to fairly large sizes in tanks, that is to say, up to 15lbs., and occasionally a good deal heavier. The mulley takes a spoon, a dead bait either moving or stationary, and a live bait, freely, also sometimes, but not often, a large fly. The tengra and murrel take a dead or live bait, and sometimes a spoon. All three also take a worm, the larger the better. The murrel is the only one which is good for eating, according to European ideas, though natives are always glad to get the other two. The O. gachua takes a medium sized worm, and sometimes a paste bait. In confined waters you will generally take at least ten mulleys to one fish of any other species.

Of non-predacious fish the number is legion, but the largest of these are, the rohu ("Labeo rohita"): the kalbans or kalabans ("Labeo kalbasu"), and the mirga or white carp ("Cirrhina mrigala"). These, especially the rohu and mirga, run to large sizes in ponds. I have taken both up to 25lbs. and kalbans up to 12lbs., but much larger fish are sometimes taken. These occasionally take a worm on a medium sized (No. 6) hook, but the bait par excellence for them is paste. They all give good sport and fight doggedly to the bitter end, though their first rush is not as strong as that of the mahseer, and the rohu and mirga are excellent eating when the water from which they are taken is not foul or stagnant, and receives periodical supplies of fresh river water.

All these fish, predatory and otherwise, can also be taken in rivers in the plains, the best places for them being the large pools left in river beds at canal heads when most of the water has been diverted from the river to the canal, and in such places they frequently run to much larger sizes than those mentioned above. The goonch ("Bagarius yarelii") and the silund ("Silundia gangetica") are also to be found in canal heads, and in river pools below the regulators, but not in ponds. These take the same baits as other predacious fish, and run to very large sizes. The goonch is a brute of whom there is nothing good to be said. He is ugly to look at, useless to eat, and his manners are disgusting. When he runs large, he will sometimes take your spinning bait with a rush which makes you think for one brief moment that you have got into a lusty mahseer of record size, and he will then go down to the bottom where he stands on his head and sulks, often for an hour or more, defying every effort to set him going again. He will then (if you have had sufficient patience to hang on to him without intentionally breaking your line and getting free) sail off into the next parish, taking as much of your tackle as he can with him. Fortunately, he is not found, or very rarely so, in the upper waters of rivers where mahseer are plentiful. His weight may be anything up to 150lbs. The silund is a fish of quite another sort. He is a handsome silvery colour, shot with gold, and he fights well and honestly. He runs up to probably 50 or 60lbs., though I have never taken one over 41lbs. I remember well one red letter day at the head-works of the Okhla canal, near Delhi, when a friend and I once took two each of these fish, of which the respective weights were 41, 35, 33 and 28lbs. We had also several breakages, due to our having put our trust in the phantom minnows of the local tackle dealer.

I cannot call to mind having taken silund in any river except the Jumna, but I believe they are to be found in others. Their habitat appears to be confined to plains waters only.

There are one or two other species of fish which are common in the rivers of the plains, but I will reserve mention of these for a later article.

MOTORING FROM CALCUTTA TO PURI.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—Messrs. Ashworth and Taylor, writing to your evening contemporary, announce that their petrol-supply scheme embraces, among other highways, "the Orissa Trunk Road down to Puri!" I wonder whether the promoters of this scheme have ever tried motoring from Calcutta to Puri. A determined, or shall I say desperate, motorist with whom time, money and the jeopardising of his car is no object might care to undertake such a journey; but from personal knowledge, having twice covered the distance on the humble bike, I should say, he would be hardly likely to repeat the feat. This is the itinerary of the trip.

1. Calcutta to Ooloobaria, by steamer—there is no road to Ooloobaria.
2. Between Ooloobaria and Midnapur, a run of 56 miles, the following unbridged rivers occur:—The Damuda, at Moheshdanga, the Roopnarain, at Nowpolla, the Cossye, at Panchkura, and the same stream a few miles out of Midnapur.
3. Between Midnapore and Cuttack (189 miles) the unbridged rivers are the Subarnarika, the Bura Balong (a tortuous stream which has to be crossed twice), the Brahmini Byturnee (also crossed twice), the Kursoon and the Mahanuddy.

The net result gives us no less than eleven unbridged rivers in two hundred and sixty-one miles. In the rains these are in full flood, the ferry arrangements are primitive, and, for all but small cars, quite inadequate; in the dry months—from November to June—they present the alluring spectacle, from a motorist's point of view, of dreary wastes of deep sand and large stones with a little water trickling down the middle. The very thing to make motoring a joy for ever. Now then ye Calcutta motorists who's for Puri! Don't all speak at once.

REDUCED CHARGES FOR THE ·350 RIGBY-MAUSER RIFLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—With reference to "·350's" letter, in your issue of 10th January, I advise your correspondent to send an empty cartridge case and bullet belonging to his Rigby-Mauser, direct to the Ideal Manufacturing Company, New Haven, Connecticut, U.S.A., asking if one of their reloading tools will suit for reloading the cases, and if a mould to cast a hollow-fronted bullet of about 200 grains, to fit the rifle, can be furnished. "·350" will find a hardened lead hollow fronted bullet quite suited to his requirements, but I warn him that he may have to devote some little time and patience in experimenting, before he discovers a smokeless charge giving a velocity of 1,400 foot seconds combined with accuracy. If he is satisfied with something rather lower, he might try 12 grains of Schultze loose in the shell, with the bullet seated only deep enough to prevent its falling out (bullet to be $\frac{1}{10}$ tin). If the Winchester Company will supply "·350" with metal-patched soft nosed bullets, he will be saved much trouble, as in this case he would have no reason to fear the bases of his bullets being deformed by fusion, through using too much powder. With these jacketted bullets I daresay about 20 grains of cordite would give good results.

It is always necessary to know the EXACT calibre of a rifle when suiting it with a new bullet. Supposing the Rigby-Mauser to have a bore measuring ·350 inch across the lands, the bullet to fit it should be about ·358 inch in diameter.

FLEUR-DE-LYS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE INDIAN FIELD."

SIR,—In reply to "·350" in your issue of 10th January the ·35 calibre Winchester self-loading rifle bullet is ·350 inch diameter, that of the Rigby-Mauser rifle is ·358 inch, so the former bullet cannot be used in the ·35 or 9 mm. Mauser.

The Ideal Manufacturing Company of New Haven, Connecticut, U.S.A., make a variety of moulds for bullets of 9 mm. calibre which will fit the Rigby-Mauser rifle. They are as follows:—

No. 358238	·35 Winchester	165 grs.	and 220 grs.
,, 358242	·38 Colt Automatic	125	,,
,, 358246	·38 S. & W.	147	,,
,, 358250	·38 S. & W special	157	,,
,, 36071	·38-44 S. & W.	146	,,

Of the above I would recommend the ·35 Winchester 220 grains which cast with hollow point would weigh about 195 grains. It would be a little more accurate than the shorter 165 grains (145 grains hollow point) bullet.

The others would do well for short ranges up to 100 yards. These bullets would require to be cast of an alloy of about 1 tin to 10 of lead to prevent stripping in the quick twist rifling of a high velocity rifle. They would, of course, be lubricated in the cannelures, pure beeswax melted with a little vaseline does very well in India, and a hard jute wad rather larger than the bore would be of use behind the bullet as a gas check.

The bullet would be fixed in the mouth of the case in its usual place, the powder being loose. With cast bullets without metal bases higher velocities than 1,000 or 1,200 foot seconds cannot be expected as a charge of nitro powder sufficient to give high velocity is apt to strip the bullet out of the rifling.

I think a good bullet for small game would be the ·360 express nickel base bullet intended for use with nitro powder in black powder rifles. Its diameter is, I believe, ·358, if so, it is correct for the 9 m.m. rifle. I believe it weighs about 190 grains. This could be driven at fairly high velocity up to 1,600 or 1,700 foot seconds with good results. It would reduce the power of the Rigby-Mauser to that of the old ·360 miniature express. The ·350 Winchester bullet 250 grains soft nose could, of course, be used for reloading with high velocity charge, but it would be rather too powerful. The ·38 colt automatic soft point rather too light.

For certain calibres the Ideal Company supply moulds to cast bullets intended to be fitted with metal base cups which they also supply very cheaply. These bullets can be used with fairly high charges giving velocities up to 1,700 foot seconds and are much used in America for midrange shooting with their service rifle, but unfortunately are not made for the ·350. They have experimented in America with good results with paper wrapped cast lead bullets in high velocity rifles and the Swiss Military bullet is or very recently was of this description. So it might be possible to use a paper wrapped bullet like the old Martini-Henry in the Rigby-Mauser, but the "lead" or slope from the chamber to the rifling might be too short for a paper wrapped bullet in the ·350 Rigby-Mauser rifle.

As regards powder charges for reduced charges for short range there is no difficulty. In the ·303 I found 7 grains of Amberite shot gun powder gave good results at 100 yards with a 160 grain bullet of $\frac{1}{15}$ tin alloy, but I fancy the velocity was under 1,000 foot seconds.

Ten grains of Cordite cut up into grains did very well so did 15 grains of ·303 rifleite with the same bullet.

I should think the ·350 Rugby-Mauser would do well with 9 or 10 grains of Amberite behind the ·35 Winchester 165 or 220 grain bullet and slightly larger charges of ·303 rifleite or grained Cordite would do, but experiments to find out the right charge would have to be made at a target. They make various brands of smokeless powder for rifles in America, where they go in a good deal for reloading. The Ideal Handbook recommends the following for the ·35 calibre Winchester High Power Rifle.

For high power.—Dupont's ·30 calibre or savage No. 1, 1903, 43 grains, Laflin and Rand's W. A. ·30 calibre, 45 grains.

For mid—range.—Laflin and Rand's sharpshooter 12 grains, Dupont's No. 1, 20 grains.

For short range.—Laflin and Rand's unique, 8 grains, Dupont's No. 1, 15 grains.

The charge for the Winchester ·35 Self-loader cartridge with its ·350 inch diameter 165 grain No. 350293 cast bullet, $\frac{1}{15}$ tin alloy, is 8 grains Laflin and Rand's sharpshooter powder. See Ideal Handbook.

The high power charge would require a metal cased bullet, while cast bullets would do for the mid and short range charges with or without base cups. English gun and ammunition makers do not encourage reloading, but it certainly pays the sporting rifleman in India to refill. I do not know of any special tools for refilling ·350 or 9 mm. Mauser cartridges like those for American cartridges, but Rigby and Company could doubtless supply them. The following tools are necessary: Mullets mould the Ideal No. 358,238, fitted with plunger for hollow point is recommended, price 2 dollars. Resizing tool, necessary for swelled cases, they generally do expand too much to fit after firing with full charges. Capping tools are wanted also, these could be supplied by any good gunmaker. If the ·350 Mauser case is primed similarly to the ·303 case the cap can be removed by a sharp pointed bradawl driven into the side of the cap while the case is held firmly in a hole in a block of hard wood or metal, care being taken not to hurt the anvil which is part of the case. If it has the usual loose anvil primer the decapping is a simple matter. The cases ought to be well cleaned and dried before being refilled. The powder should lie loose in the case and the bullet in its usual place, only enough of its base inserted to make it fit tight. If the mouth of the case is too big it might be nicked into a cannelure of the bullet in two or three places, but the resizing process usually resizes the mouth of the shell as well.

To lubricate the bullets dip them into melted lubricant and scrape off the surplus grease by passing them through the mouth of an old case the base of which has been cut off. As to short bullets not shooting well, of course the sooner the bullet gets into the rifling the better, but as long as a bullet can be relied upon to group into a 4-inch circle at 100 yards it is sufficiently accurate for most purposes and I found that cast bullets of $\frac{2}{3}$ inch in length did this in the ·303 rifle, the "lead" of which is longer than in more up-to-date small bore rifles. So there ought to be little practical difficulty as regards accuracy at sporting ranges. The Ideal Company supply metal ready alloyed for bullet casting, but, of course, it would be expensive getting it in India I would recommend a thorough perusal of their handbook which gives more information on the subject than any book I have ever come across and it is thoroughly reliable.

The Annual Meeting of Bovril, Limited, took place on the 4th February. The Chairman, the Earl of Bessborough, took the opportunity of explaining the great care exercised in the manufacture of Bovril and referred to the spotless cleanliness of the factory and the wholesomeness of the ingredients used. He further stated that Bovril, Limited, was in no way connected with the United States and expressed the hope that the recent American meat scandals would not shake the confidence of the public in "Bovril" the great British Meet Beverage. The Company prides itself in the fact that it is a British Company to the backbone. Its Chairman, Directors and Officials are all British. Its wages funds are spent among Britons at home and across sea and its dividends go in the same direction. It is the largest firm of manufacturing food experts in the British Empire.

The only accurate and expanding spherical ball in existence.

Fig. 1. Represents a perspective view of Lyon's "Letal" Ball, manufactured and recommended by Messrs. Eley Brothers London. The three-ring-shaped ridges raised in casting on the peripheral surface make a friction tight fit in the barrel and ensure the bullet leaving the muzzle in a line with the axis of the barrel.

Fig. 2. Represents a sectional view showing the semi-circular steel vanes standing at right angles to each other which by their impetus on impact of the bullet create enormous expansion. The "Lethal" has entirely Superseded the loosely fitting 13 gauge ball and shell. Loaded cartridges per 100, Rs. 16-8.

THE TURF.

SANDOWN.

THOUGH a reassuring message was early received in London on the morning of the 1st instant, as to racing being practicable at Sandown, it was a very near thing, as the frost further afield was strong, and the snow lay so thickly on the hard ground that hunting was impossible. The executive had taken time by the forelock in having the course covered a week ago, and could afford to snap their fingers at fate. Strange to say, the going was excellent; soft round the far side, where the hoof-marks were deeply imprinted, and owners need not have been at all chary, but the fears of bad going kept many intending competitors away, and fields ruled on the small side. The hay covering was all ready to be raked back again as we left in the teeth of a biting north-wester, but there was not any frost in the air, and the prospects for next day seem fair with every appearance of fine weather. Doubtless the icy outlook militated against the muster, which was smaller than usual here, though representative, many patrons of the Turf swelling the attendance in the club enclosure where the full force of the biting wind brought those roses to the cheeks of our fair compatriots for which England is famous all the world over. Details of the principal races:—

BAD WEATHER—NO RACING.

Though not at freezing point when the workmen were replacing the hay, etc., on the course after Friday's racing, at Sandown the nor'-west wind was bitterly keen, and during the night the frost returned. So good, however, had been the going—even softish on the Railway side at sunset—that the majority present were pretty confident as to the morrow. Hence a goodly number journeyed to Waterloo Station on Saturday, a favourite occasion with the half-holiday division, and greatly were they disappointed in learning that the course, which from its exposed site and sandy soil is most susceptible to frost, was too hard for racing. In London the snow that had fallen was showing moist patches, and spotting the pavements in hopeful fashion; but the temporary thaw was not general, and if Candlemas day is true to old traditions, we have not seen the last of the winter yet. The prompt action of the Sandown executive in despatching their deterrent notice is to be highly commended as it saved many the vexation and expense of a fruitless journey. Thus, like Hurst Park, Sandown had to be content with a one-day bill of fare, luckier than Kempton, whose table was bare, while in the North the Doncaster fixture, which should have begun to-day, has been postponed until 15th and 16th February. The effects of the dear old-fashioned winter are not so favourable after all to the gate system, which has extended the crop and frequency of small meetings to the complete filling up of each winter week, and must remind the old stagers of the times when it was really an off season, and the bookmakers could relax for a month or six weeks' shooting or what not sport, without risk of losing his clientele.

FOOTBALL.

RUGBY RULES.

SCOTLAND vs. WALES.—At Inverleith, Edinburgh, on Saturday, the ground of the Scottish Football Union, the representatives of Scottish and Welsh Rugby met in their twenty-third international encounter.

There was much interest in the match, apart altogether from that usually associated with the encounter, through the Welsh men deciding to persevere in their new formation against Scotland, a nation always all-powerful in the front rank. Unfortunately an injury to Winfield, the Welsh back, about twenty minutes from the close, robbed the contest of its full value to the closer students of the game as a fair trial between the eight forward system against the roving back plan. In this particular respect the engagement was inconclusive, for it would be in the closing stages that the crux would be reached; but it is a notable argument against Wales that they failed even once to cross the Scottish lines—a circumstance which has not occurred since 1895.

The weather, after a long spell of frost, was excellent, and on the straw being removed the turf proved in splendid order, both captains being perfectly pleased. It was a very fast stretch of turf.

Pritchard kicked off for the Principality prompt to time. Purves fielded, but Winfield, from a long return, got possession, and sent the ball into touch at the Scots' twenty-five. The first, scrum was anxiously watched. It was desperately contested but it broke up to neither's advantage. The Scotch backs got possession, however, and pushed ahead, and let the native division across the centre line. Clever kicking by Trew sent the ball over to the Welsh left, where Maddox got hold and punted for touch. An early misfortune happened to Wales. Travers being injured. He rapidly recovered, and from the next scrum Simson broke away in characteristic fashion. Trew laid the Scotlow, and Gibbs, the roving commissioner, new came into prominence, kicking into the centre, where Evans gathered the ball, and racing ahead, handed out to Gabe. The latter passed to Williams, but failing to gather properly, the chance was lost.

A free-kick let Scotland away and Maddox brought the game back, but Macleod and McGregor secured the Welshman. A penalty-kick against Scotland, not three yards inside the centre line, was taken by Winfield. He made a try all the way, but the ball just fell short. Sloan did not find touch with his drop back, and Winfield getting in a terrific return found touch tenyards from the Scottish line. The Scottish forwards rallied nobly, and at length, the aggressive Welshmen were driven back. For a time the Thistle pack was in well nigh irresistible mood, rushing the ball pell-mell along in their own fashion. Eagerness spoiled a promising movement by a couple getting off-side. From the scrum the ball came out on the Scottish side, and Simson fairly set his threes on the move, the dash coming to an end when Macleod was bundled into touch after making much ground. Another burst by the Scottish forwards bustled the ball over the Welsh line, but it ran dead before anyone could get it.

Aided shortly afterwards by a free-kick, the wearers of the feathers soon invaded Scottish soil. In a mêlée just outside the twenty-five a Scot got off-side, and Wales had a free awarded them, and from the place Winfield had no difficulty in putting the ball over the bar. The Scotsmen were in evidence immediately after the kick-off, Bedell-Sivright leading a stiring rush right to the Welsh twenty-five. Winfield's kicking was again in evidence, as he found touch just outside the opposing twenty-five. —mighty long kicking indeed. Walters relieved, and Purves made some ground, and Greig, the Scottish captain, supplemented their efforts with a fine kick into touch well into Welsh territory.

Rush and counter-rush was the order, and then Gibbs fairly let the Welsh rear rankers away. Evans and Williams made some ground, but again Macleod's fine tackling, which had been of much service, came to the rescue of his country. The Welshmen were now established in home ground, but a little before half-time the Scottish three-quarters got moving, but Evans clutched McGregor like an octopus, and effectively brought the raid to an end. Half-time:—

	Pts.
Wales (one penalty goal)	3
Scotland	0

With a break of but five minutes, Bedell-Sivright restarted the game. His kick was marked, but a warm reply by Macleod let Scotland down instanter. A "free" to the Principality was well taken by Winfield, who sent a tremendous punt to the other end. It failed to find touch, and Macleod's return was a mammoth one. Equally long it reached touch and gave Scotland a great advantage. The Scottish forwards were now fairly in the thick of it, and keeping the ball tight they gave the Welsh back division no chance to get into operation. The game was fought resolutely amongst the forwards, and Scotland's equaliser was soon forthcoming. The ball went out to the three-quarters, and each of them in turn handled in certain fashion, and Purves capped the movement with as fine a try as has been scored on the Union field. The place was a long one, and Macleod, who took the kick, failed to convert. With the scores even Wales went at it in stirring fashion. The ball got loose, and Trew and Evans set off at a fine pace, Macleod hard in their wake. The latter failed to tackle Williams, who got the ball from Evans, but so upset was the flying winger that Sloan had no difficulty in bringing him down.

Scotland did not long submit to this sort of thing, and carrying a succession of scrummages, they took play right into the Welsh corner on the stand side of the field. Here some terrific work ensued, and several times the Scots were all but in. The home team had the complete upper hand, and Winfield was hotly, beset. In stopping a raed, the Welsh full back sustained an injury and after a longish delay Winfield had to leave the field.

He was limping badly, and did not return during the remainder of the game, and Gibbs, the free lanced, fell into the full back position. The loss of a man to Wales did not immediately affect play, the visitors playing up in rousing style. The burst was short-lived, and an overwhelming Scotch advantage at forward brought the game once more back on the Welsh lines. A bout of passing amongst the Scotch three-quarters nearly ended in disaster, but McGregor was downed at the supreme moment.

Playing very pluckily indeed, the Welshmen gained a little ground, but, thanks to great work by the Scottish forwards, the home backs again got in motion and in quite delightful fashion the ball flashed along the third line. Macleod gathered a fine pass from McGregor, and the aspect was very bad for the Leek. The home forwards rallied round, and the game was fought desperately right under the Welsh posts. There was nothing gingerly about the tackling, and the players gave as much as they took. There was a brief pause to attend to an injured Welshman, and then at it again.

There was little doubt that Scotland were on scoring bent, and despite every effort of the Welshmen, the try came. There was a perfect mêlee around the Welsh posts. Scot after Scot assailed the line in Herculean fashion, and at length Monteith waded across, amidst cheers. The kick was entrusted to McAllum, but the Watsonian failed.

Not much time had now to run, and amidst the cheers of the spectators, who saw a Scottish victory looming ahead, the game was resumed. The Welshmen were not yet done, and the closing moments saw a despairing effort by the sons of the Principality, the Welsh backs getting away in magnificent line. Maddocks was all but in, when Sloan brought him down. From the line-out Greig kicked to the centre, where there were three Welshmen unmarked. Like a streak of light Evans made for the line and passed to Gibbs. The latter went dead straight just outside the touch-line. It was tremendous, and he did not try to dodge Sloan. With the pace on, the Welshmen reckoned he would brush Sloan aside. On bounded the Welshman, and got over, but up went the touch-judge's flag. There were loud cries of dissent from the Welshman, who were convinced that Gibbs was never in touch. Touch, however, was given, and from the line-out the Scots got to the centre, when the whistle blew. The last dash by Gibbs was a superb bit of work, and did not meet with the success it well merited. Result:—

Scotland (2 tries)	6
Wales (1 penalty goal)	3

LEAGUE TABLES TO DATE.

The interest in League work on Saturday was not of a pronounced character, but there were some interesting happenings. Newcastle United overwhelmed Manchester United, at St. James' Park, and went to the head of LeagueI. in consequence, while Sheffield United moved up several places as the result of their win over Preston N. E. Chelsea did exceedingly well to halve the points with Leicester Fosse, at Leicester, and this makes their prospects the more rosy. In the Southern League Queen's Park Rangers took two points from Leyton, at Park Royal, and Reading won a hard game at Elm Park against Plymouth Argyle League tables appended:—

BILLIARDS.

When, midway through Thursday afternoon's sitting at Messrs. Burroughes and Watts' Soho, square salon, Diggle led Stevenson by no fewer than 1,372 points, the Lancastrian's numerous admirers were shaking hands with each other, and maintaining that, despite his little "accident" when playing Dawson recently, he was quite justified in aspiring to play the top-weights on level terms. They were, however, just a little "too previous" with their self-congratulations. They probably failed to remember that although Stevenson a few years ago was not famed for his battling qualities when in the "pit," he is now as game as he is brilliant. Instead of cracking up, as many expected he would, the Hull artist went after his man in a style that could not have been excelled by that prince of battlers, C. Dawson himself. Indeed, on the evening of the day when Diggle's admirers had imagined it was practically all over, Stevenson had so pulled the game round that but little separated the contestants on the handicap. Then on Friday, the scratch player practically put paid to Diggle's account with that superb effort of 599, and although the Mancunian overshadowed this great break with the effort of his life—the 673 referred to elsewhere—in the very last stage of the match, Stevenson came through with a very handsome victory. Brilliant as Stevenson undoubtedly is, all his brilliance would have been of little avail on this occasion if it had not been backed up by the extra bit of "devil" he introduced into his play.

THREE BREAKS OF THE WEEK.

Three breaks stand out by themselves during the week—the individual record breaks of 673 and 360 by Diggle and Aiken respectively, and the 599 by Stevenson on Friday—but apart from these the work of the various professionals in this direction has not been out of the ordinary. The brilliant triumvirate—Stevenson, Dawson, and Diggle—are still far ahead of all others in the appended table, which denotes brilliancy, although in the "Results Table" they do not appear in such a favourable light, several of the younger players taking precedence here. THE BIG TOURNAMENT.

The nearer its close, the more interesting does this event become, each of the three heats still to play having a decided bearing on the result. Stevenson and Inman are in the best position, but events might so work out that a tie between four is more than a possibility. The appended table will assist Sporting Life readers to form a fairly accurate idea of the possibilities of the situation. It conveys all the chief features of the games already decided, and denotes that with only three games to go, five of the six players are still in a state of uncertainty :—

	P.	W.	L.	Inns.	Points.	Av.
H. W. Stevenson (scr.)	4	3	1	766	31,121	44·43
*M. Inman (rec. 2,250)	4	3	1	711	30,716	28·89

C. Harverson (rec. 2,000)	5	1	4	1,118	41,937	28·47

Note.—The final column gives the average for every completed visit paid to the table. For this purpose the starts and misses have been deducted from the total points.

*Fourth heat abandoned, owing to illness of Inman. Game awarded to Diggle, with scores 3,716—3,666 in favour of Inman.

ROWING.

THE UNIVERSITY BOAT RACE.

OXFORD.

Although other branches of sport are suffering from a continuation of the frost, the conditions which prevailed yesterday afternoon left little to be desired from the rowing man's point of view. The Dark Blues again journeyed below Locks under the supervision of Captain Willis, and were afloat soon after two o'clock. They proceeded at a steady paddle to Sandford, where on clearing the lock they had a formal start, and then paddled to the Horse Gate.

Continuing after a brief halt, Gladstone started off at 32 to the minute. After some distance, however, the rate of striking was reduced to 28, which was continued to the island. In Nuneham Reach, however, Gladstone quickened to 31, and sending the boat along in capital style, they finished the spin at the Black Bridge. As usual, they stretched their legs on the bank, and then, re-embarking, pulled back to the barge, only one sharp burst of rowing being done on the way. Names and weights :—

CAMBRIDGE.

After having practised for twenty-seven days, the Light Blues yesterday entered strict training, and in the evening all dined together. Practically speaking, there have been no changes since the 21st of last month, and it may be taken that the crew are definitely settled. Not since they returned from Richmond has there been any work during the morning, nor was there any change yesterday, when, as on the previous day—owing to Powell, Hudson, Goldsmith, Burn, Baynes, and Shimwell being tubbed—the eight were late in getting away.

The sun shone brilliantly, but the tow-path was in a vile condition. Nevertheless, chiefly because it was early closing day, several hundreds of people assembled outside the Goldie Boathouse to watch the crew push off, while a good number accompanied the coach, Mr. Escombe.

Pulling away from headquarters, they had a number of "easies" before they reached the Pike and Eel. From here they went to Grassy Corner in one piece, paddling as steadily as they possibly could, and registering only 21 to the minute. Occasionally they broke into half a dozen strokes of rowing. Getting together again, they paddled at 26 to the Locks, where they came about and stripped. A preliminary start landed them at the Little Bridge, and from here they rowed to the Ditch, keeping up a stroke of 34. From here they paddled to Ditton Corner, and then rowed to Cook's, the latter at a stroke of 32. The first piece of rowing was good, but in the Long Reach, although there was but little wind, they splashed rather a lot and occasionally rolled. Names and weights :—

BOXING.

Despite the wretched weather on the evening of the 4th instant there was an excellent attendance at headquarters to witness the programme arranged by the management. The principal events on the card were a couple of ten-round contests in which Army and Navy men figured. Seaman E. Kelly (late of H. M. S. Jupiter)—who, it will be remembered, met Tiger Smith several months ago in the same ring—met J. McMurray (Royal Garrison Artillery), while the contestants in the other event were those well-known feather-weights, Stoker C. Stoodley (H. M. S. Drake) and Dan Bowie (Champion of Natal), the men having signed articles to box at 8st. 12lbs. When the men weighed earlier in the day the visitor just went the required poundage, while Stoodley was 8lbs. lighter. Unfortunately, the Drake representative had not recovered from an injury to his right hand, which became very painful in the third meeting, and caused his retirement.

The meting between the heavy-weights, Kelly and McMurray, ended even more abruptly, the former winning in decisive fashion in the second round. Another contest which was contested between "handy men" was that between Seaman Mackerel and Seaman Broadbent, but the latter knew more about the business in hand, and won easily. Further progress was made in the 10st. novices' competition, and those who had braved the elements were well rewarded for their trouble.

Officials :—Referee, Mr. J. H. Douglas ; timekeeper, Mr. E. Zerega ; M. C., Mr. A. F. Bettinson ; seconds, Arthur Gutteridge and Bill Baxter.

PASTIMES.

JU-JITSU AT CAMBRIDGE.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY JU-JITSU CLUB vs. LONDON SCHOOL OF JU-JITSU.—The first match between institutions or clubs outside Japan took place at Cambridge on Friday, 18th January, and in view of the extending popularity of the exercise I should like to be allowed to mark the occasion by offering details, together with some criticisms, in order to supply a record of the game for the ju-jitsu players of the future. Three men represented each side and the contests were as follows : -

1. E. A. MACNEE (CAMBRIDGE) vs. C. A. MACCLYMONT (LONDON).—In this contest it seemed as though both contestants were too much impressed with the importance of the match—and naturally enough, as they were the very first representative combatants in a ju-jitsu match outside Japan. Accordingly neither was able to show his knowledge of ju-jitsu to any great extent. After three minutes Macnee tried a good knee throw which was very effective, MacClymont falling to the ground. Groundwork followed and Macnee eventually forced MacClymont to surrender by the use of the neck-lock although, strictly speaking, he ought to have relaxed his hold when MacClymont raised him and dashed him on the mat. Afterwards Macnee assumed the aggressive and no further score resulting, the referee in ten minutes awarded the match to the Cambridge representative on the one point that he had gained.

2. G. T. LEMON (CAMBRIDGE) vs. F. B. ROGERS (LONDON).—This was a more interesting contest for the onlookers, but a difficult one for the referee, as it was a standing combat from beginning to end. In two minutes Lemon tried the first trip against Rogers's left leg, quickly, however, changing it to a side throw, which was successful. It was so quickly done that only an expert would have noticed that there were two tricks employed. Lemon was awarded three-quarters of a point for this, subsequently making up one point. Rogers meanwhile had gained half a point, and gained another half point by a good side throw, so that with the score at one point all the game became more and more interesting. In twelve minutes Rogers threw Lemon over his head by means of the stomach throw, thus winning the match.

3. E. T. BUSK (CAMBRIDGE) vs. W. H. DREW (LONDON).—Busk, though only a beginner, had shown considerable promise, and was included in the side at the request of the instructor himself. Drew was the lightest of all the contestants, but showed great agility and science. In a few minutes Drew, using the first trip, effected an excellent throw, which very clearly deserved one point. Busk attacked with the shoulder and hip throws, but Drew guarded, and soon gained three-quarters of a point. Another quarter of a point would have given him the maximum of two points, but Busk on the ground managed to seize Drew's left leg, and getting a leg lock, forced Drew to pat the mat in token of surrender, thus gaining one point. Having found out where to attack, Busk soon got the same lock again on the same leg, scoring another point, and winning the victory by quarter of a point. Drew's style, both in attack and in defence, was worthy of admiration, as was also Busk's pluck in maintaining the fight and eventually winning after his opponent had gained one and three-quarter points.

Of the three prizes presented by Baron Komura, the Japanese Ambassador, two fell to Cambridge and one to London. No roughness was displayed on either side, and full confidence was placed in the referee.

SKATING.

SPEED CHAMPIONSHIP OF EUROPE.

The European championship took place on Saturday and Sunday, 2nd and 3rd February, at Davo's Plate, together with several competitions in figure-skating. The entries for the championship were : S. Mathisen (International Skating Club, Davos), F. Schilling (Vienna Skating Club), O. Steen (Christiania Skating Club), M. Ocholm (Stockholm Skating Club).

The rules of the International Skating Union, under which all International competitions, either in speed or figure skating, are held, set forth that the winner of the championship must be successful over at least two of the following distances, and that he must run in all, viz., 500, 5,000, 1,500, and 10,000 metres.

The world's records for distances up to 10,000 metres are :—

	m.s.
500 metres.	0·41⅘.	Rudolph Gundersen,	at Davos,	1906
1,000 „	1·34,	Peter Oestlund	„	1900
1,500 „	2·22⅘,	Peter Oestlund	„	1900
5,000 „	8·37⅗,	Jap Eden,	at Hamar,	1894
10,000 „	17·50⅕,	Peter Oestlund	at Davos,	1900

Davos is undoubtedly the best of venues for speed-skating and training. The climate and ice are excellent, and the absence of wind is all in favour of fast times. It will be seen from the above table that four out of five world's records have been made there. The racing track is double throughout and 400 metres in circumference, the competitors crossing over at a given point in each lap.

It will be seen that no English competitors were present; indeed, England is never represented in any International speed skating event. Surely this cannot be from lack of good material, for given similar facilities for training, our boys should be as good as any, but from want of energy on the part of those who control the sport.

The National Skating Association of Great Britain is a rich body, but it has never sent a skater to train or race abroad, while the chief object of similar bodies on the Continent is to ensure that a capable representative shall be present at the principia meetings. The clubs take a real interest in the efforts of their men, who, on their side, are equally anxious to do credit to their clubs.

The competitions were commenced on Saturday morning with the compulsory figures for the Ladies' Figure-Skating. For this event there was three entries, all from the Figure-Skating Club, London—Mrs. G. Smith, Miss Lycett, and Miss Eardly Wilmot. The figures selected comprised loops, counters, three-change-three, and the simple three's. Most of the figures were skated best by Mrs. Smith, Miss Lycett being a close second.

The first of the four races for the championship followed, over 500 metres, and this produced the surprise of the meeting, for the young Swedish skater, Oeholm, who was making his début in Davos, succeeded in equalling world's record for the distance. The result and times were:—Oeholm (Stockholm), 44⅕secs., 1; Steen (Christiania), 47secs., 2; Schilling (Vienna), 50secs., 3.

The 5,000 metres race was next decided, and here the Swedish skater was again successful. The result were:—Oeholm, 9mins. 6⅘secs., 1; Steen, 9mins. 18⅖secs., 2; Schilling, 9mins. 18⅗secs., 3.

The Swede thus secured the championship, though compelled to race in the 1,500 and 10,000 metres on the following day in order to obtain the title.

On Sunday the free-skating for the ladies' competition was decided. In this Miss Lycett was first, but Mrs. Smith's lead in the compulsory figures enabled her to win, the result being:—Mrs. Smith, 1; Miss Lycett, 2; Miss Eardly Wilmot, 3.

The race for the 1,500 metres was a fine one. Victory again rested with the Swedish champion, the times being :—Oeholm, 2mins. 31⅘secs., 1; Schilling, 2mins. 32⅘secs., 2; Steen, 2mins. 36secss. 3.

During the afternoon exhibitions of fancy-skating were given by Mrs. Syers (lady champion) and of pair-skating by Mr. and Mrs. Syers, and Mr. and Mrs. Johnson.

The final event was the 10,000 metres race. In this Oeholm was obviously suffering from his previous exertions, and he fell at the half-distance and finished third. Times :—Schilling, 18mins. 44secs., 1; Steen, 18mins. 47⅖secs. 2; Oeholm, 18mins. 52secs., 3.

The meeting was carried out in perfect weather, and was witnessed by an immense number of spectators.

No. X.

The tenth Meet held at Jodhpur Thana last Friday morning drew a large gallery, but a moderate field of performers, a fact accounted for to some extent by the number of hunter races on the maidan just now. The course started at the Thana and after three fences on the railway side crossed the main road opposite the new tank, past which the Secretaries had found a very passable way on to the old piece of plough land, where the ancient wall in the corner was dully resuscitated. It claimed at least one victim to add to its long tale of successes, as Mr. Koetlitz and his gay chestnut pony took a glorious toss over it in the pony chase. The drop fence was the next speciality, but was very moderate in its demands, and only the gentleman who is bold enough to call his horse "Avernus" made a facile descent on to the swiftly rising clods at this obstacle. A long sweep round behind the Durzis' village brought us out beyond the Tollygunge Lane without accident, but the run home along the Mullah Hat Road to the Ladies' wall and so back to the main road brought an unusual number of people to grief. Orphan Boy and Ruddigore fell together at a simple wall in the open, but the undaunted policeman was quickly remounted and actually dead-heated for second place. The last hurdle dislodged Mr. Pierson and gave Mr. Shearme a very nasty looking fall, while shortly after a sportsman on a bay cob also took the floor. On the whole it was quite an exciting morning.

After all these tumbles Mrs. Lamond Walker and Detective won a real hard chase in tip top style, the President of the Club and Mr. Halliday dead-heated next and the rest came in procession. The order was :—

1. Mrs. Walker on Detective.
2. Mr. Dudley Myers on Sir Walter.
3. Mr. Halliday on Ruddigore.
4. Capt. Fitzgerald on Fermoy.
5. Mr. Deakin on Trilby.
6. Dr. Forsyth on Corydon.

Pathfinder showed the ponies the way round, and after this successful burst Captain Holden seems to have a very excellent chance of bringing off a double event in the Cup chases. The official order of running was :—

1. Capt. Holden on Pathfinder II.
2. Mr. Forster on Josephus.
3. Mr. Wheeler on Envious.
4. Mr. Pauntley on Irish Boy.
5. Mr. Barrow on Puck.
6. Mr. Bell-Irving on Samah.

THE INFANTRY TOURNAMENT.

FIRST TIES.

ROYAL WELSH FUSILIERS vs. DURHAM L. I.—The Durhams set about it at once and put on no less than four goals and a subsidiary in the first chukker, the reply of their opponents being a single subsidiary. They increased their score with steady persistence and it was not till the third chukker that the Fusiliers got a goal and after that play ruled pretty level to the end, but the Durhams maintained their lead and eventually won by 7 goals and 1 subsidiary to 4 goals and 2 subsidiaries. Teams :—

Umpires :—Colonel Porta and Captain Bannerman.

SEAFORTH HIGHLANDERS vs. ROYAL IRISH RIFLES.—Taking the field at by no means full strength the Irishmen were severely handicapped in meeting such a powerful combination as that presented by the Highlanders.

It goes without saying that they did their best and at times put up a most creditable defence ; but it was all defence, and to say, and the Highlanders won by 6 goals and 3 subsidiaries to 1 subsidiary. Teams :—

Umpires :—Colonel Phayre and Major Daunt.

The Queen's vs. Rifle Brigade.—A level, fast and pretty game. It was anybody's game up to the fourth chukker when the Riflemen put on a spurt and had most of the attack thence to the end of the game which they won by 3 goals and 1 subsidiary to 1 subsidiary. Teams :—

Rifle Brigade.		The Queens.

The Semi-Finals.

The Durham L. I. vs. Seaforth Highlanders.—In the opening chukker the Seaforths made a strong demonstration in the Durhams' ground, but they could not break through the Durhams' defence, and then the latter charged the venue of play and hotly attacked the Highlanders' flags, and ere the chukker closed they scored a subsidiary. The second chukker witnessed a lively bout all over the ground, and the Durhams were able to add a goal to their score. The third chukker was the most eventful of the game. The Seaforths rallied and put a new complexion on the game, while the Durhams showed a falling off. Play for most of the time was in the Durhams' ground, where the Seaforths put up 2 goals and 2 subsidiaries. Though the Seaforths in the succeeding chukker continued to have the best of the game, the Durhams on several occasions looked like asserting themselves, but they were only able to add a minor point to their score, while the Highlanders increased theirs by one major and two minor points. The fifth and practically the last chukker saw the Durhams again playing up very level, but the Seaforths got 2 goals to their 1 goal, the Seaforths winning by 5 goals 4 subsidiaries to 2 goals 2 subsidiaries. Teams as before.

Umpires :—Colonels Phayre and Portal.

The Cameronians vs. Rifle Brigade.—In the first two chukkers the Riflemen had put up 4 goals and 2 subsidiaries to 1 subsidiary, and had entirely the best of the game. Then the Cameronians made a change in the disposition of their team, and they were able to put a better aspect on the game. In the second chukker the Cameronians, mainly through Colonel Macan's help, scored 2 goals to the Riflemen's 1 goal, and it was entirely owing to the splendid defence of Trafford that the Cameronians in two or three hot assaults did not score again, for the ball was re-cued each time when all but out between the flags. In the concluding chukker the Riflemen got three more minor points, and finally won a splendidly played game by 5 goals 5 subsidiaries to 2 goals 1 subsidiary. Teams as before.

Umpires :—Colonels Phayre and Portal.

The Final.

Rifle Brigade vs. Seaforth Highlanders.—The final was played, between these teams on the 23rd instant. On a capital ground, in good pleasant weather and before a big gallery both teams showed their best form. Play was brilliant almost throughout, fast galloping, clean hitting and good combination evoking continuous applause. It was a level game, too, the Riflemen winning by 4 goals and 3 subsidiaries to 3 goals. Details :—

The first chukker was a very good and lively bout. The Riflemen early got a goal, and the Seaforths quickly equalized. Then the Rifles confining the play to the Seaforth ground, got two subsidiaries at the close of the chukker, which was prolonged through penalties awarded against each team. The Seaforth pressed home their attack and scored a goal. Score: Seaforths, 2 goals to Rifle Brigade's 1 goal and 2 subsidiaries.

In the second chukker the Rifle again were early to score a goal, and thereafter for a long space held the ball in the Seaforths' half of the ground, where scoring was averted by good defence. Then the ball went out in the Riflemen's ground. Score: Rifle Brigade 2 goals and 2 subsidiares to 2 goals.

In the third chukker, soon after play started, the Riflemen took the ball into the Seaforths' territory, where after a brief detention they attacked the flags and scored a goal. Very level and excellent play with fine individual displays followed in mid-field, both the backs doing grand service till the ball finally went out at the side in mid ground. Score: Rifle Brigade 3 goals and 2 subsidiories to 2 goals.

In the fourth chukker was another very level and fast period. At first the Seaforths were hot on the attack in front of the Riflemen's flags, then Trafford relieved the pressure by a long shot into mid-field and changed the venue of the play. The Riflemen now assumed the offensive till the ball went out at the side, the chukker closing without score.

In the fifth chukker there were only five and-a-half minutes left for play, which were utilised in a vigorous struggle. From the throw-in the Riflemen got on, and by a clean shot they scored a subsidiary, and continued on an attack in the Seaforths' ground, and shortly scored a goal. From the throw-in the Seaforths took the ball to the Rifles end, where they had two unsuccessful shots at the flags and continuing to hold the ball in Rifles end they ultimately got a goal. Uneventful play followed all over the ground till the call of final time. The Rifle Brigade won by 4 goals and 3 subsidiaries to 3 goals. Teams as before.

A distinguished veteran officer, who habitually speaks in a low voice, which sometimes sounds confidental, was calling on some intimate friends. The door was "answered" by an under housemaid, a young girl to whom he was a stranger. Having entered, he asked her to fetch a brace of pheasants from his carriage, and noticed with some surprise that in doing so she carefully hid them under her apron. Being rather amused at her extreme caution, he mentioned the incident to the lady of the house, who explained that the girl was a new hand, quite recently taken on adding: "And a very nice, careful girl indeed; but I can't quite understand why"—then suddenly remembering—"Oh! she is a gamekeeper's daughter!"

Talking about churches, etc., suggests the following riddle :—"Which is the most obedient, the bell or the organ?" The bell, of course, because it sounds when it is tolled (told); but the organ says he "will be blowed first."

Cricket.

CRICKET IN CALCUTTA.

English Schools vs. Indian Schools.—An excellent game under this title proved a fitting termination to the cricket season in the Eden Gardens, and after some tall scoring on both sides ended in a most creditable victory for the home schools with four wickets in hand. The local side was a strong one, though weakened by the absence of Boo, owing to a damaged hand, but the English team was not at full strength, and with von Ernsthausen away all the first day, was decidedly short of bowling. Bayley won the toss, and naturally took first innings on a perfect wicket. Mookerjee soon went, but Rosser and Quiterio made a prolonged stand, though both were several times beaten by Stewart who sent down his first twelve overs for 14 runs, including six consecutive maidens. Both batsmen too had lives at the wicket were Tatam was not in his usual fine form. At last Quiterio was L-b.-w. to Guise for 77, a stylish but uneven and rather nervous innings. Mehta adopted more forcing tactics and shaped well until bowled by a good ball from Quin, who also at last got rid of Rosser, thanks to a splendid one hand catch in the slips by Nicholls. The outgoing batsman's display, though a little dull at times, was practically faultless, and he once more thoroughly proved himself the backbone of any such local side as played in this match. Rosser's wicket fell at 234, to which he had subscribed 112 in two hours and forty minutes. Stumps were drawn with the board showing the high total of 254 for only four wickets, but next morning Stewart, though not bowling nearly so well as on the previous day and von Ernsthausen soon dismissed the remaining batsmen and the innings closed for 328, von Ernsthausen securing three wickets for 23 runs.

The home schools entered on their tall task with four hours and a quarter to play, and got the runs with an hour to spare, in spite of the total failure of Eddis, Turnbull and Hill, of whom the two former have been scoring so freely all the year. Guise was the hero of the match, and once more fairly won the game for his side. Eddis was caught at the wicket in the first over, but Guise and Pope then put on 132 before Pope was leg before for a dashing hit, not faultless, 60. Turnbull and Hill were clean bowled by consecutive balls from Templeton, and Nicholls, though he made a few hard hits, showed no defence at all. Five wickets were down for 168, but von Ernthausen and Guise played confident free cricket until the former shared Pope's fate, 235—6—42. The match was by no means won yet, but Bartholomew, who now joined Guise, also played sound, stylish cricket and the runs were eventually knocked off without further loss. Guise was out in the next over for 134, an innings which in the circumstances it is impossible to over praise and the game then came to an end. Bartholomew's 34, not out, was also a good and valuable display. Mehta for the losers bowled extremely well, but with shocking bad luck, and Templeton was effective and should have been kept on longer when the wicket begun to wear as he was making the ball get up very hastily: the rest of the eight bowlers tried were innocuous. A word of praise must be given to the cover points on each side. Eddis and Quiterio who both fielded splendidly: taken all round the ground work of the losers was better than that of their opponents, but failure to hold catches in the slips, Templeton being a prominent offender, may have cost them the match. Full score.

Ballygunge C. C. vs. Mr. H. V. Low's XI.—This provided the hard hitting B. C. C. men with a very easy victory as will be seen by the appended scores. Messrs. Martin, Whiteley, Sherman and Eastgate smote vigorously and runs came merrily; also "Mr. Extras" weighed in with a more than useful 44! H. M. Sherman was also in good form with the ball and collared six wickets. Messrs. Lee and Mytton batted best for the losers and Simson and Yeoman bowled for them with some effect. Score :—

Golf.

GOLF IN THE BRITISH ISLES.

London, 8th, February 1907.

Once again has the even tenour of the ways of Links and Linksmen been disturbed by meteorological vagaries and the whole of the British Isles has been held captive by the icy grip of King Frost, what can the golfer do then poor thing? not much! that is to say not much with regard to medal or Bogey for golf is not Golf when the ground is like iron, when the sand in the bunkers is apparently cast in the same metallic mould and when one's fingers are dead and yellow! But although on Saturday, 26th January, one met more athletic looking men carrying skates than clubs, yet after mid-day on Sunday a suspicion of a Scotch mist conveyed to the alert mind an idea that thaw was at hand and by Monday morning when the London Street were thick and splashing with mud one knew that the rain of below 32° had ceased and hope eternal sprang up with renewed vigour in the golfing breast.

The decision of the 'Varsity captains to play their annual match once again at Hoylake has provoked some adverse criticism, one or two people being of opinion that the golf match like all the other inter-'Varsity contests should pro bono publico be held within the metropolitan area we have somehow so got into the habit of expecting that all these should be played or rowed within a certain radius that it offends our conservative notions and we object to Hoylake or any other Links far far away being the venue. There is absolutely no reason for this nor are there any hard and fast rules confining these or any matches—football, cricket, hockey or golf to any given district. Hoylake is a good test of golf and March is a bad month very often for Sandwich or any first class Links in the south-east corner of the British Isles. It appears that the choice of green lies alternately with the Light Blue and Dark Blue captain, and the Hon'ble C. N. Bruce who has the right in 1907 by virtue of office as Oxford captain has chosen Hoylake—so be it. The Cricketing Golfers inter-County-Tournament has begun again and so far as one can ascertain there will be far fewer Scratchings this year than last. The holders (Yorkshire) seem to have quite as good a chance of retaining their title this season as they had of winning it last, on the Mid-Surrey Club's Course on the Old Deer Park, Richmond, on Tuesday, 29th ultimo, the first heat of the Tournament was played between Middlesex and Somerset, resulted in a win for the latter county by 3 up and 2 to play. As will be remembered the conditions are this year quite altered and have taken the form of a foursome on merits. The winning county was represented by Mr. W. Trask and Mr. W. N. Roe, whilst the defeated "team" consisted of Messrs. Beldam and E. S. Littlejohn. Nothing at all remarkable or worthy of comment occurred during the round, the only noticeable feature being the bad putting by the losers. After the frost, however, probably the greens were difficult, on Wednesday, 30th, a very interesting game also in connection with the Cricketing Golfing Tournament took place between Yorkshire and Lancashire on the Formby Clubs Links, the Lancashire couple, Messrs. W. B. Stoddart and E. E. Steel, began well and stood 2 up at the turn. From this point, however, the Yorkshiremen (the Hon'ble F. Jackson and Mr. Ernest Smith) put their shoulders into it and finally won the match by 3 up and 2 to play. A very interesting contest took place on Saturday, 2nd February, between Devonshire represented by the brothers the Hon'bles Denys and Osmund Scott, and Essex for whom Messrs. A. S. Johnston and A. H. Read fought, this match took place at Walton Heath and resulted in a win for Lord Elton's Sons by a decisive 4 up and 2 to play, judging from the form showed by the two brothers, they should stand a very good chance of going through the Tournament.

At Hythe, on the same day, Kent and Gloucestershire had a good fight, long strong hitters in the cricket field all four have many a time and oft proved themselves, and long strong drivers from the tee and though the green were the quartette at Hythe. For Kent were Messrs. C. J. Burnup and K. L. Hutchings and the Gloucester pair were G. L. Jessop and J Healing. So close was the match that they stood all square on the 18, and had to contest another 9 before the home County finished 2 up.

Again on Saturday, 2nd, was another match in this very interesting tournament decided, this was between Northumberland and Durham far far away in the other extreme of England for Hythe to Seaton Carew is a far cry, and there Messrs. A. B. Horsley and T. Knich (Durham) beat Messrs. J. Hansell and V. Thompson (Northumberland) by 3 up and 2 to go.

Interesting as in the progress of the competition, there are other than Golfing Cricketers in the world of Golf, there are Professionals who just now are without a thrashing at the London Professional tournament, for this there is a very large entry and great enthusiasm prevails, but it would be tedious to enumerate the contest as they take place one by one, so it is proposed and carried unanimously by the writer of these notes and postpone all details until the finish and then to give a brief synopsis only of the preliminary matches. The Oxford and Cambridge Society's Easter Tour will this year be made in Lancashire and Cheshire. Easter falls so uncomfortably early, that with Arctic weather we are now enjoying (?) (8th February) one hardly dares make plans and preparation for the Spring Festival. All the "Union" are making up their Fixture Cards and programmes for the year, the Sussex will hold there Championship on the links of the Southdown Club, on 18th, 19th, and 20th April. The Cornish Championship is to take place at Newquay from 20th to 25th May. Perhaps after all one might as well be up-to-date in the Cricketing Golfers matches. Snow, hail and frost prevented that between Norfolk and Suffolk coming off on the appointed day, but it will probably take place at Hellesden, the Royal Norwich Club's course, as soon as the extra cold weather disappears. Then on 4th February Sussex and Hampshire met at Richmond. The Sussex Representatives were Mr. George Brown, the famous batsman, an old international footballer, and Mr. H. L. Simms who also played for the county last season, Mr. E. C. Lee and Mr. F. E. Lacey played for Hants and this latter couple beat Sussex by 2 holes after a very close struggle. Next week I hope to give more interesting notes, but as I said frost freezes more than the water and the ground.

HOCKEY IN CALCUTTA.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

THE Calcutta Hockey season of 1907 opened on the 6th instant, with the first games in the Senior and Junior Leagues, and with over a hundred and fifty fixtures to be got through in six weeks, the executives have had some considerable difficulty in arranging the programme. It is to be hoped that it will be found possible to complete the number of games by the specified date, and not to have to continue them throughout the Beighton Cup Competition as was the case last season.

The League has opened in a most disappointing manner; two teams in the Upper Division, viz., Ballygunge and Hornets, and teams galore in the Junior Division have been obliged to cancel their engagements owing to their inability to get a side together. The E. I. R., I understand, have scratched altogether, and it simply seems as if certain Clubs have entered the League without the least intention of seeing it through.

Sibpur have been obliged to scratch to Calcutta, and their conduct, to say the least of it, is most deplorable. They knew perfectly well that they were sending a team to play in the Allahabad Tournament and therefore could not keep several of their earlier engagements in the League, and then have the audacity to write at the eleventh hour requesting Clubs to put off engagements to indefinite dates in following months! There is nothing whatever against their entering for both tournaments, and in fact we are only too glad to see one of our leading clubs competing in outside tournaments had they only notified earlier that they would be unable to keep some of their earlier fixtures in the Calcutta League, and thus avoided a lot of unnecessary trouble.

The authorities are to be congratulated on the formation of a Hockey Referees' Association and Clubs have been asked to send in the names of members willing to act as referees during the season: I understand quite a number of acceptances have been received.

Mr. Miller and Mr. Wade, who have jointly taken on the Secretaryship of the Association, have hopes of being able to appoint competent referees for all the fixtures. Personally I do not consider their task an easy one. On some dates there are seven games down for decision which will mean the appointment of fourteen referees, and although two referees for each game is not compulsory, it is certainly desirable. It will be difficult to obtain the requisite number on occasions such as these and if the Secretaries succeed they will have every cause for congratulation. It is up to individuals to assist them, with their services, and more especially for older players to prove that beyond the personal pleasure and interest they have had in the game, they still have the interests of the game as played in this City at heart.

It is early yet to discuss the prospects of any Clubs, these I hope to deal with in my notes of next week. There are, however, one or two points which might be brought to notice with regard to change in rules and play.

A new rule is now in force whereby when a ball passes over the side line it can be rolled in along the ground by hand in any direction and need not necessarily as hitherto be rolled in behind, or in line with the point, and parallel to the goal line, where it was out.

With regard to the actual play itself, it is to be hoped that the game will be conducted in a more sportsmanlike manner than has hitherto been noticeable on the maidan. "Above all," to quote the words of advice in an article on the subject of how to play the game "let blows be received in silence. Hockey is an irritating game abounding in knocks which raise a bruise and the temper at about the same rate, however it is most excellent discipline, and to rob it of that with strong language is to squander half the afternoon."

A few words of advice to captains, which may not be altogether unnecessary. Let there be no shouting for passes, no bellowed orders; talking, if there is any to be done, should be done by the captain and possibly should the captain be playing in the back division, the centre forward might be deputed to do the cackle. Let every man do his best in his own way, and let the umpire not be appealed to as if his ears were in his boots.

WHY NOT.

THE BANGALORE TOURNAMENT.

THE Bangalore annual hockey tournament for the magnificent challenge cup held at present by the Bangalore Rifle Volunteers opened on the 2nd instant. Only seven teams have entered this year and it seems odds on the B. R. V. retaining the trophy, for they are still a very strong side.

BANGALORE GYMKHANA vs. ROYAL ARTILLERY.—This was the first match played, and the game cannot be described as a good one. The troops in Garrison have not had much time for practice, owing to lengthy and exacting manœuvres and the Gunners, although energetic, played a wild and unscientific game. "Sticks" were frequent, and "fouls" and "offside" appeals numerous. In fact the referees' whistle was hardly ever still. The Gymkhana, although a somewhat scratch side, played a much better game, and had it not been for some marvellous saves by the R. A. goal-keeper, would have won by considerably more than one goal to nil, which represented the state of affairs when time was called.

ROYAL ENGINEERS vs. SHERWOOD FORESTERS.—Played on the 23rd instant. This was a much better game, and there were good men on both sides. The Sappers pressed almost throughout the first half, but only scored once, Paisley for the Sherwoods effecting some marvellous "saves." The interval arrived with the score 1—love in favour of the R. E., Bamberger having scored for them. The early portion of the second moiety of play saw the Sappers still pressing and except for occasional flashes of good passing between Bernard and Parsons the Sherwoods scarcely seemed to be in the hunt. Bamberger, and then White scored for the R. E., but during the last quarter of an hour a great change came over the game, the Sherwoods almost penning their adversaries. They worked like horses to score, although the match seemed hopelessly lost, and at length succeeded, through a good bit of passing. Lee centred from the right, and Bernard being hampered passed to Foxon on the left wing, the latter scoring amidst applause. The remaining play was all in favour of the men from Nottingham and Derbyshire but they could not get through the Sapper defence, and lost a good game by 3 goals to 1. Baos played well for the losers at centre half, Paisley was good in goal and Bernard and Parsons were the best of the forwards. For the winners White, Bamberger and Pemberton in the forward line, Agnew at centre half and Keenan at back were best.

PUNJAB NATIVE ARMY HOCKEY TOURNAMENT.

THE FINAL.

14TH SIKHS vs. 15TH SIKHS.—Played 4 P.M. on Saurday, 16th instant. The weather was against very fast play, for rain fell during the morning, and even during the game itself there was a smart shower. The clerk of the weather has been particularly unkind this year, rain having fallen on most days during the last fortnight, and it is a pity that the best grounds which had been carefully prepared were hardly played upon, as the 34th Pioneers' parade ground lies low and it takes many days for them to dry. However, to-day's game was played on the 38th Dogra ground which was in excellent condition after a short preparation. Both teams come from the same station, i.e., Ferozepore, and it is curious to notice that in most practice games the 14th usually held the upper hand, whereas to-day they had to admit defeat by 1 goal to love. The most noticeable incident of the game was the friendly spirit in which it was played, there was no roughness and yet play was as keen as possible, and though the referee was strict the whistle was not often in evidence. The 15th got their goal in the first half from a free hit near the circle. The 14th had undoubtedly bad luck, an excellent shot by Channer from a corner hit striking the goal-keeper's pads; the wearer of them could not possibly have seen the ball, but once he felt it promptly cleared. The game was mostly open up and down the ground, good play being shown by both sides. For the 15th Macmullen, though suffering from influenza, played a very good game at centre half, Muir doing equally good work at right half. McGrayne at back was very sure and got in his hits very quickly as did Bir Singh, his partner; at the same time the latter was rather inclined to rough play. For the 14th Channer and Pennington worked their hardest, but they tried to do everything themselves, and quite neglected their other forwards who towards the end were left absolutely unmarked, their opponents realising that the 14th halves would invariably pass the ball to one of these two players. Their backs played very surely and it was none of their fault that the 15th scored their goal. On the conclusion of the game General Kitchener kindly presented the cup to the winning team, and spoke some true and kind words regarding the game itself, and hockey in general; he mentioned the 40th Pathans for their good play and very rightly too, for they played to get more goals than their opponents and were unlucky in not being able to do so. This is the third time that the 15th Sikhs have won the cup which was presented by Ganda Singh Uberoi, the well-known athletic outfitters at Sialkot, and all who know them will be glad that the trophy is in the possession of such a real good sporting regiment.—Civil and Military Gazette.

GORAKHPORE GYMKHANA.

Saturday, 16th February 1907.

A VERY successful Gymkhana was run off to-day. The Honorary Secretaries, Messrs. Judson and Bliss, worked hard to secure full entries for each event and the results fully bore out their efforts.

The first event was for members of the Gorakhpore Squadron, and comprised part of their prize programme. The prize was presented by Major Crawford, I. M. S., and was won by Trooper Lang.

THE LADIES' DISTANCE HANDICAP was easily won by Miss Lightfoot, riding her racing pony King of Thule.

THE LIMERICK RACE was most amusing. Many and varied were the experiences of the "young maid of Japan." She was given children black and tan. She was held by the hand by a man. She generally waggled a fan. She was entranced at the sight of a man; but the crowning point was put to her misfortunes when "Being fanned with a fan by a man" she got so hot she exclaimed, "What! what!! The poor little maid of Japan!"

THE CRACKNEL STAKES afforded amusement. Mr. De Hoxar came in first, closely followed by Mr. McCall; these two, however, were disqualified; the first for losing his cigarette, and the second for losing the top of his sunshade.

IN THE IGNORANCE COMPETITION all did fairly well, though it puzzled several to find out that, if two sheep stood back to back, how could they see each other without turning. The name of the Home Secretary also seemed a stumbling block to many.

THE JOBBING STAKES was very easily won by Mr. Crawford.

The members of the Gorakhpore Squadron were "At Home." The Gymkhana prizes were presented by Mrs. Broun and the Corps prizes by Mrs. Turnbull.

A very successful and most enjoyable afternoon concluded with three cheers for the ladies, who so kindly undertook to distribute the rewards.

THE DOG NEVER A WOLF—ITS MODERN EVOLUTION.

SOMEONE—perhaps one who did not love this faithful friend of man—has asserted that the dog is a descendant of the wolf and has no distinctive canine ancestry.

This view is vigorously combatted by an authority who has recently put forth two fat volumes of 400 pages, each devoted to tracing dog history back to the beginning.

He has examined records, drawings, carvings and sculptures dating as far back as 7,000 years ago, and is unable to find any proof that the dog was once a wolf. His work is so sincere, so convincing, that one, after reading the eulogistic pages, is enabled to look the meanest cur in the face with some degree of respect.

This literary and research-loving friend of the dog went far back into the dim and forgotten past.

He found carved on the tomb of Amten, an Egyptian ruler of the Fourth Dynasty—about 3,500 years before the Christian era—a well-defined figure of a dog of the period.

And it was a dog—not a wolf, a half-wolf, or an animal having any close resemblance to a wolf.

It has a hunting dog, and was shown in three scenes, in two of them attacking a deer and in the third running some other kind of a horned animal.

It is said that the writers of ancient Egypt referred to this particular species of dog as a Foxhound.

If it had been a wolf, or the descendant of wolves, doubtless there would have been something to indicate the origin.

There were Terriers, too, in the early Egyptian days. At any rate, a Terrier-like dog is found among the relics of the Sixth Dynasty, about 3066 B. C.

A few centuries later in the line, the large Greyhound, the Mastiff and the Dalmatian, or coach dog, were discovered; and as early as 2266 B. C. the Dachshunde type appeared.

At that time the Dachshunde seemed to be the particular favorite as a house dog, and must have been in high favor at court, as the royal fancy in these times set the fashion regarding almost everything known to man of the period.

The early Egyptians had great reverence for the dog, and evidently did not consider it any relative of the wolf, which have no standing in their favor.

One of the early Egyptian gods, Ambis, is shown with a dog's head. When a family dog did in those long-gone times the family went into mourning.

There were severe penalties for moltreating a dog, and the animal was recognized as occupying almost as high aposition in the world of living things as man.

Six or seven hundred years before the Christian era the Greeks used dogs in war, teaching them to attack the horses of cavalry regiments.

Toy dogs were in favor as household pets, especially the Toy Spaniel and the little Pomeranian.

So far as can be learned, there was little difference between the dogs early history and those of the present, as regards size, weight, etc.

The Assyrian dog was about thirty inches high at the shoulder; that of the sporting gentlemen of Athens or Rome about twenty inches.

It was not until 1387 that the Spaniel appeared in the troubled history of the times. The first a members of the family are recorded as haing been the property of a famous sportsman, Gaston de Foix, who maintained a large estate in France, on the Spanish border.

With a Frenchman's depreciation of every nation but his own, Gaston de Foix said of his dogs that they "had many bad qualities, like the country they came from;" but he insisted that they never manifested any of the qualities of the wolf.

From about that time argument as to the probable descent of the dog from the wolf was dropped by the historian of the canine tribe.

He had evidently concluded that his contention had been proved, and that the straight-backward ancestry lines of the dog could be followed by the beginning of the tribal life, without touching the borders of wolfdom.

From the fourteenth century onward the historian devoted himself to following the development of various dog species.

The Setter and the Pointer, for example, were diveloped out of the transition from the ancient fowling piece to the flent-lock gun and the shotgun of later years.

The smooth sheepdog of the present is the original farm dog, and, in fact, is regarded as the original cur. The Bulldog is a close relative of the cur, it seems; but, through a series of years of upward breeding has been lifting himself into a higher and distinctive class.

Entirely a nineteenth century production is the Bull Terrier, dating from about 1820. The Black-and-Tan Terrier can boast of a little older ance try; while the Irish Terrier, it seems, has lost track of his ancestors. It is stated that this particular animal is mentioned in old Irish manuscripts.

From an old Scottish race comes the Skye Terrier—it may be the oldest of Terriers. No one knows the dawn of this dog's history.

The Great Dane received many years of careful training in Germany before he became generally known to the world. There are pictures of this species dating as far back as 1425.

Founder of the most useful, intelligent and fearless of the dog families is the Mastiff, which was among the war dogs of Rome.

The St. Bernard is known as far back as 1092, and the Newfoundland has a lineage of which even an animal may be proud.

Of the large family of hounds, the Irish Wolfhound is regarded as one of the oldest types of hunting dogs preserved in its original purity. The Greyhound and the Russian Wolfhound also reach back into dim antiquity.

All this research into the past of the dog tribe has had one principal object—to prove that the dog was not in the least to be regarded as a descendant of the wolf.

The canine member of the animal world stands upon his own feet, according to the proofs revealed by research, and has been a dog since the beginning of things animate upon the earth.—The Breeder and Sportsman.

Thursday, 21st February 1907.

On the whole this was a better show than we have yet attempted, with its 13 Classes and 166 entries, though it doesn't, of course, compare with the recent Calcutta Kennel Club Championship show which I see by the magnificent illustrated catalogue had no less than 82 classes and over 250 exhibits. Still it was successful and there were some good dogs benched. The judging was curious, I could not follow it in many instances; for example how Domino came to be overlooked in the wire-haired Fox Terrier Class seems incomprehensible. I append a list of the awards.

THE GRAMOPHONE CO.

GENTLEMEN,

The Gramophone of to-day I find is such an improved instrument for recording the human voice to the older machines with which so many of us are familiar, that my hitherto objection to allow the thousands who cannot hear me sing personally to listen to the reproduction of my voice through the instrumentality of your Gramophone is now quite removed, and the Records which you have lately made for me I think are natural reproductions of my voice.

Yours truly,

The Naturalist.

THE SENSE OF LOCALITY IN ANIMALS.

THE migration of birds is a subject which is full of interesting and difficult problems and not the least interesting nor the least difficult of comprehension is the question how they find their way. About the admirable accuracy of their movements there is no question whatever. The willow warbler will come back year after year to occupy the same position in the same tangle of grass and undergrowth as the site for its nest. Others are less accurate and punctual; but the exactness of this little bird is the more remarkable because of the apparently feeble powers of flight which seem to leave it quite unprovided with the locomotive means required to bring it so unerringly to its goal. While the questions which migration presents are difficult enough of understanding, there is one which transcends all the rest in its obscurity. It is the question which is suggested by the fact, apparently quite well authenticated, that in the case of many species they are the young birds of the year that lead the migration fight.

The instinct, as it appears to be, which leads animals to direct their course to a certain spot without, so far as we are able to ascertain, any previous hint or indication of guidance, demonstrates itself in several remarkable ways besides that of the migration fight, but in none perhaps more remarkably than in the case of the guanaco, a species of llama of South America, which resorts in immense numbers to a certain place to die. In fact, it seems from the accounts given by Darwin and by Mr. W. H. Hudson, that all the guanacos of the southern part of Patagonia must resort, when the hour of death approaches to a certain spot in a certain river-bed which has become a perfect mausoleum of their bones. Mr. Hudson had hazarded a very ingenious hypothesis to account for this assemblage in the common mortuary. He notes, primarily, that it is only the guanaco of the southern extremity of the South American Continent that has this habit; which is as much as to say that it is a habit restricted to descendants of forefathers who lived at one time in an extremely rigorous, semi-Arctic climate. Mr. Hudson conjectures that among these forefathers the instinct grew up, when the stress of hunger and cold was very dire, and they felt its chill setting upon them, of resorting to this sheltered place in the river bed where they might find warmth in their own closely collected numbers, and possibly food, which would enable them to outlive the days of extreme rigour. By a continual survival of those who betook themselves to this place of refuge the race instinct would be formed of resorting thither when they felt the tides of life running low. This feeling, Mr. Hudson argues, their descendants are likely to experience now at the approach of the hour of death, and in obedience to it flock to the same resort. But now it is no longer just a passing spell of extreme cold which they can hope to survive that leads them thither. The death call has come and they must lay their bones in the common mortuary. It is not "in order to die," as we so frequently say with a very common error in considering the ways of animals that the guanaco seeks his place; it would be nearer the truth if we were to say it was "in order to live." Another instance of what appears to be this wholly mysterious guidance is afforded by the well-known habit of the rattlesnakes, in the colder countries of their range to assemble together in great numbers for hibernation in caves. It seems to be pretty well established that the snakes, on emerging from these caves, cover long distances in their wanderings, that their young are generally born far away from the wintering-place, and yet that these young, although they do not accompany their parents, nor remain with them until the date of hibernation approaches, still succeed in finding their way to the caves with the greatest certainty.

About the pigeon itself there has been a great deal of misconception. It has been imagined that, provided a pigeon belongs to the variety which is called carrier or homing, it is enough to liberate the bird at any distance from its native cote, and it will then immediately fly straight home led by some mysterious force which is beyond human understanding. There is so much in the universe that really is beyond this modest limit that it is quite unnecessary to invent difficulties gratuitously. As a matter of fact, very well known to all trainers of these pigeons, they have to be carefully practised in flights of constantly extending distances along the line in which it is desired to send them eventually, until a chain of landmarks has become familiar to them along the whole course between the point at which it is wished to liberate them and their native home. There is no more mystery in this than in a man's finding his way along streets the features of which are known to him. Lord Avebury and other observers of insects have seen much to lead them to think that it is in the same simple manner that hymenopterous insects find their way back to their homes; they have no special loadstone.

THE OSTRICH.

ALL ostriches, adults as well as chicks, have a strange habit known as "waltzing." When chicks are let out from a kraal in the early morning they will often start away at a great pace. After running for a few hundred yards they will all stop, and with raised wings, spin rapidly round for some time, often until quite giddy, when a broken leg occasionally occurs. Adult birds, when running in large camps, will often, if the veld is good, do the same, especially if startled in the fresh of the early morning. A troop of birds waltzing, in full plumage, is a remarkably pretty sight.

Vicious cocks "roll" when challenging to fight, or when wooing the hen. The cock will suddenly bump down on to his "knees" (the ankle-joint), open his wings, making a straight line across his breast, and then swing them alternately backward and forward (keeping the line straight) as if on a pivot, each wing as it comes forward being raised while that going backward is depressed. The neck is lowered until the head is on a level with the back and the head and neck swing from side to side with the wings, the back of the head striking with a loud click against the ribs, first on the one side and then on the other. The click is produced by the skin of the neck, which then bulges loosely just under the beak, and for some distance downwards. While rolling every feather over the whole body is on end, and the plumes are open, like a large white fan.

Considerable misconception prevails as to the manner in which the ostrich runs. It seems to be still generally held that, when running, it spreads out its wings, and, aided by them, skims lightly over the ground. This is not correct.

When a bird really settles itself to run it holds its head lower than usual, and a little forward, with a deep loop in the neck. The neck vibrates sinuously, but the head remains steady, thus enabling the bird, even at top speed, to look around with unshaken glance in any direction. The wings lie along the sides about on a level with, or a little higher than, the back, and are held loosely just free of the plunging "thigh." There is no attempt to hold them extended, or to derive any assistance from them as organs of flight. Indeed, I doubt whether the conformation of the wings permits their being held out to any extent with the edge to the front; and the front edge is thickly and heavily covered with long feathers (which are regularly plucked for the market). In fact, it may be said that the wings assume just that position along the sides which the wind would force

When ostriches are startled, as by a dog; when they start away to run; or when not very hard-pressed, they will often run, and very rapidly, for some distance with their wings raised nearly upright on each side of the neck; just as under similar conditions, springbucks will run with the white fan on their backs raised, frequently "pronking." When the ostrich runs thus, with its wings raised, it generally moves with a high, springy, bounding step, never with the long raking stride of the bird that, hard-pressed, is fleeing for its life. Raised wings are undoubtedly an obstacle to the greatest pace. So the springbuck, when he stretches himself out to run his fastest, shuts down his fan, as the attitude which enables him to expand it prevents his attaining to his greatest pace. When an ostrich, after a long run, is very tired, its wings sometimes droop; this is due to exhaustion; they are never by a running bird exerting itself to the utmost, held out away from the sides to lighten its weight or to increase its pace. But the wings appear to be of great service in turning, enabling the bird to double abruptly even when going at top speed.

The ostrich feeds in a peculiar manner. It tosses the food into a sack in the upper part of the neck, and then swallows it. I have seen a bird toss fully a quart of mealies (Indian corn) into this sack before swallowing; and it is no uncommon thing to see two "swallows" travelling down the neck at the same time with a clear interval between them; or to see one of them (if of large and loose food, e.g., grain) slide back into the sack after being swallowed, if the bird lowers its heads to continue feeding before the food has travelled some considerable distance down the neck. The food travels slowly, and performs a complete circuit of the neck before reaching the crop. Crushed bones are greedily eaten; if two large a piece should stick in the neck, it is a simple matter to cut it out and sew the wound up again. The wound, as a rule, heals quickly, and causes but little inconvenience.

As is well known, ostriches will swallow almost anything small enough to pass down the neck. I have either known them swallow, or have heard of them swallowing, and on evidence, which I believe, such things as oranges, small tortoise, fowl and turkey chickens, and kittens! I found a cock in my dining-room on one occasion rapidly demolishing, one after another, the contents of a box of luscious peaches. Some friends were playing tennis with only one ball. A rather vigorous drive sent it beyond the tennis ground, close to an ostrich hen; she at once swallowed it with evident relish, and brought the game to a sudden end! A cock swallowed several yards of fencing-wire in short pieces, and about half a dozen brass cartridges. These were found in his crop, and had killed him. He had followed the fencers, swallowing the ends of the wires as filed off! An ostrich's crop always contains a large quantity of smooth stones, many of them brightly coloured.

The Story Teller.

THE OLD ADAM.

CECIL LORRIMER had ridden all his life. From the time of his first pony to the end of his 'Varsity days he had always something to ride, or had been in the way of getting a mount. Now that, with a family living in his eye, he had adopted the Church as a profession, and settled down to the life of junior curate of a High Church in a seaside town, he found that polo and hunting were out of the question, and his silk jacket and cap only to be dreamt of in his very wildest moments. He took them out sometimes and looked at them regretfully; for they, with the crops, cutting whips, and spurs that adorned his diggings in Seaview-Terrace, Bexham-on-Sea, were all that remained to remind him of the old life.

Two years passed, with only an occasional afternoon on a hired hack, or, when funds didn't run to that, a day on foot with the local harriers—for holidays and oof were scarce amongst the curates of St. Augustin's—and now one evening found him in his armchair after dinner puffing reflectively at his pipe, and reading for the tenth time a letter the evening post had brought him. It was from an old 'Varsity chum, and its last paragraph ran—

"Do try, old man, and come to us for the 18th, and stop a week or as long as you like. Our local chases will be on—there'll be a large house-party, and we're all going over. You can have the run of the stables and the rabbits, and amuse yourself as you think best."

It was very tempting, and a chance not to be missed.

He knew the Digby stables, and miles of green pasture rose in his mind with recollections of many a frolic over the timber thereon. He was more or less entitled to a few days, and it would be easy to get one of the other curates to take his services and do his visiting; then he would square the vicar.

Lorrimer worked all the preliminaries successfully, and a few days later, in smart clerical evening dress, walked into the drawing-room at Digby Grange as the second dinner-bell rang.

What a change it felt from the humdrum existence at Bexham-on-Sea; and how different the dinner from the chop or cold joint which was his daily portion at Seaview-Terrace.

After the ladies had left the room the talk naturally turned on racing and sporting matters generally, the coming meeting being eagerly discussed, for most of those present were either owners or riders, or interested in some way in the horses.

"How's The Doctor doing?" asked Tom Digby of a man at the other end of the table.

"Oh he's doing all right; but I shall have to scratch him, I'm afraid."

"Scratch him! Why?"

"Well, I've had a wire from Thynne at Aldershot to say he can't possibly get away—and I've been counting on him. I can't raise anybody at this short notice that I know of. It's gentlemen riders only for the Shire Cup, you know, and that course takes a bit of riding.

"There's Lorrimer here. He'll ride for you. He used to be good—weren't you Cecil?"

"I!" exclaimed Lorrimer. "My dear fellow, I can't go about the country riding chases. Supposing the bishop got to hear of it? Why, my vicar would have seven fits if he thought I even dreamt of such a thing, and all the old ladies in the parish would cut me dead."

"Oh! the bishop will never know, or the vicar either, unless you tell them. It's quite simple; your name won't be on the card, so it won't get into the papers; and nobody would imagine you're a parson when you've got a regulation jacket and cap on."

"But in any case, I'm not trained; besides, I've no racing things."

"You're fit enough—you're always in condition," answered Tom Digby. My togs used to fit you; I'll rig you out all right."

Perhaps Lorrimer did not wish to make a very determined resistance. At any rate, such feeble objections as he raised were soon overruled, and with the added persuasion of the ladies in the drawing-room, he gave in and consented to chance it. The next two days were passed in making The Doctor's acquaintance and getting into his little ways.

"He's a bit hard to hold sometimes," said his owner, "and he'll show his temper if he thinks he can get the better of you; so let him know who's master the first chance you get."

The day came, and Lorrimer had almost forgotten St. Augustin's in the lapse into the old life and associations; and certainly few of his parishioners would have known him as, in Tom Digby's boots and breeches, he walked into the weighing-room, and presented himself to the clerk of the scales.

He felt a little nervousness at first, but it wore off when he was mounted, and he had all his work cut out as his horse sidled with crab-like gait in the direction of the post.

"You'll have to watch him at that first bank, remarked The Doctor's owner, as he walked down alongside them, "keeping well out of range of his beauty's heels; there's a road down there that he knows leads home, and he'll make for it."

"Cheerful mount this," said Lorrimer to himself as he joined the others at the post. "I've every chance of breaking my neck—and then the fat will be in the fire properly."

They were off, however, before he had much time to think of it, and following the lead of the others, The Doctor took the first fence, and behaved himself like a gentleman up to the next one. He looked at that somewhat doubtfully as he came up to it; then, seeming to alter his mind, took it sideways, and under protest, as it were.

There was no doubt, however, about the next obstacle—the bank Lorrimer had been warned about. The Doctor suddenly dug in his toes, slid along for about ten yards, then came to a dead stop. Again and again did Lorrimer take him back and rush him at the bank; the same thing occurred each time and at last he began to walk sideways slowly and surely, and, in spite of a terrible mauling from whip and spur, in the direction of the road that led home.

It was tiring work, and Lorrimer was hardly in condition to keep this game up for long. He was getting more and more done every minute, and had begun to wonder which of them would give in first, when he heard a trap drive along the road near him and pull up, while a cheery voice sang out—

"One moment, sir—I'll come and give you a hand."

Lorrimer was too much occupied with his horse's head to look round; and the reinforcements began, with what sounded like a carriage whip, to lambaste The Doctor about the hind quarters with a vigour that started him bucking and plunging and making every effort to get the bit and start in the direction of home.

But it was two to one against him now; his head was held firmly in the direction of the course, and a rain of searching cuts came from every direction he tried to turn in, and got him on all sorts of unsuspected places, while a running fire of uncomplimentary comments was kept up.

"Come up, you brute—take that, then! I'd one like him myself at Oxford, sir, and I'm not likely ever to forget him. He lost me half a dozen races in exactly the same way. Dear me! this is just like the old times. Hope you've got nothing on this race, sir? Now he's moving! Ha! would you? That's right, sir; sit back. Capital! Excuse me, sir; but I've done a lot of this sort of thing when I was younger. I can't now. Now he's on the course—tha's it—keep him up to it, and we'll take him at the bank. Now then get him well in hand—that's it—rush him at it. Capital!"

After a further consignment of cuts on parts that were getting remarkably tender, the astonished Doctor gave in, went at the bank, and scrambled over with as bad a grace as he could. It was no use following on then—the others must have been in long ago; so Lorrimer turned to thank his unknown helper, when he recognised in the perspiring figure before him, with a broken whip under his arm, and mopping his forehead with his handkerchief, the Lord Bishop of Fulborough, in which diocese Bexham-on-Sea is situated.

"Well done, sir," began the bishop; "you sat him well. Regular brute that—you can see it in his eye. Luckily, I was just driving along the road when I saw you. I've broken the whip, too, and it belongs to my host. And—excuse me, sir, but I surely know your face somewhere? Let me see now—let me see. Why, of course, you are one of the curates at St. Augustin's, Bexham—eh?"

"Ye—yes, my lord," faltered Lorrimer.

"Then how do you come to be riding in a race like this? You surely know—"

Lorrimer saw there was no way out of it, so explained just how it had happened from the beginning.

A fellow feeling is supposed to make us wondrous kind, and there certainly was a twinkle stealing into the bishop's eye as he said—

"Well, Mr. Lorrimer—perhaps we'll both say nothing about this little meeting. Yes; I did a good deal of riding when I was young—and I'll tell you what, it's fortunate you didn't come off, or I really believe I should have been tempted to get up and finish the course instead of you—and a pretty sight I'd have looked coming up the straight! You see the danger you exposed your bishop to, sir! Don't venture on it again," he added, with a smile. "Good-day, Mr. Lorrimer."

"Good-day, my lord," answered the curate, as he turned his horse's head and trotted off towards the paddock.

When a few months later a vacancy occurred for the private secretaryship to the Bishop of Fulborough, there was great speculation in clerical circles as to why the choice of his lordship fell on the Rev. Cecil Lorrimer; and perhaps nobody was more astonished than the Reverend Cecil himself.

THE WESTMINSTER GLEE SINGERS.

BY the time this notice appears in print, the Westminster Glee Singers will have departed! Would, that, like the poor, they were ever with us! Not until they come again, like the swallows, of which little Albert Hole, the world's youngest chorister, sang so sweetly, shall we be delighted, our senses soothed, our spirits refreshed by that pleasing "old world" courtesy of manner and style, which is as sweet as rain after drought in this hurrying busy twentieth century of ours, where people very often do not seem to find the leisure to be polite! Not so the Westminster Glee Singers. With the deliberation which makes for great effect, just as haste is the sure sign of incompetence, this gallant little band of four children, one woman, and six men wait upon each other and efface their own identity in their thorough subservience of self to the general effect. Each is quite content to be a unit in one harmonious whole, and so is harmony, real harmony, in every sense of the world, produced. It is difficult to give an adequate idea of how the truly musical—and there are not a few of us in this city—have been delighted with the dear old English ballads and half-forgotten ditties of a bygone day, these people have sung. "The Rhymes my mother taught me" have, perhaps never sounded sweeter, except in the original, than in Madame Marie Hooton's rich contralto voice. This lady is never at fault, and whether in a touching ballad, drawing tears from our eyes, a sigh from our hearts, or merry and sprightly in a gladsome ditty she is always, desirable, and yet again to be desired, as her repeated encores will attest.

With an accompanist, as sympathetic as Mr. Edward Branscombe, or one so entirely able to interpret his own settings as Mr. T. C. Sterndale Bennett, it would be hard to find fault. The former gentleman was a lay vicar of Westminster Abbey up to a short time ago, when the demands of his extensive tours compelled him to relinquish all other work. Undoubtedly one of the world's highest authorities on part singing, he is more than qualified to be the Organiser and Director of the party; while in Mr. Sterndale Bennett, remembering his distinguished grandfather, one recognises more than ever the force of heredity. His settings of the nursery rhymes specially written for the boy sopranos was one of the features of the entertainment, as well as his rendering of one of his own compositions—"Dennis Lightheart."

The funny element is supplied by Mr. Harry Ivimey, whose efforts, always distinctly clever and never malicious, take us back to another day, when mild flirtations and gentle scandal supplied the void now filled by golf, bridge, and motoring. By the crowd of small smiling people who thronged to both matinées he was specially appreciated, while by their elders his perfect skill as an entertainer of the first order, could not fail to be recognised.

The smallest boy soloist in the world—little Albert Hole—has captured a place in the affections of Calcutta wholly out of proportion with his size. He was perhaps most delightful in the solo "Love was once a little boy;" though his high notes in "The Swallows" and "Cherry Ripe" must have been the envy and admiration of many sopranos of far maturer years.

Unaccompanied part singing, or part singing with vocal accompaniment, we have no hesitation in saying, appeals to the truly musical in a way nothing else can do. To those who have heard the Westminster Glee Singers at their best in these lines, any comment is quite superfluous. Suffice it to say, those to whom the present party are not total strangers, gave them a warm welcome, while to those who had not had the previous pleasure of hearing them, they have been a delightful surprise, and the entire Calcutta public, in wishing them bonvoyage, does so, with regret at their short stay, and wish them a speedy return to a city where their appearance in the season of 1906-1907 has been an unequivocal success.

THE INDIAN FIELD.

1, Hare Street, Calcutta.

THURSDAY, 14th March 1907.

AN EXPLANATION.

As announced in my circular last week, The Indian Field, which should have been issued on Thursday, the 7th instant, failed to come out owing to a general strike of compositors and pressmen at the "Edinburgh Press," where the paper is printed and from which it has been turned out with unfailing regularity for the last five years. This strike was not only unexpected; it was absolutely unwarranted. The men, far from having any grievances, have always been treated with consideration bordering on indulgence: their attitude is altogether inexplicable. I will refrain from further comment and it will be unnecessary for me to point out that, whatever the merits of the misunderstanding may be, the press and I are heavy losers.

My advertisers and subscribers, I am confident, will extend to me and the press their sympathy and support in what has been nothing short of an outrage, and I trust they will approve my action in supporting the press and enabling them to hold out against this iniquitous strike thus, even in a small way, helping to maintain British commercial prestige. I have decided to slip an issue of the paper and, though the present number is necessarily rather behind hand with its sporting news, and has, moreover, been produced under many difficulties, I shall make amends by bringing the record of sporting events up to date next week.

It is the first time in a journalistic career of nearly twenty-five years that I have failed to "come up to time"—I can only invite perusal of appended extracts from the daily press and leave myself in the hands of my friends and supporters.

W. S. BURKE.
Editor and Proprietor.

The strike at the Edinburgh Press continues The offer held out to the men, that the press would be open at 10 a.m. yesterday, and if they resumed work unconditionally, they would be received back and nothing more said, has not been availed of. Not a single man of the strikers turned up. But other developments have occurred. The strikers have sent a message that they will not resume work unless a general rise in salary all round of Rs. 2 per month is made. This has come through the Printers' Union. Of course, the Company would not yield to any such terms. This only shows that the employés of the Edinburgh Press have absolutely no grievances, and the demand for a general increase in wages is only an excuse to cause loss and embarrassment to the proprietors. We believe that the employés of this press have always been exceptionally well treated. The manager informed our representative that the Secretary of the Printers' Union had even admitted to him, and had informed the men on a previous occasion, that the men could not have better or more considerate employers.

There is a sinister side to the strike, as some of the strikers have taken up a position outside the premises with the object of preventing such men as wish to come in, from resuming work.

The company have addressed the Commissioner of Police as to the picketing and the threatening attitude of the strikers, and have asked for the protection of such of their employès as have remained faithful. The proprietors of the press are determined to hold out against the strikers, and will not submit to any dictation of terms either from the strikers or the Printers' Union. In this they have the hearty support of all right-thinking people, as it is monstrous that the whole of the work of a large concern like this should be paralysed and remain at the mercy of men who bring about bad relations between employers and their employes.—Englishman.

The strike which has taken place in a Calcutta press will have the effect of preventing the appearance to-morrow of our excellent weekly contemporary the Indian Field. We feel sure that the readers of the Field in their own disappointment will sympathize with the proprietors, who are victims of a dispute in which, whatever its merits, they have no concern.—The Statesman.

One of the victims of the strike at the Edinburgh Press is the Indian Field, which ought to come out to-day, but which is thus prevented by circumstances over which it has no control." Readers who have been deprived of their weekly entertainment are however, unofficially invited to call on Mr. Burke, the editor, when they will be treated to a dissertation on the viciousness of mankind in general and of printers in particular, accompanied by lurid prognostications as to the enternal future of the compositors of Bow Bazar.—The Empire.

Last Thursday for some unknown reason I felt strangely ill at ease. There was nothing particularly extraordinary in the atmospheric conditions. But still there was something which I could not quite define, which made me feel as if I had missed some important event or as if there had been a void in my usually tranquil and peaceable existence, an it was only on Friday that I discovered what was wrong. The Indian Field that most estimable of sporting weeklies had failed to make its usual punctual appearance. No wonder that I felt disturbed and uncomfortable and it was all due to the strike at the Edinburgh Press. I hear, however, that the Indian Field will be issued as usual next Thursday, and I am sure it will be an extra good number to compensate for mine and many other peoples' disappointment.—The Journal.

CALCUTTA RACES, 1906-1907.

DURING the past season a very decided step has been taken in the development of Indian Racing, and looking to the immediate future perhaps the most interesting features are the continued decline of pony racing and the success of English-bred horses. The small pony, that is to say everything below the 14-2 class, has practically disappeared from the Calcutta course, a result foreshadowed in these columns when the 14-2 pony was introduced a few years ago. In Calcutta their loss will hardly be felt, since the number of horses in training has increased so rapidly during the past few seasons that the C.T.C. programmes could easily be constructed without any pony racing whatsoever. The exclusion of these events would admit of the framing of handicaps or second and third class horses throughout the big meetings, and so afford opportunities to owners who at present must be content to wait until the end of January before their chance comes. It is impossible to foretell the effect of these changes upon racing elsewhere than in Calcutta. Most of the old Bengal meetings that were mainly or entirely supported by pony racing have already disappeared, but, on the other hand, this form of sport has never been so flourishing as it is to-day on the other side of India. Were a suburban Pony Racing Club to spring up in Calcutta, it might well happen that a strong revival would take place on this side, but such an eventuality has not yet come within the range of practical politics.

Fitzgratton and the rest of the fine stable now owned by the Hon'ble Mr. A. A. Apcar have done much to sustain the credit of the Australian race horse, but this year a very large number of sprint races and rich handicaps have been carried off by English-bred horses, the number of which has so largely increased in India during the last few years. Without going into figures it is sufficient to mention the names of Sermon, Paddy's Darling, Annamulloch, Sacristan and Killeevan as proofs, of and reasons for, the popularity of English horses on Indian courses. One or two of those with the greatest reputations, such as Steinhager and Clear Artist, have been failures, but on the whole their success has been remarkable. Mr. Galstaun, who has perhaps the longest string now in training on the Calcutta side, will no doubt be encouraged by this year's experience to send more and more orders to England, and already he has a new one in Cinder Bill that is taking very kindly to the Indian climate and is consequently expected to do great things next season. The great sensation of the early meetings, however, was caused by a country-bred. A series of victories ending with the Trials, in which he beat the best horses in India at weight for age and class, was scored by the Indian-bred Saloon. It was not surprising to find him made a hot favourite for the Viceroy's Cup itself, and although he could not run into the first four, his win in the Trials is sufficient to stamp him as a marvel among country-breds, and, apart from his breeding, a veritable wonder for his size and inches.

For years past there have been croakers in plenty to foretell the doom of jump racing at Calcutta and Tollygunge. This season has not brought them one whit nearer the fulfilment of their prophecy, and indeed the New Year's Day programme at Tollygunge was a very respectable one. In the Grand National there were nine starters and in the Trial Chase eight. The Hunters' Races were somewhat disappointing, but the interest in these events shows no sign of diminishing. It has again been suggested that the Tollygunge course should be entirely remodelled, but the hands of the C.T.C. Stewards are already so well filled by the constantly growing cares and duties of the maidan meetings, that they are not very likely to undertake such a serious responsibility at this juncture. Until they make up their minds to hand over the Tollygunge Course to a subsidiary Club or Company, nothing much can be expected in this direction.

The improvements in the stands and paddocks on the Calcutta course are in a state of transition, and the arrangements this year have evoked considerable disapprobation. Such of the complaints as were well-founded have already been liberally met, or have no doubt been noted for consideration when the new accommodation promised for next year becomes available. Of the official arrangements the handicapping alone has met with any adverse comment. This was almost inevitable upon the appointment of two new officials, and their work can hardly be fairly judged upon so short and sudden a trial. We append the usual statistics and publish the Form at a Glance among our Turf news.

Sporting Notes.

THE Calcutta season wound up with a huge programme of eight races and backers had a real bad time. There were three or four big dividends on the tote, as Emigrant, Jacinth and Mercedes went out almost friendless; the last named paid something over Rs. 500 on win tickets. In the Balaclava Plate for Light Horse Chargers, a horse named Dougale was reported to be a real good thing, and a few hopefuls had backed it at threes before it was announced that the horse was missing and his number was removed from the board. Myrene created some little stir in the air down at the gate by dashing through the ropes and breaking every one of them. Eventually they got away to a good start and the result was a duel between Emigrant and Jorrocks, in which Mr. Bletsoe, who is a scion of the great chasing family, had the better of it and won on a very tired horse.

Baichan rode another nice race on Bundah in the Farewell Plate and the objection lodged by Cyril's rider was not sustained. Then came a big surprise in the Hunter's Flat Race, for Jacinth, with Mr. Galstaun up ran clean away from his field and was never headed. The others no doubt expected that the old horse would come back to them whenever he heard them in pursuit, but Mr. Galstaun did not give him time to think and hustled him right home to the winning post. Detective cut it somewhat in the struggle for second place and Pretender beat him in the last few strides.

The public were not far wrong in their next effort and Mr. Dass scored a win with Mulison, a turn of luck which he well deserves. The pony race was another disaster as Hazelnut gave Baichan a second win, and the well-backed favorite, Yardley, ran nowhere. Bundah very nearly scored again in the Harrington Plate, but Mercedes made a magnificent effort in the straight and just managed to get home in front. Proceedings closed with a race round the course, which Scamander won easily. Clodian ran disappointingly, but with a stronger rider must have done much better.

Captain Holden and Pathfinder managed to pull off the Pony Paperchase Cup in spite of all the weight they had to put up. Geebung was pushed along with great determination by his sporting owner and actually led during a great portion of the journey, but the chestnut stood no chance against the Dehra Dun pony when it came to fast work over the heavy ploughland through which the last mile of the course lay.

Mr. G. B. Deakin will have much sympathy in the loss of his fine mare Meadow Saffron. She died in Bombay after a severe attack of fever and her place in the stable will be hard to fill.

Amongst those on the homeward trail this spring are Mr. and Mrs. Latham Hamilton, Mr. Boteler, Mr. J. D. West, Mr. Arthur G. Macpherson, Mr. Gresson and J. M. Turner. The genial time-keeper is said to be retiring for ever and a day, but this is a long time and we hope to see him, watch in hand, again on the Calcutta course before many seasons roll by. Mr. Turner has not quite recovered from his knock on the head, but is taking the long sea route by way of Colombo and should be well on his legs again before he reaches London town. He will be much missed at the Tollygunge Club Gymkhanas, the more so in the absence of Messrs. Macpherson and Gresson, who have both taken a large share of the work at these pleasant little meetings.

Our Bombay correspondent writes:—As usual, with the close of the big meeting, several of the big stables have left, as well as many of the jockeys and trainers, and the mail that left on Saturday took several of the bookmakers, those fortunate people who are able to take an annual trip Home at our expense. The slightly diminished attendance did not, however, prevent our having a more than fair day's sport, which however, included a most unfortunate occurrence. Some very large fields are generally seen out in the races for newly landed ponies, and when these get away to a good start it is indeed a matter of surprise there are not more accidents when the fight for a position near the rails begins. Such was the case in the Second Dealers' Consolaiton when the jamming began about a furlong from the start and in the thick of it Jalal and The Barb came down with Mujeed and Yussuff. The former lad has had a very successful season, but unfortunately, whilst on the ground, was either kicked or galloped over as he was carried off on a stretcher with a broken left collar-bone and three fractured ribs and looked more dead than alive when brought into the paddock. He was removed to hospital and if these are the only injuries he has received he should be seen riding again in Poona, but his nerv will probably suffer. Yussuff luckily got off scot-free and rode in the next race. The Stewards asked Williams to pay them a visit after the races, and, as the accident in question could not be any particular man's fault, may be the rumours that he shouted something about shutting Oriental in during the Parle Plate had something to do with it.

So many changes have the M. G. and A. N. stable made in trainers that, though Fowler had done them so well up to the big meeting, it was thought probable a lack of wins of late would mean yet another The change has occurred and we now see Bleach at. that position though he himself has had to give up a strongs tring. Poor Fowler! The very day after this they secured two brackets, and the kudos goes to the newcomer.

There were seven events on the card and three favourites figured as winners, but this did not make a punter's day. One need not say very much about the first four races which were all won with ease. Sherlock was made a favourite for the first of the new Arab races and after allowing Madrid to flatter his backers for a time, came away as he liked; Madrid beating the one time favourite Madras. The pony race, the Kensington Plate, once more saw a field half full of Byramjee's charges. It did not take long to leak out that Russley Rose had shown form in a gallop with Koko and, to cut the story short, she won on her head after being made a hot favourite. She has come down no less than a stone and a half and it is not Mr. Cursetjee's usual plan of action to ease them off like this when the least bit of return to form must end in but little else than a canter.

With a clean sweep of six entrants, only three faced the barrier for the Spring Plate and Killua was quoted at fours on. The stable having, however, got him at something about evens were content, and no wonder, to make assurance double sure and cover on Harpist at threes. This somewhat puzzled punters but as it turned out Killua came up to the other and Balayeuse at the bend and walked home. The second new Arab race followed and the mishaps have already been dealt with. It will be remembered how disappointing Kalee Charan was in the Second Dealers' and now again after following Salanic he absolutely failed to stay. A rank outsider in Company drew up to Salanic near the stand and left him easily. Jalal, who fell, was backed by his stable and we are told to keep an eye on this good looking grey.

Once more the public could not grasp the fact that 9-12 takes more carrying over nine than seven furlongs and once more made Precious favourite. He came up well at the bend but was beaten there. The finish was a pretty one as, after Hadhur had made all the running, Melsom came with a great run and won a nice race almost on the post. Oriental had a very bad run and came a long way round finishing very close to Hadhur and would probably have won with a clearer course. This was followed by another magnificent finish for the March Plate. Freelance again dashed out in front with Gambara in pursuit and at the bend only half a length divided them. Melsom, however, had only been taking a breather and once more went away by over a length. Near the stand Manley realised how well the leader was going and driving the black along finely seemed to have dead-heated but Freelance was returned by a neck. Then in conclusion came the second M.G. and A.N. success in a hollow win by False Start who, after lying handy, came away very comfortably. Another of those occurrences in the betting ring likely to disgust punters was seen for this race when Byramjee once more had three interests. They first came at Scimitar and the public followed, but at the last moment a rush on Plassey sent him from tens to six to four and those who saw the former go from twos to five after this probably gloated over the running of the latter in the ruck.

The annual Chart and Compass Race of the Calcutta Light Horse, though hardly a sporting event, has so much of sport and sporting spirit connected with it that our readers will perhaps pardon us if we give at least the bare results. It came off in the Duttapukur country, on the Bengal Central Railway, and the official placings were as follows:—

WHY DID YOU BUY A PIANO?
Presumably for the music that is in it. But—how much of that music do you and your family get? The average piano gives about one-tenth of the pleasure which, under ideal conditions, it is capable of. In other words you are missing 90 per cent. of the music that you might get from your piano.
Ideal Conditions prevail where there is a NEOLA Player-Piano. It enables everybody to play all kinds of music with equal ease and artistic completeness. It gives you the missing 90 per cent. of enjoyment lying dormant in the ordinary piano.
We will take your dead piano and put a living one in its place, allowing you all that your present Piano is worth in part payment, if necessary.

severely wonded, the fish who had also suffered a good deal in the encounter was captured and found to measure 3 feet in length, scaling 16lbs. In some of our north-east districts otters are frequently trapped bearing extensive scars which are attributed to fights between themselves, but may just as well have been caused by "catching a tartar" as stated above. We should much like to witness a tussle between one of our big river siluroids and a good dog otter.

Our Bangalore correspondent writes:—"A" team has beaten "F" team in the final of the Bangalore Skittle Polo Tournament. Contrary to expectation they beat "F" in the last match on the American system by a bare subsidiary and the teams then totalled four wins each out of five matches. Meeting in again the "decider," "A" team again won this time by the substantial majority of two goals to a subsidiary. The winning side was composed as follows:— Captain the, Hon'ble H. E. Joicey and Major Tickell, D.S.O. 14th (King's) Hussars, and Messrs. Bruce and Naper, R.A. The runners up were: Mr. A. G. S. Astley and Mr. H. Maddick, 14th (King's) Hussars, and Captain Muspratt and Mr. H. T. Walker (Gordon's Horse).

Captain G. H. Sawyer of the 23rd Pioneers has been mauled by a leopard at Chitral. He will probably lose an arm; one of his legs is said to be also badly damaged. Hard luck.

E. J. Lee, the Bombay bookmaker, whose encounter with the police we noticed in our last issue, has been fined and otherwise inconvenienced. The charge of keeping a common gaming house was heard by the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Bombay, who in his judgment said he was satisfied the books produced were books kept for the purpose of recording wagers and making statistics and calculations in relation to wagers in connection with horse races, that posters on the wall were used for the purpose of advertising such wagers, and that the other exhibits, tickets or cards, were used for the purpose of recording wagers in relation to horse races. He was of opinion that they were instruments of gaming within the meaning of the Act. He accordingly convicted the accused No. 1 and ordered him to pay a fine of Rs. 100. The evidence against accused Nos. 2 and 3, who were present in the room, was not in his opinion sufficient to lead to a reasonable belief that they were assisting in conducting the business of the room, and accordingly he acquitted them. The Magistrate ordered that two-thirds of the amount found on the premises (Rs. 907) be returned to the first accused and one-third confiscated. Certain exhibits in the case were also ordered to be returned to the accused and the rest to be destroyed.

A remarkable sequel to the bite of a dog was described at the Marylebone County Court. Mrs. Mary Emma Kestas of Shrewsbury Road, Willesden, sued Mr. H. Williams, for damages, declaring that she was bitten by his dog, and that since then she has suffered from a nervous affection, the principal symptom of which is that her hair has fallen out in patches. She said she had lost five patches of hair in all, and that a doctor told her it would be eighteen months before it grew again.

Dr. Moore said he had made a microscopical investigation of the hair and could find nothing to account for its falling out. He came to the conclusion that it must have been produced by the dog bite, which had caused great shock to the system.

"The hair will come back again, doctor?" said Judge Selfe. "She has youth on her side, has she not?"

"Yes, youth is her greatest asset," said the doctor. "It will come back in a year or so."

"You would not expect me to get my hair back?" said Judge Selfe.

"No; there is not much chance after forty," said Dr. Moore.

"Well, I will confess that I am nearly that," said the Judge, who was born in 1845.

A dustman named Pratt said that he never approached the dog without a shovel, and when he was asked if the dog was in court he said:—

"I hope not, your honour. I have not brought my shovel with me."

Mr. Williams and some of his neighbours gave the dog a good character, but Judge Selfe awarded £7 10s. damages to Mrs. Kestas.

The following advertisement, taken from a recent issue of the Times, is surely most inspiriting:—

"Young gentleman, first-class public school education, well-trained and skilful chemist and physicist, careful, intrepid, quick, self-reliant, is prepared to FILL any DANGEROUS POSITION. Absolutely no fear of death. More danger the better. Highest testimonials and references.—X 25, The Times Office, E.C."

The mind instinctively turns to thoughts of the most dreadful risks open to men, such as being compelled to read through the whole of the correspondence on a Bandman theatrical squable, or exting the air on the earth Calcutta Strand Road during the prevailing motor pest. But the explanation is probably much more simple. The courageous young gentleman merely wishes to obtain a situation in which he will be able to take the fullest advantage of the new Servants' Compensation Act. As the Irishman put it, "Who'd be afraid of being killed if you were sure of getting £70 a year for the rest of your life afterwards?"

The Bareilly Polo Toumament brought further laurels to those top-notch players the Durhams who beat the Carabiniers in the final by 4 goals and 2 subsidiaries to 2 subsidiaries.

The annual sporting fixtures for the Simla season have been arranged. The summer races will be on the 28th and 30th May and 1st June; the polo tournament for the Beresford Cup during the week beginning the 10th June, and the horse show in the same month. The Durand Footpall Tournament will take place, as usual, in September.

In India, especially in Lower Bengal and the plains generally horse-owners are constantly confronted with trouble in connection with their horses' feet, Among the more common affections fevered feet, sand crack, corns, shelly feet and contracted heels readily occur to one. For some time we have had personal knowledge of what we are inclined to think is a sovereign remedy for these complaints and we are glad to find the manufacturers are now vigorously pushing the sale of the specific in this country. To refer to "La Corniere," a full-page illustrated advertisement regarding which appears in the body of to-day's paper. Its really wonderfull properties are testified to by leading vets. in many parts of the world and no wonder when such quick and astonishing results are obtained in the direction of replacing diseased by sound and healthy hoof material. It is in a word a wonderful horn producer and healer and a further claim to the consideration of horse-owners is its recognised preventative action against future ailments. We should say "La Corniere" will soon establish a big reputation in India and ere long be found as indispensable a stable accessory as the "momrogan" and "somrogan" beloved of the genus syce.

The Hyderabad twenty-first annual tent-pegging tournament was held on the 4th instant and was won by "O" Squadron of the 29th Deccan Horse who made the very fine score of 69 points out of a possible 72.

The polo tournament for the cup presented by the Begum of Bhopal will be held at Jubbulpur, beginning on the 31st instant.

On the 4th instant Mr. Lionel Lloyd, an assistant in the Shivagunga Zemindary, Madras, and one of his native overseers, were drowned while out duck-shooting on the Nettoor tank. The native got out of the boat to retrieve a duck, and got into difficulties; Mr. Lloyd went to his rescue an both were drowned.

The annual meeting of the Indian Polo Association held at Meerut on the 7th instant, was remarkably well attended. Every British cavalry regiment in India was represented, and so were most of the British infantry and Indian cavalry regiments Native infantry and polo clubs, however, were not represen- General Clements was unanimously elected President of the Association and Major Leslie, Poona, Captain Watson, Mhow, Colonel Kavanagh, Rawalpindi, and Colonel de Lisle, Lucknow, members of their centres.

A proposal to discontinue the Championship Tournament was not carried. It was resolved that the Championship be held at Calcutta next cold weather with the permission of the Calcutta Polo Club.

Major Leslie's proposal for raising the height of polo ponies was also not carried. The following proposals were carried: That 14-1 be the limit for ponies; that the period of play be changed from five minutes' actual play to seven and-a-half minutes all in, and in case of a tie that the goal posts be widened by double the distance, and seven and-a-half minutes, chukker be continued till the first goal is obtained, that no player be allowed to play with his left hand; that the I. P. A. penalty for a dangerous foul shall remain as at present; and that with the above exceptions the Hurlingham rules be adopted.

Colonel Macan's proposal for a permanent list of umpires was not carried. A proposal by Colonel de Lisle that when gate money is charged a proportion of this should be expended in defraying the expenses of the teams was discussed as also an amendment by General Clements that where there was a big tournament and where a large amount of gate money was realized, the Secretary of the I. P. A. should be directed to address the local committee, suggesting that a portion of the gate money should be allotted to the defraying of the expenses of the teams. The amendment was eventually carried. A proposal that the Inter-Regimental Tournament next year should be held at Meerut on the first Monday in March was carried.

Captain Barrett proposed that a committee should be formed at Meerut each year to formulate a "forms" list. This was also carried.

Athletic Notes.

THE Fifteenth Championship Meeting of the Bengal Presidency Amateur Athletic Association was held on the 2nd instant on the Calcutta Cricket Club ground in the Eden Garden, and was as successfull, from an athletic point of view, as most of its predecessors; but it attracted probably the smalles "gate" on record—the takings were nearly seven hundred rupees less than last year. It is not easy to account for this: the only explanations that suggest themselves to us are the lateness of the date this year and the fact that the fixture came at the very end of a season which has been unusually full of gaieties, amusements, and opportunities for parting with cash! The lateness of the date may be an inconvenience to a good many people; but seeing that the Association cannot get the ground until after the C.C.C. have completed their fixture card we do not see what can be done to improve this matter unless the Cricket Club will come to the rescue and arrange their card so as to admit of the sports being put on earlier, as in days gone by.

The outstanding features of this year's meeting were, to begin with, perfect weather. We heard it remarked by many that it was oppressively hot and that this might have accounted for the poor attendance. The fact remains that the thermometer showed the afternoon of the 2nd March to be cooler than that of the 23rd February, in addition to which a steady cool north breeze was blowing throughout. The ground was in perfect condition, and though the form did not disclose anything of superlative merit it was distinctly good and occasionally brilliant, there were some really good races and three dead-heats, while two records were lowered. One was accomplished by Sepoy Mirza Khan of the 91st Punjabis, Bhamo, who did the Native Army Championship quarter mile in 52⅗secs. Quite a good performance when we look at the times put up that afternoon for the same distance by the British Army runners and the Amateurs—53⅗ses. and 54secs. respectively. The 91st Punjabis came up with the reputation of being "hot stuff" and they proved this conclusively by establishing a record, winning the 100 yards and quarter mile and running a good second in the half. We congratulate these enterprising and speedy fellows on carrying off Sir Allan Arthur's magnificent Challenge Shield.

GUARANTEED TO CURE

COMPLICATIONS.

Dear Sirs,—I beg to inform you that I tried your La Corniere on a carriage horse twenty years old, suffering from sunken sole, after lamanitis, and extensive destruction of horn tissue, as the result of seedy toe. I find that a new growth of horn is appearing, both in the walls and the sole. This case was considered incurable.

Yours faithfully, J. SUTCLIFFE HURNDALL, M.R.C.V.S., London.

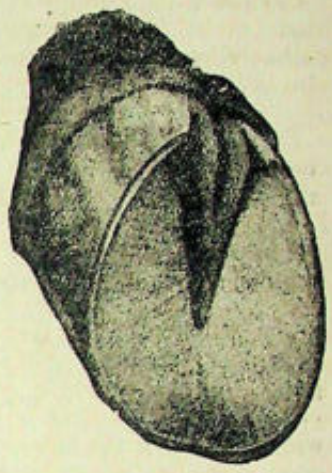
FEVERED FEET.

Dear Sirs,—I have tried your La Corniere for a horse with bad feet, and my stud groom considers it very efficacious, and thinks that the use of it tended much to increase the growth of the hoof, and also to remove the fever in the forefeet to which the horse was subject.

Yours faithfully,
(Earl) HADDINGTON.

EVERY AFFECTION OF THE HORSE'S HOOF.

CORNS.



Dear Sirs,—I have much pleasure in saying that your La Corniere has been a great success with my mare. When I wrote for a Jar she was so tender from two corns she could not bear them touched; but now they have nearly disappeared, and she is absolutely sound, and doing a lot of hunting.

Yours truly, (Mrs.) R. S. BAGNALL.

CONTRACTED HEEL.

Dear Sirs,—I have much pleasure in testifying to the good qualities of La Corniere for horses' hoofs. I have used it with great effect on a driving horse, which h very bad contracted feet when I purchased him; but I am glad to state that your Ointment has made a wonderful change for the better.

"DISEASES OF HORSES' HOOFS."

"Any discovery which enables us to deal more effectually with diseases of the horn structures of the horse's foot will be welcomed more especially by those who best know the difficulty of directing Nature's efforts to the reproduction of sound material in the place of diseased, which it has been necessary to remove. La Corniere appears to have this most valued quality in an unusual degree, as veterinary surgeons have testified. Without such a horn producer, there is a natural fear of taking away too much 'foot" and the consequence of such hesitancy is more or less failure to bring the selected medicament into contact with the whole of the diseased structure. The proprietors of the new remedy, very wisely as we think, supply printed directions by an eminent veterinary doctor, recommending the removal of imperfect horn, even to the extent of scraping away a sandcrack 'until the blood oozes.' In this way, corns, sandcracks, and other defects are cured by going to the origin of the trouble, and exciting a new secretion of sound horn, which shall not give way under similar strain to that which originally caused the malady. We have not seen it recommended for the treatment of those troublesome, indolent heel diseases in cattle, sometimes known as kibe, and variously described as foul of the foot, but have found it most useful in restoring a serviceable heel to stand upon, in place of the soft and tender substance which for so long hinders the subject of it from walking. Being a volatile substance of penetrative power, it is also a preparation which needs to be carefully closed when put away, or rapid deterioration results. It is to be obtained in London of LACORN

SAND CRACK.

Dear Sirs,—I had a valuable horse with both hind feet split right through the coronet. I had two staples across each foot, and rubbed the coronet with a stimulating ointment, but did not make much headway; but I am pleased to say that, under the treatment of La Corniere, fresh horn is growing on the horse's hoof, which seems sound all round; one hoof is almost all right again.

Yours sincerely, W. GRIFFITHS,

"'LA CORNIERE' HOOF OINTMENT."

The preparation which, under the title 'La Corniere,' will come as a boon to horse-owners and all connected with the care of horses. It is claimed to be the best hoof ointment on the market, and is guaranteed to cure in a few days. Mr. Demuth has so much confidence in its efficacy that he undertakes to refund the cost to anyone giving it a trial where a cure is not effected. 'La Corniere' is not only a speedy remedy for corns, sand cracks, contracted heels, speedy toe, shelly and fevered feet, and ether affections of the horse's hoof, but it promotes a rapid re-growth of the horny substance, and is a most efficient preventative against future ailments. Although is has been for only 12 months on the English market it is already in much favour, and numerous testimonials have been received speaking highly of it success. In each of these, whether it be from titled owner, breeder, trainer, veterinary surgeon, private individual, cab proprietor, omnibus company or business firm, they are unanimous in its praise and request a further supply of the ointment. Some of the cures reported are certainly extraordinary, and in one instance the case had been pronounced incurable.

were veritable giants and, of course, they carried away the Shield again, though one must not forget that their opponents were really a scratch lot and lacked training and practice together. But their runners were almost as big—Private Chandler, who won the thousand yards and mile, and Private Pratt, who tied for first place in the quarter nd ran Corporal Smith of the Devons to inches in the hundred, were runners of dimensions one seldom sees. out here, both good to look upon and beautifully trained. Chandler won the mile, making his own place throughout, and coming in over twenty-five yards ahead of the second man, in 4mins. 41⅕secs. which is just a fifth outside the Indian Army record made by Checkly of the Black Watch in 1897. The supreme ease with which he won— he was actually easing down at the finish—convinces us that, if hustled, Private Chandler would be capable of knocking nearly ten seconds off this time. The other record was made by Private E. A. Fay of the 10th Hussars, who in the bicycle race lapped his opponents and covered the three miles in 7mins. 42⅖secs. The previous best on this track was his own 8mins. 7secs. done last year and the next best 8mins. 13secs. by Mr. H. E. Bryning seven years ago, so Fay's performance was of distinct merit. These two records (the native quarter and 3 miles bicycle) and the good timing in the British Army mile, the Amateur hurdles—18⅕secs. from the 140 yards mark, the Amateur 220. the Native Army 100 yards, which equalled record and the British Army 100 yards, which was only a fifth of a second outside record, help to prove that it was an ideal afternoon for athletics and show the "far too hot for sports" brigade to be utterly wrong.

Entries were very good in all the British Army events and of average proportions in respect of the Amateur events, while the schools were at usual strength. There was a marked falling off in the Native Army Championships, only five regiments being represented this year. Mr. W. A. Knyvett, a much improved runner, showed up well. He won the hurdles from 20 yards behind scratch in 18⅕secs., which shows him to be capable of at least 16 secs. for the proper distance ; he was a good second in the 150 yards from scratch, the winner from a 6 yards mark being clocked at 15 secs. ; and he jumped over for the high jump, being the only entrant, and very sportingly returned the prize to the Association for presentation next year.

The fine Irish athlete, Captain T. E. Harty, R. A. M. C. won the 220 and the quarter mile in capital style ; he has a wonderful long stride and is a particularly strong sprinter. Hearty congratulations on winning The Indian Field shield and may you again show them the way next year ! Mr. R. T. Ross, of Sitarampore, ran well, carried off the McLeod shield which goes with the 100 yards Amateur Championship, and the 300 yards Handicap and was placed third in the 150 yards handicap. Mr. W. E. Watts, of Kanchrapara, was prominent in the sprint events. Both these rather unknown quantities were too literally treated by the handicappers, indeed of the three handicaps the hurdles alone worked out well.

St. Xavier's College again won the Schools Shield (they tied for it last year with the Armenian College) and have the distination of having their name engraved on this coveted trophy for the sixth time.

Her Excellency Lady Minto was present from half past four o'clock and distributed the prizes. Owing to his engagement at the University Convocation the Viceroy was unable to be present. His Excellency Lord Kitchener was prevented from being present by reason of a recent bereavement in which he will have the sympathy of all sportsmen. The band of the 5th Fusiliers, under the baton of Mr. A. N. Moss, provided one of the most appre' ciated features of, the afternoon and "lor'an'order was strictly preserved by the strong picket kindl'y placed at the disposal of the Committee by the Officer Comanding the Regiment. Messrs. G. F. Kellner's catering was beyond reproach. Full details appear further on.

The recent boxing entertainment at the Columbia Rink, Calcutta, was a "flat, stale, and unprofitable" affair. The star item, a mill between Sam Newman and Harry Powell for the "Heavyweight Championship of Calcutta," whatever that may be under present conditions of boxing in this city, ended, after a dull and uninteresting exhibition, in a draw. The padding of the programme in the shape of bouts between a few aspirants to fistic distinction was a fitting garnish to the piece de resistance.

Rumours not infrequently pass around of a new ball, possessed of prodigious powers of flight, which is to be sprung upon an unsuspecting and somewhat doubtful golfing public. And well may we golfers be doubtful—more than doubtful—if the game will be improved by further developments in the carry and run of golf balls. When the rubber-cored ball was introduced it was received by many with strenuous oppositon, especially by the professionals, who petitioned the ruling clubs to make the use of the gutta ball compulsory in the Open Championship. The request was refused, and after the event the consensus of opinion will surely endorse the decision. Mr. A. J. Balfour's pronouncement on the subject undoubtedly carried weight. He said that in his opinion "any attempt to standardise the implements of the game was to be deprecated," or words to that effect. Mr. Balfour's influence over the fortunes of golf has been considerable. His known love of the game materially assisted to strengthen the rising tide of its popularity which set in early in the nineties.

An interesting lecture was delivered on the 14th ultimo, by Dr. Warre at the Oxford University B. C. to representatives of the various college boat clubs. Dr. Warr prefaced his remarks with the interesting statement that it was exactly fifty years ago that day that he first rowed for the O. U. B. C., of which he subsequently became president he pointed out the importance of coaches seeing that the boats in which they were teaching their pupils were properly adjusted for them, seats to work at the right height, stretchers at the right length,&c., and went on to impress the absolute necessity of coaches being able to give, and always giving, a reason for their instructions, and of being able to show their pupils what they meant by practical illustration. He showed very cleverly and clearly the exact amount it was necessary to turn the handle of the oar to bring it on to the feather," indicating the right and wrong positions of the hands in so doing.

Dr. Warre emphasised the importance of swinging the bodies backwards and forwards on what he called "the medial line" (i.e., an imaginary line dividing a man exactly in half through the spine, and passing down between his heels) in order that each set of muscles arranged in pairs should be able to work equally. Finally, he deplored the slow rate of stroke used in teaching, and the stiffening-up of the muscles during the swing forward, which, he said, was answerable at Oxford "for reducing men who might have been capable performers to the level of the wooden respectability of heavy and powerful oarsman."

An amusing proposition has been made at home to present prizes to the coaches of winning crews as as well to the oarsmen. It has been negatived by the powers, who naturally did not wish to add to the army of pot-hunters the estimable gentlemen who shout words of wisdom through megaphones. If coaches are not now content with the opportunity of criticising in detail the rowing faults and personal characteristics of several helpless men in a boat, and with the honour of referring to "my winning crew," they are changing for the worse.

The Calcutta Football Club Hockey Fixtures for the week will be found advertised further on. The Beighton Cup Tournament starts on the 17th April.

The combined team of the officers of the 6th Jats and 37th Dogras beat the Queen's on Saturday last in the finals for the All India Hockey Tournament by 1 goal to nil after two extra periods of play.

We heartily congratulate Messrs. Walter Locke and Company, Limited, of Calcutta, on the latest edition of their General Sports Catalogue. As a specimen of high grade printing it is a most creditable production (there is no imprint to indicate who produced it), while as a sporting list it is probably the most comprehensive, detailed and fully illustrated of anything of its kind hitherto submitted to the Indian sporting public.

Our Bombay correspondent writes :—Despite the confidence the Presidency should have gained from their Poona victory over the Parsis and the tremendous strength local scribes declared them to have had, there has again been a victory by the Hindus of which the Europeans must feel thoroughly ashamed. They were beaten at every point of the game and though some sort of excuse was made for the rot that set in on the second day in their first innings the Hindus followed on the crumbling wicket and tooked their bowling mercilessly to the tune of 263. With a deficiency of 319 runs to make up in their second innings, the Presidency again bowed down to the hopelessness of playing Baloo and, except for a brief partnership by Rutter and Turner, were all dismissed for 81. I have purposely refrained from anything like a detailed description of the game, Mr. Editor, as not only would it make very poor reading but there's no use in further rubbing salt into the wound which will not heal till more exhaustive methods are adopted to get at the best possible Presidency eleven.

There are, however, one or two features one should mention and first of them, from a spectator's point of view, was the magnificent performance of Pai. His two totals were 107 and 44 and so confidently did he treat the bowling that he never looked like being beaten. In the first innings he gave one barely possible chance, a very hard low drive to Coombs who was bowling, and hit fifteen 4 s. Not a chance did he give in the second, 32 of which came from boundaries and those to all parts of the field. Baloo was a less finished display though a sound one with 64 for once out and, though slow, Divekar's was also a sterling display.

In Seshachari's performance behind the wicket we undoubtedly saw the finest we have seen and the majority consider him the best man in that position in India. To say that in Baloo the Hindus also possessed India's finest bowler would also not be far off the mark. He is a medium pace trundler with occasional fast ball, keeps a fine length, breaks both ways and changes his pace without any change of action.

Of the Presidency eleven Cheetham's 53 was a really good effort in his usual style and with 21 and 20 Rutter deserves praise for very sound displays at times when they were most wanted. Bowling at a great pace in the first innings Crump met with considerable success in taking 5 for 36 and Turner, who I thought was even faster, got three of the most useful wickets in the second very cheap. Priestley behind the sticks also performed creditably and had some erratic fast stuff to contend with.

Commencing Saturday week the Yacht Club have been having their Regatta during the week which throughout has been favoured with fine weather and a good moderate wind. On Tuesday four races were sailed and with her substantial allowance from Eileen, Isca won easily. From six starters Coralie won a grand race from Midget by under a minute in the Tomtit Class and Turquoise narrowly beat Sapphire after a race in which they left the other five behind in the A B and C Handicap. Only two went out for the Pixie Class, but the race was a splendid one. Though Trixie went over with the first gun and was late for the second she got up to Pixie and a great race ensued in which the latter just retained the lead by a mere second.

Wednesday was Ladies' Day and three races were sailed, the first being the C. and T. Handicap in which two started and Midget easily saved her time on Tomtit. The B Class was a good race between five in which Trixie just beat Pixie under a minute at the same mark. Of the three that went out for A Class Turquoise won very comfortably.

The fourth day was the last of the month and in the opening race after Melody had given up Sapphire more than saved her time on Turquoise. In the Any Size Race, Yellow Peril was in the lead when Trixie came up and on their fouling one another the former's bowsprit broke and the two retired. Pixie went on from here and won from Erin. The third was the Tomtit Class and this was comfortably won by Coralie.

On Saturday four races were sailed in a decidedly stronger wind. The D Class only had two starters and after a grand race Swale just beat Swin on time by half a minute. In the Third Challenge Cup Race Melody gave up leaving Sapphire and Turquoise and the former easily saved her time. There were six for B Class and leading all the way Trixie beat Erin and Pixie by a good margin. In the last, Tomtit, race Midget was unfortunate in fouling the Schooner and Maud sailed an excellent race.

The European Amateur Billiard Championship at Pyrke's saloon is drawing towards a close and this week both Messrs. Lamb and Beattie scratched. The only actual game played was between Messrs. Binning and Hargreaves and this was about the best we have seen to date. They were playing dead level till 200 when it must be confessed Hargreaves had all the luck and left Binning most difficult shots, some of which he got very cleverly but could never get them together. Hargreaves took a lead of over a hundred and held it to the end, winning comfortably. Hargreaves' best breaks were 42, 36, 26, 25, and 24, Binning's were 31, 25, 24, and 20.

Mr. A. S. Anderson, well known in Calcutta broking and sporting circles, met with a fatal carriage accident Sunday night. Driving home from the Rowing Club to his residence in Camac Street at 7-15 P.M. his tum-tum collided with a ticca-gharry at the foot of Kyd Street, he was pitched out on to his head and killed on the spot. Poor old "Jock." for by this name we all knew him, he had many friends who will mourn his loss. Beneath a brusque exterior he had a warm heart and was ever ready with a helping hand, a kindly soul a smart and straight business man and a good friend. He had been in Calcutta about thirty five years and in the eighties he took a prominent part in the Ballygunge C. C. Sports and to the last maintained his interest in sporting matters. It is inexpressibly sad to reflect that after seventeen years' absence from the old country he was about to return for a short holiday; as a matter of fact, he was to sail in a few days and his advent was being anxiously awaited by his old mother, his wife and two bonnie children.

London Week by Week.

Friday, 15th February 1907.

THE King and Queen opened Parliament in State on Tuesday and the politicians lost no time in falling foul of each other. I am told that His Majesty dislikes exceedingly Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman's campaign against the upper house, and that his dislike was reflected in his tone when he read the passage in his speech which refers thereto. It had been expected that the suffragists and unemployed would contrive to adorn the precincts of Westminster on Tuesday, but they did not. The police refused to allow the procession of 800 out-of-works—unemployables of the plainest type for the most part—within a mile of Westminster, and the women postponed their little show till Wednesday, and then they gave the police a very lively time.

Ostensibly they had postponed their "Attack on the Commons" until they learned whether the King's speech contained any word about female suffrage: and as it did not, were ready with their plans. They held a meeting at Caxton Hall and then sallied out in procession, four deep, 300 strong to St. Stephen's entrance where the police stopped them and the row began: eleven women managed to dodge through the police and reach the lobby to be fired out gently or ungently as their conduct required: all were turned out and some were arrested, to be released on bail in time to attend the evening meeting at Caxton Hall. I suppose the evening campaign must be considered a great success: there were nearly a thousand police in the streets outside Palace Yard and held in reserve, and the women's attack was as vigorous as they knew how to make it. Encouraged by the cheers, or jeers, of an enormous crowd they tried to break their way through the solid masses of police. The men on foot behaved with extraordinary forbearance, but the mounted police had a difficult task: the women were mixed up with a mob of hooligans, who had come for a row, and when the mounted men pushed their horses through the mob to break it up, the shrieking and yelling was indescribable. The neighbourhood of St. Margaret's and thereabout was perfect chaos from five o'clock, with a brief interval, during which the onlookers did not disperse, until nearly ten: by that time most of the leading suffragists had qualified for the police court, had been arrested or re-arrested and removed. When was peace.

We shall not know what caused the explosion in the cordite magazine at Woolwich till the War Office enquiry is held and it is very doubtful if we know it then. There is nothing left of the magazine: a hole fifty feet deep marks the site and the remains of the building are scattered over Essex. By great good fortune the accident occurred at 3-20 on Monday morning when there were few men in or about the place and the only personal damage was sustained by two constables who suffered from the shock. A curious feature of the explosion is that the effects were felt on the ground level: countless shop and house windows were broken, but in every case there were groundfloor windows. One lump of masonry weighing quarter of a ton was thrown 500 yards, the back of a grand stand on the arsenal football ground was blown away and its roof dislodged and the arsenal gasometer was badly damaged. Having regard to the effects of the explosion, the fact that nobody was killed is one for great congratulation. The force of it was felt right on the other side of the county at Bishop Stortford, which is actually in Bedfordshire.

The Cabbies' Union sent a deputation to the Home Office on Monday to complain about the new cab regulations. The cabmen want the motors to ply "under the same conditions" as the horse cab. We all wish they would! You realise the immense superiority of the motor vehicle if you tender the man his legal fare: his language is subdued, but vitriolic or petrolic. Try and get a motor off the rank and the driver at once tries to stipulate for what he considers a proper fare, and his views are generally so liberal that you conclude negociations by calling the hansom that almost inevitably has pulled up to await the fare he knows will be his.

The Special Committee appointed to enquire into the effect of the L. C. C.'s electric generation works at Greenwich upon the Royal Observatory has issued its report. Certain restrictions in the time and manner of working the engines are suggested and it is urged that the new engines should be turbine, which cause much less vibration. The establishment of means of communication between the observatory and the station is proposed and restrictions are suggested on the height of certain chimneys and the heat of the vapour they may discharge. Perhaps the most important clause in the report is that which recommends re-examination of the whole matter after two years' working.

The Norfolk Street burglary on Monday night or Tuesday morning promises to rival the famous Bond Street robbery of 1876 when Gainsborough's "Duchess of Devonshire" was cut from its frame in Agnew's galleries and carried off three weeks after Agnew's had paid 10,100 guineas for it. Mr. Charles Wortheimer is a brother of the Wortheimer who carries on business in Bond Street: the victim uses his house as his shop and a very beautiful house it is. The police theory is that two bold and expert thieves climbed the porch in Norfolk Street and got to work early in the morning. Their spoil consisted of a picture by Gainsborough "Nancy Parsons" and "Mrs. Roland Yorke" by Reynolds: the two are valued at £15,000: these were roughly cut out of their frames. Reflecting no doubt that such pictures are hard to sell the thieves solaced themselves with eighteen snuff boxes, a couple of miniatures, and a curious old watch scent flask; these trifles being valued at about £35,000 for their workmanship and material: even melted down, the gold and jewels would be worth much.

The robbery was very carefully thought out: the thieves left the house at 6 o'clock, at which hour there is never a constable in the immediate neighbourhood of Norfolk Street. A burglar alarm, with fine irony, gave notice of the thieves exit by the front door. Finger stalls and old gloves left behind show that the thieves have due regard for the significance of finger prints. Mr. Wertheimer was so prostrated by the loss of his treasures that they had to send for a doctor: £1,000 reward is offered for information leading to apprehension and recovery.

A curious case was decided on Saturday in the Probate Division. An old woman named Charlotte Spiers having received many little kindnesses from the local relieving officer English who supposed, with the best reason, that she was a penniless tramp, got him to make her will for her in his own favour. The old woman, after being turned out by her own relatives, received further meals and sixpence from English what time she abode in a disused chapel whence nobody thought it worth evicting her: and eventually went to the workhouse infirmary. She let fall various obscure hints about her property and English concluded she had a pound or two in the local branch and caused her to put in writing her wish that he should see she was decently buried. She died: an enquiry at two banks revealed that the supposed tramp had about £1,150 at her credit. From one account she had drawn nothing since 1880. The woman's relatives opposed probate, but the action of the relieving officer English was so clearly proved to have been inspired by good natured charity and his ignorance of her hoard was so plainly demonstrated that the jury found for him without hesitation, notwithstanding the fact that he had written the will in his own favour.

The Times advertises a meeting in the interests of a new publishing company to carry on business upon the lines advocated by that journal in its war with the publishers. This move does not come as a surprise to anyone. From the first, a good many of us anticipated that the Book Club would develop into a publishing company. Thinking to win the support of the Times for it, I proposed six months ago to invite the Manager of the Book Club to publish a book I had ready: but my artist colleague shrank from incurring the hostility of publishers and the offer was never made.

Mr. St. John Hankin's four act Comedy produced at the Imperial on Monday falls short of success: one character after another fails to win our sympathy in "The Cassilis' Engagement." The mainspring of the plot is the engagement of Geoffrey Cassilis to Ethel Borridge, daughter of a deceased bookmaker of bad repute and his mother's successful machinations to break it off. We appreciate Mrs. Cassilis' wisdom in asking that dreadful old baggage Mrs. Borridge and her common daughter to stay with her at Deynham: but we cant understand why Geoffrey allowed his future mother-in-law and wife to come. He must have foreseen the figures they would cut in county society and surely the most infatuated young man must have repented his promise to marry when he saw his future relatives beside his own people.

We cant sympathise with Geoffrey: he is too great an ass: and we cant sympathise with Ethel Borridge, the frankly deceitful, and hardly reputable —she proposes to Major Warrington that they shall run over to Paris and have a jolly week together— and we get a final "sickener" when she sings in the most brazen music hall style after dinner "Waiting at the Church." This after-dinner scene is clever and original: the silence born of "a little music" reigns on the stage throughout. Lady Mabel Vernning, the girl Geoffrey's mother wants him to marry, sings (and Miss Isabel Roland sings delightfully) and then Ethel Borridge in pursuance of her mission of contract performs as above. Geoffrey scolds her after the guests have gone and she retorts. Next morning she breaks off the engagement because he likes riding with Lady Mabel. The curtain falls on Mrs. Borridge's hysterical and pointless lamentations—pointless because the breach is her daughter's, not Geoffrey's —that they have "not a word on paper" to sue for damages.

The best of the male characters is Major Warrington, really a most respectable and decent old fellow who poses as a gay dog: he was admirably played by Mr. Sam Sothern. Mr. Langborne Burton did what he could with the thankless and difficult rôle of Geoffrey: Miss Clare Greet and Miss Maudi Darrell played Mrs. Borridge and Ethel, and both acquitted themselves excellently well save that the vulgarity was now and then overdone. Miss Weldon as Mrs. Cassilis was good and so was Miss Florence Haydon in the not unimportant part of Lady Remenham.

The music hall artists had their house-warming at the Scala on Monday, giving an "up-to-date musical comedy hotch potch," which might so well pass for an ordinary musical comedy that I should not be surprised if there were trouble. There is a thread of plot involving revelation of the natural sin of music hall managers; the excuse is the marriage of an Eastern potentate to his 25th wife which involves a performance (of music hall stars) to celebrate the event. Theatre managers may be all they are represented to be in the Scala hotch potch, but they badly want one there if only to keep the business up to time. The programme promised a variety concert at ten o'clock, but at that hour the second act of the hotch potch had not begun. There is some very clever fooling in the piece; Mr. Deon Wade's imitation of Mr. George Robey and Miss Clarice Mayne's imitations of music hall stars were very amusing and good.

It is stated that the music hall managers and the artists on strike have agreed to refer their differences to the arbitration of the Board of Trade, the services of the official arbitrator having been accepted. This necessarily means delay, and in the meantime the music halls are doing the best they can with minor stars, and do not complain of neglect by the public.

The first of what we are given to understand is a long series of "Cape to Cairo" pictures was shown on the biograph at the Palace on Tuesday. The views take us as far as the Victoria Falls on the railway and the views are varied with portraits and scenes of work in diamond and gold mines, railway laying at a mile an hour and bridge building operations. Decidedly interesting.

Mr. George Alexander is standing as a Municipal Reform candidate for South St. Pancras. He has explained to the electors that he comes forward not as a theatre manager but a "plain business man." Mr. Alexander is known as a very able business man behind the scenes and will be a useful addition to the L. C. C. if South St. Pancras is wise enough to send him there.

Billiards at the rate-payers' expense is so popular in Battersea that the borough council are going to buy another table. There is risk of surcharge as the Mayor admitted; but that public spirited official evidently thinks he knows his John Burns and takes the responsibility on himself.

There is a proposal afoot to widen and deepen the canal which connects the Clyde and Forth: the existing canal is for barges only: the project is to make it capable of passing our largest battleships. No doubt such a canal would be of strategic as well as commercial value; but the conservative mind rather shrinks from carving up the island in this fashion.

I cannot think that Miss Cartwright was well advised to sue for so intangible a loss as a top note. Miss Cartwright packs flour at a baker's by day and sings at night. In following her diurnal occupation, her hair came in contact with a driving shaft and her scalp was injured. After this accident she could only get up to B. flat, whereas she had previously reached the altitude of the top C: wherefore she sought compensation from the baker. The jury for two hours debated the nice question and gave it up, disagreeing.

A nice question in school ceremony etiquette arises in connection with Tossing the Pancake at Westminster on Tuesday. Was J. Ainger justified in importing football methods into the Great Hall? Was he playing the game when he hurled himself upon the pancake and resolutely lay upon it defying the endeavours of the nineteen to remove him? J. Ainger's plan was so successful that when he was set on his feet and restored to shape he was found to have retained possession of three parts of the pancake whereby he got the dependent guinea.

THE TARPON.

ANGLERS in search of a new and exciting form of their sport should consider the merits of the Tarpon. We had been under the impression that Tarpon fishing was one of those costly recreations reserved for the wealthy few and that it demanded such apprenticeship as other forms of angling: but as made clear in Mr. Churchill's book on the subject this is not the case. Over and above living expenses Tarpon fisbing, i. e., boat, boatman and bait come to about a pound a day, and this, having regard to the fact that the novice has quite as good a chance of sport as the expert, cannot be regarded as excessive. In point of fact there is no science whatever about the business: the angler equips himself with a stiff six-foot rod, a reel carrying couple of hundred yards of strong line, and a few large, well sharpened hooks on wire traces: the boatman provides the small fish required for bait and all the angler has to do is sit in the boat trailing his bait, while the boatman rows over such waters as he thinks most likely to provide sport: and in the season it would seem that the estuaries of rivers which enter the Gulf of Mexico at Tampico in Mexico and Boca Grande in Florida contain Tarpon in sufficient number during the season—the summer—to give sport to a regiment of anglers. Tarpon fishing may not be scientific angling, but it is probably the most exciting and hardest fishing known to man. The fish run from five feet to over seven feet in length and up to 200 lbs. in weight: they fight to the very last gasp and their habit of springing out of the water in their endeavours to get rid of the hook renders the business of playing them a vast deal more eventful than that of playing the Salmon. A peculiar feature of the Tarpon's anatomy is against the angler: its mouth is furnished with certain bony plates which militate against the chances of the hook taking hold, turn the point of the hook and in conjunction with the muscular structures enable the fish to release himself much more readily than can the majority of fish. Hence there is always an element of doubt, as in other forms of angling but more considerable, until the fish is actually brought to the gaff. A fish of enormous muscular strength, great vitality and "game" every inch of him, he fights to the very last: and here it is that the sport comes in. From Mr. Churchill's account we find that one Tarpon well hooked will provide a struggle that will last two hours or more and will leave the angler quite as tired as his quarry to say nothing of the boatman who has to keep his craft underway, lest the fish run out all the line and break away by sheer strength. Once the fish is brought alongside the boat,—or the boat alongside the fish, for even when dead beat the Tarpon will not enter shoal water—the game is over: Tarpon is not regarded as good eating by anyone, though the lower classes of Mexicans are acquiring a taste for it. When the quarry is brought alongside therefore the angler usually releases him unless he wants the specimen for the taxidermist or the peculiar trophy—the lenses of the eyes—which the fish affords. It is no easy business to get the hook out of the Tarpon; his large firm scales make it impossible to gaff him externally anywhere but under the throat and the insertion of the gaff here is very likely to inflict a fatal wound, or at least produce such a flow of blood as will attract the too numerous sharks in these waters. The accepted method is to put the gaff into the mouth and hold the fish until the hook has been extracted, when the Tarpon is released.

The number of Tarpon fishers would seem to have much increased during recent years as we read that the charges made for boats and boatmen have practically doubled. This would seem to be the case particularly at Tampico, where the sport is to be had at its best in the river Panuco, about six miles from its mouth. There is there an inn which caters for the Tarpon fisher and where accommodation is to be had for from ten to twelve shillings per diem; not so long ago the inn Tariff was half as much, but the popularity of the sport has increased so much that the inn keepers have naturally taken advantage of their position. In former days yellow fever was rife in this region and strangers gave it a wide birth: but improved drainage and sanitary arrangements have removed this scourge and a case of yellow fever has not occurred for three or four years. Insects too are less troublesome and venomous than might be supposed: and we imagine that the visitor who has had a few years' seasoning among the mosquitoes in this country would suffer little in this regard. A noteworthy feature of Mr. Churchill's book is the series of photographs of leaping fish.

THE TRAIL OF THE 'COON.

NOEL BENTLY, the champion 'coon hunter of Vermont, had no desire to upset the tranquility of West Pawlet. He simply drove through the little hamlet one clear, frosty morning in the latter part of October on his way back from Haystack Mountain with a 22-pound 'coon, and his two faithful canines, old "Ben" and young "Sport," perched on the seat beside him.

Herman Nelson saw the 'coon and in less than no time was stricken with the fever. He communicated it with a single sentence to his brother Tom Nelson. Tom lost no time telling Clarence Waters that there was nothing in the sporting line quite equal to a good 'coon hunt with crackajack dogs. Under this inspiration Waters told everything to "Wishy" Williams, the postmaster, who got so excited that he could hardly distribute the mail. While Wayland Johnson was getting his mail the news struck him broadside and he went under with the rest, even inciting W. H. Copeland to deeds of daring, and the endurance of hardships untold and not even imagined. To cap the climax George Folger, who had rather fish than work, got caught in the swirling current. Things were certainly doing.

It did not take much urging to bring Bentley up from his home in Rupert with the dogs. He had been out three nights that week, but did not object to going again if there was anything in sight.

"I aint got only nineteen this fall" said Noel, "and I want to get enough to bring it up to last year. I got forty-five in 1904, and about forty-three the year before that. Guess if I didn't have to work so hard day-times running the farm I could hack out a few more on 'em."

Along with Bentley and the dogs came George Austin, who wears a broad brimmed hat, heavy rubber boots, and a sad expression on his face. George never talks. One might imagine that he was sad over the loss of some 'coon, long ago.

The crowd gathered that night at Steve McFadden's, two or three miles out of town, and with lanterns, axes and one gun tramped the mountains and hills and valleys. It was a beautiful moonlit night to start with, but the dew was not there, and before long a strong wind commenced rushing down through Rush "Holler." The dogs were working in the woods on the side of the hill when they struck a track. Old Ben gave the signal, but as he kept going higher up the sound was carried away by the wind. The 'coon went into a ledge, but it took so long to locate the centre of action that the dogs gave it up and returned. A good dog will never leave a tree, but he knows just as well as a hunter that the chances are all against him when a 'coon gets into the rocks.

In the early hours of the morning, old Ben again gave tongue. It was in an old orchard, not far from a brook. Then the sweetest music a sportsman ever heard was wafted over the valley. It stirred the despondent nimrods to heroic sprinting. Thomas Nelson, rather portly, in his haste to reach the spot where the chorus had now reached a babel of tongues, stubbed his toe and measured his majestic form on the rock-strewn earth. The shock was great. "Hold on boys" yelled Sir Thomas, "I want to be in at th' killin'," but he had no time or breath left to spout his favourite remark: "I had ruther hear a dog baying on th' trail than to hear th' Boston symphony orchestra play a tune."

The chase was short but sharp. The quarry took to the shelter of an old weather-worn butternut. Not a leaf was left to bar the vision, and with the aid of lanterns held aloft the hunters had no difficulty detecting a dark, crouching object in the higher branches. A consultation of war was held. It would have been an easy matter to shoot the game. But that was too tame. The savage instinct said to tumble the animal out of the tree and let the dogs kill it. It is the fight at the end of the chase that the hunters long for and will walk miles to see.

"All right" said Bentley, "we will shake him out. Stand back, keep quiet, give the dogs a chance. So up the tree went 'Gene Barden, who had joined the party at the last moment. So quickly and easily did he shin the aged trunk that one might imagine him a rival to the chicoree.

Below, eagerness flushed the faces of all. The dogs were acting as if mad. They jumped, they twisted, they cavorted ; but all the time they kept their song of triumph echoing through the valley.

"Look out!" yelled Barden. Momentary silence reigned. He rattled the dead branches. With a rush, a dark object came down and struck the ground with a thud. The dogs closed in.

"Boys," said Bentley, "we've got a stray cat!"

Some of the remarks that followed would not sound well in a prayer meeting. However, the cat was saved, and that is at least a redeeming feature.

Tired out, disgruntled and disconsolate, the crowd went home, stopping on the way to drink a big can of milk. The owner of the milk, John Jackson, said next morning that that was a mild finish for a cat hunt. A slight coolness toward the subject of 'coon hunting was noticed in certain quarters until the inner man had been thoroughly appeased. Then the fever broke out again and three nights later the party had the courage to tackle the Manor swamp, which is seven miles long by three miles wide. Its mysteries were unknown, but Bentley had killed two 'coons on the edge of it a short time before.

Before they had been swashing around two hours, different expressions indicated that something was wrong. The champion 'coon hunter was so disturbed that he lay down and went to sleep. When he awoke he offered the consolation that he had no more idea of where he was than a boiled owl. Each individual offered a different direction to bring the party out in the clearing. Each was tried and the swamp remained as dear to the heart as ever. At five o'clock a lonely dog's voice was heard. That was the rescuing angel, but it was 9 o'clock in the morning before the party stumbled into town. They were called different names, most of which were uncomplimentary, but in their crippled condition could not rise to their own defence. Several homes really looked like hospitals. Along towards night, however, they slowly commenced to thaw out a little, and bristle up at the insinuation that they did not tell a poor little pussy cat from a sharp nosed, bright eyed 'coon.

Most of them admitted in unguarded moments that they had enough of wading around in water-soaked swamps on cold and cheerless nights. One of the hunters said that his respect for the animal which always washes its food in cold water before eating it, was so great that he had no intention of seeking to destroy its life. "I have learned," he said, "a great deal about the habits of 'coons. They are not easily found although their favorite location is in a swamp, where there is heavy timber, a running brook, and plenty of barb wire fences. They never seem to be injured by a fall out of the tallest tree. No sooner do they strike the ground than they are up and ready for a fight. Only an experienced dog, one who knows the game, can conquer them. They prowl around nights because that is the most inconvenient time to hunt them."

For a time it looked as if the frost had killed the 'coon fever, but one afternoon a report reached town to the effect that a 'coon had been seen in a tree in Dennison's woods. The special tree in which his 'coonship had sported with an unsophisticated puppy was not more than half a mile from the village. This was adding insult to injury, and the fever broke out in virulent form. A telephone message to Bentley brought him with his dogs. That night the crowd attacked the hills west of the town. The dogs raced through the woods and the swamps until midnight, but not a sound was heard to warm the hearts of the now despondent hunters.

Somebody suggested that it was about time to go home, if the "guides" had any idea of how to get there. Mild as the insinuation was it reduced the temperature to a marked degree, and increased the impression that landmarks familiar in the daylight had taken on unfamiliar forms in the darkness. A discussion only left the situation as clear as muddy water.

That characteristic expression of New Englanders, "I told you so," was sounded good and hard as the party strung out in single file along an old road which passed through a tumble-down fence, and along the edge of a small swamp. "No more 'coon hunting for me" remarked one of the hitherto enthusiastic followers of the chase as he stubbed his toe and measured his length on the damp earth. "I tell you there is not a 'coon in the Green pond country, and we might as well get out of it. You don't drag me——"

What he might have said was lost in the general confusion that followed. Old Ben had suddenly broken away from Bentley and was tearing around in marshy ground.

"Boys" yelled Bentley "there is somethin' doing sure as your born. Old Ben isn't crazy for nothin'. I'll bet ——" One long drawn bawl from the older dog was followed by a rapid succession of sharp tongues, and the younger dog let loose with a voice that made the old hills fairly ring with the music. It was a perfect babel of tongues, and a more excited crowd of human beings was never seen. The lethargy of despondency disappeared ; rocks, trees, and water were forgotten in the mad rush. Suddenly the barking sounded as if it came from one spot. For a moment it died away, only to be renewed with greater vigor. "Treed, sure as your born" cried Bentley.

He was right. Around the base of an oak, which towered more than eighty feet into darkness, and was so big around that a man's arm could not span half its rugged trunk, the dogs were barking and jumping as if mad. As if in delirium of joy the young hound was fairly turning somersaults.

"Smart 'coon, that" said Bentley ; "he knew enough to pick out the largest and meanest tree in the woods to climb."

Then it suddenly dawned on the inexperienced that it was one thing to put a 'coon up a tree and another to get it down. The lowest limb was twenty feet above the ground. No one seemed anxious to climb up—no one knew where or how far—and shake the sharp nosed, bright eyed forager out. A call for volunteers proved that there were no Japanese in the crowd. Oppressive silence followed. Finally Mr Thomas Nelson with great deliberation, suggestive of judicial mien, held up one hand and delivered himself as follows :

"I will tell you what we will do, listen." Even the dogs stopped barking ; it was a momentous moment. "Let Austin climb the tree, and shake out the 'coon. We will stay down here and kill it."

All eyes were turned to Austin. He was bashful, pondered a moment and finally replied to the honor offered him : "Let Tom climb."

That was the blow that almost killed Thomas. Staggered by the blow he recoiled, gasped and then blurted out : "Do I look like a tree climber?" Not one was bold enough to say "yes." Then in the hour of extreme suspense George Folger came to the front, and made a climb that will go down in the history of Vermont 'coon hunting as the most daring on record.

With the aid of long poles, made from saplings, he was helped up to the lowest branches. From there he had to "shin" a seven-foot stretch before he found himself in a working position. At the extreme top he shook out the 'coon, a risky piece of work because the branch broke. Only Folger's nerve and strong fingers saved him from a fall to certain death. But he did not forget to yell out : "Look sharp ; he's comin'."

The 'coon ran down the branch as it broke, made a wild jump at Folger's foot, but missing went crashing down to the ground. Whether it was cleverness on the part of the 'coon, or chance cannot be told, but the dead limb struck on one side of the tree and the 'coon far over the other side.

Keen to the situation, Bentley yelled : "Stand back, boys ; not a sound or we will lose him." Bentley and the dogs made no mistake in the sounds of falling bodies. With unerring accuracy they located the 'coon. In less than a second, 'coon, dogs and Bentley were mixed up in a grand rough and tumble fight. I was careless enough to get into the limelight. The 'coon broke away from the dogs, and made a rush at my legs.

"Get out of the way"! shrieked Bentley ; "let Cap have him."

I did not argue the question. Cap was on top of the 'coon in the twinkle of the eye. He grabbed him by the throat, but when the young hound pounced down upon the game fighter he got hold of him anywhere he could, thus showing his inexperience. Bentley pulled him off as quick as he could, because he did not want the hide injured. It was a great fight, an exciting fight, but the odds were too great ; the 'coon died.—Western Field.
