To sportsmen who lead the strenuous life an "easy" is very acceptable, and the Thursday in the busy, bustling, rushing week at Epsom generally affords quite a contrast to the other three days. Yesterday was a day of days, from a veteran turfite's point of view, with fields just strong enough to induce some spirited wagering, but generally of such proportions as admitted the covering scope of race glasses in all parts of each contest. The addition of two valuable prizes to the programme has raised Thursday from its imputation of an off day, and visitors returned to town comfortably refreshed instead of hot and fagged out. match, in which H. H. Hilton and H. C. Ellis opposed Captain C. K. Hutchison and Gordon Lockhart, the games were fairly close. At the end of the morning round, honours were easy. Each side led on two matches and one was all even at this stage. The top match was a remarkable one. The first eight holes were halved, and there was every indication of the game being desperately close all the way. Hilton, however, played some wonderfully fine golf, and it was mainly due to his efforts that the Englishmen had a lead of 4 up on the first round. In the afternoon, they gradually increased their lead, and it was not until the ninth in the second round was reached that the Scotsmen won their first hole. Hilton and Ellis ultimately won by 7 and 6.

The second match, between Robert Harris and Norman Hunter and John Ball and Abe Mitchell was won by the Scottish couple. In this game Ball did not play his customary game. Mitchell played steadily, but he was unable to make up for the shortcomings of his partner. The Scotsmen led from the start. They were 2 up at the fifth, winning the third and fourth holes by their superiority on the greens. At the turn the English couple were 5 down. They were 6 down at the eleventh, where Ball missed his tee shot. Towards the end of the round, however, the Englishmen improved and on the first 18 holes they had a deficit of 3 down. At the turn in the afternoon, the Scotsmen had regained their lead of 6 up. Coming home, Hunter was several times at fault on the greens and Ball and Mitchell won the eleventh, twelfth, and fifteenth holes. The Scots were now only 3 up, but Hunter holed a good putt on the sixteenth for the match by 4 and 2.

There were some interesting fluctuations in the match between Blackwell and Fairlie and Lassen and Woolley. The last named was erratic with his driving going out, and Lassen was not recovering well. The result was that the English pair were 2 down at the turn. Coming home, they showed considerable improvement, and by the end of the round they had converted their two-hole defeat into a two-hole lead. They lost this advantage going out in the afternoon, and at the turn Blackwell and Fairlie had drawn level. The Scots were 3 up with 4 to play, but they lost the next two holes. The seventeenth was halved, so that they were now dormy 1. On the last green Woolley had a putt of eight yards to square the match. It ran past the hole, and the Scotsmen won by 1 up.

The Hon'ble Maurice Scott and Everard Martin Smith had a close game with J. Gordon Simpson and C. E. Dick. The latter couple lost two of the first four holes, but at the turn the match was "all even." At the end of the round the Scotsmen had an advantage of 1 up. Scott and Smith took the lead at the eighth hole in the afternoon, and they ultimately proved successful by 1 up. Perhaps the feature of the match was the putting of Scott.

The third Scottish success was that gained by Jenkins and Macfarlane over Stevens and Scratton. In this game there was seldom much to choose between the sides. The match was "all even" at the end of the first round, but Jenkins and Macfarlane won the first two holes in the afternoon, and, after leading by 2 up at the turn, secured the victory by 3 and 1. Results:—

Scotland.—Captain C. K. Hutchison and Gordon Lockhart 0, Robert Harris and Norman Hunter (4 and 2) 1, Edward Blackwell and W. G. Fairlie (1 hole) 1, J. G. Simpson and C. E. Dick 0, J. C. L. Jenkins and C. B. Macfarlane (3 and 1) 1; total 3.

England.—H. H. Hilton and H. C. Ellis (7 and 6) 1, John Ball and Abe Mitchell 0, E. A. Lassen and F. A. Woolley 0, Hon'ble M. Scott and E. Martin Smith (1 hole) 1, L. B. Stevens and E. W. Scratton 0; total 2.

THE AMATEUR CHAMPIONSHIP.

The Semi-finals.

The two matches in the semi-final round were neither of them very close, Mr. Mitchell was altogether too strong for Mr. Macfarlane; in fact, there never was a match in which the crushing advantage of great length was more clearly shown.

Mr. Ball began by playing excellent golf against Mr. Hambro, very different indeed from that which he had played against Mr. Bond. He holed a long put for a 4 at the 1st hole and also won the 2nd. At the 3rd he approached badly and Mr. Hambro got one hole back. At the 4th Mr. Hambro played an admirable approach shot to within a few yards of the hole. Mr. Ball in thoroughly characteristic fashion played one still better, and running down his put for a 3, was once again 2 up. He had another 3 at the 5th and very nearly another at the 6th. In fact, up to the 11th hole he never made the ghost of a mistake and stood 5 up.

Then a change came over the game and for a moment it seemed as if Mr. Ball was to have the same sort of attack made on him as he had made on Mr. Bond in the morning. He slipped a stroke at each of the next two holes and lost them both. Mr. Hambro had a huge drive and iron shot to the 13th and won that also in 4, and then played a perfect shot to the 14th, laying his ball within three yards of the hole. Mr. Ball followed suit with another just as good. He had to play the odd just missed his put for a 2. Now was Mr. Hambro's great chance, but he also missed his put and with it lost all chance of appearing in the final tie. He topped his drive into the rushes at the 15th, a fate which Mr. Ball rather narrowly escaped. He did escape it, however, won the hole easily and obtaining a comfortable half at the 16th, passed for the tenth time into the final round of the Amateur Championship.

Final.

The amateur golf championship was won by John Ball (Royal Liverpool), who defeated Abe Mitchell at the thirty-eighth hole on the links of the Royal North Devon Club at Westward Ho! on June 7. Mr. Horace Hutchinson was the referee. The weather was perfect in the morning, but rain fell heavily later in the day.

The present is Mr. Ball's eighth victory, and he conquered a man who was born in the year he won his first championship. John Ball was a great power in golf before Abe Mitchell was born, in 1868, the year the championship cup was first hailed in triumph at the then remote and unknown village in Cheshire. He is in his forty-ninth year. He made his first appearance in the open championship when he was fourteen years of age, and finished sixth, several strokes ahead of some prominent professionals of that period. He gained the amateur championship for the first time in 1887, and for the seventh time in 1910.

At the first hole Mitchell outdrove his opponent by thirty yards. Ball had to take a brassey for his second, and even then was short. Mitchell hooked his iron shot, and took 5 to reach the green, and the hole was halved in 5. At the second Ball topped his brassey shot, but escaped trouble. Mitchell was to the right of the green with an iron. He made a good run-up, and, holing a four-feet putt, won in 4 to 5. Going to the third, Ball took a cleek for his second shot, and topped it into the bunker. Mitchell was nearly on the green with two fine wooden club shots. He was strong with his short pitch; but Ball had to play two more on the green, and Mitchell, winning in 5 to 6, became 2 up.

At the fourth Mitchell had a bad lie in rough ground on a hummock from his drive. He got only about 15 yards with his second, and after playing two more on the green he picked up, Ball winning the hole in 4. Mitchell made a perfect tee shot to the short fifth, and got down a curly downhill putt of three yards for a 2. He was now 2 up. At the sixth Mitchell was bunkered in front of the green from his approach. He put his shot out over the green, played two more, and then picked up. Ball was practically dead in 3.

Ball found the bunker from his tee shot going to the seventh. He took three strokes to reach the green, and the hole went to Mitchell in 4 to 5. At the eighth Ball was five yards short of the bunker, and he got trapped with his next shot, which he completely duffed. He took 2 to recover, and Mitchell won the hole in 4 to 6. The latter was bunkered in front of the green at the ninth. He missed a three-yards putt for a 5, but Ball holed one of about the same length, and won in 5—6. Mitchell had a lead of 2 holes at the turn, the scores out being:—

Mitchell	...	...	5	4	5	6	2	6	4	4	6=42
Ball	...	...	5	5	6	4	3	4	5	6	5=43

The tenth was halved, Mitchell laying his opponent a stymie. Ball, in trying to screw round the ball, put both into the hole. The next two were also halved.

Ball hit a magnificent brassie shot to within seven yards of the hole at the thirteenth, and reduced his opponent's lead to 1. At the fourteenth Ball was bunkered to the right of the green. He had no niblick with him, and his mashie proved useless. He took 3 to recover, and Mitchell won the hole in 4. The latter became 3 up at the fifteenth, where Ball had a poor run-up shot. At the sixteenth Ball played a poor tee shot and a poor pitch and Mitchell, winning with a 3, became 4 up. Mitchell missed a short putt at the seventeenth, and Ball won the hole. The eighteenth was halved in 4, so that Mitchell finished the round 3 up. The figures home were:—

Mitchell	...	...	4	4	4	5	4	4	3	6	4=38
Ball	...	...	4	4	4	4	6	5	4	5	4=40

Rain was falling heavily when the second round began. There were about 2,000 spectators. Both players jumped the ditch with their second shots to the first, which was halved in 5. Mitchell sliced his drive at the second, and was nearly in the rushes. In his back swing his club was retarded by the rushes, and he missed the shot. Ball was on the green with a splendid brassey shot, and he won in 4—5. Mitchell was now 2 up.

Both players missed putts at the third, and the hole was halved. They approached past the fourth green, but Ball got down an eight-foot putts for a 4. Mitchell missed a slightly shorter one, and Ball won the hole. The short fifth was a lucky hole for the latter. His ball struck an umbrella which was being carried by a spectator and rebounded on to the edge of the green. Mitchell's ball struck another spectator and bounced into a bunker. Ball won the hole in 3 to 4, and squared the match.

After a half in 4 at the sixth, Ball became 1 down at the seventh, where Mitchell laid his approach on the edge of the green. Ball squared again at the eighth, where he holed a four yards putt for a 2. Ball missed his drive at the ninth, and again became 1 down. Scores out:—

Mitchell	...	...	5	5	5	5	4	4	4	3	5=40
Ball	...	...	5	4	5	4	3	4	5	2	7=39

The figures home were:—

Ball	...	...	4	5	5	3	3	5	4	6	4=39
Mitchell	...	...	4	5	5	5	4	4	4	5	5=41

The 37th hole was halved, but Ball won the 38th and the game.

BOXING.

Driscoll vs. Poesy.—Last Monday night, at the National Sporting Club, Jim Driscoll, of Cardiff, and Jean Poesy, of France, met in a 20-round contest for £1,200 and the feather-weight championship of the world. Driscoll had the advantage from the first and knocked his opponent out at the beginning of the 12th round, thus retaining the title which is generally conceded to him even by American critics.

Driscoll is, of course, the champion in his division of the British Isles; he is the only boxer who has gained the three victories in championship contests required for winning a Lonsdale Challenge Belt outright. During a tour in the United States some years ago he outpaced and outpointed Abe Attell, who was then easily the best of the American featherweights, in such brilliant fashion that his all-round superiority to the transatlantic experts was generally acknowledged. As an exponent of the classic English style of boxing he is unrivalled; nobody who saw him beat "Spike" Robson, a formidable natural fighter with a strong defence, in the 7th round of his last Lonsdale Belt encounter, will ever forget the graceful effectiveness of his method of disposing of a stronger but less skilful adversary.

Since that famous vindication of the artist's superiority over the artisan, which took place more than a year ago, Driscoll has had no serious engagement. Sparring practice and gymnasium work are not an adequate substitute, and it was felt that so long an abstention from the ring would be a distinct disadvantage to the British featherweight champion. Moreover, Driscoll has now reached an age when nine out of ten boxers lose something of their pace and capacity of taking punishment.

In Jean Poesy, the featherweight champion of France, he was meeting a bustling fighter with a very dangerous punch in either hand, who is ten years younger and the possessor of a cast-iron physique. Poesy's best performance was his victory over "Digger" Stanley, our bantam-weight champion who could not give away all the weight between the two divisions, and had much the worst of a contest that went the full distance of 20 rounds.

That "youth will be served" is an adage of the ring which works out correctly much more often than not. Still Driscoll, a consummate master of ringcraft, never allows an opponent to dictate the plan of campaign, and it was generally believed that his consummate ringcraft would enable him to keep out of danger.

Driscoll had nearly 2lb. advantage in the weights, but Poesy looked the bigger and stronger man when the two were stripped for action. It was clear that both were in the best possible condition.

During the first two rounds Poesy was very aggressive, and one could see that, like most of the American boxers, he fights in two planes, relying chiefly on body-blows to wear his man down. In the earlier stages of the contest Driscoll was content to remain on the defensive, while "sizing up" his opponent, and at the same time treating him to an occasional straight left. Once he had ascertained the conditions of the Poesy problem he proceeded to solve it at his leisure.

After the sixth round, in which the Frenchman tried a little butting and shouldering without any result whatever, Driscoll proceeded to turn the contest into an exhibition. The pace and power of his hitting were amazing; the way in which he put leg-drive into his blows was an object-lesson to the many professional boxers present. To his style, as to that of the Jam Sahib at cricket or of John Roberts at billiards, the much-misused epithet "effortless" is strictly applicable. He had Poesy helpless in the 11th round, and after the interval finished him off with a terrific right and left. He well deserved the applause he received from a full house.

CALCUTTA NOTES AND COMMENTS.

The football during the week has been very interesting and some of the results have come as great surprises. The greatest surprise was the defeat of the Y.M.C.A. by Dalhousie who won by no fewer than seven goals to nil. This is a record score for any First Division League match in Calcutta. The defeat of the Customs by the Rangers by three goals to nil came as a great surprise, and the subsequent victory of Customs over Calcutta by four goals to two was also quite unexpected. The other games terminated as was anticipated, but the England and Scotland match, which the latter won, should have been a draw.

In the Customs and Rangers match, which took place on the grounds of the former, the home team had rather the best of the attack, but their forwards could not force the ball into the net. Manuk and Vaillant seemed reluctant to take the responsibility of shooting. Falloon was shy to get close to the goal, while the shooting of Galbraith and Williamson was of the wildest description imaginable. Nothing had been scored up to seven minutes of the close, and then Anderson miskicking gave Lindsay an opportunity of scoring the first goal. After this some of the Customs players lost their heads and sulked like children. Lindsay netted a second goal and a third came from Smart, but had some of the Customs players 'played the game" the Rangers would not have got the second and third goals. There was no attempt to stop the Rangers men, and only Hyland, Hargrave and Christison exerted themselves, the other standing still and seeing the Rangers score

On the Calcutta ground the Middlesex beat the Garrison Artillery by two goals to nil. The Dum Dum team were without Pigott, and the goal scored by the gunners would in all probability have been warded off had Pigott been in goal. The Middlesex are to have two changes in the Shield Tournament—Adcock and Eden, who have been at Dinapore, are expected on Saturday.

The charity match on Saturday between England and Scotland produced one of the finest games witnesed this season. Last year's game was very tame and one-sided, but for Saturday's contest two excellent teams had been got together—the best that have opposed each other in these matches. Consequently Mr. H. E. Medlycott and his committee had every justification to look forward to a big 'gate," and in spite of the bad weather there was a very large attendance, but the crowd would have been even a larger one had the conditions been more congenial. The seating arrangements were all that could be desired, and with high class football and the excellent band of the Black Watch in attendance, to say nothing of the drums and pipers of the same regiment, an excellent evening's sport was provided. Ten minutes before the finish a smart shower of rain fell which detracted not a little from the enjoyment of the proceedings. The football, however, was never dull and some remarkably fine play was seen. The Scotch team won by three goals to two, but on the evening's play a draw of two all would have been a truer index to the game.

With the exception of Stewart, who was unable to keep goal for Scotland, the teams were the same that was originally selected. Sergeant Brown, who really should have been selected, filled the vacancy in goal, and it was indeed lucky for Scotland that the Black Watch man was in charge of the net. Indeed Brown brought off many excellent saves and but for him England would probably have won. The English forwards have more of the play during the initial half, but their forwards threw away some beautiful chances of scoring. Hurlston once missed badly by sending behind, and Fenn, Lomas and Bateman all failed to score with practically open nets. Watson, the great inner-left of the Black Watch, owing to a bad knee, was not seen at his best; but his partner Connor, the outside man, played at the top of his form, and was easily the best forward on the field. During this period Brown had more shots to handle than did Pigott, his vis-a-vis, and at half time the representatives of the Rose were leading by one goal to nil. Lomas, the Black Watch man, scoring with a fine shot.

So far the game had been played under favourable conditions, except that the ground was a bit on the heavy side. On resuming, Scotland were not long in equalising. Quayle pushed an opponent from the back just outside the penalty area, and Gordon, taking the kick, sent in a hard low, one which Pigott only half cleared, and the ball coming out on the left, Connor was not slow in taking advantage of the opportunity, sending in a beautiful hard shot which gave the Middlesex custodian no chance, great cheering followed, and shortly after the same player scored again. Shortly after scoring of the second goal the weather, which was very threatening, broke down and a smart shower of rain fell. The English team equalised, Bateman scoring, but Scotland were awarded a lucky "penalty kick," and Connor, taking the shot, scored. After the match the Hon. Mr. Norman McLeod gave a short speech, congratulating the players, and Mrs. H. G. Pooler was asked to present the Scotch team their medals.

On Monday there were three matches played and the game on the Calcutta ground against the Customs attracted the largest number of spectators. The game was very fast and exciting, and both sets of forwards in their eagerness to score missed some fine openings, especially during the first half. Pooler played a poor game, and in this match he paid more attention to the man than the ball. At half time the Customs led by a goal to nil, and after ends had been changed and the home team had scored two goals, a victory for Calcutta was anticipated. However, the Customs played with great dash, and the Riversiders netting three more goals won an unexpected but well-earned victory by four goals to two. The third goal by the Customs was from a penalty, Pooler fouling Williamson when the latter looked all over like scoring. The Customs are a most inconsistent team, for after losing to the Rangers by three to nil, they beat Calcutta by a two-goal margin. The "Reds" displayed nothing like the form they did against the Black Watch and the Middlesex.

The same evening the Black Watch beat the Rangers by two goals to nil, Bandmaster O'Donnell netting both points. Hall, who played for the Rangers, shaped very well considering this was his first game and with a little more practice he should render a brilliant account of himself. The Black Watch were without Watson and Gordon.

Dalhousie put up a record score by beating the Y.M.C.A. by no fewer than seven goals to nil. The first match was a win for the Association, but on Monday the Christians were outclassed.

THE BOMBAY HARWOOD LEAGUE.

The Bombay Gymkhana met the B. A. Temperance Association on Monday, the 17th instant and were beaten by a goal to nil. The soldiers had the best of the match throughout. Keef scored in the first half and they maintained this lead by superior play to the end. On the 18th the Hornets met the Byculla Mechanics' Institute. The Hornets were making their first appearance in the League and gave a very good account of themselves, though beaten two to one. The opening half was well contested and the Hornets were first to score, Downes putting through. It was not long, however, before Peel put the teams on terms and the interval arrived with the score one all. The Mechanics, helped by the wind, had the best of the second half and Mungavin scored. Other chances were missed and the game ended 2-1 in favour of the Byculla team. On Tuesday the Bombay Athletic Club beat the Y.M.C.A. by the odd goal in 5. The Y.M.C.A. did most of the pressing in the first half and led at the interval by a goal to nil, Ivers scoring at the end of a nice bout of passing. On changing ends the Athletic Club equalised from a penalty and shortly after put on another goal—the result of a misunderstanding between the Y.M.C.A. backs and custodian. The Y.M.C.A. then took up the running and McDurmutt eventually equalised. Level play till a few minutes before time was called when Hyde scored the winning goal for the Bombay Athletic. On Saturday the Gymkhana and the R.G.A. played a draw of one all. The Gymkhana were perhaps the better team, but their forwards failed at critical moments.

THE MURREE TOURNAMENT.

The final in the tournament on the 17th instant brought together the Lancashire Fusiliers and the 4th King's Royal Rifles. There was a big attendance which included Sir James and Lady Willcocks. The game was well-contested throughout and in spite of the efforts of both teams neither was able to score in the first half. The Lancs were awarded two penalties but failed to score and the Rifles also lost opportunities. In the second half play continued fast and hard. The Rifles opened their scoring from a penalty. The Lancs made desperate efforts to equalise and after numerous attempts they got on terms, Russell putting through. On resuming Gamble put on a second point and the Rifles being unable to respond the Fusiliers won a splendid game by 2 to 1.

Lady Willcocks then presented the cup to the winners, also a miniature cup to the Captain and medals to the winners and runners-up. General Willcocks in well-chosen words complimenting the redoubtable 20th and encouraging the 60th.

The Naturalist.

THE EGGS AND NESTS.

ONE of the most curious of eggs is that of the apteryx of New Zealand (writes the Hon'ble Gladys Graham Murray in Chambers's Journal). The size of the egg is out of all proportion to the bird. It is so large that it is affirmed that the egg cannot be replaced in the skeleton without breaking or displacing one or more of the bones.

Most eggs are hatched out by the warmth of the body of the hen bird, who sits for several days upon the eggs, the period of incubation differing among the various birds.

On the soft ball of a newly-hatched chick being examined, there will be found at the tip of the upper half of the mandible a tiny hard nodule, which is known as the egg-tooth; this acts as a file to the imprisoned chick when it is chipping its way out of the egg, and, since it has no further use in life it completely disappears long before the bird reaches the adult stage.

In hot countries birds are very often the makers of artificial incubators; in the case of the Moleo birds, of the island of Celebes, the nesting-side is chosen in a beach of loose black sand, a hole of three or four feet is excavated, and in this the eggs are deposited at intervals of about a fortnight. These birds do not brood, and the hatching of the eggs is, therefore, due to the warmth of the sand and the powerful sun-rays.

The brush-turkey, of Australia, is one of the mound builders. These birds construct huge mounds of leaves and grass, and the warmth produced by the fermentation of this vegetable matter helps to hatch out the eggs.

Among ostriches the cock-bird digs a hole, in which the hens lay, all in the same nest—fifteen to thirty eggs being found—and the duty of incubation falls chiefly to the cock.

No egg is hatched under more curious conditions than that of the emperor penguin of the Antarctic regions. It lays its large single egg on the sea-ice, with a surrounding temperature of fifty degrees below zero; but nature has not allowed this bird to perish, and the parent bird keeps the egg off the ice by placing it on the upper side of its feet and covering it from above by a feathered fold of skin.

The tailor-bird, a native of the East Indian region, actually sews together its own nest. By means of its beak it pierces a row of holes along the edges of conveniently hanging leaves, and then, with the fibre of some plant it sews these together, forming a bag-shaped sort of nest, which is lined with soft white down, and swings from the branch on which the leaves grow.

The weaver-birds, inhabitants of Asia and Africa, have curious pensile nests, which are slung from the branches of trees. The sociable weaver-bird builds a joint-nest, like a thatched roof, in a tree, the different pairs occupying separate nesting-holes in the thatch.

The bower-birds of the Australian region, while they build nests in no way specially remarkable, have the extraordinary habit of constructing "bowers" decorated with small bright objects of various kinds, and used by the birds as playgrounds. Among these the gardener-bird seems to carry the instinct for decoration to the highest pitch, employing flowers and bright-coloured fruits to adorn his "bower."

STATE ELEPHANTS OF THE MUGHAL EMPERORS.

ONE of the most interesting pictures in the Delhi Museum of archæology represents "Alam Guman," the favourite elephant of the Emperor Jahangir (1605-1627-A.D.) This elephant, which was presented to Jahangir by his son Prince Khurram, afterwards the Emperor Shah Jahan, was captured from Maharana Amar Singh of Udaipur, whose favourite elephant it also had been. Jahangir thus refers to the elephant in his memoirs: "At this auspicious moment the elephant "Alam Guman" [i.e. the arrogant of the Earth (Tod)] which was fit to be entered in the private stud, with the seventeen other male and female elephants which my son Baba Khurram had sent of the Rana's elephants, were presented before me and the hearts of the loyal rejoiced. On the 2nd day of the New Year knowing it to be propitious for a ride, I mounted it and scattered about much money."

Nicolao Manucci, the Venetian traveller who visited India in the seventeenth century, gives the names of some sixty-six of the State elephants belonging to the Emperor Aurangzeb, and examples of their names are: "Highly Sedate," "Always Drunk," "Pretty Artist," "The Worker," "Polished," "Quick Walker," "Valiant with the cut ear," etc., names which Manucci says were given to them by the King "according to his fancy or some aptitude he detects in these animals." He gives the following account of their training and feeding, and of the uses to which they were put :—

"Usually the king has one hundred very tall elephants which he uses himself; and there are also female elephants on whom he does not disdain to ride. All the elephants he rides are trained to stand fire or of both artillery and musketry, of rockets, and other fire works. This is done so that when they come across such things they may not be afraid. Others are taught not to be frightened of tigers or of lions, so that they may be used in hunting. To teach them they take a tiger-skin or lion-skin and stuff it with straw. Then just as it were alive, they move it here and there by a rope. The driver encourages the elephant, and urges him towards the dummy which with feet and trunk he tears to pieces. The elephants are well looked after; they are given spirit to drink to increase their courage in fight. It is the rule that there shall always be one elephant on sentry duty day and night on the river bank stationed within a little gateway just underneath the royal seat.

"Among these animals is one stronger and taller than the rest which bears the title of "General of the Elephants." When he appears at Court he is very richly caparisoned, and attended by a number of other elephants, by flutes, trumpets, cymbals, and flags, all of which makes a grand show. The chief elephants have every day for their ration each one hundred and sixty-five pounds of food stuff, namely, flour, rice, meat, butter, fine spices, and thirty pounds of sugarcane. This is in addition to straw, grass, and leaves, for which they have twenty-five rupees a day. To wait on each elephant there are ten servants, that is, two drivers to ride on and direct him; two to fix on his chains; two men with spears; two for the fireworks and to assist others, if necessary; one to remove the dung and another to give him water for drinking and cooling himself. All these men are paid out of the twenty-five rupees a day allotted to the elephant and these attendants have each four rupees a month besides what they can steal from the elephants' food.

"In addition to the above elephants there are fourteen hundred others that are employed to carry the queens, princesses, and the princes' concubines, the tents, the baggage and the kitchen utensils. The strongest of all who have no tusks, draw the heavy artillery over difficult ground and perform such like duties. The lowest among them has three rupees a day and three servants. All the elephants move with bells attached to their body, serving to warn the passers-by and give them time to move and get out of the way; for when an elephant runs, or merely walks, he does not stop like a horse would.

"When the King makes them (the elephants) fight, the wives of the drivers remove their ornaments, and put on mourning, just as if they were widows. If their husbands come back alive a great feast, just as if newly married; for in these encounters and combats the drivers put their lives in great jeopardy, as I have seen several times. Moreover, these animals are enormously strong, they do not have long lives, for often they fall suddenly to the ground and die in a short time. For, once they have fallen down, there is no hope of getting them up again; that is why they remove their tusks and leave them where they are."

One of the chief pastimes of the Mughal Court were elephant fights which took place usually below the walls of the palace. A low mud wall was erected, on either sides of which the combating animals took up their position. Old pictures show them, with trunks interlocked, apparently trying to pull each other over the barrier. The Mahouts on these occasions must have had, as Manucci says, a pretty anxious time, as the first aim of a skilful fighting elephant was to remove the mahout from his opponent's back, so that without his guidance it might be the more easily vanquished. When the elephants became mad with rage and likely to kill each other, they were separated by means of chakkars, or catherine wheels, held against them on the end of long poles. They were then easily separated and driven to the river, where, plunging into the water, they soon became calm again.

Another picture in the Delhi museum represents the adventure of Prince Aurangzeb with an elephant which had become unmanageable in one of these fights, and was about to kill a man, when the Prince, who, bigotted and cruel though he was in later years, was never a coward, successfully diverted the attention of the infuriated animal from its victim to himself, so that the former was saved. The picture represents his father Shahjahan and his brothers Shikoh and Prince Shuja watching the incident.

Motoring.

BY THROTTLE.

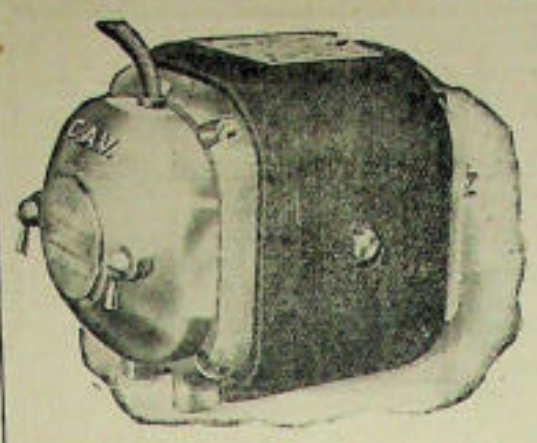
RECENT motor prosecutions comprise amongst others two cases against the driver of taxi-cab B6. As one of these has not been concluded at the time of writing comment is withheld. The driver of car No. 1280 has been fined Rs. 50 for driving at an excessive speed in Wellesley Street. This is a portion of the town where a European sergeant is seldom seen and consequently has been for some time past a veritable speed way for a certain class of driver. For driving on the wrong side of the road a private driver was fined Rs. 25 by the Chief Presidency Magistrate. Most of these cases have been instituted by Sergeant Viner, who has recently shown a keen interest in that cleansing of Calcutta traffic, of which this column has always been an advocate. In this connection it is gratifying to note that the subject is now receiving attention in the daily press, both from editors and correspondents. More power to their styles. Giving evidence in one of the above cases Colonel Bird, I.M.S., obtained an acquittal for his chauffeur who was charged conjointly with another.

THESE appeared in the Statesman during the week, over the nom-de-plume "Reform", one of the soundest letters I recollect having seen in Calcutta on the subject of rash driving. This gentleman particularises the crossing of Wood and Short Streets, a point to which attention has been called by the writer several times. But the vagaries of the office jaun may be seen at almost any hour of the day in Clive Street and other portions of the city. The occupant of this mobile rabbit hutch lays back with his feet up while it careers along to the accompaniment of shouts from the driver and syce of rokke! rokke! The prosecution of the owner as an accessory is the only means, apparently, of arousing him from his lethargy to a recognition of the rights of others to the road. That owners are greatly to blame can be seen by anyone with inclination to look. Watch the conduct of the coachman of any official or burra sahib towards other units in the traffic. He rushes through street and gateways absolutely regardless of the "rule of the road" and lets loose a shower of abuse on the luckless individual of less importance who happens to cause a temporary check in the triumphal progress; moreover, I have often seen the vituperation of the coachman and syce supplemented by that of the employer. A case similar to the above happened to the writer on one occasion in Calcutta; the matter was not allowed to rest until what amounted to an apology was wrung from the employer who had in his service a coachman who, shining in the reflected light of his burra sahib, habitually indulged in conduct of the most arrogant type, which was particularly galling, at a time when European motor drivers were more plentiful than they are now.

A CLAUSE in the Traffic Regulations as laid down by the Commissioner of Police states: "When a vehicle is entering a main street from a side street, the driver of such vehicle shall stop, so as to allow any other vehicle proceeding along such main street in the vicinity of the cross street, to pass first."

Native coachmen cannot read this, but it is the duty of all employers to see that their servants are conversant with such rules.

IN the statistics published recently by Captain St. John Moses regarding Calcutta mortality for 1911, carriage accidents are shown to be responsible for 14 deaths, while to motor cars are attributed only 5 out of a total of 356 deaths for the year. These figures speak for themselves The remarks of this officer on carriage accidents are worthy of quotation. "Unless still more energy is shown in the repression of furious and reckless driving, this toll from the streets is likely to increase. The marvel indeed is that fatal accidents are so few." Captain St. John Moses is himself the owner and driver of a motor car as well as horse-drawn vehicles and consequently is in a position to give an unbiassed opinion, and his comments above are worth of the gravest consideration of the Police, to whom he is by the way the Medical Officer.



WITH the prevailing weather and its probable continuation for some weeks engine troubles are sure to arise, amongst them and probably the chief will be the reluctance of the engine to start. This is usually due to one of two causes—defective carburation or faulty ignition. A simple test for good carburation is, with normal lubrication and no vaporized oil with its consequent smoke issuing from the exhaust, to use a sheet of clean white paper as a background, on this an exhaust from good carburation should show only a slight brown tinge. A practically odourless and colorless exhaust is a good indication. There is no mistaking the pungent odour of an over-rich mixture, whilst if the mixture be excessively rich a "black" exhaust is produced, which resembles the smoke given off by an ordinary paraffin lamp when the wick is turned too high. But it must be remembered that the most perfect mixture will give off some little smell, which though characteristic is difficult to describe; this does not result, however, from unburnt petrol. Loss of compression is another failing which is very common and may arise from worn piston rings, wrongful adjustment of valve tappets, or badly seated valves. The remedy in the last two cases is in the hands of any intelligent driver. When the face of a valve becomes pitted and rough, causing loss of compression it is advisable to grind it in with emery flour and oil; a little of this should be placed on the face of the valve between it and its seat, then with a large screw driver and by means of the slot provided, the valve should be worked briskly round under and even pressure until the surfaces become smooth. The valve during grinding should not be turned continually in one direction as this causes grooves or rings on the surfaces. A back and forward motion is best with the occasional lifting of the valve from its seat and its relation thereto altered. Care should be taken after completion of the operation to remove all traces of emery to prevent it reaching the guides. Only the very finest emery must be used, "220 corn emery" being that usually recommended. Carborundum powder of the finest grade cuts quicker than emery and some prefer it, but its use should only be allowed to those who thoroughly understand the work. A good finishing off composition is rotten stone and oil. As to how often a valve should be ground in is somewhat variable estimate, but taking an average, once in a couple of thousand miles should suffice or probably a little oftener in the case of exhaust valves. When valves and seat become badly pitted through neglect or other cause recourse must be made to special tools for truing the valve face and providing a new seating. These tools however in the hands of amateurs are liable to do more harm than good.

The tappets, which strike the end of the valve stem and thus cause the valve to rise from its seating, should be so set or screwed up that only the minutest clearance remains when the valve is properly down. In obedience to the physical law of expansion of metals a valve stem will be longer when hot than when cold. In practice it will be found that $\frac{1}{64}$th of an inch space between the valve stem and tappet when cold will leave ample room for expansion and effective working under all conditions.

AT this time of the year nuts are liable to be difficult of removal owing to rust on the threads A method worth trying is the application of paraffin, but in this case some time must be allowed to elapse. Another way is to apply a piece of red hot iron to the side of the nut; this causes expansion and the subsequent application of the spanner, with probably a piece of iron tube supplied over the handle to give greater leverage, should move the most refractory nut. In this connection I might mention that it is always inadvisable to use a tight-fitting sparking plug, as the force required for its removal is liable to render it useless through fractures of the insulation. A good plan is to rub a little graphite grease on the thread of any new plug when fitting.

PROBABLY no trouble prone to develop in an engine causes so much annoyance or is so difficult to diagnose as a persistent knock. Most motorists know that an engine will knock if the ignition is advanced beyond the normal working point, and it is also generally known that the ignition may be safely advanced when running fast beyond the point advisable when running slow. Advancing the ignition even slightly when running slow often produces misfiring and at starting the disastrous back fire results. But too advanced ignition is not quite the same as pre-ignition, which is also a prolific source of knocking, and this condition in its turn must not be confused with self-ignition. Faulty carburation, that is too rich a charge, or a deposit of carbon on the piston blocks due to lubrication may cause pre-ignition. Strictly speaking pre-ignition is a too early explosion of the charge occuring without the agency of the spark. On the other hand self-ignition from the same cause may occur at approximately the correct firing moment if the engine be running with the throttle about half open. A not uncommon experience is to find that on switching off, the engine will fire perfectly for some seconds. If the throttle be fully opened while this is occurring a severe knock is generally set up. The reason is this, more gas means higher compression and the greater heat induced thereby raises the igniting media to the point of incandescence earlier in the stroke. This trouble may occur even after the combustion chamber and the top of the piston blocks have been scraped, though small particles of carbon remaining in the ports, consequently the cleaning out should be as thorough as possible. Another source of pre-ignition may be traced to a defect in the cylinder casting in the shape of a minute projecting spur of metal, or a "flake" at one of the valve ports; this superfluous metal becomes incandescent through heat and causes premature ignition of the charge. As this subject of engine knocking is a very wide one I intend to continue its discussion next week.

The last word in dynamo car lighting by the firm who had the first word on the subject.

We had the first word in electric car lighting when we originated specially designed lamps for car use nearly ten years ago. Determined to maintain the lead we have designed and perfected after the most searching tests, quite regardless of expense, the new dynamo lighting outfit. It effectually represents the last word in car-lighting systems.

The whole system is characterised by extreme simplicity, exceptional lightness and compactness. This is supplemented by a great increase in efficiency and reliability. Complete, the plant is a tribute to British ingenuity, skill, and workmanship.

In spite of its manifold advantages, the dynamo complete can be supplied from

The Story Teller.

"THE MAKING OF BILLY LANG."

WILLIAM BRACEBRIDGE or the "Old Man" as he was popularly called was one bound to succeed in anything he attempted. A born leader of men, a spendid sportsman and an adept in all the "ologies," he was a magnificent specimen of the mens sana in corpore sano.

His father had been compelled to keep a school for small boys owing to pressure of res angusta domi or the immoderate increase of hostages to fortune, but his sight failing him, William, instead of taking his proper position in life, was obliged to help his father and in consequence the school for small boys developed in the course of time into the first institution in England for training young men for employment in Government service. Bracebridge's became a name known throughout the United Kingdom and the fact that a man had passed through Bracebridge's was a certificate for his being a good 'un, as the old man would never take any one who was not a good all-rounder. He had only one son, John, who was a worthy son of his father. At the early age of eighteen John began to help his father. A grand athlete, his pet hobby was cricket. His manifold duties did not allow him to devote as much time to his pet game as he would have liked, but all the same he was the crack batsman of the county eleven and it was said of him that he was the finest cricketer who had never figured in a Test Match. Loved by all, there was not a man who passed through Bracebridge's who did not consider John his life-friend, but there was one to whom he became most particularly attached and this was Clem Hewett. Both were of the same age and both were mad on cricket. Many thought Clem was as good a batsman as John and the two together had often done great things for the school.

Clem entered Government service in India, and it was towards the end of a certain hot summer that we find his two friends seated one sultry evening in the verandah of Clem's bungalow, which was situated in one of those places which is known as "the back of beyond." Since they had been chums at Bracebridge's, some years had rolled by and now they were 34. John had availed himself of the summer holidays to pay his old friend a visit and incidentally to see something of, to him, a new country.

Simultaneously with John's arrival Clem had got the unexpected news that he had tumbled into a legacy—a legacy so large that he could comfortably afford to retire on it.

"What is this you say? You are going to retire!" said John in horror and astonishment, "at your age? And they tell me that you are destined one day to occupy the highest position in the Province. My dear Clem, this heat has got into your head—you must be mad"

"No!" replied the other; "I am thoroughly sane and I mean what I say. I have considered it all very carefully, a few weeks ago it would have been madness to have thrown up a pension of a thousand a year, but this legacy has altered things. Just look at my life here—not a congenial soul within 20 miles of me—8 and sometimes 10 hours' office work a day and so limp at the end of it one has no energy to take any exercise. No, John, I know you would disapprove, but it is no good. It is a dog's life I lead here and I hate every hour of it.

My mind is obsessed with one idea—to chuck it and to devote some years to cricket, cricket and nothing else but cricket. Do you know that last year I had only seven days' cricket in the whole season!"

John argued about the sanctity of work, the gloriousness of ambition, etc., etc, but it was all to no purpose.

At last he said:

"Suppose you will marry."

"Well! I suppose it is time I thought of doing so."

"Anybody in your eye?"

"Nobody."

There was a long pause and then John said:

"I wish you knew my sister Ethel."

"Well, I do know her; I think she was four years old at the time."

"I am not jesting. I want you to meet her. I think the dearest wish of my heart would be fulfilled if you married each other. You are both in your different ways perfect."

"But my dear John," replied Clem with a hearty laugh, "two perfects make one discord."

"Ethel" went on the other, "has grown into a beautiful girl and she is as good as she is beautiful. At games she—but it is unseemly in a brother to talk in this enthusiastic way about his sister Besides marriages are made in Heaven and not in the verandah of an Indian bungalow!"

The conversation changed and veered round to their pet hobby, cricket.

"You must promise me," said John, "to bring a team down to Bracebridge's next summer, but it must be a good one. You will have to hunt up the very best. That was a fine team we had the last year you were there, but we are even stronger now."

"Yes, I know, I saw in the Field the other day that you seem to have some rare good 'uns just at present. Two of them have been piling up a lot of runs.

"Thompson and Miles. They are both going to get to the top of the tree, but we have two or three more not far behind them. Our wicket-keep is a genius and we have a couple of bowlers considerably above the average."

"Add in John Bracebridge and there you are!"

"Well, as a matter of fact, just before the holidays commenced we downed an eleven which contained seven county players pretty badly."

"Wonderful! all the same, I'll bet you a fiver I will produce a team that will knock the stuffing out of you."

"My dear Clem! I know you are a rich man, but I am not going to allow you to throw your money away."

"Throw my money away be hanged! I'll make it a tenner."

"All right, old man, as you wish. I'll consider it a present, and—and if you fancy Ethel and win the match, I'll further your interests with her. She never refused one of my wishes yet"

Clem Hewett retired and by the following January was ensconced in an ideal place. The house was not too large, just large enough for a man who was contemplating matrimony, and it stood in twenty acres of ground. He took over with his property old Henry Lang, who had been gardener there for over thirty years. He was known as Henry and nobody dared to address him with the more familiar Harry.

Clem's first idea was to put down a cricket pitch and on its nearing completion he asked Henry if he knew of any yokels about who would give him a little practice.

"Well, sir," replied the gardener "the parson who was here last was fond of the game and taught some of them to play a bit."

"That's good news, Henry. Just tell them if they will come and bowl to me. I'll give them a bob every time they hit the stumps."

"Very good, sir! But may I speak to you about something, sir?" "Certainly—fire away!"

"Well, sir! This here cricket ground gives a lot of extra work and I require an extra hand. I have a nephew on a Shropshire farm and his mother is always writing to me to get him a better place. With your leave, sir, I should like to get him to help me. I haven't seen Billy since he was a little chap, but I hear he has grown into a powerful big man and can play cricket a bit."

"Bipping!" replied the master; "consider him engaged and send for him at once."

It was an unusually fine April and an absence of cold biting winds made an early start with cricket-practice possible. It was only a few days after the nets had been put up, that Billy Lang, Henry's nephew, turned up.

Clem Hewett was a splendid specimen of manhood, standing full six feet and the picture of an athlete, but he was quite dwarfed by the new arrival. Standing 6 feet 3 inches in his stockings, Bill's massive bones and broad shoulders showed that in a few years (he was only 22) he would develop into a veritable Hercules. "I hear you play cricket" said Clem. "Be on the ground this afternoon at 3 and show us what you can do."

Bill Lang was punctual to the moment and on his confessing he could bowl, he was handed the ball. Clem never in his life forgot that first half-hour he had with his undergardener.

Taking a longish run, he literally hurled the ball through the air. It was a short pitched one on the leg. Hewett never saw it, but he felt the wind of it as the ball grazed his head. The next two were short ones on the off one of which the batsman just touched. In a match it would have been a palpable catch in the slips. Only twice in the afternoon did the ball keep wicket high and on each occasion the wickets were shattered. At the end of half an hour, Clem Hewett felt distinctly humiliated. He had been clean bowled twice, had given at least four chances in the slips, had not scored a single run in front of the wicket and he had three or four very painful bruises on his body.

That evening whilst enjoying his pipe in his study, he soliloquised thus:—

"My word! won't I give old John a surprise! I have struck not only the fastest bowler I have ever seen in my life, but what I believe must be the fastest bowler in the world. But he is a shocking bad bowler all the same—shocking bad—no pitch—only pace and nothing else. Ranji would play Hades with him. I remember Ranji's 154 not out in the Test Match of 1896, when Ernest Jones of Australia was bowling at a terrific pace and making the ball rise face high in the most dangerous fashion. And yet how easily Ranji scored off him. But Lang is faster than Jones—much faster. Hang it all. A good many of his balls I never saw at all. Let me see! It is close on three months before the match against the old place. In three months I must knock Lang's pitch into shape."

For the next three months he had his bowler out for half an hour morning and evening. He found in him a quick pupil and long before the three months were over, Bill Lang was quite unplayable.

His speed increased if anything, he acquired a natural swerve and he sent down a yorker which nobody in the world could stop.

Nor did Clem neglect his batting. This at the start was ludicrous. His one idea was to block the ball with the feebleness of a child. Clem made him hit—hit wildly at anything and the young giant began to like it. With his immense height and great strength he soon learnt to lay on properly.

It is rather interesting to record this, because, as is well known, in after years Billy Lang became one of the most scientific bats in England.

It is the evening before the match and Hewett had arrived with his team at Bracebridge's. He had been singularly unlucky in his selection. All the good men he had asked were engaged and he had to fall back on what he could pick up—a very sorry lot, but still he was not down hearted. Some weeks of Lang's bowling had given him the finest practice a man could have and he never played better in his life and at the back of his mind he was perfectly certain that Billy Lang, the unknown, the paragon, would trundle his opponents out like ninepins.

"Clem, my boy!" said John when he had gone over the opposing team, "I have a bone to pick with you. What do you mean by bringing down a team like this? You're all right I know—but as for the rest—I never heard of one of them in my life before, and to tell you the truth they don't look like cricketers. It is a great disappointment to me" and his voice had a tone of annoyance in it "for weeks and weeks I have been looking forward to this match. As for Ethel she is just furious with you. She says it is an insult to Bracebridge's."

"You seem very cocksure, John. Like to make some more money? Have another tenner on it? Take it?"

"Gambling on the glorious uncertainties of cricket—eh? Well—you can afford it—that will make twenty pounds altogether—it's a bet. By the by who is that young giant you have fished up?"

"That fellow? Oh! he is my undergardener— had to fill up the team somehow."

And Clem chuckled, as he saw the painfully hurt expression on his friend's face.

He had an unpleasant five minutes with Miss Ethel. She was an enthusiast at all games—cricket included—and she took an enormous interest in Bracebridge's cricket exploits.

"Going to see the match?," she said with unwonted asperity. "Not I! I take interest in skittles. I'll look in for half an hour perhaps—it will all be over by tea time."

Bracebridge got first knock. They certainly were a formidable side with Thomson, Miles, John Bracebridge, Langton and Smith to lead the batting off with—all men who had piled up a good many centuries already that season. Clem had promised his fast bowler a five-pound note if they won the match and Billy was set on winning his fiver. Down went Thomson's off stump with the first ball—"never saw the ball at all" as Thomson told them in the Pavilion. The next ball was one of Billy's terrific yorkers and John Bracebridge was powerless against it. His complaint too was he had never seen the ball. With the last ball of the over, the leg stump was made into matchwood and a new one had to be produced. It lasted a short time and the invincible Bracebridge's were all out for 42—Billy Lang's average showing nine wickets for 21 runs and one man was run out.

John felt pretty sore:—"Sold me a pup, have you, with your confounded undergardener? However you haven't won the match yet my boys—you won't do any better and next innings will show you something."

But that was not the only shock John was destined to receive that day.

Clem was at the top of his form and he luckily found a stonewaller to keep up his wicket, whilst Clem made the runs.

When the latter left, the score was 84 for one wicket, Clem being 70 not out.

As for the rest there was not a man who could bat two annas, as Clem expressed it, except the redoubtable Billy. His luck was in and smiting furiously at every ball, some of his hits calling forth wild applause, he knocked up 54 in a very few minutes. The innings eventually closed for 175—Clem just missing his century, making 94 not out.

What is the use of dwelling on the second innings? Some man who has passed through Bracebridge's may read this and it is a harrowing tale. Shortly the second innings was a repetition of the first and Clem Hewett's side won comfortably in one innings. The match was all over by tea time, but not quite in the way Miss Ethel Bracebridge had anticipated.

Early next morning John entered Clem's room.

"I have a painful duty to perform" he said; "here is the £20 I have lost—lost fair and square—beaten at every point of the game, as they say. But, old man, I think you might have told me all about that wonderful bowler of yours—you made a bit of a fool of me yesterday. By the by where did you unearth him?"

Clem told the story.

"Well, yesterday he was the best bowler in England, and as for you, you were splendid."

"John, I am glad we won, but I am afraid I have dished my chances with Miss Ethel. You know what a fancy I have taken to her, but she was very angry with me yesterday and to-day she will feel worse about it."

"There you make a mistake, my boy. She has taken the downfall of Bracebridge's best of all—has been chaffing the souls out of us—asked us if we hadn't better take to gardening and practising with potatoes in a cabbage plot. But," said John with a merry twinkle in his eye, "you have a dangerous rival. She has confided to me that she didn't know which she was most in love with—you or your undergardener!

Clem Hewett married his chum's sister in good time.

Billy Lang is now the popular idol with the cricket public. His name is known in every country in the world where cricket is played. Only the other day he captured 16 wickets for 64 runs and made 172; but here has been told how he first made his name.

A PARADOX.—A poor man's income—he can live neither within it nor without it.

WHAT reason is there to believe that Othello was a lawyer?—He was a-tawny-general of Venice.

JUDGE.—"Do you know the nature of an oath?" Witness—"Yes, your honour; it is generally ill-natured."

WHAT DID SHE MEAN?—He.—"Won't you miss me when I'm far away?" She.—"No, I shall always think of you as very close!"

THE DIFFERENCE.—"Father, what is the difference between a lunch and a luncheon?" "About seven-and-six, my boy!"

"DARLING I mean to prove my love for you not by words, but by deeds." "Oh, George, did you bring the deeds with you?"

STRANGER.—"He seems rather inclined to exaggerate." Native.—"He sure is. I wouldn't believe him if I knew he was telling the truth."

NOT IMPROVED WITH AGE.—"Why, man, you have no sense of humour! When I first heard that joke I laughed till my sides ached!" "So did I!"

MR. SPLOSH: "You want to marry my daughter, eh? Have you got a title?" Young Snook: "Well—er—the chaps used to call me 'Gingel' at college."

SARCASTIC CUSTOMER (TO GROCER).—"Have you any eggs that you can guarantee not to contain half-hatched chickens?" Shopkeeper.—"Yes, sir; I have some very nice duck eggs!"

"WHAT'S the meaning of that?" asked an unaccustomed visitor to a theatre of the Irish commissionaire, pointing to the word "Exit" over the door. "That, me bhoy," replied the Irishman, "means it's the intrance out!"

AN old Irish labourer walked into the studio of an artist and asked for money to obtain a meal as he was too weak to work. The artist, seeing possibilities for a sketch, said, "I'll give you two shillings if you will let me paint you." "It's an easy way to make money," said the Irishman; "but I wonder how I'd get it off."

SETTLING THE BILL.—We hear a lot just now of doctors and their "demands," which recalls a little story of how a patient proposed to settle his medical account:—"My dere doctor, I ain't got much money. Vill you take my ball out in trade?" "Why, yes, I might. What's your business?" "I'm der leader off her liddle Chermen band. We'll play in front off your house ebry efening."

"A good wife is Heaven's greatest gift to a man and the rarest gem the earth holds," remarked Mr. Jarphy the other morning. "She is his joy, his inspiration, and his very soul. Through her he learns to reach the pure and true, and her loving hands lead him softly over the rough places. She is"—"Jeremiah," said Mrs. Jarphy, solemnly—"Jeremiah what wickedness have you been up to now?"

EVERYONE just now is telling stories of Labouchere, and reminding themselves of the innumerable incidents of his career that never failed to procure a ripple of laughter. Upon one occasion he moved to discontinue the practice of reading prayers to the House of Commons. "For five hundred years," he said, "we have been praying for the Divine guidance and aid, and Her Majesty's present Ministers are the result. It would surely be well to stop these prayers lest some worse thing befall us."

THE CANNY SALESMAN.—"It was a terrible situation," said Bubbleigh. "There we were hub-deep in the sand, and the tide was rising. At the end of an hour the water was up to the floor level of the tonneau, and then I managed to get hold of an old cuss with a team of horses and he hauled us out." "By George—that was a narrow escape. What did you give the old fellow for rescuing you?" said Higgs. "I offered the old duffer ten dollars, but he was a retired sea captain, and he attached the car for salvage," said Bubbleigh.

ANIMAL PHOTOGRAPHY.

THE announcement that an exhibition of photographs of wild animals is to be held at the offices of the London Zoological Society invites attention to the development of this department of art—we had almost written "of sport." Wild animal photography is a development of comparatively recent years. If we remember aright the first work on sport which contained photographs of wild beasts alive in their habitat was an American book; the author had gone into the mountains armed, among other weapons, with a telephoto camera, then a new invention, with which it was possible to take pictures at a range of three hundred yards or more; the results were more curious than instructive, requiring much enlargement to demonstrate that the specks shewn were what they were stated to be—photographs of deer and wild sheep. The work to which we refer was published some twenty years ago, and remains in mind as the herald of the new and immensely increased interest that was to attach to the shooting work of the future. We have travelled far in photography during the years which have intervened: the telephoto camera has been improved until it yields plates that might have been taken at a stone's throw; and the advances made in other, less complex, cameras are such that no big game shooter's outfit is complete without a camera that enables him to secure pictures of his quarry in life. The flash-light has been called into service with results even more remarkable than those obtained with the aid of the sun; and when we consider that the life of beasts of prey is the life of the dark hours it is obvious that flash-light photography must play the most important part in the portrayal of predatory animals until such time as ingenuity contrives plates upon which darkness will act even as light now acts: he would be a bold prophet who should say the thing is impossible! Meantime we have the work of Schillings and other lesser men to show what can be done with the flash-light and the camera in the machan. At the meeting of the Zoological Society held on 22nd May, Mr. Blayney Perceval, Game Ranger in British East Africa, exhibited photographs of various animals, notably giraffes, which indicated, as a correspondent informs us, what may be done by the patient and capable sportsman.

Mr. Perceval took his pictures from a "scherm" at close quarters and the results, we are told, are the most remarkable examples of animal portraiture ever seen in England But it is not every man who possesses the patience essential to secure such pictures, to say nothing of the time ; Mr. Perceval informed our correspondent that he lay in wait for five days before the subjects upon which he had set his heart "stood" to him as he desired. But the results repaid It is not so long ago that some enterprising American betook himself to the lion grounds of East Africa bent on securing for the cinematograph films shewing the charge of the lion ; we should be sorry to affirm that he was attempting the impossible, but we have not heard that those films have yet been submitted to the gaze of an eager public ; the operation is one that depends rather upon good fortune than anything else, and the interest of such a film would be in proportion to the difficulty of obtaining it. That difficulty is enhanced by the objection some individual beasts evince to having their portraits taken ; we have in mind the experience of a sportsman who, with his camera, was incontinently charged and bowled over by a leopard ; the leopard fell to the rifle of a companion ; but there was no photograph to show.

The defects of photography of wild beasts in their haunts are only too apparent, more especially those of jungle dwelling creatures ; the best and clearest negative of an animal in jungle is admirable proof of assimilation to surroundings ; you may by dint of close examination trace the beast's outline or parts of it, and you learn, within limits, the appearance the creature presents to the human eye under such conditions ; but as a picture ; as something to exhibit pose, attitude or movement it is not helpful. It has been suggested that the perfection of colour photography will do much to remove this defect ; for ourselves we doubt it ; nothing is more remarkable than the manner in which colours, to all optical seeming widely different blend and become almost undistinguishable in the subdued light of heavy forest ; we do not forget that the camera lens sees more, and sees it more correctly than the human eye ; but still we doubt whether colour photography when perfected will do more than demonstrate with the greater clarity how closely the animal of whatever colour or colours blends with its environment. We have seen photographs which in this regard recall the "puzzle pictures" sold in London a generation ago whose attraction was the difficulty of finding some figure or object merged in the drawing.

While it is not to be expected that the camera, of whatever perfection will ever replace the rifle, we feel sure that the day is approaching when it will play a part even more prominent then it does now. The successful big game shot who depends upon his own knowledge of woodcraft is of necessity a naturalist ; he owes his success to the study of wild life and acquaintance with their habits ; he has acquired in the process an interest in their lives and methods which makes the living beast of far greater interest than the dead ; and it goes without saying that as much skill and care, are needed to come within camera range of an animal as are needed to come within killing range ; and in very many cases much more. We have to reckon with the human wish to have "something to shew" for our pains ; and we regard with sympathy the dictum that it may be possible to photograph the quarry first and shoot it afterwards. Less photography perhaps has been done in the Himalayas than on any other sporting ground, and for good reasons ; the difficulty of obtaining tolerable plates of the wild sheep and goats has been proved by those who have attempted it ; the game is hardly worth the candle, so many are the obstacles to the business, apart from the risks to apparatus and operator at high altitudes on bad ground. And yet when we recall the number of books on Hill sport illustrated with admirable photos of dead game it appears to us that there are possibilities yet unworked. It is not one of our national characteristics to be daunted by difficulties ; and though we have in mind the "Shabash !" of the wearied follower who saw the capsize and irrepairable smash of the camera he had carried for many weeks to be only the means of losing his master many chances, we do not question the certainty that mountain game will in the near future receive its full meed of attention from the photographer sportsman. The portrait of the dead beast has been eclipsed for all time by that of the living.

"By jove, I left my purse under my pillow !" "Oh, well you servant is honest, isn't she ?" "That's just it. She'll take it to my wife."

"So Bates's wife turned suffragette as a matter of principle." "How so ?" "Bates ran for office and she felt it was her duty to vote against him."

"PAPA, what does arbitration mean ?" "It means that when two Powers of equal strength get hold of a smaller country, they agree to divide it equally."

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

MYNORA, who has won the Northumberland Plate (2 miles), is a chestnut mare by Pietermaritzburg out of Memoria and ran ten times last season, winning twice only and being placed on three occasions. She is trained in Osborn's stable and her first performance of any note last season was when she ran into a place at Newcastle in the Newcastle Handicap, 1½ mile, behind Puro Caster and Obnoxious. She next ran at Ripon in the Great St. Wilfred Handicap in which she was also third, both Des Essars and Point of View beating her: Mynora started favourite and was two lengths off the second who was beaten a head. She was next placed at Stockton when she ran in the Wilton Handicap third to Point of View and Sour Plum. Her first win was the Thirsk Autumn Handicap, 1½ mile, for which she started well backed and won comfortably from St. Bees and Little Music and she very shortly after this went back to her "native heath" and won the Northumberland Autumn Handicap, 1½ mile, Ashgate and Lichen being placed second and third and there were eight others, including Sour Plum, Darrara, Seedlake, Mint Eve, Santander, Plume, Obnoxious and Des Essars. Darrara was favourite and Mynora started at 8 to 1. She had only 6st. 6lb. in the Northumberland Plate and even at that light weight they did not appear to fancy her as her S. P. is returned at 20 to 1.

RED CAPE, who ran up, is a five-year-old chestnut mare by William Rufus out of Cape Wrath and picked up a couple of races last season, the occasions being the Great West Riding Handicap, 1½ mile, at Pontefract, beating Lychnis and Ted and the July Plate, 1 mile 5 furlongs, at Ayr, beating Abattis and the colt by Veronese out of Jebba. Red Cape also ran up at Stockton in the Stockton Autumn Handicap, 1½ mile, to Buxom Girl, Woolacombe running third and Melays, St. Bees, etc., etc., were behind the placed ones and she was also placed second in the Delamere Handicap, 2 miles, at Manchester to Heman, who was giving her 5lb. Set Free was third, Mynora fourth, Accurate, Policeman, Papavero, Facet, Ashgate, and many other fair horses being amongst those that ran.

POLICEMAN, who ran third, recently won the Ascot Stakes, 2 miles, beating Rots Pride and Southannan, and his performances were too recently set out in these columns to demand any further reference. His prominent running at Newcastle, however, where he had 9st. as against the 7st. 12lb. at which he won at Ascot, marks consistency and his connections probably had some sort of a fancy for him as he started at 100 to 7.

SCEPTRE, who dropped a filly foal to Cicero this year, has again, so we understand, been mated with that sire and hopes are entertained that the "next one" will be a "boy" for so far this great lady, who made so much turf history, has not been fortunate in her daughters and they have exhibited what is called in polite circles a high spirit and very little else. Experts seem to think that a change of sex in her progeny might effect a modification in these not always desirable qualities. She is owned by Messrs. Somerville and Rupert Tattersall and it is to be hoped that the disappointments of the past will be recompensed by the result of 1913.

AMONGST horses likely to be seen out at the coming Monsoon Meetings in Calcutta is that nice mare Politesse, who was originally brought out to India by Captain A. C. Charrington of the Royals with a view, we believe, to the Indian Grand National, but after winning last Monsoons on the flat she subsequently broke down. Since then she has been patched up sufficiently sound to race and she has joined Major Ormond Winter's string now at Barrackpore.

CAPTAIN F. W. BARRETT'S horses will come down from Lucknow shortly and will be stabled at "Woodlands," Alipore. Some of them may come down in time to run at the concluding meetings at the Tollygunge Club, but nothing is so far definitely arranged.

CAPTAIN POWER will send down a couple of ponies from Darjeeling for the Monsoons and they will possibly start over hurdles. This owner may, we understand, also be represented at some of the later Tollygunge Club Meetings.

OAKLEY'S horses from Behar will not, according to present arrangements, be down much before the middle of this month, though this arrangement may be altered if any of them are wanted early on for the first day or two of the Monsoon Meetings.

IN a recent issue of the Winning Post, Mr. Sievier took up the question of void nominations and his inadequacy of the present rules regarding them and which enact at home as well as elsewhere that a horse's engagements are void on the death of the owner. The risk that a purchaser "with engagements" has to face are naturally greater in England than they are in India, where races close comparatively close on to the date that they are run, but at the same time the rules as they at present stand operate with unnecesary harshness on the purchaser. Mr. Sievier makes the very sensible suggestion that it should be open to the original nominator to secure the purchaser "with engagements" by paying in advance and that it should also be possible to shift the liability for forfeits to the "last man in." He writes:—"There are so many ways and means of effecting a wholesome and desirable change in the present rule that it is perhaps the very simplicity of these alterations that causes the old method to obtain. So far as commonsense can prevail, the executives of meetings suffer rather than succeed under the drastic practice of 'a dead man's horses are dead.' True, the Registry Office has no legal claim on a dead nominator's estate, for doubtless entries made in his lifetime would be decided by a court of law to be gaming transactions. If not, probably the executors of the late Lord Calthorpe would not have permitted the memory of this wealthy sportsman and member of the Jockey Club to be besmirched by his name appearing at regular intervals in the forfeit list published in the Racing Calendar for the matter of a paltry couple of hundred or so. If the trustees paid this the residuary legatee would have a legal right to compel them to restore the money. Hence a nominator should be given the opportunity of paying the liabilities in advance or of making them secure in a manner approved of by the Registry Office. Nominally this is the Continental system, which has its drawbacks, but there can be no valid reason why a nominator should not have the right to insure his entries against death in the manner suggested should he so desire. In the first place a nominator of a horse is always responsible for his forfeits should a second owner fail to pay them. Then why not make it law that anyone purchasing a yearling with engagements is ipso facto a second nominator? Then should he in turn sell to a third party, with engagements, the latter becomes responsible, that is to say, the present owner is the first to look to, and so on, as the horse may have passed from one to another until the original nominator is reached. This minimises to a fractional degree the present risk of a purchaser losing a valuable horse's engagements through the death of one man, the original nominator. Why should a horse's value deteriorate because someone who has parted with him and pocketed his selling value at the time he was sold is dead? On the other hand, why should a winner of a sweepstakes not receive the forfeits due over an inferior horse who, though owned by another, escapes forfeits owing to the death of the man who sold him! At racing it is, or should be, a case of the survival of the fittest. As the rule now stands, the favourite for a Derby or St. Leger could be laid low by a corpse—grotesque."

THE matter is not, as we say, so urgent a one so far as India or others countries similarly situated, as it is at home, but the present rules are not fundamentally sound and an alteration upon the sensible lines that Mr. Sievier suggests is obviously desirable.

THE experiment of growing grass upon the Calcutta sand-track upon which our flat races are run in the cold weather is certain to work much improvement in the galloping surface, for not only how many people there are, who, while taking the greatest pains to keep their bodies clean, yet neglect the most important part—their mouth and teeth. This is much to be deplored when it is considered that the teeth have such important functions to perform, the chief of which is the proper mastication of the food, on which the conduct of the digestive organs so largely depends. If, therefore, the teeth are not kept clean and free from decay, the food which should go to nourish and strengthen the body cannot be digested as it should be. How do we set about attaining this desired end? The problem has been solved in an absolutely satisfactory manner, by rinsing the mouth with the antiseptic dentifrice Odol, which is the best dentifrice and mouth-wash that science has yet invented, and the only one recognised by the scientific world that will protect the teeth from decay, and which acts not only during the time of application but for hours after use.

will it provide an additional "pad" to counteract any jar, but it will also give stability and substance to the course and render it less vulnerable to the damage that a heavy day's racing after a deluge of rain usually inflicts.

In common with our contemporaries we much regret to record the death of Sir George White, who was at one time Commander-in-Chief in India and incidentally one of the most popular entities in the social and sporting life of Calcutta. Sir George will be long and affectionately remembered by a host of sorrowing friends in the dusty land of Ind and the greatest sympathy be felt for his bereaved family and relations. One form of sport of which Sir George White was extremely fond was paper-chasing and he was a regular attendant at the local meets and used to ride very forward in the heavy weight division. Upon one occasion he met with a bad accident and was so unfortunate as to break his leg. Sir George always took a keen interest in racing, was a more than average good man to pig and was also a very good big game shot.

The Tollygunge Club held the first of their annual series of Gymkhana Race Meetings last Saturday. They were favoured with good weather, the course was in excellent order, there was a big gathering and the public generally had the best of the betting. Fields were small on the whole, but the sport was very fair and taken all round it was a very successful afternoon, only marred by an accident to Mr. Evers, who came by an ugly fall in the first race. He was picked up unconscious, but his injuries were not serious and he was able to ride again very soon, and won the last race on an outsider.

Our Bangalore correspondent wires:—The final entries for the Bangalore races have drawn a good few candidates. H. H. the Kour Sahib of Patiala has entered Bull's Run for the McIntire Plate and Leonidas Purse. Mr. Goculdass sends Pantry Girl for the former and Mr. Lauder's Chaucer is in for the McIntire Plate, Leonidas Purse, and All Horse Handicap. Mr. Garda's Regalia is in the Horse Trials and July Plate. There are the following additions to Paddock Stakes : Evening Herald, Cheeky, Glory, Valiant, Aubrey, Red Patch, Cowslip ; and Aubrey for the Farm Plate, Grant Plate and Club Plate. Regalia for Bangalore Cup, Senseless for Desert Plate, Glory for Cantonment Plate, Mil and The Witch for July Plate. Altogether the prospects for the Bangalore meeting are very rosy and already there are at least two extra days' racing in prospect.

We have to thank the Secretary of the Calcutta Turf Club for a copy of the Racing Calendar just published. This makes Vol. 24 of the series and comprises all the usual information indispensable to the racing man in India and embraces the period from 1st April 1911 to 31st March 1912.

A second polo tournament on the American system has been organised at Simla and five teams have entered. On the 25th ultimo two games were played, rain interfering with the second match. In the first "B" team (Colonel F. Maxwell, Major Talbot, Captains Stephen and the Hon'ble A. Weld-Forester) beat "E" team (Major Souter, Captains Astor, Muir and Reynolds) by 4 goals to 2.

The second game between "A" team (General Rimington, Mr. Nethersole, Captain Mowbray, and Major Battine) and "C" team (Captains Tod and Hogg, Major Molyneux, and Mr. Wilkinson) was interrupted by rain in the third chukker when the score was: "C" three goals, "A" one goal.

One more game was played on the 28th. "C" team (Captains Tod and Charrington, Major Souter and Major Molyneux) beat "D" team (Captains Nicolson and Henderson, Major Lawrence and Major Harbord) by 6 goals to 2. A heavy downpour prevented the commencement of the second game, but on the 29th ultimo "A" team met "B" team and were defeated by 4 goals to 1.

Two more games were played on the 1st instant and both were fast and well contested throughout. In the first "C" team met and defeated "E" team by 5 goals to nil, while the second game between "A" team and "D" team ended in a draw 4 goals all.

The Mysore Polo Tournament was concluded on the 1st instant, when the 7th Hussars beat the 20th Deccan Horse in the final by 4 goals to 3 after playing extra time.

In connection with the Polo Tournament at Mysore, a polo pony show was held on the race course on the 29th ultimo. Entries were large and the show was well attended. The judges were Messrs. Appended are the results of the important cricket matches played in England during the past week:—

The South Africans beat Scotland at Glasgow by an innings and 97 runs.

Sussex beat Oxford University by an innings and 147 runs.

The matches between Surrey and Leicester, at Leicester; Yorkshire and Northants at Bradford, and Cambridge University and Hampshire at Southampton, were drawn, the first-named teams leading on the first innings.

Derbyshire vs. Warwick match at Derby was drawn, but neither side scored points, the first innings not having been completed.

Hampshire beat Middlesex by nine wickets.

Surrey beat Sussex, at Horsham, by 78 runs.

Kent beat Worcester, at Dudley, by an innings and 35 runs.

The matches between Oxford University and the M. C. C. at Lord's, Notts and Lancashire at Manchester, Yorkshire and Warwickshire at Birmingham, Essex and the Australians at Leyton, and H. D. G. Leveson Gower's eleven and Cambridge University at Eastbourne were drawn, the first-named eleven leading on the first innings.

The South Africans beat Scotland, in the second match, played at Edinburgh, by an innings and 97 runs.

The third test match was drawn. On Wednesday England carried their score to 320 for 7 wickets and declared. Australia then played out time, scoring 282 for 7, Macartney contributing 99 and Kellaway 61.

As will be seen from our Special Telegram the Open Golf Championship was won by E. Ray of Jersey—his first victory in the championship, though he has taken part no fewer than fourteen times and generally finished near the top. In 1906 he was ninth 12 strokes behind the winner, in 1907 he was fifth six strokes behind; in 1908 third ten strokes behind; in 1909 sixth 9 strokes behind; in 1911 he was two strokes behind Vardon and Massy who tied for first place. Ray was second in the News of the World Tournament in 1903 when he was beaten in the final by Braid. Ray's 295 in the Championship this year constitutes a record, the previous best being 300 (77,76,74,73) put up by Braid in 1906.

Money seems to be no object with Jack Johnson, the coloured heavy-weight champion, for he can refuse 30,000dol. offers without the quiver of an eyelash, and apparently enjoys it. Many of the boxing followers have been of the opinion that these 30,000dol. offers were very much of the bunk order, but they are nothing of the kind. Mr. Hugh D. McIntosh, of Australia, offered to give Jack Johnson 30,000dol. for his end and expenses to meet Sam Langford, the Boston Tar Baby, in a contest for the championship of the world, to take place at Sydney within six months from the date of the offer. This would mean the outlay of at least 45,000dol. for the Australian promoter, as it is certain that Langford would not enter into the contest without receiving at least half as much as Johnson, and the expenses would bring it up another 5,000dol., making the offer close to 50,000dol. When the proposition was put to Johnson the big fellow declined. He says he intends to retire on the 1st September and is going to open a swell restaurant in Chicago. If Langford will meet him in America before that date he will consider the matter, but he will not leave the States.

The match for the Middle Weight Championship of the World between Billy Papke and Marcel Moreau took place in Paris on the 29th ultimo, ending in a win for the American. Moreau was knocked out in the fifteenth round.

Bombardier Wells, the English heavyweight champion, has started his tour in the States most inauspiciously. After a great deal of procrastination his match with Al. Palzer, the Ohio white hope, was brought off in New York on the 28th ultimo, the Bombardier being knocked out in the third round. Few real matches and those far between, together with the music hall business are apparently the cause of Wells' downfall. T'were better had he remained in England and met Gunner Moir a second time and endeavoured to wipe out the defeat he suffered from the big artilleryman. His showing against Palzer would not seem to justify his much-discussed match with Johnson. Details of the short three rounds will be awaited with interest.

Palzer has announced his intention of being present at the Flynn-Johnson bout at Las Vegas on the 4th instant to challenge the winner. He is agreeable to post a forfeit of $20,000 to fight any time after the 4th July. To-day's battle seems likely to draw a big attendance. Strange as it may appear there are many who fancy Flynn's chances and expect him to win if he will stick it out for 8 or 10 rounds. Johnson is pronounced as being far from as good as he was when he fought Jeffries. The fast life he has led during the last three years, or ever since he defeated Tommy Burns in Australia is supposed to have had its effect on his constitution and he is stated to give every evidence of having lost his vitality. We shall see.

In the football matches in connection with the Olympic games at Stockholm Finland beat Italy by 3 goals to 2, Austria beat Germany by 5 goals to 1, Holland beat Sweden 4 to 3, Britain beat Hungary by 7 to nil. Austria beat Norway, 1—0.

The Clay Bird shooting competition in connection with the Olympic Games at Stockholm was brought off on the 2nd instant and ended in a win for the American team which scored 532 out of a possible 600. Great Britain scored 511 and Germany 510.

Miss Daisy Carwen, of the Westminster Ladies' Swimming Club, Liverpool, holder of the 100 metres world's record, accomplished a magnificent performance on the 10th ultimo at the gala promoted by the Birkenhead S. C. She succeeded in creating a new record for the distance by no less than 4 secs., her time being 1 min 20-3/5secs. Miss Carwen swam in brilliant style and in the course of her swim equalled the 100 yards record. The performance was undertaken under the official supervision of the Northern Counties Amateur Swimming Association. Miss Carwen is one of the selected British team to visit Stockholm.

George Horine of Stamford University, California, is again reported to have beaten the world's record for the high jump. Recently he was credited with 6 feet 5 inches, then with 6 feet 7 inches, and now it is stated that he has cleared 6 feet 8¼ inches. This is 2¼ inches better than M. J. Sweeny's jump which was the record. Horine is in his second year at the University and will probably go to Stockholm.

The last English mail brings news of the death of that once splendid athlete, A. R. Downer, a magnificent runner at the sprint and furlong. By dint of great pluck and perseverance he became almost a world beater over a furlong, and although he came under the ban of the ruling body it was never as much as hinted that he was other than a genuine stayer. He first ran as a senior in Edinburgh in 1890, and in the following two years his powers steadily developed, but 1893 was his first great year. Twice within a month he broke Scottish record at 120 yards, and at the Championship meeting in Glasgow he took the 100, 220 and 440 yards championships, his times being 10-3/5, 22-2/5 and 53-2/5 respectively. Suspended in 1894 the decision was recalled and he retained his championships in that year. The following year was perhaps his best as an amateur. He broke Scottish records at four distances and won his three Scottish Championships again and all three short distance races for Scotland vs. Ireland in the international contest. His races with Bradley excited great interest, but while Bradley invariably won over the shorter cut Downer was presumably his superior over 130 yards and upwards. Indeed at this period it is questionable whether there was a runner in the world equal to Downer over distances of 75 to 880 yards all in. In the autumn of 1895 he was one of the L. A. C. team which visited the States, but lack of condition and ill-health told against him. In 1896 he was permanently suspended by the Southern Committee of the A. A. A. He then became a professional and accomplished a series of wonderful performances.

The following amendments, in the rules of Rugby Football as approved by the International Board, were recently agreed to: Law 16 to read as follows: In the case of a throw-forward or knock-on, the ball shall be brought back to the place where such infringement occurred, and there be scrummaged, unless a fair catch has been allowed, or the opposite side gain an advantage, or unless, in the opinion of the referee, such throw-forward or knock-on is wilful, when he may award a free kick to be taken at the spot where such infringement occurred. This shall not apply to a wilful throw-forward or knock-on into touch, which must be dealt with under Law 16a. Add new Law 16a: If a player shall wilfully pass, knock, or throw the ball into touch the opposition side may claim either a free kick or scrummage. Such free kick or scrummage is to be taken at their option, either (a) at any spot at right angles to the touch line, ten yards from the place where the ball went into touch; or (b) at the spot where such pass, knock or throw occurred. In the case of a free kick, the "spot," whether under (a) or (b) shall be taken as the mark. This law shall not override the power of the referee to allow or disallow a try under Law 13.

The definition of tackle to read as follows: A tackle is when the holder of the ball is held by one or more players of the opposite side so that he cannot at any moment while he is so held pass or PRESIDING at the annual meeting of Bradford City F.C., Mr. William Pollack said they suffered much financially in the past season because they had the hardest possible luck in the Cup-tie by losing against Barnsley in the last minute. Instead of having a balance at the bank they still owed the bank money. Referring to the fine of £150 re the Blackburn match, the chairman said the directors felt very keenly the injustice of the fine, and they had lodged an appeal.

THE question is often asked, "What is a fair proportion of kills to shots fired by the average sportsman?" In Half a Century of Sport in Hampshire, Lord Malmesbury's record is given from a careful account kept by himself. In the course of 40 seasons, viz., from 1801 to 1840, he fired 54,987 shots and killed 38,454 head, which is an exceedingly good average, considering the times antiquated weapons, and unreliable ammunition. On the other side, it may be said these were the days of long stubbles and walking up with well-trained pointers and setters. Mr. Thomas Southall, a veteran sportsman of 83, gives his experience as follows:—In the course of 47 seasons he shot on 1,375 days, and out of 25,203 shots fired he bagged 10,328 head. Mr. Southall's figures we think would about represent the shooting of the average sportsman of to-day. Some well-known shots, however, have given their opinion that one head out of three shots is by no means a bad average.

MR. PAUL RAINEY, an American explorer and big game hunter, proposes to try the novel experiment of hunting tigers with dogs in India next year. He has already hunted lions in this way in British East Africa and with success, having killed seventy-four in eleven months. He proposes to come out to Burma, and visit the Malay Peninsula, Sumatra, Borneo and French Indo China and through Northern India and will start hunting as soon as he decides on the most suitable country for his purpose. He will have two packs of dogs—a trailing pack and a fighting pack. The latter are led behind the others and so get up when the fighting begins. His dogs are able to kill leopards unaided, but the lions were shot when they were brought to bay.

To hunt successfully in this way one must follow on horseback. The best time, of course, is during the rainy season, or right after it.

The breed of dog which Rainey chiefly uses is the American boarhound, bred in Mississippi. They have a good deal of the bloodhound in them, and the kind of dogs which the old planters had before the Civil War.

THE trade in birds' feathers has been occupying the attention of the Customs authorities in Burma and recently they have made seizures of large quantities of paddy bird feathers which had been sent into Rangoon for shipment out of the country. In one case two parcels of feathers valued at Rs. 8,000 which had been billed in cardboard boxes as "silk loongyis" were sent through the General Post Office, Rangoon, by a European firm for an address in Hamburg, Germany. A seizure was made and the firm was fined Rs. 15,000 and the feathers confiscated. Another seizure of a parcel of egret plumes posted at Mandalay and valued at Rs. 1,500 was made a few days earlier in the Rangoon General Post Office.

OUR Madras correspondent writes:—The first skittle meeting of the season, generally held during the hot weather, came off on Saturday last on the Madras Gymkhana grounds on the Island. Though the weather was not satisfactory there was a fairly good gathering of spectators. There were five events on the programme which attracted a good number of competitors. Competition was keen throughout and the leading feature of the evening was the close finish in most of the events.

A word of praise is due to the energetic Honorary Secretary, Captain P. Heffernan, I.M.S., to whose exertions the success of the evening's function was largely due.

At the conclusion of the day's sports Mrs. W. O. Horne gave away the prizes. The following are the details:—

Tent-pegging was the first event. Six competed for this, three runs being allowed., Some of the competitors having failed to fulfill the conditions required, Mr. F. Hannyngton, I.C.S., was adjudged winner on points.

Rescue Race.—Competitors to ride to a zareba, rescue a dummy and bring him round a course. A field of seven competed. Mr. H. Smith first got through the barrier and cleared away, closely followed by Mr. W. S. Bickham, who, though mounted on a heavier animal, won by a neck. A close finish and an exciting ride.

Whistling Coon Stakes.—One of the three ladies nomination events, conditions being competitor to ride up to lady and whistle a tune which will be told him at starting. Lady to write on a slip of paper the tune whistled. Competitors to finish round a short course. First in with the correct tune wins.

The race drew half-a-dozen competitors and ended yet in another close finish. Mr. J. B. Cunliffe nominated by Mrs. Horne led the whole way up, closely followed by Mr. F. Hannyngton. A wrong solution of the tune disqualified Mr. Cunliffe and Mr. Hannyngton nominated by Mrs. Worke was declared winner.

Fishing Stakes.—The fourth event was the Fishing Stakes for which there were eight competitors. This was also a ladies' nomination. Conditions being gentlemen carrying fish will gallop to lady and throw the fish into a bucket of water and the lady who will be provided with a rod and line must catch same. After having caught the fish lady will hand the rod and line with fish on to gentleman who will remount and finish round a given course. First past the post with fish on line to win.

After reaching his partner Mrs. Padday Captain Heffernan was the first to get away, but unfortunately dropped the fish on the way, and Mrs. W. S. Bickham nominated by Mrs. Wagstaff was adjudged winner.

The Correct Card Stakes.—This also a ladies' nomination was the last event and drew a field of nine. The competitors were given slips of paper on which was written the name of a card. Ladies selected the card from a pack and handed it to partner. The first in with the correct card to win. The correct card was "six of diamonds." In the ride after securing the card from the lady partner there was a very close finish between Mr. Hannyngton nominated by Mrs. Horne and Mr. Bickham nominated by Mrs. Padda. Mr. Hannyngton won by half a length.

These gymkhanas will be held fortnightly during the hot weather, and the last meeting will be held in September. A special prize will be awarded to the lady securing the most marks at the end of the meeting.

London Week by Week.

LONDON, Friday, 14th June 1912.

THERE has, perhaps, never been a review quite like the one held in Hyde Park last Saturday evening, when the King and Queen inspected 30,000 men of the London Division of the National Reserve.

The men were marching into the park through every gateway, in squads and battalions, for hours before the King's arrival, and taking up their positions in the great open space prepared for them, reaching nearly the whole breadth of the park from Hyde Park Corner to the Marble Arch.

Railings and fences had been removed and little flags stuck in the grass to mark the spot where each squad was to take its place in the great sea of men, which reached far back towards the trees and Serpentine, looking like a vast black human carpet, for every man wore mufti or the uniform of his present calling.

There were uniformed commissionaires, omnibus conductors, and railway porters, marching side by side with bowler-hatted artisans and their poorer brethren who have served their country well but have now fallen on evil days, as was shown by the ragged clothes. Even they had medals among their rags, and bore themselves finely, while here and there was a flicker of white from the spats of smartly dressed City men, whose tall hats bobbed above the ranks of bowlers as the squads turned into their allotted places.

They represented London's contribution to the nation's "Old Guard," for they were the veterans from all the services who have expressed their willingness to take up their arms afresh if their country needs them. Field-Marshal Sir Evelyn Wood, V.C., was in command, and among the chiefs of the seven brigades were Lord Dundonald and General Sir Alfred Gaselee. The famous park has rarely held so great a crowd before, for by the time the Old Guard had arranged itself in a mighty black wall of squads behind squads there were over 80,000 spectators ranged along the rope barriers.

When all the marching and arranging had been completed the pathetic little band of Crimean and Mutiny veterans marched to the ground, some wearing the quaint uniforms of the Crimean period. Some helped themselves along on crutches. As the old men made their way cross the open space the whole great gathering clapped them with a sound like the sea breaking on far-reaching pebble ridges, swelling into a great roar of greeting which visibly affected the veterans, who took off queer shakoes and forgotten patterns of helmets in response to the splendid greetings. It was a pity this item was included in the show.

The King wore the undress uniform of a field marshal, and rode his favourite black charger along the mile-long ranks, with Prince Arthur of Connaught beside him and the Queen following in a carriage.

The veterans were particularly favoured, and the King spent some time inspecting their ranks, speaking to several of the oldest members and turning to salute in response to a quavering cheer which went up from every aged warrior as the King reached the end of their lines.

The only splash of colour in the review was on the Lord Mayor's stand, where City dignitaries in their scarlet and gold, looked like a cluster of poppies among the sombrely clad legions to right and left.

After the King had passed along all the lines, large detachments of each brigade marched past the saluting point, giving a wonderful exhibition of the skill with which the reserve has been organised, for snake-like columns of citizens and soldiers threaded their way among other columns, passing and repassing till there were acres of moving bowler hats spreading in all directions. The march past was conducted without a hitch, and each squad marched away to its respective headquarters.

That ridiculous person, the Dean of Manchester, who was Bishop Welldon what time he added to the gaiety and the bewilderment of Calcutta, has just added to his reputation for braying. This narrow-minded but wide-chested man created quite a little sensation at the Halle Conference, held in Manchester early this week, when he made a protest to the executive in connection with the appearance of Mr. Thomas Beecham as conductor at one of last season's concerts. Mr. Beecham, in November of last year, was co-respondent in the divorce suit of Foster v. Foster, in which Mr. George Sherwood Foster, the artist, was awarded a decree nisi against his wife, with costs against Mr. Beecham.

Bishop Welldon, who read his remarks from a paper, said:—

"We do not like to pry into the lives of artists who come to Manchester. We ask no questions about them. We gladly give them a cordial welcome but it is impossible that we should shut our eyes to notorious facts which have been recently exposed in a court of law. Even if the committee should take what I can only call the miserable view that art has nothing to do with morals, still there are at least two classes of persons who may not unfairly look for consideration. One class consists of such subscribers to the concerts as the clergy and ministers of religion and the other of persons who are bound officially no less than personally to uphold a moral standard. They have paid for their tickets, and is it right to place them in such a position that if they are present at a concert they may be allowed to condone, if not to approve, immorality? Then there is the second class—the ladies of the choir, to whom a great debt is owing from the citizens of Manchester; and they, or some of them, may reasonably object to association with a man whom they would not wish to meet and know in private life. I cannot say more on this disagreeable topic, but I regret that the committee have forgotten what is due to the high character of the Halle concerts."

Now how very nice and Christian all this reads, does it not? But of course Manchester will grin and bear it; they had a different way of dealing with Bishop Welldon when I was in Calcutta if I recollect aright.

It is always a painful experience to find a respectable man, with a good reputation, breaking out into irregularities. Nor is the experience less painful in the case of a cherished public institution. For, alas, the most highly-respected institutions do sometimes go wrong and begin to sow their wild oats long after they have arrived at an honoured maturity. Big Ben, one regrets to learn, has been misbehaving himself. Last year his average error was ·97 of a second a day. Considering his public position and responsibility, this revelation of systematic error is very sad. How many thousands of people may have missed trains or been late for appointments through his faulty guidance! It will shake our confidence in him for the future. Big Ben ought to be like Caesar's wife, above suspicion; yet we find him deceptive and inaccurate, with a reprehensible passion for decimal diversions. Would it not be well to form a society for reforming him? With a few bishops (including one Welldon) and duchesses on the committee, a good start might be made, and the results ought to be striking—especially at the hours and quarters.

Mr. Lennox Robinson's play "Patriots" at the Court Theatre is the last new thing and it will probably have a fair run. Here is the plot. Jim Powell, the philosophic old caretaker, told young Willie Sullivan that the Nugents were all queer, terrible fellows, mad with politics or religion or "other devilments." And being a philosopher he was very glad James Nugent's meeting fell through and he was able to see the moving pictures, which showed an Irishman fighting with a negro, "a most beautiful sight, they say." No one came to James Nugent's meeting. He had been eighteen years in prison for killing a traitor to his cause, and his cause was the expulsion of the English from Ireland by physical force. He returned home to find things changed. His league still existed, but had turned from being a revolutionary force into an excuse for agreeable lectures and conversaziones. His wife's brothers, Bob and Harry, had made it quiet and respectable, and were scandalised when James asked them if plenty of arms were stored. But James was undaunted at first. For eighteen years he had controlled the flame of his passion to free Ireland from the oppressor, and now, he told them, he would set to work again at the great cause. His daughter, Rose, a cripple, believed in James; and young Willie Sullivan. All the others shook their heads, or, like his wife, stoutly told him they had outgrown their folly. But James would not give way. Only in the empty meeting room, when his wife told him their child was a cripple because of his recklessness at the time of his arrest, was he daunted, and that broke his spirit. He went home, a beaten man.

The play is inconclusive. He does not come sufficiently to grips with his subject, so that the play seems meagre and thin, as though a one-act play had been stretched out into three acts, and the process had not been contrived with much ingenuity. James's crude political sentiments were loudly applauded by members of the audience, and there was a gentle flow of wit which was very agreeable; but the only scenes with any drama in them were those in which Ann, his wife, stood up to him in the second act, and finished him off, a little unfairly perhaps, in the last. And both these scenes Miss Sara Allgood played quite magnificently. Indeed, her whole performance was one of the best she has ever given, and that is saying much, for she is a fine actress. She made one forget the extreme unlikelihood of the basis of the second scene, namely, that Rose should choose to leave the mother with whom she had lived for 18 years, and whom she loved, and go away with her father, who was, after all, a stranger to her. It was simply taken for granted that she would do so to give Ann a reason for her second outburst. Mr. Fred O'Donovan played the shadowy enthusiast with great conviction, and Mr. J. M. Kerrigan gave an exquisite study of Jim Powell, the caretaker. Miss Kathleen Drago made the cripple girl a very earnest and nice little person, but the character was too feebly imagined to give any actress much scope.

History once more garbled to provide a feast for "the gods"; the French revolution again called to the dramatist's aid; picturesque costumes and daring deeds; plot and counter-plot and intrigue; villainy vanquished and virtue victorious; sentiment, treachery, and "comic relief;" in a word, all the familiar fare that has become so popular at the Lyceum Theatre under the management of Messrs. Melville—such is "The Women of France," described as "an entirely new romantic play," which was produced there last Monday night.

The authors, Messrs. Arthur Shirley and Ben Landeck, have based the piece upon a book of letters called "A Friend of Marie Antoinette," written by Lady Atkin during her attempts to rescue the Queen from the revolutionists.

Vigorously told as it is, with incident following incident in rapid succession, with the dialogue crisp, and with the mounting picturesque, "The Women of France" is exactly the thing for those who find their joy in honest, wholesome melodrama, and who are willing to swallow improbabilities without asking questions. The company played with plenty of spirit, and Mr. Henry Lonsdale was a handsome, dashing Victor, while Miss Nora Kerin was full of sympathy and emotion and winning grace as Valene.

In the gallery of bizarre and sinister portraits that Sir Herbert Tree has placed before us his Fagin stands out prominently. Mr. Comyns Carr's version of "Oliver Twist" may be completely lacking in the true Dickens atmosphere; it may be little more than a series of disjoined episodes; it may show only the brutal and the sordid of the book, relieved only by sugary sentimentality; but it does serve a very useful purpose in providing a background for a remarkable piece of acting by Sir Herbert. When the play was revived this week at His Majesty's it was found that in some scenes the actor had added even more minute detail to his study of Fagin—indeed, there were moments when it was in danger of suffering from over-elaboration. But his conception was as arresting in its gruesome realism as ever. The "merry old gentleman's" fits of horrible playfulness, his sardonic humour, his by-play, and his facial expressions as he listens to the blows while Bill Sikes murders Nancy in an adjoining room; his crazy despair in the condemned cell—these and a dozen other moods were so impressively realised as to lift the play above the ordinary blood-and-thunder melodrama that it would be in the hands of a less capable principal.

Sir Herbert has been fortunate in securing such important members of the original cast as Miss Constance Collier to play Nancy and Mr. Lyn Harding to play Bill Sikes.

The death took place, in Edinburgh this week, after a lingering illness of A. R. Downer, the celebrated short distance runner who created a sensation by winning the sprint, furlong, and quarter-mile events, in one afternoon, at the Scottish championships in 1893. He repeated the feat in the next two years and also in the Scotland vs. Ireland match. Downer was suspended in 1896, and subsequently ran prominently as a professional. He was born in Jamaica, educated in Edinburgh, and was forty-one years of age. Downer was well known in the South of England, and ran several matches with C. A. Bradley, who won the 100 Yards Amateur Championship in four successive years—1892-95, inclusive.

A BEAR ADVENTURE.

An intimate acquaintance of mine named M—who had spent his apprenticeship at sea, rising, while still a young man, to Master, having a lucrative offer made to him to remain on shore decided to try his luck in India. He completed his voyage Home and returned a passenger to Calcutta to enter on his new life.

Having the gift of acquiring languages he was not over eight months in the country when he could speak and read Hindustani fluently. He was of good address, energetic, succeeded beyond his expectations and was not long in having a flourishing business of his own.

He had been driving himself a little too hard, and in the spring of 1907, when he received an invitation from an old schoolmate, now a planter, to visit and spend a month with him at his place on the confines of the Almorah District, he made the necessary arrangements and went.

M—was a keen sportsman both with gun and rod and he promised himself some sport in the hills. On arrival at his friend's place the first two days were spent in inspecting the grounds and machinery. He then began to daily knock over a few chicore and other small game and to extend his rambles amongst the hills. One day he went farther afield than usual in the expectation of meeting with something more exciting, when he came across a hut supposed to have been erected, at some previous time, by one or other of the shepherds in the locality. It was situated in what he considered a favourable spot as a base for big game shooting. He saw that an hour or two's work would make the hut habitable and there and then made up his mind to spend a week in the place. On returning to the planter's bungalow he at once made known his intention. His friend at first demurred to leaving the comforts of his home, but as he could not very well leave the invited guest to go off by himself, he at last agreed to accompany him.

Next morning saw them with a cook and a lot of coolies carrying bedding, provisions, etc., on the road to the hut. It stood on an elevation about thirty feet higher than the level of the river that ran round its base and was surrounded by high trees, some of them close to the hut. The river ran in a kind of ravine with high trees also on the opposite bank. They set about putting the hut in habitable order and then the coolies were sent back.

The rest of the story was told me in rather forcible language interlarded with sea phrases, and although it will, no doubt, lose much of its expressiveness, I will endeavour to give it in somewhat milder words.

The following day a messenger arrived with a letter for M's friend, and in consequence he had at once to leave for his bungalow, and as the cook was not at all satisfied M—told him to go also as he could manage without him.

After their departure he busied himself about the camp, cutting firewood, cooking, etc. When darkness put an end to work outside he retired to the hut, lighted the lamp and began reading one of the magazines they had brought with them. He had been so engaged for some time when he was aroused by the snapping of a branch or small stick outside in front of the hut.

They had hung their basket of provisions well out of reach on the limb of a small tree in front of the dwelling, as a matter of habit and not from fear of its being touched by any of the wild animals that were known to inhabit the mountains around. There was an old she bear which was known to have ranged the hills for some years, a huge, gaunt creature, and which M—had seen the day previous, but he did not connect her with the noise. His first thought was, that one of the sheep which were roaming about had been attracted by the light and had wandered up to the hut to investigate. With this idea in his head and being very comfortable, he did not bother to look into the matter.

But just as he was about to resume reading the sharp crack of a breaking branch accompanied by the thud of something heavy striking the ground caused him to jump to his feet. Hastily picking up his double-barrelled No. 12 gun, he inserted two cartridges and quickly opened the door. In the dim moonlight he made out the form of a large bear busily engaged satisfying its hunger with the contents of the provision basket. Without taking time to think whether he had better get his rifle, he brought the gun to his shoulder and fired. With a fierce growl of pain the wounded animal charged straight for the open door, and before he could close it, rushed right into the hut.

As a seafaring man he had gone through some stirring scenes, but he said that the next five minutes were probably the most exciting he ever spent. The bear suffering from its wound and dazzled by the light gave him an opportunity, which he speedily seized, by rushing out again. He ran round the hut for his life, the brute at his heels, and quickly ascended a roughly made but strong bamboo ladder, which he had fortunately observed during the day. The ladder led to the top or roof of the hut. He thought, or rather was in hopes, that the bear had lost track of him, and he was not only astonished but dismayed when he turned to throw the ladder down, to find the bear nearly half way up it and climbing fast. M—said that at that point he got somewhat bewildered, and commenced to ascend a tall tree growing close to the hut, hoping to hide himself amongst the branches.

It seemed to him, however, that he made no progress for the dead wood, on which he placed his feet, broke continually and his hands and legs, in his frantic hurry, were almost beyond his control. He finally reached a stout limb about twelve feet above the roof of the hut and there he halted to consider the situation. This was but a momentary respite as, glancing down, he saw the maddened bear preparing to follow him, and in a panic he began to climb again.

On reaching up for a branch above his hand came in contact with a creeper that stretched across from the tree on which he was to one on the other side of the ravine, through which the river flowed. It was a strong climbing tough plant as thick as his wrist, similar in these respects to many in the hills. In the short time he had, he endeavoured to test whether its hold on the opposite tree was secure, and if it would bear his weight.

As the bear was nearing him, he was hurried to a decision and started to across the ravine on the creeper, hanging, back downwards, by the hands and feet. The brute struck at him with its paw tearing off a heavy leather legging he had fortunately not thrown off, and scratching his leg, but not severely. This unlooked for blow caused him to nearly lose his hold, which had he done, the fall would have finished him.

His early sailor training stood him in good stead at this time, and he swung out of the reach of the animal and worked himself along. It was slow progress but the danger behind stimulated his energies. He continued till he was compelled to rest his weary arms and legs. This he did by throwing one leg and arm over the creeper until it came under his knee joint and armpit. The river was running forty feet beneath him. From the swaying of the branches of the tree he had left he judged his pursuer, baffled by the creeper bridge, was on the descent.

After five minutes rest he started again, but when about two-thirds across, the creeper oscillated so violently with his exertions that, at different times, he almost lost his hold, and it was only his light, muscular build and hardy training that saved him.

At last he got to the opposite tree, stretched himself out on a large branch and rested. Once or twice he heard Bruin moving about on the other side of the ravine; then all was quiet.

He made himself as comfortable as possible, and stayed all night in the tree, taking care to make no noise for fear of attracting attention. On day breaking he got back and into the hut, which he barricaded as well as he could and remained there until his friend unexpectedly returned. This was about 11 o'clock, and he brought with him re-inforcement in the form of another planter and his dog.

M—recounted his adventure, and the dog accustomed to such work was put on the track of the bear. They came up with Bruin about three miles distant from the hut. M—was given the first shot and was successful in knocking over his whilom enemy. It was found that his first shot at the hut had injured the right eye and partially carried away the right ear. This, no doubt, accounted for the fury of the animal and its determination to be revenged. As above mentioned the bear was a female, weighed 273 pounds, was 3' 7½" high at the shoulder and 6' 2½" in length. The skin was somewhat the worse for wear, the head was unusually large, and the claws, although worn, were massive.

On examination of the creeper, on which M—had crossed the ravine, it was found that it had grown along a quarter of inch wire rope, which some previous occupant of the hut had stretched across for some purpose of his own; it was lucky it was there so far as M—was concerned.

HARD TIMES IN JOURA WHEN AFTER IBEX.

(Concluded.)

About ten o'clock we reached a point on the edge of the great ravine. The woman had left us some time previously, I suppose to look after the sheep. Dimitri now sent his little brother to drive the ground to our left, and presently he pointed out to me two bucks making rather sharply for the big ravine itself. We started to cut them off. Before we had gone far I measured my length, with some ingenuity succeeding in excoriating both wrists, my right knee, and left ankle. However, I consoled myself with the reflection that if I had not had gloves on it would have been worse, as these had saved my hands, and limped on.

In good time, it seemed to me, we reached an outlying spur—a capital position—and took post. Dimitri signalled to the little fellow where to go, and he obeyed perfectly. It seemed a certain shot, but the result was commensurate with all our Joura luck—the beasts had broken out somewhere, and were gone.

The boys then took me to the eastward cliffs, and then to some ground I had not previously seen, towards the extreme north of the island. Here, however, there were a number of charcoal-burners at work, and it was obviously no use expecting game.

I ate my lunch during which process the woman joined us, and shortly afterwards we made out V. working towards us. We joined forces, and wended our way homewards. My partner said he had seen nothing, but when we reached the ridge where the southern path ended the shepherds signed to us to wait, whilst the small boy, who was almost as active as a goat himself in the rough ground, went on to reconnoitre. Presently he returned in some excitement, though why I do not even now know. Dimitri gestured that he would drive the hillside if we went on and took post, and when we agreed he handed my rifle to his mother—the first occasion on which I have had the assistance of a lady shikari. Of course, I had to endure a good deal of chaff from my partner, but the tables were turned when she pointed out his position and sat down near it, leaving myself and the small youngster to take post lower down. She certainly was keen enough, for during the drive, as things were not looking very promising, she left V., and went back to the hill-top herself to assist. Both our places were good and the ground was promising, but very soon the child uttered the inevitable "Tipota," which was always our fate on Joura. (I do not know if they spell it so, but they pronounce it so, and it means "There is nothing").

Sadly we went home through pelting rain, and when we got there V. declared himself sick of it. So we lighted the signal fires that were to have brought our cutter from Pelagonisi, it being arranged that I should have a last try next day, whilst my partner arranged the packing up and shipping of the things.

The night began badly. Our old dragoman and cook let my best cap, which he was drying, fall into the fire, and when blamed turned indignantly on me: "What for you cry out for brandy-and-water, then?"

But this was a trifle. The wind increased to a gale, with torrents of rain, and, unfortunately, V. had not brought the outer fly of the tent. A small hole above my head awoke me by dripping on me, and an attempt to repair it by sticking a copying-ink pencil only changed the stream to one of violet ink. I moved my bed out of the way, but an hour or two later the whole thing descended on my head. (I was on the windward side.) Shouts of "Thomas!" at last brought the poor old fellow out to re-drive tent-pegs, for the "individual" had prudently fled to the monastery. All through the trip I had suffered from cold, not having given the "Isles of Greece" credit for such a winter climate, but this night it was both wet and cold that banished sleep. V., who was on the lee-side and well provided with fur karosses, did better. Cold and miserable, I waited for daybreak. At last it came. Thomas' tent had been down twice, and he was in a miserable plight. The place in which our camp was pitched was ankle-deep in slippery mud, and the very side-pockets of the tent were full of water. Fortunately, I had, by a mere accident, not put my telescopes in them, as usual. Tea revived us a little, and then, when the people from the monastery had turned up, we proceeded to remove our things to a great cave close to the landing-place. I can best give an idea of the place by saying that the spot I selected for my bed was about sixty feet from the mouth—in which, by the way, were the remains of the hut built by the last monk of Joura, and in which he lived as a hermit for many years after all his fellows had been simultaneously struck by lightning.

We had now reached something very like the condition of primeval man. Hunters before, we were now troglodytes. After our things had arrived and we had arranged our tent across the mouth of the cave, we had no occupation for the rest of the day than that of watching the great seas break against the cliffs of the islet of Gramsa, just opposite, or the spindrift driving along the surface of the water, unless it were to avoid the pungent wood-smoke from our fire, which filled every nook and cranny of the cave; or to see V. vainly attempting to hit with his ·303 the cormorants floating amongst the rollers. That night, however, was one not to be forgotten. For the first time this trip I slept warm and comfortable, lulled by the dripping from the stalactites close to me.

Christmas Eve was as bad a day as one could wish to see. The bitterly keen north wind blew so strongly that the snow, of which the sky was full, could only fall at intervals. Of our cutter there was no hope; we were weather-bound once more. As there was equally little chance of sport, we only went as far as the monastery and visited the little chapel, where the skulls of the last monks of Joura are collected.

Meanwhile starvation stared us in the face for all our stores, and even our wine, were run out. Our tea, too, having been only packed in paper, had lost its savour, and even after the desperate expedient of boiling it for a quarter of an hour it only tasted of tin cup and condensed milk. That day we had some salt ibex, which tasted like indiarubber, and still more briny olives, which the shepherds brought us. Fowls they refused us, as they were required for breeding purposes; but we were desperate and ordered a raid. Our men brought back two antediluvian specimens, for which we afterwards paid famine prices.

Christmas Day was nearly as bad as the day previous. V., who had killed two lions on this anniversary the year before, cursed his luck and refused to go out. The wind was bitter and it snowed most of the day. I got as far as the monastery and stayed there till I was thoroughly chilled waiting for Dimitri. At last I started off, thinking he would follow. Of course, he never did, and never had had any intention of facing the cold.

I walked along the path by the big ravine, seeing nothing but a hobby and a pretty little rock-creeper, grey in front and black behind. About one o'clock I ensconced myself among some bushes to eat my frugal lunch. Till then I had not realised the extent of the cold, but in about a quarter of an hour I found I could stand it no longer, and hurried on. It took me quite twenty minutes' sharp climbing before the circulation in my hands was sufficiently restored to have enabled me to use my trigger-finger. However, the occasion did not arise, and I made my way onwards over the frozen ground, where the snow now lay pretty thickly in sheltered places to the eastern cliffs. Here I continued my careful spying, but in vain. About three o'clock, on looking through a gap in the cliffs, my attention was attracted by a peculiar cry from a wooded hollow below me, and a doe, repeating the same note. And followed by her kid, sprang on a rock some hundred and fifty yards away. Much as meat was wanted in camp I could not bring myself to fire. Moreover, I hoped a buck would follow; but none did. The doe leaped down and disappeared, then she crossed a piece of absolutely bare reddish ground, repeating her alarm signal about every minute. Although I had this to guide me, and my glass open and ready in my hand, I failed to catch sight of the goats again. This shows the difficulty of finding these animals before they themselves see the stalker.

The cry of the Joura goat is difficult to describe. Though distinctly animal in its nature, it in a considerable degree resembles the note of some kind of wild goose heard at considerable distance. It also suggests the sound produced by the mechanically-squeaking dogs of our childhood, while the way the animal repeated it from time to time in moving along recalled the action of an alarmed roe-buck.

After this I saw nothing more. V., who had got tired of inaction, was out when I reached the cave, but soon returned, having seen nothing.

Our Christmas dinner was simple. It consisted of chicken-broth and chicken out of the broth, which was so tough as to be uneatable. There was also a tin of pears left. V. washed this meal down with tea such I have described, but I preferred not to adulterate my water. Then we divided our last drop of brandy and our last two cigars and went to bed.

Next morning, to our delight, we were able to embark, and left Joura about half-past nine. It was indeed not quite calm, though a Channel boatman would have called it a lovely day. Our skipper, however, looked at things from a different point of view, and we could not induce him to make for Skyros direct. He said he did not want to be drowned. As a compromise, he ran down to the island of Skantzoura with a beam wind, and I anchored there about one, when we landed and made our way to the monastery.

Though Skantzoura is, like Joura, a limestone island, with, indeed, a great deal of marble, the vegetation of the two differs greatly. Here the higher ground was covered with heather of two different kind and dwarf coniferae, none of which are to be seen at Joura. On our way we met a large herd of goats, and both agreed that they in no way suggested the animals we had been hunting.

The monastery—a very good house, with a chapel of the usual pattern, in which, by the way, were some very suggestive skulls, one split almost in two by a sword-stroke, and another perforated by a musket-ball—was deserted; but on our way back we met the "caloyer," or monk, and procured some eggs and some very resinous wine from him. He told us that the steamer for Piraeus left Skyros on the following afternoon. Consequently our skipper promised to sail at midnight, which he did; and when we emerged from the hold at seven o'clock we found ourselves not many miles from our destination.

Our steamer turned up punctually, and, sailing immediately, reached Laurium at two the next morning. Here she waited no less than twenty-two hours, and then on a lovely afternoon steamed round Cape Colonna into the Piraeus, and we reached the Grand Hotel at Athens in time for dinner.

Within a week we had left Greece, going different ways, I back to London, and V. to Assam and Baltistan, where I am glad to know he had better sport than on the island of Joura.—"SNAFFLE" in Shooting Times.

HE.—"Don't you know her? She lives in your square." She.—"Perhaps so; but she is not in my circle."

"If you refuse me I shall never love another woman." "Does that promise stand good if I accept you?"

LOU: "I would rather a man would call me a fool than a knave." SUE: "Of course. It's truth that hurts."

MAUD: "I've something to tell you—I'm engaged to Jack!" Ethel: "I'm not surprised. Jack never could say 'No'!"

"I HEAR ye had words with Casey." "We had no words." "Then nothing passed between ye?" "Nothing but one brick."

—essential to good sport.

The most accurate and reliable of cartridges may not always suffice to ensure good sport, but good sport is out of the question without them.

Eley Cartridges do all that the best cartridges can do in this direction, with a trustworthiness which has won for them a measure of success greater probably than any other cartridges in the world.

Two 'Eley Loaded' Cartridges:

Eley 'Acme' — A bright orange 2-inch deep-shell Cartridge, loaded with Eley (42-gr.) Smokeless Powder.

Eley 'Eloid' — A light maroon Cartridge. Loaded with Eley (33-gr.) Smokeless. Light recoil; absolutely waterproof.

The above, and other Eley Specialities, may be obtained from Gunmakers and Dealers in Ammunition, everywhere.

TROUT TICKLING.

The indignant orthodox fisherman denies that trout tickling is a sport at all. In a manner he may be right; and yet in a manner he is most certainly wrong. Trout tickling is no sport in the orthodox, and, next to dry fly fishing in the clear, chalk streams of Hampshire, that there is for me no moment more enthralling, no excitement comparable to the moment when, with the lightest touch, the fingers glide slowly, almost caressingly, along the back of some fine trout tracked with infinite care and patience to his ultimate inaccessible lair, where no worm, no fly, no line of any sort could ever find him.

Perhaps it is just this very inaccessibility that affords alike the excuse and the excitement, for it is only where the trout are quite inaccessible, when the underwood surrounds their pools so closely that neither fly nor worm could ever penetrate, that the trout may be tickled with an easy conscience; and here let it be said that were I offered the alternative of worm fishing or tickling in a blind pool, I would give my choice for tickling.

There is infinitely more sport, more science in tickling than in any worm fishing, and to the worm fisher I would say: "If you are keen enough to bear a little discomfort, away with your rod and into the water." Cold, tedious, unsportsmanlike! Not a bit of it. Cold it may be, and very seldom will you return with a dry stitch of clothing; but it is far less tedious than deerstalking, when the science of the game is played by a man at your elbow, and infinitely more sportsmanlike than worm fishing; the excitement is greater, and the chances—the chances are what you make them. I have tickled trout in many streams, but I am still inclined to give the odds on the fish.

The slightest clumsiness, the slightest mistake, or the slightest discoloration of the water, and the game is up, the trout is gone; waste no more time over him, but go on. Further away among the jungle-like undergrowth another pool awaits you, there with infinite patience, infinite care, infinite quiet, you may retrieve your mistake.

The oldest of clothes and an old pair of rubber waders or sand shoes are the best protection. Turn your sleeves up to the uttermost. Do not mind a few scratches or thorns; you will get plenty of them, but if you are courageous, if you are really keen, no scratches, no bitter cold of the sunless water will deter you. You will have no time to think of cold or scratches; all your senses are required at their very keenest for other things.

Now the sunlight lies behind you, among the overhanging boughs scarcely a single ray penetrates, and over the water hangs a sense of secrecy and infinite calm, accentuated by the monotonous ripple of some tiny cascade mysteriously near and yet mysteriously far away. The overhanging tree with deep roots enables you to locate the pool, and you approach with infinite care. The slightest slip will prove fatal, for though you are advancing up water the noise of your stumble will give warning to the trout, and he will seek refuge before you can see him.

And to see him. That is your ambition. The brambles obscure your way and hold you back. Turn them aside slowly, gently; if they are dead, break them quietly: avoid them when you can; above all, let nothing drop into the water, for the least splash will prove your undoing.

The moments pass slowly enough while you achieve your aim, now bending, now erect, waiting ever alert, ever watching the pool in front for the slightest ripple, the smallest movement that will betray to you the secret of the silent pool. All your movements are catlike, all your attention is fixed; unconsciously, you imitate the animals. When you rise you are motionless, silent as the heron; when you scan the water you are swift and alert as the otter.

At last a faint ripple at the head of the pool gives you the clue. The fish has turned from the shallows and is swimming lazily back into the deep water. Has he seen or heard anything? You hold your breath for a moment—rigid, unstirring, one with the trees and the rocks.

You can see him now quite clearly—a long, grey line; a shadow, visible at one moment, curiously invisible the next; a long, grey line just perceptible in the water, with tail that moves and undulates gently with the motion of a piece of weed swayed by the current. Has he seen you? No. He lies still in the open. Had he seen you, or even suspected you, he would have gone at once straight to his cave. You draw a quiet breath and prepare for the final moment, the uttermost sensation that the world of sport can give, the personal capture of a living prey.

Every motion now must be one of infinite delicacy. You must make progress in the water inch by inch. You have, indeed, the knowledge that if he suspects you, becomes frightened, he will make for his cave; but then the game will be against you; the disturbance of the water, the fact that the fish is frightened, all diminish your chances of success, and for one fish that you can get in the open water you will lose three under the bank.

Time passes in the approach, but you heed it not. It may have been five minutes, or twenty, before you find yourself within gripping distance, and it is then, alas! most often that the fish turns and makes, as if instigated by an unknown fear, for his home in the deep water among the inaccessible.

But fortune is still with you. Very, very slowly you lean forward till your hand touches the water about half a foot behind the motionless fish. Thence very quietly you move forward till you can just touch the slippery, eel-like back, and at the touch how many have failed! There is nothing quite like it in the world of sport, this touch of a living fish, so yielding, so soft, so electric. Every nerve is now restrained; you no longer breathe. The water is icy cold, but you do not feel it. You feel only the faint outline of the supple and sinuous form on which your eyes are fixed.

And so your fingers travel onward surely, caressingly, obeying some ancient law which you seem to have known all your life, and suddenly to have discovered, till the moment arrives when the thumb and first finger close in a deadly, deathlike grip, and the fish, for all his struggles, is yours.

THE TURF.

EPSOM.

THE Epsom week came to a conclusion under the most unpleasant conditions, and with rain falling heavily all day everyone was glad when the end arrived.

The melancholy engendered by the wretched weather was deepened by the unexpected result of the Oaks, and folk generally were more glad to leave the scene of action than they had been to reach it. Early on it was rumoured that "something" had happened to Tagalie which would prevent her from running in the Oaks. Such canards do sometimes set backers' hearts palpitating on the morning of a big race, but this report gained ground, and the knowing ones were open to lay that the Derby winner did not see the post. Both owner and trainer were, it is needless to say, greatly surprised by the reports, which had no shadow of foundation; but as it afterwards happened the filly might well have rested on her Derby laurels, for she found the double task too hard for her, and failed even to attain a place. Results:—

PLACES: Evens Belleisle, 5 to 4 Bill and Coo, 6 to 4 Preferment, 4 to 1 Silesia, 5 to 1 Merry Maiden, others in proportion.

Miraka got away clear of Preferment, Green Cloth, Tagalie, Silesia, Belleisle, Lolette, Equitable, Lovely Night, Merry Maiden, and The Tylt, with Jenny Melton whipping in. Thus they raced for a quarter of a mile when Preferment went on, closely followed by Green Cloth, the pair being well clear of Silesia, Tagalie, Miraka, Lolette, Bill and Coo, Belleisle, Merry Maiden, Equitable, and The Tylt, with Sourabaya now bringing up the rear. Shortly afterwards Lolette slipped on to her knees, and, descending the hill, Green Cloth lost her place, Tagalie going on second in front of Equitable, Miraka, Silesia, Bill and Coo, Merry Maiden, and Belleisle. Rounding Tattenham Corner Tagalie headed Preferment and entered the straight with a length advantage of Equitable, who was just clear of Miraka and Bill and Coo, but the favourite was beaten a quarter of a mile from home. Equitable then went to the front, but gave way in the last three hundred yards to Miraka, who won in a canter by three lengths; three-parts of a length separated second and third. Fifty yards behind, The Tylt was officially placed fourth. Time—2mins. 43⅕secs.

Kempton came as a palliative to sportsmen who had survived the nerve-racking of an Epsom week. Considering the unpromising outlook it was astonishing to note what a big attendance was present. Comparatively little interest was taken in the last race, for at this juncture a whirring sound came from above and Mr. Sopwith, within hail of speech from the ground came over the stand in a bee-line for the Sandown turning point in the Aerial Derby, leading by some four minutes the rest, who kept close together. Everybody was looking at the flying men, and hardly any one cast a glance at Berrilldon's victory. Results:—

CRICKET.

THE heavy and continuous rain we have had for days—it has rained every day and many times a day since the month began—led to the drawing or abandonment of most of the important cricket fixtures. Last Friday and Saturday the conditions were torrential and the public disappointment very deep. I have, therefore, very little to chronicle under this heading except the result of the second of the Test matches and some trimmings.

WINCHESTER

.401 Caliber High-Power Self-Loading Rifle.

Besides being the most powerful recoil-operated rifle made, the Winchester .401 Caliber High-Power Self-Loader is the simplest, strongest, most easily operated and most rapid shooting of all rifles of this type. For hunting game, the self-loading type of rifle is ideal, providing it is reliable; and when you can get the power and the swiftness and ease of action of the .401 Winchester, you have a battery that prepares you to meet any game alive. Just look at these figures: velocity of bullet, 2142 foot seconds; energy, 2038 foot pounds. These figures show that the .401 is more powerful than the .303 British, and in addition you have the increased rapidity of fire. This is further augmented by the interchangeable magazine system, the simplest, quickest and most effective method of loading ever devised.

THESE RIFLES CAN BE SEEN AT ALL GUNMAKERS'.

THE AMATEUR CHAMPIONSHIP.

Last Friday, after a prolonged struggle, in which the fortunes fluctuated a good many times during the afternoon, John Ball won his eighth amateur golf championship, beating Abe Mitchell, the Ashdown Forest artisan player, at the thirty-eighth hole.

It was another great uphill fight on the part of the champion, for he was three holes down at the end of the morning round of eighteen holes, and Mitchell started the last of the thirty-six holes dormy one. Ball won it in 4 to 5. They halved the thirty-seventh, but Ball won the thirty-eighth and the championship.

Perhaps the rain had something to do with Mitchell's failure to hold his lead, but, all the same, it was a great performance on the part of Ball, who during the week played eight nerve-racking rounds in a game calculated to test the pluck of a player to the utmost extent.

In all, the Royal Liverpool man has played in ten final ties of the amateur championship. In 1887 he was beaten by H. G. Hutchinson in the final round; in 1888 he beat J. E. Laidley in the final, and he had the same opponent in 1890, when he was again returned the winner.

In 1892 Ball beat Hilton in the last stage. S. M. Ferguson opposed him in the final of 1894, when Ball was again successful. In 1895 Ball was beaten by L. M. Balfour-Melvile. Ball's fifth victory was scored in 1899, when the late Fredy Tait was beaten at the thirty-seventh hole. C. A. Palmer opposed Ball in the final of 1907, and was well beaten by 6 and 4, and in 1910 Ball beat C. Aylmer in hollow style by 10 and 9.

Ball is also one of the very few amateurs to have won the open championship. He was successful in 1890.

It is fitting that Ball should have won the first contest on the newest championship course. Apart from the champion's wonderful strength, there was extraordinary behaviour on the part of the crowd. It was the first time an artisan had appeared in the final, and in the afternoon every workman in the neighbourhood seemed to be on the links. Some had bags of tools, as if they had struck work for the day. They cheered and applauded Mitchell's strokes and made comments on anything Ball did. Nothing like it has ever been seen in amateur golf, and the partisanship, at which, of course, Mitchell was grossly annoyed, was reminiscent of some of the worst days in old professional golf at Musselburgh.

Mitchell got in a fine drive at the first hole (431 yards), but a half in five resulted. At the second (418 yards) Mitchell was on the green in two, and won easily in 4 to 5. Ball lost the third (436 yards) in 6 to 5, but at the fourth (347 yards) he reduced the lead with a fine 4.

Mitchell played a fine half-iron shot to the short fifth (135 yards), and lay hole high, a few yards from the pin. He holed his putt for two, and won the hole, and became 2 up. Mitchell had a great drive to the sixth (350 yards), and, being slightly off the line, his ball landed in one of the big pot bunkers. His shot out was bad, and Ball, who played the hole perfectly, won it easily in four. Another fine drive at the seventh (356 yards) by Mitchell carried the bunker placed for a pulled shot, Ball being trapped.

Reaching the green with a half-iron, shot, the Ashdown Forest player ran down his putt for four, and again became 2 up. Neither was on the eighth (191 yards) from the tee, Ball pushed his shot out and, duffing his next, landed in the bunker, taking two to get out, Mitchell was safe for a good four, and was now three holes in hand. To the ninth (464 yards), Mitchell hit a spanking ball, outdriving his opponent by quite fifty yards. Taking his cleek, he ventured carrying the bunker guarding the green, but was just caught. Ball was on with two wooden club shots, and, holing a putt of two yards for five, won the hole.

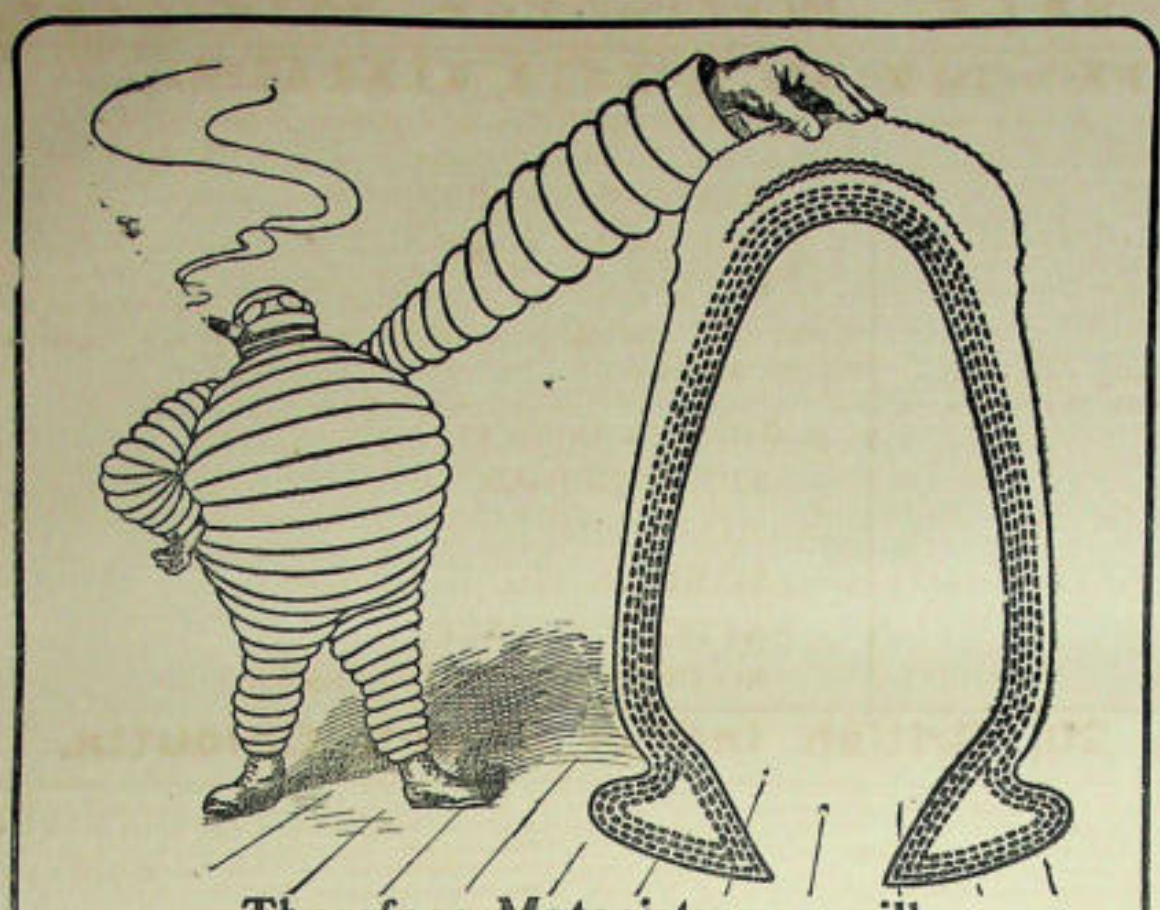
Ball was outdistanced in the drive to the tenth hole (331 yards), but he played a splendid approach, while Mitchell was over the green. The latter's shot back was too strong, but he left Ball a dead stymie, the latter, in trying to get round, holed Mitchell's half, and the hole was halved in four. The eleventh (372 yards) was divided in a good four, while at the twelfth (434 yards), both men displayed splendid form, and another half in four resulted.

The feature of the thirteenth (412 yards), was a magnificent brassie by Ball, which landed two yards from the pin. He holed out in a perfect four, and thus reduced his opponent's lead to one. Mitchell was over the fourteenth green (166 yards) from the tee, while Ball, slightly pushing his shot, dropped in the bunker. The ex-champion required three to get out, and Mitchell had no difficulty in winning the hole in four, and becoming 2 up again.

A poor run up to the fifteenth (302 yards) cost Ball the hole, and he also lost the sixteenth (137 yards), through taking three putts on the green. Mitchell had two very long shots to the seventeenth (543 yards), but his putting was too strong, and Ball, getting down in 5 to 6, reduced the leeway. Mitchell's fine second to the eighteenth (402 yards), landed just over the burn, and kicked back on to the bank. He played a splendid chip shot to a yard from the pin, and holed his putt for four. Ball was down in a like number, and the finish of the first round found him three holes down.

Rain was falling heavily when the players came out for the final round. Mitchell had an advantage of twenty yards on the drive to the first hole. The play on both sides was moderate and a half in 5 was the outcome. Ball had a splendid brassie shot to the second hole, but Mitchell was rather weak, and the former won the hole in 4 to 5. Both were just off the third green in two good shots, and also short with their approaches, the hole ending in a divide in 5. The putting on the fourth green was indifferent, but Ball managed to get down in 4 against 5 and was now only 1 down.

The crowd gathered round the fifth green and the players had difficulty in playing their shots. Ball drove first against the wind and rain, and used his cleek. His ball overran the green and hitting a lady sitting on the edge of the bunker stopped dead. Had the lady not been there Ball would most certainly have been in the bunker. Mitchell's shot struck another lady, but he had not the luck of his opponent, and his ball cannoned into the bunker. Ball holed out in 5 against 4, and thus squared the match.



Mitchell had the better approach to the sixth, but missing a 3 yards putt had to be contest with a half in 4. Ball lost the seventh through weak putting. Mitchell running down in another fine 4. The ex-champion had a lovely tee shot to within 3 yards of the pin at the eighth, while Mitchell was over the green. Ball holed his putt for 2 and the match was again all square. To the ninth Ball's drive landed in a cart rut, and he only just got out, to be bunkered with his third. He was never in sight of even a half, and Mitchell, winning the hole easily after being on the green in 2, turned 1 up.

At the eleventh hole Ball pulled his drive into the rushes and had to pick out and drop under penalty. Mitchell, on the green in 2, took three putts and missed one of less than a yard to win the hole, which was halved in 5. The artisan pulled his second to the twelfth, and the hole was halved in 5.

Mitchell was bunkered and Ball holed a long putt at the next for a 3 to square the match. Ball won the fourteenth and took the lead for the first time in the match, Mitchell being over the green and requiring three putts.

Mitchell was on the next green in 3 and holed out in 4. Ball took three putts, and so Mitchell won this hole. Both were into the bunker from the sixteenth tee, and ultimately this hole was halved in 5. Ball topped his second into the bunker to the seventeenth, and Mitchell ran up in 3. On the green Ball was laid a dead stymie, and Mitchell became dormy 1.

Ball, however, secured the thirty-sixth hole, and thus squared the match. The contest was carried to the thirty-seventh green, and here again a half resulted, the play being continued to the thirty-eighth green amidst intense excitement. The strain was now telling on the players, Mitchell showing the greater sign of wear and tear. At any rate, he sent his drive into the ditch from the tee, and ultimately picked up his ball and gave up the hole. Ball was on the green, but was not asked to hole out.

Therefore, Motorists, you will understand why the possesses this unique shape.

A long series of practical tests have demonstrated that only a cover of this particular shape can give the best results as regards wear.

The tread, being tightly compressed to begin with, is still further compressed when the cover is inflated. Hence the rubber not only is increased in strength, but acquires the tendency to close up any cut sustained, instead of allowing it to swell open, providing a free passage for the immigration of foreign bodies.

ROWING

Cambridge University.—The eight-oared bumping races were brought to a conclusion on the Cam on the 8th June, when a large crowd watched the proceedings. The weather was fine, and great excitement prevailed. After two hard races on Thursday and Friday First Trinity were compelled to strike their colours, and with it the honour of holding the headship, to Jesus, who, after an exciting contest, caught them in the middle of Long Reach. Besides Jesus, King's, Pembroke II., Queen's, Trinity Hall II., and Caius III., the getting on boat, gained their oars. Details.—

Four bumps were recorded among the second division crews. Sidney achieved their object over Christ's opposite Ditton Paddock, and Trinity Hall II., who made the fourth successive bump, ran into First Trinity III., just after passing Grassy Corner, Caius II. were unfortunate in falling victims to Downing. When near Willows in Long Reach number three in their boat caught a crab, and they were compelled to stop, Downing bumping them easily when being hotly pursued by Jesus III., who were overlapping at the time. The getting on boat, Caius III., made further ascent, and captured Clare II. at Little Ditch.

In the first division five bumps were registered. Jesus went up rapidly on First Trinity when entering Long Reach and caught them just before the Glasshouses amid great excitement. Jesus II., also triumphed, catching Emmanuel I., at Ditton Corner, where also Caius II., vanquished First Trinity II., Pembroke II. continued their upward career and bumped Selwyn at Little Ditch. Queen's met with further success, overtaking Magdalen just after rounding First Post Corner.

Oxford University.—Although, so far, only one or two crews have been practising, Oxford will again be strongly represented at Henley this year. Magdalen will not defend their title to the Grand, as the president, L. G. Wormald, and E. D. Horsfall will probably be rowing in the Leander Olympic crew. They will, however, have an eight on for the Ladies. With Horsfall absent, the stroke thwart will be occupied by F. H. Sandford, the stroke of their second eight. New College are in some doubt with regard to the Grand. If Littlejohn's entry is accepted for the Olympic Games, and there seems no reason why it should not be, seeing that the two Australians, Cudmore and Kelly, figured in the Leander crew that competed on the last occasion, they will do battle for the Grand and then go on to Stockholm. If Littlejohn is ruled out of court, then the probability is that they will devote their energies to a four for the Stewards. Christchurch are undecided what to do at present. They have on a four—R. W. Lush (bow), R. S. Maciver (who stroked the first crew), G. E. Hellyer, and A. C. Boult (stroke)—and they may also have another four out at the commencement of the week, whilst it is possible they may send an eight. Brasenose make a start with an eight and University are sending an eight consisting of A. G. R. Garrod (bow) A. L. Middleton, C. F. L. Pigott, E. L. Mort, A. L. S. Cope, G. Cory Wright, C. E. Tinne, W. L. Matthews (stroke) E. T. Osborne (cox). Balliol have not made a move and the probability is that they will not be represented save by the College Barge which will be sent down as usual. Lincoln, after their excellent performance in the eights, have decided on sending their crew unaltered in any respect. Oriel are going for the Thames and will be again coached by E. R. Burgess, of Magdalen. They did wonderfully well last month and are a strong hefty crew averaging over 12st. per man. Leonard, who rowed bow, has been given a trial at stroke. Walker going thence to 2 and W. Henry in the bow thwart, but to-morrow they will probably revert to their old order. Sir W. Parker, New College, will coach them on the home water, whilst J. C. Drinkwater, Wadham, will supervise the work at Henley. Corpus, who have secured the services of Dr. G. C. Bourne as coach, are also sending an eight, but at present they have not started work.

THE MYSORE TOURNAMENT.

20th Deccan Horse vs. 29th Lancers.—This was the first match in the tournament and was played on the 25th ultimo, the 20th winning by 6 goals to 1.

First Chukker.—The 20th Horse were on the ball at once and took it along to the goal, near the mouth of which Campbell-Ross shot and drew first blood for the favourites. Thereafter the 29th attacked and their opponents were greatly put to it to defend. Score: 20th Deccan Horse, 1 goal; 29th Lancers, nil.

Second Chukker.—This was another fast turn, some good galloping being witnessed, during the first half minute of which the 20th put in their second goal from a scrimmage. From the throw-in the 20th attacked and hit the third goal.

In the next thirty seconds it looked vastly like another goal for the leaders, but the 29th saved. Score: 20th Deccan Horse, 3 goals; 29th Lancers, nil.

Third Chukker.—After a little up and down play the 20th attacked but missed a good thing and Campbell-Ross hit yet another wide one. The rest of the play was without result. Score: 20th Deccan Horse, 3 goals; 29th Lancers, nil.

Fourth Chukker.—On the ball being thrown in the 20th attacked instantly, and although the 29th made game efforts to hustle nothing came of their belated tactics, Campbell-Ross scoring the fourth goal. After that Ross once more brought it away with a fine run down the field and hit the fifth point. Score: 20th Deccan Horse, 5 goals; 29th Lancers, nil.

Fifth Chukker.—Taking the throw-in the 29th made a despairing effort and were well on the ball for goal but missed one of their best chances of the day and then hit wide at least twice. No score in this period. Score: 20th Deccan Horse, 5 goals; 29th Lancers, nil.

Sixth Chukker.—The final round was remarkable for a strong defensive game on the part of the losers, but they continued to miss their chances. Both ends of the field were visited in rapid succession, and after much bad shooting the 29th actually dribbled in their one and only goal, Wright being responsible. The 20th presently collared the ball and hit their sixth goal and thus won the game. Score: 20th Deccan Horse, 6 goals; 29th Lancers, 1 goal.

MYSORE SILLADAR HORSE vs. MAJOR DYER'S TEAM.—This game on the 26th ultimo was very one-sided, the Silladar Horse winning by 11 goals to 2.

First Chukker.—The Silladars took the ball down, but Ansdell brought it back and with a series of pretty passes menaced the Silladars' goal. Fiaz Mahomed got it out of danger and ran it up to opposite end, and enabled Saddudin to put it through. The Silladars resumed the offensive and a hard galloping game ensued, the ball visiting either goal in turn, Fiaz Mahomed very nearly scoring twice, Dyer saving just on the goal line. Score: Silladars, 1 goal; Major Dyer's team, nil.

Second Chukker.—After a scrimmage in midfield the ball was rushed up towards the visitors' goal, Dyer, however, averted danger; up and down play till after several strenuous efforts the Silladars added another point, Fiaz Mahomed putting through. Score: Silladars, 2 goals; Major Dyer's team, nil.

Third Chukker.—The Silladars attacked immediately and obtained a penalty free hit for a foul against the visitors. From the scrimmage which resulted Saddudin scored another point. Play in midfield till the Silladars worked the ball round to the visitors' ground where Fiaz Mahomed scored again. Score: Silladars, 4 goals; Major Dyer's team, nil.

Fourth Chukker.—The Silladars took possession at once and scored again through Fiaz Mahomed. They continued to force the game and Shanker Rao made a brilliant run. Lakshamana Rao added the 7th goal, Shanker Rao putting the ball through for the eighth time shortly after. Score: Silladars, 8 goals; Major Dyer's team nil.

Fifth Chukker.—Shunkar Rao added another goal for the Silladars, who were in splendid form round and simply ran rings and their opponents. Lakshmana Rao obtained the tenth goal, and the Silladars pressing during the rest of the period nearly scored on several occasions. Score: Silladars, 10 goals; Major Dyer's team, nil.

Sixth Chukker.—Montgomery worked the ball down and scored. The visitors now played up, but it was too late. They followed up this success by another score out of a scrimmage. The Silladars then resumed the attack at once and Sunker Rao scored. A minute later he scored the eleventh goal for his side, and time was called with the score 11 to 2 in favour of the Silladars. 20TH DECCAN HORSE vs. 2ND SAPPERS AND MINERS.—Played on the 26th ultimo, the game being very one-sided the 20th had things practically their own way and won by 11 goals to 3. The Sappers scored in the opening chukker, but before time was called the 20th Deccan Horse had hit four goals. The second period saw the leaders still attacking strongly which gave them 7 goals in all at its close. At half time the score was 8 goals to 1. The fourth was a fast turn in which the Sappers were again signally outplayed, their opponents hitting their ninth point. The fifth chukker advanced the score to 11 and the final period was productive of two goals to the losers.

First Chukker.—The Mysore Lancers ran down but were repulsed. Each end of the field was then alternately visited without result till the 7th secured an opening and scored. Soon the Lancers had a piece of bad luck, Lambert hitting the goal post after a fine run up the field. Score: 7th Hussars, 1 goal; Mysore Imperial Service Lancers, nil.

Second Chukker.—The Lancers pressed at once with great dash and saved splendidly once before their opponents were able to collar the ball. The period closed without further addition to the score. Score: 7th Hussars, 1 goal; Mysore Imperial Service Lancers, nil.

Third Chukker.—Attack and counter-attack was the order of this round. There was much galloping and no end of the really sound polo till on the call of time the Hussars hit their second, Gibbs being responsible. Score: 7th Hussars, 2 goals; Imperial Service Lancers, nil.

Fourth Chukker.—The 7th got away with the ball. Rankin put it through. Then Soobraj Urs sent the ball through high above and between the flags. Before the period closed the 7th hit their fourth from a scrimmage in front of the goal. Score: 7th Hussars, 4 goals; Mysore Imperial Service Lancers 1 goal.

Fifth Chukker.—This period practically decided the match, the 7th hitting their fifth. Score: 7th Hussars, 5 goals; Mysore Imperial Service Lancers 1 goal.

20TH DECCAN HORSE vs. MYSORE SILLADER HORSE.—Played last Friday, the 20th winning by 8 goals to 1.

First Chukker.—Midfield play till Campbell Ross drove the ball along and put the first goal through. Play was retained in the Deccan territory for a minute longer and when time was called they had hit 2 more goals. Score: The 20th Deccan Horse, 3 goals; Mysore Horse, nil.

Second Chukker.—The Mysore team defended brilliantly. They got away at length but Ross saved and carried the ball away and hit the fourth for his side. After a little desultory play Ley made the fifth point. Score: 20th Deccan Horse, 5 goals; Mysore Horse, nil.

Third Chukker.—The Mysore Horse resisted a series of hot attacks valiantly, but Konsul Singh got through and shot the sixth goal. Score: 20th Deccan Horse, 6 goals; Mysore Horse, nil.

Fourth Chukker.—The 20th immediately notched their seventh goal. Then the Mysore men got away and scored their first point, narrowly missing another point soon after. Score: 20th Deccan Horse, 7 goals; Mysore Horse, 1 goal.

Fifth Chukker.—The 20th pressed but were penalised. Nothing came of the hit and the 20th took the ball down and nearly scored. Score: 20th Deccan Horse, 7 goals; Mysore Horse, 1 goal.

Sixth Chukker.—The Mysore team played up, but they could hardly do anything and were beaten as stated. Score: 20th Deccan Horse, 8 goals, Mysore Horse, 1 goal. Teams as before.

7TH HUSSARS "A" vs. "B" TEAM.—Played on Friday "A" team winning by 10 to 2. Teams:—

First Chukker.—McCalmont took the ball away and got in the first goal. Then Brassey carried down and Watson shot the second goal on the sound of time. Score: "A" team, 2 goals; "B" team, nil.

Second Chukker.—This chukker was very level till McCalmont got away and shot a long one. Score: "A" team, 3 goals; "B" team, nil.

Third Chukker.—Hard galloping in which "A" took the ball away and hit their fourth. Score: "A" team, 4 goals; "B" team, nil.

Fourth Chukker.—"A" team continued to attack strenuously and put on three more goals. Score: "A" team, 7 goals; "B" team, nil.

Fifth Chukker.—Up and down play "A" team scored one more about a minute before the period ended. Score: "A" team, 8 goals; "B" team, nil.

Sixth Chukker.—"B" attacked furiously and Bates contrived to shoot the first goal for his side. "A" responded with another and "B" returned the compliment with equal despatch, finally "A" notched their tenth from a scrum. Score: "A" team, 10 goals; "B" team, 2 goals.

"A" TEAM 7TH HUSSARS vs. 20TH DECCAN HORSE.—These teams met in the final on the 1st instant, when the 20th, who have held the cup for two years, were beaten after a splendid game by 4 goals to 3. It was a splendid game.

First Chukker.—The 7th pressed but hit wide. Resuming the 20th brought it back well past midfield, but it was again transferred, Ross saving in the nick of time. The 7th resumed a vigorous attack, out of which Konsul Singh shot wide. Even play followed and the first period ended blank. Score: 7th Hussars "A" team, nil; 20th Deccan Horse, nil.

Second Chukker.—The Hussars put on their initial goal. The 20th responded with a fine combined movement, till Brassey brought it away and hit it wide. The 20th got a penalty hit for a foul but no further result accrued. Score: 7th Hussars, 1 goal; 20th Deccan Horse, nil.

Third Chukker.—Konsul Singh and McCalmont galloped grandly up and down. Quite on time the latter passed to Brassey, who drove the ball between the posts. Score: 7th Hussars, 2 goals; 20th Deccan Horse, nil.

Fourth Chukker.—The 7th put on their third goal and Konsu Singh ran down and then Ross got hold of the ball and hit the first goal for the 20th. Half a minute later Konsul Singh put the ball through the goal. Score: 7th Hussars, 3 goals; 20th Deccan Horse, 2 goals.

Fifth Chukker.—Both ends were frequently visited, till the 7th obtained a penalty hit from a foul. Nothing came of it, however, and the sound of time saw no addition to the score. Score: 7th Hussars, 3 goals; 20th Deccan Horse, 2 goals.

Sixth Chukker.—The 20th pressed a fine effort by Brassey being smartly banked. Each team pressed and in a scrimmage, Ross equalised the score amidst enthusiasm. Exciting play followed. Time having sounded the goals were widened. Score: 7th Hussars, 3 goals; 20th Deccan Horse, 3 goals.

Extra Chukker.—The 7th played with the stiff breeze in their favour and after a little desultory play McCalmont put through the odd goal which won them the cup. Score: 7th Hussars, 4 goals; 20th Deccan Horse, 3 goals.

Rowing.

THE PROGRESS OF ROWING AT CAMBRIDGE.

IT is to trade that Cambridge owes the May Races, and even the Inter-University Boat Race, for a little over two hundred years ago an Act of Parliament was passed for making the river Cam navigable from Clayhithe to Cambridge, and incidentally this made modern rowing possible on the narrow stream.

But although on the Thames amateur rowing had long been a favourite pastime, the King's Scholars at Westminster having a six-oared boat called the Fly in 1815, and being challenged to row by Eton as early as 1818, Cambridge men did not look on their river as fit for anything but idling.

On the Upper Thames at Oxford and Eton rowing was practised before the battle of Waterloo, but at Cambridge another ten years had to elapse.

AN INFORMAL START.

During the next few years, however, the Eton and Westminster men at the University gradually introduced rowing of a more serious sort, and funnies, canoes, and pairs began to appear, till in 1824 there were two six-oars and several four-oars on the Cam.

In 1825 racing began in an informal way by four Trinity men hiring a four-oar called the Shannon and challenging any other boat they met to row. This was the origin of the First Trinity B.C., and in the same year the Johnian, founded a club, and in 1826 brought up an old eight-oar from Eton.

This was the first eight ever seen on the Cam, and was a huge clinker-built boat 38 feet long, 5 feet wide, and 26 inches deep.

It was named the Etonian, and was used more for picnics than racing, as it contained a "pantheratticon," or cooking outfit. The man responsible for the innovation was an Etonian, the Hon'ble R. Trench, who may thus be considered the father of Cambridge eight-oared rowing. Fired by the Johnian example, the Trinity men, by the advice of an unknown Old Westminster, had an eight-oar built in London, which proved a much better boat than the Etonian.

With these two boats eight-oared racing began at Cambridge. The crews went out nearly every day, the coxswains having bugles with which they sounded a challenge to the adversary. No race was rowed until the coxswain had blown his bugle, and he was fined a guinea if he sounded the challenge, or answered it, before each man in the crew had given him leave.

PROF. SCHMIDT prefers Gonosan (Kawa Santa Riedel) to any other preparation of Sandal wood oil. Although he has used the drug in many cases he has never observed any signs of Nausea, Flatulency, Nephritic pains, Pruritis or Skin Eruptions. The same is the opinion of other leading Specialists. Literature free on application to Holzmuller and Schmidt, Calcutta. Procurable at all chemists.

The object of the boat in front was to "tail" its rival, and that of the hinder boat to bump the one in front. This form of racing must have been amusing to the oarsmen and spectators, for other colleges began to have boating ambitions.

THE FIRST COLLEGE RACES.

A group of Trinity men got a ten-oar from Eton, Caius and Jesus both started six-oars, and Emmanuel followed suit. The C.U.B.C was started in 1827, and the first college races rowed on the Cam were held on 26th February, in that year, the boats on that day being Trinity ten-oar, Trinity eight-oar, St. John's eight-oar, and Jesus six-oar.

The captains agreed upon this order before starting, and later on (for crews seem to have rowed or not as they liked) Caius, another Johnian boat, Emmanuel and Trinity Westminsters took part in the racing. There were fifteen races in the Lent Term, eleven in the May Term, and six in the October Term, 1827.

From the first the boats were started much as they now are. There was a lock at Chesterton, by Charon's, and the boats were started above it from posts 90 feet apart.

It was not until 1835, after the Chesterton Lock had been removed, that the starting point was removed to Baitsbite, and the finish placed just above the railway bridge.

With that removal the early days of rowing at Cambridge end, and though many changes were still to come, the modern history of the C.U.B.C. may be said to date from that year.

CALCUTTA NOTES AND COMMENTS.

THE League is coming to a close and really the competition should have terminated last evening, but the postponed match between the R. G. A. and Dalhousie will not come off until next Saturday. So far (up to the time of writing) only the Customs have completed their engagements and out of fourteen games the Riversiders have secured 16 points. The Customs were most unlucky in not sharing points with the Black Watch in the return match and against the Middlesex in the first encounter the result should have been a win for the Customs instead of a draw. The Customs lost two valuable points against the Rangers, but in this game the Riversiders had only themselves to blame. There will be a keen struggle for second place, and if the Rangers and Middlesex win over Calcutta and Dalhousie, respectively, the Customs will be fourth on the table. The Dum-Dum team at present have a better goal average than the Rangers.

Although Dalhousie have done poorly in the League I expect the old Trades Club to render the best account of themselves in the Shield competition among the civilian teams.

On Saturday Dalhousie put up a magnificent fight against the Black Watch, and if Pearce would only improve in his shooting the Trades Club would go very near annexing the prize. Dalhousie invariably take a long time in getting their house in order, and it would be very foolish of the Selection Committee if they were to keep Reynolds out of the Shield eleven. Reynolds is one of the finest forwards in Calcutta, and although a bit selfiish, is speedy, and a very hard and accurate shot. What Dalhousie are yet lacking is good hard straight shooting by their forwards. As a matter of fact the shooting in Calcutta is very poor indeed.

The entries for the I.F.A. Shield closed last Monday night, and out of the seventeen entries there are three from out stations. The Royal Irish Rifles, who won the trophy in 1901, are coming down on Saturday, and although every player is new to Calcutta, I was informed by one of the Corporals who has been here a week that the side is good enough to beat any of the local teams, except the Black Watch. Sergeant Savage, at one time a regimental player, is in charge of the men, and as the Rifles have always rendered an excellent account of themselves I may say with confidence, the team that will beat the Irishmen should annex the Shield. The R. I. R.'s in addition to have carring all before them here, have won the prize at Simla, and have also annexed the Rovers' Cup at Bombay.

The East Yorks, runners-up last year, will make another bid for the Shield, and the Gordons, who won the prize in 1908-09 and 1910, will also be fighting for possession for the trophy.

There is not the slightest doubt the military would be better represented, and the I. F. A. tournament would be equally as popular as that run at Simla, but one cannot expect soldier teams to come from the Punjab when the Association do not come forward to meet at least half their expenses. The firm who hires out chairs could easily give 25 per cent. to the Association and this money could greatly contribute in paying a portion of the expenses of the military teams coming from far off places. However if Mr. H. S. Sutton is Honorary Secretary next year there will be lots of improvements and alterations made. The other entries are Black Watch, Calcutta, Mohan Bagan, Measurers, Customs, Rangers, Sibpur College, Bristol United, Chinsurah Sporting, Y.M.C.A., Sova Bazar and Moslems. The following are the teams entered for the Trades Cup:—Medicals, Nationals, Lansdowne, Jaun Bazar, Aryans, Police, Howrah Sporting, Y.M.C.A., Banga Basi, E. B. S. R., Ballygunge United, Tollygunge, Tajhat, Kumartulli, Wellington, Chandernagore, Presidency College, Telegraph Association, Telegraph Storeyard, Sporting Union, Burn's, Port Commissioners, Lillooah, Free School and Orientals.

There were some interesting matches played during the week, and as the Customs, Middlesex and Rangers are all running neck and neck for second place the games between these teams have been very keenly contested. The Customs and Middlesex match ended in a draw—pointless. This being the second occasion the two teams have shared points. The pace was a hot one from start to finish, but although both goals were constantly being attacked the ball was never netted.

The Black Watch and R. G. A. match on the Calcutta ground was a tame affair. The Scotch team were minus three of their regular players, but managed to win by two goals to nil.

The best match on Saturday, was that between the Black Watch and Dalhousie. The game was fast and interesting throughout and the referee was infinitely better than has been seen in several League games this season. The Black Watch were slightly the superior side and in the end won by a goal to nil.

In the Rangers and the Middlesex match it was fortunate for Durant that there was not a stricter referee, for had there been a referee of the Sergeant Curley or Hounsell class Mr. Durant would have got marching orders. Durant has a nasty habit of putting down his head low and charging, which is to say the least most dangerous. The game resulted in a goalless draw, but the Dum-Dum team were unfortunate in not scoring a "penalty kick" for an illegal charge against Durant.

Calcutta beat the Gunners by four goals to one, but the game was too one-sided to be of much interest, Hugh Sherman as centre forward, was an improvement on some of the men seen in that position, but I don't expect the "Reds" to go far in the Shield judging them on what they have shown in the League. I think the team could be improved upon.

The Customs beat Y. M. C. A. on the latter's ground by a goal to nil, and last Monday the Association lost to the Middlesex by the same margin.

After Tuesday's disgraceful scene between members of the Measurers and the Aryans both teams should not be allowed to take further part in any football competition. I may state that the refereeing was anything but satisfactory. As for the play the least said about it the better.

MOTOR MEMS.

LONDONERS who care to do so may now, at the modest outlay of one shilling, review at their ease and under one roof the beginnings of automobilism. At the old premises of Waring and Gillow, 164-176, Oxford Street, W., is now gathered together a motley assortment of "prehistoric" motor vehicles, the construction of which took place when the automobile world was young. The history of the modern self-propelled road conveyance has, of course, been as brief as it has been brilliant; but, even when this is borne in mind, it is difficult to realise that the majority of the cars on show at the new museum were evolved less than fifteen years ago. If we might judge from their appearance we should be justified in assuming that at least a century separated their birth-date from that of the standard pleasure vehicle of to-day. Perhaps the most interesting exhibit of all is the ancient Panhard, a twin-cylinder veteran of twenty-one years, which is—save for a temporary holiday during the next few months—still in daily use by its owner, a French curé. But the Panhard is only one of the many: Wolseley, Lanchester, Star, Benz, and other famous pioneers are represented by their first crude efforts towards the production of a mechanical road conveyance. The promoters of the museum hope eventually to arrange for the vehicles to be permanently housed in such a manner that they will always be available for inspection by generations to come.

IT is no easy matter to produce a book on any aspect of motoring nowadays which has any pretension to originality of treatment. The subject, in every phase, is well worn. The more praise, therefore, is due to Mr. John Armstrong for his book "The Motor" (Stanley Paul and Co., 10s. 6d.) In making what is practically a review of motors from the very earliest beginnings down to to-day, the author has set himself a severe task, and it is much to his credit that he has been able to deal as adequately as he has done with so vast a subject. His book cannot, perhaps, be regarded as a standard work of reference. He does not go sufficiently deeply into the various problems he discusses. Rather does he record the fact that the problems exist, and leaves his reader to work out their solutions for himself. But there are several very admirable chapters in his book which deserve the careful attention of all beginners and a good many experienced motorists. Among these should be mentioned Chapter XIV., "The Significance of Simplicity," in which he offers much good counsel (including the excellent advice to carry a spare magneto); "The Comfortable Car" (XV.), in which he recommends an ingenious form of mudguard; and "The Consideration of Economy." There are some instructive plates accompanying the text, and there is a decided originality about the whole scheme. The volume closes with an attempt at giving "The Hundred Best Cars," but the value of this is rather discounted by some errors and by the fact that a good deal of it is out of date.

"OWEN JOHN" is responsible for the opinion that no one is so ignorant concerning motors as the motorist who never drives any car other than one particular kind. This is a subject dealt with in the Motor News, more especially in connection with manufacturers, who for their own education should make a point of testing as many other cars as possible, whether foreign or otherwise. This will give them an opportunity of locating the points in which their competitors' vehicles excel their own and enable them by degrees to eliminate the weak points in their own productions. The manufacturer who considers his own car is perfection is never likely to attain to the front rank, or if he did succeed by good luck in producing a very perfect article, is unlikely to retain the position so gained.

"Owen John" also gives a very plausible reason for the great development of motoring in America. In the United Kingdom the inhabitants live as a rule close to a market town or railway station, where a horse and cart can carry out all the work required. In America, on the other hand, the farmers frequently live at great distances from the nearest railway, and consequently the motor car is invaluable for the conveyance of farm produce, the procuring of necessaries, or the transaction of ordinary business. In parts of Ireland the same conditions apply, and no doubt the well-to-do farmers will eventually find that cheap and rough but strongly-made motor vehicles will prove both an economy and a great convenience.

GONOSAN has rapidly advanced in demand among the public and this sale is due to the recommendations of all reputable Chemists and leading Medical Scientists of the day. Gonosan is most antiseptic and harmless—in fact it is the "ideal" remedy, it is a pain preventor, it has cured thousands. Try it.

FEW people realise the fact that but for popular opposition and the legal restrictions placed in the way of development mechanically propelled carriages would have reached an extraordinary degree of efficiency and have come into almost general use long before the internal combustion engine was thought of. In the early steam engine period great attention was paid to the subject and many vehicles were designed and run successfully; but the restrictions imposed absolutely killed an industry which, if it had been allowed to progress along normal lines, would have given Great Britain an unapproachable lead in this important industry. Mr. White Stevens, of the Maudslay Co., has recently unearthed from a file of old papers a copy of a journal called John Bull, dated Monday, 20th July, 1835, in which appeared the following reference to the first mechanically propelled carriage made by the originators of the Maudslay firm. The paragraph reads as follows:—

"Maudslay, Sons, and Field's steam carriage made her second run to Reading on Thursday. It started from Hyde Park Corner at 8-30 agreeably to advertisement, and completed the journey in 2 hours 58 minutes 20 seconds and returned in 2 hours 46 minutes 50 seconds exclusive of stoppages travelling down at the rate of 14½ and up at the rate of 13½ miles per hour. There was a slight delay in Brentford in returning, in consequence of the orb of the wheel of the attached omnibus having become heated, but that was the only casualty."

That a coach could have been produced at such an early stage capable of running lengthy distances at a speed of 14½ miles an hour is most remarkable, more especially when it is considered that such a vehicle was necessarily shod with iron tyres. A decade of experiment and experience would have effected a vast improvement. The introduction of solid rubber tyres would have still further developed the steam road car and would have prepared the way for the modern internal combustion engine, and have resulted in the designing, before the end of last century of cars equal to those now procurable. It is quite interesting to learn that the Maudslay firm were pioneers in this direction and that their name was famous from an engineering point of view long before the existence of any of the firms at present engaged in the motor industry.

THE humble petition, of which all Scots are alleged to be guilty, "Lord, gie us a gude conceit o' oorsel's," needs no imitators in the United States, so far as motorists are concerned. It is the misfortune of the American to mistake quantity for worth; he assumes that because huge factories turn out large numbers of cars that those cars are the best in the world. For instance, a writer in the Horseless Age of recent date, says—"It is a well-known fact that American automobile manufacturers lead the world in design and construction of gasoline motors." That opinion represents in a general way the attitude of mind of the average American motorist towards the rest of the world's output. It is a curious commentary on the expression of opinion quoted that in the same paper there is an account of a race in California in which F.I.A.T. cars took first and second places, while a Benz was third. The race was remarkable for the speeds attained on a road circuit, the average of the winner for a distance of 303 miles being at the rate of 76·62 miles an hour.

BY "THROTTLE."

IF the gentleman (?) who killed my dog by running over him with a motor car on Saturday morning last will call on me I can guarantee him a lively few minutes. The car number and all other particulars are known, but no legal action is being taken, for this at any rate, but the prenumerical ability of Zadkiel is not required to predict an early vacancy in the existing list of drivers' licences. Accidents will happen and if the person mentioned had had the decency to stop and say it was an accident and unavoidable no further notice of the matter could have been taken, but after making off as he did, let him remember the now historical admonition "wait and see."

ACCORDING to the latest racing news from Rome the Benz combination series of victories piloted by L. G. Hornsted. This driver is now quite at the top of the list of racing drivers and is undeniably the successor of the great Italian Nazzaro, of Fiat fame, as the world's champion in this branch of sport. Perhaps Hornsted's most sensational feat was the driving of the 1909 Benz at 141·7 miles per hour in April 1911. Not bad for a car two years old. Mention of the Benz reminds one that 1 the very earliest type, built in 1885, wire wheels and double elliptic springs were fitted as well as thermosyphon cooling and electric ignition all of which features in an improved form survive to-day. While on the subject of racing the recent performance of the Sunbeam is worthy of notice. Two of these cars finished fourth and fifth respectively in the Grand Prix of the Dieppe circuit, separated by 1 minute only, which says a good deal for the even distribution of the make. The race was won by a Peugeot with a Fiat in each of the next two places separated by 17 minutes. By this performance the Sunbeam keeps up its track record of last year when at Brooklands Easter Meeting, driven by L. Coatalen, it won four cups in four races. Finishing up by beating a 60 H.P. Napier in a scratch match of five miles by 15⅘ seconds at a speed of 88 miles per hour, the Sunbeam was rated at 15·9 H.P.

MOTOR CYCLE racing, under the auspices of both the British Motor Cycle Racing Club and Brooklands Club, is rapidly gaining in popularity. Recently at a meeting held on Brooklands track competitions were held between motor cycles and cars, whilst on the 15th of last month at a Brooklands Club meeting five competitions were provided for motor cycles. At this meeting also it is significant that an Aeroplane Handicap was included in the programme. What a change from the time, when, in the memory of all of us, "two crazy brothers named Wright" were ridiculed for practising with gliders on the slopes of Ohio. The writer distinctly remembers an Illustrated article in an American magazine which did not trouble to even thinly veil its ridicule of the pioneers of aviation. In justice let it be said that the same magazine was recently foremost in the laudation of the late Wilbur Wright, said to be the first aviator to die a natural death. Be that as it may the tardily awarded laurels were earned as honestly and nobly as they were ultimately freely given.

LAST week I promised my readers a further dissertation on the causes of engine "knocks." This is a particularly interesting subject and one to which too much attention cannot be given either by amateur or professional. A very puzzling case of knocking has been traced to the compression being too high, resulting not so much in pre-ignition as in the too rapid burning of the charge. The charge could, of course, be compressed so high as to cause spontaneous combustion. With overcompression a "detonation" occurs instead of a comparatively gradual expansion of the ignited gas. Reducing the compression frequently effects a cure in engines prone to knock. There are various ways of effecting this, chief amongst them being the fitting of shorter connecting rods between piston and crank-shaft, or if depth of metal allows a certain amount can be turned off the head of the piston, thus giving greater compression space. An engine in which the compression is too high will never run smoothly; although there may be no actual knocking there is excessive vibration caused by the exertion necessary to overcome the super-compression. This is a fault which is much more common than is generally supposed. It is worth any owner's while to obtain a cylinder gauge to test compression the recognised limit being about 90lbs. In addition to those already mentioned there are mechanical causes of knocking. The motion of the petrol engine is of what is termed the intermittent torque class, as distinguished from the continuous and rotary motion of the turbine or the electric motor, and requires all moving parts to be of as close a working fit as possible to run sweetly. Any wear or backlash in the bearings or any inaccuracy in the alignment between two moving parts sets up undue stresses and causes trouble, but it is not usually so marked or so serious in its consequences (unless neglected) as the knock caused by pre-ignition and faulty timing. An experienced ear readily distinguishes between the two kinds of knock. An engine with a bearing slightly loose may run for a considerable time without any serious consequences, but it certainly is not a good policy to allow bearings to get into a bad state. Any slackness should be taken up or adjusted as soon as possible after being noticed. The writer knows of one car at present running about the streets of Calcutta which has fully ¼ an inch play in the "big ends," due solely to the carelessness of the driver and the parsimony of the owner. The true alignment of the engine shaft and clutch depends largely on the bearings being in order. Particular attention should be paid to the bearings at each end of the connecting rods, as there is a tendency on their part to wear oval caused by their taking the direct thrust from the explosion, hence the wear on one side more than the other. Care should be taken to see that the nuts holding the cylinder flanges to the crank case are screwed down equally and tightly all round. The nuts holding the connecting rod bearings, also, should be always tight and secured by split pins, any slacking back on their part would immediately result in a bad knock and very probably in a hole being knocked in the crank case.

NEXT to knocks come squeaks. With them and the methods of locating them I will now proceed to deal. Squeaks may be classed under three heads, viz: The continuous, the regularly intermittent, and the occasional. The first will be generally found to originate in a small bearing, the second on larger surfaces and such parts as universal joints, and the last from such parts as springs, shackles, lever connections, etc. Obviously the first thing to do in locating a squeak, is to make sure whether it comes from the engine, the clutch or its actuating gear, the transmission or from the brake bands. If the car be stopped and the gear lever brought to neutral and the squeak continues, then it must follow that the trouble is in the engine, clutch, or gear box. The latter may be eliminated by depressing the clutch pedal, thus bringing the gears to a stop. Should the squeak still continue, manipulation of the clutch pedal up and down should serve to indicate whether the trouble is in the clutch withdrawal collar or not; if it is not there, then by this simple course of elimination, starting from the right end we have the defect located in the engine. As instances of usually unsuspected causes of engine squeaks it may be mentioned that oil applied to valve springs frequently eradicates the noise, as the springs may get out of the straight and set up a squeak by rubbing against the valve stems. I have known a persistent squeak to occur when cranking an engine by hand, but was unnoticeable when the engine was running under its own power. This fault was traced to the revolving grip on the starting handle and to the casing under the radiator containing the handle shaft. Should the squeak cease when the car is stopped, obviously, by a system of elimination the reverse of the above, it is in the transmission gear, the brakes, or the road wheels. The best way is to ascertain if it is the brakes which are at fault. This may be tried before stopping the car; first make sure that the side brake lever is as far as it will go in the "off" position, (in view of the fact that the brake bands may be pressing on the drums) then slightly apply the brakes noting at the same time any variation in the noise. If it increases on applying the brakes lightly it will be obvious that the trouble is here and a drop of oil may be applied to the drums or, if circumstances permit, the brakes may be at once re-adjusted and the defect remedied. Occasionally a squeak will occur only when the car is reversed, it does not necessarily follow that the noise comes from the reverse pinion in the gear box, it may be traced to the above cause, as some types of brakes have a tendency to bind on the drums when the car is run backwards. A squeak very rarely comes from the road wheels, feeling each wheel bearing for undue heat will quickly enable it to be determined whether the lubrication at this point is at fault. Universal joints, in the majority of cases, receive far less attention from drivers than they should do and in some designs of propeller shafts especially a squeak readily arises through neglect of this part. If this is suspected the actual point may be determined upon removal of the floor boards and then pushing the car backwards and forwards a foot or so. In the block type of universal joint, a handful of grease pressed into the socket will affect an immediate remedy, or in the cross pin type a few drops of oil on the joint will be equally effective. In most up-to-date cars attention is paid by the designers to automatic lubrication of these joints so that it is chiefly in old types that the trouble is likely to arise. Intermittent squeaks usually come from the springs, both the shackles and leaves being liable to become musical if the lubrication of them is not attended to occasionally.

DURING and after the rain storm on Monday evening the Calcutta streets were as usual in a flooded condition. This was an opportunity for the exhibition, on the part of some drivers, of perhaps the worst form of thoughtless driving. I am putting it very mildly. Several cars were driven round corners so close and at such a rate as to drench those who were unfortunate enough to be standing anywhere near the kerb. As a driver one does not like to think this was done intentionally, but it is a very common thing at the season to see drivers of all classes so behaving. A little more consideration on the part of those in charge of cars for the right of others to be in the street is certainly desirable.

THE draft rules formulated by the Commissioner of Police are of interest and if carried out should go far to reduce the present dangerous condition of the local thoroughfares. These rules are as follows:—(1) No driver of any vehicle shall, when driving in any street, hold any umbrella, or anything which interferes with the free and full use of both his hands for the purpose of driving his vehicle. (2) No driver of a vehicle drawn by a horse in any street shall drive with his feet in any other position than on the footboard of the vehicle. (3) No person shall, without reasonable excuse, walk on or along the carriage way, in any of the streets mentioned in a schedule given except in such portions of such streets as have no side footpath for the exclusive use of foot passengers.

As suggestions are invited I beg leave to submit the following for the consideration of Sir Frederick.

"No driver of any vehicle shall, while driving, have his head so muffled or wrapped up as to impede his seeing and hearing to the fullest possible extent."

The value of a rule to this effect will be at once apparent to all motorists. During the rains and the subsequent cold weather it is customary, especially at nights, for the drivers of both ticca gharries and private carriages to so wrap themselves up as to render the senses of sight and hearing almost useless. It is unnecessary to point out even to the meanest intelligence that by so attending to personal comfort they are constituting a grave danger to the public and laying themselves open to serious accident. A drive along Chowringhee when the theatres emit their patrons during the cold weather is enough to strain the nerves of the most hardened motorist. Last season I had an opportunity of discussing Calcutta traffic with several drivers from England and the Continent and they were almost unanimous in their condemnation of the practice at which my suggestion aims.

UNCONQUERED NEW GUINEA AND UNBEATEN BRITONS.

ALTHOUGH the expedition to Dutch New Guinea in 1910-11 under Mr. A. F. R. Wollaston, organised by the British Ornithologists' Union, did not succeed in reaching—let alone in ascending—the great central snowy range, yet it was by no means a total failure. For, as a matter of fact, it was the means of bringing to light a considerable number of species of birds and other creatures unknown to European science, while it has afforded a large amount of valuable information with regard to the anthropology of the country, more especially the pigmy tribe discovered by the explorers.

These discoveries, together with a general account of the expedition, have been recorded in a picturesque manner by Mr. Wollaston in a beautifully illustrated book published by Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co., under the title of "Pygmies and Papuans : the Stone-Age to-day in Dutch New Guinea."

Comparatively unknown as is New Guinea as a whole, that portion of the great island which is under the rule of Holland is the least explored of all. And although it is nearly three centuries ago since the Dutch navigator Jan Carstensz beheld the snowy range from the sea—no one, of course, believed his story—that mysterious mountain chain has to this day remained untrodden by the foot of man. It is true, indeed, that some three years ago Mr. Lorentz, a Dutch explorer, succeeded in reaching the snow-line on Mount Wilhelmina, an isolated peak some three hundred miles to the east, but this is by no means the same thing.

New Guinea is therefore still incicta; but she is not likely to remain so much longer if British pluck and British energy are able to prevail against climatic and other obstacles; and what British explorers are unable to accomplish is practically incapable of being effected by the members of any other nationality except under unusually fortunate opportunities.

Mr. Wollaston has, indeed, determined to have another trial at reaching the central snow; selecting, it may be presumed, a starting point which will give better promise of success than the one originally chosen. In his new venture the experiences of the first trip cannot fail to be of the very greatest value and assistance. He will, moreover, be accompanied by Mr. C. Boden Kloss, Curator of the Museum at Kuala Lumpur, a well-known explorer, who is thoroughly seasoned to the climate of the Malay countries, and who, it may therefore be hoped, will have the best possible chance of withstanding the still more trying climatic conditions that obtain in Papua. Our best hopes for success will follow both these plucky explorers and their companions.

Reverting to the consideration of the first expedition, as detailed in Mr. Wollaston's book, it appears that the author has but a very poor opinion of the intellectual capacity of the Papuans, this being specially exemplified by their lack of curiosity. When, for instance, the vessel which brought the expedition approached the coast a number of natives were permitted to come aboard; but although they had never previously seen a steamer, one casual glance down the sky-lights of the engine-room was quite sufficient to satisfy their curiosity, and for the remainder of their visit they were quite content to squat huddled together on deck begging for tobacco.

Although the complete isolation of the Papuans from other races added greatly to their interest from the anthropological point of view, it at the same time greatly increased the difficulty of establishing communication with them. For, unlike many savages, they display a strange lack of comprehending that their interrogators desire to learn their words and names for things.

"You may point at an object and look intelligent and expectant," writes Mr. Wollaston, "but they are slow to take your meaning, and they soon tire of giving information. The facial expression, which amongst us conveys even to a deaf man an interrogation, means nothing to them, nor has the sideways shake of the head a negative meaning to Papuans."

Very curious is the circumstance that, although they are able to count much higher, they have only words for one and two.

As with mankind in general, the chief occupation of the Papuans is the search for and acquisition of food, but as they have no thought for the morrow and no idea of the division of labour, the quest of nutriment becomes literally a hand-to-mouth business which occupies the chief attention of every member of the community.

Many of the villages have no cultivation of any kind; and the inhabitants have in consequence to depend upon the products of the jungle. When the rivers are in flood they frequently bring down the trunks of large trees in a particular state of decay, which contain the large white maggots of a beetle as large as a man's thumb. These luscious morsels are carefully hacked out of the rotten trunks with the aid of stone-axes and tomahawks, when they are either swallowed whole by the lucky finder like oysters, or are roasted in the fire and then eaten, each to his own taste, say we!

When the expedition first reached the country the inhabitants were in possession of only two or three small scraps of iron, so that they may be said to have been literally living in the stone-age.

For further details of these interesting and primitive people, our readers must be referred to the book itself, which will be found teeming with interest, and is delightfully written from start to finish, while the numerous illustrations are first rate.

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

The Princess of Wales's Stakes, like so many others of the big events of this present season, has gone to an outsider, Major Eustace Loder's little-fancied gelding Lance Chest having come home at the nice price of 20 to 1, beating Mr. T. Pilkington's Prince Palatine, who had just previously accounted for the Ascot Gold Cup in very easy fashion and who was consequently very well thought of for the one and a half mile contest at Newmarket. The price at which Mr. Pilkington's good horse started, 5 to 2 on, indicated very plainly what a good thing they thought this race was for him and they were fully entitled to do so on recent form, as he beat his field at Ascot in a common canter. Lance Chest's victory is some compensation to Major Eustace Loder for his disappointment with Coriander, who was expected to run very forward in the Derby but broke down in a gallop just before that race. Like the winner of the Princess of Wales's Stakes Coriander was also a Spearmint and as a two-year-old was first of all known as the Admiration colt. Lance Chest is by Spearmint out of Chestnut Sunday and was little known to fame as a two-year-old as he only won once. He was two or three times mentioned at a forlorn price for the Derby, but Coriander was all along known to be the stable's best. Lance Chest first was out at the Newmarket Spring Meeting last year and ran unplaced to Alope in the First Spring Two-Year-Old Stakes. Alope, it will be remembered, ran second to Tagalie in the One Thousand. Lance Chest was also unplaced when he ran in the Badminton Plate at York which race was won by Winstanley from Karelian and the colt by Hamburg out of Martha II. His only other effort was when he won the Hook Two-Year-Old Maiden Plate at Sandown in which Paradise was second and Omnibus third. Tagalie started for this race and was much fancied but finished down the course. Lance Chest has not shown much form until now, but by his present victory he has proved himself to be a good colt for he has defeated certainly one of the best of the four-year-olds in Prince Palatine. He is not unfortunately engaged in the Leger, Coriander and Mountain Mist being his owner's two sole representatives in that race.

The Joel luck is again beginning to give evidence of its continuance as Brother Jack's Lycaon (Cyllene—La Vierge) who finished second in the Leger last year to Prince Palatine and was beaten out of sight by that horse, has bobbed up serenely and won the London Cup beating Ruapana and Hayden. Lycaon started at 11 to 10 on and so the "family" must have had the money down. In the Two Thousand Guineas last year Lycaon ran third behind Sunstar and Stedfast. He only won once as a three-year-old, namely, the Gratwicke Stakes, 1½ mile, at Goodwood, in which he beat Quebec, St. Bruno, Narenta and Fair Eileen. When he started for the Leger he was fancied both by the stable and others also considered that he was very nearly the next best three-year-old to his own stable companion and he started second favourite, level with Prince Palatine, to King William who was at 6 to 4, the other two at 100 to 30. In the race Prince Palatine made backs of the lot of them and won pulling up by six lengths.

The Monsoon Racing prospects in Calcutta can now be very fairly gauged for with only three weeks before the first day on the 3rd August things are beginning to take a definite shape. There is no doubt whatever that we shall have some excellent racing and with a large number of horses present and more coming there is every prospect of some first-class sport. So far only seven days' racing are advertised—four in August and three in September, but it is considered extremely likely that with such good encouragement as is offering the Stewards will extend the Second Monsoon Meeting to four days also and give us another programme on the 21st September. The last advertised date so far is the 14th, but there will be plenty of horses to fill yet another day's racing, and more if necessary. The much-criticised sand-track has been this year greatly improved by the crop of grass that has been grown on top of it, but whilst they were about it we think it is a pity that the C.T.C. did not relay the last four furlongs which still have that solid brick flooring: the first three are laid with kunker foundation and a top dressing of sand and mould mixed. We shall never be persuaded that the fragile racehorse, or any other horse, was meant to gallop on a surface with a foundation like rock and out of which all resilience must necessarily have been taken. However, the bed of grass that has now been grown over it is a great advantage and will not only help to counteract the jar but will also keep the track in better order and render it less vulnerable to damage in wet weather. The going elsewhere in Calcutta, as it usually is in the early part of the Monsoon, is really excellent and trainers have no cause whatever for any complaint on this score. The weather, it is true, has been exceptionally trying but notwithstanding this all the horses that have summered in Calcutta and the immediate neighbourhood, like Barrackpore, are looking most astonishingly well and a number of them that were the reverse of right at the end of the cold weather racing season and seemed all to bits have picked up and put on good hard condition in spite of all the many supposed disadvantages of our Calcutta climate. Bloss' horses, for instance, are looking particularly well and one would hardly credit it that they have been here throughout the scorching days that we have had to face during the last six weeks to two months.

One thing that will make for good racing during the monsoons will be the large number of different interests represented and it will not be by any means a "one man show." We may not get any of the Poona lot and we do not think any one ever seriously expected that we should, when once it was decided to run that meeting, but there are plenty of horses without them, and plenty of owners also. Amongst the strings likely to be represented are Bloss' (Mr. Valentine's) with nearly twenty horses and ponies all likely to be seen out; Major Winter's, Captain Barrett's, Mr. Hilliard's and Mr. Platt's joint establishment which is located at Barrackpore and will total about nineteen all told Butlin's (for various owners) about seventeen when fully recruited and reinforced Scrubbing the surface of the teeth with powders or pastes does not thoroughly cleanse them; it leaves their condition, and that of the mouth unimproved.

What the teeth and mouth need is Odol, which antiseptically purifies the mouth, and, being liquid, penetrates even the minutest cracks and crevices, cleansing every part of all the teeth, —not merely where they show.

by some that are coming from Bangalore about the end of this month; "Mr. Roland" has six; Mr. Evers about eight; Walker about seven at present; Mr. Tanner two; Oakley probably about three; Mr. J. D. Scott probably about six also; Captain K. Robertson and Major Bennett a few each; Beedham probably three or four; and there are a good number of singletons and doubletons such as Major A. Smith, who succeeded Major Raymond at Belgatchia and whose two ponies probably Mr. S. G. McCall will look after; Captain Power; Mr. Shillingford and a whole host of local owners whose horses have recently been seen out doing battle at the local gymkhana meetings at Tollygunge. There will also be plenty of G. R.'s and we hear of several jockeys coming to swell the present local contingent which is not very large and is confined to Williamson, C. Bloss, Lansdowne, W. White and a few more. We hear, however, that Ruiz and Northmore are certain to come down and that J. Davis, M. Davis, Trahan, O'Neill, possibly Bland and several others are all arranging to be here about the end of the month.

There is a certain amount of work doing on the course and on cloudy mornings some trainers have been tempted to indulge their charges with a little medium-paced work with occasional short spurts "all-out." The going, as already noted, is excellent everywhere and at present, therefore, trainers are more or less independent of the course and are able to go along anywhere, as it is all equally good. A short run through the lists of those that are here and also likely to be coming will, we opine, be of interest to owners both here and up-country as it will give them some sort of an idea of the class of form that they are likely to have to meet.

Mr. Bloss commands the biggest brigade and "Mr. Valentine," if force majeure can achieve aught, should manage to pick up a good few races. Almost all these horses are looking extremely well and unless we knew to the contrary it would be hard to believe that they have been here all through the hot weather. The majority of them look big and hard and carry a good bloom on them though there are of course one or two of the unthrifty and some of them also are more or less newly landed. The list is as follows: Cherry Hackle, who was not sweating freely up to a few days ago, has now taken a turn in the right direction. Bushey Dane, very bright and well and twice the mare she was in the cold weather; Runaway Girl well; Pressy ditto and taking kindly to jumping, she being destined for hurdle races; Realm quite sound again and looking better than he has ever looked; Chin Chin wonderfully improved and she has lost all that tucked-up appearance she wore at the end of the cold weather season; Circus Girl as round as ever; May Kenley vastly improved and very big and well; Lady Ratcliffe, Ngkappa, Edwards, all looking well, latter two being jumped; Bonny Boy fairly well; Haut Park rather angular but looking bright; Dutch Packet and Nakmagower, two new ones, not likely to race yet awhile; Haloya very much as he always is and only just recovering from skin disease; Peter Pan, Water Lily, Holstream by Holbrook out of Streamlet, a big bay horse and a bay gelding by Woodlark complete this lot. It is a good show all round.

Major Winter also does all his work at Barrackpore and has got the old racecourse into some sort of order for work has not yet got his full muster. Amongst those that he has are old Confederation (late Admiral Crichton), Winsome, Clear Out, Politesse, Devon, who is not intended for these meetings and a few more. Captain Barrett's and Mr. Hilliard's horses, to the number of about half a dozen, arrive this week so we understand. Both Politesse and Winsome are looking nice and bright.

Mr. Evers, when he gets his string together, will have the following horses and ponies: Rupert, Convent Girl, Rifleman, Farthing Bun, Late Light, Hard Times, Mighty Atom (a half-sister to Farthing Bun and said to be promising), Mary Jane by Laveno out of Sainte Marquise, a mare Mr. Galstaun imported and subsequently sent home again to the stud; and old Marionette.

"Mr. Roland," whose successes with Lasso are always amongst the pleasant surprises, has the faithful chestnut and also old Sacristan II, Marmalade III, another light of other days: Tana, J. E. A. and Village Girl. "Mr. Roland" is an enthusiast but we think he has at any rate two lame ducks in this "fleet"!

Butlin, we are glad to see, has plenty of patrons and after all the buffets of fortune that he has sustained it is pleasant to see the sturdy old veteran well on his legs again, even though one of them is not one of the soundest! He has a very nice handy little string and if it is reinforced by Sholto, Wassail and First Love—a nice mare and very promising—as it probably will be by the end of July, it will possess a formidable fighting line. The horses already in Butlin's charge are the following:—Light Metal, Best China, Grazie (by Galloping Lad out of Jenny Creeper); Lady Leonard (by Sir Leonard; she is owned by Mr. Johnston Stewart, H.L.I., and has run in Military chases up-country); Scottie by Scots Grey; Daisy Priam; Skipper; Peer Ray; Ormley; Alton; Survivor; Culverin; Joy and Jack Sheppard. Butlin as usual has a good many jumpers and will be well represented in the closed races. Some of these horses are for sale, amongst them Skipper, who was performing at Tollygunge last Saturday, a useful sort for the closed races and paperchasing.

Walker has his old friend Moira and Glenora, Rosebud, Frank, The Priory, Girton Girl and Rameses who has not been winning out of her turn, but is, we hear, looking very well.

Mr. Tanner has Hobson's Choice and Jaguar; Mr. Steele-Perkins' Sincerity, and there are many other horses of the Tollyguge Club class, some of whom we saw out last Saturday.

Oakley is down, but it is not yet known what he will have for the Monsoons. Amongst the horses in his charge are Fidelio; Blue Light; Yum Yum; Make Haste III.; Pyers Mostyn and First Bell. Pyers Mostyn and Yum Yum will probably run here.

Jack Scott is due towards the end of the month and, they say, will bring down Proprietor, Craigendorrie, Red Tape, Sea Lad, Lady Vera and some others, but we must await the event. He will be in his old quarters at 225, Lower Circular Road.

The second Tollygunge Gymkhana Club meeting was run on Saturday last and provided a very good day's sport on the whole though in half the races fields were on the small side. There were two jump races on the card and in the event over hurdles only three started, whilst in the pony steeplechase only two out of an entry of five faced the starter. The racing was not altogether without incident and there were one or two surprises, some of which came to the help of the ringmen, who must have had a fair day on the whole. Their Excellencies the Governor and Lady Carmichael and staff attended the meeting and remained until just before the last race, when they left by motor. The Black Watch band played on the lawn throughout the afternoon and there was a much better attendance than on the opening day. The hurdle race came first and they made Skipper a very hot favourite and it won comfortably though had Sincerity run more kindly, she might have made a race of it. For the chase Alton was backed at 5 to 2 on, but he cut it at the second last fence when he had the race in hand and brushed his jockey off against the wing, leaving Meprise to finish alone. The Cavalry Cup was another upset, as Mr. Pickwick looked good on the previous week's performance, but five furlongs was too far for him and he was beaten all the way by the winner Dick, who was nicely ridden by Mr. Sayers. Another favourite, Dot II., went down in the Polo Scurry and there was a hot set-to between Queen of Spain, who was second favourite, and the 10 to 1 chance Irish Girl, the former winning a neck. The bulk of the public was on to Jaguar for the Russa Stakes, but the horse ran none too kindly, so it is said, and was beaten a neck. He was late away and late in coming at the finish. The best field of the day went for the Pony Cup, which was won by the 6 to 1 chance Reuben, the favourites Marjorie and Water Lily entirely failing to connect. Details appear elsewhere.

The following teams have entered for the Bangalore Polo Tournament which begins on the 16th instant:—7th Hussars "A" and "B" teams, 20th Deccan Horse, 2nd Sappers and Miners, Mysore Imperial Service Lancers, and Mysore Silladar Horse.

The Inter-Regimental Polo Tournament was concluded at Hurlingham on the 6th instant when the Royal Horse Guards beat the 20th Hussars in the final by 9 goals to 3.

The Leicester Regiment have once more won the Madras Hockey Tournament, beating the 43rd Oxford and Bucks L.I. by 4 goals to 2 in the final on the 6th instant.

The Quetta Handicap Tournament was brought to a conclusion on the 28th ultimo. We gave results of the earlier rounds last week and publish details of the semi-finals and finals to-day. In the penultimate round the 23rd Cavalry "B" team (+2) beat the Staff College Senior Cavalry (+1) by 3 to 2; and the Royal Irish Fusiliers (+2) beat the Gymkhana "A" team (+4) by 6 to 5. The Final between the Fusiliers and the 23rd Cavalry ended in a win for the former by 5 goals to 4.

The situation as regards military polo remains uncertain, if not somewhat strained, writes the Times. It will be remembered that a circular letter, signed by the president of the Army Polo Committee found its way into the Press. It has been explained that the letter was misinterpreted, and it is understood that a second letter has been issued confidentially by the president of the Army Polo Committee which was intended to dispel the misapprehension caused by the first letter. It is, however, open to doubt whether it has succeeded in doing so, and the whole question as to whether the regulations which govern the playing of polo by officers in London do not stand in need of revision is brought to the front.

It may be said at once that feeling in the Service is in favour of doing away with all restrictions as to the amount of polo which officers may play in London; and if the Army Polo Committee is of another opinion, then this body does not represent the feelings of its constituents. The Household Cavalry regiments naturally enjoy unlimited facilities for practice in London, and, this being so, it may not be obvious why regiments quartered in other parts of the country should be precluded from enjoying equal latitude so far as their duties and other conditions may allow.

The two dominant factors of the situation are professional efficiency and expense. In the case of a regiment which is quartered at a station where the opportunities for practice are negligible or inadequate, a desire to secure as much practice as possible in fast games in London is only natural. This can be obtained at an expenditure which returns the best value that can be had, and if officers choose to spend their leisure and means in this way it is hard to see why they should not do so within reason. The commanding officer should be the sole, as he is also the best, judge as to the point at which liberty might degenerate into deleterious excess. He is solely responsible for the efficiency of his unit, which, if he is competent, he is not likely to imperil. It is no argument to say that if one commanding officer allows his officer to arrange to practise a good deal in London—which he may easily do without detriment—therefore another commanding officer must allow the same measure of liberty; in the case of the latter, owing to a combination of circumstances, it might not be justifiable.

A concrete instance may be quoted of a commanding officer who adopted—in India—a bold but unassailable attitude. His unit was on important manœuvres, and he applied for a month's leave for four of his officers in order that they might play in polo tournaments. The General asked him if he could spare them, and his reply was that he would not think very highly of his unit or himself if he could not do so. The leave was granted, and incidentally it may be added that his team won both the tournaments in which they played. It is the natural desire of every commanding officer that as many as possible of his officers should be entered to the game. To sacrifice this object to an attempt to secure four players capable of winning the inter-regimental would be a blunder without excuse. But equally to say that the Inter-Regimental Cup is less necessary to the welfare of Army polo than the Oxford and Cambridge match is to University cricket is to talk nonsense.

It is recognized without any pangs of jealousy or invidious comparison that some regiments have more means and therefore better ponies than others; and moreover this inequality is not infrequently adjusted by the fact that the worse ponies are ridden by the better players. This was proved, to take one instance, by the result of the final tie for the Inter-Regimental Cup at Hurlingham last year. It would be an irritating irony if, when an attitude of sympathetic encouragement has been established in Whitehall, the Army Polo Committee should fetter freedom with red-tape.

Over 150 athletes will represent America in the Olympic Games at Stockholm. Every section of the country is represented from college, club and school. The track and field men number 98 and the remainder is made up of cyclists, swimmers, rifle shots, fencers, horsemen, wrestlers, a gymnast, an oarsman and a tennis champion. The committee responsible for the selections have spent much time over their work, but, as has been the case in every other country, they have come in for much adverse criticism. On looking through the list, however, it does not appear that any of the star performers have been left out, the biggest surprise, perhaps, being that J. M. Rosenberger, the Irish American A. C. representative, who has many excellent performances to his credit up to a quarter mile, has only got into the supplemental list of the 400 metres. In the sprints there are several men who are well-known in England, not least of all being the Rhodes scholar and Oxford Blue R. L. Lange, and R. C. Craig, who has improved a great deal since his solitary appearance in England H. P. Drew is a high school boy who has recently been doing phenomenal performances, and C. L. Reidpath, from Syracuse University, has shown such form that he has been preferred to the old champions. Melvin Sheppard, the well-known athlete, is in the 400 metres, in which J. E. Meredith of Mercersberg is found, and is expected to do great things

When Harry Gissing and T. J. Halpin are only considered good enough to be included in the supplementary list, then America must be well off in the middle distances. Sheppard, of course, is among the certainties, he having well maintained his form of four years ago, but it is from the newcomer that success is anticipated. There is besides Meredith already referred to, J. P. Jones of Cornell University, who not so long ago had a fancy for getting among the records at and about a mile. His performances were good enough for him to be starred as a prospective winner, but the efforts of A. R. Kiviat, from the Irish American School, are quite fresh in memory, smashing as he did, the Olympic records for 1,500 metres.

In the longer distances an old warrior, George Bonhag, will be relied upon, the new men supporting him, being W. J. Kramer, Long Island, L. J. Scott, South Paterson, and the Indian who is credited with wonderful running, L. Tewanima. The latter is also in the Marathon, in which Mike Ryan, who has given us a taste of his abilities, is again found among the certain starters.

Smithson, the Olympic record holder, is missing from the hurdles and G. Chisholm, who went over with Yale and Harvard in the last match against Oxford and Cambridge at Queen's Club is only supplementary. Another Irish American, who has been showing good form over the timber, J. J. Elles, jun., finds a place. G. L. Horine, Stamford University, the hero of the leap of 6 feet 8¼ inches, is, of course, a first choice in the high jump, though many critics are of the opinion that he will not repeat this feat at Stockholm, and it is significant that in a meet since this great jump he had difficulty in clearing 6 feet. P. Adams, New York A. C., is a newcomer who has been jumping well and also showing good form in the various field events, in nearly all of which he figures. The American authorities have adopted the policy of the A. A. A. by having their long distance track men also in the cross country race.

C. W. Daniels has apparently carried out his threat to retire from competition, for he is a notable absentee from the swimming team which includes

P. McGillivray, Illinois; Duke Kahanamoku, Philippines; H. B. Hebner, Chicago; M. McDermot, Chicago; G. Gardzik, Chicago; and W. McAlerman, New York. The team's expenses amount to £23,000, which has all been publicly subscribed. About a hundred supplementary athletes have also been chosen, who can accompany the team at their own expense if they so desire.

It is expected that England and Sweden will be the principal rivals, but there is the utmost confidence in America that the United States will carry off the majority of the prizes. Indians competing are Sockalexis in the Marathon race, Tewanima in the Marathon, and 10,000 metres, and Jim Thorpe in the 110-metre hurdle race, the running high jump, the running board jump, hop, step, and jump, putting the shot with the right and left hands, and the pentathlon and decathlon.

Thorpe is expected to prove the biggest surprise of the American team, for he is the greatest all-round athlete America has produced. He is a student at the Carlisle Indian School, maintained by the Federal Government.

The Stadium at Stockholm was opened by the King of Sweden on the 6th instant—the ceremony being witnessed by immense crowds. His Majesty and the Crown Prince both made speeches of welcome and there was a grand march past of all the athletes competing, who paraded in groups representing their countries. Several of the games have been put through up to date and the American team looks like carrying all before them. In the 100 metres sprint they supplied the first three men—R. C. Craig 1; Meyer 2; Lippincott 3. Patching, the South African, who recently won the A. A. A. 100 yards Championship at Stamford Bridge, in record time was fourth. Craig won by 2 feet, inches separating the others. Time—10⅘secs. In the 800 metres race after winning six out of the eight places in the preliminary heats the Americans finished first, second, and third—J. S. Meredith 1; M. Sheppard 2; Davenport 3. Time—1min. 51⅕secs. Other American successes were the running High Jump, won by Richards, who cleared 6ft. 4ins.; second in the Ten Thousand Metres, Tewanima, the Indian runner, finishing close behind Kolemainen. Sweden is also doing well at the games. Lemming won the Javelin competition with a record throw of 60·64 metres; while the Swedish team won the team competition in connection with the Cycle Race round Lake Maeler, England second and America third. The Tug-of-War also went to Sweden, who beat the London City Police team at the first pull, the latter being disqualified in the second pull for sitting. Swedish competitors also won all the prizes in the Miniature Rifle Shooting contests for individuals at 25 metres and the team competition at the same range. The 200 miles Cycling Race round Lake Maeler was won by Lewis, the South African, with Grubb (England) second and Schutte (America) third. One hundred and thirty-five started and the time was 10hrs. 42mins. 39secs. The Ten Thousand Metres Race went to Kolemainen (Finland) who ran magnificently, leading throughout and winning in 31mins. 20⅕secs.—a world's record. Tewanina (America) was second, Stenroos (Finland) third, and Keeper (Canada) fourth. Triolitiras, a Greek, won the standing Broad Jump with a leap of 3·37 metres.

The preliminary heats for the 100 metres swimming provided a world's time record—Kahamamoker, the Honolulu representative of America, winning easily in 1min. 2⅗secs., beating Longworth, the Australian.

The successes of Great Britain so far, apart from the football, have been second in the Miniature Rifle Shooting; second in the 200 miles cycling; and first in the 400 metres relay race; Great Britain won in 42 4-10 seconds, Sweden being second in 42 6-10 seconds. Germany and America were disqualified.

Great Britain has won the Miniature Rifle competition at the Olympic Games, America finishing third. Sweden won both the "running deer" competitions and also the team pistol firing. In this latter Russia was second, Great Britain third and America fourth. In the final of the Olympic Lawn Tennis Doubles Kitson and Winslow of South Africa beat Pipes and Zborzil of Austria by 4—6, 6—1, 6—2, 6—2. The victory was a most popular one

In the Singles Championship Winslow (South Africa) beat Kitson (South Africa) by 7—5, 4—6, 10—8, 8—6.)

In the Ladies' Lawn Tennis Singles Mme. Broquedis (France) won the final, defeating Mme. Koering (Germany) 4—6, 6—3, 6—4.

In the football competition, the semi-finals were played off on the 2nd instant, Denmark defeating Holland by 4 goals to 1 and Great Britain defeating Finland by 4 goals to nil. The final was played last Thursday, Great Britain beating Denmark 4—2.

The Golf Championship of France was concluded at La Boulie on the 2nd instant and ended in a win for Gassiat with 289, H. Vardon was second with 290 and Tellier third with 291.

The French Amateur Golf Championship has been won by Scott, the Australian, who beat MacFarlane of Scotland in the final by 8 up and 7 to play last Sunday.

The English Tennis Championships at Wimbledon attracted much attention last week. In the Singles Championship A. W. Gore beat Gobert by 9—7, 2—6, 7—5, 6—1, but was beaten by the holder, Wilding, in the Challenge round 6—4, 6—4, 4—5, 6—4. The doubles final ended in a win for Roper Barrett and Dixon who beat Parke and Beamish 6—8, 6—4, 3—6, 6—3, 6—4. They then met the holders, Decugis and Gobert and beat them 3—6, 6—3, 6—4, 7—5. In the Ladies' Singles finals Mme. Lascombe beat Mme. Sterry 6—3, 6—1. The holder did not defend her title.

In the mixed doubles final Parke and Mme. Lascombe beat Prebble and Miss Boothby 6—4, 6—2.

The fourth of the Triangular Test matches was begun at Leeds on the 8th instant. The weather was fine, there was a big crowd, but the wicket was on the soft side. England had first lease of the wickets and put up 242, Woolley scoring 57. The South Africans then went in and had made 141 for 8 when stumps were drawn.

In our English sporting letter this week we publish details of the boxing match for the Welter Weight Championship between Johnny Summers and Arthur Evernden, ending in an easy win for Summers. For some time there have been difficulties in the way of this championship. The holder of the Lonsdale belt, Young Josephs, had recently been defeated several times in other matches and an eliminating competition was also unsuccessful. Eventually Josephs and Evernden were matched, but the former would not agree to the offered terms and had to return the Lonsdale belt. Thereupon Evernden was matched with Summers with the result noted above.

Those who expected Jim Flynn to beat Jack Johnson in the fight for the Heavy Weight Championship at Los Vegas on Independence Day, must have been disappointed, for the fight only went nine rounds when it was stopped by the police. From the short telegraphic account received Flynn never at any time seemed to have the smallest chance of victory, for we read that Johnson was smiling throughout the contest and indulged in many sarcastic remarks at his opponent's expense, frequently leaving his stomach unguarded "to be punched." Flynn, who was badly punished, was frequently cautioned for butting Johnson. Johnson has again announced his intention of retiring from the ring in September. Five years ago Johnson knocked out Flynn in the eleventh round of a bout held at San Francisco in which the present titleholder burlesqued for ten rounds and then administered a quick finish.

Another world's fistic championship was also brought off at Los Angelos on the 4th July, when "Joe" Rivers lasted out 13 rounds with Wolgast in the fight for the World's Light Weight Championship.

Reuter announces the death in England on the 4th instant of the famous bowler Tom Richardson, who used to play for Surrey county. Born in 1870 Richardson learned his cricket at Mitcham and first played for Surrey in 1892 (vs. Essex at the Oval when he took 6 wickets for 45 and 6 for 55): in first-class cricket in 1892 he took 29 wickets for 602 runs; in 1893, 172 for 2,680; in 1894, 196 for 2,024; in 1895, 290 (a record) for 4,170; in 1896, 246 for 4,016; in 1897, 273 for 3,945; in 1898, 161 for 3,177; in 1899, 98 for 2,585; in 1900, 122 for 2,949; in 1901, 159 for 3,697; in 1902, 106 for 2,607; in 1903, 119 for 2,732; in 1900, 115 for 2,596; in 1905, 8 for 300, after which he retired from first-class cricket. He represented England in 14 test matches vs. Australia and in these took 88 wickets for 2,220 runs with an average of 25·22; his first appearance for England was at Manchester 24th August 1893, when he took 5 wickets for 49 and 5 for 107; he visited Australia in 1894-95 with A. E. Stoddart's team, heading the bowling averages in eleven-a-side matches with 68 wickets and an average of 23·52; he was again with Stoddart's team in 1897-98 when in all matches he took 65 wickets for 1,731 runs. In 1894 he took all ten wickets in an innings when playing for Surrey against Essex at the Oval and three times took over 200 wickets in a season—290 in 1895, 273 in 1897 and 246 in 1896. As a fast bowler Richardson had few equals and probably no superior. On a warm wicket he was in those days unplayable and when in form with a wicket to suit him he was in his element as much as the opposing batsmen were out of theirs. He was a bowler pure and simple, but occasionally he delighted the crowd at Lord's where he was a great favourite with a slogging exhibition.

Appended are the results of important cricket matches played in England last week:—

Sussex beat Leicester at Brighton by an innings and 151 runs.

Kent beat Essex at Gravesend by 256 runs.

Lancashire beat Worcestershire at Manchester by an innings and 181 runs.

Oxford University beat H. D. G. Leveson-Gower's Eleven at Eastbourne by an innings and 38 runs.

Derby drew with Northants at Chesterfield.

Australians drew with Yorkshire at Sheffield.

South Africans drew with Middlesex at Lord's.

In these three matches the first-named eleven led on the first innings.

In the Gloucester vs. Notts match no play was possible.

The match between Surrey and Hampshire at the Oval ended in a pointless draw.

Notts beat Derby at Nottingham by an innings and 147 runs.

Kent beat Surrey at the Oval by nine wickets.

South Africans beat Warwickshire at Birmingham by six wickets.

Hampshire beat Oxford University at Southampton by an innings and 68 runs.

Lancashire beat Australians at Liverpool by eight wickets.

Cambridge beat the M. C. C. at Lord's by two wickets.

Yorkshire beat Worcestershire at Dewsbury by 214 runs.

Essex gained a first innings victory over Sussex at Leyton.

The annual dinner of the Shikar Club took place at the Savoy Hotel on Friday of last week, when the Lord of Lonsdale presided over a gathering of distinguished sportsmen. The chairman, in the course of his speech, said the club had been founded at a time when game was being slaughtered for trade purposes, and measures were taken in South Africa to prevent the continuation of wholesale destruction. They were all present as sportsmen, which meant that they never killed any animal except for the sake of sport. At the present time the club numbers 243 members, which includes eight honorary members.

There has just been mounted in the Royal Natural History Museum, Stuttgart, the largest mammoth skeleton ever discovered. It was found in August, 1910, at Steinheim, in the diluvial deposits of the River Murr, a tributary of the Neckar, in Swabia. The skull weighs nearly three-quarters of a ton, and the upper fore-leg is 4 feet 6 inches long. After months of searching a nearly complete skeleton was obtained. The specimen shows abnormal length of the legs, indicating a swift-moving animal, and the general lightness of frame suggests activity. The tusks are well-shaped, with a slight semi-circular curve, but are much less in size than the normal type, being only 7½ feet in length, whereas many of the Siberian and American specimens have tusks double that size. It is supposed to be a late type of the diluvian mammoth at a period when the transition to the smaller and more active elephant species was commencing.

London Week by Week.

London, Friday, 21st June 1912.

At last some attempt is to be made to deal with the vandals who disfigure the earth and make hideous the prospect in and around London by the exhibition of advertisements. An interesting series of by-laws for the regulation of advertisements disfiguring the natural beauty of landscapes has been submitted to the London County Council.

These by-laws, which have been made under the Advertisement Regulation Act, 1907, will prevent the erection of bill-posting stations in any neighbourhood where they are likely to interfere with the view or to disfigure the general outlook. They provide that:—

No person shall exhibit any advertisement within forty yards of any open space contained in the schedule, so that such advertisement or hoarding shall be seen by any person in the open space in question.

No person shall exhibit at a height of more than thirty feet from the ground any illuminated advertisement or any advertisement which exceeds twenty feet in length, so that such advertisement may be seen by any person in the open space.

No person shall exhibit any advertisement in such a place or in such a manner as to disfigure the natural beauty of the landscapes mentioned in the second schedule.

The first schedule contains nearly all the parks and open spaces in the metropolitan area, and applies to all the cemeteries and burial grounds. It includes such places as Trafalgar-square, Hyde Park, and Gray's Inn.

The landscapes mentioned in the second schedule include:—

View of the River Thames, the Tower Bridge, St. Paul's Cathedral, the House of Parliament, and the northern heights of London from Blackheath.

A panoramic view of London from Tower Bridge to Westminster from Brockwell Park.

Views of Sydenham-hill, Crystal Palace, and Dulwich College from Dulwich Park.

Views of the Bucks hills from Windsor to Harrow, the Herts hills, over London, including the principal buildings, the Surrey hills, and the Crystal Palace from Hampstead Heath.

Views of the Tower Bridge, St. Paul's Cathedral, the Houses of Parliament, and Westminster from Peckham Rye Park and Peckham Rye.

The by-laws, which, worse luck, will not apply for five years to any hoarding at present in use, will have to be submitted to the Home Secretary for his approval.

On Monday the Horse Show, which is international in character as well as in name, opened its fortnight's season at Olympia with every promise of another big social success in spite of the clashing with the Ascot week. Olympia has been transformed into a gigantic flower garden, and never, probably, has the terracing of the big arena looked so well. The United States, Belgium, and France, Germany, Russia, Italy, Austria, and Holland, have sent representatives, while a new and notable feature this year is the parade of typical representatives of English and Continental breeding of horses and ponies.

The world has been ransacked to make this feature attractive, and among the 100 horses that take part in the parade are the cream horses that draw the King's coach on occasions of State ceremonial, the coaching mare Woodland Queen, from the royal stables at Hampton Court, the Jutland and Percheron heavy horses from Denmark and France, and many other types.

The jumping contests in which the Army officers compete have the same jumps as last year, viz., bush, hurdle, gate, poles, railway sleepers, wall, and double gate, such as are to be found at railway level crossing.

The stabling is even more elaborate than ever, and excellent arrangements have been made in the annexe for accommodating all the animals that are to take part in the parade.

The Horse Show, as it stands, represents an expenditure of £50,000, including amounts for the entertainment of the foreign competitors. The total sum offered in prizes is no less than £13,500, £10,000 of which is in actual cash, while the balance was represented by trophies.

Mr. W. H. Moore, the well-known American judge and sportsman, is the foremost exhibitor. He has sent close on 50 horses and a large number of vehicles, from a road coach to a light harness buggy. Other noted exhibitors are Prince Alexander of Teck, Mr. Walter Winans, Mr. A. C. Vanderbilt, the Countess of Warwick, Viscountess Cole, Mr. George Cornwallis West, and Viscount Falmouth.

For a considerable number of years oarsmen competing at Henley have been dissatisfied with the course, which, they state, greatly favours the crew on the Bucks shore. Considerably more races have been won from that station than the Berks, and last year, in four days' racing, thirty-two victories were scored from there to twenty-one from Berks—practically three in five.

This year the stewards are making an attempt to do away with the inequality, and for that reason they are moving the booms on the Bucks shore ten feet nearer those on the Berks side. This will cause the Bucks crew to row a little further, whilst when the famous "Bushes wind" prevails the crews will not obtain so much shelter as hitherto.

It is thought that this will make the stations much fairer, and the experiment will be watched with interest.

The alteration will make the course ninety feet wide at its narrowest point; but as two eights, with their oars fully extended, occupy only fifty feet at the most, there will be ample room for two boats to race side by side.

Under the heading, "The Reign of Terror," a remarkable advertisement appeared in the Times this week from Mr. John Lloyd, J.P. It says that he is the victim of a serious motor accident, and asks for the formation of a strong society to protect life and secure safety in the streets. It adds:—

To-day's Times, 18th June, records two quite young children killed and a third injured to the point of death.

Are the London streets reasonably safe, or have the hourly risks of traffic-dodging reached a point at which action by the authorities is imperative? The question may be well asked to-day.

The pedestrian has the first right to the road. But the enormous increase in the number of motor vehicles, combined with the all-round acceleration of pace, leave him very little room in the busier streets. And he does not have that little long. More and more the middle-aged and elderly are finding that their one chance of getting anywhere is to dive through the narrow gaps between fast-movingly vehicles, across roads that are wider than they used to be.

We are by next year to see another 2,500 motor 'buses added to the present stream of 2,000 of these peculiarly terrifying vehicles. The cheapening of motor-cars and the taxicab habit will swell the mighty tide of the streets, and it is estimated that we shall have 5,000 more of them. How grave the problem of the streets is to the public can be seen from these facts:—

Last year over 400 persons were killed in London streets, 155 by motor-cars and taxicabs, 107 by motor-buses, and 26 by electric tramcars.

Ten thousand persons were knocked down by motor vehicles in the same period.

The death roll quoted was higher than that recorded from the same causes in twenty-four other counties and towns with a total population of 16,000,000.

Up to the present the number of traffic victims in London shows a considerable increase on the same period of last year.

For years the London County Council have tried in vain to induce the Government to create a traffic board, which a Royal Commission recommended. Since the first appeal was made 3,000 persons have been killed in London streets.

It was an idea worthy of Mr. Frohman to revive Sir Arthur Pinero's farcical romance, "The Amazons," at the Duke of York's with a "star" cast, just in the very height of the season. The play is specially suited to such treatment, though Miss Ellis Jeffreys, who is, of course, far the most accomplished actress, has too little to do, as the eccentric Marchioness of Castlejordan, whose whim was to bring up her three daughters as boys. The three daughters were played by Miss Pauline Chase and Miss Phyllis Neilson-Terry, who each have a song to sing, and Miss Marie Lohr, who can act, and played the boy with capital spirit—to the manner born. Of course, the play opens just at the psychological moment when the three girl-boys (they wear, in the seclusion of Overcote tweed knickerbocker suitings or riding breeches), unlike Miss Bus and Miss Beale as the rhyme goes, Cupid's darts begin to feel. There are two comic lovers for the younger sisters, and one real, gallant lover for the eldest sister. The two comic lovers are played by Mr. Dion Boucicault and Mr. Weedon Grossmith. Mr. Boucicault gives a dashing study of a little stage Frenchman, full of carefully made points and characteristic business; Mr. Weedon Grossmith gives a study, exquisitely finished and exquisitely funny, of an English lord, "bred a bit too fine," as Lord Tommy puts it—the Englishman of French caricature.

The way in which Mr. Grossmith managed to put fresh life into the repetition of the same joke (Sir Arthur Pinero is far too adroit a dramatist not to know the value of constant repetition) was little short of marvellous. All London will be obliged to go and see him endeavour vainly to climb the rope in the gymnasium, to see him crawl through the bushes into "The Tangle," to see his face when he is effusively kissed by the Frenchman. There is no doubt that the whole production will prove an enormous success, for who will not want to see, besides the exquisite fun of Mr. Weedon Grossmith, Miss Jeffreys and Miss Marie Lohr acting delightfully, to hear Miss Pauline Chase and Miss Phyllis Neilson-Terry singing, especially when those three tremendous young favourites are to be seen in a variety of dress ranging from tweed knickerbockers and riding breeches and gymnasium kit to the most delicious frocks? The idea of reviving "The Amazons" was certainly a stroke of genius on the part of Mr. Frohman. A lady was heard to put the following invidious poser to her friend in the pit: "Yes, but which would you rather see—'The Amazons' with this cast or a good play?" "Great Heavens!" was the expressive and contemptuous reply—as if there could have been any doubt about it for a single instant.

The long-expected production of "The Children of Don" took place at the London Opera House on Saturday evening; and I cannot recall any opera which was received with so little enthusiasm, nor one which caused such lively regret. It is a misfortune for British opera, from which it will not recover for years. The new work had everything in its favour—and yet it is doomed. Perhaps, however, good may come of evil, for it teaches a salutary lesson. It shows convincingly that what British composers lack is a sense of the theatre. It would not be possible, for an opera in any other country to fail in precisely the same way as "The Children of Don," or for the reasons which proved fatal to it. Our composers lack the dramatic instinct, but because they have fewer chances of developing it—and will not use those they have got. They will not go to opera when they can. They think it is enough to read scores at home, and scoff at them, and say the public is sick of them.

M. Charpentier's music is incredibly undramatic. As music pure and simple, it has merits—it is clever, it has life-blood, the scoring, though it suffers from excess, is brilliantly resourceful. It is, however, eccentric and unmelodious, and the composer's sense of beauty and finish is undeveloped. Yet, with all these deductions, it remains the music of a man who cannot be dismissed without consideration. As an illustration of an operatic text it is of no practical use; as a setting of that particular text it is impossible.

The subject of Lord Howard de Walden's drama is a noble one—nothing less than the redemption of man from the tyranny of the powers of darkness. The text may have its faults—it lacks the dramatic sense quite as much as the music does—but it has some qualities of dignity and imagination. The comings and goings of the characters are managed ineffectively. The scenes do not work to climaxes, and the personages have not much real life blood. But worse texts have inspired good operas, because the composers have supplied the lacking dramatic element and the musical characterisation. The faults of the music of "The Children of Don" go deeper still, however. What character the music has is totally at variance with that of the text. It is always raging and fuming, and suggests nothing so much as a succession of "red-fool furies." In Mr. Holbrooke's Symphonic Poems one has often pointed to the lack of apparent design—they have been censured for sounding as if he had taken a poem and then set each little section of it by itself, fixing his mind on its outward meaning, and not searching for its inner significance. In "The Children of Don" we have this tendency intensified tenfold. There is not a scene in which we get the impression that it has been viewed steadily and viewed whole, with an intention of fixing and trying to find a musical equivalent for its main idea. Every sentence seems to have been taken separately and set to music as if it were the climax, with the result that there is no real climax anywhere, except in the orchestral interludes, which are like oases in the desert. Let no one say this is a result of a study of Wagner, or even of Strauss. It can only come from a complete misunderstanding of their real artistic principles.

The singers did all they could. Mlle. Jomelli, Mr. Alan Turner, Mme. Doria, and Signor Boxano may be singled out for special praise. The drama offers little scope for acting, but in this respect, too, they did their best. The scenery, designed by Mr. Sime, is apparently original and artistic, but the authorities kept the stage so dark that one could hardly once see the face of anyone there. It is supposed to be a philistine thing to ask for light in these days, but no drama can have an effect unless the facial expression of the actor can be seen. The only thing we did see was the one thing which should have been hidden—the device representing the metamorphosis of Gwydion into a wolf.

It is difficult to find adequate words of praise for the playing of the orchestra or the conducting of Nikisch.

"Aaa," by Lechmere Warral., is drawing splendid houses at the Criterion. When a young lady says, "Wal, I guess that's jest the lim-mut" and hides what she calls a "nightie" under the sofa-cushion by way of practical joke on a young man whom she proposes to marry, she must needs be a very bewitching young lady to carry it off. But after five minutes of Miss Renee Kelly you know that she can carry off anything with her pretty pouting lips, her unflagging spirits, her wheedling ways, her swift fawn-like movements, her all-conquering American fun.

This little enchantress appears in a rather absurd play, which asks you to take a good deal for granted. As, for instance, that a young man of seven-and-twenty, who has written "the novel of the season" full of views about women, has in fact never kissed any other woman than his mother. Also, that an American woman-journalist would force an entry into her "subject's" flat by the fire-escape and would then, after "interviewing" him, proceed to play off a series of pranks designed to estrange him from a lady to whom he is engaged in order that she may marry him herself. But the absurdities of the play really do not matter. Its sufficient justification is that it serves as a pretext for the witcheries of Miss Renee Kelly, who carries it all triumphantly off. The shy, awkward, innocent young man whom the irresistible American intruder liberally educates by love is intelligently, but too restlessly, played by Mr. Basil Hallam. It is all very well to "rattle through" a light comedy, but we see no reason why he should race through it. He might, occasionally, drop from a run into a walk. Fortunately there are two thoroughly expert and restful artists to restore the balance—Mr. Holman Clark and Miss Fay Davis. The Dean and his wife whom this pair represent are conventional enough, but quite harmless conventions, and very agreeably played. Both players have consummate tact, and that was just what was wanted to save the play from degenerating into a wild romp. Not that Miss Renee Kelly would ever romp—she is too fairylike for that. Indeed, for delicate, fantastic, witchery we guess she is jest the lim-mut.

ODD DAYS IN SOMALILAND.

SCORED OFF AGAIN.

ANOTHER day a deputation came in with an elderly man whose leg had been crushed by a pony falling on it two years before and was in consequence permanently out of shape and which I was expected to cure! Every sahib is credited with powers of healing.

It was at this man's "karia" that I was scored off once again by a leopard. The "karia" was six miles from my camp, so as the Somalis said this leopard was much too regular in his visits for their fancy, I rode over one evening to spend the night. As I walked into the "karia" a small piccaninny standing by its mother, catching sight of me unexpectedly, burst into tears and fled in terror: I wonder if Somali mothers sometimes frighten their children into good behaviour with tales of a white bogey-man! But the Somali ladies were not shy; when my bedding was put down beside my loophole a bevy of giggling dusky beauties inspected it with much interest.

The loophole they had made for me was, as usual, about 2½ feet from the ground, but was not, as it should have been, flanked by a screen of sacking or camel mats on either side so as to make it quite impossible for an animal to see through the fence. The omission proved unfortunate. The leopard turned up at about 12-30 A.M. and rushed the goat; he failed to seize it, however, and stood a couple of yards beyond, where I could not see him from the hole. I waited for him to return to the charge—and had to wait—for he did not come. He knew the zareba was occupied, and if he had merely heard the sounds of movements inside would probably have paid no attention beyond perhaps waiting until the sounds had ceased. But owing to the absence of a screen, he must, I think, have seen, through the fence, which might have been thicker, that there was someone a little too close to be comfortable. The result being that a few minutes later a stampede of the animals at the far end of the zareba told that he was prowling round on the other side. He did not come into my view at all, though twice during the hour I waited, the behaviour of the sheep and goats inside showed that he was still about. At length I lay down again and was just dozing off when a shout and commotion inside the zareba made me sit up and look round. I was just in time to see, in the dim moonlight, a shadowy form race across the unoccupied portion of the zareba behind me and clear the fence at a point some 8 or 10 yards from where I lay beside my loaded gun. It was the leopard, of course, and he had taken a sheep with him! It looked as if he had, instead of jumping out where he came in, purposely crossed the zareba to my side to show his contempt for me and I could almost believe I heard a mocking laugh as he vanished into the darkness! The whole proceeding involved a nice calculation of risk worthy of all praise, demonstrating once more how the bolder is so often the safer course; and affording an interesting illustration of that combination of wariness and audacity which distinguishes the leopard above any beast I knew.

Two days later, leaving some stores, etc., at K——we started to move south for two or three marches into the Haud to get a dibatag and look for more lions. With respect to the latter we had no luck, the few "karias" that had been pasturing in the Haud had begun to feel the want of water and gone north and the lions were wandering. Three times we came across the tracks of a big one but always a day or two late.

However I got three "dibatag." For a gazelle the dibatag (G. Clarkei) stands high and has a long neck, though less remarkably so than the gerenuk which is also a larger animal. It is like the gerenuk too in its general habits and in the absence of horns in the female. But unlike the gerenuk the dibatag trots away with head well up and back, a bizarre effect being afforded by the unusually long tail which is carried up in the air sometimes curving right over as if to meet the head. The buck's peculiar horns curving sharply forward in the reed-buck style, though small (10 inches is good) are handsome, and his coat is an uncommon colour, a pretty purplish grey with the face markings a handsome dark brown: altogether an elegant animal.

"MANY A SLIP!"

I returned to K——after a week in the Haud. The khubber of lions that I had there did not not materialize, but I had one experience with a different beast which might have been amusing to an onlooker, but to me was decidedly exasperating. On my first trip I twice came across an animal on the plain of T——which the Somalis call "Somajesti," on both occasions it escaped to an earth in the open plain. In the distance it looked rather like a large jackal but on a near view resembled rather a small striped hyena. I came to the conclusion that it could only be an aard-wolf but was anxious to get one and solve the problem. Well, on this occasion I was out on the K——Plain at about 5 P.M. when, putting the glasses on to a greater bustard in the distance, I saw prowling about in the grass an animal that looked very like my old friend somajesti, and a nearer approach showed that it was. He was scratching at something in the ground (if an aard-wolf he would be fond of ants), then when I was about 100 yards away sat up and looked at me with ears pricked like a fox. From my previous limited experience of his kind, I believed him to be very shy; so though the visible part of him was a small mark in the grass, I thought I had better fire, using a solid bullet as I did not want to risk spoiling his skin. At the shot he sprang three feet into the air, lay still for a few moments and then began to move towards me with apparently a foreleg broken. With frequent stoppages he came nearer and nearer, though a bit to one side, then when he had sat down only 50 yards away I committed an unfortunate error of judgment. I had no more ·318 solid bullets with me and took the little Sherwood. It was quite powerful enough, but I should have used a capped bullet. However, looking upon somajesti as disabled and over-anxious to avoid a big hole in the skin of the new beast such as the expanding bullet might have made, I used a solid lead bullet. It did not seem too light for its purpose, for he dropped to the shot and I walked towards him. When, however, I was still 30 yards away he came to life again, picked himself up and bolted away to our right at a pretty useful pace for a cripple—and disappeared.

Then I realised the explanation of his coming towards us when first hit; we had unwittingly cut off his retreat to his hole which he had now reached in safety. The next thing was to see if we could dig out our quarry, fortunately one of the boys who had come out with Hendaleh carried a short spear with which somewhat inadequate tool we set to work. First we sank a shaft about four feet from the entrance; the depth here was three feet. From this spot the tunnel turned sharp at right angles; probing this with a stick in the new direction, I unquestionably felt a soft yielding body. We then sank another shaft 4 feet further on and at a depth of 3½ to 4 feet I at length got hold of a somewhat bushy tail! More excavating and then a hind-leg with a distinct feeling of life in it, but no more movement than that. However to make sure I put a ·32 pistol bullet into the leg high up, aiming so that the bullet might I hoped rake forward, though, of course, I could not tell the exact position of the rest of the body; a quiver in the limb and movement ceased. Then after enlarging the whole a little more, I got a good hold of both hind legs, and lying on my face gave a great tug and out he came. But the moment I swung him clear, a vision of open eyes and open jaws turning in the air as if to try a snap at my bare arm, was a trifle more than I was quite prepared for from a "dead" beast, and I dropped him like the proverbial hot potato! The moment he touched the ground he was up and away—except for a more foxy head just like a smaller and more tawny edition of a striped hyena. My Somalis were as much taken by surprise as I was, but recovering themselves, dashed in pursuit. I snatched up a rifle, but could get no chance of a practicable shot. However I still believed the beggar was moribund and only making a dying effort and expected the Somalis to catch him up and knock him on the head directly. But if he was dying he was in no immediate hurry about it, and increased his lead until after a chase of about a mile by which time it was getting dark, he got clear away. Looking back, there was a distinct comic element in the affair, but it was an awful sell! I was so certain that he was done for; though I might have taken warning from the episode of my first black buck in India years before which escaped me after I had spanned the length of his horns with my fingers as he lay temporarily stunned by a bullet that had grazed the spinal cord. At any rate the question of somajesti's identity was solved, he was undoubtedly an aard-wolf, to whose insignificant teeth I need not have given a thought, but I did not remember that in time.

Another day, exploring the high grass on the western edge of T.——plain we struck, a day too late, the tracks of a big lion. He had surprised and killed a burrowing animal (Somali "Karindi") which I believe to be that strange ant-eating creature that the Boers call the "aard-vark" (earth pig). Crossing a corner of the plain, after having to give up the lion, I shot an aoul with 20½-inch horns, a very fine head indeed. Then a little further on we met a big tortoise which Abdilleh promptly stood upon as a Somali always does; the idea being that it strengthens the soles of the feet. The tortoise does no mind.

AN AWKWARD MOMENT.

One day we halted in open bush on the edge of the A.——"ban" a great open prairie, just across the Abyssinian border. On the way there the camp was "drowned" one evening. We had only just halted and got the tent up, no time to make a trench or embankment, when the most tremendous rain came down. In 15 minutes the whole zareba inside the tent and out was under water 15 minutes more at the same rate and the rain had stopped. And then we had a great time draining the zareba. The floor of the tent, after the water had been got rid of, had to be all dug up and we were hard at work until 10 P.M. It was very good fun as soon as we were sure that nothing important had been damaged; at the first indication that it was going to be heavy rain all the camel mats had been piled on top of the precious skins and ammunition, etc. And the Somali sets too high a value on the rain that keeps his flocks alive, to mind a wetting, so no one could have had more cheery companions than were mine. Next morning we had to wait until about 10 A.M. to let things dry a bit before we could march again.

A.——was a neighbourhood famous for lions, though some of the bush was difficult; while out on the plain besides oryx and soul there was a chance of hartebeest, and in the bush again a few lesser kudu. For three or four days I did nothing, lions were a myth, and the lesser kudu to which I gave most of my attention defied me. There was only one good bull which I saw two or three times and he was extraordinarily wary, would never stop when once started.

Then fortune gave another shake of the dice and there were happenings. First news came in one morning of a sheep taken during the night from a "karia" four miles away. We made our way there and took up the tracks—a single lioness. After about two hours' tracking back nearly in a line towards camp, we struck a likely patch of high grass beyond which the trail did not seem to go. The grass and bush were rather too continuous to make it a nice spot; however I took my stand in a position that seemed to afford the best command of the situation, but there was no cover for me. Abdilleh stayed with me, sending Elmi with four other trackers we had brought to throw stones and sticks into the grass from the other side. The lioness would not move for some minutes, but at last sprang out from the thickest part, and stood where the grass was thinner, looking to see who was disturbing her. She was 20 yards from me, but I could only see the back of her neck and one ear. I fired and saw the head and neck go down out of sight in the grass, then after a moment reappear in almost the same place. I had no more to aim at than before, and having emptied one chamber would ordinarily have reloaded it or waited for her to show more of herself before firing again. But I saw that one of the beaters on the other side had foolishly come much too close, and ignorant of her whereabouts was actually within 10 yards of the lioness: I saw too that she had detected and was watching him, and caught a glimpse of a switching tail that meant mischief. Convinced that she was on the point of going for him, I fired again at once and rather hurriedly; at the shot she turned and dashed out into the open to my left, then catching sight of us, instead of continuing her flight, checked with startling suddenness, and stood for a second the picture of rage. I turned to Abdilleh for the ·400, but instead of handing it to me, he fired both barrels rapidly. She shrank at the first shot in a way that showed she was badly hit, and then bounded into an adjoining clump of grass.

There might be trouble to come, but for the moment I felt I was well out of an awkward situation. For it had been awkward. An empty gun in my hand, and a wounded lioness only 15 yards away! Of course at the moment I was angry with Abdilleh for firing instead of handing me the rifle; but, as he said, the distance was so small and she so obviously meant mischief that he was doubtful whether I should have had time to get rid of the Paradox, take the rifle and get in my shot, if she had charged the next moment as was practically certain she would have done. I think I could have done it, but it would have been a very close thing, and under the circumstances he was quite justified in acting as he did, seeing that for the moment she offered him an easy shot. At the same time though he could use a rifle Abdilleh was far from being a practised shot, and if his first shot had not been a fortunate one (his second was a miss) the result might, almost certainly would, have been disastrous. For as it turned out—a fact of which we were not at first aware—she was that most dangerous of foes, a mother with young cubs, while my bullet had hurt her just enough to enrage.

However, to go on with the story, we endeavoured to drive her out of the new patch of grass but without success, but at length one man from a tree said he could see her. I climbed with the glasses to his point of vantage and made her out lying on her side in an open space in the middle of the grass, apparently dead. Another bullet to make sure, and we dragged her out, and examined her with interest. We found that my second shot had been unlucky in striking the neck just to the right of the spinal cord and passed out through the side of the throat not causing any serious injury. This affords another illustration of the danger of the neck shot even at close quarters, unless nearly the whole of the neck is visible, and preferably broad side on: though no shot can be more effective if correctly placed. Abdilleh's first shot had found the heart, luckily for us both. My original mistake lay in not waiting for a clearer view for my first shot, though there was little excuse for a clean miss. So the credit for the death of my seventh lion was all Abdilleh's. Palmam qui meruit ferat. All the same I have the skin, and any way I did draw first blood!

The lioness was dead and we proceeded to look for the cubs but without success. As it happened we were not far from camp, so I sent a man to bring out my Indian orderly Iddu Khan to have his photograph taken sitting on the lioness, to his intense delight. When she was skinned he insisted on carrying off a hind leg! He said he was going to dry the meat and take it to Aden, the Subadar Major of the Indian Infantry Regiment. There attributed great properties to it. Both in India and Somaliland, great store is set by the fat of a lion, tiger, or leopard, for various medicinal purposes, among others the cure of rheumatism, and it is always carefully preserved; but this was the only time I have ever heard of any such value attaching to the lean meat. Somalis also preserve the oily liquid secretion found in the liver of a lion, for use as a wash for sore eyes. Western physicians have evidently still a lot to learn!

Later when back in camp at breakfast, a Somali turned up with an offering for a consideration in the form of a baby caracal (the African lynx) a quaint little reddish-brown kitten with thick soft fur and black tufted ears. It was three or four weeks old with very sharp teeth already, but quite friendly, and I was pleased to have it. The caracal is not common in Somaliland, and being very quick and active as well as extremely stealthy and nocturnal in its habits, is very rarely met with.

CORROSION AND THE CAUSE OF METAL FOULING.

I.

It is with extreme diffidence that the writer approaches this subject, one which so many have touched upon and yet left us all in doubt as to the real causes underlying the subject alluded to by the above title. Therefore it is more with the hope of adding somewhat to the facts and data heretofore presented and by suggestion aiding other investigators than with any egotistical idea that what is here presented shall be considered as a final solution. An old saying is that "fools rush in where angels fear to tread," and perhaps some may think that saying applies here, but if some of us speak up and tell what little we do know, progress is apt to be delayed and the true solution of this subject made less plain.

In the old days of black powder things were vastly different. Lower pressures, less initial velocity, slower twists and softer bullets, together with better moist burning powder and methods of lubrication, made our tasks of investigation much less difficult, although even then we all had enough to work out, and, being not so far advanced in the knowledge of to-day, were hardly able to cope with the tasks before us.

It has long been a matter of conviction in the mind of the writer that so long as spelter is a component part of the cartridge shell or the primer, just so long the rifleman will have trouble with corrosion and its concomitant—metal fouling. It is well known to all those versed in the alloying and founding of the non-ferrous metals that the specifications for "cartridge brass" call for pure metals and great care in alloying and subsequently working of the metal; but be that as it may, the writer has no doubt at all that much of the corrosion and metal fouling which bothers riflemen is due to the presence of spelter in the shells or primers, or both.

If any of those who read this have ever seen the vapour of oxide of zinc arising from a crucible of melted brass just as it was lifted from the furnace to be poured, or have noticed the peculiar deposit which it leaves on anything it comes in contact with, as well as the extreme dryness of that deposit, he will soon understand the objection to having any of that stuff injected into his pet rifle barrel every time he fires a charge in it. That this is done to a certain extent is a fact whenever we use a powder that has an acid reaction, or develops intense heat by its explosion. Spelter, or, as it is more commonly known, zinc, is one of the most volatile of metals, and in all its alloys and chemical combinations this fact is prominent; it might well be termed a "fugitive" metal, for when alloyed with other metals, either in a melted or a solid state, it takes every opportunity to leave its fellow metals by oxidation from some cause or other. Heat, acid fumes, or some liquids accelerate this action.

The writer is not a chemist nor a metallurgist, but many things have brought to his notice the peculiar action of metals where spelter was one of the component parts of the alloy. One incident may serve to show its strong corrosive action on iron or steel in contact with it and when combined with acid and heat.

Some years ago the writer had charge of a manufacturing plant in Massachusetts which need for power both steam and water. On taking charge, he soon found that renewals of the boiler tubes were prominent factors in the repair bills, and as these repairs seemed to occur more frequently than was thought right, he began to investigate. It was found that all the feed water for the boiler was taken from the mill pond, which in turn was fed by a brook having its source in a cedar swamp. This water when tested by litmus paper proved strongly acid from its contact with the cedar roots, but as the company insisted on using it, it was decided to find out if better results could not be obtained by other methods. Further investigation showed that nearly all the pipe and fittings used to convey this water to the boiler were heavily galvanised iron, the exception being near the boiler, where the pipe was of copper and the fittings of brass. Here, it was reasoned, were the component parts of a strong galvanic battery with plenty of zinc and copper to feed it, and aided and abetted by the acid water and heat of the boiler. As the writer had little doubt that he had located the "nigger in the wood-pile," he set about to neutralise the results. All the pipe was replaced by copper and the fittings by special bronze made for the purpose; then the water in the boiler was kept neutralised by semi-weekly injections of carbonate of soda and frequent "blowing down," when the trouble practically ceased and the bettered results soon more than paid for the outlay. The general verdict was that the acid water passing through zinc-lined pipes and then into hot copper pipes and brass fittings, there was some electro-chemical action formed, which affected the boiler tubes most, they being of steel, and the boiler plates of soft charcoal iron.

Now, in the case of the modern high-power rifle and high-pressure nitro powder, we have on explosion great heat developed in contact with both the steel and the shell, and if the powder has an acid reaction on the shell and barrel we might well expect a liberating of zinc oxide from the shell or primer or both and a corrosive action on the steel, which would be aggravated by the oxide of zinc. We may look for acid action almost anywhere and find it. I have known workmen whose sweat was so strongly acid that steel touched by their hands and not wiped off would rust in about an hour, and even ordinary brass would dim up and tarnish in a shorter time. The air at times is full of acid action and in some places this is quite strong. Now combine the acid action with the heat and friction consequent on explosion, and it may (and doubtless does) cause in the barrel a deposit of zinc oxide, similar to that noted as rising from the crucible of melted brass as before stated.

Oxide of zinc is a very dry and refractory deposit, which clings closely to its support, and when a modern jacketed bullet passes over it at immense speed, and super-heated at that, metal fouling would most certainly take place. Here we have the hypothesis strongly supported by the facts that metal fouling is caused, at least in part, by the vapour of zinc oxide.

Now for corrosion and its causes, or, at least, so far as it has connection with the oxide of zinc. A deposit of zinc oxide on steel, especially when the steel is highly heated, will certainly cause rust in a short time, the time to a great extent being dependent on the magnitude of the causes. The zinc oxide strongly absorbs the moisture out of the air, and if not removed soon enough will rust the polished grooves and lands so badly that it cannot be removed without spoiling the bore of the rifle.

But presume that we have fired enough bullets through our barrel to make patches of metal fouling, then the effect of corrosion acts somewhat in a different manner. Let us consider the manner in which acid acts on a steel or iron surface. If we uniformly wet a steel surface with boiling hot nitric acid or blow a hot acid blast over it and let it stand, we will have corrosion sure enough, but much of the acid will dry off or be dissipated and will leave a somewhat uniform surface which can be cleaned if taken in time, as much of the acid strength has been expended out into the air.

If, on the other hand, we seal or cover up a portion of the acid (especially when the barrel and acid are both hot), as is done when metal fouling takes place, the acid cools off first, but being under the seal or cover of the fouling it cannot escape or expend its strength, and so continues to eat deeper into the steel for a long time if left alone. This action is aggravated by the fact that the steel of the barrel holds its heat longest in the section between the inside and outside of the barrel, and as it cools gradually it draws the acid action deeper into the metal. It is like what the doctors call an "indolent ulcer"—one that will not heal up.

The writer is quite positive that zinc oxide is one of the worst coatings a rifle barrel could have, as it has so strong an affinity for oxygen and will absorb it so rapidly. He is positive that rifle shells would oxidise even if black powder were used with the consequent lower heat and pressure. He has seen ·45-70 rifle shells of a well-known make, which, after they were fired for the first time, could be seen through in several places, yet before that they were apparently all right.—"Trim Nat" in Arms and the Man.

GREAT SHORTAGE OF SILKWORM GUT.

To the Editor of the "Indian Field."

Sir,—We regret to inform you we have received advices from our Agents that owing to the over-production of gut in Spain during the last few seasons, and slump in prices, caused by the very heavy output of common gut, that the worm growers have only produced about half the usual quantity this season.

The crop therefore is a very short one indeed, and as a natural consequence the price of raw material has advanced almost 50 per cent., which will mean a very great increase in the price of the manufactured article.

PRACTICAL RESULTS WITH ·410 AND ·360 SHOT GUNS.

To the Editor of the "Indian Field."

Sir,—Some time ago I carried out a series of experiments with ·410 and ·360 full choked walking-stick guns, and gave a summary of results in letters which were published in your columns.

Since then I have had opportunities of trying both guns on rabbits, and find that even the ·360, if used with discretion, is capable of fair results up to about 20 yards.

Although the charge of shot in a ·360 is but 14 or 15 pellets of No. 6 less than in a ·410, yet the practical difference in power between the two guns is very much more than this would lead one to expect.

The ·410 is effective on rabbits at quite 10 yards longer range than the ·360. No. 6 shot is decidedly too small for these miniature guns, when they are to be used for shooting rabbits, and this is particularly the case when the rabbits are full-grown animals.

I think that No. 5 chilled shot is on the whole the most satisfactory size, but even No. 4 may be used with success from the ·410 full choke. I have tried shot as small as No. 8, but even at short range, this will not kill rabbits outright: for rat shooting No. 8 is very satisfactory and I have killed a fair number with the ·360, using this size and Schultze powder.

As I have mentioned in a former letter, Schultze seems to suit small bore shot-guns particularly well, and all my experiments point to this powder giving better results than any other, both as regards pattern and penetration. It is no use at all using soft shot in a full choked miniature gun: the cartridges should always be loaded with chilled shot, even when the size is as small as 8 or 9.

THE TURF.

GATWICK.

THOUGH the Home-bred Cup at Gatwick is worth close on 1,000sovs., it did not appear probable on Saturday morning that many runners would turn out for it ; but a field of four was certainly a great disappointment. The presence of Cap and Gown, however, was sufficient to account for this, as owing to the allowance which he claimed he had a big pull over all his opponents. The bookmakers, however, were in liberal mood, and as it was possible to back the good thing by laying 3 to 1 on, most people went for their expenses, with happy results. They never had the slightest uneasiness at any part of the race, for the favourite went to the front at the start, and holding his opponents all the way, won in irreproachable style by four lengths. It was a smooth performance indeed, and more is certain to be heard of Cap and Gown in the future. Results :—

One of the best of the ante-post wagering events left to us, the Royal Hunt Cup, next to the City and Suburban, the big handicaps in the London district, and good as was the attendance on Tuesday, it was eclipsed by the enormous muster that assembled on Wednesday. A field of twenty-eight went to the post, the race thus maintaining its ancient prestige. For the first time the runners were paraded, a pleasant spectacle for the visitors, who thus have a chance of viewing all the field. Results:—

NOTTS vs. SOUTH AFRICANS.—As could only be expected after the even position in which the game had been left on

WINCHESTER

AN EFFECTIVE BIG-GAME GETTER.

There's no question about it—when you go after big game, you want a rifle that has power. You get it in the .35 Caliber Winchester Repeater. This rifle handles a cartridge having a 250-grain bullet, which has a muzzle velocity of 2200 foot seconds and a muzzle energy of 2687 foot pounds. Think of this tremendous energy being expended inside an animal, as it is when a soft-point bullet is used! And you have five cartridges all told, which can be fired in rapid succession. What animal could withstand the terrible shocking effect of such a battery? Many so-called big-game guns seem mere toys in comparison. The .35 Winchester has a strong, simple and reliable action, and a short 24-inch barrel, which is easily handled and yet shoots straight and true at all ranges effective for big-game shooting.

ALL GUNMAKERS CARRY THESE RIFLES.

Friday the match between Notts and the South Africans had at Nottingham last Saturday to be left drawn. Full score :—

BOXING.

THE ENGLISH WELTER-WEIGHT CHAMPIONSHIPS.—At the National Sporting Club, on the 17th instant, Johnny Summers beat Arthur Evernden for the welter-weight championship of England, the Lonsdale belt, and stakes of £400.

From start to finish Summers outclassed his man. Evernden, one of the crouching, covering up type of boxers, relied on the possibility of getting in a knock-out blow. He did not try to box, and more than half his blows were hit in holds, and did not count for points.

Summers, on the other hand, stood well up and hit straight and in the end his tactics told, Evernden being knocked out in the thirteenth round, after having had all the worst of the exchanges.

It was not a pretty contest to watch, Evernden's clinching and covering up bothering Summers a lot. In a way it reminded me of Wells' trouble with Storbeck. The referee was continually calling "Break," and told both men in turn not to hold. Summers certainly did hold when they came to clinches, for all Evernden's dangerous work was done as they came out of holds.

From the third round, when Summers floored Evernden with a right on the jaw, the result of the contest was never in doubt, barring a knock-out. It was felt, however, that Evernden was so strong that he might tire Summers out, until the ninth round, when Summers had his man weak with a heavy right on the jaw.

After that the blows that Summers was always landing told their tale, and when, in the thirteenth round he floored Evernden again with a left flush in the face the contest was all over.

Evernden got up pluckily and was punched round the ring, and finally out of it, where he was counted out. Had that not been the case he would have been disqualified, for one of his seconds tried to lift him up. His covering up was not of much real account in any of the rounds, for Summers time and again got through the guard, and only at in-fighting ever had the worst of the bout.

It was a popular victory, for Johnny Summers has ever been one of the best liked of English boxers. He is a clean, upstanding boxer of the school prior to the days of the ENGLAND vs. IRELAND.—Although the weather conditions appeared uncertain a large crowd assembled at Hurlingham to see the struggle for the Patriotic Cup. The match was endowed with more than usual interest. The Duke of Westminster was trying a new combination of players, and spectators were to see what Captain Cheape and Mr. Edwards could do on the Eaton ponies. Our South American visitors as well as Irishmen had a stake in the Ireland team, for Mr. Traill and his cousin are, of course, well known to all lovers of the game in the country in which they live. Both teams were scratch sides in the sense that they had enjoyed little or no practice together, and there was every inducement to enthusiasts to muster at full strength on the occasion.

POLO.

The game began quietly, as such games often do, and there was no score in the first period, during which neither side showed any decided superiority. In the second period, however, Ireland began to gain the upper hand and scored two goals, to which England failed to reply. In the next period each side hit two goals, and with the match nearly half over Ireland held a lead of four goals to two, an advantage well earned on the merits of the game.

Irish and Argentine spectators grew enthusiastic, but their hopes proved to be ill-founded and short-lived. The fault of the England team palpably lay in the fact that Captain Ritson was unable to drive the ball up through the game to his forwards, and it is probable that if the Duke of Westminster had not realized this and ordered Captain Cheape and Captain Ritson to change places the Irishmen would have continued to profit by England's tactical error, and would have proved victorious. As it was, the change met with instantaneous success. England scored two goals in the fourth period, at the end of which the score stood at four all, and maintained this rate of scoring in each of the three remaining periods, while Ireland's score remained stationary. Thus the change of places between Captain Cheape and Captain Ritson not only made a difference of eight goals to their own side, but also had the effect of successfully drawing the teeth of the Irishmen.

It may be claimed, without fear of contradiction, that the match produced the best game seen this year. Although beaten by 10 goals to 4, the Irishmen emerged from the struggle with the greatest credit. Teams:—

ENGLAND.—Captain R. G. Ritson, the Duke of Westminster, Mr. A. N. Edwards, and Captain L. St. C. Cheape (back).

IRELAND.—Mr. L. Morogh Ryan, Mr. Joseph Traill, Mr. J. McCann, and Mr. John Traill (back).

ROWING.

THE SILVER SCULLS.

THE final of the sculls was rowed on the 15th instant evening, and excited an unusual amount of interest, a large number accompanying the race. Fine weather prevailed, but the conditions were not of an ideal character, a strong south-westerly wind prevailing, which save just at the start, bothered the scullers all the way up, N. M. Bruce, Christchurch, last year's winner, and H. R. Mundey, Trinity, were left in, the former having first station. From an even start Mundey at once drew away, and at the Weirs Bridge held a lead of half a length. Bruce went a bit wide, but soon got in line again, and was on even terms at the bridges. Going up the Green Bank the holder improved his position, and at the crossing was quite a couple of lengths to the good. Reaching the wall Mundey began to show signs of distress, and Bruce, as usual, finishing very strongly, continued to gain rapidly, and finally won in the fast time, considering the wind, of 7mins. 17secs.

QUETTA JUNIOR TOURNAMENT.

Semi-Finals.

23RD CAVALRY "B" vs. STAFF COLLEGE SENIOR CAVALRY.—This was a very well contested match and the victory of the 23rd Cavalry was most popular.

First Chukker.—The 23rd had the best of the play but lost opportunities and the period ended without score.

Second Chukker.—Up and down play, the 23rd had several shots at goal but none were successful and another blank chukker resulted.

Third Chukker.—A free hit to the Staff College for a foul was unproductive and play ruled up and down once more. Then the 23rd were awarded a free shot for a foul. This was also unsuccessful and the score sheet remained blank.

Fourth Chukker.—Up and down play till eventually the Staff College drew first blood. Even play followed till the end of the chukker. Score: 23rd (+2) 2 goals; Staff College (+1) 2 goals.

Fifth Chukker.—The goals were widened and play continued. The 23rd did most of the attacking and after numerous efforts a goal was scored by Allen. The 23rd Cavalry thus won by 3 goals to 2. Teams:—

Mr. Lowry Corry ...	2	Capt. Greene ...	2
Capt. Kirkwood ...	3	Capt. Ward ...	3
Capt. Cameron	(back).	Capt. Giles	(back).

ROYAL IRISH FUSILIERS vs. GYMKHANA "A."—The Fusiliers won this game by 6 to 5, but it was well contested throughout, both teams playing with great dash. The Gymkhana were handicapped by some of their ponies being not too well trained.

First Chukker.—Fast up and down play—no score.

Second Chukker.—The Fusiliers did most of the pressing in this period and Greer and Hennessy scored a goal each. Score: Gymkhana (+4) 4 goals; Fusiliers (+2) 4 goals.

Third Chukker.—The Gymkhana territory was invaded and the Fusiliers scored in a mêlée. Soon after Stewart put through for the Gymkhana and made the score 5 all.

Fourth Chukker.—The Gymkhana made great efforts and had bad luck in not scoring on more than one occasion. The Fusiliers eventually got away and hit the winning goal. Final score: R. I. F. (+2) 6 goals; Gymkhana (+4) 5 goals. Teams:—

ROYAL IRISH FUSILIERS (+2).		GYMKHANA "A" (+4).
Mr. Elton ...	1	Mr. Haviland ...	1
Mr. Hennessy ...	2	Capt. Wood ...	2
Capt. Webber ...	3	Col. Stewart	3

Final.

ROYAL IRISH FUSILIERS vs. 23RD CAVALRY "B" TEAM.—These teams met on the 28th ultimo, a large crowd witnessing a close game. The Fusiliers won by 5 goals to 4. Greer and Allen playing best for their respective sides. The officers of the Staff were "At Home" and at the conclusion of the game General Sclater made a short congratulatory speech and Mrs. Sclater gave away the prizes.

First Chukker.—The Fusiliers pressed throughout and in spite of a stout defence Webber got through and scored twice.

Second Chukker.—The Cavalry attacked and Kirkwood scored, up and down play followed till the Fusiliers worked the ball down again but missed an easy shot.

Third Chukker.—The Fusiliers kept up the pressure and after Greer had missed Hennessy put the ball through. The Cavalry were next prominent but were driven back. They returned to the charge, however, and Allen scored a sensational goal.

Fourth Chukker.—Level play. After a fruitless run by the Cavalry their opponents took up the attack but nothing came of it. Allen then got away but his shot hit the post, another shot by the same player went wide and in spite of all their efforts the 23rd were unable to equalise and were beaten by one goal, the final score reading: R. F. Fusiliers (+2) 5 goals; 23rd Cavalry (+2) 4 goals. Team:—

"TOMMY," said his mother, "grandmother is very sick. Can't you go in and cheer her up?" "Yes," said Tommy, and he went into the sick room. But in a few moments he came out disconsolate. "Couldn't, mother," he said, "she seemed to get worse." "What did you say, dear?" asked mother. "Why, I asked her if she would like soldiers at her funeral!"

LITTLE ETHEL was usually very fond of salad, so that the rest of the family were much surprised, the other day, when she refused to partake of a particularly elaborate and inviting one. "Won't you have any?" asked her mother, towards the end of the meal. "We've eaten it nearly all now. Why don't you want it to-day?" "I felt so sorry for the poor caterpillars," vouchsafed Ethel at last, pensively, "when I saw cook chopping them up!"

CALCUTTA NOTES AND COMMENTS.

THE entries for the I.F.A. Shield, as will be seen from the drawings, are smaller than they were last year, and with the exception of a couple of military teams from outside Bengal the competition is a purely local one. This tournament never has drawn and never will draw more than two or three outside military teams, but if the Association could come forward to meet half the expenses of these teams coming from stations outside Bengal, I feel certain our Calcutta tournament would be just as popular as those played at Simla and other prominent competitions in the Punjab and the Bombay Presidency. The two outside teams this year are the East Yorks, a team who has already taken part three times in the tournament; last year being runners-up. The Royal Irish Rifles, who have come from Kamptee, are not new to Calcutta, for the Irishmen annexed the Shield in 1901. but lost possession the following year. The coming tournament will produce very few really interesting games, and the final this year will probably be fought out by two military teams unless Dalhousie play up to the top of their form.

Last week I suggested that Mohan Bagan had a chance of beating most of the First Division League Teams, but after their miserable display in the final of the Bengal Gymkhana Tournament, I have cause to modify my views. It is true that the Shield holders were not at full strength, but their play was poor in the extreme. Mohan Bagan are drawn against Calcutta, the match being fixed for next Monday, and although the "Reds" have not given a satisfactory account of themselves in the recent League, still I shall be awfully surprised if Calcutta go down to the Indians.

Now, however badly the C.F.C. have done in previous games, I fully expect the "Reds" to come into the second round. Calcutta are, or rather have been, great fighters in the shield, and they may meet the Black Watch in the third round. The Scotch regiment are favourites for the trophy unless the Royal Irish Rifles are as good as they were in 1901.

The Rangers and Calcutta match on the latter's ground attracted a large number of people, and the game which was a fast and exciting one resulted in a win for the Rangers by two goals to one. This is the first time in the history of the League that Calcutta have lost both matches to the Rangers, but it was weakness in front of goal that caused the "Reds" to lose. Calcutta certainly had the larger share of attacking, and Fitzpatrick had more shots to handle than did his vis-a-vis, Crawford, but some of the shots lacked powder, and on four or five occasions absolutely open nets were not taken advantage of. Hugh Sherman is Calcutta's best forward and it must be very disheartening to this fine player to see his beautiful centres going a-begging. Out of the three chances the Rangers had, two were turned to account, while Calcutta's goal was the result of a penalty. H. Sherman scored for Calcutta, while Lindsay and Skemp.on netted for the Rangers.

The Middlesex and Dalhousie match the same evening produced a very evenly contested game which went to the Dum Dum team by a goal to nil. The Middlesex, when they have the assistance of Warley and Adcock, will take some beating. The game was played in a good sporting spirit, and a draw of one all would have been a truer index to the game.

The Black Watch, without extending themselves, beat the Y.M.C.A. by two goals to nil.

On Friday, the last match of the League—the postponed game between Dalhousie and the Garrison Artillery—took place on the former's ground when the Trades club won by three goals to one. The Civil and Military match on the Calcutta ground last Saturday was not so exciting or interesting as the one between Scotland and England played a fortnight back. The weather and turf was all that could be desired, but the play of the Military fell much below expectations. Bateman should never have been picked in the Military team, while Foster would have made a better centre-half than Wootten. Indeed it would have been better had the match been "Black Watch vs. the Civil." Of course Pigott is a great goal-keeper, and on Saturday was seen to great advantage, and but for his fine goal-keeping the Civilians would have won by a larger score. The game was marred by one bit of unsportsmanlike behaviour on the part of Richmond, the Black Watch full-back, who deliberately kicked Galbraith after the latter had scored.

The Civilian team might have been strengthened had Williamson played instead of Bisseker, but I don't think Fenn on recent form, would have been an improvement on Brotchie. The Calcutta man has fallen off considerably lately, and against the Royal Irish Rifles last Tuesday was only a passenger.

During the initial half the game on Saturday was rather evenly contested, but gradually the Civilian forwards took advantage of palpable weakness in the Military back-division and in the latter stages of the game easily held the upper hand. While the Civilians constituted a finely balanced side, the Military, on the other hand, was very uneven and only good in parts. Doubtless the latter's forwards would have done better with more adequate support from their centre half. Watson and Connor combined well at times, on the left, but the latter did not display anything like the form he showed when he represented Scotland against England. On that occasion, Connor, it will be recollected, netted all three goals for the Scotch team. During the first half there was no score on Saturday, but after ends had been changed the Civilian forwards had all the game, and Galbraith and Bisseker scoring, won by two goals to nil. On the winning side Hyland, Galbraith, Quayle, Hargraves, O'Shea and H. Sherman were seen to most advantage; while for the Military Pigott, Richmond, Clark and Patterson played best.

After the match Mr. W. G. Stewart, one of Calcutta's best left-wingers of a few years back, made a short and appropriate speech; and Mrs. Claud Ismay presented the prizes. The Black Watch "A" team were handed the Locke Cup, while the "B" team of the same regiment won the Gramophone Cup. The winners of Saturday's match received silver medals.

On Monday the final for the Nawab Ashanullah Shield in connection with the Bengal Gymkhana, took place on the Sova Bazar ground, when Lord and Lady Carmichael attended. The teams to appear in the final were Mohan Bagan and Tajhat, and after an exciting and evenly contested game the result was a draw—goalless.

There was a very large crowd on the Calcutta ground last Tuesday, the attraction being the first appearance of the Royal Irish Rifles, who at one time carried all before them in this city. The C.F.C. were playing them a friendly, and although the Irishmen won by two goals to nil, on the run of the play the "Reds" had quite as much of the attacking as did their opponents, but as usual weakness in front of goal prevented Calcutta from scoring. Hugh Sherman did his part very well indeed, but the other four quite failed to catch the eye—Bisseker being dreadfully slow.

As the Rifles were not a representative team and the slippery and heavy ground was not to their liking, it is very difficult to judge the side on the evening's play, but the men from Kamptee may be depended upon rendering a good account of themselves in the coming shield tournament.

Hockey.

THE MADRAS TOURNAMENT.

THE Annual Hockey Tournament, held under the auspices of the Madras Cricket Club, was played on the M.C.C. Grounds, Chepauk, on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Saturday last. Five teams had entered, viz., the M.C.C. Team 1st Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire Light Infantry from Wellington, Madras Volunteer Guards, and two teams of the Leicestershire Regiment. The first match was played on Monday last, the teams pitted against each other being the home team and the local team of the 2nd Leicesters. The other three teams had drawn "byes." On Tuesday, 2nd instant, the Oxfords and Bucks were matched to play the Bellary team of the Leicesters in the 1st round. In the semi-finals the Madras Volunteer Guards, who had drawn a bye in the first round, met the local team of the Leicesters who were the winners of the first day's match. The final was fought out between the Oxfords and Bucks and the local team of the Leicesters, who were the winners in the semi-finals.

FIRST ROUND.

M.C.C. vs. 2ND LEICESTER REGIMENT.—The match between the these two teams was played on the M.C.C. grounds in the presence of a large crowd of spectators both in the Club enclosure and on the opposite side of the ground, where the Military element mustered strong. The afternoon was cloudy. The refereeing of Lieutenant Bacon and Captain Lyndsale was all that could be desired. The excellent play of Madras with the Leicesters in friendly matches some time before the tournament gave rise to the hope that the home team would give a close finish to their opponents and get possession of the Cup, but that was not realized in any sense. The home team had the disadvantage to play without their usual custodian Gordon Fraser, who was unavoidably absent, and Scott, who replaced him no doubt rendered a brilliant account of his charge, though he had not played in this position before this. The home forwards lacked a little combination, especially when playing with formidable opponents like the Leicesters. Taking individual play into account it may be said with much commendation that Steele, Ogden and Manders did each their level best. But for their splendid play the score would have been much larger. The Leicesters put out their best team available. There was excellent understanding among them, and their backs, especially Lieutenant Clarke, played very well. They took their passes in grand style. They got their score of two goals in the very early part of the first half, the second goal having been got off a penalty corner conceded as the result of a dangerous run by the inside right of the opposing team. The second half was more interesting, and the game played at a great pace. There was no further scoring. The result was a win for the Leicesters by 2 goals to nil. Teams:—

LEICESTERS.—Sgt. Hockey, Goal; Lieut. Clarke and Cpl Fanks, Backs; Pte. Russell, Sgt. East and Pte. Spriggs, Halves; Pte. Cook, Pte. Steele, Pte. Dumford, Pte. Barton, and Sgt. Sole, Forwards.

M.C.C. TEAM.—H. P. Scott, goal; H. G. Stokes and R. Kittick, backs; C. Elphinstone, R. C. M. Strouts and W. H. Sell, halves; A. H. Steele, T. C. Manders, Capt. Wheeler, H. G. Ogden and G. R. Attwood, forwards.

On Tuesday, 2nd instant, quite to the expectation of everyone the Oxfords and Bucks won their match against the Leicesters (Bellary team). The Oxfords and Bucks opened the attack and were soon 1 up. When the ball was set in motion Lieutenant Bacon, the inside right of the Oxfords, got it and Dixon, when the ball was passed to him, making a fine run at it and shot at the goal comfortably. Roused by this early disaster the Leicesters pulled together, manœuvred the ball into their opponents' territory and more than once the Oxford's citadel was in a dangerous situation. The Oxfords were quite equal to the occasion and returned the ball into the Leicester territory and the goalkeeper had to save three times in quick succession. Many a corner fell to the Leicesters, but they failed to improve upon. When halftime arrived the Oxfords were leading by 1 goal to nil.

The second half opened in favour of the Oxfords and in a very short time they scored their second goal. The Leicesters had a chance to equalise matters, but two good shots had hit the post. A few minutes later Lieutenant Bacon scored a third goal from a melee in front of the Leicester goal. After this a perfect combination between the Leicester forwards gave Lively a chance of dribbling through. He took advantage of the opportunity and scored the first and the only goal for his team. Elated by this success the Leicester forwards worked up together and tried their utmost to reduce the margin. But Dame Fortune appears to have been on the side of the Oxfords, as immediately after the Leicesters got their goal Dickens, the outside left of the Oxfords, scored a fourth goal. The whistle sounded leaving the Oxfords winners by 4 goals to 1. The game was throughout keen and exciting and provoked considerable interest and enthusiasm from a good crowd of spectators.

Messrs. T. C. Manders and H. G. Ogden supervised the games. Teams:—

OXFORDS AND BUCKS.—Pte. Caslan, goal; Lce.-Cpl. Davies, Lce.-Cpl. Kendell, back; Pte. White, Lce.-Cpl. Tilvery, Pte. Lane, halves; Pte. Longhurst, Lt. Bacon, Lce.-Cpl. Dixon, Pte. Charten, Pte Dickens, forwards.

SEMI-FINALS.

A very large crowd of spectators assembled on the M.C.C. grounds on Wednesday last to witness the semi-final round between the Madras Volunteer Guards and the local team of the Leicester Regiment who defeated the M.C.C. team in the first round.

Last year when the Volunteers were pitted against the Leicesters in the finals and their performances were so good as to excite a good deal of interest, it was expected that they would win the cup this year. But they met with a crushing defeat, much to the disappointment of their numerous supporters. The issue was safely settled in the very early part of the game. They had a very weak defence in their halves which conspicuously accounted for their miserable failure. They had two pretty chances of scoring lost. Their centre-forward opened a good attack and when he was about to shoot the Leicester custodian Sergeant Dooley, rushed forward and sent the ball to mid-field, where play for a time was quite exciting. The defence put up by the Leicesters was perfect and full of confidence. In a very short time in the first half they scored 4 goals.

After the respite the Leicesters opened the attack and scored in a considerably short time their fifth goal. The Volunteers in their eagerness to score made some spasmodic rushes, which proved about. Just before close a fine run and centre secured the Tigers their sixth goal to love. Teams:—

LEICESTERS.—Sgt. Dooley, goal; Lieut. Clarke, Cpl. Faulks, backs; Pte. Russell, Sgt. East, Pte. Sprigg, halves; Pte. Steel, Pte. Cook, Pte. Dumford, Pte. Barton and Sgt. Sole, forwards.

M. V. G.—Patton, goal; B. Laybourne and A. Laybourne, backs; Mersh, Oliver and H. Lynsdale, halves; B. Lynsdale, Paul, D'Cruz, Kelly and Kate, forwards.

Referee:—Messrs T. C. Manders and A. H. Steele.

THE tournament was brought to a conclusion on Saturday last, the 2nd Leicestershire Regiment carrying away the cup with them. They were the easy winners and they richly deserve it. They have put up a record in the annals of the Madras Hockey Tournament. Throughout the season their combination was excellent and their conduct was always sportsmanlike. Taking them all round a better team could not have been found. Sergeant Dooley, the custodian, a fine type of the British soldier, is a splendid acquisition to his team. We have not had the chance of witnessing his abilities yet. He is a front rank goalkeeper. Their two backs have always played a sound defensive game. The three halves form a tower of strength. In the forwards there is little fault to be said found.

The match on Saturday lacked nothing in point of interest and more than a modicum of importance was attached to the meeting, inasmuch as the question of winners was considerably involved. Both the teams were well balanced. The Oxfords were tighter and made the pace hot by their sprinting powers in the first half. They forced the Leicester backs on the defensive by playing with fine combination, but their forcing game encountered a firm resistance from the Leicesters, their defence was exceptionally sound, they rallied at a dangerous crises and repelled repeated attacks on their citadel. Very soon by the aid of short and quick passing the Leicesters scored their first two goals. Roused by this their opponents combined together worked up the ball into the Leicester territory and netted a fine goal. The wildest excitement prevailed and cheer after cheer broke from enthusiastic and interesting spectators. In the latter half the Leicesters outplayed their opponents and in a very quick succession added two more points. The Oxfords pulled themselves together splendidly and scored a second goal. The Leicesters were finally left winners by four goals to two.

They have won the cup five times in the tournament and this is third time in succession.

Shortly before the commencement of the match a group photograph of the two teams was taken.

After the match, the handsome silver cup was handed to the winning team by Mrs. A. P. Symonds, with silver mugs to the individual members of the team. In requesting Mrs. Symonds to make the presentation, Mr. A. P. Symonds congratulated the winners and on behalf of the Club thanked the teams for the excellent sport they had provided. The losers he said he hoped would come next year and meet with better luck. Cheers were then given for Mrs. Symonds, and then the proceedings terminated.

THE LAHORE TOURNAMENT.

THE Tournament began on the 2nd instant when the North-Western Railway "A" team met the Punjab Police, the Railway team were much too strong for the Police and beat them by 7 goals to nil. The Police made a good fight of it in the first round and were only two down at the interval, but on changing ends they were completely outplayed. Another match—Lahore Gymkhana vs. North-Western Railway "D" team was also down for decision on this day, but the Gymkhana walked over, the Railway team having scratched. On the 3rd instant the two remaining matches in the first round of the tournament were put through. The Punjab Volunteer Rifles team met and whipped the North-Western Railway "C" team by 3 goals to nil and the Aitchison College defeated St. Anthony's School 2 to nil. The first was a very one-sided affair, but in the second match, although the Aitchison College were the better team, their opponents offered a stout resistance all through. Two matches in the second round were played on Thursday last. The King's (Liverpool) Regiment met the North-Western Railway "B" team, a keenly contested game in which there was little to choose between the teams, ending in a win for the Railway by 2 goals to nil—one point scored in each half. The other game was between the Lahore Gymkhana and the 46th Brigade R.F.A. The Gunners had been expected to win but their easy victory came as a bit of a surprise. The Gymkhana showed up very feebly in the first half during which the Artillerymen scored 5 goals to 1. The second half was not so one-sided, but the Gunners managed to put on another goal without response and thus won by 6 goals to 1.

On Friday the North-Western Railway "A" team and the 1st Punjab Volunteer Rifles took the field and a great game was expected, but it was a runaway affair for the Railway who won by 10 goals to 1. They opened their account immediately on starting and registered 5 goals in each half. The Volunteers scored their only point in the first half.

On Saturday the North Western Railway "B" team met the Aitchison College in the first of the semi-finals, victory going to the College by 2 goals to 1. The Railway had the best of the initial half and scored a goal. On changing ends, however, the went to pieces and the Chiefs' playing up well, equalised and put on the winning goal shortly before time.

"I'M surprised at you." "What's the matter, now?" "I hear you've invited your grocer and butcher to your daughter's wedding breakfast." "Well, what of that?" "Think what you owe society, man!" "Yes, but think what I owe my grocer and butcher!"

"YOU look sweet enough to kiss," says the impressed man. "So many gentlemen tell me that," coyly answers the fair girl. "Ah! That should make you happy." "But they merely say that," she rejoins "They merely tell me the facts in the case and never prove their statements"

EXIT THE HALF-MILE RACE.

THE half-mile race for two-year-olds is to be abolished again ; so the Jockey Club decided at their last meeting after prolonged discussion. For many years prior to 1905 five furlongs was the minimum distance over which horses might run ; in 1904 the Jockey Club, in deference to the capacities of two-year-olds, took what many regarded as a retrograde step and ordained that two-year-olds might thenceforth run four furlong races until the Epsom Summer Meeting. Accepting the presence of the two-year-old on the turf at all—and we are old-fashioned enough to regard him askance—there was a good deal to be said in favour of admitting the half-mile scurry for his benefit : races that taxed his powers in their undeveloped state were to be avoided in the interests of the soundness of the breed ; four furlongs would tax these less than five, therefore let there be four-furlong events for the rising equine generation. For eight seasons the rule has endured—or will have endured at the close of the present season—and now it has been decided to revert to the five-furlong minimum. The Jockey Club paved the way to repeal with characteristic caution ; they argued that trainers were the men who could best form an opinion on the effect upon racehorses of the half-mile or any other class of race, and they applied to 27 experienced trainers for their views, couching their question in the simplest possible terms :—" Do you, or do you not, like four-furlong races ?" The comprehensive simplicity of the enquiry commends it : there were many questions touching detail that might have been put, but this one brief query covered them all, and the result was a definite verdict. Definite though not unanimous, but unanimity was not to be expected in this any more than other matters. Three of the 27 trainers did like half-mile races ; three liked them up to a certain date in the season ; two were indifferent and the large majority, 19, were empathatically against them. And fortified with this preponderance of opinion the Club has ordained discontinuance.

The idea that the shorter race would do something to lessen the strain to which the two-year-old is subjected has not proved correct ; we should have been surprised if it had ; for if a young horse cannot run five furlongs without risk to muscle and sinew it is very improbable that he can run four.

The gate has done a good deal to remove the manifold objections to the start in the short race; there is much less of that bother which used to spoil the horse's temper and try his hocks and fetlocks, but the objections to the short race on the grounds of principle remain. There are still too many short races at English meetings for the good of the thoroughbred, despite the progress that has been made in reducing their number during recent years. The returns of the last seven seasons are cumbered with the addition of those half-mile events which are to cease with the Epsom Summer Meeting of the present year, and this is to be borne in mind. Looking back to the pre-half-mile race days we find that between 1897 and 1909 there was a marked change in the totals of races grouped under various lengths: thus in 1897 there were 805 races under six furlongs; in 1909 there were 640, including 52 of the half-mile events. In 1897 there were 220 races of over one mile and under two and in 1909 there were 468. During the same period races of between six furlongs and one mile became more numerous and races of one mile decreased in number by nearly half. Races of from two miles to three decreased from 67 to 37 and races of over three miles disappeared altogether. The last were out of date; ideas of what a horse may fairly be asked to do have undergone a change, as was shown when the length of the journey for The Whip, last of our old four-mile races, was reduced to two miles and a bit; the change was approved in some quarters on the ground that the four-mile race savoured of cruelty! It might savour of cruelty if ridden at the pace of a five-furlong scurry, but when ridden by men who were horsemen as well as jockeys, the long race was a fine test of horsemanship. But the day for examining the virtues of the four-mile race, save from the academic point of view, is gone. We believe that were wisely directed effort made to restore and encourage long races the thing could be done and with large advantage to the race of thoroughbreds; but the vested interest is the difficulty in these days of gate-money meetings. Race-meetings must pay their way; that is the case for short races in a nutshell; given two meetings within equally easy reach of London whence the crowd comes; advertise at one three races of from 1½ mile to 3 miles and advertise at the other seven races carefully arranged to meet the lowest requirements of the rules: and for one man who attends the first meeting you shall have a thousand at the second. One is real business; the other provides more than twice the excitement and more than twice the facilities for betting; it is human nature and not to be got over by argument. We have not ventured upon a comparative estimate of entries at our theoretical meetings; our readers can do that for themselves, by the light of their own knowledge of the number of animals now on the English turf which can stay over a distance; and, let us add, hope to pull up reasonably sound after a two-mile race. We wish we could regard abolition of the half-mile event for two-year-olds as indicative of a new era in racing; it cannot be gainsaid that the vast majority of our racehorses at Home are nonstayers, and, pace Lord Harewood's dictum that you cannot make stayers by legislation, we cling to the idea that something might be done to encourage stayers. Trainers—some trainers—maintain that horses cannot stay over a distance simply because they are not trained for prolonged effort: make it worth while to train horses to stay, say these, and the thing shall be done. This is reassuring, or would be reassuring if we could screw up our credulity to the requisite pitch; but our own belief is that it were necessary to begin farther back. Horses that have proved themselves stayers during the brief career a good one is now allowed to enjoy on the turf before he goes to the stud are always in eager demand by breeders; their lists are full at remunerative fees for seasons in advance; but, not to express it too strongly, all their produce are not stayers; the dam has something to say in the matter. There be those who maintain that we have more stayers than we know; that these are never discovered simply because they are not permitted opportunity under the prevailing system of short races, or are only discovered by accident: this may well be true, but if true it furnishes a strong argument in favour of affording horses opportunity to prove their ability to stay. Trainers and owners now have no inducement to try and develope the staying quality; and that quality which is suffered to lie dormant is only too likely to die out altogether in course of time. It is encouraging to see that the majority of those trainers whose views were asked for, express aversion for the half-mile race for the youngsters; and we hope the aversion may go yet a little further and take the shape of preference for longer races for horses of all ages. No help need be expected from the executives of gate-money meetings; it is not so long since the committee of a meeting near London advertised a race specially framed in the interests of horses which had proved their inability to stay. Encouragement of degeneration could hardly go further.

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

We are now within a little more than a fortnight of the First Calcutta Monsoon Meeting, and about the end of next week we shall probably find all the visitors and "residents" very hard at it, preparing to open the campaign with what success they may! Some owners, as we know, are never particularly keen about their horses winning early on and prefer to let them do what is called "race themselves fit," than give them their winding up gallops in private. It is a very excellent principle when not carried too far and we thoroughly endorse the very well-known opinion that one gallop with the colours up is worth three in private; but nevertheless there are times when the gallop in public is, as we know, carried too far—or in the opinion of some observant punters and students of public and private form—not quite far enough by several lengths that is to say—sometimes even by almost a furlong! These little matters, however, are never referred to in detail excepting by Stewards of race-meetings and not always by them! It is not of every noble race-horse that we can say "I came like water and like wind I go," because it is not always so, and those who speculate upon its happening every time very frequently get their feet wet! So far as can be seen and judging by the signs and portents there is every prospect of a very good season with much diversity of interests represented and consequently better sport and more excitement for every one concerned. The jump-racing is always a feature of the Monsoon season and a very popular one with the majority of the crowd that patronises the meetings, even if it is not so much so with the careful punter who prefers not to see his money up in the air and rarely walks in and backs his fancy for all that he would like to when every furlong contains an added risk in the shape of an obstacle, which may put the supposedly good thing on the broad of its back. In fact there are some people who consider that we have far too much jump-racing and would be well content if, out of a card of six races only one were over fences: we frequently as we know have seen four out of seven events over hurdles and should the fields in some of the Monsoon hurdle races be big as they sometimes are, we shall no doubt see this happen again. There are any number of horses here at the moment who are intended for the "illegitimate," and with good money for this class of event to be picked up and as a general rule excellent going, owners are not unnaturally very keen on this form of amusement, especially as the class competing is never very formidable and any horse of moderate pretensions has every chance of doing a lot more than pay expenses.

Amongst jump horses and ponies for both the open and closed events the following are either here or signalled as probables:—

Pressy, Proprietor, Red Tape, Craigendorrie, Rameses,* Realm, Maisonette, Haloya, Elpis, Confederation, Rough Luck,* Farthing Bun,* Pilot,* Sholto, Lady Leonard,* The Priory,* Daisy Priam,* Rifleman,* Skipper,* Peer Ray,* Jaguar,* Survivor,* Culverin,* Joy,* Mary Jane,* Alton,* Ormley,* Edwards,* Ngkappa*, Late Night,* Rupert, Hobson's Choice,* Ida Coil,* Pacific,* Scottie,* Sincerity,* Water Lily,* Stella II.,* Reuben,* Meprise,* Gem,* Ormley, Moira, Rosebud II,* Yum Yum,* Juba,* Thrifty,* Desmond* and several more that are to come. Those "starred" are eligible for closed races and the list we submit gives us promise of some very excellent racing in this department. The majority of these horses are already here and every day now will possibly see additions made to the number, as there are various horses said to be "probables" and whose names have been mentioned. Thomas, for instance, we hear may come up with Vernier from Bangalore and Wishart also it is said may come with a few details: amongst those mentioned as possibles being "Mr. Holmes'" Blenheim Orange, who would be well suited by the nice soft going on our Monsoon course, as he did not find the hard ground in the cold weather best suited to him and pulled up very lame as will be remembered after one of his races. With jump racing such a flourishing concern during the rains it is a matter for wonderment that it does not thrive better than it does during the steeplechasing season in the cold weather and there is only one conclusion possible, namely, that at that time of the year there is so little of it that owners do not find it worth their while. In the Monsoons there are always two or more hurdle races in each day's card and consequently there is money in it and the owner of a likely jumper finds it a paying business to school and ready him for this class of event.

For the open hurdle races, of those enumerated above, Realm, Proprietor, Sholto, Craigendorrie, Pressy and Maisonette are probably about the best that there will be to beat and all of them are old hands excepting Pressy, who has not yet been out in public over obstacles. She is, however, very promising and on Saturday last she went a short school at speed over several flights in very taking style, performing like an old and practised hand at the game. She has plenty of speed and Bloss has got her looking extremely well. In the closed horse class Farthing Bun, Pilot, The Priory, Daisy Priam, Lady Leonard, Pacific and Sincerity are in our idea about the best of them. Amongst the ponies for both the open and closed classes we place them in more or less the following order of merit: Moira, Ngkappa, Water Lily, Rupert, Alton, Ormley, Edwards, and Late Night, and shall not be surprised to find these about top of the form at the end of the season.

Last week on Wednesday, Friday and Saturday there was a certain amount of schooling over hurdles on the Calcutta course and some of it is useful to record for future reference. On Wednesday Survivor, Scottie and Daisy Priam were jumped in company and the first named fell at the stand flight damaging Mr Roddick somewhat and over-reaching slightly. Both Scottie and Daisy Priam are very good jumpers, the grey being by the same sire as The Ghost so we understand and he very closely resembles Captain W. A. Kennard's good grey chaser. Both of these greys were brought up by Mr. L. A. Lamb. On Friday morning Water Lily (Williamson) and Edwards (C. Bloss) were schooled, the latter slipping up at the turn out of the straight but doing no damage. Water Lily runs on Saturday in the hurdle race and is very promising as she jumped in much improved form on Wednesday. She ought to make into a nice little hurdler in time. On Saturday morning things were considerably busier and besides several schools over hurdles there was a little fast work doing on the flat course (sand-track): Walker's Girton Girl and The Priory were both jumped early, ridden in each case by Lansdowne without a lead. They both fenced well and The Priory gave no trouble which was a pleasant surpise to his trainer, as he was very cranky at the end of last cold weather and showed a good deal of temper. Skipper (Mr. Roddick) and Alton (Captain Kenworthy) went over three flights in company at a very brisk pace neither of them losing any time about it. Alton jumped and galloped the better of this pair and will score before the season is out or we are much mistaken. Joy (Williamson), Pressy (C. Bloss) and Culverin (Mr. Riviere) went together over three flights the pace being a cracker and Culverin bolting. Joy went on alone after the third flight till picked up by Scottie (Captain Kenworthy) at the big tree. The grey galloped away from the badly-tiring Joy, who looked as if every succeeding flight must mean her Waterloo. Scottie jumped very well. Reuben (Mr. Dudley) jumped two flights at a canter and is very clever and neat.

Chin Chin, Haut Park and Bonny Boy from Bloss' stable had a rough up on the flat and all three moved well, particularly Chin Chin, who is obviously in good case just at the moment. Bonny Boy also caught hold and galloped as if he were enjoying himself. May Kenley, Ngkappa and Runaway Girl also had a spin at about three-quarter speed. Some of Mr. A. N. Das' lot were also spurted and Sidonia, Sandbeck and Carnival were observed. From Walker's string Moira, Glenora, Rosebud II., Rameses and Frank all spurted and some of Butlin's as well, as the jumpers already enumerated, did fast work.

Amongst other intending visitors to Calcutta during the Monsoon season are Major Mussenden, Captain M. R. K. Hodgson, Major Bennett, Mr. Platt, and Captain K. Robertson. Major Mussenden will probably ride some of Butlin's horses in their engagements. It is also probable that General Sir Bryan Mahon will come down from Darjeeling for a few weeks and Captain Power, Mr. Shillingford and other visitors are signalled as being likely "starters." Calcutta will probably be very full of racing folk in about a week or ten days' time, as Jack Scott, Beedham and possibly Thomas and Wishart will be here as well as a number of jockeys, amongst them Ruiz and Northmore for certain and possibly Randall, J. Davis, and M. Davis.

The new rules which the V. R. C. propose to bring into force on the 1st August or as soon thereafter as possible are very stringent and very novel in some of their provisions. The rules will, it is anticipated, be finally adopted by every racing club in Australia and the codes of all the different States of the Commonwealth will therefore at last be standardised, a thing that it has long been considered that they should be and which is obviously desirable. The reason for this remodelling which is principally in the direction of giving very greatly added powers to the stewards is said to be the great strength of the so-called "jockey ring" in Australia and the number of races that are "arranged." It is to defeat this combination and to render it unsafe for any person or persons to practise the gentle art of fixing in what order the horses shall arrive that these new rules are framed. For instance, stewards are empowered to order any jockey to get down off any horse before a race, even though he may have been satisfactorily weighed out and there may be no "case" against him. And they can further, if an owner demurs to the jockey the stewards select being put up, refuse to allow the owner's horse to start at all! This is very drastic!

They may also, "if they are satisfied that the winner, or any placed horse, in any race at a meeting has not been permitted by his owner, trainer, rider, or other person interested, to do his best in any other race run at that meeting, to disqualify such horse for that particular race." Stewards are also to have the power to report within 14 days after the holding of any race meeting to the principal committee the running of any horse at such meeting, which, in their judgment, is inconsistent with any previous or subsequent performance or performances of such horse at any time, either on the same or any other course. The V. R. C. or any controlling club in the other States may make rules with reference to the appointment of stewards, whether honorary or stipendiary.

All this is quite new and gives enormous powers of life and death to the executive; but we are told that it is not by any means before they were needed! Reading on we see that the V.R.C. committee, or the committee of the controlling club in any other State, is given power to inquire into alleged cases of inconsistent running, and punish, by fine, suspension, or disqualification, any person found guilty of malpractice in connection with inconsistent running, and they may also disqualify any horse in this connection. In order to prevent the risk of accident where there is likely to be a big field, the committee may allow a race to be run in heats on such terms as the committee may prescribe. The reversion to "heat" races is something very like "new" even though it is so old! In our opinion such a procedure will not be found practicable and the only solution is that which is frequently adopted in India, namely, dividing and making two races of it on identical terms.

The new code provides for the general adoption of the A. J. C. rule which gives the committee power to punish, by fine or disqualification, any person proved to have tampered with any lad or other stable servant in a racing stable.

The new rules provide that no horse shall run in any race in a hood or blinkers.

In regard to dead heats, the new rules set out that if the horses running a dead heat, or any of them, are under three years old, or the race be a hurdle race or a steeplechase, or if in the opinion of the stewards the dead heat cannot be conveniently run off on the same day, the dead heat shall not be run off, and the owners shall be compelled to divide the prize. When a horse that runs a dead heat carries over-weight, such over-weight need not be carried in the run off. A horse that is scratched for a run-off of a dead-heat it is laid down shall still rank as a winner and be liable to all the penalties he would have earned had he run in and won the run-off.

The rules of racing at present in vogue allow a judge to correct a mistake within half an hour after the race has been run. The proposed rules provide that he can only correct a mistake "before the placed horses are weighed in."

It is provided in the new rules that at all meetings the hurdles used in hurdle races shall be open hurdles, 3 feet 3 inches high, and in steeplechases no obstacle shall be less than 3 feet 9 inches high, all measurements to be made in a vertical line from the ground to the top of the obstacle as fixed. At present there is no limit as to the size of hurdles or fences.

If some of these new Australian rules were introduced into India or any other country there would be something very like consternation in the camp of the clever! They are, so we understand, almost certain to go through and become racing law all over Australia before the present season is out.

The Coaching Marathon was the event of the day in London on the 22nd ultimo and a huge crowd turned out to see it, from Hampton Court the starting point to the finish at Olympia the route being lined with cheering enthusiasts. The entries numbered eleven and included all the best teams available. Mr. R. Craig McKerrow, who was prominent in Calcutta sporting circles last cold season, was first to be sent away with his Reynard, followed by Messrs. W. A. Barron (Venture), W. J. Smith, Limited, W. A. Barron (Vivid), Percy Hughes (Tantivy), Thos. Tilling, Limited, W. H. Moore, A. G. Vanderbilt, J. E. B. Wimbush (New Times), the Tarsap Company and R. Craig McKerrow (Red Rover). The route was along Park Road over Teddington Railway Bridge, Strawberry Hill to East Sheen, Barnes Common and over Hammersmith Bridge. The teams came into Olympia in the following order:—W. J. Smith, W. H. Moore, W. A. Barron, R. Craig McKerrow, Percy Hughes, W. A. Barron, Tilling and Company, Tarsap Company, Vanderbilt, Wimbush and R. Craig McKerrow. The final positions were awarded as follows:—W. H. Moore (Rockmarge), 1; W. A. Barron, 2; R. Craig McKerrow (Reynard), 3; W. A. Barron, 4; T. Tilling, 5; A. G. Vanderbilt Reserve. Judge Moore thus gains the trophy for good having won it two years in succession.

The final of the Polo Champion Cup was held at Hurlingham on the 26th June when the Old Cantabs

A CONFIDENTIAL CHAT.

He: That you, sweetheart?

She: Yes, darling; what is it?

He: Oh, I want you to do something for me. I quite forgot to ask you before I came away this morning to buy me a bottle of Odol.

She: Speak louder; I can't hear. A bottle of what?

He: Odol, O—d—o—l, Odol. You know, the famous preparation for the teeth.

She: All right; I won't forget. I'll make a memorandum at once that you want something for your teeth. I'll ask them at the shop to give me the best powder they have for the teeth.

He: (shouting): No, no, no; I don't want tooth-powder.

She: All right; I'll get you tooth-paste.

He: No, no, no; I don't want tooth-paste either.

She (rather irritably): Then what do you want, darling?

He: Odol, sweetheart. Tooth-powders and tooth-pastes are no good. They don't get into the crevices and between the teeth, so they are useless for preventing fermentation, which causes the teeth to decay. Odol gets into every crevice of the mouth, and washes away everything that may do harm. It penetrates the interstices of the teeth and the mucous membrane of the mouth. It is an antiseptic, and its refreshing effect lasts for several hours after using it. That is why I don't want you to get me anything else but Odol. All my friends use it now.

She: All right, darling; I'll get you a bottle of Odol. Good-bye.

He: Stop a minute; don't ring off. Say, sweetheart?

She: What is it?

He: There are two sizes of Odol—one at eighteenpence, and one at half-a-crown. Buy the half-crown bottle, for it is much more economical, as it contains double the quantity of the other flask.

She: All right. Good-bye, darling.

beat the Tigers. The Old Cantabs, who had in the semi-final beaten Eaton rather readily by 5 goals to 3 were much fancied for the event, but the Tigers made such strong running that at the end of the third period they led by no fewer than 6 goals to 1, and in playing a fast and skilful game appeared to have victory well in sight. At the next meeting, however, the Tigers had a stroke of bad luck, for in a cannon Mr. Railston was upset, pony and rider both coming to grief. In the fall Mr. Railston, besides being much shaken, sustained a nasty cut over the right eye and though resuming after a slight delay and playing a plucky game, it was not surprising to see him hardly at his best. It was a significant fact that from here the Light Blues had more of the game, and coming up hand over hand they drew level by scoring as many as four goals to nil in the fifth period and finally won a remarkable match by 7 goals to 6. The scores were even at the commencement of the last stage and it is worthy of note that the losers never moved their figures after the third period. Up to this they had shown superior dash and combination, with clean and effective striking, and taking into consideration the mishap to Mr. Railston they may be accounted a trifle unlucky to lose. Teams were:—Old Cantabs—Captain G. Bellville, Mr. F. M. Freake, Mr. W. S. Buckmaster, and Lord Wodehouse. Tigers—Count de Madre, Mr. H. G. M. Railston, Major B. Mathew Lannowe and Captain L. St. C. Cheape.

Owing to rain and the consequent heavy state of the ground the Polo tournament could not begin at Bangalore on Monday, the opening matches being postponed till Wednesday. The draw is as follows:—17th July—2nd Sappers and Miners play the Mysore Silledar Horse and the 7th Hussars "B" team vs. The Mysore Imperial Service Lancers; Second round—the 7th Hussars "A" team will play the winners of the first game and the 20th Deccan Horse play the winners of the second game.

The one-time unapproachable 15 miles world's record has been harshly treated of late. First, A. E. Wood lowered Fred Appleby's figures at Celtic Park, New York—this was on 5th May of this year—and now on 8th June Tom Longboat beat Wood and the record in a 15 miles race at Toronto. The former record was undoubtedly sound, and we understand that the same remarks apply to the last great performance. The track was correct, and the timekeepers most reliable. It was a great race. Once more Alfred Shrubb was settled early on; this time after leading at 5 miles in 25mins. 19secs., he went groggy at six, and limped off the track half a mile later. Willie Queal was next to cry a go. Wood ran the eighth mile in 5mins. 4secs., and settled him for good, but Longboat still hung on. Again, at 11 miles, Wood ran a fine mile, but he could not shake the Indian off, and a couple of sprints in the thirteenth mile were of no avail. When the last lap came round, Longboat let out a link, and dashed away, but Wood was never dropped and coming round on the outside he drew level 80 yards from home, and led by a yard in the straight, but 30 yards from the tape Longboat drew level again, and in a desperate finish was adjudged a winner by 6 inches. Wood claimed a dead-heat, but there was no doubt that the Indian breasted the tape a trifle ahead of the Englishman. The leaders and mile times as compared with the previous records were as follows:—

America continued her series of victories at the Olympic Games. In the 200 metres Craig finished first and Lippincott second, Applegarth the 220 English Champion coming in third. Time—21-7/10secs. Reidpath of America won the 400 metres, with Braun (Germany) second and Lindburg (America) third. Time—48-2/10secs. Kelly won the 110 metres hurdles in 15-1/10secs. and Gutterson the Running Broad Jump with 7·60 metres, both American victories. Kiviat and Taber were second and third respectively in the 1,500 metres. America also won the 1,600 metres Relay running competition and the 3,000 metres team race as well. G. Strodino finished third in the Marathon, the first American representative to get home. The Result of the final in the Throwing the Hammer competition was:—McGarth 54·74 metres, Gillis 48·39 metres, Childs 48·17 metres, all three are American. The Decathlon was won by Thorpe. James Thorpe is an Indian of the Carlisle Indian School, America, a member of the Sac and Fox tribe, now centralised in Oklahoma. He was generally expected to prove an excellent team mate for Martin Sheridan, heretofore acknowledged the greatest all-round athlete in the world.

Thorpe is 6 feet high, weighs 178lbs., and is 23 years of age. He is a member of the football, baseball, basket-ball, hockey, lacrosse, and tennis teams at Carlisle, and has repeatedly performed on the track and field with wonderful results.

100 yards dash in 10-1/5secs.
Running broad jump, 22 feet 10 inches.
Running high jump, 6 feet.
Putting 16lb. shot, 43 feet.
120 yards High Hurdles, 15-3/5secs.
220 yards Low Hurdles, 26secs.

In these six events he has a combination of speed, strength, and skill which, at this writing, no man in America is known to equal. He is a good pole vaulter, and is a student with the discus and javelin.

In the Swimming events, Kahanamakur, the American representative, won the hundred metres free style in 1min. 3-2/5secs., Healy of Australia finishing second in 1min. 14-6/10secs. The 100 metres back stroke also went to America, Hedner winning in 1min. 21-1/5secs. The 1,500 metres swim free style was won by Hodgson of Canada in 22mins. 1sec.—a record; Hatfield of Great Britain was second in 22mins. 39secs. and Hardwick of Australia third in 23mins. 15-4/10secs. This same order was the result in the 400 metres free style swim, Hodgson's time being 5mins. 24-2/5secs., another record; Hatfield's 5mins. 25-4/5secs. and Hardwick's 5mins. 31-1/5secs. Australia won the 800 metres swim, with America second and Great Britain third. In the 100 metres breast stroke only Germans were placed, and Great Britain won the Ladies' 400 metres team competition and also the water polo, beating Australia by 8 goals to nil.

Great Britain's best Athletic success was Jackson's (Oxford) win in the 1,500 metres race in record time, 3mins. 36-8/10secs. A Britisher was third in the 3,000 metres team race, another third in the 8,000 metres cross country race, Hutson third in the 5,000 metres and Great Britain took second place in the 10,000 metres walk with Webb. This walk was won by Goulding (Canada) in 46mins. 28-4/10secs., Webb's time was 46mins. 50-4/10secs. and Altimiri (Italy) was third in 47mins. 37-6/10secs. H. Kolemainen (Finland) won the 5,000 metres in 14mins. 36-3/5secs. after a terrific struggle with Bouin (France) who was beaten by inches, his time being 14mins. 36-7/10secs. Finland was second in the cross country race won by Sweden.

The Swedes also took second and third places in the Decathlon and second in the 3,000 metres team race. The Individual Epee contest was won by a Belgian.

The Marathon produced a splendid race and was unfortunately marred by a tragedy—Lazaro, a Portugese competitor, succumbing to sunstroke after the race. The heat was intense. Kolemainen, the Finnish long distance champion, went out from the start and was closely followed by C. Gitsham and K. McArthur, the South African representatives. Kolemainen was done with on the sharp hills on the return journey and McArthur and Gitsham maintaining their lead finished first and second respectively with G. Strodino of America third. McArthur staggered in and collapsed at the finish. The times of the first three were 2hrs. 36mins. 54-4/5secs., 2hrs. 37mins. 52secs.; 2hrs. 38mins. 42-2/5secs. The following were the other competitors to finish in the Marathon Race, arriving in order named:—

Sockalexis (America), Duffy (Canada), Jacobsen (Sweden), Gallagher, Errleben, Piggott, Forschaw (America), Fabre (Canada), Demar (America), Boussiere (France), Green (England), Smith (America), Forsyth (Canada), Tewanima (American Indian).

On the conclusion of the Athletic Competitions the prize winners were marshalled in the Stadium in front of the three platforms where the King, the Crown Prince, and Prince Charles crowned with wreaths the firsts, seconds, and thirds respectively.

A solid phalanx of Americans headed the array.

In our Boxing Column to-day we publish details of the fight between Carpentier and Klaus at Dieppe. Below we give a short account of the return match between Digger Stanley and Charles Ledoux in which the Englishman was knocked out in seven rounds, defeat being due to his going in to mix matters with such a dangerous infighter as Ledoux. Stanley started the first two rounds rather badly, going through six very sultry minutes, the while his opponent, chased, slashed and bashed all the time. Stanley made use of the ring a good deal but Ledoux often rushed to close quarters and literally showered punches on Digger's body. Things underwent a slight change in the third round. Stanley had been publicly warned by the referee at the end of the previous meeting for hitting low, but when Ledoux struck his man while the latter was down from a slip nothing was said. Anyhow Digger was not hurt and he let his left go clean on the mouth. Ledoux was riled and rushed like a bull. Stanley missed a chance to drop his man with a right. Ledoux was totally uncovered and off his balance when it seemed the simplest thing in the world to shoot a right on the jaw. Stanley let the opportunity pass but brought his left into play and had an advantage on the round. The Englishman's eye was discoloured but he drew blood from his opponent's nose and mouth in the fourth round—the result of beautiful lefts. Thereafter Stanley kept on forging ahead by well-timed and effective punches. Ledoux appeared to be tiring perceptibly and it looked odds on the Englishman winning. But he seems to have lost his head. He had caught the Frenchman on the chin with a stiff right and had he stepped back and fiddled about to see the effect of the punch might well have followed up with lefts and then take up the thread of victory. Instead of which he rushed into close quarters and swopped punches for a good 20secs., suddenly going down for the count. The Digger was most unlucky and the opinion of critics appears to be that he would have won well if he had not been in such a hurry and had not gone in to finish his man off in that seventh round.

The Dieppe meeting can scarcely be called a success. Things were badly managed while the three disqualifications on the day of the Carpentier-Klaus battle were, to say the least of it, hardly satisfactory. Fred Delaney was put out on an alleged foul in his contest with Marcel Thomas: Arthur Everden was disqualified in the second round of his fight with Bernard. This decision brought about a free fight which necessitated the intervention of the police to restore order. The extraordinary ending to the Carpentier-Klaus contest is related further on. Carpentier was most dissatisfied and challenged Klaus to a return encounter. Nothing definite was settled but another meeting between the pair is looked upon as certain.

Next week we will have details of the Bombardier Wells-Al. Palzer fight. From notes previous to the contest Palzer seemed to have been absolutely certain of victory, but there were many who, nevertheless, favoured the Bombardier. They must have been considerably disappointed with the result. It was Palzer's intention to be present at the Flynn-Johnson battle and to challenge the winner. This probably occurred and in all probability the nigger has accepted his challenge, for he had declared his intention of meeting all challengers including Sam Langford, Joe Jeannette and others at the rate of one a week after he had settled with Flynn.

South Africa went in again and had scored 146 for eight wickets when play ceased.

At the conclusion of the test match between England and Australia at Lord's on the 26th ultimo the Australian skipper, Mr. S. E. Gregory, was presented with a testimonial subscribed in commemoration of his 50th appearance in England vs. Australia matches. The gift was a handsome silver cup and a purse containing £200. The presentation was made by the Right Hon'ble Sir George Houston-Reid, G.C.M.G. the High Commissioner for Australia and Lord Harris, who was present, also added a few kindly remarks assuring Mr. Gregory on behalf of the cricketers of England that they did honour to him as one who had played the game in its best spirit during his long career.

We learn from Reuter that Mr. Pelham Warner, the captain of the English cricket team which toured Australia last season, is again seriously ill. This time suffering from hemorrhage due to a blow he received at the nets. He will in consequence have to lay up for at least a month.

In an article on lions in the American Magazine, Mr. S. E. White describes how a lion kills his prey. Mr. White has just returned from a year's hunt in Africa, during which he saw 71 lions and killed several. The lion, he says, generally springs on his prey from behind or a little off the quarter. By the impetus of his own weight he hurls his victim forward, doubling its head under, and very neatly breaking its neck. Mr. White states he has never seen this done, but the process has been well observed and attested; and, certainly, of the many hundreds of lion kills he has taken the pains to inspect, the majority had had their necks broken. Sometimes, but apparently more rarely, the lion kills its prey by a bite in the back of the neck. Mr. White says he has seen zebra killed in this fashion, but never any of the buck. It may be possible that the lack of horns makes it more difficult to break a zebra's neck because of the corresponding lack of leverage when its head hits the ground sideways. Once the kill is made, the lion disembowels the beast very neatly indeed, and drags the entrails a few feet out of the way. He then eats what he wants; and, curiously enough, seems often to be very fond of the skin. In fact, lacking other evidence, it is occasionally possible to identify a kill as being that of a lion by noticing whether any considerable portion of the hide has been devoured. After eating he drinks. Then he is likely to do one of two things; either he returns to cover near the carcass and lies down, or he wanders slowly and with satisfaction towards his happy home. In the latter case, the hyenas, jackals, and carrion birds seize their chance.

The astute hunter can often diagnose the case by the general actions and demeanour of these camp-followers. A half-dozen sour and disgusted looking hyenas seated on their haunches at scattered intervals, and treefuls of mournfully hump-backed vultures sunk in sadness, indicate that the lion has decided to save the rest of his zebra until to-morrow, and is not far away. On the other hand, a flapping, snarling, Kilkenny-fair of an aggregation swirling about one spot in the grass means that the principal actor has gone home. It is ordinarily useless to expect to see the lion actually on his prey. The feeding is done before dawn, after which the lion enjoys stretching out in the open until the sun is well up, and then retiring to the nearest available cover. In an undisturbed country, or one not much hunted, the early morning hours, up to, say, nine o'clock, are quite likely to show you lions sauntering leisurely across the open plains towards their lairs. They go a little, stop a little, yawn, sit down a while, gradually work their way home. At those times you come upon them unexpectedly face to face, or, seeing them from afar, ride them down in a glorious gallop.

HOW TO HAVE A BEAUTIFUL COMPLEXION.

One of our lady readers who found that her skin was becoming harsh and dry from the use of powders, rouge and creams, sends us the formula below. She states that the simple, harmless, and inexpensive lotion made therefrom softened her skin, and so greatly enhanced the beauty of her complexion that she has entirely done away with all other preparations which she had been accustomed to use. This lotion can easily be prepared at home or by any good pharmacien. It calls for two ounces of Rose Water, one drachm Tincture of Benzoin, and two ounces Flowers of Oxzoin. Mix together and apply night and morning with the hands, or use a soft cloth or sponge. Always shake well before using. Our obliging correspondent asks that her name be withheld for personal reasons, but nevertheless gives us permission to publish her letter for the benefit of other readers. She adds that this formula was given her by a woman 65 years old, whose youthful complexion and almost total absence of wrinkles were a source of wonder and admiration to all who knew her.

London Week by Week.

London, Friday, 21st June 1912.

After four weeks of wretched futility, the dock strike is completely beaten. The agitators who called this strike without any reasonable cause, for merely anarchical ends, are thoroughly discredited though they are still out of jail, worse luck. Their dupes have found them out. What money the unions had has been squandered, while wages have been thrown away. A great deal of wanton damage has been inflicted on the trade of the Port of London by which the strikers live. Misery and ruin have been brought on the men themselves. There was never either need or excuse for a strike, and no strike has ever ended in failure so complete. In these circumstances we believe that the employers would do well to show a large and tolerant magnanimity. We do not, of course, suggest that they should give way on any of the crucial points on which they took a firm and necessary stand, or that they should have any dealings with Mr. Ben Tillett. But the battle has been won, the noxious pretensions of the agitators have been swept away, and the strike, as weapon, has proved itself so wasteful and futile that all the least muddle-headed sections of Labour opinion have recognised its suicidal folly. Thus the employers of the Port have struck a sound blow for liberty and sanity.

With last week-end the splendour of mid-summer came upon the whole country. Could some super-airman have covered Great Britain from north to south and east to west during the Sunday he would have looked down everywhere on happy people in holiday mood basking in a radiant sunshine tempered by cool and gentle breezes—a perfect example of that most perfect of all climates, an English summer at its best. As the sun left the blue sky bright with fair white clouds, the warm, sensuous night brought greater beauty still. Sweet scents of flowers, floating on the slow-moving, caressing air, a languorous stillness and the deep, soft shadows united in a strange kind of Oriental charm.

The focus and centre of all the beauty of the glorious summer day was certainly the river, and the great place on the river was, as always on Ascot Sunday, Boulter's Lock. There are those who doubt—usually on wet days—whether "the river" is as popular as it was. If they had been at Boulter's Lock the only complaint they would have heard—and probably have made—would have been that the river, the lock, and the towing-path were severally too crowded for comfort. The morning trains from Paddington to the Thames Valley, and especially to the favoured region that lies between Windsor and Sonning, were crowded with men in flannels and girls in white. There was a steady stream of motor-cars along the Bath Road to Maidenhead Bridge. Riverside hotels were full, and parties came from most of the country houses which had been entertaining for Ascot.

Launches, motor-boats, punts—still the most popular, as some think they are the most graceful craft on the river—skiffs, canoes, and here and there a sailing-boat, one and all were engaged in the pastime of the day, the passage of Boulter's Lock. This is the focus of Ascot Sunday, its great clearing house, and it is a point of honour to go through the lock, somehow or other and some time or other. Everybody on the river yesterday who wished to get from Taplow or Maidenhead to the lovely stretch of river that nestles in the shade of Cliveden Woods had to go through the lock. For there were no rollers to take skiffs and punts out of the crush. The tramway by the side of the towing-path has gone, along with other familiar features of the old lock, and the new electrically-driven moving platforms—surely the height of luxury!—are not yet at work. But if river folk were denied this new sensation they had the satisfaction of passing through a brand new lock. It was the first severe test to which it had been put, and only those who were shut out—for the waiting "queue" in the afternoon never seemed to grow smaller—had anything but praise for the transformation effected by the Thames Conservancy

The Horse Show is to be followed by the costers' donkey show, and without attempting to appraise the respective importance of the two events, one may point out that both must, in the nature of things, be soon numbered with the curiosities of the past. For horses and donkeys are fast disappearing before the motor car and the motor bicycle. It only requires a new spurt in invention to make the disappearance complete. When motor bikes are constructed to leap five-barred gates and take twenty-feet water jumps there will be no more need of hunters; and already the motor barrow is coming into fashion to the exclusion of the faithful and fast-trotting "moke." The "pearlies" have gone and the "moke" is going; we must soon put up "Ichabod" on the Whitechapel walls.

It is with a pang of sadness that one has to chronicle the passing of the big gooseberry as a newspaper sensation. It has been superseded by the big strawberry. An enterprising contemporary has awarded a prize for the biggest strawberry and several bloated and plethoric specimens were sent in for competition. The encouragement thus given to the cultivators of mere size is distressing to fruit lovers with an old-time predilection for flavour. Your big strawberry is a hollow-hearted, spongey thing, without the fine flavour of sweetened sunshine. Out upon these overgrown and pretentious prodigies! If they come into general favour we shall have growers going over their beds with an air-pump, inflating the berries as if they were pneumatic tyres. Already there is a talk of Brobdignagian strawberries being retailed by the slice.

An announcement which will cause a good deal of interest in the worlds of journalism and sport is the formation of the "Sporting Times" Company, Limited, with a capital of £135,000, with Mr. W. F. de Wend Fenton as sole permanent director. The Financial News states that Mr. de Wend Fenton has the right of nominating ordinary directors, who are not to be more than five. Mr. de Wend Fenton is to have a remuneration of £2,600 per annum. It is interesting to compare these large figures with the price at which Mr. John Corlett acquired the Sporting Times from its founder, Dr. Shorthouse, which was £50. This was in 1874, and Mr. Corlett, who is a Nottinghamshire man of an old soldiering family, and started as a clerk in a City office, had then been nine years in sporting journalism. He was earning £1,000 a year doing "'Vigilant's' Notebook" for the Sportsman in the days when that paper was owned by "Rosebery" Smith, the famous owner, who won the Cesarewitch and Cambridgeshire with a horse called Rosebery, and built the Bon Marche at Brixton out of the winnings.

When Mr. Corlett took hold of the Sporting Times his marvellous memory, and his judgment in "horsey" matters, rapidly brought it to the front among followers of the Turf, while his staff made it the organ of the "mashers," the young men about town of the "seventies" and the "eighties."

There certainly never had been any English newspaper so unconventional or so "intimate" as the Pink 'Un, as it was nicknamed. Apart from the "Notebook," which Mr. Corlett transferred to it, maintaining the name "Vigilant," the paper chiefly consisted of the narratives of the adventures of the staff at the old Pelican Club, the National Sporting Club, Romano's Restaurant in the Strand, and in its earlier days the "Rifle Saloon," which stood in Fleet Street on the site of the Cock Tavern.

It was a happy-go-lucky combination, and all the staff had nicknames. Mr. Corlett, the proprietor, was "Master," and his country place at Headcorn in Kent figured in anecdote and reminiscence as "Bottombarley." There was Mr. Shirley Brooks, son of the editor of Punch, who figured as "Peter Blobbs," and Mr. William Farn Goldberg, who wrote as the "Shifter," and was the author of "The Office Boy's Diary." The "Shifter" was an Oxford man who had been a chorister in a D'Oyly Carte company, an advance agent, a club proprietor, and who ended his days as a journalist. He was famous for his knowledge of Dickens and for his Bohemian life. Mr. Charles Cureton Rhys, a Balliol man, who was notable for his translations of Horace, was another roysterer, who wrote as "Chat" and "The Pote." Then there was Mr. James Davis—"Bat" Davis, afterwards famous as "Owen Hall," the author of "The Geisha"—Mr. Bill Yardley ("Bill of the Play,") Mr. Edward Spencer Mott, who still writes as "Nathaniel Gubbins," and Colonel Newnham-Davis, famous as "the Dwarf of Blood" and an epicure of purest ray serene. All the leading figures in that Bohemian set had their nicknames too—"Dicky the Driver," and so on.

Romano, the Italian restaurateur, who made a fortune out of the advertisement which the Pink 'Un gave his house among the young bloods by making it one of the theatres of its narratives, was always called "the Roman." Agostino and Stefano Gatti were nicknamed Angostura and Stephanotis Gatti, and there were similar honors for all in the boisterous circle. The paper still bears the motto: "High Toryism, High Churchism, High Farming, and Old Port for ever," and its political attitude has been always worthy of its inspiration.

The House of Commons may be recommended to take a leaf out of the book of the Chicago Republican Convention. The other night one M.P. called a right hon'ble gentleman a coward, and the right hon'ble gentleman retaliated by calling the hon'ble member a cur. No one would wish to put severe restrictions on the interchange of the civilities common to political society, or to strain parliamentary amenities by the prohibition of gentlemanly invective; but there ought to be some provision for possible consequences. At Chicago, red cross flags were flying over a number of exits which led to emergency hospitals. This showed a prudent forethought, and the House of Commons should at once arrange to have an ambulance in the lobby, and one of the committee rooms set apart as a surgical ward. Hon'ble and right hon'ble members might then slang each other with immunity, knowing that broken heads could speedily be plastered.

"Alexandra Day" has come, and all male London was on Wednesday captive at the feet of the ten or eleven thousand pretty women in white, who were selling millions of artificial roses for charity's sweet sake.

It was a good idea, this scheme of celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the landing in England of Queen Alexandra, the "blissful bride of a blissful heir." That all London should wear her favourite flower, and by so doing help her favourite charities, was an inspiration.

There was no doubt about its success. Many leaders of the social and political world helped in the good work. Mrs. Asquith was busy in Whitehall Place, and Mrs. Lloyd George and her daughter were stationed near the Embankment. At the House of Commons, Mrs. Lowther, Lady Mond, and Lady Henry were disposing of flowers as quickly as they could take the money. Many peeresses acted as amateur flower-girls for the day. "It was roses, roses all the way," roses in the City and in the slums, roses in the pleasant garden suburbs, and roses along the dusty highways of the town.

The wonderful triumph of a charming idea was, of course, primarily a tribute to the respectful affection felt for a very gracious lady, who in fifty years has established herself for ever in the hearts of the people of this country. But there was more in it than this. It was an actual demonstration of solidarity in the best sense of a much-abused word. The cambric rose was like the mark of a secret society pledged to good and wholesome endeavour. The universality of the badge was a proof of common loyalty and common goodwill, a happy bridge over the perilous gulfs of class and politics. The hospitals reaped a golden harvest—something like £25,000 was collected. But those who contributed in pennies or in pounds reaped a richer one in the sense of fellowship, and Alexandra Day served well a national need.

Long ere these lines see print your Indian readers will have heard of the death of Sir George White, V.C.—hero and Irish gentleman. He had been ill for some time and died last Monday at Chelsea Hospital, aged seventy-seven. He had innumerable friends and millions of admirers in both hemispheres who can never forget how he "kept the flag flying" at Ladysmith. The Army can never forget how he saved it from the disgrace of surrender, even against the advice of the Commander-in-Chief in the field.

The defender of Ladysmith was a soldier without fear or reproach. He was a great Englishman, and a great Irishman too. Long before his name became a household word he had proved those qualities of which we as a people renowned in war are proud. India and Burma bore witness in many a desperate battle not merely to his personal bravery but also to that firm grasp of dangerous problems of which Ladysmith is the crowning example of his long career.

While his countrymen mourn the loss of a brave warrior and a devoted servant, his comrades and friends, mourn the loss of a man who in every relation of life was pre-eminent in loyalty, sympathy, and generosity. None knew better than Sir George White how to give praise to others and to take the blame upon himself. The spirit of self-sacrifice was in him, and he never hesitated to make the sacrifice for friend or for country. His sympathy and tact were unfailing.

NOTES ON TIGER SHOOTING.

In compiling these notes I find myself merged in that tide of banalities with which every other modern writer is invariably afflicted—the portrayal of those conventionalities which are forced upon one with an insistence which one would do much to avoid. I am referring, of course, to the little prefaced remarks so often considered necessary to the production of a sporting narrative; and now, with the reader's permission, I shall endeavour, so far as my feeble faculties will allow, to deal briefly yet conclusively, with the principal phases of tiger shikar before passing on to the lesser ideals.

Here in India be it known, there are various and divers methods of stalking the feline tribe. Besides being bagged from the resourceful machan, the tiger is often followed in the open, or else he is driven to death from the breezy heights of a howdah on the back of an elephant. Speaking of the south, however, it is a significant fact that he is rarely gotten in any other way than over a "kill." Tracking him on open ground is a course the average sportsman is content to eschew, principally, perhaps, because the chances of an encounter under those conditions are very often more than usually remote. is for much the same reason presumably, that the kathé generally has found so few adherents, for it is only when a large and systematic "beat" has been launched into pleasing effect, when the fact of the tiger being driven out into the very face of his pursuers (so to speak), is assured, that the elephant plays an important part in his destruction. But there are exceptions to every rule, and while I have spoken of the "stalking in open ground" as being a method rarely indulged in, it must be remembered here that there are some sportsmen who have departed from the customary method and bagged their tigers under the most unlooked-for circumstances. Besides, going after tiger is not quite like following panther, and it is a better policy to wait until you get news of your tiger and so be able to make a "formal acquaintance" than to force yourself into running the risk of a wastage of valuable time and energy in instituting a fruitless search; or, in the case of an encounter, something very much worse. Having got news you proceed with as little delay as possible to the venue, and if Fate is with you, and there is a dak bungalow or any other convenient shelter near to the scene of action, you are well advised to take advantage of it, for it is hardly sportsmanlike to expose yourself to the ravaging effects of a million mosquito bites, which would certainly be the case if you chose to take up your abode in one of the dismal swamps in the jungle interior. Then you wait for news of definite traces, and if there is really a tiger in the vicinity, it should not be long before you get it. Very often, however, a tiger does not consider himself bound to consult your convenience, and the frequency with which he changes his quarters is not a little embarrassing. Given an intelligent band of coolie trackers, however, and a tolerably fair endowment of ordinary patience and commonsense, it should not be long before you "run him down." Speaking of the village shikari, reminds me that it would be as well to say here that some little caution has invariably to be exercised before you engage your man; for on that functionary depends, to a very considerable extent, the making or marring of your shoot. He is for the most part a diminutive little object, very unlike his Herculean brother of the North, though quite as hardworking. He will walk miles for you from village to village without any apparent fatigue, and it is worthy of note that he is always careful not to do anything that will lower him in the shikari dorai's (gentleman's) estimation. For instance, if you are on a tiger shoot, lack of interest on his part to help you to discover traces he knows to be a serious offence and one that is likely to act as a deterrent to his being engaged on subsequent expeditions. Little wonder then, that so eager is he to please, that he is sometimes willing to stake his honour upon the game, and if, after days of weary toil, he is unable to find any "pug marks," he will go to the trouble of preparing one for you. For he believes that a sportsman's sole ambition in life is to find a "pug" and having gazed affectionately on it, go on his way to look for another and that the matter of following up the tiger by which it had been left, is one of minor significance. Personally, I have never been subjected to such a deception, though it is not a little amusing to hear of people who have. A friend of mine, who is a great sportsman, once related to me an incident of the kind with which he himself was closely associated. "I was out on a shooting trip in P," he said, "and the only sport I could get was a couple of head of sambhar and some feathered game. Of course, I had expected something very much better and one day, when intelligence was brought in to me of a tiger in a village several miles inland, I hailed the news with joy and started off immediately. Days passed without any further developments taking place, and though I did not doubt that a tiger had been in the vicinity, I was strongly of opinion that he had since decamped. Before giving up the business, however, I decided to send a party of villagers into the jungles where they were to make a searching detour and report to me any intelligence of importance, while my own shikari and I made a similar search in another direction. Fully six days passed without any news being brought in to me, and on the seventh all that I learned was that two of the search party had been struck off the list with an attack of jungle fever. Early on the morning of the ninth day saw the return of the third villager. With a look of absolute genuineness on his innocuous face, he told of a trace he had found, and the shikari and I set out immediately to examine the spot. Half an hour's walk brought us to a shady grove, and here, where a quantity of loose sand predominated, I was shown one of the most infamous frauds I have ever set eyes on. It was a carefully 'manufactured' pug, and one which might very easily have caught on with a 'young hand' But it lacked in originality of design, so that the fraud, so far as I was concerned, was easily detectable; and the villager reaped a fitting reward for his ingenuity. Of course I bagged no tiger, and this proved the correctness of my first theory, viz., that the tiger had changed his quarters, for I heard not long afterwards that he had crossed the frontier into British territory, where he was bagged several months later." But, let it be borne in mind, I do not give these instances with any intention of disparaging the utility of the village shikari, for he is mostly a hard working little beggar, and a very valuable adjunct to a sportsman's party.

Once, while out shooting small game in Y—r, a fine strip of jungle which stretched below the base of a magnificent range of hills, I got news of a tiger which had the reputation of being a maneater, so the shikari and I set out to make investigations. Great excitement prevailed as we entered the village, and even greater enthusiasm was aroused when we revealed our identity by asking for news of the tiger. Here we gathered somewhat conclusive proof that the latter was a maneater of the worst order, though it was also a fact that he was content to feast off an occasional bull or goat when human fare was not forthcoming. Three people had been attacked within the past twelve days, one a woman, another an old man, and the third a cowboy, who had been sent out as usual with the cattle, but had not returned. The woman too had met with a tragic fate, but the old man had had a Providential escape. He was sleeping on a pial outside his house on a cool and moonlit night, when suddenly he felt himself being rudely disturbed and carried off junglewards. But here the story ends, for the tiger, after carrying him some distance, suddenly left him, partly perhaps because of the noise set up by the old man and his relatives and partly because the tiger did not think it worth the trouble; for the victim was an article of ancient origin. We spent the night in an open shanty, and early next morning, after a hurried and incomplete breakfast, set out to patrol the base of the hills, and subsequently to inspect the remains of a bullock's carcase, which animal had been carried off by "stripes" one afternoon a week before, while the herd was grazing in that locality. This struck me as rather a singular proceeding for a tiger which had become accustomed to human flesh, but as I had never had the privilege of stalking such a formidable specimen before, I took a generous view of the subject and listened with the utmost intentness to all that was told me. Late the same afternoon saw us walking round the borders of the hill range, following a flock of sheep, and hoping that the tiger would be induced to come out if he were anywhere about, for I was assured that he had done so before. This might seem an egregious method of going about things, but it must be remembered that I had very little alternative. Rigging up a machan would have been of but small use, unless there was some proof that the tiger was in the vicinity. Meanwhile, we tramped steadily on, with the sun glowing in the west in a bright, lurid flame, and darkness fast supervening. The discovery of a decided "pug" by one of our party and a second one some yards ahead partly hidden in the shadow of a hedge set us all on the alert, and we waited breathlessly for what might follow. Down into ditches and wide gaping nullahs, past long rows of hedges and feathery topped plantations, we had walked, until now, our recent discovery had set all thinking, and here we halted, looking lingeringly on this "plot of promise." It might be that the tiger had passed that way a month ago and that the "pug" had been left undisturbed. But the native knows a "fresh" mark when he sees it, and whispered consultations among some of them were to the effect that the tiger was not very far distant. By this time we had all formed into a quadrangle round a heavy wall of bushes and had apparently forgotten everything save the fact that "stripes" might have shifted some distance ahead, which was as it subsequently transpired to be. Then a shrill "whoa" followed, the sheep were once again driven out on to the outer borders, and we followed slowly in their wake. Keeping rather too much in the background, I found myself separated by some twenty yards from the shikari and the others of the party, and I was deprived of the privilege of witnessing the coup which followed. Enough that a half roar and a crash, followed by a weird, pitiful little bleat was sufficient to prove that another shortage of one sheep had been marked in letters of red against the record of the day's proceedings. The rush was so sudden, yet so complete, that even when it was over, I strongly doubt if there was any one of our party who could fully comprehend what had actually occurred.

The week following the occurrence of the foregoing episode passed uneventfully enough, and yet another day after that was allowed to elapse before I could convince myself that a saunter along the hillside with the shikari and the .500 might not be without its fruitful results. Then we crossed the borders of the hill range, looked up almost timorously at the nigh gradient of the hill we were about to climb, and with one final effort, braced ourselves for the ascent and "did it like men." It was about midday when we set out and now the heat of a blazing afternoon sun was upon us. But we stuck to it, for the refreshing coolth of the forest shadows in the glade at the summit held out its attractions. A halt in the cool of the evening as we sat down on a bank and appeased the demands of the "inner man" with a smack of lunch and a cigarette was sufficient to refresh me for any further ordeals that might follow. It was just getting sunset as we entered the forest shadows, when presently a scampering rush from the right of us set us on the alert, and half a minute later saw the shikari and myself engaged in a wild chase after a barking deer. After such a climb as we had had I believe I would have been content with this for a trophy rather than go back empty handed. But the deer kept up a good lead, and I could never get within range; so with some reluctance, I gave up the chase, and contented myself with listening to the joyous bark of the deer as it crashed back into the jungle and safety. One point which impressed itself on me, was the extraordinary manner in which the deer kept up its bark, almost in a wild timorous strain, even after it had got well out of our ken. I was about to mention the fact to the shikari, when that functionary, who is always an excitable individual suddenly took a tight hold on my arm and with a wild "Look Sahib!" pointed half timidly to the projecting bough of a giant banyan not twelve yards from us. This was followed by a dull thud, and it was only then, with my eyes eagerly following the movements of, and transfixed by the cavernous snarl of an infuriated tiger, that I realised what we were in for. Drawing the head well over the left shoulder I let him have it with both barrels, when he immediately set off at a wild, onward rush in the direction in which he was facing. This gave me the impression that I had missed him clean, but one never knows one's luck, so we took a hurried stock of a few of the surrounding landmarks and then turned to retrace our steps to the village below. Early next morning, having summoned a band of coolies to our aid, we set off at a brisk pace for the spot, and here, in the thick, tall grass the direction the tiger had taken was clearly indicated. But the density of the grass made it heavy going, and naturally enough, none of the men were willing to take the risk of going in any further. The widespreading branches of a neighbouring tree, however, suggested a suitable way out of the trouble, and one man volunteered to go up and take a look out into the area beyond. A cry of exultant joy escaped him then as he explained the position of the tiger which was lying not twenty yards away from us. This inspired confidence in our men, and "stripes" was then approached with some care, and when, after being carefully pelted with stones to make sure that he was really dead, he was dragged out from the thorny hedge against which he had fallen, I examined him and found that the first bullet had almost shattered the shoulder while the second had penetrated the neck. Subsequent investigation revealed the putrid remains of a carcase near by, which perhaps explained 'stripes,' attitude on the tree on which the shikari had first spotted him and the temerity of the deer which we had been stalking. This was quite an unexpected "encounter" and one which, I think, very strongly supports the views I have expressed in the first part of this article.

SEA FISHING AT TEIGNMOUTH.

To those who wish to enjoy fair sea fishing, in a pleasant climate, the South Devon coast offers considerable attractions.

Teignmouth, or rather Shaldon the little village opposite to it on the other side of the river, has quite a reputation for bass fishing.

The harbour is formed by the widening of the river Teigh inside its narrow exit to the sea.

The tidal current in and out is very rapid, so that the fishing within the bar can only be carried out for a short time between tides.

The favourite bait for bass is a live sand-eel, and the local fishermen make a regular business of catching these delicate little fish with fine meshed nets. The sand-eels are kept alive in sourges, which are floating live-bait receptacles of galvanized iron or wicker work, shaped like short fat torpedoes to enable them to be towed behind a boat.

The bass do not enter estuaries and harbours in any numbers till well on in the summer: during the first week in June, I only heard of one or two small bass being taken in Shaldon Pool.

The plan is to drift slowly with the tide, just as it begins to make up the harbour, with a rod over the side and a live sand-eel.

The bass taken go up to five or six pounds, and the very early morning is the best time.

Besides bass, one can catch pollack, flat fish, and at times mackerel in Shaldon Pool.

Flat fishing is rather annoying sport on account of the quantity of weed which drifts with the tide and constantly fouls one's line.

There are also freshwater eels, which every now and then take the bait and give trouble. That there are plenty of flat fish is evidenced by the fact that certain fishermen make a living by fishing for them above Shaldon Bridge.

The pollack caught inside the harbour are small: they are to be taken with an artificial bait trailed behind a boat. The "Belgian Grub" is a favourite local lure, but no doubt a bright minnow, or a rubber eel would be just as killing.

The mackerel come into the harbour in the middle of summer, and are fished for from small sailing boats.

As the river is very shallow in places, centre-board sailing boats are great favourites at Teignmouth and Shaldon. Some of these are made unsinkable by having cylindrical cushions filled with some buoyant material, attached along the inside of the gunwales.

Outside the bar, in the open sea, there is very good fishing. A great bluff of red sandstone, crowned with pine woods, overlooks the narrow bar. Outside, round the outlying rocks of this great cliff, which is called the Ness, there is excellent pollack fishing.

The Parson and Clerk, two curious detached pinnacles of sandstone, are also good for pollack.

Off Maidencombe, half way between Teignmouth and Torquay, there is a most excellent whiting ground. Fishermen who are keen enough to go out at night, can make big catches of bream and conger.

Teignmouth is one of the few places on the South Devon coast which is not relaxing. There is always a pleasant breeze, either from the sea, or from Dartmoor. Haytor Rocks and the neighbouring ridges are in full view, whenever the air is clear.

There is a widespread idea that all Devon is very rainy. This belief is quite erroneous: Teignmouth, Newton Abbott, Exmouth, Paignton, etc., have all quite moderate rainfalls 30 to 34 inches.

The soil is very light and porous in many places, so that the ground dries rapidly.

Round about Newton Abbott for instance, I have been particularly struck by the rapidity with which the roads dry up after a shower of rain. York, with its low rainfall of 23 inches, is a peculiarly damp and disagreeable place, on account of the clay soil. The roads remain wet the whole winter, and the climate, though much colder, is infinitely more relaxing than that of Teignmouth.

The extraordinarily large allowance of sunshine is another charm of South Devon: directly a passing shower from the moors is over, out comes the sun, and the wet foliage glitters in the warm rays, as though the land had been sprinkled with diamonds.

CORROSION AND THE CAUSE OF METAL FOULING.

II.

CARBONATE of soda is one of the best things to use if taken in time, not only to clean out the barrel, but also to neutralise the acid action in the bore. The U. S. Government has always been a consistent user of it in all its tests, and, in fact, I believe, insists on it being used in all barrels it will be called on to accept. The writer has great faith in it, but it will not correct careless delay nor remove metal fouling. Past experience has made the writer a strong believer in the merits of graphite as an aid to proper lubrication, having had it in use previous to 1878 with perfect success with black powder, and with cast and grooved bullets, as well as the paper patched ones. His belief is that in some form of application it is a necessity with the more modern rifles and high-pressure powders, as it is unaffected by acids or alkalies, or by any heat that can be developed in the rifle, yet under all conditions it is a fine lubricant if properly applied and uniformly. From his experience with Acheson brand of graphite, the writer can recommend it as being the best yet produced for riflemen's use, but be sure to get that brand when you ask for it, as others are liable to be substituted by ordinary dealers.

A good way to use graphite in the powder charge is to mix the graphite in liberal quantity with the powder to coat the grains all over, then shake the whole in a sifter made with screen of coarse silk bolting cloth, when the excess of graphite will pass through, leaving the powder uniformly coated. To use it in wads, melt refined Stearine wax with all the graphite it will take up without becoming brittle, keeping it well stirred, as the graphite will settle to the bottom of the wax otherwise. When nearly cold, or after slightly heating, slice it off in thickness to spit and cut into wads for use on top of powder. Stearine wax when refined is neutral, has a high melting point, and leaves practically no carbon deposit.

The rifleman has many things to contend with at the best. The modern rifles and powders call for so many new and practically unknown details that his scores are quite likely to be spoiled as well as his rifle before he has mastered enough of them to save the gun. Powders should be neutral, if possible, not only in themselves, but also in their reactions on other parts which they come in contact with. All such materials such as swabs, oil, water, etc., used to clean the bore, should be of the best and absolutely free from acid. It is the writer's opinion, based on everyday practice, that gasoline, benzine, or naphtha, no matter what the fire test or grade, is about as bad as anything, if not the worst thing that is used to clean gun or rifle barrels. They are far too volatile, leave a very dry coating, and a strong tendency to rust.

Kerosene, on the other hand, is a much better solvent for many forms of corrosion, powder dirt, etc., and if care is taken to use only the best and most refined forms of neutral kerosene, there will be no ill after-effects. It leaves an oily coating, which is easily wiped away if desired, yet does not leave the surface so liable to rust, and is receptive of the many good oils to be used afterwards. Do not trust to luck; get enough of the best, and have it tested before using; then use it liberally. This is where many riflemen fall down; they do not take care to get neutral oil, and they do not use it liberally.

All mobiloil is not good, but that known to the trade as the "Gargoyle Brand, Grade B," and made by the Vacuum Oil Co., have a very high fire test and is generally neutral. Do not take anyone's word for that; have it tested. Keep it clean and closed tight when not in use. If a barrel was thoroughly well cleaned and corked tight at each end with corks that had been saturated in this oil and the barrel being filled with oil, the writer thinks it would keep for ever.

The Phosphor Bronze Smelting Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., manufacture a grade of phosphor bronze known as the "Elephant Brand," and which, to the best of my knowledge, they furnish in sheets, rods, or castings, to suit any purpose, and they can furnish it to stand continual use in boiling acids. The writer used some of this kind, which he bought from them a few years ago. It was ¼in. size rods and some ¼in. steam-pipe, and was in use every day for over five years in boiling sulphuric acid. After this time they showed no sign of corrosion, and when last heard from were still perfect, except for wear due to friction.

It would be interesting, although somewhat costly, to have a lot of high-power rifle shells made up from this metal and to suit some fine modern high-power rifle like the New Springfield, which had bothered with corrosion and metal fouling, use copper non-mercuric primers and good care otherwise, and report results. If any brother rifleman who is a fine mechanic should wish, he could make these at comparatively small cost, and it is the writer's opinion they would repay the trouble and outlay in lasting qualities and in helping to down the corrosion and metal fouling trouble.

Perhaps some day we may have makers who will give us steel that is non-corrosive, powder that is neutral, and shells and primers that will not oxidise, but until then we shall have to depend greatly on "elbow grease" and "cuss words" as aids in cleaning our rifle barrels.

These notes and comments have been written from experience in metal working and rifle using for many years past as well as in other lines. They are given for what they are worth and in the hope that they may be of assistance to some careful worker who is looking for all the light he can get, not as authoritative data which will end all troubles right away, but as helpful and kindly suggestions to those who are careful in their methods. The careless ones will get into "steen different kinds of trouble, in spite of us all any way we could fix it.—"Trim Nat," in Arms and the Man.

JONES, able seaman of H.M.S. Vernon, gazed into the face of his commander pleadingly. "You are always on leave!" exclaimed the officer. "What on earth do you require extra leave for now?" "My sister's baby's going to be waxnated, sir," replied Jones. "And what has that to do with you?" "She's my sister, d'y see, sir?" exclaimed Jones, with a hurt look. "What, the baby!" "No, sir. The baby's sister's my brother—I mean, I'm the mother's baby—er—the father's my mother—no—I mean—" "You mean!" broke in the commanding officer, angrily. "What do they want you for—that's the point?" "P-p-please, sir," stuttered Jones, "they want m-m-me t-to stand as god-m-mother."

BANGALORE SECOND SUMMER GYMKHANA.

Thursday, 11th July 1912.

THE Gymkhana Races held last Thursday afternoon were got through in very pleasant weather, although while driving down to the course it was rather warm. There was a very fair attendance in both the enclosures, among whom I noticed in the Grand Stand Major-General Mackenzie Kennedy, Sir A. A. Apear, Colonel Arthur Young and a host of sporting gentlemen who have come down here for the big meeting which begins on the 11th instant. Leicester and Dalal represented the pencilling brigade and did a moderate business. Six races were down on the card and five favourites got home much to the jubilation of those who accepted the reasonable prices offered by the two bookies, especially Leicester. Barring the unfortunate bump Shirley's Hope gave Forrard On in the steeplechase, which caused a deal of dissatisfaction amongst the public over the objection being overruled, sport was thoroughly good and enjoyable. The band of the 7th Hussars played at intervals during the afternoon. The following are the results:—

THE OPEN PONY RACE.—Rs. 49 to the winner and Rs. 10 to the second. For all ponies 14·2 and under that have not won a race value Rs. 900 since 31st March 1910. 14·2 to carry 9st. 10lb. W. I. Winners since 31st March 1910 to carry once 4lb., twice 7lb., oftener 12lb. Maidens allowed 5lb. 4 furlongs.

Mr. G. Wright's bk aus g Glory, 8st. 13lb.	Futh 1
Col. J. Desaraj Urs' b e m 36, 8st. 7lb.	P. Kuhn 2
Lieut.-Col. Logan Home's ch e m Rolling Stone, 10st. 3lb.	Mr. Macalmont 3
Major C. Rankin's b e m Brynbella, 8st. 7lb.	Meah Jan 0

BETTING: 6 to 4 on Glory, evens 36, 2 to 1 Rolling Stone and 4 to 1 Brynbella.

Brynbella was a bit fractious at the post, but when they were sent away Glory got the best of the start and led by two lengths right up to the bend, 36 gradually drawing closer as the straight was entered; the other two tailing off. From the distance post 36 was on the girths of Glory and both of them had to be ridden, but the favourite, who was full of running, won by half a length; two lengths dividing second and third. Time—53secs.

THE CHARGER RACE.—Rs. 49 to the winner and Rs. 10 to the second. For all horses regularly ridden on parade by officers of the Bangalore Garrison, which have never won a race under C.T.C. rule. W. A. and C. raised 2st. Previous winners of a Gymkhana race to carry 7lb. extra. To be ridden by those qualified to enter. 1 mile.

Mr. T. A. Thornton's b aus m Ballet Girl, aged, 11st. 3lb.	Owner 2
Mr. D. V. Creagh's b aus g The Kid, aged, 11st. 3lb.	Owner 3
Mr. J. R. Ramsey's ch aus g Rufus, aged, 11st. 10lb.	Owner 0
Mr. H. M. J. Alves' b aus g Amcol, 11st. 3lb.	Owner 0

BETTING: 6 to 4 on Red Hussar, 5 to 2 agst. Ballet Girl, 9 to 1 each Rufus and Amcol, and 5 to 1 The Kid.

Red Hussar, Rufus and The Kid paced abreast as far as the six-furlong post when Red Hussar shot to the front and before the half mile was reached, the favourite had a lead of two lengths, the others all in a bunch. At the three furlongs Ballet Girl chased the leader, but Red Hussar went farther away from his field and won hands down by four lengths; two lengths separating second and third. Time—1min. 56secs.

THE GRAND MILITARY HANDICAP STEEPLECHASE.—Rs. 49 to the winner and Rs. 10 to the second. For all horses regularly ridden on parade by officers of the Bangalore Garrison. To be ridden by those qualified to enter. 2 miles.

Major C. Rankin's br aus g Shirley's Hope, aged, 11st. 4lb.	Mr. Thornton 1
Major C. A. Sykes' b aus g Forrard On, aged, 11st. 8lb.	Mr Ramsey 2

Mr. H. M. J. Alves' ch aus g White Star, 10st. 10lb. (car. 12st. 2lb.) ...	Mr. Gordon 0

BETTING: Evens each Phillip and Forrard On, 4 to 1 Shirley's Hope, 5 to 1 Bolter and 6 to 1 White Star.

Phillip slightly led from Forrard On, Bolter and Shirley's Hope jumping together, while White Star tailed off immediately 6 lengths away. As they passed the Stand Forrard On forged ahead from the others and led by two lengths, Shirley's Hope displacing Phillip and Bolter next. This was the order maintained as the fences were negotiated as far as the 5 furlongs from home when Shirley's Hope draw closer and as they entered the straight Forrard On was leading with Shirley's Hope coming along fast; just as the horses in the straight was about to be taken Shirley's Hope swerved and dashed into Forward On, who was nearly brought down and in the run home Shirley's Hope going stronger won by one and a half lengths; ten lengths between second and third. Time.—1mins. 16⅘ secs. An objection was lodged against the winner for bumping, but it was overruled.

THE DALAL CUP (open)—Rs. 49 to the winner and Rs. 10 to the second. For all horses that have not won a flat race value Rs. 1,100 or over since 31st March 1910. W. A. and Co. Winners once 4lb. twice 7lb., oftener 10lb. Maidens allowed 5lb. 5 furlongs.

Mr. H. Wishart's b aus m Bomb, 9st. 1lb.	Firth 1

BETTING: Even Bomb, 5 to 2 Uro, 4 to 1 each T. M. S. and Bachelor's Art, 5 to 1 each Vic's Pride and Sugar Loaf, 10 to 1 Valiant.

After two false starts, the field of seven were sent away on even terms, Bomb and Uro making the running, Valiant running last all the way. As they took the bend for the run home Uro ran out and lost a lot of ground, but on coming again he could not make any impression on Bomb, who won rather easily; Batchelor's Art running into third place two lengths away. Time—1 min. 6secs.

THE DESERT PLATE (open)—Rs. 49 to the winner and Rs. 10 to the second. A handicap for all Arabs 14·2 and under. 1 mile 2 furlongs.

First Day, Tuesday, 16th July.

RACING opened this afternoon in pleasant weather, after a slight drizzle. The attendance was unusually large and there were any amount of bookmakers. Captain Campbell Ross did the starting and Colonel A. A. Jones was in the Judge's box. The first race was the Horse Trials for which Criton was red hot favourite and carried home all he was worth. Nine stripped for the Paddock Plate for which Evening Herald and Kismet started about equal favourites but Red Patch was the dark horse and the knowing ones who backed him at long odds were delighted see him win. The Pony Trials saw a field of seven go out for which Hazed was most fancied and backed down to five to four on and then rubbed off. Of the others Harebel and Asfandier started at three's, the latter carrying most money and his supporters were not disappointed as he ran splendidly and won a grand race. A few strides from Home Zari and Grey Mist had a keen fight for places the former finishing second by a head. A field of eleven donned silk for the Macintire Plate. This was considered a good thing for Tom Chaucer and he was well backed at two's and evens eventually starting at one and a half and winning from Bachelor's Art and Metal Maid both outsiders. Eva B and Wave Hill had a fairly strong contingent of supporters but failed to come up to expectations. The C.-B. Plate was a five furlong sprint and a very open event. Six starters faced the barrier Pearl and Harebell being about equal favourites. Crowbar had a large following, Chemise a moderately small coterie of friends. The last named came up on the post and made a dead heat with Crowbar her stable companion, Harebell finishing half a length behind. The dead heat was run off later and Crowbar showed that she could win with something to spare. A Pony Scurry attracted nine candidates of whom Safety Pin and Mauveron had first call, Mandeville and Premos next in demand. Betting on the race opened at fives and sixes expanding to tens and twelves. Lady's Maid, a rank outsider with Melsom up, winning all the way, the favourites nowhere. Following are details :—

NEWCASTLE.

IT is rare indeed that we have two objections in the course of a single afternoon's sport, but such was the case at Gosforth Park on Tuesday, which somewhat marred an otherwise interesting afternoon's sport. It must be admitted that in each case there was some grounds for complaint, but both were overruled. The first was against the Ladaside filly in the 31st Biennial Stakes, and the other concerned The Guller in the concluding event. Lord Lonsdale was expected to secure the North Derby by the aid of St. Neots, but the prize went to Absolute, the property of Mr. Hall Walker. Results:—

CRICKET.

SURREY vs. LANCASHIRE.—The match at the Oval had a very uninteresting finish on Saturday. Lancashire easily saving the game and declaring so late as to leave themselves no chance of getting Surrey out. Thanks to a magnificent and nearly faultless innings by John Tyldesley, Lancashire, who had to face arrears of 94 on the first innings, were at the tea interval 259 runs to the good, and there were two hours left for play when the game was continued. Instead of declaring then Hornby waited until five minutes past five, and then Surrey went in to get 269 in an hour and ten minutes. The remaining play was not taken quite seriously, and before stumps were drawn at a quarter past six Surrey lost three men for 57. Score:—

WARWICKSHIRE vs. HAMPSHIRE.—Remarkable for heavy scoring, the match at Coventry had to be left drawn. Warwickshire held a lead of 98 on the first innings and as stumps were to be drawn at half-past five, they forced the game in the effort to win. They met with no special success, and it was not until after lunch that they were in a position to declare. Then Hampshire were sent in to try and get 262 in two hours and a half. They never looked like getting the runs, and only lost Stone, who was out in a curious manner, removing a bail in falling, after being struck on the head. Johnston and Mead played fine cricket, but when a draw was certain, the Warwickshire captain rested his best bowlers. The match was given up when Johnstone had made three figures for the second time in the game.

NOTTS vs. YORKSHIRE.—As the result of a most interesting game at Trent Bridge Yorkshire gained a splendid victory by 5 wickets. They were 116 runs behind on the first innings, but did so well in the field on Friday that they began the last stage of the match requiring 232 runs to win with nine wickets in hand. This did not prove such a serious task as seemed probable, as the wicket was in good order. Rhodes had been dismissed overnight, but Denton played with some freedom, the second partnership producing 60 runs. When Wilson left at 155, and four men were out, Notts appeared likely to win, but then, Kilner and Tasker, by adding 115 in an hour and a half, practically won the match, only three runs being wanted when the amateur left. Batting two hours without giving a chance, Kilner, who had the satisfaction of making the winning hit, played splendid cricket, and included in his 73 were eight fours. It was curious that Kilner, who came into the side for Hirst, should have had such a big share in his side's victory. Full score :—

wickets in hand, were no more than 35 runs on when the game was continued but Saville, who had played so well overnight, found a good partner in Hopley, who, making a rather uncertain start, subsequently hit with great vigour. Realising 47 runs, the stand came to an end with Saville being bowled. Saville played better than he has ever done before this season, and hit seven 4's. The county fared badly before luncheon against the bowling of Kidd and Holloway, five wickets being down with 37 on the board. After the interval, however, Chaplin and Cox made matters quite safe for their side by putting on 38 runs together. Full score:—

THE THIRD TEST MATCH.

THE third Test match of the triangular series—between England and Australia—ended at Lord's on the 27th in a draw. England declared with seven wickets down for 310, and Australia, thanks to some fine batting by Macartney and Kelleway, had scored 282 for seven when stumps were drawn.

The Australians must be congratulated on a fine performance, but the game made it clear that the English attack must be strengthened by the inclusion of a fast bowler. Score:—

LAWN TENNIS.

OXFORD VS. CAMBRIDGE.—The annual matches between Oxford and Cambridge were concluded at Oxford on the 26th instant, when the Doubles were decided. Cambridge proved successful by 6 matches to 3, and as they won the Singles on Tuesday by 8 matches to 1 the entire competition resulted in their favour by 14 matches to 4. The results were:—

W. St. J. Pym (Rosall and Trinity) and H. Crisp (Barnet and St. Catharine's) Cambridge, beat E. F. Herring (Australia and New College) and H. R. Pope (Eton and New College) (6—2, 6—4); beat L. S. Hunter (Kelvinside and New College) and L. S. Lee (Wellington and Merton) (6—1, 6—1); beat A. Traill (Charterhouse and New College) and P. S. Cannon (Repton and New College) (9—7, 6—3).

H. G. Eltringham (Charterhouse and Caius) and C. N. Thompson (South Africa and St. John's), Cambridge, lost to E. F. Herring and H. R. Pope (5—7, 7—5, 5—7); beat L. S. Hunter and L. S. Lee (6—2, 6—4); beat A. Traill and P. S. Cannon (6—2, 3—6, 6—4).

E. V. Adams (Dulwich and Caius) and J. S. de Morpurgo (Private and King's), Cambridge, lost to E. F. Herring and H. R. Pope (3—6, 6—1, 3—6); beat L. S. Hunter and F. S. Lee (7—5, 6—2); lost to A. Traill and P. S. Cannon (6—3, 0—6, 4—6).

ATHLETICS.

THE A. A. A. CHAMPIONSHIPS.

FULLY 15,000 spectators attended the general championships of the Amateur Athletic Association, which took place on Saturday, the 22nd instant, at Stamford Bridge. They were fourteen in number, the other two events—viz., the seven miles walk, secured by R. Bridge, of the Lancashire Walking Club, in 52mins. 45 3/5secs. and the ten miles run, in which W. Scott, of the Broughton Harriers, proved successful in 52mins. 35secs.—having been decided at the same enclosure on 20th April this year.

Bridge and Scott both competed on Saturday, the former in the two miles walk and the latter in the four miles run; but whereas Bridge was successful (winning by twenty yards from E. J. Webb in 13mins. 55 2/5secs.), Scott had to put up with a seventy yards' defeat by the soldier, G. W. Simson, who covered the four miles in 20mins. 10 4/5secs.

It was thought that Bridge's success in the two walking championships would secure for him the Harvey Memorial Gold Cup for the most meritorious feats in connection with the championships of 1912; but the committee, after full consideration of the principal performers' merits, came to the conclusion that the South African representative, G. H. Patching, was most entitled to the honour.

It was a decision to which no reasonable person could object, for Patching won the 100 yards in 9 4/5secs.—a record for this particular event, although, perhaps, the wind was a little in the runner's favour—was second, beaten about three yards, to C. N. Seedhouse, a Newmarket member of the Blackheath Harriers in the quarter-mile (time, 49 4/5secs.), and third to W. R. Applegarth, of the Polytechnic Harriers, and the Welsh champion, D. H. Jacobs, of the Herne Hill Harriers, who were first and second in the order named in the 220 yards championship, which Applegarth won by a good yard, in 22secs., thereby tieing J. N. Cartmell's championship record accomplished in 1909.

Patching spoiled a very good chance of winning the "quarter" by cutting out the work at top speed. In fact, he could not have run the race in a way more likely to suit Seedhouse (who came with a grand and successful spurt in the last fifty yards, when Patching had exhausted his pace) had he tried to do so.

Only four of last year's champions defended their titles, viz.: D. F. MacNicol in the mile, H. V. L. Ross in the two miles walk, H. Braun, of the Munchener Sports Club, Germany, in the half-mile, and P. Kirwan, of the Irish A.C., in the long jump, and of these only Braun, who won the half-mile in 1min. 58 1/5secs., and Kirwan, who cleared 23ft. 2½ins., proved successful.

In ten of the fourteen championships decided on Saturday the winners did better performances than was the case last year. Results:—

220 YARDS.—W. R. Applegarth (Polytechnic H.), 1; C. H. Jacobs (Herne Hill H.), 2. *Time—22secs.

QUARTER-MILE.—C. N. Seedhouse (Blackheath H.), 1; G. H. Patching (South Africa), 2. *Time, 49 4/5secs.

HALF-MILE.—H. Braun (Munchener Sports Club) (holder), 1; J. T. Soutter (Aberdeen University), 2. *Time—1min. 58 1/5secs.

THE CHAMPIONSHIP.

EDWARD RAY won the open championship at Muirfield with the fine score of 295. Perhaps the whole of Ray's golf may be summed up most accurately by a remark heard on the links.

"What was the best point of his game" someone asked, and was explosively answered: "All of it, you fool."

Ray was out to be champion, and it was about his turn. His approach putting was perhaps the thing that struck one most. His confidence in himself was colossal. The genial giant, as he is often called, only made mistakes to recover from them with apparent ease. His terrific right forearm carries him through appalling difficulties.

No one but the most biased of his admirers—and, of course, he has any amount of them—could compare him as a stylist to Harry Vardon. He is a great big man with a distinctive walk, with a decided roll in it, a green hat and an inevitable pipe.

Ray's terrific strength won him the championship. And his win was most extraordinarily popular. But when George Duncan finished the feeling, that a good man had to have, was that of the late W. L. Murdoch in the great Test match of 1902 at the Oval: "Why can't we both win?" Why can't they all win?

He was carried shoulder high from the green by his brother Channel Islanders. Many players had yet to finish, but it was recognised on all sides that Ray could not be beaten, and in a minute or two cheers were heard in the professionals' tent.

All through Ray has been very consistent. In his qualifying rounds on Friday he headed the field with rounds of 77 and 76. On the first day of the competition proper he returned 71 and 73, and yesterday, with 76 and 75, he put up an average of 74 2-3 for the six rounds he has played upon the course of the Honourable Company of Edinburgh Golfers.

Ray's figures through the two hard days were: Monday, first round—4 5 4 3 3 5 4 4 4 4 4 3 4 3 4 5 4 4 =71. In the second round in the afternoon—3 4 4 4 5 4 4 5 4 4 5 4 4 3 4 4 4 4 =73. This morning he did 3 3 3 5 4 4 5 4 5 5 4 4 5 4 4 5 4 5=76; and in the afternoon, although starting apparently nervous—3 4 4 4 5 4 3 6 5 4 4 4 4 4 5 4 4=75. Ray's score ties with Taylor's 295 at Deal in 1909, but does not, of course, equal Braid's phenomenal 291 at Prestwick in 1908. The next best to these three was Jack White's 296 at Sandwich in 1904.

For the last eight years Ray has occupied a prominent position in the classic event and tied for fifth place in 1907, 1910 and last year.

Born in Jersey in 1878, Ray is one of the giants in the golfing world, for he stands over six feet high and weighs about fourteen stone. He was formerly engaged as professional to the Churston Club, Devon, the Scarborough Club, Canton, and is now attached to the new Oxhey Club at Northwood, Middlesex.

Vardon, in spite of his blunders and his rotten bad luck, was second with 299. Given luck, Vardon might have done under 290; that sounds unreasonable, not to mention mad, but it happens to be true.

George Duncan got fourth prize, but what were prizes to men like that? He had keyed himself up for this one thing, and though nearly there he was so far away.

Those few strokes, those bits of luck; that slight lack of self-belief and what it does mean in a championship cost him the contest. Duncan could beat Ray in the international, could play as if a master was teaching a promising pupil, and to-day the pupil won.

Braid made his recoveries, but the strain was too big even for his marvellous temperament.

"YOUR pa attends a great many banquets," remarked the visitor. "I hear he is going to have his after-dinner speeches published. I guess they will be interesting." "Not half as interesting as his before-dinner speeches," said Truthful Tommy. "Before-dinner speeches?" "Yes, the speeches pa makes when dinner is a few minutes late."

A LAWYER noticed that his youthful son, who was studying arithmetic, seemed very restless. "What ails you? Why can't you sit still? Wriggling about every minute!" "It's all your fault," murmured the boy. "My fault! Why!" "Because I asked you last night how much a billion was, and you said it was a heap. Teacher asked me the same question to-day, and I gave the same reply. That's why I can't sit still!"

THE POONA AND KIRKEE FOXHOUNDS.

THE opening meet of the Poona and Kirkee Hounds was held at Ganeshkhind on Thursday morning last. There was a good field and the Master had fourteen and a half couple of hounds at work. Among those out were Major-General Barter the new president of the hunt, Colonel Logan Home, Master, Lieutenant Whaley, Lieutenant Johnson and Captain Cassim Shan' whips, General Sir A. Barrett, Lady Barrett and Miss Von Goetben, H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, all the members of the Government House Staff, the Hon. Mr. C. Hill, the Hon. Mr. Curtis, the Hon. Mr. Quin, Colonel Cramole, Colonel Evans, Colonel Impey, Colonel Perkins, Mr. H. Symons, Mr. Fowler, Mrs. and Miss Fitzgibbon, Mrs. Davie, Mrs. Sydenham, Miss Harrow, Miss Palin, Miss Crawford, the Misses Wheeler and a host of others, every regiment and department being well represented.

After being photographed the company moved off along the Bombay road and across the Harris Bridge on the other side of which a jackal was put up and away went hounds in the direction of the Alandi Road. Crossing this they came to stop in a nullah, where they switched on to a fox, who took them across the road and then made for the railway. Hounds were again at fault shortly after and were whipped off. On drawing once more another jackal was turned out but got away with a whole brush as hounds were unable to hunt him far, scent being very poor. Returning to Government House the field were entertained to breakfast by H. E. the Governor and Lady Clarke.

On Sunday the meet was at the fourth milestone on the Bombay road. There had been rain the night before and scent was better than it had promised to be. The broken ground on the east of the road was first tried and we were soon on to the line of a good jackal who gave us a fast gallop of over 23 minutes. He made his point for Bhosari, then turned to the left and was ultimately killed in the open. The brush was presented to Mrs. Ramwell. The Master then drew a fox and hounds went away on a hot scent in the direction of the Bombay road: crossing this they were at fault, and as it was getting late they were whipped off. Nearly sixty formed the field, and amongst those out were General Sir A and Lady Barrett, Colonel Dunlop, M. F. H., the Hon. Mr. Millett, Lieutenant-Colonel Impey, Majors Bowen, Hughes, Henderson, Robinson, Kemble, and Westmorland, Captains Chaytor, Collum, Cook, Conker, Davis, Lucas, Langrishe McCudden, Startin, Sydenham, Vachell, Vines, Walker, and Wilson, Messrs. Knight, Bruce, Eeles, and Cany, Mrs. Fowler Mrs. FitzGibbon, Mrs. Collum, Miss V. Goetham, Mrs. Sydenham, Mrs. Vines, and Mrs. Ramwell.

Football.

CALCUTTA NOTES AND COMMENTS.

THE twentieth annual I.F.A. Shield Tournament at Calcutta commenced on Friday, when two matches in the second round were played. The two matches in the first round fell through—the Moslems scratching to the Rangers, while the Measurers were disqualified and so Sova Bazar, like the Rangers, had a walk over. Another team which scratched were the Chinsurah Town, but as two teams had entered from this suburban station, a representative side will appear in the competition, the Town and the Association clubs of the Chinsurah station having amalgamated. With the exception of the E. I. R. (Asansol), Sibpur and the Black Watch, the remaining teams have before taken part in this competition. New blood is always welcome, but still we cannot say that the three teams mentioned are new to Calcutta football. Sibpur have invariably taken part in the Trades competition, but as this tournament in recent years had gone from bad to worse, the competition, year before last, taking over two months before it was completed, Sibpur were obliged to scratch, as their autumn vacation starts early in August. Last year Sibpur did not enter for the Trades, and it would be throwing away money for entrance fee when after playing two games they would have to withdraw. I absolutely fail to see why this tournament should not finish within a month and next year it is to be hoped that the Trades will start by the end of June and wind up by the end of July. To let any tournament hang on for six weeks or two months is absolutely ridiculous, but this is due to a bad management and the numerous illegitimate competitions which are permitted to be run by the I.F.A. Some of our biggest clubs are encouraging "pothunting" by entering for these trash competitions, and it is these "soccer" mad people that are killing the Rugby game in Calcutta.

The tournament is again, so to speak, of only local interest and of the two military up-country teams the doings of the Royal Irish Rifles will claim more attention than that of the East Yorks. The latter's prospects of going far in the tournament are not very rosy, for they had their work cut out to beat Sibpur—a purely junior team by two goals to one. The Fyzabad team have lost several of last year's players, including Cressey, their brilliant goal-keeper. The game between Sibpur and the East Yorks took place on the Dalhousie ground last Friday, and was witnessed by a large crowd of people; but the majority of the spectators were somewhat disappointed at the moderate display given by the East Yorks. The weather conditions when the match started were not unfavourable, but the showers of rain during the early afternoon rendered the ground heavy and slippery. During the initial half of the game the East Yorks did all the attacking and led at half time by two goals to nil. Grimshaw was credited with both the goals, the first being scored from a pass by Pratt, while the second one was from the result of a corner kick

After ends had been changed the college boys played surprisingly well, Baptist, McGuin, Ghose, and Duncan in particular being prominent. Dunhill, the East Yorks goalie, had a lot of shots to handle, and Whitley being penalised for "hands" in the prescribed area Sibpur were awarded a penalty kick, and Baptist taking the shot, scored. Several were of opinion that the penalty should never have been allowed, and it was one of his opponents who kicked the ball onto the hand of the East York's man.

The Middlesex and Y.M.C.A. match hardly attracted a hundred spectators, and a tame game ended in a victory for the Dum Dum team by a goal to nil. The Middlesex, who opened the season in promising style, have fallen off considerably, and have never been able to recover themselves. Two or three of their regimental players are at Dinapore, and next Monday they are certain to go down to the Black Watch.

The Bristol United were expected to give the Customs a great game, but the Scotch team were outclassed, and the only thing the Bristol players or rather some of them were better in was "tripping". The centre half was an adept in putting out his leg and tripping the opposite players, and he was fortunate in not being pulled up by the referee. The Customs won by only two goals to nil, but the score might have been four or even more, so great was the disparity between the two teams. It was fortunate for Carlstion, the Customs goalie, that he was not troubled at all throughout the game, for this fine player had only left his bed the day previous after five days' fever, and was in no fit condition to play. Lamb, the Bristol goal-keeper, saved a lot of hard shots, and but for his fine goal-keeping the Scotch team would have been badly beaten. The Customs had a few changes in their team, but the selections were not satisfactory. Hargreaves, who has performed exceedingly well at back, was sent as right half, while Alexander partnered Williamson as outside right, a position that was not to Alexander's liking. Vaillant was put out of the team, while McCready, who would have done better as inner left, was played right full-back. If the same team played Calcutta on Saturday, the "Reds" should win easily. Against the Bristol, Galbraith and Hyland got a goal each, the Customs winning by two to nil.

The Calcutta ground on Monday evening was the Mecca of all football enthusiasts, especially the Indians who came to see their favourites—Mohan Bagan—play Calcutta. The Mohan Bagan team in previous matches had displayed nothing like the form they exhibited last year, but as Calcutta had also done none too well in the recent League competition speculation was rife as to which side would win. It was an exceedingly keen struggle, for there was determination on both sides to appear in the next round, and the thirty or forty thousand people who witnessed the match, saw a fast and most exciting game. The crowd was the largest that has witnessed a match this season, but the attendance was much smaller than the one that witnessed the final last year. Mohan Bagan and Calcutta had not met in any important tournament since 1907—the Minto affair, when Mohan Bagan won a most sensational and unexpected victory. Last Monday, however, Calcutta avenged this defeat and won by two goals to one. There was nothing much to choose between the two teams, and while Mohan Bagan netted the ball on three occasions Calcutta scored twice

The Indian spectators were naturally dissatisfied with the referee's decision, and there were thousands among whom were a large number of Europeans, who thought that a draw of two all was the correct score. However, Donaldson, an ex-soldier who comes from Jamalpur and has refereed a good deal in Lancashire, was probably in a better position to judge than most of the people. Calcutta, on the run of the play, deserved to win, and the scoring was credited to Fenn, who, with Sherman, were the pick of the Calcutta forwards. The players on both sides worked like Trojans and the game was a typical Shield contest.

On Tuesday, the match, between the Black Watch and the Rangers, was a tame affair, the Fort regiment winning by two goals to nil. Bandmaster O'Donnell netted both the points. The Rangers played much below their League form.

The same evening on the Sova Bazar ground the Home team played a goalless draw with the Chinsurah Sporting Club.

"Semelle" Non-Skid.

If a non-skid tread is to be really effective, it must be actually a part of the cover—not an attachment.

That is the principle—dictated by Science and confirmed by experience—upon which the Michelin "Semelle" is made.

The tread, which forms an integral part of the tyre, is composed of a stout leather band.

This band, besides rendering the cover practically puncture-proof, constitutes the only effective foundation for the hard steel studs which project through it and grip the ground.

THE LAHORE TOURNAMENT.

THE postponed match in the semi-final round was played on the 9th instant when the North-Western Railway "A" met the 46th Brigade R.F.A. As was expected the Railway were too good for their opponents and beat them easily by 8 goals to nil. The final was played on the 10th instant on the Railway ground, the contesting teams being the Chief's College and the Railway "A" team. As was expected the Railway were victorious in spite of the good game put up by the College team, which played determinedly to the finish. The score was 2 to nil in favour of the Railway at the interval and on resuming they pressed throughout the second period and scoring four more goals without response ran out winners by 6 goals to nil. The Railway thus won the cup which was presented to them at the conclusion of the game by the Hon. Mr. Justice Robertson. The winners scored 31 goals in the four matches they played, their own goal line being crossed only once. Results :—

CARPENTIER vs. KLAUS.

AUDIENCE IN AN UPROAR.

RIOTOUS scenes marked the finish of the fight at Dieppe on the 25rd June, between Georges Carpentier, the young French boxing champion, and Frank Klaus, of America, for the middle-weight championship of the world. The contest was one of twenty rounds.

In the nineteenth round Carpentier's manager, M. Decampes, sprang into the ring and shouted at the referee, declaring that Klaus was jostling his opponent with his elbows. M. Decampes then seized Carpentier by the waist and tried to drag him from the ring. Carpentier, with tears of rage in his eyes, struggled desperately to free himself from his manager's grasp, but in the meantime his second had thrown the sponge into the ring. The fight was thus closed and the spectators, who had been excited to the highest degree by the progress of the match, dispersed amid unruly scenes.

The contest was not a remarkable one to watch. Klaus, despising all the finer arts, hammered his man with all his might from close range. Carpentier was cooler and more skilful. When his manager interfered he had a slight lead over Klaus and was boxing very calmly, while the American was getting rather wild.

In the first round Carpentier ran in, and Klaus got in a beautiful upper-cut. In the second Carpentier shot out his left to Klaus's head, and then tried to upper-cut. Klaus got in two on the face and one in the ribs in return.

Klaus began to get the upper hand in the in-fighting in the third round and inflicted a great deal of punishment with both hands on Carpentier's body. Once, too he hooked him with the left and landed on the ribs. In the fourth round Klaus was leading, and in the fifth he forced the fight at a great pace and he struck the Frenchman on the point. Carpentier went down for three seconds, and when he rose was "groggy." He ran in and put both arms round Klaus, and the referee did not disengage him. Klaus tried hard to get in a knock-out blow, but did not succeed.

In the sixth and seventh rounds Carpentier boxed very warily. In the eighth he had completely recovered. In the eleventh round, however, he showed fatigue. Rounds 16 and 17 saw Carpentier rally and perform better work, and at one point it looked as though he were going to win. Klaus, however, nerved himself to his utmost efforts. In the nineteenth round Klaus ran in and tried to knock Carpentier out. He missed, and Carpentier clinched and held the American with all his force. Klaus strenuously fought to disengage, and in bringing the full force of his body to bear jolted Carpentier under the chin several times. Then it was that Carpentier's manager sprang into the ring. Klaus was declared the champion. There was no doubt that Carpentier was himself responsible for any jolting on the part of Klaus, who was continually obstructed by the Frenchman's persistency in the clinch.

REFEREE KNOCKED DOWN.

After the great fight had finished, Evernden, of England, and Bernard, of France, went into the ring for a ten-round bout. They had only got to the second round, when the referee pulled Evernden away from his man, and the Englishman knocked the referee down. Immediately the referee jumped to his feet and retaliated vigorously. The seconds sprang into the ring and engaged in the melee, and pandemonium reigned until a strong force of gendarmes cleared the place. The decision was, of course, given to Bernard, Evernden being disqualified.

MOTOR MEMS.

AN enthusiastic motor scribe some year or two ago pictured the time when the horse, turned adrift from domesticity and no longer used for commercial work, for sport or for pastime, would be hunted in the wild state and, when captured, destroyed. There is little fear of that time coming. Although we have Motor Derbys and Aerial Derbys, the Derby and Ascot are still—and are likely to be—events of the year. And now we find that the motor has been pressed into the service of the horse. For the conveyance of horses to and from the racecourse a French trainer has had constructed a box van to take two horses. The box, which is mounted upon a suitable chassis, enables the racers to be driven direct to the course. The difference in this mode of transit and that involved by locomotive haulage is best appreciated by those who have seen much of the latter. The shunting and hanging on the railway does much to upset the nerves of highly-trained racehorses. With the motor horse-box there is nothing of this. The travel along the road is smooth and the horses are subjected to much less handling and worry.

Ascot this year will be memorable for the first really solid and overwhelming invasion of the motor-car. For several years it has been felt that the accommodation for cars was not adequate, and the time has arrived when the motor-car can no longer be ignored. Complete arrangements have now been made, in the obtaining of which the R.A.C. have played a very prominent part, and motorists who have been visiting Ascot are now admitted to the course in four enormous garages. The chief one is on the opposite side of the course to the grand stands, and it will hold many hundreds of cars. During the past week a large number of motorists have availed themselves of these new facilities, and the additional comfort and convenience of them have added much to the enjoyment of the Ascot meeting. The motor-car has been so much to the fore that, like Epsom or Derby Day, this year's gathering can be called the motorist's Ascot. In addition to these facilities the roads for miles round have been liberally tarred, so that the dust nuisance has been reduced to a minimum.

FOR a motor-car to run away on a steep hill is a terrible experience, both for driver and passengers, but when it occurs in the case of an omnibus the situation is desperate, indeed. This happened last week at Highgate Hill. The 'bus was in charge of a skilled instructor and contained four learners. Both brakes, strange to say, failed to act; but the driver pluckily stuck to his post, and although the 'bus reached a speed of about forty miles an hour succeeded in avoiding the traffic. At length, in steering clear of a tram car, it crashed into an electric standard. The driver succumbed to his injuries and four other men were also injured, two of them pedestrians who were walking along the street.

We have always held the opinion that in the case of private motor-cars three independent brakes should be fitted, and it is still more necessary where such heavy vehicles as omnibuses are concerned. Should one brake fail on a bad hill it is quite possible that the exceptional strain may prove too much for the other brake also. If a third is in reserve, however, the situation will be saved. It is quite a common occurrence in motor-cars that one of the brakes is comparatively weak and has to be supplemented by the second on steep hills. The driver has then no reserve to fall back on.

A WELL-KNOWN "Motor-noter" writes in a London paper that he would have the following recommendations blazoned in imperishable letters round the walls of every motor-house :—

1. Use the largest size of tyres possible.
2. Have equal-sized wheels, back and front. Except, perhaps, on very fast cars, the large size on the front wheels does not affect the steering of the car to any undesirable extent.
3. Find out the correct maximum pressure at which they should be kept, and keep them at it. Never go out with one of the tyres looking "a shade soft," even if it be only for half a dozen miles. Have a good, reliable pressure gauge to correct them by.
4. Remove all tyres at regular intervals to search for rust and to inquire into the condition of the security bolts, if used. This should be done at least once every 1,000 miles. It is a troublesome, dirty, and lengthy job, but it is well worth while.
5. If the choice be offered you, have detachable rims rather than detachable wheels; detachable steel artillery wheels rather than wire wheels (which are very difficult to keep clean); detachable wire wheels rather than a temporary wheel for "getting home." This latter undoubtedly has its uses, but it is only a makeshift contrivance and its appearance is against it.
6. Whichever you use, detachable rim or wheel, or temporary wheel, remember to keep the tyre on it in perfect condition. Unless your standby part, whether it be a sparking plug, a tyre, or an entire engine, is in proper working order it is as bad as useless. If you use detachable rims or wheels you should change the spare one with one of those in running use at frequent intervals. This will ensure its getting proper attention.
7. In winter have alternate non-skids; that is to say, fit them to the near-side front wheel and the offside driving wheel. In summer carry only one. Here is the value of the detachable rim (or wheel). On dry days you can run on plain tyres, which makes for economy owing to their better wearing qualities, keeping the non-skid on the spare rim; while, should a shower make the roads greasy, it is only a few minutes' work to exchange a front plain tyre for the studded one. It is generally better to use a single non-skid on one of the steering wheels than on the driving wheels.
8. Daily search diligently for nails and flints in your covers. When found, fill up the holes they leave with some good solution overnight. This precaution will save you many pounds.
9. Be sparing in the use of French chalk. It is only intended as a kind of dry lubricant, and if too much is used it forms hard lumps which spoil tube and cover.
10. Have the very best of all tyre implements. Nothing is more maddening than to have to work with jacks and pumps that refuse their office, and with tyre-levers that are too short.

Lastly, and most important of all, start, stop and take your corners as gently as it is possible for you to carry out these manœuvres.

By Throttle.

ILL LUCK continues to dog the wheel tracks of the Calcutta Motor Fire Engines. On Saturday morning last that magnificent engine "The City of Calcutta" was out for practice in the Howrah district and during the run entered Avenue Road. This thoroughfare happened to be under repair, consequently those in charge of the motor attempted to turn round on the reverse gear, always a dangerous undertaking, the result was that the rear of the engine crushed a native against a tree by the roadside, inflicting such injuries that death took place after an operation in the Howrah Hospital. It is reported that proceedings are to be taken against Messrs. Jarrett and Fredericks the engineers concerned.

IF Mr. Keays, while on leave is keeping in touch with Calcutta affairs, it must be gratifying to him to note the effect of the drastic treatment meted out by him to erring motor drivers prior to his departure. I have no doubt that the absence of cases of rash and negligent driving so noticeable lately are directly attributable to the exemplary punishments which he inflicted.

MR. E. L. CARTER, the professional whom I mentioned some couple of months ago as being on a tour of India in charge of a big Knight Daimler owned by an American lady, has returned to Calcutta. His experiences upcountry on Assam roads since the rains broke were trying in the extreme. In a month's tour only one run of 88 miles (Fyzabad to Lucknow) was done on a good road under favorable touring conditions. The remainder of the time was spent in circumstances which may be better imagined than described. By next week I hope to have a full account of the tour ready for my readers, the time since Mr. Carter's return not allowing of its publication in this issue.

I NOTICE that a contemporary is busy giving away hints on the management of a car. On some points we do not agree and in many cases he goes a long way round to achieve his end. What most owners and drivers want to know is how to keep a car going well with the tools at their disposal and the assistance of such simple make-shifts as may be at hand. Consequently I propose offering my readers a few hints and as I have given some of them before I will be as brief as possible. Always see that all nuts are kept tight. It seldom happens that makers split pin the bolts and nuts holding the two portions of the crank case together, and if these get loose the result is generally loose bearings as well, hence the advisability of going over all nuts occasionally with a spanner.

Keep your valve tappets properly adjusted, a locked nut is generally provided on the tappet ends for this purpose. When the valve is closed and the tappet right down on the cam, it is sufficient if an ordinary visiting card can just be passed between the bottom of the valve stem and the top of the tappet. Less than this may prevent the valve from closing properly, and if more space is allowed, the valve will not open soon enough nor fully enough to allow of a full charge of gas entering, in the case of inlet valves, or escaping in the case of exhaust valves. Don't grind valves too much or too often. It is unnecessary wear and waste of material. It is sufficient when you have them out for grinding that a uniformly bright ring is obtained on both the valve face and its seat without any black spots showing. These spots are really minute depressions or holes caused by the pitting of carbon deposit, and if they extend across the bright ring mentioned allow of gas escaping and consequently account for loss of compression. Exhaust valves get out of order through pitting more rapidly than inlets, therefore they should be inspected more frequently. Valve grinding is an art of which very few amateurs are the masters. Fine emery powder mixed with oil to form a thin paste is the best grinding agent. Remove the valve spring and replace the valve on its seating, then after smearing the face with the composition mentioned, give the valve a few turns with a screwdriver exerting an even pressure all round. Keep lifting the valve and giving it a half turn so that the emery is evenly distributed otherwise grooves or ridges are formed. When after working in this way for a few minutes, an even bright line is obtained, the operation is completed. All that is necessary then is to carefully remove all traces of emery with a piece of clean cotton waste. A good plan is, after wiping the grinding mixture off, to give a few more turns as before, but this time using only plain oil. This will pick up any particles of emery missed by the waste. Finally wipe the valve, seating, valve pocket and walls thoroughly with clean waste and then reassemble the valve. If any difficulty is experienced in replacing the valve spring a cotton reel may be placed on the valve and the cap screwed down on top of it. This will hold the valve in position while the necessary leverage is applied to compress the spring and allow of the pins being placed in position. If as sometimes happens after the valves have worn a bit you find a ridge round the centre of the seating the valves are too large and should the valve pocket not be machined round the seating as is frequently the case in cheap cars, one side of the seating is almost certain to be higher than the other, this will in time cause the valve stem to bend and entail a serious loss of compression. The only remedy for a defect of this nature is a lathe. The ridge above the point that seats properly must be bevelled off, taking a little extra off the top portion of the face so that it does not unduly project over the seating. In other words the diameter of the valve head should be slightly reduced leaving it a shade greater than the diameter of the seating of the pocket. This extra bit is to allow for wear and grinding in from time to time.

Where the cooling system is governed by a pump, leaks are of frequent occurrence, more so than in the Thermo Syphon system, on account of the greater number of joints. To make a good join with rubber piping, smear the inside of the rubber tubing and the outside of the metal piping with a coat of ordinary rubber solution. This will harden with the heat of the water and cement on automatically. Incidentally this coating of solution also causes the rubber tubing to slip on much more easily than it would otherwise do. Screw up the pump packing if it shows signs of leaking at the bearing, and if this has no effect repack it, following the original method as far as possible. Don't screw up the grease cap on the pump spindle too much. In most pumps some little grease is sure to get into the system and if it gets on to the cylinder walls the cooling effect of the water is greatly decreased. As long as there is a little grease on the bearing, let well alone, but be sure there is some there.

After a new car has run a few hundred miles it is advisable to take the radiator down and shake out any particles of solder, etc., that may have got detached and found their way to the bottom and so into the lower water pipe. The whole cooling system should be washed out occasionally by turning a hose into the filler and then opening the cock at the bottom of the tank. Keep all rubber joints free from grease. If you cannot prevent it getting on in any other way wrap the rubber up with insulation tape, this serves a double purpose by keeping the rubber free from grease and strengthening the joint. If an engine over heats and the carburation is correct, it may be caused either by the radiator water jackets being caked with grease or by the lime deposit from the water choking the tubes. To remedy this make a strong solution of soda, about 2 pounds of soda to a gallon of water. Empty the whole cooling system, fill up with this solution and run the car for a day or so. Then thoroughly wash the system out again and refill with clean soft water. This cleaning out has been known to work wonders. Don't use this solution in an aluminium radiator under any circumstances. If the engine still overheats look to the lubricators. If your lubricator is pressure fed from the exhaust, take off and examine the pressure pipe as this gets choked up where it joins the exhaust pipe and then of course no oil is forced to the drips. This pipe should be washed out with paraffin and scraped with a wire, but no waste should be used unless great care is exercised to see that no fibre remains in it. It is surprising the amount of sediment that gets into a lubrication system, consequently this should be thoroughly cleaned out frequently. Forced feed lubrication is generally by means of a pump sucking oil from a sump in the base of the crank chamber, driving it through pipes to the crankshaft bearings and so through the hollow crank to the big ends whence it escapes and is splashed over other working parts, eventually running back to the sump through a gauge filter. The oil leaves the pump usually through two pipes, one of which leads to a gauge not unlike the needle valve of a carburettor and the other direct to the bearings. If the oil passes freely through the gauge it is divided equally between two more pipes, but if it is prevented from doing so by screwing down the needle leading into the gauge the oil being so obstructed will flow at a greater pressure through the other pipe to the bearings and in this way the lubrication is regulated. The oil pump being driven from the shaft the pressure varies of course with the speed of the engine.

I HAVE so often "roasted" the drivers of the Indian Motor Taxi Cab Company that it gives me special pleasure to single out one of the number for commendation on account of the coolest bit of driving in an emergency that I think I have ever seen. A few days ago a couple of chokras were flying kites on the space in New Market, one of them suddenly ran backwards quickly just as a taxi came along at a fair speed, at the critical moment the youngster fell, apparently right under the front wheels of the motor. Far from losing his head, the driver threw out his clutch and applied the footbrake simultaneously jamming his steering over to the full extent of the lock. The result was what is professionally termed a "dry skid" and it was effective. The taxi lurched dangerously but stopped literally within an inch of the chokra on the ground. Then a Parawallah sauntered up, confiscated the kite, and clouted its owner, the taxi driver let in his clutch and drove on without turning a hair, apparently quite unconscious of the fact that by presence of mind and promptness he had saved a life and performed a feat of driving which would have been too much for ninety-nine drivers out of a hundred, irrespective of color, nationality or any other consideration.

ALL is fair in Love and War and as journalism partakes of both I may be pardoned for trespassing on the ground of my foot ball confrere to let my readers into something good. It is rumored round the "central corner" of the town that the genial Jerry M. (not of Grand National fame) is preparing something particularly warm for the forthcoming I.D.N. Cup. It should be worth while to see him as he is too good a sport to wish to keep his friends out of the good thing. Some very speedy "colts" with an even time reputation are said to be already in regular training.

LIVERYMAN (to rider): "Here, what's this? Two shillings! Why you've been out two hours." Rider—"So I may have, but I've been on the brute's back only ten minutes."

KIND LADY: "I am glad to see you do not use a brutal stick to urge the poor beast, like other cruel boys." Driver: "No, mesens, I jest screws 'is tail, ad' he goes like billyo!"

GUNNER: "He used to be a pessimist, and say the world was a bubble. I understand he has changed his opinion." Buyer: "Yes. You see, he fell out of an airship not long ago."

THURSDAY, 25th July 1912.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY.

THE present is an age of centenary and kindred celebrations; and about the time that this article reaches India the Royal Society of London will be celebrating the 250th anniversary of its foundation; this forming one of the most important events of the latter part of the London season; and its significance being marked by the fact that Their Majesties the King and Queen graciously signified their intention of receiving the fellows and their ladies at a garden party at Windsor on the afternoon of 18th July. According to the provisional programme issued to the fellows shortly before the present article was penned, the celebrations commence on the evening of 15th July by a preliminary reception at Burlington House of the foreign and colonial delegates by the President of the Society, Sir Archibald Geikie, K.C.B., the distinguished geologist. The following morning includes a short commemoration service at Westminster Abbey; the afternoon of the same day being devoted to the formal reception of the delegates at Burlington House; while in the evening the Royal Society entertains its guests at a banquet in the Guild Hall, kindly lent for the occasion by the Corporation of the City of London.

On the 17th the Duke and Duchess of Northumberland give a garden party to the Society at Syon House, their Graces' beautiful residence on the banks of the Thames; this being followed in the evening by a conversazione at the Society's apartments at Burlington House.

The festivities appropriately close with the reception by Their Majesties at Windsor of the President and Council of the Society and the delegates from abroad; this being followed by the Royal garden party to the fellows, each of whom may be accompanied by his wife or a daughter.

The Royal Society, of which his Gracious Majesty is Patron, has throughout the greater part of its long and distinguished career been honoured by Royal patronage; its original charter having been granted in 1662 by King Charles II. who took a great personal interest in its foundation and promise for the future. His Majesty is, indeed, stated to have puzzled the fellows with the following conundrum :—Why, if a fish be put carefully in a vessel brimful of water, does none of the liquid overflow? The answer, of course, being that it does.

The list of Presidents of the Royal Society, which is much too long to be quoted in detail on this occasion, includes many of the most famous names in British Science. Among some of the most distinguished in this distinguished list, may be mentioned Sir Isaac Newton, the discoverer of the law of gravitation. He was succeeded in 1727 by Sir Hans Sloane, the great London physician of the time, whose property descended through the female line to the Cadogan family, and whose name is perpetuated in Sloane Street, Sloane Square, and Hans Place. Sir Hans was also distinguished as a collector of objects of natural history and vertu; and it was his collections, purchased by the nation for £20,000 (far below their value), which formed the nucleus of the British Museum.

Another most distinguished President was Sir Joseph Banks, who accompanied Captain Cook in the voyage during which Australia was discovered and who occupied the presidential chair for a period of no less than forty-one years prior to 1820.

Among modern occupants of the chair, it must suffice to refer to Professor T. H. Huxley, who held that honourable position during the 'eighties, to the great engineer and mathematician best known to the world as Sir William Thompson, and to the inventer of antiseptic surgery Lord Lister.

The Royal Society occupies an altogether unique position among scientific bodies in England, being the only one of which the fellowship is a sure and certain mark of distinction, and which cannot be obtained by men of science except they have made their mark in the world. Hence the exceptional value—which may be reckoned in solid £ s. d., as well as a mark of merit and honour—attached to the privilege of writing the magic letters F.R.S. after one's name.

Of course there must be a vast range of variation in the abilities and mental capacities of the members of a body of this nature, just as, if we may be pardoned the quotation in such a context, "one star differs from another star in glory." But the Royal Society as a whole undoubtedly represents all that is best and strongest in the ranks of contemporary British science, as it has done in the past. It should be mentioned that in addition to those who have distinguished themselves by original research in some branch of science, the Council of the Royal Society enjoys the power of adding to its roll the names of a certain number of eminent personages of high rank or position who have displayed strong sympathy with the aims and scope of science. And when we mention that among the later additions to this section of the Society's membership is included the name of the Duke of Bedford, it is unnecessary to say more in commendation of the practice.

In addition to recognising rising talent by electing men of science to its fellowship, the Royal Society takes the lead in all important scientific investigations. Of late years, for instance, it has undertaken the important investigations connected with the origin and nature of the terrible African sleeping sickness, the production of malaria by the intervention of mosquitoes, the origin and dissemination of plague, and the nature and cure of cancer. It has also the control of the Government grants for scientific purposes, and likewise superintends scientific work in India, so that its rôle practically embraces the lead in scientific research throughout the Empire.

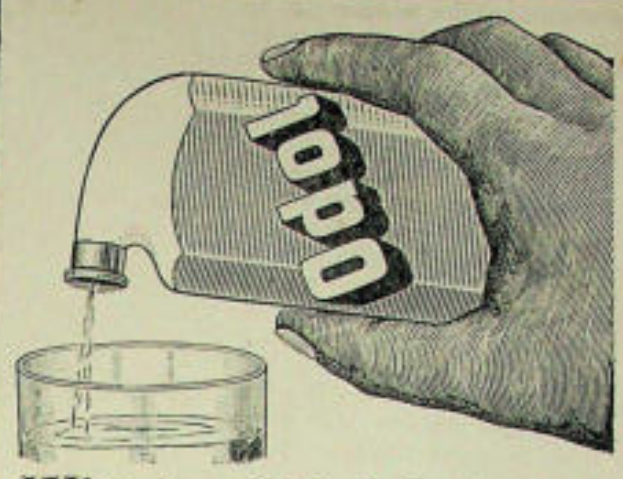
Sporting & Athletic Notes.

THE confident support accorded to Stedfast for the Eclipse Stakes was more than justified by recent happenings and especially by those of the Epsom Meeting where Lord Derby's horse had defeated the present winner at Sandown by three parts of a length in the Coronation Cup (1½ miles), the distance of that event being far more to the liking of such a stayer as Prince Palatine than the 1¼ miles of the race under notice. They then met at level weights 9st. 3lb. each and at Sandown they again met on the same terms, though on a 10lb. higher scale, and capped as Stedfast's Epsom success had been by a win in the 1¼ mile Royal Stakes at Newbury, there would seem to have been every encouragment to the noble owner to back him as he did. The public evidently shared the owner's convictions, as Stedfast started at 13 to 8 on, and though beaten gave his supporters a very great race for their money, as the verdict in favour of Mr. Pilkington's great stayer was only a head and there must have been as slashing a race for this valuable prize as when Lemberg and Neil Gow dead-heated for it in 1910 and there was only a point between them in the betting, Lemberg starting at 5 to 4 and Lord Rosebery's horse at 6 to 4. Prince Palatine is of the company of the stayers and his recent defeat in the Princess of Wales' Stakes (1¼ miles) by Major Eustace Loder's little-fancied three-year-old Lance Chest in no small measure accounted for the lukewarm support accorded him at Sandown. He let his backers down badly in that race, as he was liberally supported at 5 to 4 on and on the Ascot Gold Cup form it looked, even at those odds, a gilt-edged investment. At Ascot, as will be remembered, he won in very hollow fashion, Basse Point, the French horse, owned by M. E. de St. Alary, being quite unable to make him gallop and he scored as easily as he did in last year's Leger, which he won by six lengths, pulling up from Lycaon and Prince William. Lycaon was third upon the present occasion so that the last season back-end form has worked out very correctly. Prince Palatine is one of the best descendants of that great equine celebrity, at the stud Ellen Horne and Lady Lightfoot his dam traces direct back to her through Glare—Footlight, Paraffin—Paradigm who was by Paragone out of Ellen Horne. On the sire's side he gets Persimmon, who traces back to Blacklock on both sides (St. Simon and Perdita II.). So that in this horse we have a living exemplification of the truth with which the great staying strains will reproduce themselves generation after generation. Through Isinglass out of Lady Lightfoot he gets Sterling, Stockwell—Newminster, The Flying Dutchman (Bay Middleton) and such jument base ladies as Pocahontas (twice) Beeswing, Red Rose, etc., etc.

THE racing at the Tollygunge Club comes to a temporary close on Saturday next, when the fourth of the first series of Gymkhanas is run and we get no more at this course till the month of November when there are usually two meetings. These race-meetings are "Gymkhanas" only in name, as in every other respect they are now as advanced as ever were the old "Sky" Meetings in Calcutta so popular some twenty odd years ago. It has been frequently urged that it is high time that the Tollygunge Club should apply to the C. T. C. to be taken in under their rules and we consider that the time is indeed ripe when this should be done. We should be lacking in our duty if we concealed the well-known fact that the happenings at these meetings of late have been the subject of very unfavourable comment and we can hardly say that such comment has been altogether unmerited. It is openly said that things are done at these meetings that would rarely be attempted at meetings run under rules which would make delinquents liable to dire punishment, and this being the case and the Stewards having taken no action it is eminently desirable that some drastic change should be made. Bookmakers abound and the general public are allowed into the club grounds to bet, and as anyone who has attended these meetings well knows there is a very considerable amount of money moving in the Ring, quite as much as there usually is at the ordinary Monsoon Meetings or any other second-class race meeting run in any part of India. If these meetings had remained on their original footing, that is to say on about that of a point-to-point gathering there would be no necessity to urge any change, but as things are the whole character has altered and it is therefore desirable that the means to control them should alter also. Wherever there is the possibility for big wagering to take place the meeting at once loses its "amateur" status and must be taken seriously, for as we know complications will arise in even the best run entertainment and it is a very elementary proposition to say that there should be the means to hand to deal with those complications. At present there are no such means and it is a pity that they do not exist. The public are allowed in and they expect to be protected, and it is this that is being said. As to the domestic arrangements in the matter of penalties and allowances upon and to various G.R's there is nothing to be said, for if the club choose to frame their General Conditions so as to endeavour to level up the riding talent that is their affair. Personally we consider all these complicated penalties and allowances somewhat of a farce, for they entirely change the whole aspect of a handicap and are for other reasons also unnecessary and very troublesome. The affair of having these meetings under recognised rules is, however, another matter entirely and one in which we think the public, who pay entrance money to go in, have some right to be heard. The aforetime "Gymkhanas" have only too obviously got too big for the old go-as-you-please system and demand the closer control which racing under the Calcutta Turf Club Rules would give them.

LAST Saturday's proceedings were very considerably marred by the inclement weather and both during the morning and whilst the racing was on very heavy rain fell, rendering the course very wet and making all things unpleasant. The course was in very good order and is not greatly affected by heavy rain as all the surface soil is sandy and all bad turns are carefully "doctored" with cinders. In the jump races at some of the fences horses were jumping out of one sheet of water into another one and yet it was not at all slippery and save that it was wet the going was uniformly good, though naturally heavy. There were only five races in the card, two of them over obstacles and the rest on the flat and they were all of the closed order. Fields were not big and there was no very exciting contest. Proceedings opened with the Pony Hurdle Plate, for which when the numbers of both Late Night and Alton were found to be missing from the frame, Water Lily was installed a hot favourite and she was quickly backed down to odds on, but eased to level money just before the start. The confidence reposed in her was fully justified. as she never had the result in any great doubt and won easily after jumping well all the way. Mr. Shillingford ought to be able to pick up a race with her during the Monsoons, as she is showing much promise and she is in a nice position in the weights, her last Saturday's win not being likely to greatly prejudice her.

THE Steeplechase, the Nullah Cup, was booked a good thing for Sincerity on which mare Captain Kenworthy had the ride, but she ran the reverse of kindly, yawing about all over the course and losing a lot of ground with the result that the ragged looking Survivor had her beaten a good long way from home. The other one, Joy, was tailed off all the way and could never live with them. A trio again were stripped for the July Stakes and Peer Ray, a horse that Mr. Stephen bought from Mr. Lamb for paperchasing, was sent out a very hot favourite, starting at 7 to 4 on and in some places 2 to 1 on. It was a very slow-run race—1min. 19secs for 5 furlongs, being little better than a crawl and it makes the ones behind very bad indeed. Rough Luck is better over a longer distance, but he can have very little pace as he could not make the winner gallop. Rifleman, the third runner, is Mr. Evers' paper-chaser and would find himself better suited in a second-class amateur hurdle race, but if he cannot go faster than this he would not even have a winning chance there.



FIVE ran for the Jiu Jitsu Plate for which Loyalty was much fancied, but he never looked dangerous and Mr. Partridge's Commander jumping off in front led throughout and won without much difficulty by two lengths. The card was brought to a conclusion by the Gurriah Plate for ponies, for which Reuben and Alton were both supported and the former won, the two favourites being divided by Ida Coil, who started at long odds and ran very well all the way. All these ponies will be seen out hurdle racing in the Monsoons and Major Smith's Reuben is in our iden one of the small but very good ones.

THE entries for next Saturday's Fourth Tollygunge Gymkhana are "excellent" and will be found at a later page. There are again only five races catalogued, but as it is probable the stewards may have to divide one at least of them we may get a better and longer card than last week. The open races, of which there are two, have been very liberally supported by owners, and though a good many horses have probably merely paid entrance money to have a look at the weights, we shall very likely see a lot of them starting. "Mr. Valentine" is very largely represented in both the horse and pony races and candidates from most of the local stables as well as from Major Winter's establishment at Barrackpore are to be found. The weights will, we fear, make their appearance too late for comment.

CAPTAIN F. W. BARRETT, Captain K. Robertson, who is now on H. E. the Governor's Staff, Mr. L. Platt (17th Lancers), Mr. McCall and several other visitors, have arrived and Captain M. R. K. Hodgson and several more are expected next week.

IT has now been practically decided that the Indian Polo Championship Tournament is to be played in Calcutta this year, and as it is also the year of the Jubilee of the Calcutta Polo Club it is to be hoped that the two combined circumstances coupled with the fact that H. E. the Governor is presenting a £100 cup to the winners of the Championship will make for good polo during the Xmas week in this city. The only circumstance detrimental to this consummation is the announcement that it is said that officers are not to be permitted more than ten days' leave during the coming cold weather, and that only at 'Xmas time. This will, it is said, upset all the open tournaments and cause most regimental teams to reserve themselves for the Inter-regimental at Meerut in March. We can but hope, however, that this announcement concerning leave to regimental officers has been somewhat over-stated and misunderstood and that the open tournaments like the Championship, Lucknow, etc., will not be knocked out as they will be should this rumour prove to be correct.

Monsoons, but the weather has been much against us and those trainers who have gone easy with their horses have in our opinion chosen the wiser part, for most mornings the heat has been very oppressive and there has been no breeze to help us through the close muggy days that outvie anything that the worst month of the whole year, September, is able to inflict upon us. At this time of year horses do far better if they are allowed to race themselves fit in public and they come to hand far sooner we have found when these tactics are employed and the bucketting gallops in private abandoned. A good many horses that run at these Monsoon Meetings are stale before ever they have run at all: a good many more are knocked out by the amount of fast work they are asked to do and it is the small residue that is able to stand up to this sort of thing or whose trainers have sense enough to know how fatal it is to a horse's chances, that win the races and see the season out with credit to themselves and profit to their connections. It stands to reason that in such a climate as that which Calcutta "enjoys" at this season of the year very few horses' constitutions will stand the strain of a race, a week with certainly one, if not more, gallop in private thrown in to "keep him in wind!" There are not many of them who are really ready to race one day a week, let alone two or perhaps three, which is what a number of these horses are asked to do under the mistaken idea that to win races you must gallop. Under present conditions, however, we consider that the horse most likely to gallop in public is the one that has not done much galloping in private.

On Saturday last there were several of them moving along a bit and Bloss sent some of "Mr. Valentine's" short spurts over five furlongs on the sand, amongst them Cherry Hackle, Chin Chin and old Bonny Boy. All these horses are looking well, but a good many of them are right up at the top in the weights and some of them are not quite as young as they used to be. Old Bonny Boy, for instance, a good many people regard as a light of other days, but personally we shall not be surprised to see him win a race this autumn as Bloss has got him looking very well. Herald, late Referendum and Peter Pan also had a rough-up and we like the former. R. Powell is looking after him and the horse appears to be doing well. Peter Pan does not fulfil our ideas of a race-horse at the moment. Best China from Butlin's and Rameses from Walker's came along together about three-quarter speed. Rameses is a very good sort and does his trainer much credit. He is about the best of the flat-racing lot that Walker has got. Mr. Platt, we understand, rides him in his engagements. Moira and Glenora also galloped and Moira is going the better of this pair. She is to be schooled on Saturday next so we hear and as everyone knows is a clever little jumper. The Priory and Girton Girl from Walker's establishment were jumped by Lansdowne and both performed well, though The Priory would probably go better with a lead, as he is a bit inclined to shift about at them. Scottie and Mr. Johnston Stewart's mare Lady Leonard jumped a few flights in company, both performing well. Mr. Evers had some of his moving along a bit and Late Night, Murmur, Convent Girl, and some others were observed. On Tuesday again there was a little galloping and most of Bloss' spurted, also one or two from Butlin's and Walker's, but nothing of any note happened. On Wednesday Butlin had a few of his out jumping, the same two as on Saturday jumping three flights well and both should be nice rides in the closed hurdle races for some one, as they are finished performers.

The Annual Autumn Sky Meeting at Darjeeling has been fixed for the 22nd, 24th, and 26th October and attractive cards have been arranged for each day. The Stewards have now decided to include races for 14-2 ponies, whereas hitherto all races have been restricted to ponies 1b-1 and under. Four races—including the Governor's Cup—will be for ponies 14-2 and under.

At Sandown Park, on the 29th ultimo, Mr. J. C. Galstaun, the well-known Calcutta turfite, won the Alington T.Y.O. Selling Plate of 200sovs. with Oriolita and then paid the big sum of 1,400 guineas to buy him in after the race! Details in our English Sporting letter.

A handicap polo tournament on the American system was held at Gulmarg on the 4th, 6th, and 10th July for cups kindly presented by Colonel Hodgkinson. Four teams entered, viz., Kashmir, represented by Mr. Barbour, 1; Raj Kumar Hari Singh, 2; Captain Hamilton, 3; Major Barr, 4; (handicap, 1 goal per match); The Chummery, represented by Lieutenant Pott, 1; Lieutenant Colbeck, 2; Major Phillips, 3; Captain Wood, 4 (handicap, 1½ goals); The Remnants, represented by Captains Trench, 1; Davies, 2; Raban, 3; and Birkett, 4; (scratch); 14th Jat Lancers, represented by Lieutenant Elliott, 1; Captains Young, 2; Hewlett, 3; Sutherland, 4 (handicap, 4½ goals).

The final scores after deducting handicaps were:—Kashmir, 9 goals; Remnants, 3 goals; 14th Jat Lancers, 2½ goals; Chummery, ½ goal.

The Jumping Championship over the course resulted in a British victory at the International Horse Show on Saturday in mail week. The winner was Mr. Geoffrey Brooke, of the 16th (the Queen's) Lancers, on that splendid animal Combined Training. It was not only a triumph for the home men and home stock, but it was a splendid success for the Army, whose good work, says the Morning Post, was thus crowned in unmistakable fashion. During the run of the Royal Naval and Military Tournament one was able to appreciate the presence of a new quality in horsemanship and horse training. Continued practice in good class competitions at the Horse Show seemed likely to advance the Tournament improvement towards the end of the big Horse Show fortnight, and day by day this probability was emphasised. Beaten on the post by foreign horsemen from time to time, the last chance of something more than a second or third prize came on Saturday, and Mr. Brooke, by superb riding on his newly famous brown gelding, became champion—a world's champion—for he competed against the choice of Russia, France, Belgium, Sweden, Italy, and Holland.

The early entrants who survived the ordeal best were Centerial, Epire, L'Ami II., and Sorab, who have done so well, and Ursule, all of the Continental string. The big Russian Guardsman, Captain Rodzanko, urged on his fine winner, Sorab, with good English, crying, "Hey, come on," the response being a splendid run, with a bad finish. Baron de Meslon's French mare Amazone, a premier winner, was going well with three half faults against her, when the stirrup leather broke and spoiled the jump at the gate. Centerial, the hope of the Belgians, cleared the eight obstacles with only a loss of three faults, and Sweden managed almost to equal this performance with Count Lewenhaupt's Medusa. So far the British response was typified by the excellent work of the Glencroes horses from the West Country, by Mr. Foster's Paddy, and by Comet. The contest was nearly at an end when Peter Piper, the slow, graceful French gelding, put the leading group into second place with a truly grand run for the loss of only one fault. The championship seemed all over, as only one more horse had to jump. The number went up—753. A hurried look at catalogues showed that it was Combined Training, fit and well, ridden by Mr. Brooke, who had a bruised leg. It was the last hope of the British school, and people waited with suppressed excitement as he made for the bars and cleared them. In succession the gate, wall, and other jumps were beautifully negotiated, and Mr. Brooke lifted his horse grandly at the bank and wall, with the big descent beyond, and cleared. A low roar went round the house as the British hope rode for the last obstacle, the double gates of the level crossing. Eight faults were possible at this in-and-out jump, and the French leader had only one against him for the whole course. Combined Training leaped at the first gate, and, with a hind hoof, sent, a slip, spinning off with a bar for a half fault, landed finely, took off with a great-hearted spring, and cleared the second gate. The French horse was beaten by half a fault! A great shout rose in the auditorium, and round after round of cheering echoed in the building. The Earl of Lonsdale and the directors hurried into the ring, and Mr. Brooke and his brilliant jumper were brought back to receive the Championship of the World rosette, amid a memorable scene of popular enthusiasm. It was a grand victory, and crowned the previous winning of the Connaught Cup and the Military Tournament Championship for British Officers.

In consequence of what happened at Dieppe on 24th June, Arthur Evernden has been prohibited from boxing in France for a year. The Federation Francaise de Boxe has upheld the findings of the French National Sporting Club in regard to the incidents at Dieppe. Deschamps, Carpentier's manager, was found to blame for his principal's disqualification or retirement in the nineteenth round of his bout with Frank Klaus; and Evernden has been prohibited from boxing at any establishment a liated to the French Federation until 23rd June 1913. It will be remembered that Evernden was disqualified in his fight with Bernard for striking the referee, one M. Maistre, and thereby causing a free fight in the ring which had to be stopped by gendarmes. Evernden was wrong and deserved his punishment no doubt, but what about Maistre, who opened the ball by throwing the Englishman down, should be be allowed to go scotfree? It will never do for a principal to assault a referee, but at the same time this gentleman has no right to take the law into his own hands.

The 20-round fight for the World's Middle Weight Championship at the Cirque de Paris on the 29th ultimo between Marcel Moreau and Billy Papke ended in a win for the American, Moreau's seconds throwing up the sponge in the sixteenth round. At the outset Papke received some severe punishment, but after the first few rounds the American who had merely smiled at his adversary's blows, warmed up to his work, while in the seventh meeting Moreau was already visibly tired and was hitting weakly. In the eighth round Papke sent Moreau down with an uppercut, the Frenchman taking the count of 8 seconds before rising. In the next four rounds Moreau improved considerably and more than held his ground. In the fourteenth round Moreau seemed to be having matters all his own way and Papke was warned for using his head. The next meeting saw the Frenchman in serious difficulties. Papke uppercut him twice and again sent him to the boards. Three seconds before the gong Moreau was down once more and the sixteenth round had hardly commenced when his seconds through up the sponge. Immediately afterwards Carpentier entered the ring and challenged Papke, who accepted.

Sid Burns, the British Welter Weight boxer, met Mike Gibbons in a contest in New York on the 2nd instant. Gibbons punished Burns badly. The Britisher was knocked down twice in the fifth round and was unable to resume the fight as the gong sounded for the sixth round. Burns, though clever, was no match for the agile American, who knocked him all round the ring and doubled him up with rights and lefts on the face and body.

In our boxing column of to-day's issue we publish a report of the defeat of Bombardier Wells in America by Al Falzer. We now hear that Wells has since knocked out Tom Kennedy in eight rounds at New York. The Bombardier would have been better advised had he started his American campaign by meeting the lesser lights among the white heavy weights before tackling Palzer, the White champion.

The boxing tournament held at Quetta by the Essex Regiment lasted from the 5th to the 16th instant and proved a very successful affair. There was a large crowd of spectators at each session and the fighting on the whole was extremely good. Appended are results of the finals:—Novice Feather Weights—Pte. Evans, Royal Welsh Fusiliers, beat Pte. Hutchison, R. W. F. This was the first of the semi-finals, but as both the contestants in the other semi-finals were disqualified, Evans won the competition with Hutchin 2nd. Novice Light Weights—Lce.-Cpl. Miller, Royal Irish Fusiliers, beat Bdsmn. Wilson, Essex Regiment, on a knock out. Novice Bantam Weights—Pte. Berry, Royal Irish Fusiliers, beat Pte. Woodhouse, York and Lancasters, on points. Novice Middle Weights—Pte. Middleditch, Essex, beat Pte. Griffiths, Royal Welsh Fusiliers, on a knock out. Open Bantam Weights—Pte. Dale, R. W. F., beat Pte. Lane R.W.F. on points. Open Feather Weights—Pte. Davis, R. W. F., beat Pte. Cutler, R. W. F., on points. Open Light Weights—Pte. McAlaran, Royal Irish Fusiliers, beat Lce.-Cpl. Parker, R. W. F., with a knock out. Open Middle Weights—Pte. Simmonds, R. W. F., beat Pte. Downy, on points. The following men fought ten round contests during the tournament:—Cpl. Collier, R. I. F., vs. Pte. Lipscombe, Essex. Collier won on a knock-out in the tenth round. Dmr. Osborne, R. W. F., featherweight champion of India, vs. Cpl. Holden, Essex. Osborne won on points. Dmr. Rose, R. I. F., vs., Lce.-Cpl. Wilson, Essex. Wilson gave in in the tenth round. Cpl. Walters, R. W. F., Bantam Weight champion of India in 1909, vs. Private Rogers, Essex. Walters won on points.

The Imperial Cricket Conference was held at Lord's on the 16th instant. The question of arriving at the final result of the Triangular Contests was deferred till the necessity arose.

It was proposed that England should visit South Africa in 1913-14 and Australia in 1915-16, that Australia should visit South Africa in 1914-15 and England in 1916, and that South Africa should visit England in 1917.

The scheme, however, was not definite, some delegates not being invested with sufficient powers.

The fifth of the triangular test matches was played at Lord's and ended in a win for Australia. As announced in our last issue, South Africa had made 263 in their first innings and Australia had replied with 390. Going in again South Africa scored 146 for eight wickets and on the 17th instant completed their second venture for 173, Llewellyn being top scorer with 59. The Australians were thus left with 47 to make to win and hitting up 48 without loss they thus won by 10 wickets. The King was present on the afternoon of the 16th instant and the teams were presented to His Majesty in the interval.

Warwick beat Northants at Birmingham by 303 runs.

Derby beat Somerset at Derby by 133 runs.

Lancashire beat Surrey at Manchester by ten wickets.

Yorkshire beat Leicestershire at Sheffield by eight wickets.

Hampshire beat Worcestershire at Portsmouth by eight wickets.

Middlesex beat Kent at Maidstone by 271 runs.

Notts gained a first innings victory over Sussex at Brighton.

The Australians drew with Leicestershire at Leicester.

Yorkshire and Northants drew at Northampton.

Sussex drew with Hants at Eastbourne.

The South Africans drew with Kent at Maidstone.

Players and Gentlemen drew at Lord's.

In each case the first named team led on the first innings.

Kent beat Worcester by an innings and 10 runs at Catford.

We have received from Mr. W. Wilson, chemist of Rawalpindi, a sample bottle of Loto, a hair tonic manufactured by him. We have found it a clean and refreshing hair dressing, removing all dandruff or scurf, and in addition to these qualities we have read numerous testimonials certifying its efficacy in preventing the hair from falling out. Loto is put up in two kinds—oily and non-oily—at Rs. 3 per bottle and may be had of most of the chief chemists or direct from Mr. W. Wilson, Rawalpindi and Murree.

The Amateur Golf Championship of Northern India will be held at Gulmarg on the 28th, 29th, 30th and 31st August, the Ladies' Championship occupying the afternoons of the same dates. Golfers in Upper India have a full season before them in Gulmarg, Major Hill, the secretary for Golf, having arranged an excellent programme of fixtures.

The London Zoo now possesses what is perhaps the rarest bird in the world—a shoe-bill or whale-headed stork. The bird stand about 3½ feet high and has an enormous bill. He feeds on rats, mice and fish and is only to be found in the wild, inaccessible swamps of the White Nile. Naturalists have for years tried to obtain specimens of the bird but their efforts have always been unsuccessful till a fledgling was recently obtained and taken to England.

big gathering of spectators. The Band of the 1st Battalion Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway Volunteers enlivened the proceedings and the meeting was most successful. Proceedings opened with the usual Tent-pegging competition for which ten entered, the winner being Mr. R. F. Cooke, Messrs. Knight Bruce and Todd finishing second and third respectively. Next came the Ladies' Calling race, in which each lady started from a corner of a square, at which was placed a "not-at-home" box. They rode right-handed, and dropped a card into each of the boxes at the four corners. A fifth box was placed inside the square, and after dropping their fifth card into the box, the ladies rode to the winning post. Only three ladies competed and Mrs. Richardson beat Mrs. McCausland. The Jumping event brought out eight competitors and was won comfortably by Mr. Wallace, who went round twice without a mistake, Messrs. Knight Bruce and Landon being placed next in order. In the Unsaddling Race, Mr. H. W. Moulton was first and Mr. Knight Bruce second. Then came the ever popular Whistling Coon Stakes. This, as usual, caused much amusement—the successful couple being Mrs. McCausland and Mr. R. F. Cooke, with Miss Warden and Mr. L. Graham second. A Polo Scurry wound up the proceedings: eleven started and in a close finish Mr. J. L. Thompson on Biscuit beat Mr. Bamber riding Olivette by a length. Mr. J. R. Landon third.

Great Britain won the Military Team Riding at Stockholm, with Germany second and the United States third. In the Rowing events the Britishers carried practically every thing before them. In the heats for the eights, Leander beat Canada, Australia beat Sweden, and New College, Oxford, beat Norway. Then New College beat Stockholm, and Leander beat Australia—thus reversing the Henley result after a splendid race. In the semi-finals Leander beat Berlin and New College rowed over. The final between Leander and New College provided a great race, Leander winning by a length. The Single Sculls was won by W. D. Kinnear (Great Britain) who was beaten at Henley in the first heat of the Diamonds by Colin Stuart of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. The fours ended in a win for Ludwigshaven, who beat the Thames Rowing Club by 2½ lengths. Reuter wires the following as being the official points scored by the different nations at the Olympic Games.—

Sweden 133, America 129, Great Britain 76, Finland 48, Germany 47, France 29, Denmark 17, South Africa and Hungary 16, Canada, Italy and Australia 13, Belgium 11, Norway 10, Austria 6, Russia 5, Greece 4, Holland 3.

We very much regret to announce the death, at Berhampore, on the 9th instant, of Mr. A. E. Raoul Dubus, whose many and varied contributions to our Shikar and Natural History columns over the nom-de-plume of "Raoul" will be familiar to all our readers. Mr. Dubus had been practically all his life in India, connected with the silk industry, and was ever an ardent sportsman. Besides his numerous contributions to sporting and other journals in India he also wrote "Small Game Shooting in Bengal" and "Twenty years Pigsticking in Bengal," two little works well known and appreciated by Indian sportsmen. Mr. Dubus was 62 years of age at the time of his demise.

HOW TO HAVE A BEAUTIFUL COMPLEXION.

One of our lady readers who found that her skin was becoming harsh and dry from the use of powders, rouge and creams, sends us the formula below. She states that the simple, harmless, and inexpensive lotion made therefrom softened her skin, and so greatly enhanced the beauty of her complexion that she has entirely done away with all other preparations which she had been accustomed to use. This lotion can easily be prepared at home or by any good pharmacien. It calls for two ounces of Rose Water, one drachm Tincture of Benzoin, and two ounces Flowers of Oxzoin. Mix together and apply night and morning with the hands, or use a soft cloth or sponge. Always shake well before using. Our obliging correspondent asks that her name be withheld for personal reason, but nevertheless gives us permission to publish her letter for the benefit of other readers. She adds that this formula was given her by a woman 65 years old, whose youthful complexion and almost total absence of wrinkles were a source of wonder and admiration to all who knew her.

London Week by Week.

London, Friday, 5th July 1912.

July has begun badly, with daily rain and continual and lengthy spells of that atmospheric condition described by Londoners as "comin' over very dull." June was moist and depressing enough in all conscience, but we are promised worse things for July: indeed the weather-wise prophesy a repetition of the miseries of 1903. Yet amidst the encircling-gloom we are somewhat cheered by the unprecedented wealth of splendid flowers all round us. "Lovely roses, four a penny" offered everywhere—and such blooms. The year 1912 will go down in horticultural annals as the great rose year, and posterity will bear with envy of the wonderful roses that rioted in unheard-of profusion in this season's gardens. Evidence of this was found in the grounds of Holland House, Kensington, where the Royal Horticultural Society opens its summer show this week. Never has such a wonderful display of perfect roses been seen in England. The seasons have conspired to surpass even the growers' wildest dreams of abundance and to make this year of England's international show a record one for British flowers.

In no country does weather play so tyrannical a part. Spring frosts and summer storms destroy the gardener's work time after time, and the cause of the glorious and wonderful blooms of to-day must be sought as far back as last summer's heat. Such a prolonged drought had not been seen for years, and ruinous as it was to the actual blooms then, it so ripened the wood of trees and shrubs as to make this year's abundance certain—if the Spring would only follow up the work. It did. April and May went by with few showers and mildest temperature, June finished their work with rain. The result was seen at Holland Park and in every garden in the country

Henley week! Say, my masters, what good old memories the words recall. This year we are to have the King and Queen present for the first time—may the conditions be suitable to the occasion and the racing to match. The ideal way to travel to Henley is by river, just as to Oxford it is by road. As you come up stream you enter upon the scene of the regatta, by which the little town springs into more than national prominence for the space of one week every year, in the most picturesque and logical manner. Soon after Hambleden Lock you catch sight of a green island in the middle of the stream, and there, at its side, are the busily fluttering little red flags that mark the start of the course—a spot charged, if you have ever rowed at Henley, with poignant memories of uneasy emotion.

Then, as you glide past Temple Island, the whole of Henley lies open at one glance before you. The long course neatly ruled out in parallel lines of booms; Fawley Boathouse, the landmark caught by the tail of the rowing man's left eye that marks half-way; the white house-boats, with their dainty awnings and roof gardens of fair flowers; the canvas city of marquees between Remenham and the Leander Clubhouse, that grows larger every year, and this time, conspicuous white among the red stands by the finishing-post, the pretty little summerhouse from whose verandah the King and Queen will watch the swinging, driving, exhausted crews come racing out of the distance down the course.

There are thirty-five crews rowing this year, with four pairs competing in the Goblets and fifteen scullers in the Diamonds as well, which makes roughly 300 men in white flannels and rowing blazers of all sorts of different colours to brighten up the streets of the old town. They range from the black with a trimming of narrow yellow ribbon of Brasenose, Oxford, to the lurid scarlet trimmed with scarlet ribbon of Lady Margaret, Cambridge. The dress of a rowing man at Henley gives, too, quite a lot of biographical information about him. Thus, one approaches wearing a red and black cap—that is Jesus, Cambridge. He wears a coat of light blue—he rowed for the 'Varsity. His socks, you notice, are salmon-pink—they speak of his membership of Leander—and so on; there are all sorts of variation.

The hub and centre of all the activity of Henley, the focus of its human energy, the forum of its gossip and rumour, is the little landing-stage in front of the two big tents by the bridge where the boats lie one above the other on trestle shelves. To anyone who has ever played a part, however obscure, in Henley regatta, any chance mingling of the smells of varnish and warm canvas will always bring him back in memory to the Henley boat tents and to what must always be counted among the most delightful days of youth. For rowing, more than other sports, becomes, when it is over, something of a sentiment. Witness the whitehaired old gentlemen you may see sculling their daughters about on the river and wearing the London Rowing Club or the Trial Eights caps that they won forty years ago. There is a peculiar camaraderie bred of the joint labours that sink individual distinction in the common profit of the boat. And though the weeks of preparation may be monotonous, on the day, the sweep and flash of the yellow oars, the machine-like swing of the eight white bodies down a clear course sharply marked off through the bright-coloured crowd of onlookers, whose craft cluster thickly outside the booms, combine to make up the most graceful and lovely form that athletic effort ever took on.

What Henley will be like on Saturday if the day is fine nobody dares to predict. The river is always crowded with punts and skiffs and "Canaders" during the regatta, but with the first visit of a King and Queen and the first water pageant of the present reign as spectacles added to what is likely to be one of the best racing regattas of late years, it seems probable that the craft on the river will crowd each other out of the water on to the bank, like the carp in the pond in the Kurgarten at Wiesbaden.

The royal barge is a little disappointing. Besides a state coach it would be quite a sober vehicle. One had imagined something all gold and carved dolphins, like the galley in which the Doge of Venice used to go out to wed the Adriatic. It is about the size of a ship's gig, painted a greyish shade of white, rising at the stern to a little poop, carved and gilt. There is a narrow gangway down the middle, and the King's watermen, in their scarlet and velvet and peaked caps, sit side by side pulling their red-bladed oars with a short arm-stroke like a sailor. Mr. William East, the King's barge-master, is perched high up, right in the stern, steering with a tiller. There does not look as though there would be much room for the King and Queen and the Princess, who are to sit under a red silk canopy between the steersman and the two stroke oars.

Mr. Charles Edward Jerningham, who has, written for Truth as "Marmaduke" every week for twenty-two years, has decided to discontinue his labours.

So runs an editorial note in this week's issue of the journal which Mr. Labouchere made famous. It is a portentous announcement. It means the retirement from regular journalism of one of its foremost and best-loved personalities; the snapping of the link between a worldwide public and those who are set in high places.

For "Marmaduke" in one way and another had the gift of universal intimacy. It is no polite exaggeration to say that he "knows more people" than any other man in London. All through his long career he has been "behind the scenes." His weekly "Letter from the Linkman" has always been unequalled as an authoritative guide to coming events of importance. He is retiring, he told an Evening News representative to-day, because he feels that a rest would do him good. He is near sixty, but still young enough to hate work as much as he did when he was twenty-five.

"I was charmed with the programme. I thought at first it was going to be too long. I have spent a most enjoyable evening."

This is the criticism which the King made to Mr. Alfred Butt and Mr. George Ashton last night when the curtain rang down at the Palace Theatre on one of the most remarkable entertainments in the history of the music-hall.

It was one long triumph from start to finish. It began at 8-15 and finished at twenty minutes to twelve, when the National Anthem was sung by the most prominent members of the music-hall profession who crowded the stage.

The whole house rose to its feet, the popular favourites in "variety's garden party," dressed in the costumes the public know so well, were happy even though they were not among the separate "turns" on the programme, and as the cheers rang out the King bowed to the audience.

After the King and Queen left, the roses from the royal box were thrown among the audience and on the stage as souvenirs.

The command performance was the apotheosis of the music-hall. It was the first in history, and it was honoured by the presence of the reigning Sovereign. That was its significance.

From the dingy beginning of the "free and easy," when the chairman, hammer in hand, called on "our old friend" to oblige, the music-hall has risen to the undreamt of heights that it attained last night.

There was an air of super-refinement in the entertainment, an air of excessive politeness and amiable humour. At times it was difficult to believe that one was really in a variety theatre: it was more like an enormous drawing-room.

* * * * * *

Long before the arrival of the King and Queen great crowds ringed in Cambridge-circus and spread along Shaftesbury-avenue to the royal entrance. They waited to cheer their Majesties going to the music-hall. Ten guineas and five guineas were the original prices for seats in the stalls and the dress circle, and they changed hands at higher prices. The boxes were twenty guineas; the gallery was five shillings, and for a guinea and half a guinea one could roam about among the roses in the promenades. Seven hundred and fifty people stood in the "standing room" downstairs and upstairs. There has never before been such an audience gathered to see a music-hall entertainment. There never will be again unless there is another command performance.

To go through the items one by one would be tedious. Among the earlier turns their Majesties appeared to like particularly the delicate black-and-white setting of the Palace Girls' dance; the broken Dutch-English of "Happy Fanny Fields" (whose "Cheer up! I'm suffering as much as you!" amused the Queen immensely); the Bogannys, with their knock-about humour; and Mr. Harry Tate, whose motor-car difficulties kept the whole house in one continuous roar.

La Pia's fire and wave dance effects exalted both wonder and admiration. Mr. Cinquevalli; the juggler, and Mr. Chirgwin, with his odd collection of home-made musical instruments, represented the old guard and carried the mind a long way back. Miss Vesta Tilley, as male impersonator, perhaps made a mistake in the choice of her song. Mr. Wilkie Bard was dreadfully dull.

Mr. Arthur Prince's clever ventriloquism, Mr. Alfred Lester's imperturbable humour as the village fireman, Mr. George Robey's Worshipful the Mayor, and Mr. Devant's conjuring introduced the note of variety. Mr. Harry Lauder was at his best—what more can one say of him? Or of Mlle. Pavlova? Or of Miss Cecilia Loftus? And so we came to the last item, the variety garden party, with masses of artistes singing with heart and voice and tremendous lung-power "God Save the King."

"Ben-my-Chree" was revived at the New Prince's Theatre on Wednesday night. Certainly it keeps well. The melodrama belongs to the prime of its authors, Mr. Hall Caine and Wilson Barrett, and that was not yesterday; but played with a new company and new and effective scenery it is, if not the "interesting play" which the programme calls it, a full-blooded and eventful drama. Our readers will probably remember how Dan Mylrea, the Bishop's no'er-do-well son, was attacked by his cousin, Ewan Mylrea, the Deemster's son, and killed him in self-defence; then gave himself up to justice as a murderer (which only a melodrama hero's conscience could have declared him), was sent to outlawry by his Roman father as Judge of the barony of Man, and returned to heal the sick in the plague. In a version of the play produced elsewhere a few years ago a great deal was made of Dan's relations with his cousin Mona and of Mona's share in convicting him of murder; a great deal, too, of Dan's heart (which was in the right place) and of his bad habits. The version revived last night is a much healthier, more straightforward affair, and it is on the whole acted forcibly and without mannerism. Mr. Lauderdale Maitland as Dan, Miss Jessie Winter as Mona, and Mr. Austin Melford, who gave an altogether admirable performance of Dan's devoted follower Davy, were all pleasantly free from the tricks of the trade; they spoke naturally and seemed to mean what they said and did; and Mr. J. T. Macmillan is amusing as the Deemster's deaf servant.

More Lions.

About 1 o'clock news came in that a young camel had been killed the evening before about five miles away in the opposite direction, so presently we were off again. On arrival at the spot, we found the fore part of the camel remaining, concealed in the long grass, while his pugs showed the lion to be a big male. He had been seen near the kill as late as 7 A.M. that morning, and as there was a considerable area of high grass and thick bush all round, he was probably somewhere not far off. But the cover was such as to render tracking very slow and difficult, and the chances of a shot if we found him small. So we decided it would be sound not to look for him but to take advantage of the kill and sit up for his return. Accordingly a thorn shelter was made some 30 yards away and the kill dragged in front of this from its hiding-place; a goat at the same time being tied up outside the shelter in which I took my place at about 5 P.M. Such a procedure, especially the moving of the kill, would, with a tiger, be simply throwing one's chances away; but I believe a similar plan frequently proves successful with a lion who has the reputation of being far less cautious when returning to a kill. And if any man knows the ways of lions it should be Abdilleh. However our vigil was doomed to disappointment. This was evidently a wary animal, and not being specially hungry he had moved on when his suspicions were roused. Daylight showed that he had prowled round and been within a few feet of us, but we never heard a sound except at about 9 P.M., when he roared a defiant farewell as he was moving away.

That afternoon we moved camp about 5 miles westward. On the way we visited the spot where the last lioness had died and found tracks of two cubs. Firing the grass, one cub apparently contrived to sneak away unobserved but the other was soon dislodged and captured without much difficulty. He was a fine little fellow, not more than three weeks old the Somalis said, with quite a long coat spotted like a pard.

That night was an exciting one. There were 3 Somali zaribas near at distances varying from 400 yards to a mile. From each in succession, between 7-30 and 9 P.M., came the noise of a sudden uproar indicating the attack of a lion. From the nearest shouts we gathered that at one zariba at least the attempt had been successful and a sheep been borne off by the triumphant marauder. It would be hard if our zariba alone was to be ignored! We had a donkey and a goat tied up on opposite sides. At about 10 o'clock I had just lain down when a sudden agonized bray from the unhappy donkey was followed by the sound of a scuffle and fall, to the accompaniment of deep menacing growls. I was up in a moment and at the loop-hole. Unfortunately the donkey had been tied too close to a small tree, with the result that the lions (there were two) had contrived to drag the body partially round the tree and lying down to feed on the hind quarters, were in the darkness, concealed behind the carcase and the tree trunk. Sufficiently so, at any rate, to make it impossible to distinguish anything definite at which to shoot, even when a lantern was held up above the zariba fence. Meanwhile the lions were feasting at a furious rate, the sounds of the tearing of flesh and cracking of bones, with a continuous deep growling, testifying to a horrible orgie. The sight of the lantern merely provoked increased growls. I thought of turning on my little electric hand-lamp but could not manipulate it and use my gun at the same time; and was afraid that in the unaccustomed hands of a Somali it would not be pointed accurately enough to allow me a fair shot before its bright light scared them away. However at length I resolved to try it, but just then a shadowy figure moved away to the left, and the other departed unseen. Of course we supposed they had only gone temporarily and now was our opportunity to improve matters: we sallied forth and moved the dead donkey (a fifth part of him already devoured) clear of the tree, and fastened it down, then retired to the zariba again. I have said there were two lions, the Somalis said probably a pair, and that from his voice one was a big male. Now in such cases it is invariably the female who returns first to a kill, so I determined to hold my hand and wait for her less impetuous lord and master. I had not been watching for more than ten minutes when a low purring growl announced the return of the lioness, and presently she appeared sniffing at the spot where the donkey had lain, then stood looking at the present position of the kill, never ceasing from the utterance of that low but intimidating growl, for perhaps half a minute she stood, offering a perfect broad side shot at about four yards distance, then walked away to the left out of sight.

For an hour I waited in vain, then turned in. At about 2 A.M. Abdilleh roused me saying there was something about. I sat down to watch, and in a couple of minutes it appeared on the kill a wretched jackal! The moon had now risen and I saw him clearly as he took hurried snatches at the body, after each bite looking all around him with a furtive uneasy air. It was too obvious that there were no lions anywhere near, so I went back to bed disgusted, reflecting that the lions of Aror at any rate did object to their kills being removed. However the morning furnished another explanation when we learned that two sheep had been taken from the two adjacent karias by the same pair of lions, so that my donkey was their third meal in the course of two or three hours. With waist belts tight as theirs must have been, why indeed should they return!

At about 7 A.M. we started on their tracks, from which we found to my disappointment that the male was a youngster probably, if anything a trifle smaller than the lioness. After a time we got into country consisting entirely of dura grass in more or less continuous patches, unfortunately we had to travel with the wind, which was blowing steadily, with the result that we put them up eighty yards away. Once they were on the alert it was hard work to come up with them, and we should never have done so had they not been full-fed. But at length about midday, we surrounded a patch of grass and thorn scrub that they had entered and not left. We fired the grass and the lioness came out just in front of me, and immediately put on the pace, going past me at about 25 yards distance in great bounds. At my shot, heels over head she went like a rabbit! It was the prettiest shot possible. I had held a trifle too far forward, but the heavy bullet had smashed both shoulders. She picked herself up and struggled gamely on, taking a raking stern shot from the second barrel with hardly a sign of feeling it; but another 30 yards and she was down, dead as the proverbial mutton; the second bullet entering at the flank, had carried forward through the liver and lungs into the throat. She measured 8 feet 2½ inches in length and contained 4 embryos an inch long. All of my adult lionesses were of much the same size, but these last two in the A. bush were decidedly tawny in colour and not the typical Somali grey tint of the first specimens.

At the sound of my first shot the second lion had broken away to one side, and we now followed him up. The tracking became more and more difficult, and as we did not think he was a big one we eventually gave him up and were back in camp about 3 P.M., rather done up: the wind had dropped, and it had been very hot after midday.

On the Open Plain.

After an unsuccessful attempt to locate a big Lion on the morrow, I had a long day out on the A. Ban (prairie) looking for hartebeeste. The great plain was dotted with herds of aoul, and feeding among them here and there an occasional bull oryx. An apparently very fine head carried by one of these latter attracted my attention and I proceeded to stalk him. I had no difficulty in approaching within 200 yards or so, but the wind was high and steady shooting difficult, so that I hit him too far back. A second shot when he stopped presently and looked back at me was most unfortunate, cutting off one of his horns near the base. After that I followed him for a mile before I could get another shot and bagged him, to find he possessed much the finest head I had seen, the uninjured horn measuring 34 inches, but there were only 6 inches left of the other, the remaining portion lying somewhere in the grass a mile away! However it did not prove difficult to trace his spoor back to the spot where the horn had been lost and I quite hoped to find it. But in this my luck was out; I suppose the great velocity of the ·318 bullet may have carried the horn 50 yards away, and the grass was long enough to make it impossible to search more than a very small area of ground with any thoroughness.

The Somali oryx (or "beisa") is an animal of striking appearance with its long slender slightly curving horns and the contrasted black and white of its face markings. It stands comparatively low for its size (12½ hands at the shoulder), for it is a heavy antelope; and when alarmed goes off at a lumbering bovine gallop which is far from graceful but would tax the powers of the best of horses to overtake. At the withers its hide is extremely thick and tough and consequently in great demand among the Somalis for the making of shields. "Oryx beisa" does not grow such long horns as its more Southern relative the Gemsbok.

An hour later I was examining with the glasses another oryx among some aoul, when a dark object to the right rose from the ground and revealed itself as the bull hartebeeste that was the real object of our quest. I had not the least difficulty in walking up to within 100 yards of him, and dropped him with a single bullet disabled but not dead. The hartebeestes like the oryx family are singularly tenacious of life. The head was a good one. The "Sig," as Somalis call Swayne's Hartebeeste, has a peculiarly long bovine face, with a soft dark red-brown coat and stands over 4 feet at the shoulder, but the back slopes considerably the hind quarters being a good deal lower.

Later in the day I got another good beisa and a second hartebeeste. The "Sig" has been described as shy and difficult to shoot, possibly this is so in places like the Marar prairie where they occur in herds of thousands; but the two that I shot (I saw no others) were as tame as any antelopes I have ever come across, in distinct contrast to the oryx. Back in camp at dusk after a long day, the two camel loads of meat being received with acclamation by my band of hungry retainers. Of aoul I think I must have seen more than two thousand on the plain during the day.

Next day we left A. and moved northward, the only incident of the march being an unsuccessful attempt to stalk a pair of ostriches who were off at a great pace, flapping wings helping them along, before I could get anywhere within range. Before long we were in the cattle country, green and fairly watered but with little game, objectionable little ticks far too much in evidence. "Sonny" the lion cub was quite at home by this time. He was fond of playing with the little lynx which used to bite his ears, or of stalking the aoul fawn who would put her head down and knock him over, producing such a quaint puzzled expression on the cub's face. He delighted in chewing a boot or a bare ankle; and took a great interest in the camels though rather nervous of such big things.

A Disappointment.

Moving camp from B. we crossed a stony pass which it took the camels all their time to negotiate: one nervous or obstinate old oont was just half an hour in getting over a descent of some 30 or 40 yards. Our camp the following day was in a nicely wooded spot on the banks of a wide river-bed with here a pool or two and there a trickling stream, after the fashion of rivers in these parts, waiting on the next heavy rain fall to become for an hour a swirling torrent.

As the camels were being unloaded, I strolled into a clump of trees close by, when there came a rush and just a glimpse of the white tips of a pair of spiral horns as a lesser kudu bull vanished in the long grass by the river-side. For half an hour he did not go far, but kept out of sight except for a similar occasional glimpse, defying all attempts either to stalk or drive him. At length he crossed the river, and for a moment I caught sight of his head looking at me between two bushes on the far side. But as the rifle reached my shoulder he turned and plunged behind one of the bushes, into which a speculative bullet followed him without effect. Tracking him from there he left the belt of cover by the river, and took to the stony hilly ground beyond; and after a mile and a half we came in sight of him again. He dashed off and halted on the hill side 200 yards away. It was no use trying for a nearer approach; I fired and missed, again and another miss, and then he was off, his horns shewing for a moment against the sky-line almost like those of his big brother the Greater Kudu. Certainly the finest lessor kudu I had seen at all. The next moment I discovered that the Lyman aperture sight with which I was shooting had somehow got screwed up to the 400 yards mark! Could anything be more exasperating! He was gone for good and with him my last chance of a good lesser kudu, most elusive of antelope. It was the greatest disappointment I had had. It was now 4 P.M., I had been out since daybreak: hot, tired, and down on my luck I turned slowly back. The only thing I wanted a bath, the bigger the better. In ten minutes the bath came—a shower bath, and we tramped the 2 miles into camp in as heavy a downpour as I ever want to be out in. But it cleared the air, mental and otherwise.

After shooting an oryx next morning early, I spent the rest of the day with Abdilleh exploring a succession of hills and wooded valleys, looking for kudu, but finding nothing beyond occasional tracks. Crossing the river bed near home again, I saw to my surprise a duck of sorts, an early arrival, in a pool. Slipping a couple of No. 5 cartridges into the Paradox I proceeded to stalk him. Just as I got within range I began to go down, a regular quicksand! At the same moment the duck rose, and with a struggle I got the gun pointing somewhere in its direction and fired. Down it came, a great fluke, and then I had to wait for Abdilleh to come and pull me out. The bird proved to be a garganey, a very acceptable addition to my dinner that night.

By this time my trip was nearing its end, and another day or two found us at D—our last camp before starting across the Maritime Plain again to Berbera. On the way to D—, I saw a little party of klipspringers, the only ones I had come across this time. They were on a steep hill where their grey green coats were difficult to define against a background of bushes of the same colour among the rocks. They were decidedly wild, and after a lot of warm climbing I could only get in a long shot which failed. The klipspringer, true to his name, is a marvellously agile little antelope. His surefootedness and the pace at which he can go on a rocky hillside must be seen to be realised.

That afternoon I bagged a wart-hog boar with a nice set of tusks. A marvellously ugly beast I should like to have taken the whole head, but it was late and we were still some miles from camp, so there was no time for me to tackle the job single-handed: none of the Somalis of course would touch the unclean beast. The toughness of his hide was extraordinary: it took me nearly an hour to skin the lower part of the head and detach the jaws with the tusks. Later I saw a pack of no less than ten otocyon (the pretty little long-eared fox) hunting in the dusk with peculiar little yapping calls.

LAST DAYS.

At D— came the opportunity of making two important additions to my bag, one of which I sadly failed to utilise. Exploring some rocky hills in the afternoon, I had just reached the top of a steep ascent, when there came a clatter of stones from a ravine in front, and out bounded a pair of graceful little antelopes and stood for a moment on the farther side, looking back at us. I had never seen them before, but there was no mistaking them in their dainty coats of French grey: they were baira, buck and doe, and only 60 yards away. But alas! after that last climb I had no breath left: the rifle went up to my shoulder, but the muzzle wavered horribly; and I could not sit down as a rock came in the way. The baira doe started off up the hill, the buck gave a little toss of his head preliminary to following his lady; I had to press the trigger, with the most perfect confidence that I was going to miss, and miss I did. It was the hardest of luck that the chance should have come just at that moment when five minutes in which to recover my breath would have been worth so much. I had trophies of all the other Somali antelopes, but this dainty little baira was, with the possible exception of the dibatag, in point of rarity worth the pick of them all. And I had missed a standing shot at 60 yards! Is there any humiliation more poignant? Or any memory so salutary when a run of luck and a good rifle have once again fostered the delusion that one can shoot?

Next morning I had another long climb on the tracks of a pair of greater kudu, but failed to find them. Then came across a single baira doe standing in a characteristic attitude on the top of a rock 150 yards away. I wished afterwards I had taken the shot for the sake of her skin, but hoped her mate might be somewhere near. However she vanished in a mysterious manner, and not a sign of her or another could we see again. Tramping home at about midday we were in sight of camp when a whistle came from Henduleh on the left, with a frantic beckoning that surely betokened something of account. The next moment I too saw, standing on the slope up to the hill where I had missed the baira the day before first a greater kudu doe, and then, no mistaking that darker coat and those spiral horns, a fine bull. They were 250 yards distant and looking at us. There was no cover and no hope of getting nearer; while with foresight all blurred in the noonday glare the shot was a trying one. For the time being too, after yesterday's exhibition, I had lost confidence; so of course I missed. Away went the kudu. Pulling myself together I tried again, a long flying shot and rather a forlorn hope. Oh! the joy as the sound came of the bullet's answering thud. The bull went on, I had hardly expected a stern shot like that to bring him down, but the glass showed that one leg was broken high up, and I knew he was mine. He could never climb the hill, and a wounded kudu has not the stamina of hartebeeste or oryx. They disappeared into a nullah, but on the farther side the doe reappeared climbing the hill alone. When I reached the nullah the bull dashed out in a last gallant effort to escape, but a quick shot at 70 yards paralysed the spinal column behind and brought him down. A good head though not quite the equal of my first and of a different type, the horns being remarkably upright with unusually small spread.

Three days' march from D—brought me to Berbera and the end of my expedition. At sunrise of the last day I met the first herd of lowland dhero (Pelzeln's Gazelle), headed by a good buck. They were not shy in the early morning light and I had an easy shot: but the buck moved just as I pressed the trigger and I only broke his shoulder. As I followed to give him the coup de grace, a second buck with even longer horns appeared from nowhere and, ignoring me, went for the wounded one and drove him away for two or three hundred yards; then returned in the most jaunty fashion to assume the lordship of the little herd of does who, meanwhile, had not shown the least sign of interest in the proceedings. I hardened my heart and the new-comer's triumph was short-lived. Then I went after No. 1 who gave me quite a long chase before I secured him. A nice pair of heads. Pelzeln's Gazelle in general appearance and habits much resembles Speke's Gazelle of the higher altitudes: the latter differs mainly in certain details of colouration and in the possession of a patch of loose skin above the nose which in life is inflated into a peculiar hump. The Somali name of dhero is common to both species.

That evening furnished the last incident of the trip, Elmi being bitten in the toe by a small viper which escaped. I do not think it could have been dangerous, but I cut across the wound and rubbed in permanganate of potash as soon as we reached camp, and in the morning he was all right.

At Berbera it only remained to pay off my following and dispose of my camels, etc., which I did at fairly satisfactory prices. The trip as a whole had been a distinct success and I was quite sorry to part with Abdilleh and some of the others who had been cheery companions and given little trouble.

Finally I may mention that I found the cost of an expedition such as mine to work out at from £60 to £70 a month. Any of my readers who desire fuller information I would refer to Colonel Swayne's "Seventeen Trips in Somaliland." This work is perhaps rather out of date in some respects, and expenses have risen of late years, but it remains the standard authority on the subject.

HUNTING OSTRICHES IN CALIFORNIA.

PERCY and Willis had been some time out of school, and still had lots to learn, but their pa had money, because he got eight per cent. interest on cash he lent to people who wanted to build houses. They were tired of wasting time in the salt-marshes of Bolsa, down near Playa del Rey, shooting snipe, mudhens, crap, and other wild creatures, and yearned to go into the interior far from the coast of the quiet Pacific and shoot ostriches. They hired a gasoline launch on the Los Angeles River, and steered up-stream at the flood of the waters, which is the month of December, making Cawville their place of destination.

There are lots of ostriches at Cawville, but they belong to the American Ostrich Farm Company, and are tame birds, and have no desire to run wild in the mountains; they are fed three times a day, and the company make a lot of money selling their feathers.

Percy gazed wistfully on the bunches of ostriches that were drinking at the river as the boat passed, and wished earnestly that he could raise his gun and plunk a collection right in their stomach, one of the most sensitive parts of the ostrich. It was entirely within the game laws of the State to do so, but Willis warned him that the birds belonged to the company, and his trial would soon come off for poaching if he shot any of them.

At length they arrived at the little hamlet of Vallely, that surmounts the elevation at the end of the San Gabriel valley just before one enters the recesses of the Tehachipi Mountains. Traces of ostrich could be observed on the shelving banks of the river, mostly broken egg-shells, for the ostrich of the hen persuasion loves to hear the eternal rush of waters in the river while hatching. Here they tied the launch up to a pepper-tree firmly, to avoid a freshet that might at any time raise the level of the river, and proceeded, looking carefully for those dark spots on the horizon that ever signify in California the presence of these valuable, fleet, and majestic birds.

The burning luminary was sinking below the surface of the sunlit Pacific before they discovered traces, and Willis discovered a nest filled with ostrich eggs, three of which were fresh. They at once decided to camp, for the ostrich family could not be far away, and would return to look at the nest. Making a fire, Willis produced some salt from his knapsack, and soon they were enjoying a baked ostrich egg, which tastes just the same as any other egg and is very nourishing. Willis became more hungry for ostrich meat after eating the egg, and wanted to pursue the quest; but Percy pointed out the better plan of sleeping there beneath some eucalyptus bushes, away from the fleas, who do not like eucalyptus, and in the morning to resume their journey. Spreading their canvas sleeping-bags, the heroes were soon forgotten of the world.

As the sun kissed the rugged heights of the Sierra Nevada Mountains and lit up the fertile valleys of California, bringing delight to the countless tourists who ever infest the American Holy Land, Willis and Percy arose, partook of some hot coffee and more ostrich egg, and resumed their journey. All at once Percy shouted. "Ostriches," and, taking out his binocular, Willis saw far up the valley black spots on the sun-dried, earth-coloured valley. The wind was blowing due east, so they thought that the scent would be communicated to the birds and began to trudge to the north, walking for over an hour. In this they were mistaken, for the ostrich has no nose, and cannot smell; in Africa the birds are always found in company with gazelles, antelopes, and hartebeests, because these creatures can smell, and when they smell anything and run away the ostriches run too, because they know then that there is danger. The eyes of the ostrich are very strong, however; so that, between the ability of the ostrich to see and the other animals to smell, they find association together a protection for the entire bunch.

Perspiring in the eternal sunshine, the two hunters approached a row of mountain oaks slowly and beheld their quarry on the plain just within rifle-shot. Both men stood behind trees like statues for about ten minutes, resting, and then, resting their guns on the branches, took excellent aim and fired. Instantly a crowd of dust arose from the plain, and thirty fleeting shadows passed into the perspective, leaving, as the men afterwards found, two birds dead and two limping around in misery, for they had stood in the way of the bullets that ran into the dead ones and had their legs broken. An ostrich with a leg broken is virtually a dead ostrich, for, if Nature does not at once take it to its bosom in some way, the rest of the ostrich family are so disgusted at an incompetent member of the family that they fall upon it and peck it to death, just like old sick Indians in heathen lands are put into fresh graves where they have to stay until dead.

Taking out their hunting knives, they soon cut off all the lovely feathers from the birds, which afterwards brought them three hundred and fifteen dollars in Los Angeles, selling them to the ostrich feather stores, and Percy, who was economical, wanted to cut out the long strings of muscle that run from the stomach of the bird to its mouth, for he thought these would be useful to the medical colleges to stick in people who had lost muscles; but Willis pointed out that the ostrich tendons would be so long dead by the time they reached home that the necessary life for the joinings of the muscles would be lost. Percy therefore contented himself with taking the feet of a couple of pair, because he said the feet harmonised with the motto used by grandfather when he first came from England to America, and is, in Latin, Omnium rebellat, which means in English, "Kick at everything."

Packing the feathers with string and the ostrich feet in a potato sack, they started for the launch miles away. En route Percy found a whole lot of pieces of ostrich shells, showing that there were many ostriches in the valley, and that some good hunting was still in store for those brave men who sought the seclusion of the wilderness. They called the place where the shells were found Point Vacher, and carried away as many broken shells as possible as souvenirs of their trip.

Percy and Willis intend to make another trip into the ostrich region soon, and their adventures will be recorded in this paper. The men are perfectly fearless and willing to shoot any kind of animals without any experience in the business; yet the kick of an ostrich has been known to be fatal to man and horse.—Shooting Times.

BANGALORE RACES.

Second Day, Thursday, 18th July 1912.

STEWARDS:

COL. J. DESARAJ URS, M.V.O., C.I.E.
COL. W. Y. BRERETON.
MAJOR C. A. SYKES, R.H.A.
CAPT. A. CAMPBELL-ROSS, 20th Deccan Horse.
MAJOR C. RANKIN, 7th Hussars.
MAJOR F. W. D. QUINTON, R.F.A.

Secretary and Clerk of Course.—H. DONNE, ESQ.

THE second day's racing was entirely spoiled by rain. It had been raining from 1 o'clock in the day and continued, with occasional breaks, the whole afternoon, with the result that the attendance was smaller than on the first day, the track became sloppy and the going was very heavy and the enclosures were turned into puddles, so that most people, especially the ladies, kept inside the Grand Stand. It was only the most enthusiastic punters who surrounded the betting stands and of these the temporary ones were left unoccupied.

There were seven races coloured on the card, two of them at least drawing only small fields, and while there were numerous scratchings in the others. The attraction of the day was the race for the Maharaja's Mysore Cup, which was won in the easiest fashion by the Kour Sahib of Patiala's Mil, W. Southall up. A field of nine went straight out to the post in a drenching shower of rain for the Richmond Plate Race, for which Rapin and Annahean were about equal favourites, but Wavehill was a dark horse in the race and hill, Sperry being third and Rapin finishing fourth. Cowslip was a strong favourite for the Farm Plate in a field of only four, but Chemise had a large contingent of supporters on account of her light weight, while Aubrey had a small following. The last named unfortunately was badly left at the start, much to the disgust of his sporting owner and Chemise won all round the course. The Horse Scurry (First Division) attracted another small field and Lithosian justified the confidence placed in him. Eight stripped for the Ulsoor Plate, a 5-furlong pony race, but another heavy downpour came on and spoilt the chances of the favourite, Mandeville, who was considered the only good investment. It was a hard-ridden race, all the jocks using their whips freely and P. Kuhn getting home on Morning Star in fine style. Lady's Maid, Sahasa and one or two others were freely supported for a place which they failed to obtain. The rain held off for the Cup Race which followed and permitted everybody to come down and back their own particular favourite; and there was a good deal of betting both ways. Of the ten candidates that paraded in the paddock, none could have looked more fit than Mil, although many fancied The Cellarer, which opened at 3's and started at 1½: the Australian won easily with something to spare. Aga went out favourite for the Eastern Plate which Ansad pulled off, and the second Division of the Horse Scurry was a moral for Meddling. Following are details of the card:—

Third Day, Saturday, 20th July.

THERE was a full card of eight races to be got through this afternoon and consequently business began early. The weather looked threatening all day, but rain held off. The attendance was large.

The first race was the first division of the Leonidas Purse, which thinned down to only five starters of whom Bomb was selected to win, but he was cleverly beaten by Wavehill, who had the services of Ruiz. Another small field of five stripped for the first division of the Cambridgeshire and the public were again at fault in their selection of a favourite. Ruling Passion was most fancied but was very badly beaten in the race. The Grand Plate attracted only five candidates and Cowslip was installed favourite. Crowbar had a large following and Pearl was nibbled at. The race, however, provided another upset, as Aubrey, a rank outsider, beat his stable companion in a canter and romped in a winner. There was great excitement over the start for the Bangalore Cup Race for which eleven donned silk, and as they came out and lined up to the starter in front of the Grand Stand everybody came up to the rails. Black Douglas was the absolute favourite in this race and Kilmarnock had the next call; the others were more or less supported but mostly for places. Lady Erna made a grand effort at the rails to pass the leader but failed. The owner of Black Douglas, who is present here, received the heart congratulations of many of his friends. There was a field of seven for the second division of the Cambridgeshire in which the Bookies again scored against the public. Token was selected to win this and Mauveron had next call, but Master Priam got home and upset a few pots. In the second division of the Leonidas Purse, there were five candidates and The Witch went out a red hot favourite, Metal Maid had second Call and Vic's Pride was well supported. The result of the race was a popular win for Metal Maid which did the books another good turn. The Desert Plate attracted seven candidates for which Crown Prince was considered a dead cert, but punters had another nasty knock when Minerva beat him handsomely. After all only a quartette faced the barrier in the Substitution Race, which was considered an absolute certainty for Sperry, Harene being next in demand; but this was another upset, as Sperry only finished third, so that the bookies had quite a field day of it. Details:—

Fourth Day, Tuesday, 23rd July 1912.

THE Bangalore Meeting concluded this afternoon with a fourth day's racing, which was carried through in fair weather without any hitch. There was a large and fashionable attendance and a card of six races provided good sport, although punters were again beaten, the favourites going down in nearly every race. The Stewards and Secretary are to be congratulated on the unqualified success the meeting has been, while to the Clerk of the Scales is mainly due the credit for carrying out each day's programme to time. Opinions differ as to merits of the handicappers, but on the whole his work has been considered satisfactory. Racing began at 4 o'clock with the Club Plate Race for which a quartette went out and there was very little to choose between Cowslip and Aubrey. Eventually Cowslip's price expanded to twos, while Aubrey's remained at 1 to 1¼ and those in the know backed Cowslip freely: Crowbar had a few supporters at twos and threes; it was a fine finish and undoubtedly the best horse won. The All Horse Handicap attracted seven candidates and was a very open race. Judging from the betting there were no less than three favourites—Sperry, Tom Chaucer and Eustace, but the result was unexpected. Milford Lake beating all three, sperry finished nowhere. For the Ali Askar Plate two were most fancied out of a field of seven—Aga and Mexico; the latter started a red hot favourite and won comfortably: Grey Mist and Zari carried a lot of place money which they failed to bring home. Nine candidates paraded in the paddock for the Cantonment Plate, of which Cheeky was selected to win, Premca and Kismet had next call. Morning Star, a rank outsider, who started at sixes, got home and upset a few big pots. The Cellarer went out at the shortest price in the July Plate with Nuncio next in demand; the public quite ignored Milford Lake, who weighed in for the second time during the afternoon and starting at sixes beat the favourite and won hands down. The last race of the day was a selling handicap for horses. Metal Maid was installed first favourite at even money and her price at the start expanded to 6 to 4. Vic's Pride was next in demand and he secured the judges' verdict. Details:—

Memories of the American invasion of the late "nineties" were recalled after the first race on Saturday. It will be remembered that the stable controlled by Enoch Wishard at Newmarket occasionally entered a good horse in a selling race, with the object of gambling on it regardless of price, and after success buy it in, no matter what it cost. There were occasions when they had to lay out huge sums to retain a winner, and at the Newmarket Second Spring Meeting in 1895 had to give 1,510gs. to buy in Banquet II. after that horse had won a selling plate. Since then the biggest we can recall was the 1,410gs. to which Somatose was run up after winning the Maiden Plate at Newmarket First July Meeting in 1896. On this occasion, however, Lord William Beresford secured the animal. Results :—

NEWMARKET.

Most uncompromising weather, more like October than July, put a damper on the first day's sport, rain falling persistently, while the temperature made a greatcoat welcome. The King, who went out in the rain to see his winner saddled, was not so strongly supported by Society as would have been the case under sunny conditions, as the wet grass was by no means adapted to light footwear, and the sombre weather destroyed the "picnicy" character of this charming meeting altogether. Results :—

WINCHESTER

THE MOST POWERFUL REPEATER MADE.

In the confidence that comes from knowing that one is equipped to meet the largest or most dangerous prowler of the jungle is often found success. The .405 Winchester is the most powerful repeating rifle made. Its 300-grain, soft-point bullet has sufficient shocking power to stop any game alive. Note the tremendous velocity and energy shown by the following figures: velocity, 2204 foot seconds; energy, 3236 foot pounds. The rifle holds five cartridges, which can be fired in rapid succession, each shot delivering a ton and a half of energy. Simple of operation, reliable in action and accurate in shooting, it is used by famous big-game hunters in all parts of the world.

Winchester Rifles Are Sold By All Gunmakers.

It is probable that King may take as great an interest in racing at Newmarket as did his father, who by his presence did so much for racing at headquarters. DOCTOR ROSS STRASSBURG introduced Gonosan in the treatment of the most painful of diseases to which mankind is liable. It is better and safer and more effective than other preparations of Copaiba Cubeb, or plain Sandal wood oil. The same is the verdict of other Specialists who have patiently tried it. It is the latest Scientific Remedy and has never known to fail. At all chemists and dealers.

THE FRENCH OPEN CHAMPIONSHIP.

The competition for the Open Championship of France ended on the 3rd instant on the course at La Boulie, near Versailles, in another triumph for French professional golf. The pick of the English and Scottish players competed but only Harry Vardon offered stout resistance to the progress of the home representatives. Jean Gassiat of Chantilly won with 74, 74, 68 and 73=289. Vardon was second with 71, 73, 72 and 74 =290 and another Frenchman Louis Tellier, the chief professional at La Boulie was third with 76, 72, 68 and 75=291.

Last year Massy was the victor, but in the competition under notice he played below his best form. Gassiat, like Massy is a Basque, who learned his golf at Biarritz, where he was born on 3rd September 1880. He came to the front in 1907, when he was runner up to Massy in the French Open Championship. At Muirfield this year he gained a place for the first time in the prize list of the British Open Championship, his position being seventh. Appended are the results of the French championship :—

THE POONA AND KIRKEE FOX-HOUNDS.

A FIELD of nearly sixty met the Master at the 8th milestone on the Nasik Road on Thursday morning, the 18th instant. The nullah on the left hand side of the Old Bombay Road was the first draw and bounds were soon on to a line, the quarry making for Dapari Nullah. After going about a mile, however, he changed his direction and crossed the Old Bombay Road. He next re-crossed it, made for the New Bombay Road, over the railway. A couple of miles further on he went to ground after a run of 50 minutes and all efforts to dig him out proved unsuccessful and he was left.

"COUNTRY LIFE" TOURNAMENT.

4TH (QUETTA) DIVISIONAL SECTION.

THE tournament attracted six teams and the first round was played on the 12th instant, two games being put through. The first of these was between the Junior Division Staff College and the "Dreadnoughts." The former were conceding one goal, but they attacked immediately and were soon on terms. They continued to have the larger share of the play all through and were eventually victorious by 12 goals to 4. Milward's pony came down in the fourth chukker, giving his rider a nast

Royal Welsh Fusiliers vs. "Afghan Irish".—This was a fast and well-contested game. The Fusiliers lost some opportunities of scoring, but at one time were 5—3 ahead. The "Afghan Irish" made a great effort in the two last periods and adding three goals to their score won by 6—5. The winners had inferior ponies to the Fusiliers, but made up for this by superior combination and accurate shooting. Teams:—

The semi-finals were played on the 15th instant.

Royal Welsh Fusiliers "B." vs. Gymkhana.—Play opened up and down the field, each team scored a goal in the first chukker. The second period was also responsible for a goal to each team. Play was midfield all through the third and there was no scoring. In the fourth the Fusiliers asserted themselves and scored twice to a single point by the Gymkhana and in the last period the Fusiliers put on two more points without response. The Welsh thus won by 6 to 3. Teams:—

"Afghan Irish" vs. Staff College Junior Division.—This was a fast game throughout, the Staff College winning by 9 goals to 4. The absence of Allen owing to an injury and the consequent rearranging of their team handicapped the "Afghan Irish" considerably. The first period was very level, the "Afghan Irish" drawing first blood. The Staff College equalised in the second and the third period was pointless. In the fourth play was very level and each team scored a goal. The fifth produced fast play and after the "Afghan Irish" had scored a goal the Staff College had matters their own way and put on three in quick succession. The "Afghan Irish" added another in the last period, but the Staff College replied with two more and thus won as stated. Teams:—

Final.

The Staff College Junior Division and the Royal Welsh Fusiliers "B" team met in the final on the 17th instant, a close game ending in a victory for the Fusiliers by 9 goals to 7. Owen and Ormrod were most conspicuous of the winners and Taylor and Buchanan did good work for the Staff College.

The opening play was in favour of the Staff College, but Ormrod drew first blood for the Welsh. Then the Staff got away again. Bethell equalised and Buchanan put them ahead. The Staff College continued to attack in the second period and scored three more goals. Taylor being responsible for two and Buchanan for the other. In the third period each team scored a goal—the same was the result in the fourth. The Welsh goal was besieged in the fifth, but nothing was scored. The last chukker was also pointless and the game ended with the score: Welsh 3 (+ 6) = 9, Staff College 7. Teams:—

THE BANGALORE TOURNAMENT.

Both Polo and Racing have been unfortunate in Bangalore this year owing to bad weather and there is more bad weather in store for both. The Polo Tournament which should have commenced on Monday the 15th instant had to be postponed to Wednesday, the 19th as the ground was unplayable owing to heavy rain the previous night. On Wednesday, there was heavy rain again in the early part of the afternoon, but the Tournament was opened although there was only a small attendance. Two matches were played in the first ties; the first was between the 2nd Q. V. O. Sappers and Miners and Mysore Silladar Horse, the latter winning by 7 goals to 4, and the second between "B" Team of the 7th (Q. O.) Hussars and the Mysore Imperial Service Lancers in which the Mysore men were beaten by 8 goals to 4. Following are brief details:—

Q. V. O. S. and M. vs. Mysore Silladar Horse.

First Chukker.—The Silladars put the Sappers on their defence and after about one minute's play drew first blood, Shunker Rao hitting the goal. After this the Sappers did not give their opponents any more chances and no further score was made.

Second Chukker.—The Silladars continued to attack the Sappers and about midway through the period Faiz Mahomed put the ball through. This made the Sappers pull themselves together and concentrating their forces attacked the Silladar flags which resulted in Bassett knocking the ball in.

Third Chukker.—From a scrimmage in mid-field the Sappers cleared and Conran taking charge of the ball sent it safely home which equalised affairs and made the game interesting, both teams warming up to their work to a greater degree than before. The Sappers missed a couple of chances.

Fourth Chukker.—The Sappers attacked and after some strong resistance they got clear of their opponents, Bassett taking the ball away and shooting it into goal. The Silladars now pulled themselves together and both sides played a very strong game. Eventually Faiz Mahomed got on the ball and with a few well-directed shots equalised the score. There was yet a little time before the period ended and on the sound of the bugle the Silladars notched their fourth goal.

Fifth Chukker.—The Silladars now opened a tremendous onslaught on the Sapper's goal. Faiz Mahomed put in the fifth goal soon after the ball was set rolling, and collaring the ball again the same player was responsible for the sixth goal.

Sixth Chukker.—The Sappers attacked and made a supreme effort to increase their score and taking the ball into their opponents' territory Conran put in a pretty goal. Changing ends the play continued to be highly interesting, but notwithstanding all their efforts the Sappers were again put on their defence and beaten again and the match closed with the score: Silladar Horse, 9 goals; Q. V. O. S. and M., 4 goals. Teams:—

Umpires:—Major Rankin and Major Lambert.

"B" 7th Q. O. Hussars vs. T. S. Lancers.

First Chukker.—From the throw in there was a scrimmage in midfield, the Lancers cleared and some hustling ensued. Bates got away with it and threatened the Lancers' goal but was unsuccessful. Eventually the chukker was unproductive of any score.

Second Chukker.—The Hussars put the Lancers on their defence and worried them a good deal. Tomlinson got possession and passing to Bates the latter hit the first goal. The Lancers then got away and Lambert succeeded in equalising, sending a fine shot past Rankin.

Third Chukker.—The Hussars again opened an attack on the Lancers' citadel and after about four minutes, Thornton and Paget Tomlinson each notched a goal. The Lancers made a strong attack after this which resulted in a goal being added to their score, accounted for by Abdul Guffur.

Fourth Chukker.—This was a very evenly played chukker in which the Lancers equalised, Soobraj Urs being responsible.

Fifth Chukker.—The Lancers attacked but were repulsed; Tomlinson then took the ball up at fast pace and notched the fourth goal for his side; this was followed by Bates playing on to Tomlinson, who sent the ball through once more. The Lancers now took up the assault and Soobraj Urs cleverly dodged Bates and had a goal to his credit.

Sixth Chukker.—The Hussars simply walked round their opponents in this chukker and added three more goals to their score in quick succession and when time was called score was 7th Hussars, 8 goals; I. S. Lancers, 4 goals.

The semi-finals in this Tournament were played on Friday afternoon on the I. S. Lancers' ground, in the presence of an immense concourse of people, the attraction being the "at home" given by the 7th Q. O. Hussars. The first match was between the 7th Hussars "A" Team and Silladar Horse.

First Chukker.—The Hussars hit off but the Silladars returned the ball, which was promptly taken up again by the Hussars and sent into goal by MacCalmont. Starting afresh the Hussars again attacked and Silladars returning the ball equalised, Faiz Mahomed hitting the goal. From the throw in the Silladars again assumed the offensive and gave the Hussars a warm time of it, but no further score occurred.

Second Chukker.—On hostilities being resumed the Hussars assumed the aggressive; play continued in the proximity of the Hussars' goal and after a determined attack Faiz Mahomed shot another goal. The Hussars pulled the ball away for the throw in and they kept it with them for a few seconds in the vicinity of the Silladars' goal when Watson put it through.

Third Chukker.—The Hussars opened the attack and Watson quickly notched the third goal for his side. The next bit of play saw the Silladars attacking fiercely and then the Hussars returned the compliment and scored their fourth goal. (Watson) after the Hussars made another onslaught on the Silladar goal the latter saved and time was called.

Fourth Chukker.—On resuming play the Silladars took the ball up to the Hussars' flags from where it was returned to midfield; the play became scattered and each end was visited in turn but without any definite result; the Hussars, however, had the best of the innings and very near to the end of the chukker they ran down with the ball and getting it in front of the enemy's goal mouth in a mild scrum Gibbs put the ball through.

Fifth Chukker.—The Hussars at once attacked and McCalmont sent it through. They now played down to the other end and showed the Silladars no quarter; an attempt to raise their score now failed; the ball was still kept in the Silladars' territory and the latter had their work cut out for them in defending their post which they did successfully to the end of the chukker.

Sixth Chukker.—In less than a minute from the resumption of play Gibbs ran the ball into goal and changing ends they promptly put in another one, Brassey, being responsible for the eighth goal. It looked as if the ninth was going to be notched in the next run but it was saved; continuing to press, the next attempt to score resulted in the ball being hit out: a penalty free hit was next given the Hussars which Watson took and McCalmont put through and the match concluded soon after in a win for the Hussars. Score: 7th Hussars, 9 goals; Silladar Horse, 2 goals. Teams:—

20th Deccan Horse vs. 7th Hussars "B".

First Chukker.—From the throw in the Deccans ran the ball down, against the wind, to the Hussars ground and kept it there for some little time without seriously threatening the goal; Sidi Nur then got an opening and promptly sent the ball through. The Hussars had to play on the defensive during the rest of the period in which no further score was made.

Second Chukker.—Changing nags, the teams returned to the fray and from the hit out from the Hussars goal and the ball was made to travel down the ground and the Hussars after a brilliant run, lost the ball at the Deccan goal. Worgan then took possession and made for the Hussars' goal with a couple of brilliant lifts but sent the ball wide. After the Hussars played the ball half way down the lower line, the Deccans took it up again and with a few long shots, Ross notched a second goal for his side.

Third Chukker.—The ball was played by the Deccans and after a couple of unsuccessful attempts Konsal Singh scored; the Deccans ran off with the ball again and had another shot at the Hussars' goal, the same player scoring, and he repeated the brilliant performance in the next run, which gave him 3 goals in succession. The next time there was a bit of a scrum and Konsal Singh was again successful.

Fourth Chukker.—On resuming after half time, the Hussars picked up the ball from the throw in, but the Deccans promptly collared it and Sidi Nur had a try which did not come off; a second attempt was saved and the ball worked round and brought back and sent home by Sidi Nur. The Hussars got possession and played for all they were worth but they were outclassed. The Hussars again attacked, Bates taking the ball up in fine style and Tomlinson getting it home amid much applaus

Fifth Chukker.—The Deccans were off again with the ball and in a few strokes Konsal Singh raised their score to 8 goals. Returning with the ball to the other end they were opposed successfully by the Hussars, Rankin stopping progress. Ross next got hold of the ball and with a brilliant run sent it through. The Hussars were greatly worried by these lightning attacks and the next goal went down to the credit of Worgan. Tomlinson (Hussars) now made a brilliant run for the Hussars goal but was not successful; the Deccans got away but the chukker closed.

Sixth Chukker.—The Hussars brought the ball down with a rush to midfield where the Deccans seized it and with great promptitude Sidi Nur scored. There was another chase which resulted in nothing and then the Hussars had a look in for just a few seconds; the Deccans disputing possession carried the ball back, and after a bit of a tussle, in which the Hussars made a desperate effort to get the ball between the Deccan flags before time was called, the game ended in a most decisive victory for the Deccans by 11 goals to 1. Teams:—

The finals were to be played on Monday between the 20th Deccan Horse and "A" Team, 7th Q. O. Hussars, but rain caused a postponement: Bad weather again prevented the game from being played on Tuesday.

(By Telegram).

THE final was played yesterday afternoon on the Palace ground, the rain holding off. There was a large attendance. The contesting teams were 7th Hussars "A" team and 20th Deccan Horse. The latter drew first blood, scoring a goal in the first chukker and in the second each side scored once. The next three chukkers were unproductive, the Hussars defending nearly the whole time. In the last period the Deccans put on another goal and won by 3 goals to 1. The Deccan Horse scoring was done by Worgan 2, and Sidi Nur 1, McAlmont scored for the Hussars. The Challenge Cup and 4 small cups were presented to the winners by the Maharaja the Deccan Horse team receiving a tremendous ovation.

CALCUTTA NOTES AND COMMENTS.

I HAVE repeatedly said, and it has been proved on several occasions, during the last four or five years, that unpleasant incidents have occurred chiefly in illegitimate competitions, and the ultimate results have been that the I. F. A. Council has generally come in for adverse criticism. As the I.F.A. have to take up these unpleasant matters, it may perhaps seem rather ungenerous to suggest faults. There are, however, a few points which might be improved, at any rate if football is to be regarded from the standpoint of its public interest. Already there have been two disgraceful scenes in football matches, to say nothing of the last unpleasant incident which took place on the Calcutta ground last Monday evening, in an I.F.A. Shield match between the Black Watch and the Middlesex, which I will comment on lower down in this column. The two incidents I allude to are the free fight between the Measurers and the Aryans which took place early in the month; and last Friday's fight between Hyland of the Customs and Gillett of the 70th Company R. G. A. I may say I was present at both these games, and I am sorry to state that the I. F. A. Council did not punish both teams as they deserved to have been. It was a free fight in which the players and supporters of both teams took part; but while the Aryans had only one of their players suspended the Measurers' Club on the other hand were prohibited from taking part in any further football competitions. Now, in a case like this, any broad-minded body of people would have punished both teams as they deserved. The match was a Calcutta Soccer League competition—a tournament which was inaugurated this year, and the Council of this competion knowing that both teams were equally to blame, have should punished both the offenders in like manner. In the Customs and R. G. A. match it was a soldier who misconducted himself on no fewer than four occasions. He began by fouling the Customs players and the referee—a soldier belonging to the East Yorks was obliged to award a penalty kick to the Customs for a deliberate foul committed by this individual. The second offence by Gillett was when he handled young Hudson roughly, and when Hyland, the captain of the Customs team went between and prevented the soldier from assaulting the lad, Gillett turned on Hyland, abused him and struck him first. The Customs man naturally retaliated, and a few blows were exchanged before the men were separated—Mr. Deefholts, of the Customs Club, being the first to part the men. The game continued without any further incident, but just after the match terminated Gillett marched up to Hyland, and challenged him to another fight. The Customs' man replied that they could talk over matters after all the spectators had left and invited Gillett to have a drink. But this did not appease the Artilleryman who abused Hyland and followed it up by a blow. Hyland then lost all control of himself and slashed out at his opponent. After some blows had been exchanged the men were again separated. Now, in this case where only two men were implicated, and Gillett being the only player who really resorted to "dirty tricks" the I. F. A. Council not only disqualify the two men who fought, but the two teams were in addition suspended from taking part in any further competitions controlled by the Association. Why the Aryans Club were not suspended when they were implicated in a "free fight" with the Measurers and why the Customs and the R.G.A. teams were both suspended when only two men violated the rules is surprising and no wonder the I.F.A. have come in for adverse criticism and the sooner a more fair-minded and experienced body of men are selected on the Committee, the better for the Association and sport in general. If three out of the four Indians, now on the Council, were substituted by three Europeans from three of the leading Civilian and Military teams I feel certain that more correct decisions would be arrived at and there would be no dissatisfaction at their finding. The Dalhousie, Rangers, Black Watch and the Middlesex have no representative on the I.F.A. Council, or at all events I did not see a representative from any one of these teams mentioned, sit on the Council meetings when the Measurers vs. Aryans, and Customs vs. R. G. A. matters were discussed.

Connor, of the Black Watch, was kicked Out of the Middlesex when these two teams met last Monday on the C. F. C. ground in a shield match, has been suspended by the I.F.A. up to the end of 1914. Had Connor been suspended or not, the sporting Colonel of the Black Watch would never permit a man in the regiment who misconducted himself as Connor did, to take part in any football, and the offender has been severely reprimanded for his unsportsmanlike conduct. Before going into details of the week's matches I may state that Hyland has been acknowled to be one of the most cool and sporting players that has been seen on a football field in recent years, and at no time has he been pulled up for a deliberate foul or any shady tricks.

Dalhousie had their forwards to thank for being beaten by the East Yorks, for on the evening's play there was nothing to choose between the teams, the Trades Club having as much of the attacking as did their opponents. Indeed the local team were presented better openings, but O'Brien, Pearce and Brotchie missed practically open nets. Hurlston was also not seen to much advantage, while Wright plays better at half than in the forward line. The game was a fast and exciting one, but the shooting left much to be desired. Grimshaw netted during the initial half, and Lieutenant Eccles, after ends had been changed, and Dalhousie being unable to reduce the margin, the Trades Club lost by two goals to nil.

On Friday the Royal Irish Rifles met Sova Bazar on the Customs ground and a very one-sided game resulted in a win for the Irishmen by three goals to nil. The Rifles netted the ball in all on five occasions; but two of the goals were disallowed.

The Calcutta and Customs match on the former's ground was spoiled owing to the wretched condition of the ground, for much rain had fallen on Saturday which left the turf in a quagmire. The ground conditions were all against the lighter team, but this is not the only reason that caused them to lose by a goal to nil. The Customs it will be recollected beat Calcutta in both their League engagements and before they took the field the Riversiders or rather most of them were under the impression they were again going to be successful. The Customs took matters rather easily at the start and it was only after ends had been changed and Calcutta were leading by a goal that the Customs began to realise their situation. Then they began to strain every nerve, but Calcutta who are great Shield fighters were not going to lose their advantage and the whole team working like Trojans to maintain their lead, eventually won after one of the hardest games the Reds have taken part in this season by a goal to nothing. It is true the Customs had hard lines in not scoring on occasions and once Galbraith was tripped by Pooler when on the point of shooting—an infringement of the rule which the referee did not notice, but it is also true that their forwards threw away good chances at times. The only goal of the match was scored by Fenn, this player also having chalked the two points registered against Mohun Bagan.

The Black Watch and Middlesex match proved far more exciting and interesting than most people anticipated, for it was thought that the Scotch team on their League showing would win without really extending themselves. However those present got a pleasant surprise and it must be admitted that the Black Watch were very lucky indeed on winning that evening by a goal to nil. The game was marred by the incident referred to above and but for this it was the most exciting game witnessed in Calcutta for a long time. During the initial half the Black Watch not only played the better football but enjoyed the larger share of attacking. The two goal-keepers were tested to their utmost, Pigott during this period having more to do than Brown; but after ends had been changed the Middlesex were constantly attacking and the Dum Dum team did every thing but score. Brown has never been tested so severely as he was on this occasion and but for his wonderful saving the Black Watch would have been a beaten team. The Fort regiment scored early in the game, Band Master O'Donnell netting and the Black Watch were indeed lucky to run into the semi-final after scoring a goal to nil.

On Tuesday on the same ground the East Yorks were beaten by the Royal Irish Rifles easily by five goals to nil and the display given by the Yorkshire men came as a great disappointment to their supporters. I expect the Royal Irish to make a great bid for the shield, but one can never tell what may happen in a game like football. I am writing this before the Calcutta and Black Watch match and I would not be at all surprised if the C.F.C. were to lift the trophy.

Boxing.

BOMBARDIER WELLS' DEFEAT.

It was a body blow, with the power of a 16st. man behind it, which knocked consciousness out of Bombardier Wells at New York on Friday the 28th June. He was beaten in three rounds; beaten to such an extent that his mentor, Jim Maloney, emulated the example of M. Descamps at Dieppe, and threw up the sponge. But there was a mighty difference, Carpentier, at Dieppe, was standing on his feet, and in full possession of his faculties, when his manager intervened. Wells was crumpled up on the floor, obviously beaten and done with, or Maloney would never have publicly signalled defeat. He is not so emotional as Descamps, and the hurling of the sponge into the square is to me the most significant fact of all.

This contest seems to have been strangely like that at Olympia, when Gunner Moir achieved the sensational, and knocked Wells out. That, too, was in the third round. Quite remarkably do the details resemble one another. If Palzer had been tutored by the grim gunner he could not have so well repeated the occurrence of that other day. At Olympia Wells was an easy winner in the first round. It was so at Madison-square Garden. He had Moir on the floor practically beaten; Palzer was down for six seconds, and was forced to clinch. In the second round at Olympia we had Moir a little in the ascendancy; Palzer was at New York; whilst in the final round in each place there came that crushing blow to the body which left one man standing and the other an inert heap on the floor.

"The Englishman crumpled up and sank to the floor." That is the way the American reporters put it. It is a phrase pregnant with meaning. It conveys to us all that we want to know; it corroborates much that we dreaded. But the defeat, bad though it is to the loser—for the aftermath is a certain loss of prestige, and with that an increasing difficulty in getting good contests—should not breed undue pessimism. There was never a champion yet who did not at the outset of his career encounter reverses.

I have always looked upon Wells as a boxer lucky in his generation. He has arisen at a time when great white heavyweights have been conspicuous by their absence. In the years gone by he would have attained little prominence, and yet he is a man full of possibilities. Were he older the contention would not be reasonable, but he has youth on his side. So that this defeat should not be too largely taken into account. It brings him back a rung or two, of course—the Americans will have us believe that he has been thrown amongst the ruck—but you who would know of the progress of the boxing man should read of the early days of the greatest of them all. Defeats more often than not serve a purpose. It may do for Wells—we can, at least, but hope for that. His mistake has been in trying to reach the pinnacle at too great a speed. Caution was ever a virtue.

It requires no great judge of boxing to assign the reason for Wells' defeat. It was his body that beat him—that part of it that took the impact of Gunner Moir's smashing right at Olympia. The American writers saw it when he landed at New York. They spoke of him as a good-looking lad with a poor neck and a very weak middle portion. So they echoed the cry of English critics, and counselled him, on the night when he stepped into the square with Palzer, to box only, to keep out of the way of the ex-farmer, and to place chief reliance on his long left. Perhaps the Englishman did all this. Indeed, we are led by the reports to believe that he did more. His fashion of starting was in contrast to that on the night when he opposed Storbeck at the National Sporting Club's. Then he was jumpy and inclined to be overimpressed, but now, in a contest that transcended all the others in importance, he led easily with his right and left, and side-stepped with such ease as to make Palzer seem cumbersome and slow. That he was not upset by the occasion is clearly proven by the circumstance that he stepped in twice and felled Palzer. A great first round it must have been, but how like that one on the memorable night at Olympia.

We had the assurance of Jim Maloney on Saturday last that Wells was in magnificent condition. "Never in my life have I seen him in such fine shape," were the words, so that on that score there can be no excuse. As a scientific boxer Wells was miles ahead of Palzer; he was cleverer and more skilful in all he did; he managed to assimilate blows to the head. All this makes it the more certain that it was the body of Wells that sent him to defeat. And Palzer knew it. He was nearly three stones the heavier man, and he played for the body throughout; he heaped blows on the chest, and then at the end, he came lower. It would be absurd to so much as conjecture that this last blow was the only one that counted. The others had helped in the work—the last, giving the conge, was the final straw. It is a doubtful matter whether the wisest course was followed in matching him so soon with the best of the American white heavy-weights. For Wells, after all, has not had much experience. His contests have been with men who by no stretch of imagination could be described as first class. Less than three years ago he was totally unknown; but he has been flying at high game for quite a lengthy while.

JOHNSON vs. FLYNN.

The contest, at Las Vegas, California, between Jack Johnson and Flynn for the Heavy-Weight Championship of the World was stopped by the police at the end of the ninth round. The fight was awarded to Johnson, who thus retains his title.

The weather was fine, and there was an attendance of some 8,000 persons. Johnson, smiling continually, fought with great care, but from the first he had all the best of the fight. All the time he kept up his usual running fire of sarcastic taunting remarks addressed to his antagonist; he repeatedly dropped his guard and invited Flynn to "blaze away," a proceeding which convulsed the spectators with laughter. There was a great cheer for Flynn at the end of the fourth round, when he rushed the negro to the ropes and then landed a hard left on the jaw. By this time, however, Flynn's own face was covered with blood.

In the fifth round Flynn complained that he could not fight while Johnson was holding him. He had received four straight lefts to the face in quick succession and one left upper-cut, and his counter-attack, directed to Johnson's stomach apparently produced no effect.

In the sixth round Flynn butted three times and complained that Johnson had made this justifible by holding him. Johnson appeared to be infuriated by this charge, and landed a volley of left and right punches on Flynn's face. In the seventh round Flynn, who was bleeding profusely from the nose, failed to land his glove on the champion once, and in the eighth round he started butting again, and had to be warned three times.

In the final round Flynn closed in and then suddenly jumped, planting the top of his head against Johnson's jaw. At this point the police interfered and stopped the contest on the ground that it had become a brutal exhibition. The referee, Edward Smith, of Chicago, gave his decision in favour of Johnson, his award being received with enthusiastic cheering.

Another account of the fight by rounds:—

Second Round.—Flynn again rushed but Johnson, smiling held him at bay, lightly jabbing Flynn with the left to the face and then planting a heavy uppercut on the jaw. The men hurled insults at one another during this round, at the close of which Flynn's mouth was bleeding badly.

Third Round.—Johnson continued his taunts, which were cut short by a right hook to the jaw, which drew blood and nettled the champion, who volleyed with his right on Flynn's mouth, drawing blood freely.

Fourth Round.—Flynn again made a rush but Johnson drive him all round the ring with uppercuts and the challenger was both badly punished and tired when he took his corner.

Fifth Round.—Johnson toyed with his opponent hardly taking the trouble to look at him and maintaining amusing conversation with his wife and his seconds. Flynn hammered away to the champion's body and received occasional lefts to the face.

Sixth and Seventh Round.—Johnson's supporters urged him to end the battle offhand but replying "Wait a minute" he commenced to beat a tattoo with both hands on the face and body of his man who was dazed and bleeding.

Eighth Round.—Flynn received further punishment.

Ninth Round.—Johnson sent in a terrific uppercut to the mouth and Flynn dropped helpless. The police thereupon jumped into the ring and stopped the fight. The weight of the contestants were given as Flynn 192lbs. and Johnson 360lbs. Al Palzer has challenged the winner.

Motoring.

By "Throttle."

The improvement in motor driving in Calcutta mentioned in this column last week is still being maintained, there having been a noticeable absence of serious cases before the courts, in the few which have been reported nominal fines have been imposed. Being himself a keen motorist, Mr. Bagram, the officiating Second Presidency Magistrate, may be relied on to continue the course adopted by his predecessor, which has proved so effective.

At this season with its rains almost daily ignition troubles are liable to be more frequent than in the dry weather. Special care should be taken to see that no water can leak into boxes containing the coil or accumulators. A good plan is to give all terminals a coating of vaseline, this prevents corrosion and consequent short circuits. Magnetos also should receive special attention if they are to run properly and although it is going over old ground I will give a few tips for the benefit of those who may need them. Don't pull a magneto about unnecessarily, it is a delicate instrument and much harm may be done by the man who takes one to pieces to see how it works. If you have had your magneto down don't forget that you may set it correctly to the marks on the timing gear and yet the engine will not work. In such a case the spark occurs on the right cylinder but at the wrong time; the remedy is to take the magneto down again, give it one complete turn and refix as before. Another way is to change the wiring, but as this is the lazy man's way, I will not encourage it by explaining how to do it. The following remarks apply generally to most makes of magnetos. See that the spark gap is clear and screwed up properly so that there is not too much space between the points. Keep the bearings of the make and break lubricated, the oil put in the oil cups goes to the main bearings only and does not touch those mentioned. A magneto spanner may be purchased from any motor firm, this has a gauge attached to test the break of the contact. The thickness of the gauge being the correct amount of break to allow and it should be kept adjusted to this. The platinum points of the contact should always be kept flat and even, this is accomplished by the occasional use of a fine file. Keep the distributor clean, a spot of oil wiped round this with the finger tip and a touch of the same on the centre connection prolongs the life of these parts and the carbons without affecting the sparking. If the metal and fibre walls of the distributor are uneven regular firing cannot be expected nor will the carbon brushes give the wear that they should. A fine file may be used on these also for the purpose of trimming up occasionally. If badly worn the distributor must be put in a lathe and very carefully turned down. A common source of trouble is the spring holding the carbon in place, this should be inspected occasionally to see that it is sufficiently strong to keep the carbon up to a good connection. Ordinary plugs should not be used for magneto ignition, the spark being so much hotter than that from an accumulator that they will not stand it. Special plugs are made for use in connection with magnetos and these should be always fitted, personally I have found the single point type preferable to any other. If the star type is used, see that the points of the star are at equal distances from the ring in which they are enclosed. Beyond ordinary cleaning and oiling leave the magneto alone as much as possible. For lubrication a thin oil should be used, as the wick generally fitted to the oil bath will not suck up an oil that is too thick as readily as is necessary to ensure effective lubrication. Defective firing may often be traced to the switch so this should be kept clean and examined occasionally to see that the lever is properly connected and takes its position correctly, a loose screw generally causes the trouble but sometimes the current "shorts" across the connections at the back. It is advisable to have a magneto re-magnetized about every couple of years. If a magneto is driven by a flange coupling, and not by a "dog" see that it is centred properly, otherwise the bearings will be worn unduly. The most troublesome form of ignition is, of course, the accumulator system and one is pretty safe in predicting that in a very few years it will be obsolete. At present it is used generally only for starting and with motor manufacturers devoting their attention to various designs of self starters its life even in this capacity seems to be nearly at an end. Where coils are used the points of the trembler screws should be kept even, as in the case of the platinum points mentioned above. Accumulators should be run down and recharged every month whether in use or not. The usual method of adjusting tremblers is by turning the screw until a sharp musical buzz is obtained and then as near as possible to adjust the other screws to obtain the same note from each. The current consumption of the coil depends largely on how close the tremoler contacts are set. It frequently happens that a good deal of current is wasted in having too close contact and at the same time platinum points are soon worn and pitted from excessive sparking. There is another serious disadvantage inasmuch that the firing point cannot be synchronized for each cylinder, the closely set trembler firing the charge earlier that the lightly set one, and thus it happens that an engine rarely gives off the full amount of power when running on the accumulator. The fault lies in the bad setting of the coil. A special Ammeter for adjusting coils is obtainable and is a most useful necessity, as it is only necessary to connect it in the coil circuit, one terminal being joined direct to the positive terminal of the coil and the other to the positive of the accumulator the usual connection be temporarily removed. If the coil is designed to work with for instance one ampere of current, each trembler can be adjusted until the needle of the Ammeter registers exactly the amount required. This method of setting will at the same time give an indication of any defect in the coil, contact maker, or wiring. Suppose for instance the coil had a bad connection inside, the needle would jump about instead of remaining steady. A bad contact elsewhere would generally cause a low and unsteady reading, while a short circuit would cause the needle to jump beyond its normal range, indicating the passing of excessive current.

Provided accumulators have not run short of acid, recharging is not a difficult matter and can be done by anyone where electric light or continuous current is fitted. A method which entails no special requirements but merely two lengths of wire is to take the cover off one of the switches controlling a group of two or three lights, put the switch in the off position and find out which is the positive terminal on the switch. To do this connect two lengths of insulated wire, one to each terminal and after cleaning the other ends place them in a glass of salt water, the wire connected to the negative pole of the switch will then give off a series of bubbles. All that is necessary then is to join this wire to the black terminal and the other to the red terminal of the accumulator and leave them so connected long enough to complete the charging. The lamps will remain alight and with no appreciable loss of brilliance. When fully charged the accumulator gives off gas freely and the acid becomes cloudy, the voltage rising to about 4·5. The number and candle power of the lamps should be adjusted to suit the size of the accumulators. Instead of tapping the current at the switch it is often more convenient to connect the accumulator to a lamp holder and charge it while the lamp is on. The requirements in this case are a lamp holder, an adapter and a couple of yards of flexible twin wire. The adapter is fitted into the main lamp holder and the lamp is inserted in the new holder. The positive and negative wires may be found as described and then coupled up as in the former method. The lamp used would be either an 8, 16 or 32 candle power according to the size of the accumulator and the voltage of the lighting circuit. During charging the vent plugs must be removed to allow the gas to escape.

With a voltage of 220, seven 16 c.-p. lamps are required to pass a current of 2 amperes and 12 hours should be allowed for the charging of a 20 ampere accumulator. When charging during the time the lamp is required for illumination and to avoid loss of light a special lamp of from 6 to 10 volts lower than normal voltage may be used. The old type of carbon filament lamp is the more convenient for charging through owing to the greater current consumed per lamp as compared with the modern metallic filament lamp. This means that a less number of lamps are required to pass a given amount of current. A good make of accumulator should with proper attention last for several years. If left for lengthy periods uncharged an action known as sulphating sets in on the plates. This is evidenced by the formation of a white film, and if this has set in to any great extent it is an extremely difficult matter to get rid of. The best plan is to give the cells a prolonged charging, then discharge them through a four-volt lamp and recharge repeating the operation till all signs of sulphating has disappeared. The acid in the cells should be kept at uniform strength which is a specific gravity of 1,170 when the cells are nearly discharged. If a densimeter is not at hand for testing it may be remembered that one part of pure concentrated sulphuric acid by volume and 4¼ parts distilled water mixed form dilute acid of approximately correct strength. The plates should always be kept covered with liquid, but as the acid evaporates it must be brought up to the correct level by adding water only. Should any of the acid be spilt then it is necessary to replace it with dilute acid, if water were to be added then the electrolyte would be too weak the plates would not charge properly. Loosening of the paste in the grids is usually the result of the cells being subjected to severe vibration from the car on which they are used. Care should be taken to see that accumulators are well packed into their boxes so that they cannot shake about and loosen the paste, as if this drops in between the plates it causes an internal short circuit and the cells run down. If accumulators are to be kept unused for any length of time and it is not convenient to charge them occasionally, they should be well charged, the acid should be emptied out, the plates washed and allowed to dry. The acid can be replaced and a short charge given when the cells are required to be used. When accumulators have celluloid tops these must be kept clean and dry otherwise a leakage of current takes place. Damage to celluloid cases, such as holes or cracks can be repaired by cementing on a piece of sheet celluloid with acetone. Cells which will not hold the charge, that is they run down when left standing are very troublesome and unreliable, the defect may arise as stated above from an internal short circuit between the plates, the acid may be too weak or too strong, or a leak in the partition between two compartments. This latter trouble can be detected by emptying out the acid from one cell only and noting whether that in the other retains its level. A cell may also run down through the plates becoming hard and thus losing porosity.

ANYONE on the look out for a good car cheap cannot do better than send to Mr. Monk of Messrs. C. and A. Danby's for tickets in the raffle of his 4-cylinder Bedford. This is a well-known car in Calcutta and is a thoroughly good one, in first-class condition and the owner is only getting rid of it on account of his having imported a bigger car. Mr. Monk is a practical motor engineer and consequently has taken good care of his car, the result is that the tickets are being sold out rapidly. The price is Rs. 5 per ticket and one cannot expect to get a really good car for less even in these days of cheap American competition.

AN excellent tribute to the wearing qualities and reliability of the world-famous Michelin Tyres is furnished by the result obtained in the Grand Prix and Coupe de l'Auto Races run at Dieppe on the 25th and 26th of June. Eight out of the first ten cars in the Grand Prix romped home on Michelin Tyres and even more signal success was gained in the Coupe de l'Auto, for the first six cars were fitted with Bibendum's famous product. In addition to this, the three Sunbeams which formed the only team to arrive, thus securing the Reliability Cup, attribute their success in a large measure to the fact that Michelin Tyres were used.

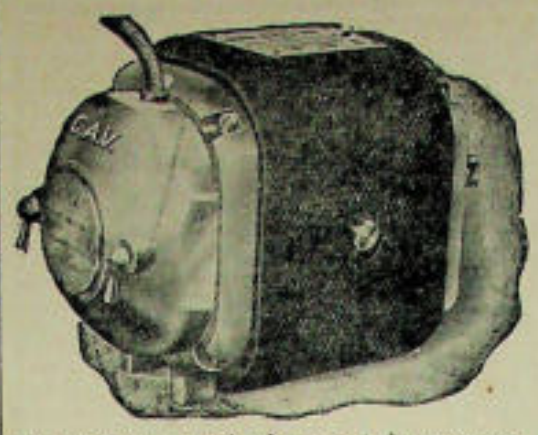
BIRD MIGRATION IN BRITAIN.

MR. EAGLE CLARKE'S unique experience makes his study of bird migration a very interesting work. As editor of the records of observations collected from the lights on the British and Irish coasts by a British Association Committee from 1880 to 1887 he found, as he tells us, that "vast though the data were, much desirable information was still lacking." In order to fill these gaps he spent a month's holiday in the Eddystone Lighthouse, another month in even less agreeable quarters on board the Kentish Knock lightship in the North Sea, and further periods in Fair Isle, the Flannans, St. Kilda, and other outlying islands. His investigations, especially those on Fair Isle, says the Times, have added considerably to our knowledge of the occurrence of rare species in Britain; but he has performed a more important service in reducing the great mass of migration observations to intelligible order and explaining the singularly complex movements of birds in and through our islands, where many routes converge.

On the mystery of the original causes of migration Mr. Clarke is not very enlightening. It does not take us very far to point out that if swallows and cuckoos stayed here during the winter they would starve; what we seek to discover is the impulse or traditional habit which makes them leave their haunts in the south and come north for our summer. Clarke finds one reason of this in the "well-known passionate attachment shown by birds for their native land." Another he thinks, is the physiological development of the birds in spring, which "must prove an overpowering incentive to seek the accustomed breeding haunts." "Another important factor is that the southern and tropical regions. . . are not suited for a nursery of the young of the hardy northern species." None of these explanations seems to go very deep. We deduce the bird's passionate attachment for its native land from its migration, and cannot therefore logically explain the migration by the attachment. As to the second point, the impulse to breed does not necessarily involve an impulse to breed in any one particular spot. And the hardiness of the young of certain species is once more a consequence and not a cause of their repairing to the north to breed. We can find no hint in all this of how our palæarctic birds dispersed themselves from their original homes and where those homes may have been. Yet in some such consideration as this must lie the key to all their subsequent wanderings.

Most people by this time understand that the great majority of our so-called resident birds, such as the skylark or rook, are in reality migratory, though their movements are largely concealed by the appearance of fresh relays in their places. Song-thrushes, for example, are true residents only in a few gardens and other sheltered spots. The song-thrush was one of the two most abundant species (the other being the skylark) in a great southward rush past the Eddystone on 15th October, 1910, during Mr. Clarke's visit. These were summer visitors departing; and on almost the same date, two years later, he watched song-thrushes "careering around the ship" in a great westward rush from the Continent to England past the Kentish Knock. These birds were winter visitors arriving; and it is one of the most interesting points about our climate and its influence on bird life that the winter movement of Central European birds is not only southwards towards the Mediterranean and Africa, but westwards towards the warm British shores. Mr. Clarke points out that in some cases their autumn line of migration actually takes them to the northward of their summer home; they cross the southern part of the North Sea from south-east to north-west at the same time as some of our own summer visitors are departing in exactly the opposite direction. In addition to these movements of summer and winter visitors, the song-thrush also passes through our area as a true bird of passage both in autumn and in spring. In this guise it falls into the same class as such scarce and fugitive wanderers as the knot and the curlew sandpiper.



Such are the main movements of a species which appears to most people as one of the most sedentary of garden birds. They are not difficult to comprehend if we once realize that almost all birds migrate, though the length of their journeys varies enormously, and that the summer visitor of one country naturally becomes a winter visitor somewhere else. Far more intricate are the routes by which birds of these various classes enter and leave Britain at various times of the year, and here lies the great value of Mr. Clarke's long and patient work. He has mapped out from the bewildering diversity of individual records a chart of the main migration routes which subsequent observation will undoubtedly supplement, but is unlikely to supersede. The most southerly point where he himself attempted to carry out observations was the island of Ushant, where he was himself so persistently observed as a supposed spy that he migrated prematurely to Alderney. It was the autumn of the Fashoda incident, and what peering and prying Englishman was likely to be concerned merely with sparrows? It is a pity that the expedition was not made in more recent and more amicable times, for Ushant is a singularly interesting point on the greatest migratory route. It is here that the main stream from Spain and Portugal and Africa south of the Sahara splits up to follow the French and English coasts of the Channel, while other streams diverge to skirt Ireland both on the east and on the west and to press on for Scandinavia and the far north. The same routes are followed in autumn in the opposite direction. From these main routes many minor paths must deviate as the birds press on; and, to judge from the observations carried out in recent years by the British Ornithologists' Club, a large proportion of our own summer visitors arrive all along the south coast in small as well as large parties, coming directly from the south. These seem to be all drafts from the large body skirting the opposite French coast.

Besides the coastwise migration through Britain and thence by way of the Shetlands to Iceland on the west and Norway on the east, there is a direct migration to and from Norway at many points across the North Sea north of the Wash. To the south of the Wash the evidence shows that the sea is crossed by a different set of routes—those between England and Central Europe. In the middle of this stream lies the Kentish Knock light-vessel. Mr. Clarke considers that the Continental end of the east-and-west sea route in the delta of the Scheldt and Maas, and that from this great funnel the birds spread fanwise in autumn from Norfolk to Kent. Fair Isle lies between Orkney and Shetland, on the main north and south route; and the richness of its birds life at migration times is most significant. On this bare and stormy island, where there are only 23 species of breeding birds, no fewer than 207 species have occurred since Mr. Clarke's first visit in 1905. Many species previously regarded as rare visitors to Britain have been discovered to be regular migrants, and five new British species have been identified. It is incredible that all these rare visitors should occur only on this one lonely spot; and it is quite clear that the richness of its list of novelties is due to the concentration of the migrant swarms on a small, isolated, and treeless island where they have lately been very closely watched. No doubt a great number of rare birds pass from end to end of the country at each migration season, but escape notice owing to their wider dispersal, the small proportionate number of daily observers, and their concealment in trees and undergrowth. Apart from the fractional percentage of very rare wanderers, the great value of the observations on what Mr. Clarke fairly calls the British Heligoland is the accurate information gained on species which use this great migratory route and the periods during which the migrations of the different species are performed.

Mr. Clarke has reached some interesting conclusions on the dependance of migrations on the weather. He declares that, contrary to general belief, the direction of the wind during the period of migration is absolutely unimportant; the one requisite is that it should be gentle and not rough. In an excellent series of maps, based on those prepared by the Meteorological Officer, he shows the various main types of weather over West and North-West Europe which hinder migration by interposing a barrier of storm, or help it by a calm anti-cyclonic system. In point of fact, a south-east wind marks the most favourable migration periods both in spring and autumn; but this is simply because it is a result of a large Continental anti-cyclone which sheds light airs round its circumstance over the whole of our areas. With a cyclone centred over Western Europe we get strong westerly and north-westerly winds, and the migrating birds are checked. When the cyclone moves away and is replaced by a calm interval or light anti-cyclonic airs, there follows one of the great rushes which in thick weather bring the birds by myriads to the lights. The descriptions of these rushes as seen on the Eddystone and the Kentish Knock Lightship are weirdly fascinating. On clear nights the birds pass safely on and do not approach the lights; but when the beams shine strongly through a thick atmosphere they are attracted in swarms. On densely foggy nights they often appear in large numbers and seem then to have lost their way, as is shown by the presence of species which ordinarily do not migrate. But the most typical state of the weather for a great rush round the lantern is when the atmosphere is filled by rain or

A triumph of simplicity.

Unparalleled experience, expert knowledge and unique manufacturing facilities have enabled us to produce the simplest dynamo lighting plant extant.

Extreme simplicity is not the only remarkable feature: lightness and compactness are equally marked. Thus, in addition to attaining an abnormally high degree of efficiency and reliability the system is as perfect as it is possible for ingenuity and skill to make it.

Yet in spite of all these advantages, we can supply the dynamo complete from £7-10.

haze, or even by a high percentage of invisible moisture. Then the light throws densely luminous beams, and the birds are attracted from far away. Red lights, being much less luminous, are hardly ever visited. The author mentions some curious points of difference between the behaviour of various species. He notes that almost all the birds which come to the lights are of the passerine order: waders pass safely overhead and there are few cases of fascinated birds of prey. He suggests that this susceptibility of the passerine birds may be due to their higher nervous development. Starlings, which are among the most intelligent of birds, are overpoweringly affected by the beams. Perched on the iron frame of the light-ship's lantern, "when one brilliant beam had passed, the bird craned its neck and appeared to gaze longingly at the next, which was slowly approaching." On the Eddystone the starling became "not only a complete fool but a seemingly willing sacrifice." Skylarks are even more headlong in their dash for the light, and perish in equal or greater numbers; but there is appalling loss of life among many species during one of the great rushes on a thick night. The preference of most birds for night travel, which is one of the most curious points in their migration, is tentatively explained by the author as being due to their being obliged to hunt for food during the daylight hours. In most cases this seems an adequate reason; but there are some curious exceptions. The woodcock migrates by night, though night is its normal feeding-time; and swallows, which are purely diurnal, none the less migrate by day.

PARROTS.

There is a great deal of individuality about the parrot, to whatever tribe he may belong. The African grey parrots are supposed to be the best talkers, but the Indian birds, although perhaps not so clear of speech, are often quite as clever. A great deal depends, of course, on the bird's up bringing, and if one may say so, on the careful development of its mental faculties. Goldsmith, in speaking of parrots, says with his always unconscious humour, that he found French parrots spoke French much better than English parrots spoke English, and he was evidently much puzzled at this, for he writes:—"I was at first for ascribing it to the different qualities of the two languages, and was for entering into an elaborate discussion on vowels and consonants; but a friend that was with me solved the difficulty at once, by assuring me that the French women scarcely did anything else the whole day than sit and instruct their feathered pupils!"

The most satisfactory way to ensure the bird's being properly taught is to buy a young bird, a nestling, if possible, and teach it yourself. Old birds that are untaught will not learn nearly so easily as young ones, and besides that, they generally imitate some of the sounds they have heard, and seem to take a special pride in airing their least pleasing and noisest accomplishment the greatest number of times. A person bought from a sailor an untaught parrot supposed to be only a year old. Certainly the bird could not speak, but whenever it was hungry or angry, and it was either one or the other most of the time, and often both together, it would imitate with wonderful accuracy of volume and note, the wail of a syren. At first its owner was quite proud of this accomplishment, but when he had been kept awake several nights by the hideous din, and when the bird refused to grow "accustomed" to its new home, and declined to learn a single word, it fell out that the cage door was left open one night, and the parrot was assimilated by the cat! Prince Maurice and Colonel O'Kelly were both the proud possessors of famous parrots. When asked to sing Colonel O'Kelly's parrot would say "I can't," and he would lift the skirt of a lady's dress and say "What a pretty foot!" If anyone teased him he would say "I don't like it." The writer has an Indian parrot which sometimes takes a savage delight in biting him as hard as possible. With great cunniness the bird will simulate extreme affection and call out "Come and scratch-a-poll, poor Polly." If the request is acceded to, he allows one to place one's finger on his head, and then with a snake-like twist of the neck he seizes it and bites hard, chuckling joyfully if he succeeds, and fluffing himself out, and dilating and contracting the pupil of his eye—a sure sign of wrath in a parrot—should he fail. But his ebullition of wrath over, this same parrot is most fascinating. Henry VII. had a parrot which, as the King was then in residence at his river palace, learned many words and phrases from the passengers about to cross the river. One day the bird, which was on a long chain attached to a perch, fell into the river. Instantly it called out at the top of its voice, "A boat, twenty pounds for a boat!" A ferryman was near by, and hearing the cry, and recogising the bird as the King's parrot, he rescued it, and restored it to its royal owner. As the King was very fond of the parrot the waterman demanded the twenty pounds, saying the parrot had promised that sum. Henry replied that the parrot should determine the matter. The bird heard this, and at once called out "Give the scoundrel a groat!"

Aristotle declares that parrots will drink wine, which produces the same effect of tongue-loosening on them as on human beings, and this he says renders their conversation more witty and amusing. In the wild state the flocks of parrots are exceedingly beautiful to look at, but the noise they make is most unmelodious. In some parts the natives, to procure the nestlings, will cut down the trees in which the birds have built, and take what young ones the shock of the fall has not slain; or they will stun the adult birds with blunted arrows should the demand for young birds exceed the supply. In some places the flocks of parrots devour most of the fruit grown by the negroes, and as the birds are not ill-flavoured, when they have been eating certain berries, a good number find their way into the pot. Luckily they are too numerous and spread over too large an area for them to be easily exterminated.

Of parrot stories of every degree of humour there must be thousands, many of them hoary antiques. At the risk of being such a chestnut the following story is given. A sporting parson, who loved a good horse better than anything else of a temporal nature, had a parrot. He was a good man, as well as a good sportsman, and attended a race meeting for the pure joy of seeing the best horseflesh. Unhappily his bishop, who knew him well and liked him, died, and the new bishop disapproved in toto of anything and everything connected with the turf. It so happened that just after a Confirmation in the sporting parson's parish there was a violent thunderstorm, and the bishop took refuge at the parsonage. He made the acquaintance of the parrot, and was talking to it, and praising it to the unsuspecting rector, when suddenly the bird put its head on one side and called out in stentorian tones the latest phrase it had been taught, which happened to be "Two to one bar one." The bishop was electrified, and the rector struck dumb; but worse followed. Before either could speak the parrot gave a chuckle, and said in the rector's voice, "By Jove! if the bishop heard you!"—Globe.

THE STATE OF ENGLISH CRICKET.

As each season comes round those doctors of cricket arise again to examine the condition of the game and offer prescriptions for the restoration of that healthy condition, which, it is understood, has been passing away these many years. The principal disease from which cricket is suffering is that which has disturbed the public for long past; the game is too slow. Now, it is not to be denied that cricket is often dull as a spectacle—even a test match may be dull in this respect; but is this entirely the fault of the game? It is only within living memory that cricket has been exalted to the position of a popular spectacle; in earlier days the thin crowd round the ground was composed, not of people in search of excitement, but of men who were more or less experts. These did not demand sensational play; they looked for science; if a "slogger" came to the wicket and ran up fours in the style desired of the shilling crowd they appraised him critically; but the game was the thing; and free hitting, though enjoyed, was not the be-all and end-all of the match. With the perfecting of pitches, and wider public interest, the game is tried by the spectacular standard; and though this is unfair to a pastime which, in its essence, is non-spectacular, we must examine the situation by the light of modern demands. If public interest in cricket is to be kept alive, say the doctors aforesaid, something must be done to make it more exciting; and the remedies proposed are entertaining in their variety. We are inclined to think that Mr. Punch expresses the feelings of a good many in his own characteristic way when he advises that that batsman be declared "out" who fails to make at least one stroke for four in his first two overs. That condenses the largest complaint into a nutshell, and appeals to us as embodying the spirit of the criticisms levelled at the game.

Serious criticism takes one of two forms; one school of improvement would alter the implements; it would narrow the bat or raise the height of the stumps; the other would import new rules for the regulation of the game; it would have five-ball overs, it would restrict the length of the bowler's run or abolish the tea interval. We take it that any alteration of implement is out of court; it is to be remembered that legislation applies not to exhibition cricket alone but to the game as played by club and village teams, by school and college; and no complaint comes from these nurseries of the game, simply because it is not there spectacular, but retains its original character as a game for the delectation of those who take active part in it. What the sightseeing public wants for its shilling is big hits and fast scoring; it wants to see the figures on the telegraph board mounting up, to the end that it may have something to talk about. It has made the leading cricketer a demi-god; and the enlightened public is not unlike the heathen in that it expects the gods it has appointed to live up to the standard it has been pleased to set. Now the truth is that the modern batsman actually does, on the whole, score more rapidly than his predecessor of about twenty years back. Some of us can recall matches in the late 'eighties and early 'nineties in which the score crawled up at the rate of thirty or forty an hour; and it was dull; there is no getting away from that, the damning fact remains; such cricket may have been faultless, but it was dull. For such is the quality of that which is faultless and is not peculiar to cricket. There was a season when the "Dead March in Saul," whistled by thousands of reproachful onlookers gave players, a hint, stronger than any "barracking" could convey, that the display was not up to the standard expected. We would not go, so far as to suggest that such measures had any beneficent influence, but the fact remains that play now-a-days is distinctly faster—and therefore from the point of view of the spectator, better—than it was twenty years ago. This is not guess work; some industrious person has worked the thing out, and has shewn that whereas sixty runs an hour was then held fast rather than slow scoring, now the average rate of scoring is nearer seventy-five runs per hour. We think, too, there is rather less "playing against the clock;" less purely defensive play to save the draw when victory is clearly out of reach. That the public interest in the game is not waning, as the doctors would have us believe, seems proven by the size of the crowds which have been attending the test matches; 13,000 on the first, a wet and unpleasant day, and 15,000 on the last, a fine one, at Lords for the England versus Australia match, does not look like waning interest when we think how many and various are the rival attractions of cricket at the height of the London season. And yet the play was not evenly exciting: on the contrary one candid critic remarks of Mr. Kelleway's innings that "it was terribly dull to watch;" and as he was at the wicket for 4 hours and 10 minutes for a score of 61 we can well believe it: but at the same time his work is appraised as "of the utmost value to his side;" he wore down the bowling by his inexhaustible patience.

This is a very good example of the relative attitude of player and onlookers. Fifteen thousand people paid to see cricket on the day of the Australian's innings, and they wanted to see exciting play. Mr. Kelleway had a certain task to perform in the interests of his side and he performed it to admiration; had he set himself to knock the bowling about he would have pleased the crowd but he might—in all probability would—have done less good to his side.

The spectator pays the piper in these days and he claims his right to call the tune: that the "gate" should figure so largely in the calculations of the modern cricketer is regretable, but the fact is there and cannot be blinked. If county clubs are to survive at all county matches must "draw" the crowd; the shilling is master here as everywhere; and if the payer is not content he will spend his money in some other way. The cricketer cannot do without him; his occupation is gone if he tries; for that is the penalty of making cricket into a spectacle. Perhaps they are right who maintain there is too much cricket in these days; the man who would be an amateur in the strictest sense of the word must be an unpaid professional, for he has to give up an appreciable part of the year to cricket and nothing else. The public gets as many opportunities of looking on as it can enjoy,—often more than it can use; and its standard is pitched by the play of famous players who ran up sensational scores and gave food for adulation.

The remedy does not lie in tinkering with laws or implements; to make the over-five balls would be to waste more time; to alter size of bat or raise height of stumps would spoil the game for both players and spectators; but we should see no objection to abolition of the tea interval! The peculiar feature of the cricket match is that nobody, save the rabid enthusiast, cares to see the match out; it is the rarest thing in the world for the score of one side so nearly to approach that of the other that the issue remains in doubt till the end of the game; and the vast majority are content to see a day's play and await the result in the newspaper. This we take it is one of the chief disabilities of cricket as a spectacle; and it is one that no ingenuity can dispel.

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

THE winner of the Liverpool Summer Cup, Coastwise, came up in the betting very fast on the day of the race, as he is returned as having started at 9 to 2, whereas the day before his telegraphic quotation was 10 to 1 and his connections therefore must have known that he would be near the top with 7st. 4lb., a concession of 18lbs. from the two top-weights Trepida and Mushroom, both of whom were apparently well backed as they were quoted at 4 to 1 each with Chili II next choice at 5 to 1 and Hair Trigger II at sixes. Hamerton, who ran third, also came up in the betting at the last moment and started at 9 to 2 level with the winner. Coastwise beat Chili II, this year's City and Suburban winner, by the comfortable margin of three lengths and Hamerton was only a neck behind the runner-up. Coastwise ran down the course in the Queen's Prize at Kempton in April won by Duke of Sparta II from Paravid and King William and a very good field and was reported to have been badly away, but last season he secured three brackets and also ran up on two occasions. He captured the 1½ mile Manor Handicap at Haydock Park in which he beat Victory and Sealed Orders from both of which horses he was getting weight 5lb. and 4lb. respectively, and Chinchilla, to whom he was conceding 18lb., beat him in a canter for first position in the 1 mile 3 furlong Portland Highweight Handicap at Doncaster, but next time he was out he won the Sherdley Gold Cup, 1½ mile, at Wolverhampton, beating Election and Orquil to both of which horses he was giving away a bit of weight. He ran up in the Horseshoe Handicap, 1½ mile, at Gatwick to Glenlivet 6st. 11lb., Coastwise 8st. 7lbs., Roedean 9st. 8lb. being third. His third victory was obtained in the 1 mile 5 furlong Nottingham Handicap which he won cantering with 7st. 9lb. from Election 6st. 5lb., Himan 7st. 1lb. and Marajax 9st. fourth. Chili II was the 20 to 1 winner of the City and Suburban, Mushroom having been the elect of the multitude, but failing to even collect the place money for his confiding supporters and Lonawand ran second to Chili II and Moscato third. Chili II also this season won the Nottingham Spring Handicap beating the unreliable Duke of Sparta II and Succour. Hamerton's principal achievement last season was the Ascot Highweight Handicap in which he beat Demosthenes and Decision and he also secured the Liverpolitan Plate in which Take Care was second and Cyrano was third. Coastwise is ticketted an improving horse and his last performance certainly connotes an advance upon previous performances, but he has never been particularly brilliant and he is now no longer young as he will be an aged horse on the first of next year.

A REPORT has come out from home by the mail that Kilbroney, the five-year-old horse by The Wag out of Innismakil, has been bought for this country by a sportsman who is well known in Calcutta and Bombay turf circles; but last week Kilbroney was in the Newmarket July Sales list as a stallion which does not look as if they were at all hopeful of his being of much more use on the turf. He was out a good deal last season and he won several important races, but this year his number has been conspicious by its absence and it was said last back end that he would be placed on the retired list and sent to the stud. Last season he had a good run of luck and secured three important races as well as running very forward upon other occasions. He ran second early last season to Facet in the Brabaham Plate, 1½ mile, Esperanto, Roedean, Glacis being next behind him; then came his victory over Bagotstown and Clannish in the Great Metropolitan (2 miles 2 furlongs) at Epsom when he started second favourite to the runner-up. He ran second in the Northumberland Plate to Pillo, Cardinal Beaufort being third and Renown fourth, but next time he was out he annexed the Summer Handicap, 2 miles 24 yards, at Newmarket, beating Clarenceux, who started favourite, and White Perdrigon ran third a good field behind the placed horses. Then came his big win at Goodwood in 2 mile 5 furlong Goodwood Cup in which he beat Martingale II. a head, Yellow Slave running third and the other two runners being Royal Realm and Bryony. His season closed brilliantly as he ran Lemberg to a neck in the Doncaster Cup at level weights 10st., and there were not a few who considered that the Derby winner of 1910 was not a little lucky to get home. The only thing about this horse for India is that he is now a five-year-old entire and will be hard on six by the time he races here, if he comes out, and stallions do not usually improve with age when they come to this country. It is also doubtful whether we have any race quite far enough for him out here as our Cup is only 1¾ mile and Kilbroney has so far only distinguished himself in races over considerably longer distances. However the report was very positive in its nature and was brought out by a gentleman who has just come from the scene of action and is in a position to be sure of his facts.

As the day for the opening of the Monsoon Season in Calcutta approaches the turf metropolis is rapidly filling up with racing folk and "the cry is from the wall 'still they come'"! Lady Douglas has joined Major Winter's string at Barrackpore and is now owned by Captain Thelluson, R.F.A., who also owns Airman, etc. This mare was formerly owned by Major F. C. Stratton and won a small five furlong race at Meerut in March (Rs. 470), beating Obo and Morino, and she is eligible for our closed races in Calcutta of which there are not a few, but of which many owners think that there might be more on the flat as there are a number of horses here who have not won over the Rs. 500 limit and which are not jumpers. The hurdlers are well cared for but the same thing is not the case where the flat race division are concerned. Wishart arrived on Tuesday from Bangalore with two of "Mr. Holmes," the big chestnut colt Orange Pekoe who had been added to the list and is reported to have summered well and the black gelding Plain Mister, who was very bad with rheumatism when he left here in the cold weather but is now reported to be better; Glory, Bomb, Santoinette and Wise Hawk, the two latter being handed over to their respective trainers, Mr. Roland and Butlin. With Captain Kenneth Robertson's Betty Birr, Puntigam and Lola came three for Major Bennett of the same regiment, Reinforement, Spicy Breezes and Prima Donna, all three recent winners over obstacles and all qualified to go for the closed races, the two latter being ponies 14-2 and 14-1 respectively. Thomas is said to be a certain arrival from Bangalore during the next few days and it is reported that he will probably bring Harene, Tom Chaucer, Vernier and the over-grown black four-year-old Lucullus by Ard Patrick out of Pucca. Mr. Jack Scott has arrived and has brought Proprietor, Sea Lad, Lady Grey II., Pat C., Royal Colours, Miss Clare, Winna, and it is reported one or two more, but they have none of them been to the course at the time of writing.

AMONGST Jockeys who have already arrived and who have been here for some time are Williamson, C. Bloss, Lansdowne, J. Southall, F. Trahan, W. White, Randall, Elliot, McNeilage, Northmore. Amongst the Corinthians are Majors Winter and Bennett, Captains Barrett, Robertson, Kenworthy, Messrs. Platt, J. J. Hilliard, Barrow, Evers, Tanner, McCall, Roddick, Bryan, Dudley, Stephen, McLean, Marshall, etc., etc.

Mr. Steele-Perkins, who had a bad fall some time ago and broke his left wrist, has, we regret to hear, been having some more trouble with it and has had to have the bones rebroken as the setting was not satisfactory. It is bad luck as it will entirely stop Mr. Perkins from getting any riding during the coming monsoon season.

Sholto and Wassail, owned by Captain Kenworthy, and First Love, owned by Messrs. Swan and Hilliard arrived from Bangalore at the end of last week and have joined Butlin's stable. The two former are looking very well but First Love looks a bit dry in her coat, though she has built up and furnished considerably. Sholto looks bright and hard and has, so we hear, done a good deal of solid slow work at Bangalore. He is never a horse that carries much flesh, but what there is of him looks of the right sort. Wassail is a neat little English gelding by Isinglass out of Sonatina and has run-up once or twice at Madras and other meetings down south.

There has been a good deal of work doing one way and another during the week on the Calcutta course and most of the local lot have been sent along on various occasions. We should say that Mr. Valentine's and Mr. Evers' horses were as forward as any of those likely to be seen out during the next fortnight or so and that Late Night, Pilot and Farthing Bun from the latter's string were likely to be early winners. Maisonette is also looking very well as also is Rupert, but we are doubtful about the latter standing a preparation. Murmur also looks well and connected, at Tollygunge last Saturday beating Lady Ratcliffe. She has not raced for some time but does not seem to have lost any of her dash. Of Mr. Valentine's, Pressy, who is jumping well, is about ready, and Cherry Hackle, Bushey Dame and Chin Chin all look well forward and ready to begin early. May Kenley looks better than she has done for a long time and she showed she was well by the way she won on Saturday last. Lady Ratcliffe and Water Lily in this string also look very well. Butlin has Sholto, Wassail and First Love as already recorded and of the others Grazie, Best China, Lady Leonard, Ormley, Alton and Jack Sheppard look to be most forward. Mr. Das has been reinforced by Elpis, who is looking well, and of the others we like Isobela, Sidonia, Carnival and Decidedly. Bally—maclune does not look his best and is not carrying the condition he did when he won his races in the cold weather. We should say that Isobela was going as well as anything else in this lot and her round joints do not seem to trouble her in the soft going. Walker's best we believe to be Rameses who is doing well and moves well in his work. Moira also looks forward, also The Priory, but we shall only believe the latter to be a racehorse when he gives us proof of the fact. He went as slow as a man in topboots the other day in a school by himself and any pony could have beaten him. Frank is bright and well and first runs on the flat and afterwards takes it on over hurdles. He is a clever fencer when he is in the mood. Glenora does not particularly take our fancy and we should like to see her run before pronouncing a definite opinion as to whether she is likely to strike form again. Of "Mr. Roland's" lot Tana and Lasso look the best. He has a lot of old resurrections, amongst them old Marmalade III, who must be nearly 15 years old as she was an aged mare when "Mr. Holmes" first brought her out to India. Sacristan II is another ancient light and looks very well, but even the best of them cannot be expected to last for ever. Village Girl is also in this string but is not looking bad. Taking them all round the locally trained horses are looking very well and Major Winter's horses, who are at Barrackpore and are consequently seldom seen by anyone excepting their able amateur trainer, are also, so we hear, for the most part doing very well and they have the very best of opportunities for doing their work as both Barrackpore park and the old racecourse make excellent going. Of horses likely to run forward on Saturday we name Sholto, Sea Lad (or Proprietor), Late Night, Royal Colours, Chin Chin, May Kenley and Farthing Bun.

The Fourth Tollygunge Gymkhana Meeting on Saturday last provided better sport than it was expected that it would do and there were several close finishes. Entries were a record in the matter of size but fields were greatly cut down and many owners paid entrance money solely with the object, so we were told, of getting an expression of the Handicapper's opinion. As, however, the Tollygunge official's deductions do not in any way bind the Official Handicappers to the C.T.C. in their calculations the object of this does not appear on the surface. The club stewards were more fortunate in their weather than on the previous occasion, for although the card was not got through without a shower or two, the rain only came down in earnest just before the last race. There were only five races and in the majority of them the favourites were there or thereabouts, though one or two little parcels nevertheless came unticd very badly. In the first race, for instance, the Monsoon Trial Plate, May Kenley opened favourite, but just before the start there was a run on Wee Lad in consequence of a stable commission. The country-bred had been well-tried, but he was beaten out of a place in a very close race, heads only dividing May Kenley, who won, Winsome and Wee Lad. Dick, who went out favourite for the Hack Stakes, was lucky to get there as he swerved all over the course and only won a neck from Loyalty. A hot favourite went down in Lady Ratcliffe in the Visitors' Pony Plate which Murmur won by her brilliant dash at the finish. Hobson's Choice and Ida Coil went out level in the betting for the Ballygunge Bowl. The latter ran very badly and Hobson's Choice won from the outsider, Gem, who paid a dividend of 64 to 5 in the tote. The Jiu Jitsu Vase drew seven runners and they made Mr. Pickwick favourite but the winner turned up in Jeremiah who beat the favourite home after a good contest. Details appear elsewhere.

Exit the Betting Bill! That possibly well-meaning but wholly misguided saviour of souls, the Bishop of Hereford, moved the second reading of the wretched thing in the House of Lords on the 11th July and took a bad fall.

It provided that "whosoever shall print, publish, sell, circulate, or publicly exhibit any newspaper, circular, coupon, or document" which contains any advertisement or notification as to betting shall be "guilty of a misdemeanour." The publication of betting odds, starting prices, or other "inducement to bet" was prohibited. The Bill further laid it down that newspapers may not advertise or describe any competition or lottery offering money or valuable things as prizes, rewards, or benefits unless the competition be for a reward presented gratuitously by some individual of educational, artistic, literary, or scientific body for an essay or other useful work, and then the prize must not exceed £5 in value.

The punishments would run up to fines of £200 or two years' imprisonment.

Lord Durham, who is a member of the Jockey Club, moved the rejection of the Bill.

"It confounds the tipster with first-class newspapers and their experts," said Lord Durham.

"If we prevent betting on horseracing," he continued, "we may possibly get to betting on women's dresses," and he added, looking round at the smiling peers, "I suppose you would prevent that by enacting that women should not wear clothes." (Laughter).

Lord Newton, criticising the Bill, said :—"The most striking instance of national hypocrisy is that which is afforded by the Daily News. I don't think," added Lord Newton, "that we could have an instance of more slimy hypocrisy than that."

The Government opposed the Bill, Lord Strachie voicing the Cabinet's objections. In the end the Bishop of Hereford withdrew the Bill.

The Government Gazette, dated 25th July, announces the conditions of the license which the Government granted to the Stewards of the Western India Turf Club under the Bombay Race Courses Act. The license is granted for the period commencing on the 1st July, 1912, and ending on the 30th June, 1913, to hold horse races on race courses leased to them at Mahaluxmi and in Poona Cantonments. During the period for which the license is in force the number of days on which horse races are held by licensees shall not exceed 30, and licensees may, at their discretion, distribute this number of days between the said race courses. Licensees shall not permit on any part of their premises the presence at any horse race of any Bookmaker, for the purpose of registering bets, on any day on which horse races are being held and on premises within the course. The licensees may work or cause to be worked under their supervision a contrivance known as Totalisator, subject to the following conditions :—(1) The unit of stakes shall not be less than Rs. 3 and not more than Rs. 10, providing that in the first enclosure multiples of the unit of ten rupees may be sold in one ticket up to the maximum of Rs. 100. (2) Such other conditions as may from time to time be framed by the licensees with the approval of Government, provided always that Government may, at any time during the currency of license, amend, vary or rescind any of the conditions framed under the clause. In the event of any breach of conditions the license will be cancelled.

The Gymkhana Race Meeting, which was to have been held at Poona last Saturday, was postponed owing to continued wet weather and will be brought off this afternoon, if Jupiter Pluvius is kind.

A correspondent writes :—"Sipri, the coming rains station of the northern half of India, is easily get-at-able either by motor bus from Goona, Central India, or by H. H. The Maharaja's light railway from Gwalior. A motor service is shortly to be opened between Sipri and Jhansi as well. The new full sized polo ground promises to be one of the best in India as it has been made regardless of expense. It is situated just underneath the Gymkhana buildings which overlook it from a height of some 15 feet, thus giving an excellent view of the ground. The ground has been dug out of the red soil which forms an excellent foundation, 24 inches of mould and earth had been placed on this, and turf to crown it all has been carefully laid and levelled, and now it only remains for the grass to grow to make the most ideal polo ground that can be imagined. In addition to this, excellent practice grounds will also be laid out. These red soil grounds have the advantage of becoming playable as soon as the water has drained off after even the heaviest shower of rain. Sipri seems to be very fortunate as regards climate. The hounds (22½ couple), which have been brought out from England, are in the pink of condition and I hear from Mr. Handcock, the popular master, that another 10 couple are on their way out. We had a most enjoyable little hunt the other morning, the pack behaving splendidly, and it requires only a few more weeks to get them into condition for the hunting season which I am told is to begin in October at Gwalior. The Hotel under the management of Mr. Schaerrer leaves nothing to be desired. On our way here I missed a buck and shot a chinkara and in addition to the sport mentioned in Mr. Schaerrer's letter, which I enclose, there is some excellent mahseer fishing to be had in the Sindh river, 18 miles distant. I can imagine no nicer place for devotees of the rod, gun and hound and next year for polo players."

Mr. Schaerrer's letter appears in our correspondence columns and should be of interest.

Owners are reminded that the first entries for the Meerut Autumn Meeting close on the 31st August. The programme can be had on application to the Honorary Secretary.

The second of the weekly mud sports meetings of the Bombay Gymkhana took place on the 24th instant on the Marine Lines maidan when a programme of six events was discussed. The ground was in a bad state after the rain and there were a couple of falls owing to horses slipping—luckily unattended with injury. Tent pegging in half sections opened the proceedings and this was won by Messrs. L. Graham and J. W. Knight Bruce with Messrs. H. J. Graham and R. F. R. Cooke second. The Ladies' Polo Ball Stakes brought out four competitors, Mrs. Wagstaff winning with Miss Dunsford second. The jumping for Ponies was won by Mr. Knight Bruce, Mr. Bamber taking second place. It was in this event occurred the falls mentioned above. Then came the Chatty race which attracted a dozen entries. To pick up a chatty and carry it back over the course on a polo stick, competitors allowed to break the chatties of others. Won by Mr. Bamber with Mr. L. Graham second. This was followed by the Pre-Raphaelite Stakes in which the ladies showed their skill as animal artists. Eight couples took part and the winners were Mr. L. Graham and Miss Heaton with Mr. H. G. Graham and Miss Warden second. The horse scurry wound up the programme; five ran and Mr. J. R. Landon won by two lengths from Mr. Thompson, who beat Mr. Hunt on the post for second place.

The Bangalore Horse Show has been fixed for the 9th and 10th instant, entries closing with the Honorary Secretary, Captain J. W. Parrington, R.F.A., on Saturday the 3rd idem.

The three lengths handicap of the Calcutta Swimming Club was held at the Baths last week and produced some good performances. H. Jefford won his heat from scratch, his time being 1min. 12⅘secs. for the 100 yards, J. F. Lay (3sec. start) finishing second. Jefford won very easily and should have little difficulty in securing the Club's gold time medal. The second heat ended in a win for G. S. Young, who with 5secs. start covered the three lengths in 1min. 12⅘secs. E. M. Koch (—4) was second. The final was swum last Friday, resulting as follows :—

G. S. Young,—5secs. gross 1min. 14⅘secs., net 1min. 10⅘secs., 1.

E. M. Koch,—4secs. gross 1min. 19⅘secs., net 1min. 14⅘secs., 2.

J. F. Lay,—3secs. gross 1min. 23⅘secs., net 1min. 17⅘secs., 3.

H. Jefford, scr. gross 1min. 24⅘secs., net 1min. 15⅘secs., 4.

Young won easily; Jefford slowed down.

The I.F.A. Challenge Shield Tournament ended on Saturday last on the C.F.C. ground when a big crowd witnessed the final between the Royal Irish Rifles and the Black Watch. It was a good game, the Irishmen winning by a goal to nil. Details further on.

R. Arnst, Professional Sculling Champion of the World since 1908, has at last been deprived of his title. His return match with Barry was held on the Thames on Monday and Barry won easily. Arnst won the toss and took the Surrey station, and when they were sent away he took the lead rowing 38 to Barry's 36. He was two lengths ahead at Crabtree, but Barry had reduced this to half a length at Hammersmith Bridge and drew level soon after. The English champion then began to lead and was three lengths in front at Barnes. The New Zealander spurted but could not keep it up and stopped rowing 80 yards from the winning post. Barry's time was 23mins. 8secs. As our readers are aware this is the second meeting between the pair. In August 1910 Arnst beat Barry on the Zambesi. Arnst won the Championship from W. Webb in 1908, and beat him again in 1909. He next defeated Whelch in April 1910; then came his victory over Barry and last year he beat H. Pearce on the Paramatta. Ernest Barry won the Championship of England from G. Towns in 1908, and twice successfully defended his title last year, defeating W. Albany of Lea Bridge, and W. Fogwell, the Australian.

The New York correspondent of the London Sportsman commenting on the recent Bombardier Wells-Al Palzer fight has come to the conclusion, supported by several good Judges, that Wells would put up a far andaway better fight with Johnson than many people thought possible. He goes on to say: "Indeed, I think, Johnson should be at the height of his form to defeat the Englishman, and if the latter could only train up ten or twelve pounds he would be readily backed to fight the champion, who is nothing like the hitter Palzer is. On the other hand Palzer as a 'white hope' is a failure. He is strong and bearish and capable of taking a stiff beating, but Johnson would cut him to pieces." In spite of his defeat the B...bardier was well spoken of by the New York ...ss and they suggested another trial for him, ...h either Jim Stewart or Tom Kennedy. As w... already know by wire Wells met Kennedy and beat knocked him out in eight rounds

Fred Storbeck, the South African heavyweight, is also trying his luck in America. He met Jim Stewart in New York on the 9th instant and was well beaten. Storbeck gave a miserable exhibition and was outfought at every point. Several times he is reported to have fallen more from fatigue than punishment and his seconds threw up the sponge in the sixth round to save him from a big hiding.

It is stated that Tommy Burns has been seriously contemplating a match with Wells to take place at Calgary early this month. Tommy is very anxious to return to the ring and is confident that he can regain his old title. Bill Richards and Langford are also spoken of as likely opponents for Journs when he reappears in the business.

We have been informed that Messrs. Eley Brothers, Limited, have been given a contract by the Admiralty for the supply of cartridges for the new ·455 Webley Automatic Pistol which has recently been adopted for the use of the Navy.

London Week by Week.

As I predicted last week, perfect weather marked the royal visit to Henley on Saturday, and never has the river looked gayer than it did for the King and Queen. It is probable, too, that no regatta at Henley ever attracted a larger crowd. Thousands of people were massed on the meadows along the river bank. Thousands more had places in the special enclosures, and all the houseboats and other craft were filled with people.

Lord Desborough received their Majesties at the stage in his capacity as chairman of the Thames Conservancy, and led the way to the State barge. This wonderful old boat, like the State coach used at the opening of Parliament, is strongly suggestive of the Middle Ages. It is over 200 years old, but its stout oaken planks are apparently as sound as ever

The barge was manned by royal watermen, who looked almost as quaint as the boat. Their head dress was a jockey-like peaked cap of black velvet, and the coat a scarlet frock-like tunic which recalled that worn by the Yeomen of the Guard in shape. Breeches, white silk stockings, and buckled shoes completed the costume.

The watermen received their Sovereign with oars raised perpendicularly at the salute, and it was noticeable that, while the shafts were enamelled white, the blades were crimson, with a gilded crown in the centre of each.

The Chief Waterman stood on a small platform, which serves for the steersman when the boat is in motion, and at a signal from him that all was in readiness, the oars dropped as one to the water, and the journey to the royal enclosure began.

The scene as one followed the course of the State barge was pretty and animated in the extreme. A clear though narrow course for the competing boats in the regatta stretched away up river for over a mile, but behind the booms marking this out boats were packed so tightly that their occupants appeared more like a crowd standing on the bank.

Immediately after the King and Queen had taken their places the racing began, but when the first two had been decided—Eton winning the Ladies' Challenge Plate and New College, Oxford, the Stewards' Challenge Cup—there was an adjournment for luncheon. The King and Queen re-entered the State barge, and proceeded along the course and up river to Greenlands, the riverside residence of Mr. and Lady Esther Smith.

The King and Queen returned to the pavilion at three o'clock, in time to see the Paris oarsmen win the Thames Challenge Cup from St. John's, Oxford. Afterwards Queens', Cambridge, beat London Rowing Club for the Wyfold Cup, and then came the great race of the day—that for the Grand Challenge Cup.

When the preparations for this were in progress, the King and Queen, with Lord Desborough and a small party, were seen to be embarking on a launch, and great was the enthusiasm when it was seen that they had boarded the umpire's boat, and were off up river to follow the competitors through the race. The race was won by the Australians.

Shortly after five o'clock the Queen presented the prizes. Mr. Steward, chairman of the Regatta Committee, stood beside her Majesty, and announced the results, while the King took up a position on the other side of the Queen. The captain of each crew received the cup or other trophy from the Queen, and each of the members of each winning crew a gold medal. The recipients bowed low to the Queen in taking their prizes, passed on, and bowed to the King, who raised his hat in response, and passed out at the opposite side of the pavilion.

The little coxswain of the Eton crew—a son of your ex-Viceroy Lord Minto—varied the practice, and caused a good deal of amusement. When her Majesty held out her hand with his medal, he misunderstood her intention, and, grasping the gloved hand, shook it with marked fervour. As soon as she could release her hand the Queen opened it and showed the medal.

As the young steersman realised his error he blushed, and showed natural confusion, but the King, who had laughingly called the attention of those about him to the youth's mistake, put him promptly at his ease by extending his own hand, and giving the medallist a hearty shake.

Politicians of all parties will await with interest the effect on Mr. Winston Churchill of his kissing of the Blarney stone. If this celebration of a time-honoured rite should have its traditionally ascribed consequences, there will be marked amelioration of Mr. Churchill's oratorical methods and a suaver manner towards his opponents; and plausible arts, a winning address, and a honeyed tongue will replace the studied invective and acid quality of his controversial speeches. Such a metamorphosis would encourage the formation of a society for sending politicians to Ireland, free of expense, in order that they may improve their manners by kissing the Blarney stone. The Blarney stone as a politico-social softener of manners would thus acquire a new lease of popularity, and public life, instead of being clouded with personalities and insults, would be characterised by nothing worse than a delightful interchange of insincere compliments.

His "unfriends"—and in India they are many—will await with interest the result of the sensational law suit in which Sir Henry Cotton, K.C.S.I., erstwhile Chief Commissioner of Assam and "White baboo," now a pension drawer and Government vilifier is charged with several co-directors with having taken £600 from an investor by what counsel for the plaintiff calls "a tissue of gross misrepresentation."

The plaintiff was Mr. Frank Dobson; the defendants the directors of the Law Car and General Insurance Corporation, Limited.

Among them, said Mr. Shearman, was Sir Henry Cotton, who had held an eminent position in India and had been an M.P., Mr. W. Millwood, a barrister, Mr. J. W. Greig, a barrister, Mr. H. H. Wells, a solicitor and Mr. R. W. Bramacombe, a Harley Street surgeon.

All these gentlemen were represented by counsel, but, said Mr. Shearman, the managing director, a Mr. C. J. Fowler, who was also a defendant, had not put in an appearance.

"He has sought a foreign country," continued counsel. "We shall not see him here. He has gone, and I think with him a certain amount of the assets."

The plaintiff, went on Mr. Shearman, said that he had been misled by a prospectus and claimed the return of his money.

The directors' defence was that they did not issue the prospectus, and that it did not contain misrepresentations. The prospectus, said Mr. Shearman, asked for further capital and represented that the Corporation was progressing by leaps and bounds.

This progress counsel compared to that of the Gadarene swine. The society, he declared, was progressing to destruction. The hard-earned savings of the plaintiff were used to prop up for a time the tottering concern.

Mr. Shearman then stated that he would show that the directors knew the state of affairs when the prospectus complained of was issued.

The company was incorporated in 1906 with a capital of £100,000. Fowler received a percentage of the premium income, a peculiar arrangement which gave him an inducement to take risky business. He was to get his percentage if a dividend of 5 per cent. was paid.

£24,000 of the capital was subscribed by a company, formed by Fowler and another director, which had a capital of only £5,000.

In the spring of 1909, counsel's account went on, one of the officials was alarmed at the nature of the business. He put his views before Mr. Wells, who brought the matter to the notice of the board.

Counsel gave a short history of the company's business.

At the end of the first year it had made a profit of £11,832. A dividend of 5 per cent. was declared. Next year the profit was £5,376. The dividend was 10 per cent. The case was proceeding when these notes had to go to post.

An effective way of training children up to shun the use of playing cards has been hit upon at Putney. A game of living whist was played there, in which the four suits of the pack were represented by fifty-two children in appropriate costumes. How many rubbers were played is not stated, but one hand was probably enough to sicken the poor little things of cards for the rest of their lives. It would be interesting to know how the pack of fifty-two children was shuffled and dealt, and what the gorgeous king of hearts thought of himself when taken by the modest and unassuming deuce of trumps.

People are asking—where is Mr. G. Bernard Shaw? What has become of him!

There has now for some weeks been a so-called social upheaval in the East End, a dock strike with much violence and murder which was expected to stagger humanity and shake the foundations of society—and not a word from "G. B. S."!

There can only be one solution, and that is that the great upheaver has gone away out of the ken of men and things. And even then one cannot imagine that this social turmoil could go on without his intervention with at least one long letter. One paper is almost disposed to offer a reward for knowledge of Mr. Shaw's whereabouts. This is the first time for many years that "G. B. S." has resisted the temptation of having the limelight thrown on himself on so favourable an occasion, and the omission is so strange that the paper is justified in the belief that something important has happened.

It prints Mr. Shaw's portrait, and asks if any one has seen this man.

All the heraldic pomp and pageantry of a mediæval joust was spread in splendour before a great audience at Shakespeare's England (Earl's Court) last Thursday night.

It was a night's feast of Romance, served in a setting that dulled the fabled glories of Camelot. In fear that opera hats and pannier skirts might hold them still fast in 1912, the guests came decked for the occasion, ringing the tiers with Tudor finery, till the whole auditorium was one great mosaic of colour.

There never was such an interesting audience. Every taxicab had a sword inside; doublets and hose tripped down the moving stairway; ladies in great Elizabethan ruffs joined programmes with cavaliers in plumes. High over the mullioned window where Queen Alexandra could be seen in the gloom, a stalwart red halberdier kept watch on the battlements.

It cost more than £40,000 to salve this old story of knights and fair ladies from the depths of the past, but those who shared the night's pageantry will not regret their guineas. They returned home with rare pieces of realism to cherish, knowing just the sound a splintered lance makes on a blazoned breastplate, and ready to read their Froissart with inside knowledge.

It was Froissart in living pictures from the moment when the first call of trumpets floated from the high battlements of the bastioned gateway.

Ere the notes died away the Knight Martiall, the Herald, the Judges and their men came slowly under the grim portcullis. Banner-draped trumpets played before them, and behind their proud quarterings came the Earls of Shrewsbury, Essex, and Dudley, with Mr. Benson, Herald of the Triumph. Last of all, with Mr. Guy Laking, flaunting his six-sable annulets, rode the Earl of Lonsdale, Knight Martiall of the Lists.

This entry, with its note of dignity, was eclipsed by the pomp of the processions that followed, for out of the gateway, as though out of the centuries, rode the cavalcade of lords and ladies in the trains of the Queen of Beauty and the Princess Errant. They rode with tossing plumes and nodding white ruffs, with red roses beaded on the bridle reins and shimmering lengths of silk and satin trailing along the horses' flanks. All was colour and movement.

Viscountess Curzon, the Queen of Beauty, was carried in a litter, and took her place on her throne in radiant loveliness, her white silk and diamonds ablaze under the two long shafts of limelight which sloped from the heights of the towers.

Three princes and an hereditary grand duke rode with Princess Plees, the Princess Errant, and two countesses were her "wayting" ladies.

Then came the parade of the six knights, "Knights of blood and name, who pretending to excel all others, show great desire to honour their ladys by honourable adventures in arms."

Knights of blood and name they were, too—the Duke of Marlborough first, the two silver lions of his ancestor rampant across his shining breastplate, and the Earl of Craven, with green plumes nodding in a helmet that was he gift of a Philip of Spain. Henry Viscount Crichton, with Lord Gerard for an escuire, and Lord Tweedmouth, with orange plumes dipping from his golden helm, followed. Lord Ashby St. Ledger brought up the rear.

Mr. F. E. Smith, K.C., M.P., is breaking a lance at Belfast, so that the knights of the melee who made the next procession lacked one of their six.

The Ballet des Chevaux won the applause of the audience. Two and thirty lords and ladies cantered round the ring in couples, formed up in a long strip of colour before the Queen of Beauty at a sign from the Earl of Lonsdale, a courtly figure in his cloak of green and silver.

Mr. Benson's proclamation of the tourney was a notable piece of elocution. His "Oyez! Oyez!" was right good Norman French, and his archaic periods floated to the furthermost turret of the pasteboard castle. Two waiting knights pulled themselves into their saddles at the herald's last cry of "Come forth, Knights. Laissez aller! Laissez aller! and, with another fanfare, the thrills of the tilting began to the music of the thud of hoofs on the level tan, and the sharp snap of a splintered lance.

Each knight ran five courses. In the final course Lord Ashby St. Ledger defeated the Duke of Marlborough, whose dashing attacks had made him favourite. Then, with much kissing of hands, the successful knight won a smile from the Queen of Beauty.

There was a ball to crown the splendours of the lists, and the knights and their ladies danced long into the dawning under a great marquee that spanned trees and fountains in the western gardens. The day came eerily to break this night's dream of glory and grace that is gone, and the last sword clanked sadly into silence as modern London awoke to another spell of workaday life.

ADVENTURE WITH A PANTHER.

What on earth was the matter! I started up on my cotton mattress and stared out of the little teak-framed window where the grey of an Indian dawn was just beginning to show behind the heavy tracery of trees in the forest beyond, while from the native village beneath those boughs came the most deplorable uproar any one ever listened to. To my sleepy senses just torn from blissful dreams of far-away English shires, it was for a moment a confused pandemonium of undistinguishable sounds; then as the uproar came nearer and my faculties re-asserted themselves, I made out through the din the shouting of men, the screaming of women, the crying of frightened children, all blending with a miscellaneous accompaniment of bleating sheep, crashing pottery, and thumping of drums in a general wild and chaotic tumult. What was the matter? Had my five hundred Tamil coolies suddenly lost their senses, or had I? Leaping from bed and springing into those nether garments without which a man is never ready to face any kind of crisis, I ran to the door of my wattle and daub hut just as a tumultuous crowd of natives came surging up to the verandah.

"What is the matter?" I asked, wild visions of mutiny and sedition floating in my mind for a minute. Thereon from every side of the breathless crowd rose a babel of exclamations and lamentations in all the half dozen languages of the lower provinces. But there was one word dominant over the confusion and excitement, and it was enough in itself. "What," I said, "the panther, the black panther of Ootcha Mulla, has he been down to-night?" And then, as though my utterance touched a tender chord in those dusky breasts before me, a perfect wail of hatred and despair went up from the crowd, rising three times in increasing volume in the grey twilight, while the men clapped their hands upon their chests, and the women unwove and tossed out their long black hair—the picture of grief and terror.

I waved my hand for them to stop their clamour, and in a minute or two gathered from a dozen eager voices that a famous black panther, who for many years had been the terror and veneration of the district, had been amongst them only ten minutes before. He had, it seemed, struck over at earliest dawn from the forest, and passing down the long double row of mud huts, had picked his way through a group of coolies sleeping out on the last mud verandahs, had boldly entered a hovel, and taking a baby from its sleeping mother's side, had gone back into the forest with it. It was Jummo's firstborn, Jummo the overseer, and most popular man on the estate: and forthwith, when the story came to this, a howl of sympathy and horror rose afresh from the crowded mass before my door, until seeing there was nothing more intelligible to be got from them, I pushed through their dusky ranks and ran down the couple of hundred yards of hill slope to where the little native village lay like a cluster of gigantic ants' nests in the deep shadows of the fig trees. There more mourners, execrating the ancestors of the forest terror, were clustering round the unhappy mother, the picturesque extravagance of their motions, their lead-coloured faces in the twilight of the morning, and flitting forms amongst the shadows of trunks and walls, making a wild and fantastic scene.

It was obvious that the beast with his poor little victim, probably carried by its single wrap as a cat carries a mouse, must have been well away into the forest by this time—the hubbub was enough to clear the woods of every living thing for a mile round; but fortunately we knew where he had his lair in the stony recesses of the big hill which looked down upon us from a sky that was rapidly brightening with the flush of sunrise, and after a minute's consultation with Jummo, the father, I determined to go there after him, though with the consciousness that it was a forlorn hope at best. One learns prompt habits in the wilderness, and five minutes after the resolution was taken I was dressed, and, gulping down a cup of hot coffee while my butler filled my pockets with biscuits, and as the horse-boy slipped my glistening express rifle from its case, I was ready to start.

We streamed off into the thick jungle just as the daylight was breaking and the jungle cocks were beginning to crow from the coverts on the blue hills that fashioned quickly out of the darkness on every side. It was chilly enough before the sun had risen, and I had plenty of time as we went along to reflect on the chances of what was really a dangerous errand, and to recall the picture of the animal we were after as I had seen him once or twice, a rare variety of the yellow panther, coal black from whiskers to tail, without a fleck of whiteness anywhere, out with all the spots of his proper livery showing on his velvet hide like the waterings of black silk. I had come across him once sitting on a fallen tree in the forest, licking his broad chest as he performed a morning toilet in the sunshine exactly like an overgrown cat, and as I pulled up (I had nothing but an umbrella with me) and watched him presently lounge away into the tangled tree ferns, I remembered my involuntary admiration of the strength and grace of every movement, the magnificent suppleness of the great muscles which worked as he walked under his skin-like steel under black velvet. He was a fine beast to look at, and had disappointed the ambition of half-a-dozen hunters already, for he was as cunning as he was strong, and I knew enough of panthers to understand it was no light task following him into the mazes of his stronghold up above.

However, there was no turning back now: the fifteen or twenty men behind me, their grey "cumblee" shawls swaddled round their necks, their breath in the damp cold air showing like ascending spirals of steam, believed in me implicitly. If anyone could kill the black devil who had his home deep down in the sinews of the stony mountain top just now beginning to gleam like copper against the gloom beyond, they argued, it was the sahib! "And praise to Indra, the sahib's blood was hot, the sahib's heart was touched by the tears of the mother down below,—wah! surely it would go badly with the destroyer to-day!" and as I listened to the patter of those faithful shoeless feet behind me, turning back was not to be thought of.

Just as the sun topped the lemon grass hills in the east we came out on a spur of the big hill and pulled up a minute to get our breath again. It was a brief pause, but it gave me time to glance round and note in panting admiration as lovely a scene as any one could wish to look upon. The great shallow five-mile wide valley, stretching away as far as the eye could see into the northward, was filled for half its depth with a smooth solid lake of pearly white vapour. Here and there bamboo-covered ridges jutted out into the glistening sheet-like peninsulas, while between their extended points whole archipelagoes of emerald green hill tops pierced through the veil and cast their shadows heavily upon it. Just below me a great russet-coloured hawk was hanging poised above his own reflection listening to the chatter of unseen birds below, while half a mile away some hornbills were going out to breakfast, their outstretched necks and beaks as they skimmed the white surface making them look like a string of ducks passing down the vapoury ocean gulf below us. Then as we looked the sun came swinging over the grassy shoulder of the hills with tropical expedition; that great inland sea caught his rays upon its level surface and gleamed with most fascinating golds and crimsons for a time, shifting and changing colour indescribably as the light wind swung it gently to and fro, a milk-white sea shot with amethysts and gold; the magnificent pageantry of the morning rushed into the sky overhead, the hillsides opened up with all their details of cliff, and stream, and lonely thickets to the flush of the new light of day, while above and below and on every hand broke forth that strange concert of living voices which no one who has ever heard it can forget.

But for me through all that hum of sounds came the wailing of an unhappy babe—it was but fancy of course—but it was enough at that, and I turned from the wonderful scene behind before it was half developed, and plunging into the thickets again scrambled up the last half mile or so of steep ascent to the cleft in the mountain top where, amongst a wild litter of fallen rocks matted together with an inextricable labyrinth of creepers, was the entrance to the panther's den. To make this part of the narrative brief, for I feel I have already been too long upon the way, I may say we found evidences, as we knew we should, that the animal had gone in a few minutes before us, a shred of the child's swaddling cloth on a thorn, a pebble or two—turned over as he scrambled home—with the damp lower sides still beaded with moisture, and forthwith we held a consultation. It was impossible to smoke the beast out, we had no dogs big enough to fight him in his stronghold, and a siege was beyond the question—we should have capitulated long before the garrison. In short, there seemed nothing for it but to go in ourselves and though the prospect was not pleasant, I determined to venture in rather than turn back. The men had brought up a bundle of torches, and taking one of these myself, with Jummo, carrying a spare rifle, at my heels, and a couple of the most valiant coolies behind him, we approached the shadow of the portal, and—all eyes and ears—entered the panther's hiding-place. About ten yards from the entrance the coolies in the rear had had enough of it: I was conscious, though I had not thought it worth while to notice the fact, that they had modestly fallen back on the reserve forces outside. Henceforth the search was left to myself and the headman, and very unpleasant work it was.

One of the first things we were aware of as we groped our way into the dim mountain cavern, was an overpowering odour from remnants of a hundred partially finished meals the panther had enjoyed here at his leisure, and a little farther on, stumbling about in the uncertain flicker of our torches, I put my hand on something soft and damp, then drew it back with a start, and looking down saw I had touched the week old and half-eaten body of a small deer. Ten yards beyond this the uneven tunnel, which hitherto had been a stony passage winding down in ever-increasing gloom into the earth's bowels, took a sudden turn to one side, and in the pitchy darkness consequent on the shutting off of the light broadened out into a chamber littered with fallen rocks and full of the most abysmal shadows and recesses. As we entered that gloomy hall with fingers on triggers, torches overhead, and my heart at least, I will answer for it, beating high, whatever Jummo's was doing, I suddenly saw a lithe black form pass swiftly across the further wall—it was but a momentary glimpse, a passing shadow amongst a hundred others, but it was so clear for a second against the red reflection of our torches on the rugged stones beyond, that my rifle flew to my shoulder and I fired with that inspiration rather than aim which comes by long practice. Through the sharp thunder of the report echoing round the roof came an unmistakable snarl of rage and astonishment, and then perfect, embarrassing silence.

We listened motionless, if the expression may be used, for a minute or two to that preternatural calm with nothing but the splutter of our torches and the faint sound of water dripping somewhere away in the distance to relieve the tension of our nerves, and as nothing followed we were on the point of going forward again when all of a sudden across the smooth black darkness of the further recesses came clear and limpid the discontented but not frightened wail of a child. In the excitement of the last minute or two I frankly confess I had almost forgotten that plundered infant, and the sound of its voice, for of course it could only be the one we were after, absolutely startled me as it sounded in the dead hush of the great cave. But the outraged father had but one idea: him it fired with a new and furious zeal, and together we stepped forward swiftly but cautiously in the direction of the sound full of new hope. All round the shadows of the cavern danced and chevied each other in quaint fashion as our torches gleamed amongst the fallen masonry, and every footfall on the loose rubble was echoed in the most unearthly way from the stony labyrinths and chambers on either hand. At one place we blundered into a pool of ink-black water, and at another the native took a startling plunge into a shallow gully luckily full of dry sand. Then on once more for an anxious minute or two until as we stared into every hollow and started at each rustle, again ahead of us came that baby cry, not in pain but a perplexed little wail like that of an infant who was wondering what on earth had become of the morning or why his mother's breath was so hot on his face—the youngster was very small—such a cry in fact as a baby would make who did not quite understand its surroundings, and towards that voice we went again with our hearts hard, the perspiration of exertion standing on our foreheads, and our torches burning uncomfortably low.

A little further on the great hollow of the limestone hill was divided into two by an enormous fall of rocks from the roof above, and as we stood still, wondering which way to take, I was presently aware with a kind of fascination of the gleam of two green eyes shining steadily and calmly like fixed stars on me from the bottom of the left hand tunnel! Silently thrusting my torch into the native's hand, as soon as there could be no possibility of mistake I raised my rifle—aimed eight inches under those baleful planets for the beast's chest and fired. The result was the same tremendous thunderclap as the explosion rattled round that confined space,—an angry roar from the panther this time evidently hit, and then complete unexpected darkness! It subsequently turned out that Jummo springing forward at the shot to see its effect under my rifle smoke had caught his foot in a loose stone, and tumbling headlong on to our torches extinguished them both at once.

The next few seconds were about as uncomfortable a time as I had ever spent. The panther was snarling and spitting somewhere away in the darkness, and I dared hardly breathe; the click of my rifle lock as I put in a new cartridge seemed horribly demonstrative. It was a perfect relief when in a minute the feline language subsided, and that bundle of brown Hindoo flesh we were after broke out into an approved infantile howl—this time of unmistakable displeasure, and striking one of those matches without which the sportsman never ventures abroad. I picked Jummo up, relit the last few inches of torch, and started afresh.

It was obvious, however, that the crisis had come, for as the lights flared up we could see right down to where the tunnel ended abruptly in a pile of loose rocks, and what fixed our attention at once, close down to those rocks, where the passage, momentarily constricted was hardly a yard across, lay the luckless object of our search on a bare patch of sand just as he had been dropped at the last shot, and now kicking vigorously in the confusion of the shawl tied tightly round him, and howling in a way that implied he was not an atom the worse for his adventure. I saw the father's heart was hard as steel, and though I knew this was the most dangerous minute of all I said nothing but went on steadily with every sense at tip-toe. We were within a foot of the little brown swaddle, Jummo was half-stooping to touch it, when there was that sound the hunter knows so well,—the fierce deep breath an animal gives before it charges, a momentary glance of a sleek black form poised in the ruddy glare on the top of a rock, and then, like a thunder-bolt, the panther came down on us; the native's rifle went off so close to me that I felt the hot stream of flame on my cheek, and like a draught of cold air the panther went by felling my companion with a blow that tore the flesh from his shoulder to his elbow, and as Jummo went down I spun round on my heels as the beast fled away backwards towards the daylight and gave him a second and third shot from my double rifle, then leaving the gallant Tamil to bring along his screaming, now thoroughly indignant, offspring at his leisure, torch in one hand and rifle in the other, set off as hard as I could go after the wounded brute.

Even before the entrance was reached it was easy to know the beast had gone out. The uproar of the coolies came down the narrow funnel way as I blundered up it like the confused noise of a stream on a rainy day, and when I at last rushed out into the delightful daylight again, hot and dirty, a score of eager fingers were lifted, and a perfect babble of voices told me the panther had burst a moment before right through their midst, and had fallen head over heels into an isolated patch of grass down the slope. I knew, therefore, that he was mortally wounded, and as a matter of fact he did not even need another shot: we saw the guinea grass wave convulsively for a moment, then all was still, and going down, there lay the famous robber of villages and desolater of sheep-folds—a magnificent beast almost as big as a small donkey—stretched out dead in the sunlight!

We slung him from a thick bamboo, and with eight men carrying him, and the bandaged Jummo with the rescued baby leading the way, we marched back to the settlement. Half way down the hill we met a couple of hundred villagers, and when the news was known there was such a yelling and shouting and singing as scared the hawks off their nests in the cliff faces a mile away. And from the village of mud huts when we reached it arose another overwhelming uproar. The delighted natives ransacked their fertile Tamil vernacular for words fit to praise the victorious sahib, the unquestionably deserving Jummo, and last, but not least, the cause of it all, who was seized by his delighted mother and then and there given the breakfast for which he was more than eager, in the centre of a circle of sympathetic matrons! In fact, as it was clear nothing could be thought of for the moment but those twin wonders, the babe and the panther, I put off the day's work for a couple of hours, ordered an additional allowance of dried fish and rice all round to the villagers, and as I stood my rifle back into its corner in my hut, and yielded myself to the grateful ministrations of my "boy" and a tub of tepid water while breakfast was being prepared, I felt I had done that which was worth adventuring once perhaps, but which I devoutly hoped I should never be called upon to do again.

CRICKET.

M.C.C. v. CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.—The Cambridge University eleven won their last trial match, but they beat the M.C.C. at Lord's by only two wickets when they seemed to have an easy victory in view. Set to get 148 in the last innings they had overnight scored 88 for two wickets and in an hour lost six more batsmen in getting the last 60 runs. Lagden and Kidd took the score to 100 for the third partnership, but seven men were out for 126. Sixth to leave at 125, Ladgen, although he had been badly missed on Friday evening when 85, batted splendidly for an hour and forty minutes and hit ten 4s. Yesterday King and Thompson bowled in great form. Only very few spectators attended. Score:—

TEST MATCH.

ENGLAND vs. SOUTH AFRICA.—As was of course certain to be the case—as far as things can be certain in cricket—the Test match ended at Leeds in the defeat of the South Africans. England gaining an easy victory by 174 runs. This result places England first for the time being in the triangular competition with two wins and a draw. The South Africans bowled well in both innings, but their batting at present does not give their out-cricket a chance of reaping its reward. Score :—

OXFORD vs. CAMBRIDGE.—After a match which varied from start to finish in the most extraordinary manner, Cambridge just beat Oxford in a most exciting game by three wickets. There was absolutely nothing between the two sides in merit: perhaps the result should be attributed to Kidd for the magnificent way in which he used his bowling. If the match was played again it would be a toss up who would win, though both sides would go on to the field supremely confident. There would certainly be a great many more runs made by both of them. Score :—

ROYAL HENLEY.

From a social as well as a rowing standpoint, Royal Henley reached its zenith on Saturday. It was a wonderful afternoon of azure and gold, and the delicious panorama of the Thames had indeed its brightest and most alluring garb for the great occasion. The heat was never in the least oppressive, but there was always enough sunshine to make the day a real summer one, and the dreary skies of scudding grey that so marred the enjoyment of all on Wednesday, had finally been displaced by a vault of blue, flecked by a lawny wrack of white.

English Society flocked to the river in its thousands to welcome its King and Queen. And Society for the most part was dressed in white. That was the dominant colour, relieved here and there by splashes of more vivid tone. The boat ensemble was just a sheer delight to the eye with not one jarring note—a symphony of white and blue that charmed and held the eye and soothed the aesthetic sense to a soft content.

The touch of other days was introduced by the State Barge, in which the King and Queen of England and members of the suite glided over the exquisite stretch of that river which is so indissolubly bound up with the history of the land over which they rule. This was the climax of a great day a day which will assuredly live long in the memories of those fortunate ones of their Majesties' subjects who witnessed it.

The racing was slightly above the standard of recent years, and a number of contests aroused the greatest enthusiasm. The outstanding feature was that all the English representatives for the Olympic Regatta at Stockholm were defeated. Leander and New College were each beaten by the Australians, and the two scullers were beaten by home competitors.

We have grown accustomed to the success of foreign and Colonial competitors at Henley, but we have never previously allowed two trophies to leave our shores in the same year. On Saturday the Grand Challenge Cup was won by the Australians, and the Thames Cup by a French crew. This was the first visit of an Australian crew to England, and it was a singularly pleasant coincidence that they should share the honours of rowing before the King and Queen of England on the occasion of their first visit to Henley. The Belgians were the only people who had hitherto been too good for our English crews, but now we shall have to reckon with our Colonial oarsmen. The Thames Cup has once previously left these shores, when in 1895 Nereus B.C. (Amsterdam) were successful.

Of the eight races two were won by Oxford crews—New College and Christ Church—one by Cambridge—Queen's College, and one by a Metropolitan club, Thames R.C. The remarkable feature of the Cambridge success was that it was the first visit of Queen's College in the whole history of Henley Regatta.

The competition for the Grand Challenge Cup and the Diamond Sculls was of more than ordinary interest and importance this year by reason of the fact that four of the crews and four scullers had been entered for the Olympic Regatta. This was regarded as an excellent trial test, but few thought that England would come out of the ordeal so badly—not a solitary victory. The Canadian and Australian sculling representatives were defeated by English scullers, and our own representatives succumbed to home competitors. The most surprising result of the whole regatta was the defeat of W. D. Kinnear, the amateur champion, by Colin Stuart, who was making his début at Henley as a sculler. A. McCulloch, the other English representative selected for Stockholm, did reach the final, but was beaten by Eric Powell, whom W. D. Kinnear defeated last year in the final.

The success of the Australian crew against Leander has provided rowing men with a subject for endless discussion. The methods of the Colonials are not so startlingly dissimilar from those adopted by the coaches of English crews. They believe in a hard catch, and a firm beginning. They sit on the keel of their craft—not on the side as the majority of English crews. They use shorter oars, which obviates the necessity of a prolonged body swing. This seems to be the secret of their success, combined, of course, with physical fitness. Their style does not exhaust a man so quickly as the strain which the English system involves. This was the first time the Australians had ever rowed together as an eight. One could not refrain from admiring their uniformity of action. They moved as if by mechanical process.

The race was practically all over at three-quarters of a mile. Leander came off the mark at a very high rate of rowing—probably too fast for such a big crew, for they compared most favourably with the Australians, whose aggregate weight exceeded Leander's by only 3lb. Their object might have been to disconcert the Colonials at the beginning, but they were quite prepared, and raced Leander off the mark. A spurt by the Rectory gave them a lead after half a mile had been covered, and then they invariably rowed a slower stroke than Leander.

Leander made several praiseworthy efforts to secure a lead before passing the enclosure, but they were always safely held. They were far more exhausted at the finish, than the Colonials, who as soon as the judge's flag dropped turned round and shook one another by the hand from stroke to bow. Appended are full results:—

The King and Queen accompanied this race aboard the umpire's launch and were rewarded with a great fight. Leander plied their oars to the tune of 41 at the outset, but Sydney contented themselves with 38, and so found themselves slightly to the bad in the opening part of the fray. But they quickly altered matters, for after the first quarter of a mile Leander never again led. They, however, spurted repeatdly, but the Colonials always had a trifle in hand and rowing well within themselves won by three parts of a length. Time—7mins. 6secs.

Thames made the pace from the start a cracker, rowing 43 a minute to the 38 of New College, who found themselves a length to the bad in the open water above the island. Although wiping some of this leeway off going on towards Fawley Court Boathouse, it was not until making the mile that New College rushed up and placed the issue beyond doubt. Thames were altogether unable to check the Collegians, who won full of dash by two and a quarter lengths. Time—7mins. 36secs.

.401 CALIBER HIGH POWER
Model 1910 Self-Loading Rifle.

This rifle looks small and compact, yet it is the most powerful recoil-operated rifle made. It has even more power than the .303 British service rifle. This great force, coupled with its rapidity of fire, makes it effective against any animal alive. Its action is simple, strong and reliable; and it is in every respect the ideal rifle for hunters of big game.

This Rifle May Be Examined At Gunmakers' Everywhere.

Both plied their oar blades 39 for the opening minute, which came out slightly in favour of Jesus, who had some few feet the better of matters on leaving Regatta Island astern. For three parts of a mile the Cantabs retained first place, but Eton subsequently braced themselves up, quickened the pace and went on ahead. In nine furlongs it was all over bar the shouting, and Eton won by a length and a quarter in 7mins. 4secs.

Powell was always the better man, the pulling of McCulloch lacking grit and being altogether different from that which he has shown on previous occasions. Powell led one length by the first signal, but McCulloch then closed up somewhat. His effort, however, soon died away and Powell did just as he liked with his rival afterwards. McCulloch stopped short of the winning post. Time—8mins. 49secs

Hunting.

POONA AND KIRKEE HOUNDS.

THE flooded state of the country around Poona has prevented hounds going out oftener recently, but on the 21st July a meet was held at the 7th milestone on the Ahandi road, Mr. Whaley officiating in the absence of the Master. A jackal was soon turned out and gave the field a nice gallop to the Sisters Hills where he was lost. On Thursday last hounds met at Government House Lodge Gate and moved off to the Botanical Gardens where several coverts were drawn blank. At length a jackal was unearthed and away we went after him, through the Government House gardens into the open country, where he doubled across the golf course into the Botanical Gardens again, but he was pushed through and driven to Aundh Village where he went to ground and was left. The recent heavy rain had made the going absolutely awful.

OOTACAMUND HUNT.

25th July 1912.

THE hoot of the Ooty hunters' horn has been heard on these high hills for the past three months, and I must apologise for not having let you hear any of its melody as yet.

The season opened a little later than usual owing to want of rain and the hard going on the Downs: indeed until last week rainfall has been much behind the average; a light monsoon, very pleasant for getting about, but not so nice for one's horses' legs nor for scent lying well. However, the Downs, though hard, were "gallopable" and many good and fast runs were experienced in May and June. There is no lack of jacks, in fact in many parts there are too many, and hounds are often split up and running on more than one scent at a time. This is especially so in the neighbourhood of the Demon Valley and Mr. Antram's Tea Estate, Waterfall Shola being a sanctuary for them. Hounds look well, a trifle on the fat side perhaps, but this is all right early in the season and will work into muscle later. One sees some useful looking puppies in Ooty being "walked".

The new Master, Captain Meyrick, is very keen and works his pack with much personal energy; he has the advantage of the assistance of last year's whips, and, until recently, also of the Honorary Secretary. Captain Lambton, who went home last week, his place being filled by Major Gregory, a new arrival from the Punjab.

Fields were very good during the gay Ooty season and are fairly so still, the following being amongst the more regular members at the meets: General Sir John Woon, Colonels Sitwell, Maxwell, and Butler, Majors Lambton, Gregory, and Chalmers, and Captains Fowler, Waring, Clark, Torrie, George, and Watson, the Hon'ble Mr. Wynch, Messrs. Colin Mackenzie, Cotterell, Cotton, Akerman, Gwynn, Oswald, Cowie, Young, and Davidson, the Zemindar of Sivagiri, Mrs. Dennistoun, Mrs. Butler, Mrs. Hugh Clerk and Mrs. Slater, Miss Rolfe, Miss Cammell and Miss Hammicke.

The annual Hunt breakfast, always a most popular and largely attended function, was this year held on 1st June. The genial hospitality of the Hunt was extended again to me among many other distinguished guests! and, as the energetic Willie Burke photoed us all several times afterwards during the short interval allowed for digestion before jogging off to the meet on our ponies, you will be able to see those who were there, if you buy a photo.

Next letter I shall try and tell more of sport and perhaps prospects for the hunt point-to-point races which will come on in September.

CALCUTTA NOTES AND COMMENTS.

THE I.F.A. Challenge Shield Tournament was brought to a conclusion on Saturday last when the Royal Irish Rifles from Kamptee met the Black Watch, who are stationed in Fort William, in the final. As we announced in our issue of last week the Irishmen accounted for the East Yorks by no fewer than 5 goals to 1 in the semi-finals; the other game in the penultimate round—that between the Black Watch and Calcutta—was played on the 27th ultimo and we were unable to publish the result as the paper had already gone to press. It was a great game, the Highlanders winning by 2 goals to 1. Heavy rain before the match had turned the ground into a very sodden condition and there are many who are of opinion that, had it been a dry day and a dry ground, it would have been Calcutta who would have met the Rifles in the final on Saturday. The Red shirts played a great game, and though beaten have certainly covered themselves with glory in the tournament. They did not show up very well in the League, but they invariably do a deal better in the shield competition and this year was no exception to the rule. They accounted for Mohun Bagan—the shield holders—in the first round by 2 goals to 1 in a match about which a great deal of twaddle has been written and discussions innumerable have taken place. Most fair-minded spectators, however, are of opinion that it was a clinking good game and Calcutta won on their merits. Calcutta had been beaten in both their League engagements by the Customs but, meeting the Riversiders in the third round of the competition, they turned the tables, winning a great game by a goal to nil. They then met the Black Watch and were beaten as stated above. The Highlanders had accounted for the Rangers in their first game and then played the Middlesex. In this match it is generally considered that the Black Watch were lucky to win by the only goal scored, for the Dum Dum team were superior on the day's play and had bad luck in not scoring. The Royal Irish Rifles had had a fairly comfortable run through to the last stage. They beat the Railway team from Asansole by 3 to nil and then accounted for Sova Bazar by the same margin. They met the East Yorks in the semi-finals and trounced them to the tune of 5 goals to 1. Of other League teams engaged Dalhousie had had luck for, after having the best of their game with the East Yorks, they were beaten 2 to 0. Y.M.C.A. and Rangers were knocked out in their first engagements and the Customs after beating the Bristol United 2 to nil fell to Calcutta as already noted. The Muslims, Chinsurah Town and Chinsurah Sporting had also entered but did not put in an appearance, while the Measurers, as our readers know, were disqualified for a disgraceful incident which occurred in a previous match.

The tournament this year drew 18 entries as against 20 last year and the competition must certainly be regarded as a most successful one. It is, of course, a disappointment to see the fine Black Watch team beaten after going through this season with seventeen victories and no single defeat to their credit; but on the other hand it must be regarded as satisfactory that the shield has been won by an up-country team—the first time for many years. It should not be looked upon as a local preserve, and an outside victory should encourage more up-country entries next year.

Saturday's match between the Black Watch and the Royal Irish Rifles was attended with the same result as a similar encounter between these teams when they met in the final of the shield eleven years ago. The Irishmen who were stationed at Fort William at the time were practically invincible during 1900 and 1901 during which years they won the League Competition and in 1901 they carried off the shield, losing it the following year.

They won the Durand Tournament in 1903 and were runners-up to the Lancashire Fusiliers in 1908. The Black Watch, as most people know, have a splendid football record. They have never won the I.F.A. Shield but have four victories to their credit in the Durand Tournament—the blue Ribbon of Indian Football. Running up to the Somerset 2 to 1 in 1896 the Regiment won the Cup in 1897, 1898 and 1899: the North Staffords beat them in the final in 1894, but last year they were again victorious, defeating the Lancashire Fusiliers winners in 1908-1909, by 1 to nil in the final after playing a pointless draw.

The match on Saturday was a rattling good game and the immense concourse of people who, attracted by the reputations of the two teams, had turned out in their thousands could not have been disappointed. Gate money was charged and the various charities must have benefited in no small degree. Rain marred the proceedings but could not damp the excitement of the game. The Black Watch won the toss and chose the Fort end. As soon as play started the Irishmen attacked and Brown was called upon to handle almost immediately. He disposed of the shot and the Black Watch made some ground, but the Riflemen returned to the attack and had most of the play during the initial half. The Fort team were not playing up to their real form and their forwards could not make much headway. Their custodian saved cleverly twice—a long shot from a free kick and another which looked very much like going through. The Irishmen got two corners, but these proved abortive and had their shooting been better all round they might have won by a larger margin. Towards the interval the Black Watch made a great effort and forced three corners but none of these were improved upon and the interval arrived with a blank score sheet. The game was resumed in the rain and the wind favoured the Highlanders, who made the best of this advantage and the Rifles' goalkeeper was tested. He cleared in good style and then play ruled up and down. Both goals were visited in turn and several shots were sent in all of which were unsuccessful. The Highlanders had if anything the best of the exchanges and most people were prepared for a draw, when, within the last couple of minutes, the Rifles attacked and Leitham sent in a long shot. Brown failed to clear it properly and Watters, who was lying handy, put the ball into the net amidst a regular hurricane of applause. The Black Watch did their utmost to get on terms during the short time that remained, but their efforts were of no avail and the game ended as stated in a win for the Royal Irish Rifles by a goal to nil. After the game the Shield and medals were distributed by Lady Halliday and the Chief Justice made a lengthy speech congratulating the two teams.

The Shield Tournament is over, but there are numerous junior and other competitions, some of these under the I.F.A. and others unrecognised, and these will carry us well through the next couple of months. An innovation this year is the six-aside competition for a cup presented by the Indian Daily News. This has drawn numerous entries and the first round commenced on Monday last, three games being played each day of the week except Saturdays when there will be four matches. The competition is a very open one and nothing can be prognosticated till one has had a chance of seeing some of the teams in action—but it is likely that the faster teams will work their way through.

The Rugby season begins on Saturday. Lower down we publish the Senior and Junior League fixtures and as usual we regret to find the entries on the small side. The East Yorks are not taking part this year while the United Services are also notable absentees in the senior division. A new combination, however, calling themselves the Barbarians have entered and four teams will this year try conclusions for the possession of The Indian Field Cup. The Rugby Cup tournament is fixed to begin on the 14th September next and in addition to the local teams we understand that the Leicester Regiment from Madras, and the West Ridings, the Cup holders, have signified their intention of taking part.

THE QUESTION OF WEIGHTS.

	Bantam.	Feather.	Light.	Welter.	Middle.
England ...	8·6	9·0	9·9	10·7	11·6
Australia ...	8·0	9·0	10·0	10·9	11·4
America ...	8·4	8·10	9·7	10·2	11·4

Flippantly as the tongue wags we talk about champions of the world without pausing to think.

A glance at the statement, printed above, of the weight situation as it is now, and has been for a long time, should satisfy all that there is at present no real hall-marked champion of the world in any but the heavy brigade. Says the Sydney Referee.

There we have the simon pure article, the genuineness of which cannot be disputed—thanks to Tommy Burns, who, like Alexander of old, after compelling submission from the fighters of one "world" (America), girded on his armor and sallied forth to conquer all other boxing "worlds" (England and Australia) before he handed over his sword to to-day's champion.

Ere proceeding further I will say that no heavy-weight of modern times prior to the advent of Jack Johnson had a really unassailable right to the throne whereon the big black is now perched.

Jeffries reached nearer to Johnson's position than any previous claimant when he defeated Peter Jackson, but it was a badly broken up and much fallen away Peter Jackson, one who had not fought for six years between his prior contest, and that which lifted the shaggy-breasted Los Angeles boilermaker to an eminence he had not till then attained.

What Jackson might have done had the man's fighting fires been anything like as strong as they were in the years that had gone was abundantly evidenced by the brilliancy of his first round effort, which had onlooking thousands shrieking with delight, but there was no reserve to draw upon, and Peter, instead of husbanding resources, and probably affected by that remarkable demonstration from the gallery, went after the great "cave man," as writers of the day were in the habit of terming Jeffries. Throwing caution to the winds, and having nothing to back the attack up, Jackson was soon in distress.

His success that night, such as it was, gave Jeffries a better right to the distinction of champion of the world than any of those in whose tracks he followed; but he forfeited the position through drawing the color-line hard and fast when Johnson appeared on the scene armed cap-a-pie as far as endorsement went.

For a time Jeffries' attitude had the approval of most people, but the Johnson side was so persistent and insistent that it looked as if Jeffries must get in and prove his quality or get out altogether; he preferred the latter course.

However, that is ancient history, but to-day's little reference to the fact may not be uninteresting to Referee readers: it certainly appeared so to hundreds of pressmen I addressed at a memorable dinner given by the San Francisco Press Club a day or two subsequent to the affair of Reno two years ago, and I then said a good deal more in the connection, all of which my audience applauded freely. Mr. H. H. McIntosh will, no doubt, remember the occasion well; he was one of the guests.

According to the National Sporting Club of England, the London newspapers, and, later, the cableman, Jim Driscoll, champion feather-weight of England, and the French boy, Poesy, fought in London a week or so since for the feather-weight championship of the world. Most people who interest themselves in matters pugilistic were under the impression that American Johnny Kilbane held the feather title through defeating Abe Attell, who had long been recognised as the owner of that particular crown.

But is it possible, as the scaling limits are, to have a feather-weight champion of the world or a champion in the bantam, the light, the welter, or the middle sections? Each of the three great boxing-loving countries differ materially in the poundage marks of some weight classes, and not in a single instance do all agree. England and Australia certainly have the one feather-weight line, and American and Australia are together regarding what a middle-weight should pull the beam at; but that is no good. There must be a common basis to start out from—a unanimity regarding the absolute ground-work of the thing—before champions of the world, other than the heavy-weight king, may hold their positions unchallenged.

To be champion of the world in any one of the sections with a limit, the ambitious pug would have to, if he could, adapt himself to the weight customs of each country. When Mehegan goes to America after that continent's belt, he will be required to fight at 9-7, and then, I think, be below himself. In England the conditions (9-9) might just about suit him.

Were Mehegan, the undoubted champion of Australasia beaten under American or English conditions, his conqueror could not say he vanquished the Australasian champion, because the light-weight limit here is 7lbs. in excess of that of America, and 5lbs. over that of England. Then, again, were Wolgast to set his cap at appropriating the Australian title, he would be compelled to concede up to 9lbs. because, 'tis said, he can weigh 9st. 5lbs. easily. And the difference in weight must be a distinct disadvantage where a rush and tear fighter such as Wolgast is concerned particularly when pitted against one who presented the strong front Mehegan is capable of showing. So it outs, more or less, with all other divisions.

The real welter-weight champion of America is Packy McFarland; he cannot pull the light-weight (133lbs.) limit, but strips strong some pounds behind that country's welter weight (142lbs.)line. Yet an usually reliable American "Record Book," says nothing of McFarland in a welter-weight connection, and gives the 142lbs. title to Jimmy Clabby, at the same time stating that Clabby's fighting weight is from 148lbs. to 150lbs.—6lbs. or 8lbs. above the division he is declared to be the topsawyer of. We, here, all know that Clabby was a middle-weight when he visited us two years ago.

The same authority also has it printed that the middle-weight honors were claimed, up to the end of last year, or the date of the publishing of his "1912" record book, by Billy Papke and "Cyclone" Johnny Thompson, despite that he must have known neither Thompson nor Papke had a hope of making 11-4 (158lbs.) and stripping strong when the pair visited Australia in 1910.

There is no champion of the world other than Jack Johnson, and there can be none until the Australian, American and English top-notchers are all beaten at their own countries' weight limits.

My mind is made up to move some way or other in the direction of bringing into existence a universally recognised lot of weight limits; but I am afraid it cannot be done without a good deal of trouble unless America and Australia give way to conservative England.

Quite recently the English weights were re-adjusted by the National Sporting Club, and though that body knew what America and Australia recognised—Australia has the previous English poundages—those charged with the responsibility preferred getting away from America in every instance, and from Australia in four out of five divisions, and at the same time created a new section under the heading "Fly-weight," placing it where our bantam mark is—at 8st.

The Kennel.

DOG BREEDING FOR PROFIT.

After very careful examination of the case and inquiry from the most experienced and shrewdest breeders of the present day, I have come to the conclusion that the question "Does dog-breeding pay?" may be answered in the affirmative, always provided that certain precautions, which are really essential to the starting of any new business, are carefully observed and adhered to. There is, of course, the amateur who only wishes to make enough money to cover his out-of-pocket expenses, though this, with a kennel of big dogs, may easily amount to £200 or £250 a year, but it is not with him that I am concerned. It is the man and woman who wish to make a livelihood, or, at all events, add considerably to their income, who will alone be considered on the present occasion.

Many people appear to think that simply because they are fond of dogs, money can be made out of them; but, needless to say, this is absurd. Dogbreeding, like any other business, requires an apprenticeship and a thorough knowledge of the details of the business if it is to be successful. There are some who, reading of the huge prices frequently given for bulldogs, collies, or Pekingese, prices that would certainly purchase two or three first-class hunters, think that the making of money by breeding dogs must be a very easy matter. Others, who hear from doggy friends of the large amounts made by amateurs, fondly imagine that if they only start with dogs at once and purchase two or three goods ones, their banking accounts will henceforth cease to cause them any anxiety.

Things to Know.

No one who intended to start a shop would dream of doing so until he had found out whether the articles he proposed to sell were in some demand and likely to attract the attention of passers-by; and in the same way, a man or woman intending to start breeding and selling dogs should be thoroughly conversant with the most popular breeds, and the breeds that show signs of advancing in favour. Before purchasing dogs or starting even in any way, the would be dog seller should make a point of visiting all the best fixtures, where he will discover the favourite breeds, and having made quite certain which of these attracts him the most, he should visit all the best kennels owing specimens and find out every single thing he can about the breed. As in any other business, also, the beginner should do his utmost to obtain the opinion of those who have already made a success in the breed, and should cultivate their acquaintance, for he will find there are many who will be only too pleased to give him the benefit of their experience.

Finally it is useless to start with the idea of making money unless one has a certain amount of capital. Some people think that if they start with a couple of champions and mate them, they should breed a champion, and everything will go on swimmingly. But they may have half a dozen litters without having a puppy that anyway approaches a champion, and by far the best method is to purchase, on the advice of someone who knows, two or three really good brood bitches costing from ten to twenty guineas each, according to what one can afford, and to breed from these.

Shows.

After regularly attending shows and watching your produce, it will become obvious to you that there is a law of heredity, and you will find that your dogs gradually come to possess a fixed type, while you will be able to sell them at prices which vary according to the popularity of the type, their success on to show-bench, or, if you decide not to show.—I consider not showing is a great handicap to a beginner—their general excellence. Of course, experience has to be bought, and it is useless to expect to achieve in a year the success which it has taken an equally shrewd and clever breeder a decade to obtain.

If when starting you can afford the purchase of a good stud dog, the advertisement that he will give will help you enormously. It will be known that you are the owner of the dog, while you should make money from his puppies, as they will be much more likely to obtain good prices than those from a sire less known, while, even if the puppies are not show specimens, casual visitors will be more likely to buy them as companions when they know that the father is a well-known dog. Before finishing I would say that it is highly probable the beginner will have to disregard his personal predilection if he is "out" to make money.

Popular Breeds.

Certain breeds are far more popular than others. At the present time, as any one who visited the Ladies' Kennel Association Show recently at the Botanic Gardens can see for themselves, Pomeranians, Pekingese, French bulldogs, West Highland white terriers and Sealyhams (especially to last two) are the great favourites. Great Danes have an enormous popularity, but I do not think there is any money to be made out of them, and I would strongly advise a beginner, wishing to make money, to discard the big breeds. Judging from a fairly extensive experience, I am sure that three Great Danes, St. Bernards, or Irish Wolfhounds cost as much as, or more than a horse to keep, on account of their food.

Then again it is infinitely easier to keep half a dozen small dogs than one big one on account of the space and the amount of exercise that the giants require, while it is, for the same reason, far easier to keep a small dog in good health. Lastly, one gets no more for a first-class specimen of a big breed than for a small dog of the same quality.

The Horse.

TO CURE A KICKING HORSE.

THERE is no infallible cure applicable to all kickers alike, as much depends on the temper of the animal, its past habits and experience, and not a little on the man who undertakes the cure. Some nervous mares given to switching, holding the rein under the tail, and kicking may be cured by simply driving with an over-draw check, kept rather short, and by rolling the crupper with a strip of flannel until it is 3ins. thick, and will not allow the tail to settle down closely enough to hold the rein tightly, or fixing the tail to the breeching-straps at each side so as to prevent it from getting over the rein may suffice. If it is from nervous sensitiveness when touched on the quarters or hind limbs by harness, shafts whip, or hand, magner's method of turning in a narrow circle to render the horse dizzy and submissive may be tried. A strong hitching-strap or stout hemp cord is carried from one ring of the bit, back on one side of the body, through an opening made in the hair above a knot tied on the end of the tail, and back through the other ring of the bridle. This may be drawn so tightly as to bring the nose near to the tail—nearer in the less nervous animal and not so near in the more nervous—and tied with a running noose, which may be loosened in a moment by pulling on the fore-end. Or in place of tying, it may be held in the hand tightly, but ready to be slackened when necessary. Most horses in these circumstances will turn rapidly around toward the side to which the head and tail are turned, and the more rapid the turning the sooner will the animal become dizzy, and will fall on the opposite side if the process is too long continued. If the horse declines to turn, or turns slowly, he may be made to do it more actively by striking the nose gently with the whip. It is not necessary, however, to whirl him till he falls; he need only to be made giddy. After a few turns, touch his quarters, rump, thighs, hocks, and shanks with a light straight whip. He may kick or try to, at first, but the whip must be applied lightly again and again, and he will soon dismiss all thought of kicking. The whip must be repeatedly brought in contact with all parts of the hind limbs, inside and out, until he no longer fears or resents it, but takes it as a matter of course. As the effect of turning to the one side is liable to be temporary, it is best to loosen the horse in a few minutes, tie him on the other side, and let him turn for a while in that direction. The whip can now be brought more effectively in contact with the whole of the other hindquarter and leg, so that the horse becomes educated to bear it at all points without fear or retaliation. In the case of a very nervous horse this may sometimes appear to fail, the animal getting into a nervous paroxysm in which violent retaliatory kicking becomes involuntary. Yet even these, after one good lesson will subside when allowed to stand and cool off, and when again treated, a day or a week later, will submit quietly and with great docility.

The rule with an ordinary horse is to continue the lesson 15 to 30 minutes until the watchful, resentful eye becomes quiet and subdued and the tense muscles of the face relaxed, the ears, eyelids, and lips placid and the general expression calm, except as manifested in the hurried breathing and perspiration. But if after a severe lesson the animal shows only a nervous terror or fury it is better to suspend the lesson and wait some days for a second. When subdued the horse may be allowed to smell and examine harness and cart, and may be carefully harnessed and hitched, at first into shafts, or directly to a cart, encouragement and reward being made with sugar or apples, and a confident, commanding, but kind, voice and manner being employed. Several lessons are usually demanded, and it may be needful to drive in harness simply and then in shafts before he can be trusted in a cart. It is all important that everything be done safely, that a due stage of submission be reached before the animal be placed where he can by any chance be tempted to repeat his vice, as a relapse will only fix the habit more firmly, and give him to realise that the control secured by the turning operation is only temporary. In short the animal must not be educated so that he shall discover the limits of his master's power. Throughout the whole process the horse must be in the hands of a bold, judicious, kind trainer. Nervousness, lack of confidence, hesitation, and above all hasty temper, or uncalled-for abuse, is only too likely to undo all he would otherwise accomplish by the most scientific methods.

Motoring.

BY THROTTLE.

A CASE of a kind common enough in England, but fortunately for the fraternity very rare in India, has during the week come before the Magistrate at Bangalore, when a European driver well known in Calcutta was sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for one month for being intoxicated while in charge of a car and causing an accident by smashing a gharry and running over a boy. In addition to this the culprit not only made off from the scene of the occurrence but refused to accompany the police when apprehended by them. With a string of circumstances like this I wonder what would have been the sentence in Calcutta where a few days ago a driver was awarded six months' rigorous imprisonment for causing death by rash and negligent driving. Of the two I certainly think the more serious got off with the lighter punishment. For being drunk in charge of a car at Home without any accident the driver almost invariably loses his license and gets three months in jail to think over the temperance question. It is difficult to imagine a more serious offence than this or one that is liable to lead to such consequences. In India the professional driver is usually sober whatever else his faults, but it is regrettable to have to state that in this they are far ahead of the owner-driver. It is unfortunately no uncommon sight to see cars driven along Chowringhee by their owners at all hours of the night in manner which leaves no doubt as to the condition of the man controlling the accelerator.

QUITE a respectable sort of an accident (for the garage proprietors) occurred in Dharamtala Street a few days ago. A driver by trying to pass between two tram cars proceeding in opposite directions demonstrated the old adage of the man who tries to sit between two stools. In this case the driver tried to "rush a crossing" the result was that one tram caught the motor car on each side. The rest is left to the imagination. The most fortunate part of the affair is that the collision was not attended by fatal results.

"SCRUTATOR" in Commerce has a most intelligent criticism on the draft rules formulated by the Commissioner of Police particularly that relating to the use of the roadway by pedestrians. In this connection it is interesting to note that by a recent ruling in the English Courts a pedestrian has as much right on the road as anyone else. All I can add to this is that there is certainly considerable risk incurred by enforcing this right. Fancy anyone doing so at any one of a dozen points in London that can readily be mentioned. The result would certainly be an addition to the records of street wit and probably an ultimate inquest.

AT a meeting of the General Committee of the Calcutta Corporation held on Friday last it was moved by Mr. G. P. Shelton:—"That in view of the ever-increasing and dangerously congested condition of the wheeled traffic in Park Street, the Chairman do take steps to acquire the necessary land to set back the footpath to the street alignment on the north side of the western end of Park Street." This is certainly nearer a solution of the problem than the former experiment that was tried, viz., that of moving the central lamppost at this point and by so doing add to one side of the street by taking from the other. This is only one of many dangerous points in a shockingly laid out city. Let us hope that this initial motion will be rapidly followed by others. In this instance the Committee decided the estimates be called for.

EVEN the most careful motorist in this weather is liable to experience skids and these are almost always dangerous. When driving always use the side or hand brakes in preference to that actuated by the pedal. As a rule there are two of the former to one of the latter, and they act directly on the road wheels thereby causing no strain on the differential. The foot brake is an emergency brake and should be used as such. When braking, even if it is necessary to stop the car at the earliest possible moment, do not lock the wheels. If you feel they are locked ease the brakes slightly. It may sound curious, but it will be readily understood that the using of the brakes so as to transmit a dragging action to the wheels and thence to the road does more to stop the car than if the brakes are jammed on the wheels hereby locked. In other words two brakes are developed, first that of the brake on the wheels and secondly that of the wheels on the road. Should you find that you are skidding after applying the brakes, release them and then alternately brake and release. The car can be straightened up while the brakes are off. This is a particularly useful thing to know in town driving. If when driving you find that the front wheels are skidding apply the brakes firmly, this will steady the car and allow it to follow the front wheels instead of overrunning them. In the case of back wheel skids don't brake at all if you can avoid it, but if you must, then do so intermittently as already explained, and trying to straighten the car meanwhile. Sometimes a skid may be useful and even necessary. Suppose, for instance, you are on a fairly broad and slippery road and find suddenly that you must stop or meet with an accident if you can't stop then there is one desperate remedy which has been known to prove effective, and that is to swing the car completely round in its own ground, that is with the bonnet where the back was a moment before. To accomplish this (and I only advise it in cases of direct necessity) swing the steering wheel hard round at the same time accelerating the engine and letting the clutch in with a jerk. This will produce a skid severe enough for any purpose. When turned round by this means, immediately swing the steering wheel on to the opposite lock and then straighten up. The impetus of the car forcing it in the original direction and the engine pulling in the opposite, will neutralise each other, with the result that it will stop almost dead on turning about. To avoid having to perform these gyrations (and it is the best driver who has fewest adventures) the car should never be allowed to go so fast that it cannot be stopped dead within a reasonable distance taking the condition of the road in sight and the traffic into consideration. Going round curves for instance all sorts of obstructions must be imagined otherwise they will some day be found to be disastrous realities. Curves as a rule are more dangerous than corners, because of the tendency on the part of most drivers to take liberties with them, and the danger is intensified when about to pass another vehicle going in the same direction as yourself. In this case never drive so fast that you cannot stop in the space between your radiator and the back of the preceding vehicle. In fact one of the first things to learn about a new car is how quickly it can be stopped dead at any given speed. Tyres have a great deal to do with the stopping of a car. If non-skids do not hold on a greasy road try a grooved tyre on one back wheel. Personally I have often found that a fairly new grooved tyre will hold the road when a worn non-skid refuses to act, but tyres act differently on different cars. With hand brakes properly adjusted and acting evenly on either wheel Michelin non-skids are difficult to improve on. When approaching the places where streets are under repair don't slow up and then drive over them, keep going and on striking the metal release the clutch and allow the impetus to carry the car over, don't apply the power if it can be avoided. It is also advisable to declutch on turns; there is at these points quite enough side strain on the wheels without obtaining more from the engine.

FOR the past ten years British motor cars have failed to make any very deep mark in the annals of Continental racing, until the brilliant performance put up by the three Sunbeam cars recently in France, the details of which are now to hand. These cars were only 12-16 H. P. as rated for taxation, and won the open class prize of £400 given by the Automobile Club of France for the best team performance of three cars. Besides this the same cars also won La Coupe de l'Auto running respectively first, second and third. In the latter race thirty-six cars started over a course of 956 miles, and to the credit of the English machines it may be said that only five finished besides the three above mentioned. In the open class there were forty-seven starters mostly high-powered engines; of this field only thirteen completed the course with the result already stated. This achievement apart from establishing the supremacy of the car goes to show that horse power is not every thing as a matter of fact it rather points to the conclusion that the big engine is a thing of the past. As a victory for English motor manufacturers this is looked on as the greatest since S. F. Edge won the Gordon-Bennett Cup on a Napier in 1912.

IN turning from Home to local industry it is far from my intention to accord any firm gratuitous advertisement, but I was so struck a couple of days ago when paying a business visit to the garage of Messrs. Stewart and Co., by the appearance of a couple of new bodies there that I cannot refrain from mentioning them. The body that this firm has fitted to a single cylinder Knight-Rover certainly does them credit and when on the road will compare most favourably with anything that could be imported. As regards durability it is a well-known fact that Home and Continental built bodies do not withstand the Indian climate as well as those built by the best local firms, the woodwork being more liable to shrink and cause rattles, while the paint does not wear its fresh appearance under the tropical sun as well as that applied locally.

ON enquiry I am informed that the seal of the Calcutta Corporation in supplying motor cars to various servants, together with the augmentation of salaries for their upkeep is not to be extended to chuprassies and other juniors. This is rather surprising when one takes into consideration recent resolutions and suggestions now before the august City Fathers.

The most rapid and satisfactory results are obtained by treatment with Gonosan (Kawa Santal). It is Astringent, Anæsthetic, Anaphrodisiac, Sedative and Bactricidal—in fact the best and safest Balsam ever introduced. Booklet and sample to medical men free on application to Holzmüller and Schmidt, Calcutta.

GONOSAN provokes neither discomfort, complications, nor nausea. It is the happiest scientific combination of best Indian Sandal wood oil and Kawa Kawa. Has never been known to fail. The Stomach and Kidneys remain absolutely unaffected. Insist on having Gonosan.

AN interesting case is at present before the High Court in which Mr. William D. Shaw is suing the Indian Taxi Cab Company, to recover damages for an accident caused by a collision; Mr. Shaw was thrown out and it is alleged that his arm was so seriously damaged that after two months' local treatment it was necessary for him to proceed Home to have the injured limb attended to by a leading English surgeon.

The Naturalist.

A SHORT NOTE ON THE EARTH-EATING HABIT OF THE INDIAN DEER.

SOME time ago, Mr. E. R. Stevens, Deputy Conservator of Forests, Ramnagar Division, United Provinces, sent to the writer two specimens of clayey earth from "Salt Licks" which bore the tooth-marks of the animals which had visited them, with a request for information as to what constituents the animals possibly obtain from them. One specimen was described as of a "clay salt-lick," and the other of a "sand stone salt-lick," the latter, it was stated, being very rarely met with. Following this Mr. B. B. Osmaston, Conservator of Forests, Western Circle, United Provinces, sent another specimen of a "clay salt-lick," together with two specimens of "deer droppings." Of the latter, one consisted of the ordinary goat-like droppings and the other of almost entirely of earthy matter, having been picked up close to the "clay salt-lick" from which a sample was taken by Mr. Osmaston. It was clear that the tooth-marks borne by the different samples of the "salt-licks" were those of the deer. The writer was informed by a friend, a sportsman of some experience, that he had often been to places frequented by goral and had seen them licking the earth. On tasting the clay of those particular spots, he found it distinctly saline.

The animals, at times, require a certain quantity of salt which, as is so well known, serves as a tonic and a stimulant. A good deal of salt required by their system, is derived from the food they take, but at times an extra quantity would seem to be essential.

Hence it is generally supposed that the deer eat clay in order to obtain the salt which it contains, especially as they are only seen licking particular spots in the forests.

Of the three samples of salt-licks examined, one gave no indication of saline matter, while the other two gave a very slightly saltish taste when taken in the form of fine powder. The following table gives the results of the partial mechanical and chemical analysis of these three samples of earth:—

TABLE I.

Serial No.	Description of the sample.	Percentage of sand calculated on the air-dried material.	Clay silt per cent. on air-dried material.	Total aqueous extract per cent. on air-dried material.	Percentage of common salt in the watery extract on air-dried material.	Percentage of common salt calculated on air-dried material minus sand.	Behaviour on moistening the powdered material.
1	Received from Mr. Stevens.—Appearance of a sand-stone when in lump, mixed with a yellowish clay. On powdering, it seemed to have the physical composition of a loam. The powder gave a very slightly saltish taste.	74·58	25·68	0·53 The residue gave a distinct taste of salt.	0·11	0·42	Emitted a sweet fragrant though somewhat earthy aroma. A taste of clayey portion saline and more or less astringent.
2	Received from Mr. Stevens.—Appearance of a yellowish brown loam, tasteless.	71·97	28·03	0·22 No taste of salt.	0·028	0·097	Do. do. Appears to have no taste until the sand is removed.
3	Received from Mr. Osmaston.—Appearance of a ferruginous clay of rosy ochre colour. When in suspension in water, the particles showed a red colour. The powder gave an indication of a saltish taste.	17·51	82 19	0·18 Distinct taste of salt.	0·06	0·11	Do.

In connection with the salt-lick, sample No. 3, the two specimens of "deer droppings" were examined with the following results:—

TABLE No. II.

Serial No.	Descriptions.	Weight.	Sp. gr.	Loss on ignition per cent.	Ash per cent.	Soluble ash, on the total droppings per cent.	Insoluble ash on total droppings per cent.	Percentage of salt in the total "droppings" as determined in the soluble ash.
1	Healthy "droppings," appearance like goat excreta.	Numbering 14 in all, they weighed 8·4016 grms, the average weight of one being 0·6001.	0·748	87·94	12·06	0·51	11·55	0·09
2	"Droppings" of the deer that had eaten of the salt-lick No. 3 of the Table I. They were lumped together by twos and threes.	Numbering 16 in all, they weighed 35·8316 grms, the average weight of one being 2·2394.	1·667	11·38	88·62	0·92	87·77	0·079

From Table I it is clear that the physical composition of Nos. 1 and 2 is similar, while No. 3 is more clayey. No. 1, when in lump, resembled sandstone, which, however, when powdered had the appearance of ordinary loam. It will also be seen that Nos. 1 and 3 are slightly saltish, and this was probably the attraction for the animals. No. 2 contains only 0·028 per cent. of salt as compared with 0·11 per cent. of No. 1 and 0·06 per cent. of No. 3, and it seems comparatively poor in salt, though considering the quantity of salt contained in its clayey portion it contains almost as much salt as No. 3. The animals would be attracted by the saline clay that is contained in these sands rather than by the sand which in itself is tasteless. The quantity of salt, however, in all these samples is practically negligible, and it seems possible that the deer, like other animals, eat earth rather as a corrective to their system of digestion than for the salt contained in it. For example, it is generally accepted that elephants take mud to cure themselves of diarrhœa.

In this connection, it may be stated that Dr. H. H. Mann and Mr. D. Hooper have in their very interesting paper on "Earth-eating and the earth-eating habit in India" (vide Memoirs of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, Vol. I, pp. 249—270) discussed at length the abnormal taste of men and women for earth. The habit of eating earth by women, according to them, is occasionally found among almost every class and race of people. Clays, shales, alluvial muds, even sandy soils, are all used when once the habit is established. As to the cause of such a widespread habit they are inclined to attribute it primarily to the purely mechanical effect that the earthy matter seems to have in alleviating gastric or intestinal irritation. Gastric or similar irritation is inseparable from certain periods in a woman's life and these are precisely the periods when the earth-eating habit is contracted. In the same paper the medicinal uses of earth are discussed. Besides quoting the specific medicinal uses of small doses of earth given in oriental systems of medicine, a reference has also been made to a correspondence that appeared in the British Medical Journal on the subject. In the said journal, a case was recorded of piles having been cured by taking clay. A patient swallowed a bolus of about 1 drachm of yellow clay and next day he expressed himself as well. There was no abdominal pain, no diarrhœa, no blood, no heat or pain in the rectum. The same patient wrote that it was an old and common cure for piles and he knew it was always very successful. In another letter to the same journal, it was stated that Hahnemann was the first to test alumina physiologically showing that it had a very decided action on the rectum and anus, producing constipation and symptoms of piles, which has provided homœopaths with indications for its use in these affections ever since. The general opinion expressed in the British Medical Journal appeared to be that its action is purely mechanical and analogous to that of bismuth and that the effect attributed to it—removal of pain and diarrhœa—is quite possible and solely due to the excessively fine state of division of the particles. The reasons given by Messrs. Mann and Hooper for the habit of earth-eating by men are:—

(1) A peculiar fascinating odour and taste in the clay rendering it a delicacy.
(2) An unnatural craving due to disease.
(3) To satisfy hunger.
(4) The force of example, and
(5) The supposed medicinal virtues.

Of these causes, some at least may be quite applicable to animals also, specially Nos. 1, 2 and 5. All the three samples of salt-licks under reference gave, on being moistened, a very fascinating odour, and the taste of the wet and fragrant clayey portion of each sample after the sand had been removed seemed to be a peculiar "delicacy."

When earth is in certain quarters, considered a useful medicine for man, it stands to reason, that owing to various disorders of the digestive apparatus, the animal instinct would naturally go to it for putting the digestive apparatus right. It may be instinctively sought for by animals to cure pain, diarrhœa, dysentery or any other form of intestinal irritation.

In conclusion, the most probable causes of the earth-eating habit of the deer, that suggest themselves, may be summarised as follows: (1) to increase the salt in their system by eating and licking more or less saline earth, (2) an instinctive attraction that they may feel towards earth when their digestive organs are out of order, especially for relieving intestinal irritation, and (3) their choosing particular spots of clay may be due to well-marked symptoms of taste and odour that some soils possess. There is no special ingredient in these soils, unless it is salt, traces of which are found in them, which can be said to supply any food material to the deer.—PURAN SINGH, F.C.S., Indian Forester.

SPORT OR PROFESSION?

THE results of the great meeting at Stockholm, if they do not "give furiously to think," give seriously to speculate. The representatives of Great Britain have had their colours lowered by the superior prowess, training or management of athletes of other lands, and have held their own on the water and there only. We might have won the Hurdles but for Anderson's unfortunate trip over the last obstacle; and we might have won some other events had fortune been a little kinder: but it is unprofitable seeking consolation in such reflections; for other nations may equally point to competitions which would have fallen to them, "if."—It may be conceded that we come into the field at a disadvantage; that England competes as England, Canada as Canada, Australia as Australia, and South Africa as South Africa; whereas Britain and her Colonies might properly compete as one great Imperial whole. The proposition is at least an arguable one, but we doubt whether the athletes of other countries less richly endowed with robust colonial children would "see it." As to that we may know more in future years since the idea seems to have been advanced with the weight of some authority and may be brought forward for consideration. Our own feeling is averse from the idea as the outcome of defeat. Had our Home-bred representatives been able to keep their end up, we do not think the proposition would have been put forward; and we do not think it can be put forward now with any grace by the mother country. The case of America does not furnish a working parallel; the United States population is conglomerate; the number and variety of races, and mixed races, owning allegiance to the Stars and Stripes is greater than the number of nations competing altogether, as the names of the United States of America men entering at these meetings clearly indicate. The facts affords us no grounds for defence, protest or complaint, and none has been made. We hope none will be made; we knew what we were to meet beforehand, and defeat was the worst ground for picking holes.

The simple fact of the matter is Britain out of her depth in these great professional contests; we use the word advisedly for if not "professional" in the accepted sense of the word, they are conducted by other nations, more especially America, in a most strictly professional spirit. To her method America owes her long tale of successes at Stockholm. As at Athens, her men have been kept under the most rigid discipline on board their steamer, the Finland, their diet supervised, their hours regulated, their general conduct ordered for them by remorseless trainers who were empowered to send home in disgrace any man who failed to conform to regulation. That the men should submit with a good grace to this sort of discipline is greatly to their credit; it proves the intensity of their earnestness and their determination to leave nothing undone to win success. In a word they regard the Olympic Games as very serious business and submit to all their trainers deem essential with commendable self-denial. But, we suggest, their attitude, from the moment this disciplinary course is accepted ceases to be a sporting one; it is admirable, but it is pure professionalism; the amateur flavour is entirely departed from the whole thing. We are not complaining; we have known for long past that when America takes up a sport in earnest she makes it a regular business; she does not trifle with it; she is out to win and she leaves nothing to luck or to chance; the man who is deemed worthy to represent his country goes into training, and from that hour becomes an animal, to be fed, managed and physicked into the highest possible condition as he were a horse. He does not protest; it is the tradition of his country, and he takes it as a matter of course. And ourselves? It may be urged that we can furnish a parallel, in some sort, to the American methods in the training to which the 'Varsity crews submit every Spring: the eights live together, train together and practice together. The parallel holds good only within limits; an eight is not a fortuitous concourse of athletes but a combination, each item interdependent on the rest: it is an organised whole, and elementary, obvious, reasoning indicates that it must be so regarded from the first. This is a very different thing from dealing with the several contestants in a foot-race and minutely instructing each man as to his duties therein, it is understood that each American runner went out to the track with a definite understanding as to how he was expected to run, having due regard, of course, for the opposition to be encountered. That is excellent business; it makes for success, and there is no material reason why the Britisher should not do the same thing: no material reason; we have a very strong feeling, nevertheless, that our people will never do the same thing, and will not be at the trouble of assigning reasons. Such is not "our way." It is wholly averse from the tradition of British athletics and is very unlikely ever to become our way. We frankly hope it will not; ten thousand times rather would we see our men taking back seats at Olympic Games till Judgment Day rather than witness the total change of spirit adoption of these methods implies; when we adopt them we shall renounce the very spirit that now animates our games and sports, and that we should regard as nakedest calamity. When success regardless of means becomes the one thing sought sportsmanship goes to the wall. Some years ago, at a big regatta, one of the starters in a sculling race had the misfortune to upset his craft on his first stroke (the water was somewhat rough, which explain the mishap); his rival waited until he could be pulled out and set afloat again, when they made a good race of it. The action of the man who did not care to take advantage of the accident to go on and win was perfectly incomprehensible to certain American onlookers; the man was, in their judgment, deliberately throwing away a perfectly legitimate sending of fortune. The same feeling was manifested on the polo ground a few years ago when a player seeing the goal in danger, threw himself out of the saddle crying "I'm down!". The man was violating no canon of sport known to him; on the contrary, he was doing that which he held lawful and loyal to his own side: there is no rule against falling off one's pony if there is anything to be gained by it; so why should he not fall off? These trifles are eloquent of the spirit we do not want to see animate British games and sports, and we believe never will animate them. We vastly prefer our own way of losing to some ways of winning, and the greater the distance we can maintain between the frankly professional system and our own, the better. If the Olympic Stadium is to be the arena of professionalism let it be so; but then let it stand apart from ordinary atletics—if possible.

The British competitors have thrown away some events which they might have won by carelessness or inattention to rules: thus it appears that in two of the saddle competitions our men threw away their chances—courted disqualification—by riding in single snaffle bridles when the rules distinctly decreed double bits. This sort of thing is, of course, sheer carelessness or stupidity; there is no excuse for it, and it is difficult to understand how the blunder came to be made. It is not the sort of thing for which a trainer or superintendent should be required; no doubt had an American rider attempted to get up with gear that did not conform exactly to rule—though the thing is unthinkable, having regard to the exact regard for detail which distinguishes our cousins' organisation—if he attempted to ignore rule, we say, he would have been corrected at once, and probably sent to bed early that night as a punishment. Men who do not take the trouble to read and master rules for themselves in these competitions are not the right men to take part in them. It is quite in order to look after the professional athlete and see that he does all that he should do; the amateur should look after himself.

THE HIGHWAY TO INDIA.

A VERY strange and, at the same time, a very disconcerting psychological phenomenon is at the present time prevalent in England. A very considerable percentage of the population—in some instances apparently an overwhelming one—objects to many of the measures of the present Government (the national insurance scheme, for example), and yet they take no effective steps to make their wishes known. It is, indeed, as though the populace, from having had a number of more or less unpopular measures thrust upon them, had fallen into a kind of apathetic state, and had not sufficient pluck left to make their desires known, even when they are in a position to make them effective, if only they were put forward in the proper manner.

In no case is this condition of helpless apathy more marked than in the matter of the complete withdrawal of British battleships from the eastern end of the Mediterranean, and the concentration of the small remnant of the Mediterranean fleet at Gibraltar. Day by day we see leaders and other articles in the papers pointing out the obvious dangers to the Empire of such an abandonment, and the necessity of immediate action to obtain the reversal of the proposed policy, and yet no effective steps to bring the matter to a head.

Everyone appears to admit that Lord Charles Beresford is perfectly correct in saying that if this policy of abandonment is made permanent, we shall remain in the Mediterranean only on sufferance, and for just such a period of time as other Powers may find it suits their purpose to allow us It is also admitted, by the thinking classes and those whose opinion is alone worth having on such matters, that our hold on India and the East generally is largely based on prestige; and that by the abandonment of the Mediterranean we largely abandon our prestige throughout the East.

These last, it may be urged, are to some extent matters of sentiment and hypothesis; but there is no sentiment at all as regards the matter of our daily bread, and when it is admitted, as it is on all hands, that fully half our supply of corn comes by way of the Mediterranean, it surely follows that it is a matter of life and death to be in a position to adequately protect and patrol the route by which such supplies reach their destination. Equally important is the question of keeping open a route for troopships in the event of war in the East, and how this is to be done without the command of the Mediterranean, and with the greater number of our battleships engaged in "mashing" the German fleet in the North Sea, passes ordinary comprehension.

The strange thing about the matter is that the city, the underwriters, and other great influential factors are almost to a man opposed to the abandonment scheme, and yet not a single effective step is taken to put pressure on the Government, and induce them either to alter their programme, or to make it absolutely and indisputably clear to the nation, that they are in the right and the people who think differently in the wrong.

It is said that at the present moment shortage of officers and men, rather than lack of ships, is the main cause of the practical abandonment by Great Britain of the eastern end of the Mediterranean. If this be so, it is abundantly clear that the withdrawal of the battleships from Malta is due, not to what is considered to be the best naval policy, but to the exigencies of a deficiency in naval power.

If the British people, both at home and beyond the seas, can once be brought to fully realise that this is really the true state of the case (and the onus of showing that it is not rests with the Government) we can hardly think that they can hesitate in demanding that matters must be put on an altogether different footing while there is yet time, and that whatever may be the cost, the British navy must be made adequate to meet all possible calls on its energies, and, above all, that it must at once be put in a position to maintain at all hazards a free highway from the Mother Country to India and the Far East.

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

THE cablegrams announcing the results of the Stewards' Cup (6 furlongs), the Goodwood Plate (about 2 miles 3 furlongs), and the Goodwood Cup (about 2 miles 5 furlongs) arrived to us too late last week to make comment in our last issue. As these events are now the better part of a week old only a very short reference to them is necessary, for they have already been very fully dilated upon in the daily and weekly press. Mr. P. Nelke's Golden Rod by Americus out of Flower of Song, who won the Stewards' Cup, started at 9 to 1, having been quoted the day previous to the race at 100 to 7 and he was only fourth favourite on that day (29th July), Bashti, Aiglon and Braxted all being at shorter prices, but all failing to get into the first three, as the winner's immediate attendants were Mr. S. Joel's Poor Boy and Mr. G. Faber's Uncle Pat. Amongst other horses engaged and whose names are of interest to Indian readers were Mr. S. T. Creet's Runnymede and Mr. J. C. Gaistaun's Tangaroa neither of which horses ran forward. It is interesting to note the position of Tangaroa in a first-class handicap at home 7st. 12lb. compared to the weights he carries when he races out here which are in the region of 10st. and it is an eloquent comment on the form in India. Golden Rod prior to this important win at Goodwood had "connected" on two other occasions this season, once when he secured the 6-furlong Bridgman Stakes at Liverpool, winning a head after being badly interfered with, and once when he won the Waterbeach Handicap, 6 furlongs, at Newmarket with 9st. beating Highwayside 8st. 3lb. and Mediator 7st. 12lb. Devil's Dyke, who was racing in India a little while ago, was amongst the also rans and ran in the colours of Mr. Harry Norton, who is well known in Calcutta. Whalley rode Golden Rod in this race at Newmarket. Last season Golden Rod won the 6-furlong All-Aged Stakes at Ascot with 10st. 11lb., beating Eton Boy 9st. 8lb. and Elmstead 10st. 11lb.

IRISH MARINE by Desmond out of Marina, who won the Goodwood Plate, started at 4 to 1 and must have been the means of bringing home a nice little prize packet for his stable, as it is recorded that he started favourite with both the placed ones Winthorpe (Mr. W. Wyndham's) and Warlingham (Mr. R. S. Sievier's last season's 310-guinea purchase) well supported. Irish Marine, late Irish Channel, was out six times as a three-year-old last season without scoring a bracket, though he was twice placed. This season on the 24th May, he captured the 1½ mile Salisbury Cup, beating Growler and Ignition very easily. He was owned formerly by Mr. F. Stern, but is now the property of Captain M. Hughes.

THE field for the Goodwood Cup was as usual a small one, only three starting and there are rarely more than five or six out for this long distance contest, eight being exceptional and the record number only a dozen, the size of the field in the year 1859 when Promised Land won. Last year when Kilbroney won only five ran and there were only three in 1910 (Magic's year) and five in 1909 (Carrousel). Tullibardine, King William and Tootles were the three this year and F. Wootton had to stand down off the winner as a result of his antics in the Atlantic Plate at Liverpool a little time ago. The reason given is "reckless riding", but after his two previous bits of "time" for what was called foul riding and giving Danny Maher a rough passage, the present charge is probably one of those things that can be designated a "distinction without a difference." It was said the last time that Wootton was put down for this sort of thing that the next offence would spell out for good, so that in the present instance there were probably some extenuating circumstances. A month may not make much difference to Wootton's ultimate position in the list of winning jockeys, as at the time of his sentence he was probably over a dozen to the good of Maher, who was his nearest opponent. Tullibardine, who was ridden by Wheatley, is owned by Mr. J. Buchanan of whisky fame and is a brown four-year-old colt by St. Frusquin out of Floors and he and King William who has been once or twice performing in ungenerous fashion started level in the betting at 2 to 1 each and Tullibardine won by half a length in what was probably a very close finish. Tullibardine was getting 12lb. from the challenger and on the Ascot form this year (Fifty-eighth Triennial Stakes 2 miles) which Tullibardine, receiving 4lb., won beating King William two lengths, at these weights it must have been good goods. At Ascot they say King William deliberately cut it when he had the race practically won and the same story may have to be told of Goodwood when we get the fuller details of the Cup. Early this season at the Craven Meeting Tullibardine won the Fifty-second Newmarket Biennial Stakes (last 1½ mile of the Cesarewitch Course) and his other victory was the race at Ascot to which reference has already been made. King William's success this season is comprised in the Chippenham Plate at the Newmarket First Spring Meeting, his only other opponent having been Saracen. He has put his supporters in the cart more than once, as in addition to the Ascot incident he was badly beaten in the 1½ mile Burwell Plate in the Newmarket Second Spring by St. Bruno, and it was said that he again declined to put his best foot forward. He was too badly beaten for it to have been his true form as the winner had the race in hand at the Bushes.

THE Calcutta Monsoon Racing Season 1912 opened on Saturday last with a fairly good day's racing taking things all round and under far pleasanter weather conditions than have oft-times been our lot at this period of the year, the recent heavy and almost incessant rain having taken a good deal of the sting out of the heat, even though it has left things underfoot somewhat swampy and sodden. On the flat-course which is now sand with grass growing over it, the going was slow but good: on the hurdle courses it was distinctly swampy in places and however well-drained this course may be there are always portions of it that are apt to be water-logged after very heavy and continuous rain. The paths crossing the course are apt to be slippery, and, as we said last year, have brought horses down, and there is one in particular that is very bad. We refer to the path that crosses the hurdle courses immediately before the fourth flight and we endorse the suggestion made in a daily contemporary that it is desirable to slightly rearrange the positions of this and of other obstacles on this course. A longer run-in is badly needed and this could be secured without any difficulty by putting the first flight of hurdles, which is also jumped last, back another 80 or 100 yards from the winning post. Even so, the run-in would hardly be more than a furlong, which is all too short. As things are, there is only one way to win, namely, by riding a horse out a finish over an obstacle. There is again too long a gap between the second and third flights on the horse course and between the second last and the last flight. If the latter were moved back as suggested this difficulty would be overcome. Otherwise this course is a good one to ride. Criticisms of the nature we have referred to above have been passed upon it by more than one visitor who has ridden over it and it is not therefore merely a case of the prophet who has no honour in his own country. There was a big attendance and a very fair sprinkling of visitors, amongst them General Sir Bryan Mahon, Colonel Molesworth, Major Winter, Major Bennett, Major Mussenden, Captains Barrett, Power, Robertson, and Kenworthy, Messrs. Murland, Platt, J. J. Hilliard, McCall, Shillingford, Weldon, Johnson-Stewart, J. D. Scott, etc., and some of our friends did well, as out of the seven races three went to visitors' horses if we may count in Captain Kenworthy's Wassail and four if we reckon Major A. Smith's Reuben, as both these owners are new-comers to the racing capital.

Rain fell during the afternoon but not sufficiently heavily to spoil sport and the only detrimental factor to the afternoon's enjoyment was the unfortunate number of bad starts by which the chances of numerous horses, and some of them well-fancied ones, were destroyed. The blame for this it is not yet fair to place either upon the new starter or the new single rubber starting gate because in the most of the cases the fields were very rowdy and fractious ones. But the starts were not good in any case and it would, we think, be a good plan for the starter to give the field the office by shouting "go" as he releases the gate, as his predecessor Mr. Bates used to do. It is a jockey's duty to be ready to jump away the moment he sees the field in anything like line so that there may be blame attachable on both sides. Proceedings were opened by the Division I of the Amateur Plate, a 6-furlong flat race that had to be divided and for which all nine coloured started. Rameses went out a warm favourite at 5 to 4 and it was thought to be a good thing for him: but he bumped up against a faster and a fitter one on the day in Lady Leonard, who although she only won by three-quarters of a length, had the favourite in trouble a furlong from home and handed him fully a 5lb. beating in our opinion. The winner was fancied by the stable who had, we are glad to learn, a nice win. This mare ought to be very useful over hurdles, as she is a clever, quick jumper and has a very fair turn of foot. Frank was also backed for this race, but was one of the earliest beaten.

The Trial Hurdle Race came next and the start was considerably delayed by the vagaries of Vandaburg, who scattered the crowd in the paddock and also declined to join his horses at the post, and The Priory II., who also played up and reared badly. Elpis also was in a sour mood and when the gate was released remained planted, losing lengths. Sholto was picked to be "the goods" this journey, but there was also plenty of money for the handsome "pony" Sea Lad. Pressy was also fancied but failed to stay though she was going well up to the second last flight. Sholto went out in pursuit of her, Sea Lad waiting off him and then making a dash at him over the last one and quickly having his rival beaten. Mr. Evers rode a very nice race on the winner and timed his attack with excellent judgment. The Priory II. was a disappointment to his connections who expected him to nearly win; but he turned rusty about three fences from home and dropped back when holding a nice position. They say he has plenty of pace if he can be induced to try. He is an undeniable jumper also when he chooses!

In the Pony Plate, there was another mix up at the start and Village Girl, who was favourite, Miss Clare, Princess Royal were all slow away, so was Rowley Mile, but the first three were practically left standing and were never in the hunt. May Kenley and her stable companion Circus Girl made a race of it all the way, the former winning by half a length and the same owner's Lady Ratcliffe was third two lengths away. Village Girl they say would have won easily, but we are not so sure about it, as May Kenley ought even at 6lbs. the worst of the deal to just about win. It was hard lines on the owner, however, getting no run for his money.

The Amateur Pony Hurdle Race provided a field of seven, all bar Water Lily being stripped for the contest. There were virtually only two of them backed, Late Night, who went out at evens, and little Reuben, whose price varied between 2 to 1 and 5 to 2. Winna had a few friends at eights, but the stable evidently fancied Late Night and he carried the bulk of the bullion. Late Night looked a bit too big and round and is not as forward as he might be as is obvious from the fact that Reuben, who jumped none too well in the early part of the race, leaving him stone-cold a goodish way from home and winning in great form by two lengths. Mr. McCall, who had the ride on the winner, was seen to great advantage and rode a very determined race. Reuben is very short of a school or two, but this race will have done him all the good in the world. He jumped very well, coming home over the last two or three.

The Summer Plate devolved into a match between Chin Chin and Lady Grey II., the other three, Bonny Boy, Cherry Hackle, and Royal Colours, being scratched. Lady Grey was late away, but it would have made no difference if she had got three lengths the best of it out of the gate, as Chin Chin, 6 to 1 on, held her absolutely safe all the way. A hot favourite went down when Bushey Dame from the same stable as the last winner was easily beaten half a length by the 15 to 1 chance Wassail in the Bengal Plate. The owner of Wassail was as much surprised as anyone, and we believe Mr. Kenworthy had only a very small investment for a shop on this son of Isinglass and Sonatina. The horse, however, put paid to Bushey Dame's account without much difficulty. Over the last race a certain body of speculators were again on the mat, having, been led into backing the obviously unready Orange Pekoe. A cash commission came into the ring for him but did not emanate from the owner who would not have him. The wise ones were all on to Farthing Bun, who won without any trouble from Pilot and Betty Birr, who dead-heated for second honours. Details appear elsewhere.

The English mail brings news that Mr. Jas. de Rothschild has sold Bronzino and that this well-known horse will be very shortly shipped to Australia. The purchaser is Mr. Samuel Hordern of Sydney, who succeeded in defeating the strenuous opposition of the Austrian Government and secured the son of Marco for his stud in New South Wales. The sale was negotiated through the British Blood-Stock Agency, Limited. There cannot be the slightest doubt that Bronzino is the highest class horse that has been exported to Australia, at all events in recent year, and in securing such a magnificent horse Mr. Hordern has rendered the greatest possible service to bloodstock breeders in the Commonwealth, though it is understood that his new owner will this season practically reserve the horse for his own mares, many of them daughters of Haut Brion by St. Simon. On his appearance, performances and breeding Bronzino should prove a brilliant success at the stud in Australia. He is grandly bred, being by Marco out of Flitters (a winner of nearly £2,000) by Galopin out of Ierne, by Hermit from Shannon, winner of the Doncaster and Goodwood Cups, and a half-sister to Trent, who won the Grand Prix de Paris. That Bronzino was a horse of the highest class is apparent from the fact that he twice defeated Lemberg and ran Swynford to a head in the 1910 St. Leger, which was won in the fastest time on record. Had he not been badly struck into whilst running no doubt he would have won outright, for a stride past the post his head was in front. In the St. Leger he also beat the 1,000 Guineas and Oaks winners, Winkipop and Rosedrop. Two days later he came out again and won the Doncaster Cup in the easiest possible manner. It is understood that he had been tried an almost certain winner of the Ascot Gold Cup, but as all know he broke down so badly on the Saturday before the race that he was not able to run again. Australian breeders have not as a rule secured many of the best class horses from England —certainly rarely one like Bronzino—and his acquisition is a decided score for Mr. Hordern. Bronzino may be safely trusted to write his name deeply in the records of the Australian Turf.

THE Poona racing season opened with the First Extra Meeting on Saturday last and the racing public in Western India were most anxious to see how things would go under new conditions. There was a very fair attendance, though the race special from Bombay was perhaps not so largely patronised as in former years. However, all Poona was there and the enclosures were well filled. It had rained heavily in the morning but the afternoon turned out fine and the going though heavy was not so bad. Numerous improvements had been made in the enclosures but what interested most people was the Totalisator. A new machine of the most up-to-date description does duty for "win" bets with a minimum stake of Rs. 10, while Rs. 50 and Rs. 100 can also be staked. The old Totalisators have been converted into "place" machines with tickets priced at Rs. 10 and Rs. 100. The second enclosure has a win and place machine with tickets at Rs. 3 each. Of course it is early days to judge whether the race funds are likely to benefit under the new scheme as much as they did in former years or whether the public will ever extend the same patronage to the Totalisator as they did to the Books. Certainly Saturday's workings can give us nothing to go on. They were by no means encouraging and the investments were characterized by a decided caution and restraint. The dividends returned were disappointing but it will be a little time before the betting man decides whether he will continue to patronise the Totalisator or fly to other pastures where he can get his money on with the Books. The racing was interesting throughout, there were two military bands in attendance and as a social function the opening meeting was a distinct success.

THE programme opened with the first division of the New-comers' Plate for arab ponies 14 hands and under. Fifteen faced the starter and Moonspot and Raspberry had most friends at the machines. When they were sent away Raspberry showed out with Mubrook in attendance and they made all the running to the turn, where Best Chance came up, passing Mubrook inside the distance; Raspberry, however, stayed out the challenge and won by a length and three-quarters.

The closed race, the Subalterns' Plate, brought out a field of five, Tofic Pasha getting all the support. Castaway and Burg lead to the turn. Here the latter ran wide and Tofic Pasha came through and closed with Castaway. It was a fine race up the straight, the verdict giving a neck victory to Major Greig's horse, Taki Khan taking third place a length and three-quarters behind Tofic Pasha. Burg must have had something to say in the finish had he not run wide. The tote paid Rs. 156 on the winner.

The Epsom Plate for horses came next and provided the two of three objections lodged during the afternoon. Malmsey the favourite and Bambino led to the 5 furlongs, where Pelargonium took second place behind Malmsey: the latter went out in front at the turn and though challenged by Bachelor's Knot won a good race by a length; a neck dividing second and third. There was an objection to the winner for carrying 5lb. over weight. This was overruled, but a second objection was lodged against Malmsey on the score that on the terms of the race he had carried 11lb. short weight. This was upheld by the stewards and the Kour Saheb's horse was disqualified, Bachelor's Knot being placed first. Totalisator tickets were, however, paid out on Malmsey as the winner.

Eleven went out in the Arabian Plate and three well-backed ones finished in front. Real Gold and Harry Johnson showed the way to the turn, where the latter fell back and Berar and Regent came through followed by Shawcutt and Ghalyum. Regent had the legs of them at the finish and nicely ridden by Brown beat Real Gold three-quarters of a length for first place, Shawcutt third the same distance away.

In the Arab Pony Trial Plate Brazie led out in a field of ten, with Majeed and Sirkar next. At the half mile Rajput joined Brazie and Majeed in the van, Sirkar dropping back. It was an exciting finish, Rajput and Majeed coming away together, Ruiz snatching a head victory on that smart performer Rajput, Brazie third.

A round dozen went out in the Beginners' Plate, Macann having most friends. Not Yet made the pace for Macann and Sperry but dropped back at the turn leaving the two mentioned in command. At the distance Macann shook off his attendant and Brown scored his second win of the afternoon, Macann finishing a comfortable length and a half in front of Sperry; Not Yet third three lengths away.

The second division of the New-comers' Plate wound up the proceedings and brought out fifteen—the largest field of the day. Reminder and Tezab were first to show out and ran in front for a couple of furlongs when Tenebruse displaced Tezab but could not beat the bottom weight, Reminder, who won by a length and three-quarters. The winner was objected to for crossing Tenebruse at the bend and the stewards upheld the objection, Reminder being disqualified and the race awarded to Tenebruse.

THE Secunderabad Novices' Polo Tournament was concluded on the 31st ultimo, the final bringing together the 29th Lancers and the King's Light Infantry. It was a good game the King's winning by 4 goals to 1. The 29th pressed at the start and were first to score, but before the end of the first period Battye equalised. The Infantry had all the best of the second chukker and attacking throughout a goal was scored after several close shaves. The 29th made great efforts to get on terms in the third chukker, but the Infantry kept them out and the period ended without score. In the last session the King's attacked continuously and Battye and Leach were most conspicuous, each scoring a goal. The 29th failed to respond and were thus beaten 4—1 as stated.

THE third weekly mud sports meeting of the Bombay Gymkhana were favoured by a dry ground and the fixture proved most successful. The programme commenced with tent-pegging, a fence having to be negotiated on the run up to the pegs on this occasion. Mr. L. Graham was placed first, with Messrs. C. F. R. Cooke and C. Bamber next in order. They came Musical Chairs for ladies—to ride round a circle of stakes and seize a flag from one or other of a number of poles inside the circle, the number of flags being one less than the number of competitors—won by Miss Dunsford with Mrs. McCausland second. The Jumping Competition by half sections proved an easy thing for Messrs. L. Graham and B. May, with Messrs. Landon and Moulton next. The V. C. Race was most interesting—the roar of the battlefield being provided by the B. B. and C. I. Railway Band, which was in attendance throughout the afternoon. Mr. Bamber's mount showed a quiet indifference to the discord and his rider retrieved the dummy and won comfortably with Mr. J. W. Knight Bruce second. The Aunt Sally Stakes were won by Miss Irwin and Mr. Knight Bruce, with Mr. and Mrs. Richardson second. The meeting wound up with a pony scurry won by Mr. J. R. Landon on Peggy, Petty Officer ridden by Mr. Knight Bruce second, and Olivette (Mr. Bamber) third.

AT the Bombay Gymkhana on the 29th ultimo a meeting was held of representatives of the Presidency, Parsee, Hindu and Mahomedan teams to decide whether the quadrangular matches should be played in Poona or Bombay, as the Bombay grounds look as if it would not be in proper condition when required. There were present Messrs. Pavri and Divecha of the Parsee Gymkhana, and Messrs. Naik and Chunilal Mehta of the Hindu Gymkhana; while the Mahomedans were represented by Sir Ebrahim Rahimtoola and Mr. H. Tyabjee. The whole matter was fully discussed, but no definite decision was arrived at. It was decided to adjourn the meeting, and in the meantime to try and obtain or prepare some wicket in the Presidency Town.

THE sixth of the Triangular Test matches began at Manchester on the 29th ultimo and had eventually to be abandoned owing to rain. England had first lease of the wickets and made 203, Rhodes scoring 92. The Australians had put together 14 without loss when stumps were drawn on the 30th ultimo and the next day rain caused the abandoning of the game—no play being possible.

THE seventh test match began at Nottingham on Monday, Australia meeting South Africa again. The Springboks batted first and scored 266 for 6 wickets, Nourse contributing 64. On Tuesday they completed their innings for 329, White making 50 not out. Australia replied with 219.

APPENDED are the results of important cricket matches played in England during the past week :—

The Yorkshire and Sussex match at Bradford was abandoned, neither side scoring points.

Leicestershire drew with Surrey at the Oval, and led on the first innings.

The match between Middlesex and Worcester at Worcester was abandoned, owing to rain. Middlesex scored three points.

The match between Hampshire and Gloucestershire was abandoned, neither side scoring points.

The match between South Africans and Minor Counties eleven was abandoned owing to rain.

Kent beat Essex at Leyton by an innings and 114 runs.

Lancashire beat South Africans at Liverpool by 225 runs.

Hampshire beat Leicester at Southampton by nine wickets.

Sussex beat Somerset at Taunton by 87 runs.

Surrey beat Worcestershire at the Oval by ten wickets.

The games between Yorkshire and Warwickshire at Hull, and the Australians and Derbyshire at Derby were both drawn. The first-named team leading on the first innings.

A SENIOR boy at Westminster School states that under the headmastership of Dr. Gow, a serious attempt is being made to renew the ancient glories of Westminster as a rowing school.

Few of the millions who of recent years have watched the Oxford and Cambridge race, he says, realise that it was the "old Westminsters" at Cambridge who gave the Cantabs their old school colour of light blue, and that long before the rival Blues, as we now know them, struggled for rowing supremacy on the Thames, Westminster boys used to row every year against the Etonians of those days.

After 1837, headmasters began to regard the system as interfering with school discipline, and it was abolished.

Last summar Douglas Jerrold, head of the school, captained a small band of enthusiasts, which competed successfully at the Molesey Regatta.

The headmaster is contemplating the engagement of a professional coach (says the Daily Telegraph), and it is hoped that when rowing has again become officially recognised Westminster will be able once more to take her place on the river, and row successfully against her old rival, Eton.

FRANK KLAUS of America and Georges Carpentier, the French Champion, have been matched a second time, as was anticipated. The men are articled to box the best of twenty rounds in Paris on Saturday, 5th October. Another interesting contest has been fixed for the 2nd September, when Gunner Moir will meet PettyOfficer Curran at the Ring—the best of 20 rounds. This is a return to the contest in which this couple figured as principals at Mountain Ash some time ago.

FOR the fourth time in their separate careers Sam Langford and McVea have faced one another in the ring. The match was brought off at Sydney on the 4th instant. Both were on their feet at the end of twenty rounds, Langford getting the verdict on points. In view of Jack Johnson's reported retirement Langford claims the Championship.

THE latest convert to the Royal and Ancient game is the Amir of Afghanistan who, it is reported, has had links made and directed one of the Europeans in his service to import a professional player from Europe. We can scarcely picture to ourselves matches between hirsute chiefs and wonder whether knickers and stocking will replace those voluminous trousers beloved of the Cabulee !

STARTING the day with the lead of two matches to one the British Isles team beat France in both of the remaining, so won the first round of the Davis Cup contest. They have now to meet the United States to decide who is to play the holders, Australasia, and it is possible that this round will be played in Australia, at any rate it is stated that an English team will visit that country next season. The first and as it turned out deciding game on the last day was between Dixon and Gobert and after Gobert had taken the first set, Dixon annexed the next three and won 3—1. The Frenchman began brilliantly, but as Dixon improved he fell off and the Englishman made few mistakes and played a better tactical game. Gore had then to play Decugis in the last Singles, but after Gore had won the first set by magnificent driving the Frenchman retired.

Singles.—C. P. Dixon beat M. Decugis (6—3, 6—2, 6—4) and beat A. H. Gobert (4—6, 6—4, 6—2, 6—3). A. W. Gore lost to Gobert (4—6, 6—4, 3—6, 3—6) and beat Decugis (6—3, 6—0 retired).

Doubles.—H. Roper Barrett and C. P. Dixon (British Isles) beat A. H. Gobert and W. H. Laurentez (France) 3—6, 6—4, 6—1, 6—1.

A TENNIS tournament was held at Ranikhet in the latter half of July, four events under handicap being put through and producing some exciting matches. The Men's Singles drew sixteen entries, the winner being the Rev. A. Wardell —½30 who beat Captain B. Bignell —½15 in the final by 3 sets to 1. The Men's Doubles for which there were fifteen pairs brought together in the final Colonel Seller and Captain Moss (—½15) and Colonel Savage and Captain Bignell (—30), the latter being defeated by 3 sets to one. In the Mixed Doubles twelve couples competed, Miss Hulbert and Captain O. Steele (—½40) defeating Captain and Mrs. Moss (—½30) in the final by 2 sets to 1. Six pairs entered for the Ladies' Doubles won by Mrs. Moss and Miss Hulbert (—½30), their opponents in the final being Mrs. Briscoe and Miss Waller (—½15).

THE Annual Tennis Tournament at Gulmarg was this year held from the 18th to the 24th July, the entries numbering over eighty. It was a big success all through, competition was keen, some excellent games were witnessed, the handicaps worked out very well, and the crowd of spectators at the courts each afternoon showed the great interest that was taken in the various competitions. A special word of praise must be given the Honorary Secretary, Colonel Tennant, to whose energy and hard work is due the complete success of the fixture. Appended are the results.

Men's Handicap Singles.—Major Mackenzie (scr. beat Captain D. Field (4—6, 6—4, 11—9, 6—3).

Men's Handicap Doubles.—Captain Birkett and Lieutenant Napier (+½15) beat Messrs. Pott and Dening (—30) 6—1, 6—2, 6—4.

Mixed Handicap Doubles.—Major and Mrs. Mackenzie (scr.) beat Miss Steward and Captain Birkett (scr.) 4—6, 6—4, 6—3.

Ladies' Handicap Singles.—Mrs. Selwyn (—40) beat Miss M. Fraser (—15) 6—3, 6—4.

Ladies' Handicap Doubles.—Mrs. Selywn and Mrs. Hutchinson (—40) beat Lady Kate Vincent and Mrs. Weddington (+½30) 6—4, 6—1.

Two Dutch big game hunters named Lideboer, who have done considerable tiger-hunting in Java, have made a proposal to the Governor of the Dutch East Indies to completely wipe out or reduce the numbers of the tigers in the island of Sumatra. They charge no fee, but ask for travelling expenses only. If it is desired to clear out the tigers in a particular district, then the hunters will confine their operations to that locality.

The poor success of the representatives of Great Britain at the Fifth Olympiad has produced taunting criticisms in both home and foreign press, while some of the British competitors have even been accused of reckless methods on the track, and foul play in football and water polo. Our leader to-day treats with the question and we publish further on a couple of articles on the subject culled from English exchanges. In this connection it is interesting to learn through Reuter that at a meeting of prominent representatives of the athletic world presided over by Lord Desborough it was decided to raise a fund with a view to the worthy representation of Britain at the Olympiad in Berlin, and to endeavour to secure a joint Empire team. The speakers were of opinion that £30,000 would be necessary.

Our Madras correspondent writes:—Quite a large number of spectators turned up on Saturday last on the island to witness the Madras Gymkhana Skittle Meeting. There were five events on the card. The first, individual tent-pegging for a Challenge Spear presented by Major H. C. Oakes, was very keenly contested, and the final ended in a tie between Mr. F. Oswald and Mr. H. N. C. Campbell and it had to be run over and over and it was decided to reduce the peg to half size. In the end, Mr. H. N. C. Campbell was adjudged winner. The exhibition of horsemanship of the above two competitors was indeed very fine.

The next event was the Bangalore Stakes in which competitors had to jump four hurdles and pick up five flags. The course was about two furlongs and the first home with all the five flags was adjudged winner. This was a very interesting race and had to be run twice owing to indecisive result in the first try. In the second Mr. J. R. B. Branson won closely followed by Mr. W. S. Bickham.

The third event, Cheroot and Costume Race, ladies' nomination, gentleman to gallop to their lady partners who had a parcel containing a costume. This they had to put on and then ladies lighted a cheroot for them and they were to remount and ride round a given course to the finish with the costume properly on and the cheroot alight. This caused a considerable amount of amusement. Most of the riders had difficulty in mounting their horses owing to the latter being startled at the unusual costume and the small parcel they carried. Mr. J. H. Cardew, nominated by Miss Lorrimer, had an easy win.

The fourth event was another ladies' nomination event, Bean Stakes, in which the gentleman had to carry a bag of beans to his partner who counted the same and wrote the number on a piece of paper. The first to finish round a short course with the correct number to win. Captain P. Heffernan, nominated by Mrs. Chettle, was the winner.

The last and quite an interesting race was the Rekla Race. This was also a ladies' nomination race. In this race ladies chose reklas for their partners who drove them to the start and then raced to the winning post. A great deal of merriment was caused. The reklas were followed by their owners, urging their animals with loud shouts, Mr. H. N. C. Campbell, nominated by Mrs. Jackson, won just by a head from Mr. T. R. S. Mackenzie, nominated by Mrs. Fenton. After the sports were over Mrs. Miller gave away the prizes to the respective winners.

A correspondent writes:—The first paper-chase of the Secunderabad season took place on Saturday on the R. A. Course which was carefully and cunningly layed by Captain Chance, R. A. It afforded a capital gallop and there was a big field. Among the many present were the Resident and Mrs. Pinney and most of the inhabitants of Secunderabad and Trimulgherry were among the spectators. Those taking part in the chase are too many to enumerate separately, but among those I noticed particularly were: Captain Chance, Mr. Brook, Mr. Adam, Mr. Jackson of the 29th Lancers and Captain Dayrell, who was riding a fast little grey which, though small in comparison with the gunner horses, did good work. Mrs. Rettie was also riding a fast horse and came in well. Among the other lady riders was Mrs. Wilfrid Dayrell, who looked exceedingly well, riding a decidedly fast little mare and we are sorry to learn that her recent accident prevented her taking a prominent part in the chase. Mrs. Birch was also out and riding well as usual.

At this season of the year when there is such lack of amusement in Calcutta the public should indeed be grateful to the Bioscope for the entertainment provided. At the Electric Theatre one can always be certain of an excellent programme. There are two performances daily, an entire change of programme twice a week, and an hour and a half can be profitably spent in the comfortable and well appointed little Theatre in Corporation Street. The programme at the latter part of last week was most attractive. In addition to a very interesting film illustrating the Harvesting of Oranges, and the usual comic pictures, we were shown another of the popular Cowboy series and three dramas were put on. "Captain Kate" gave us some remarkable pictures of wild animals in their haunts and methods of trapping and netting lions and leopards: "Craven Hearts" introduced a big fire with all the excitement attaching to the appearance of the Fire Brigade: and "Dido Forsaken" dealt with incidents founded on the story of Aeneas' sojourn in Carthage. On Saturday another fine programme was given and we cannot speak too highly of the film entitled "Auld Lang Syne." This is an exceptionally fine film founded on Burns' poem and enacted amidst the lovely scenery of the Highlands. "The Porcelain Industry" was most instructive; the Cowboy drama introduced a fight with Indians and a thrilling escape over a canyon with the aid of a lariat: "The Long or Short of It" was a clever film of a type the carrying out of which the lay mind fails to fathom; there were a number of comic items and the weekly English gazette giving the King's visit to Cardiff, His Majesty's Inspection of the S. John's Ambulance Brigade and other notable events in England and on the Continent.

London Week by Week.

London, Friday, 20th July 1912.

We have been heat-waving throughout the week and the talk has been of little else than "degrees in the shade" and our adjectives have mostly been those which qualify hot things and hot places, from Turkish baths to Hades. And the worst of it is St. Swithun's day came along on Monday and ne'er a drop of rain and the temperature 89° in the shade. Although the prophecy that what the weather is on 15th July so it will remain for forty days is regularly falsified, the superstitions will be fortified by the weather expert's report that "there is no sign of the approach of any unsettled weather." It is, however, impossible to forecast the weather for more than a few hours ahead. Even ere this letter is posted our umbrellas and mackintoshes will be in use.

Of course the papers are printing all the time-honoured twaddle, the medical man's advice, the tailor's hints, what Tom, Dick and Harry think and advise and we are told daily how we ought to order our lives, just as if before the ink was dry on the piffling stuff there might not be hail and snow. To many poor souls the severest trials of life during three or four days fine, rich, rare, joyous hot weather is finding out what they should put into their precious tummies in the way of solids and liquids. The recommendations of the experts are so contradictory. The vegetarian tells us that meat is a poison, and that a proteid biscuit and a lettuce leaf are enough for a man's dinner. A carnivorous apostle has now arisen in the French Academy of Science who says that everyone should eat plenty of meat. It is all very embarrassing.

No one can play the part of Mr. Facing-both-Ways in such a dilemma. No one can be both a meat-eater and a vegetarian. Professor Perrier's advocacy of a meat diet is supported to some extent by another Paris professor, who has ascertained that the livers of ducks fed on vegetable food are much bigger than those of ducks fed on meat; and most people know what an enlarged liver means. Many who a week ago were preaching the gospel of lentils now, with the fear of hepatic disorder before them, look lovingly on the steak when it is red.

But here is some more dietetic advice. Two eminent German professors are responsible for saying that the average man would have more joy, energy and brain power if he consumed more chalks An increased demand for plaster of Paris images will probably be one of the consequences of this scientific approval of a chalk diet. The new therapeutics will shatter our old-world beliefs. It has been popularly and erroneously supposed that chalk taken internally is injurious, and that even when mixed with water and called milk it lacks the sustaining properties of the genuine product of the cow. Zealous but utterly misguided officers of health have gone so far as to forbid its sale. Now that Germany has taught us better, we shall doubtless change all that, and a movement for emancipating dairymen and milkmen from the fetters of ignorant prejudice may be confidently looked for. "Try our calcareous pick-me-up" should become a familiar appeal.

perspiring Londoners of burrowing habit had a thin time on the underground railways.

Simultaneously, at about a quarter past eight at night, all the trains on the District Railway and on the Bakerloo, Piccadilly and Brompton, and Charing Cross and Hampstead "Tubes" came to a standstill. The "Tubes" were instantly plunged into complete or semi-darkness, as all the lights in trains, stations, and lifts—with the exception of the emergency lamps, always kept burning on the platforms—went out. The cause of the breakdown was the fusing of some of the high tension transformers at the generating station at Chelsea from which these railways obtain their power.

Trains were at a standstill for nearly half an hour on the District, Piccadilly, Bakerloo and Hampstead railways. In each case the lights were restored a few minutes before the re-starting of the trains.

Several of the trains stopped in the tunnels between the stations, and many women passengers were alarmed by the sudden change from brilliant light to darkness. Their fears, however, were quickly allayed by the conductors lighting the oil lamps with which each carriage is provided.

On the District Railway alone some sixty trains were stopped, the entire system between Barking in the east, and Ealing, Harrow and Hounslow in the west, being affected. At St. James' Park Station the porters lit a number of lamps and ranged them like a row of footlights along the platforms. On the "tube" railways some of the passengers in the trains at a standstill in the tunnels got out of the carriages and walked to the nearest station. Hundreds of passengers in lifts about to ascend or descend had to alight, as the motive power was affected by the breakdown. A few lifts going up or down at the time remained suspended in the shafts for many minutes with imprisoned loads of passengers. Of course some young people got a certain amount of fun out of it, others completely failed to detect the least trace of humour in the situation but then they were not amourously inclined and had no reason for shunning the light.

Lloyd George's idiotic Insurance Act was publicly burnt in Finsbury Circus a few days ago to the accompaniment of hearty booing by 2,000 City clerks and other workers. The burning took place during the midday meal hour. From the balcony of the offices of Messrs. Tinling, Chartered Accountants, Mr. Hease of the firm of Henry Douglas and Co., made a speech, declaring that it was an outrage on British workers to compel them to subscribe against their wishes for benefits which they did not desire. A copy of the Act, saturated in methylated spirits, was held in a pair of fire-tongs and set fire to. Three groans were given for Mr. Lloyd George; a few persons on the edge of the crowd retaliated with three cheers. A copy of the Act was publicly burnt in Trafalgar Square last evening, and subsequently 10,000 persons attended a meeting in Hyde Park, where a resolution condemning the Act was enthusiastically passed.

Meanwhile, chaos is already established; mutiny, strikes, insubordination and impudence is rampant among the lower orders. Lloyd George: What a worm! What a sight for gods and men!!

A new phase of suffragist militancy has begun, and it takes a form which all sober students of the movement, whatever their opinions on the political issue, have honestly dreaded for some time. That form, in plain words, is outrage. Murder and arson are, it seems, to be the new weapons of self-emancipating woman, who is finally to prove the fitness of her sex for political responsibility and paramount power in the shaping of national destinies by the adoption of the weapons of criminal anarchy. Mr. McKenna has escaped the explosive placed in his room at the Home Office, and Nuneham, Mr. Lewis Harcourt's beautiful house near Oxford, has escaped a fatal conflagration. But the woman Drummond and the ape-man, Keir Hardie, twin apostles of hysterical lawlessness, have outlined in their Hyde Park orations the future of the militant movement, and have plainly threatened the resources of the calendar of crime. It is unnecessary to say that this madness can have only one result. It kills every chance of woman's suffrage in this country for many years to come.

Lord Curzon called attention in the House of Lords yesterday to the project of a trans-Persian railway to India. The Government, he said, had agreed in principle to the construction of the line without the authority of Parliament. The line of 2,500 miles was estimated to cost £20,000,000, and would affect the security of India, our communications with the East and Anglo-Indian trade with Persia.

In his view the line was not wanted. The country by agreeing to it would surrender the control of the route to India by land. Nothing that could be said in favour of the railway would justify the country in risking the security of India.

Lord Morley, in reply, said the picture drawn by Lord Curzon was so imaginary and exaggerated that he was at a loss to know how, after the recent speech of Sir Edward Grey, Lord Curzon could have taken up the attitude he had. There was no doubt the scheme was promoted in Russia, but it had had no support from the British Government beyond the fact that the proposal was presented to them and they had consented to examine it. They had committed the Government and Parliament to nothing except to this examination.

The whole question of the route of the line and the terms of administration and control were matters which Parliament and the country could consider more effectively when they had a definite scheme before them. The Government had not designed, and did not design, to shut out all foreign enterprise from Persia. They had no right to do so.

Lord Lamington said there was no advantage to be gained by the proposed line, and there was every possible risk. Lord Inchcape associated himself with Lord Curzon. The funds at the disposal of the Government should be spent on the railways of India and not wasted on a silly project of this description.

Lord Crewe said it would be dangerous to introduce an absolute veto. If—it was a very big if—the money was forthcoming for the making of the railway we should be able to secure that it should be made in the way least detrimental to our interests. He had no desire to spend a single shilling of Indian money on the project.

The range of mechanical invention in the executive production of music has been given another expansion, and a new region of delight has been opened to the man who has music in his soul, but little or no technique at his fingers' command, by the invention of a self-playing violin. The new instrument, which is styled the Phonoliszt Violina, is a sister-invention to the famous Phonoliszt Piano, and, like the latter is introduced by Keith, Prowse and Company, Limited, of new Bond Street. Its construction is a marvel of ingenuity. A real horse-hair bow attached to a circular metal band operates on three carefully-selected violins, producing a very beautiful and full tone, the pressure being varied to produce the most delicate gradations, while mechanical fingers are worked by pneumatic pressure, and all the delightful effects of staccato, glissendo, vibrato, etc., are secured in a way that makes it difficult to believe that one is not listening to a human artist of ripe accomplishment. The instrument can be used either for solos or in conjunction with the Phonoliszt piano, which afford it a quite ideal accompaniment, and as the whole range of music for the violin and piano will be gradually brought within their sphere of influence, it is obvious that this new achievement of mechanical playing will make a wide appeal to music lovers.

"The Ideal Wife" is on at the Vaudeville, and a mighty poor and unconvincing thing it is. The ladies of Milan were much admired by Stendhal, who was no bad judge; but that was a century ago, and they seem, if Signor Praga is to be believed, to be less admirable now. According to this Milanese satirist, it is useless to expect fidelity in a wife; the best that you can hope for is that she shall deceive you with tact and not allow her little love affairs to interfere with your fireside comforts. Thus Signora Campiani combines a shock of solid domestic qualities with the passionate fervour of a grande amoureuse, her husband profiting by the stock and her lover by the fervour. It seems a neat distribution of the lady's personality; unfortunately, she overdoes it. She inflicts her domestic endearments on her husband and her passionate fervour upon her lover in and out of season, and as they are both busy men they are much worried. When her husband wants to be studying the share list she wants him to give her her coffee out of a spoon, and she examines her lover's blotting-pad to see if he has been writing to any other ladies. It is the lover who gets tired first, and he escapes, though not without "scenes"; for the husband there is no escape—no, not even divorce, for the dear stupid fellow never once suspects anything or anybody. Take her all round, as wife and as mistress, we have seldom encountered a more tiresome person than Signora Campiani. She is played at the Vaudeville by Miss Ada Potter, who does not attempt to give this disagreeable character any redeeming feature. Mr. Clarence Blakiston and Mr. C. M. Hallard, who are respectively husband and lover, look very uncomfortable over the whole business, and no wonder.

IN SEARCH OF A KEDDAH.

I had always wanted to see an elephant catch, and when I heard that the keddahs were coming up into our hills for operations last cold weather, I determined that I would not let them depart without having been present at one catch at least. The cold weather wore on, however, and brought me no nearer realizing my desire until suddenly one morning in April my brother announced that business would take him out a couple of marches in the direction of the keddah sahib's camp, and he added casually "we may get in for a catch." "We must get in for a catch," I amended mentally, and went off to make preparations for the trip.

We started on a hot sticky morning, for April in these parts is a warm month, and walking (our method of progression in camp) soon became a weariness to the flesh. However, we had our ponies to fall back on, and though riding over the steep and stony ups and downs is not much pleasure, yet we were very glad to make as much use as we could of the little animals, especially up the stiff climb up to our first halting place 3,000 feet above and fourteen miles away from head quarters. Here our attention is generally enchained by the view of rolling hills and gorges on all four sides of us, the sunset over the river affording a very fine sight. But this time on arrival we were amazed to find a tent pitched and two strange sahibs enjoying afternoon tea. Visitors in that part of the world being an entirely unknown luxury, they produce a sensation almost amounting to indignation—something of the same kind to that of the irate landlord at Home who finds trespassers in his preserves. However we found that they too were in quest of a keddah, and so we shook hands amicably over it and spent a pleasant evening together in spite of the fact that already the first of the chapter of accidents had overtaken us, namely, that my pony had gone lame and one of our servants had succumbed to a bout of malarial fever common to all in these hills.

Work would detain my brother here till the afternoon of the next day, while the strangers were to push on as soon as light, so we said goodnight and goodbye in one, sending our respects to the keddah-sahib by them, fervently enjoining him not to "drive" until we could get there.

The next morning found me outwardly calm, but inwardly in a fever to be off, while my brother severely ploughed through interminable cases, apparently oblivions of my impatience.

Four o'clock saw us started. The lame pony had been sent on ahead with the coolies, so I was reduced to sharing the elephant with the sick servant—the kutki being a steed I appreciate so little that I prefer to walk as a rule. We had a thirteen-mile march before us, and the prospect of a fine moon, but we had forgotten one thing in our calculations, i.e., the jungle fires. At that time of year the whole of the cultivated parts of these hills is one lurid blaze of burning jhums and our path lay through the thick of the fires.

At 5 o'clock our troubles commenced with the increasing darkness, which lent a force and terror to the roaring crackling flames and blinding smoke, rendering parts of the road veritable gates to an inferno. Such at least was the opinion of Siliguri—our elephant. The first roar and crackle close to the road when we had already come about five miles sent her wheeling round and off best foot first for the last camp. In vain she was stopped, and turned at them again and again; in vain she was hooted at from behind, prodded in the head, urged on in loving tones by the mahout now in tears; in vain she was allowed to turn her back to them, requested to negociate them backwards; nothing was of any use. She was not going that way—not she.

I had naturally long since left my perch behind the mahout and joined the persuading throng below. I sat in stony despair, though I couldn't help laughing at the orderlies, etc., as they scuttled off or dodged precipitately when her heart failed her after a forward step or two, and she came backwards with a run.

At last a brilliant idea struck somebody, and that somebody (my brother) struck a match and proceeded to put the idea into effect. This was to collect a trail of jungle along the path right up to within an inch of Madam Siliguri's tail and then set fire to it (not the tail but the trail), in order that at least the terrors behind might equal those ahead. This took time, but after a little coaxing and blowing, behold a beautiful little blaze reaching from her very hind feet quite ten or twelve yards along the path we had come. Then the shouting, whacking coaxing wheedling was started again. Madam Elephant made a step forward—paused—wheeled suddenly! Horrors! What was this roaring and crackling on this side also? Then one terrified squeal and a frantic rush, and she was safe in comparative peace and darkness on the right side of the conflagration. So much for one difficulty overcome, but alas! nine more miles remained, and we had not covered half of one when another and a worse fire barred the way. Of course the elephant was round, and off at once, and this time she was more obstinate than ever.

A high wind and scarcity of portable jungle made our last method impossible. Indeed we only tried it in a half-hearted way this time, as knowing we had nine miles more with at least as many fires, probably it would have taken us until the next morning to drive the elephant through them all. We gave it up as hopeless therefore, hoisted the sick servant up on to the one and only pony, left the refractory elephant and tearful mahout to shift for themselves, and prepared to tramp it.

In spite of putting our best feet first the road would not slide past as quickly as it might, and it was nearly 10 o'clock before a welcome twinkling light across the valley told us that dinner and bed awaited close by us. On arrival we were almost too tired to feel the full force of the blow that awaited us, namely, that the keddah camp had moved off that very morning, leaving as sole trace of their existence a note urging us to hurry on, as the drive was fixed for the very next day. Hurry on—yes, but where? and how far? To these queries there was no reply, as among these hill people distance is as vague as time. "If you start when the sun rises it will be there when you arrive," is the most definite information procurable, and that, as may be seen, offers a considerable range for variation; in this case anything from ten, fifteen to twenty-five miles might be meant as the distance off of the keddah sahib's camp.

This was annoying enough, but worse was to follow. Next morning no coolies were procurable for love or for money, every able-bodied man in the villages around having been requisitioned to assist in keddah operations. The pony was still lame, the servant still sick and no tidings of the deserted Siliguri. There was nothing for it, but to make up our minds to halt one whole weary day.

The long hot hours dragged through, the thermometer rose steadily, and the flies were frightful. To add to our joys the smoke and dust of the jungle fires had so inflamed our eyes that darkness and perpetual bathing in very cold water was the only means of relief, and neither were procurable in the stifling little rest-house. At last towards the cool of the evening tidings that there would be coolies by next morning raised our spirits, also a note from the keddah sahib to say driving would begin probably next morning. On this "probably" I hung all my hopes, and I could not hope to be there in time for a morning's drive, yet in case it should be put off till later in the day I determined to start in the early dawn come what might, make my way to a rest-camp about ten miles off leaving A to follow when the coolies should turn up. Then, having ascertained the whereabouts of the keddah camp and found any means of transit, and it was not too late, we would go on with only our indispensible luggage, leaving our camp at the rest-house.

The cool grey morning light found me starting off on my little grey pony. The road led through a sal forest and was deliciously shady, pretty, and cool. I started with an orderly, and a rifle for escort, but Billy without a trace of yesterday's lameness soon ambled gaily off with me far ahead.

However I saw nothing more formidable than a glimpse of a startled sambur stag as he bounded into the jungle and heard nothing but the weird calling of the hoolucks as they swing themselves from branch to branch, and before 7 o'clock I had reached my destination and Bill hadn't turned a hair.

There to my joy were two elephants left on the chance by the considerate keddah sahib whose own camp, so their mahouts informed us, was only five miles off.

I took off Bill's saddle and let him graze, ordering the mahouts to get their elephants ready, and then sat down to wait for A. About 8 up, he came followed by the coolies. A quick sorting of baggage ensued; our belongings put on to one elephant; we ourselves climbed on to No. 2, and off we set again.

No information as to the elephant drive could be extracted from our mahout; it may have been yesterday, perhaps to-day or yet to-morrow, so we very soon relapsed into silent endurance of the lumbering plod, plod, jolt, jolt of our steed. On and on we went; the sun was grilling, and was there ever such a slow and clumsy elephant before. We had left the bridle path after a long steep descent through the bamboo jungle, and were laboriously making our way up a stony bedded river. Nine o'clock, ten—eleven had passed, and still no signs of the camp. We had met a few elephants and a couple of men in charge of them, but these were as uncommunicative as our own mahouts, and they too reiterated the five miles fable.

At last close on 1 o'clock we descried a hut or two. Alas! on coming closer, only last night's camp! The sahibs had moved on close up to the stockade this morning we were informed, and at last the eternal "five miles" changed to two. Bracing ourselves up for a few more minutes' endurance we went on. We left the river, now began ascending and descending innumerable thimble-shaped hillocks, jumped perfectly bare, except for blackened stumps, and consequently nice and hot; up one side we went only to slide and bump down the other, every heave and jolt sending one against the very hard wooden frame of the seat and back of the chair with a bang that left one gasping. At last—the very last—a figure in a large topee ran out to meet us, and in a minute we were stopping before two or three nice white tents pitched on a small hillock, each tent having a cool green bamboo canopy well thatched with reeds that kept off the sun and made the interiors very inviting. Stiff-sore and dust-begrimed we climbed down, but felt rewarded for all and everything by hearing that the drive was to come off that very afternoon at 5 o'clock. Tubs and breakfast and long chairs completed the cure and by 4 o'clock we were fresh and anxious to begin.

No one in the camp was allowed to make any noise and a sort of expectant hush pervaded the atmosphere. The herd we were told had been surrounded three days ago and followed up as they grazed to a valley not half mile away. The ever-narrowing circle surrounding them consisted of coolies posted a certain distance apart who kept their positions night and day careful to make no noise to disturb the animals until the stockade should be ready. This latter we could see plainly from our hillock, as it was only a stone's throw from the camp, though down in the valley considerably below it. At four o'clock we had tea, and then went down to inspect the stockade. It consisted of a stout palisade of logs planted upright in the ground touching each other about 20 feet high and forming an oval enclosure with a long gradually widening passage or funnel leading up to the gate.

The enclosure measured about 100 feet across the longest way, and the funnel was two or three hundred yards in length; the stockade walls are traced by numerous buttresses of logs placed in such a way as to stand almost any outward pressure, while cross beams are also placed within to ensure it also against inward pull. (I should mention that the sides of the oval being composed of an irregular number of straight sides and not one curved line makes the resistance against inward force very great.) Both are necessary as will be seen.

Inside both stockade and funnel the jungle is left standing, and the outside of the palisade is "masked" with green boughs until almost indistinguishable from the thick jungle around.

At the opening from the funnel to the yard is a huge and clumsy-looking but ingenious contrivance, which can be let down inside on a pivot effectually trapping the animals once in.

Close to the stockade up in a tall tree was a tiny bamboo leaf hut reached by a long skeleton ladder, and in this airy abode we spectators were to take up our position while the keddah sahib with his crowd of beaters went off to start the ceremony.

Each man has a bamboo rattle or a whistle or ancient blunderbuss or some implement capable of emitting hideous sounds when required. Our host was provided with the small whistle with which to give the final signal. His part is to start the coolies, lead them, keep with them and generally superintend the operations. And if, as sometimes happens, a tusker bolder than usual takes it into his head to investigate the cause of the hullabaloo, then his position may become exciting. The beaters indeed only armed with a rattle not infrequently meet their death in this way.

The peaceful evening hush over everything only broken by a whispered remark or two among the silent crowd of beaters send a thrill through me, and brought my excitement up to fever pitch as we climbed up into the nest and watched our host and his men file off and disappear into the jungle.

We had not very long to wait. A shrill whistle broke the stillness and pandemonium seemed upon us. Shrieks, shouts, banging of guns, whirring of rattles, crackling of fire lines for a moment drowned everything, but immediately a still louder crashing directed our gaze downwards just as out of the jungle at our very feet outside the funnel stockade, and all burst a poor scared female elephant, and her two helpless calves. One glance of despair around she cast, and then as we shouted aloud in our excitment off she lunged in an anything but graceful manner and disappeared in the jungle opposite followed by her bellowing and unwieldy offspring.

But our attention was at once diverted back to the stockade, for "here they come," "here they come," and sure enough with crashing dust and trumpeting come the whole herd full tilt, down the funnel, through the gate, and it isn't till the gate is down, while the ground still echoes with the thunder of that mad gallop that the poor foolish beates realize that they are caught in a trap.

In less time than it takes to write we were down our ladder across, and up on the logs of the palisade while the coolies hastily buttressed up the gate with spare logs in the same manner as the rest of the wall. Quick as we were by the time we could look in again not a scrap of standing jungle remained inside. Every vestige of green was trampled into the mud. There they were—a herd of some five and twenty all told—little ones and their mothers—tuskers young and old—one or two very fine maknas or tuskless males and one gonesh, a fine old fellow with only one tusk considered a great prize as Rajahs pay long prices for these thinking they bring luck.

Poor beasts, they were a pitiable sight. Huddled together, butchas all underneath, terrified, bellowing and seething round, round and round, trying to get away from the terrifyng clamour, and sights around them by burrowing under each other's huge bodies. Every now and then one of the bigger ones would raise his trunk, and with a scream of fury make a rush for the wall making one retire somewhat hastily from one's position on the top. If the charge seemed very determined or directed at a weak spot in the palisade, it was generally met by a blank cartridge or even a peppering of shot in the elephant's face which sent him back in disgust. It was very comical too to see some of the half-grown little fellows bustling with rage, running round the fence, feeling with their trunks for any chink or crevice enabling them to get a hold, or else standing upright on their hind legs like the dancing elephant on a Xmas card—feeling along the top of the logs for something on which to wreak their wrath. Luckily it didn't occur to any of them to give another a "leg up," or they might have turned the tables nicely on us.

But it was the small butchas who aroused our pity most. Hidden away almost entirely under the never-ending seethe of gigantic bodies, why they were not trampled to death is a mystery. One little fellow of woebegone opera bouffe aspect we promptly christened Billy. He was not more than ten days old we were informed, and he scarcely even came to the surface, but his whereabouts was plainly indicated by his unremitting bellowings. Indeed we discovered that Bill and one or two like him were responsible for all the hideous remonstrances in every note and key—roaring, trumpeting, and screaming, which would seem by rights to proceed from the biggest tuskers.

At last it began to get dark, and we had to tear ourselves away from the fascinating enclosure. We therefore said goodnight to the kuthis, though poor beasts it must have been anything but a happy night for them judging by the sounds of woe which reached our ears as we retired to early bed, for 5 o'clock next morning was the bookum if we wished to be present at the tying up.

The gray dawn found us all up and impatiently waiting for the "konkies" as the tame elephants who play the chief part in this ceremony are called.

The behaviour of the wild herd was much the same as the night before. They were a little quieter perhaps and certainly looked dejected. The charges also were fewer and more spiritless, but all the same the enclosure did not look quite a safe place for an outsider to stroll about in, and I was impatiant to see how the tying up was to be accomplished.

This proceeding, which would seem to an outsider the most dangerous and thrilling performance, seems, in reality a most simple affair. Having seen it I once and for all relinquished all my opinion of the sagacity of the elephant in his wild state, though I do not, of course, deny that he is wonderfully teachable when tame.

This is how it was done.

About a couple of dozen steady old konkies each with a mahout on his neck armed with a long slender sharp-pointed baboo are ranged up in a solid phalanx in the funnel facing the gate into the stockade.

The gate goes quietly up at a given signal, and one after the other in slip the konkies quietly and quickly until the row is formed up again, this time inside the gate which is shut down. At first the wild herds seems scarcely to realize the presence of the tame ones, and when they do the majority of them treat it with something like apathy. A tusker or two will come out to reconnoitre, and may even make the beginnings of a charge—but he at once finds a tusker as big as himself in front of him with the additional advantage of having something on his back capable of inflicting sharp pricks on his sensitive trunk from a long way off. Few elephants will tackle a bigger one than himself, and our wild tusker having been all night without food or water and having been badly scared besides, feels in no mood for a pitched battle.

Meanwhile the row of konkies has turned round and presents a solid row of tails to the dumb-founded wild ones, and this solid row edges quietly along backwards till they surround the whole herd and are pressing them against the stockade; then each mahout having marked his man a process of edging up and separating him from the rest is quietly observed until after a short time of apparent inaction, when to all appearances wild and tame were simply exchanging greetings—one suddenly finds to one's astonishment that each large or formidable member of the wild herd is tightly wedged back to the stockade between two konkies as large and as strong as himself and together of twice the weight. This is the secret of the whole thing. Weight and weight alone conquers the proud spirit of the gaint among wild beasts. Once jammed tightly in between two tame elephants his head to their tails he is helpless—all he can attempt is to take off the ends of those same tails, and for this the mahout has to keep a sharp lookout. Very soon he is tractable enough to admit of the mahout's getting down, and in a trice behold a great rope collar fastens his head to the top of the palsade, while both hind feet are fast to the bottom of the posts.

Then he is left to his own devices and they go calmly on to the next. These devices consist of such boundings, haulings such lashing and fuming of the beast with his enormous strength that one marvels that either the stockade does not break in with a crash or the animal tear himself to pieces.

The curious thing about the whole is the way in which the wild elephants seem to absolutely not notice the presence of the mahout on the necks of the tame ones. How easily one thinks they could put up their trunks, seize the man and have him off and trampled underfoot before one could breathe. But they never take the slightest notice of them and the deceitful konkies in offering friendly advances to their wild brethren either cannot or certainly do not seem to give them any warning.

The mahouts themselves seem quite fearless; they go about the business in a calm, quiet, unconcerned fashion. Of course they are mostly old and tried hands at the work, and it doubtless needs a watchful eye and ready presence of mind as well as more skill than one fancies. Of course among some herds are occasionally absolutely intractable beasts (the herds whose capture I witnessed were contemptuously summed up in the one word "moorghies" by our host), but when one runs amuck and threatens loss of life he is generally shot down without quarter by the sahib. Quickly, as the work seems to proceed, we found it was 1 o'clock before the last was made captive, and evening before the enclosure was empty.

The leading off of the refractory captives was sometimes very comical and this too is accomplished by weight.

Master Elephant has his huge rope collar fastened to a rope which passes round a tame one's body. His heel ropes are fastened to one or even two other elephants, who give him a prod or two behind with their tusk to help him along.

Once out of the enclosure the prisoner makes frantic rushes for the jungle, but is sternly restrained and half dragged and half-pushed along willy nilly to the encampment, where he is fastened to a tree, given food and water, if he is good and left to eat out his heart alone.

A walk round this encampment formed the last feature of our most interesting visit. Next morning saw us saying goodbye to our hospitable host preparatory to starting back for our own camp, feeling that all we had seen had well repaid us for all our trouble and toil, and the chapter of accidents that had befallen us when in search of a keddah.

Mother, sympathetically: "What's the matter darling? Does your foot hurt you?" Little Girl: "Well, mummy dear, Sissy said she'd lost a drawing-pin, and couldn't find it anywhere, but I fink I've found it for her!"

A Practical Demonstration.—Arriet—"I ses to her, 'I don't want none of your lip,' I ses; an' she ses, 'Oh, you're no lidy!' an' I ses, 'I'll soon show you if I ain't,' I ses; an' you can take my word, I' ad 'er 'ead in the mud 'fore she could think!"

Fishing.

A DEVONSHIRE LAKE.

Dartmoor and Exmoor are quite unlike Scottish moors it one respect: though well watered by numerous streams they possess no lakes. This absence of lakes is a real drawback to an otherwise perfect county. The little moorland trout would grow to a good size if only they had spacious tarns to disport themselves in.

As it is, the Dartmoor steams, though they are full of fish, are unable to provide enough food for their inhabitants. The trout in consequence are wretchedly small.

In the low ground there are a few small lakes, but they are mostly artificial, and mud bottoms make them unsuitable for stocking with trout.

There is a pretty little artificial lake of this description near Newton Abbot, which I am permitted to fish in through the courtesy of the owner.

This sheet of water is set amid charming woods, and in June its banks are gorgeous with rhododendrons. There is a little island on which rhododendrons are grown in a solid mass, so that when they are in flower, the islet looks like a huge bouquet floating on the water. This lake is very shallow except near the dam which forms one end. The bottom is mud and so there are only course fish—pike, roach, and perch.

I looked forward to having some good day'e roach fishing, but my first try has proved disappointing.

I made some paste, and taking my tackle and pet roach rod, cycled to the lake. It was not difficult to find a nice pitch at the embankment end with an open bottom and over five feet of water.

I ground-baited with pellets of paste and soon brought some roach on the scene. As was to be expected, the first couple caught were little fellows, and I was confident that better fish would follow.

To my astonishment and disgust I went on catching small ones, and after I had taken twenty-two, none of which reached a quarter of a pound in weight, I gave up and went to try the little brook which runs into the lake at the top end.

Here I found a charming little pool with a miniature waterfall which made a fine eddy. This was a spot to find a trout if any existed.

Full of hope I sent a tempting worm curling round the eddy. There was a bite, and I lifted out, not, a trout but a diminutive perch. Again and again I tried and got six more perch but never a sign of a trout.

I then went to the shallow side of the lake, where the water was brilliantly clear in the bright sunshine, and saw shoals of roach, all under a quarter of a pound. Apparently both roach and perch are infinitely numerous but very small.

A careful examination of the stream which goes out of the lake showed that it contained some half pound roach, and for these I hope to try another day.

The mud bottom is particularly objectionable in the encouragement it gives to eels, always common fish in South Devon. The presence and ravenous hunger of eels was early proved by a half-pounder actually taking my paste bait. Eels never touch past unless they are very numerous and hungry.

Six or seven miles from Dartmouth there is a very celebrated lake called Slapton Lea. This is a sheet of fresh water of about four hundred acres in extent and is caused by the bar of a small river silting up and blocking the exit to the sea. Slapton Lea is in fact only separated from the sea by a narrow strip of sand. It is full of pike and other coarse fish and affords most excellent sport.

Besides being noted for its fishing, the lake at Slapton is very interesting on account of the rare wildfowl which visit it in the winter.

American Sport.

THE BUFFALO.

Though it is the custom to speak of the American bison as extinct, there yet remain a few specimens to represent the innumerable herds which, themselves forming part of one greatest herd, swayed across the American plains into Canada and back to Mexico like the ebb and flow of an ocean tide. In the Mackenzie and Athabasca country of the North-West Territories there is a large herd of wood-buffalo, none of which remain in the United States, where only a few of the wild plains-bison are preserved in the Yellowstone Park in Wyoming. In 1907 Montana could boast of over 200, but these were then sold to Canada; and there is, besides, an increasing number of semi-domesticated animals. The large herd of wood-buffalo has drifted so far north that the cramping effect of an unparalled immigration has not become unbearable, but the others—the lighter bison of the plains—apparently miss some vital element in their surroundings. The long journeys from Texas to Manitoba, with the consequent change of climate and pasture, and the sense of companionship which their ancestors found as they moved together in armies of hundreds of thousands a generation ago, are denied to-day to creatures which inherit the instinct of centuries of gregariousness and migration. It is a curious fact that the buffalo which wintered in Canada and had to scrape the snow away with their feet in order to reach the grass were often found to be in better condition at the end of winter than those on the borders of Mexico, owing to the early winter frost retaining the juices in the naturally made hay.

Buffalo grass became hay if left to itself, but was of little use if cut for that purpose, and the heat of the sun robbed the grass on the southern ranges of a great deal of its body-building qualities. Moreover, though the buffalo appeared to move north in one huge army, they made the return journey in separate herds and companies. The trails they made were always the most direct to a given point, and were perhaps centuries old, for so hard were they that they carried no vegetation for many years after the soil had been turned. The Republican river was one of the last strongholds of the bison, but it was in the neighbourhood of the Arkansas that the herds attained their largest size, of which one is said to have had a front of 200 miles.

In the year 1876 the white hunters had split the main body into two parts, of which the smaller ranged in the north between the Yellowstone and Missourie, and the other from the Arkansas into Texas and New Mexico. Ordinarily there was no great danger to be feared from individual bisons, for they are mild, inoffensie beasts with a strong dash of obstinate stupidity in their constitution. With ordinary care they could be approached easily, and a man with sufficient nerve might do so even on foot. He would be received with an immense amount of bluff, manifested in snortings and distended tails, in shaking manes and threatening pawing of the ground; but if he held his course, even though some old bull with lowered head should charge the too-daring man, he would find that the buffalo's courage was spent in less than fifty yards. The same futile attempt to bar the invader would be made by one after another, courage failing each champion in exactly the same way until the whole herd became demoralised and fled. A buffalo bull often attained 2,000lbs. in weight, and carried a mane that sometimes touched the ground and interfered seriously with the use of his eyes. When feeding, the cows and calves were surrounded by the bulls, and it was the male parent who felt most concern for the welfare of the young. Mamma Bison was somewhat advanced in her views, and did not trouble much about the nursery. When closely pressed, the calves would push their noses into the herbage, however scanty, and shut their eyes like an ostrich. Buffalo were not easily frightened by objects in the direct line of march, but let them see anything strange in the rear and they would turn round en masse to charge the unknown from sheer panic.

There were various ways of killing the buffalo which depended on the question whether the hunter was out for meat and clothing, or for sport, or dollars. It was to the latter cause that the annihilation of the buffalo is due; for, wholesale as was the slaughter by the Indians, the killing was done according to rule, with very definite limitations, in order to secure meat and robes for the winter. No Indian slaughter had any effect in depleting the immense numbers of the bison. The Blackfeet made use of a plan known as "the deep blood kettle." An immense corral was constructed, with an outlet at the brink of a precipice, towards which the buffalo were attracted by the "medicine-man," who, wearing a buffalo mask and clothed in a buffalo robe, approached the herd close enough to rouse their curiosity.

As soon as the inquisitive creatures had begun to follow him, he quickened his pace, until they had reached the corral. Then, and not till then, the ambushed hunters would leap from their hiding places, shaking robes and uttering piercing cries to stampede the frightened animals to their death.

The Sioux Indians practised "the surround," and up to within a few years of the extinction of the buffalo, refused to allow any white man to take part in it. The "dog-soldiers," or tribal police, young men especially detailed to preserve order, were authorised to administer severe punishment to any misguided person who should fail to carry out the orders of the chief exactly. The surround was made for the benefit of the community, to which the interests of the individual were subordinated.

The main body of the Indians advanced towards the herd in horse-shoe formation, the post to windward being reserved for the head hunter and his party, from whom the buffalo received their first intimition of danger. At the first sign of retreat, a general attack from every side was made upon the frightened animals, which, becoming dazed and bewildered, could find no way of escape, and were usually arrow-struck to the last head. Ten minutes sufficed to kill as many as three hundred in this fashion. The Northern tribes sometimes hunted on snow-shoes, when the buffalo fell an easy prey to the Indian in need of tent-coverings, saddles, thread, or weapons of war.

However, all these methods were the result of necessity, and the idea of sport was less than secondary. The real hunting in which there was enough danger to spice the most blase existence, lay in "cutting out" and running down.

Individual bison offered little sport, but to ride after a small herd of twenty or thirty cows and six months' calves gave the very best. The Indians never abandoned their primitive weapons for the rifle, but the white pioneers, naturally, used powder and bullet always.

Before starting "for meat," directions were given to men with wagons to follow on the trail to the place where it would be waiting for them. This done, the riding party would approach within a mile of an idle herd of some half-thousand, halting to practise the time-honoured custom of "tossing the feather," to learn the slant of the wind. Then everyone stripped. Everything that might hinder—hats, coats, bullet pouches—was laid aside, and with one handkerchief tied round the head and another round the waist, powder cartridges stowed away in the waistcoat pocket—or what corresponded to it in the hunter's attire—half a dozen bullets "throwed in the mouth," guns charged, and ramrod in hand, the trained ponies were mounted, and their ardour restrained to a walk until within a couple of hundred yards of the sentinels.

For the great beasts moved like an army, with vedettes thrown out in parties of four or five, which kept in touch with the young bulls. On alarm, the whole body closed up round the cows and calves.

The Indian carried his bow, which he could use so rapidly that he could keep a dozen arrows in the air at the same time, in his left hand. In his right was his quirt, which he plied mercilessly. Otherwise, he gave little attention to his mount, which would of its own accord gallop into position and allow his rider to bury arrow after arrow up to the feather. Indeed, so much interest did the ponies take in the hunt that they would only do their best with a hunter who did not miss. The little animal not more than thirteen hands high, was instinctively afraid of the big one, and always kept his eye on the quarry, ready to leap like a cat to avoid the thrust of the powerful horns.

But collisions often took place, the skill of the pony notwithstanding, "for in these extraordinary and inexpressible exhilarations of chase, which seem to drown the prudence alike of instinct and reason, both horse and rider seem rushing on to destruction as if it were mere pastime and amusement."

That a rider should be parted from his horse was an accident to be expected. Consequently an essential of the pony's equipment was a raw-hide lasso, which was not coiled and hung on the saddle horn, but was trailed along the ground for some distance to make it easier for the hunter to recover his pony. A man on foot was in imminent danger of being trampled to death by the rest of the herd: otherwise it was seldom that men were hurt by buffalo in such a chase, for the animals were in flight; but often it happened that men were killed or seriously injured by their horses falling with them in rough and broken country. All considerations of safety were forgotten. "The knowledge of the danger, the rush of the horse, the thundering tread of the flying brutes, the turmoil, the dust, the uncertainty, and, above all, the near proximity and ferocious aspect of the lumbering throng furnish excitement enough to set wild the man who is new to it."

Nothing would stop stampeding buffalo except fire or firearms. On one occasion a herd of 4,000 lost half its number when crossng the River Platte. The foremost beasts became mired in quicksands; but those in the rear pressed forward, falling and climbing over their sinking companions, until the farther bank, nearly half a mile across, was reached. But it was only at the rivers that his instinct failed him, for he could travel at speed up and down precipices where a horse would inevitably be killed.

Let the end be passed over quickly. The buffalo hunters for robes and ivory for the Eastern market shot the great beasts down as they went to water, or picked them off quietly as they grazed. In some places one could walk all day on the dead bodies of the buffalo killed by the hide hunters, of whom in justice let it be said that it took a good man to winter on the plains in February, when the sheen and thickness of the fur are at their best. But it is not easy to speak calmly of those degenerates from Europe and the Eastern States who chartered special trains on the Kansas Pacific Railway right up to an unsuspecting herd, where they had only to step from the cars upon the solid earth to butcher to their hearts' content.

"I counted 112 carcases inside of a semicircle of 200 yards radius, all of which were killed by one man from the same spot, and in less than three-quarters of an hour," said an eye-witness.

Within a space of twelve year the buffalo in their millions were exterminated from the plains.

NEWMARKET.

They are becoming accustomed to cheer a Royal horse home at Newmarket this season. From the Craven Meeting the King's horses have steadily improved, and not a fixture has passed yet without the Royal Colours being successfully carried. At the Craven Meeting Pintadeau and Thrace both earned brackets; at the First Spring, Pintadeau dead-heated, with Tidal Wave; at the Second Spring Pintadeau was again to the fore; and at the First July Meeting a fortnight ago both Dorando and Le Lac added to the record. Last Tuesday it was again the turn of the latter, who placed the valuable Dullingham Plate to the credit of his Majesty. Results:—

The most up-to-date system of keeping accounts and organising big Banks in Europe has been adopted by the Bank.

As to the prospects we do not wish to say much by way of "flourish," but we hope to give at least 6 per cent. in the first year. Thorough calculations have been made of the profits likely to accrue and we are now in a position to assure intending Shareholders that there is no likelihood of loss and we hope that the profit will be sufficiently large to give very handsome returns on the Capital invested.

CRICKET.

Gentlemen v. Players.—Played on a wicket on which batsmen always held the upper hand, the first match of the season between representative elevens of Gentlemen and Players had at the Oval last Saturday to be left drawn. At the drawing of stumps on Friday all the progress that had been made was the completion of an innings on each side, and with the players holding a lead of only a dozen runs, the game stood in a very even position. At only one point yesterday, when the Gentlemen in their second innings had lost Spooner, Fry, and Day for 80, did there seem the slightest chance of a definite result being arrived at, but for all that the cricket never lacked interest and afforded plenty of enjoyment to the large Saturday crowd present. By staying together for eighty-five minutes and adding 84 runs for the fourth wicket Evans and the Jam Sahib placed their side in a perfectly safe position, and thenceforward a draw became inevitable. Spooner, the Jam Sahib, and Evans all batted in nice free style, but what pleased the crowd most before Fry declared the innings closed was the display given by Jessop. Driving and hitting to-leg with characteristic power he obtained his 41 out of 63 in half an hour, his figures including seven 4's. At half-past four Fry applied the closure, leaving the Players 234 to get to win in an hour and three-quarters. As with the pitch still perfect the Gentlemen had no more prospect of dismissing their rivals in the time than the Players had of making the runs, a tame, uninteresting finish seemed in prospect, but some remarkable hitting by Hobbs rendered the closing stage of the game as attractive as it was noteworthy. Quickly setting down Hobbs drove with tremendous vigour and scored at such a pace that he made 51 out of 55 in twenty-one minutes, while Rhodes was scoring 2, the other 2 runs being extras. Hobbs could not, of course, maintain this rate of run-getting, but when an easy catch at mid-off brought his dazzling innings to an end he had obtained in rather less than forty minutes 51 of the 72 put on for the first wicket. His figures included eight 4's. Hayes also batted freely. At ten minutes to four the game was suspended for twenty minutes as a mark of respect to the memory of the late Tom Richardson, whose funeral was then taking place at Richmond. Full score :—

ETON vs. HARROW.—After a struggle thoroughly worthy of the traditions of the match, Eton beat Harrow at Lord's by six wickets. It had been agreed beforehand to play on until half-past seven on Saturday if necessity arose and the light remained good, and as events turned out, it was only with twelve minutes to spare that Eton gained their victory. There can be no question that the winners were very much the stronger side, but the Harrow Captain C. H. P. Blount played a remarkable innings of 137, and received such valuable help from Dickinson, a left-handed batsman of untiring patience, that at one time Harrow seemed almost certain to save the game. Eton's first innings was quickly finished off in the morning, only eight runs being added to the overnight score of 352 and then Harrow going in before half-past eleven against a balance of 152, stayed in until about a quarter past five, for a total of 295. For a long time they made a great effort, but there was a collapse after Blount was out, the last five wickets going down for 25 runs. Eton had to pay a very high price for missing Dickinson in the slips when he had scored 10. That batsman maintained an impregnable defence for three hours and a half, he and Blount putting on 129 for the third wicket. Blount apparently thinking his side safe, became a little excited after completing his hundred, hitting out freely. If he had restrained himself for half an hour or so, the match would, in all probability have been drawn. Batting for a little over three hours, he hit, in his 137, eighteen 4's, four 3's and eight 2's. Left with 144 to get in rather less than two hours, Eton set to work with a will. They had three of their wickets down for 62, but Burrows played a fine game, and with excellent assistance from Davies and Rawstone, won the match. There was a great attendance, but the demonstration at the finish was not so ardent or prolonged as might have been expected in the case of a victory gained against time. Full score :—

SCOTLAND vs. AUSTRALIANS.—The game between Scotland and the Australians at Perth had to be left drawn, the Australians when stumps were pulled up, wanting only 64 more runs with seven wickets to fall. Scotland who had made 29 for the loss of one wicket in their second innings at the close of Friday's play, went on batting until seven wickets were down for 126, when the innings was declared closed. Left to make 264 to win, the Australians lost two wickets cheaply, but Mayne and Bardsley then obtained such a mastery over the bowling that 152 runs were added for the third wicket. Full score :—

TENNIS.

OXFORD vs. CAMBRIDGE.—The University Singles match was played at Lord's on Saturday, the 13th instant, between the first strings, the Hon'ble J. N. Manners (Eton and Balliol, Oxford) and Mr. H. W. Leatham (Charterhouse and Trinity, Cambridge). Mr. Manners won by three sets to love, 18 games to 8.

The first set, which lasted about 40 minutes, was a very close fight. Mr. Leatham established a lead of two games to love. Mr. Manners drew level and led at 5 games to 4, 40—15, with a fairly short chase to defend. He took a return which would have lost the chase: Mr. Leatham then won the stroke and pulled the game out of the fire. Mr. Manners, however, won the deciding game and the set, and in the next two sets Mr. Leatham was never in sight of victory. He played weakly in the third, hitting rather wildly and without judgment.

As a whole both players are well above the average of University form. It was quite a good game to watch, with plenty of long rests; but the ball was hit far too much on to the end walls, and in the case of hazard side chases the tactics were crude in the extreme. The striker-out generally attempted a shot for the galleries, irrespective of where the server was standing, or else a slow boasted force. The obvious and easy stroke, a hard and low full-pitch on to the dedans battery, was practically never attempted. Score:—

	1st set.	2nd set.	3rd set.	Total games.
Mr. Manners ...	6	6	6	= 18
Mr. Leatham ...	5	2	1	= 8

J. Fennell was the marker and H. Lambert called the faults.

There was a match between the second strings afterwards, and Cambridge had some compensation for their defeats by a victory in this game, for the Hon. A. Windsor-Clive (Eton and Trinity) beat the Hon. G. W. Grenfell (Eton and Balliol) after a close fight by two sets to one (2—6, 6—2, 7—5).

Oxford have now won the Singles 18 times to 35 by Cambridge.

POLO.

ARMY CUP—SEMI-FINAL ROUND.

The Dragoon Guards, Past and Present, beat the Hussars, Past and Present, by five goals to four. The sides were:—

DRAGOON GUARDS.—Captain G. Heseltine, Captain C. B. Hornby, Major H. Mather-Lannowe, and Captain C. F. Hunter (back).

HUSSARS.—Captain G. MacG. Dunbar, Major P. D. Fitzgerald, Sir Charles Lowther, and Mr. B. A. P. Schreiber (back).

The ground was in capital order and really fast for the first time for many weeks. The game produced a most interesting struggle and the two teams were never more than a goal apart. Low scoring in the conditions of yesterday and with players of this class engaged always means a keen fight. The score was level at each stage until the Dragoons managed to score the deciding point in the last period.

The winners had the advantage that three of their side were at one time members of the 4th Dragoon Guards regimental team and consequently knew each other's play, while only two of the Hussar team, Mr. Schreiber and Captain Dunbar, have had much practice together. This advantage probably turned the scale, for individually the Hussars showed as good form as the winners. There was no score in the first period and the Hussars made the first point in the game during the second period. Neither side scored in the third period and at the end of the fourth the Dragoons had drawn level at one goal all. The evenness of the scoring and of the run of the game was maintained until the last period, when the Dragoons managed to gain and retain an advantage of one goal.

The game produced some capital gallops and the ball travelled up and down the ground with the frequency which is enjoyed by the spectator. Major Fitzgerald received a nasty blow on the face just before the end of the game, but he was able to continue playing until the bell rang. Although more perhaps might have been made by both sides of their opportunities at goal, both winners and losers on the whole did themselves full justice and Sir Charles Lowther has not been seen to better advantage this season.

Hunting.

POONA AND KIRKEE HOUNDS.

A good field turned out to meet the Master on Sunday, the 28th ultimo. A jack was put up in a nullah to the left of the Alandi Road and followed for half a mile: there was then a check and hounds picked up the line of a fox but were whipped off. The Master made a clever cast and hounds were soon on the scent of the jack and streamed away in the direction of the Nasik Road at a fine pace. Here they again checked but drawing back they put up a jack which got up in their midst and was quickly pulled down near Dighi village. Several of the field then made for home but some stayed on and were treated to a fast run from Dighi to Kalas ford, where the jack was lost.

Last Thursday the 8th milestone on the Nasik Road was the rendezvous and a field of forty met the Master. The country beyond Bhosari village was first drawn and a jack went away in the direction of the old Bombay Road over some excellent going. A turn to the right brought him back to the road, but he was headed and made for the north-east again, taking cover in a clump of prickly pear. He was soon forced out of this and killed in the open at the foot of the hills after a good run of 50 minutes, the last couple of miles being covered at a hot pace.

Athletics.

THE SPIRIT OF SPORT.

An interesting comparison of the English and the American attitudes towards sport is made by a correspondent of the Standard.

The very mild successes of the English athletes in the Olympic Games at Stockholm (he writes) have made doleful reading for the followers of athletics in this country. The report that the Englishmen sit up till midnight in the cafes while the American competitors are safely under lock and key with the trainer on guard has driven good patriots to the point of despair. And to top it all, the American Press exults over our non-success, saying "poor old England!" and prophesying defeat when Armageddon comes.

But to me—and I think many other people will share the view—the idea of the English athletes sitting down in the Stockholm cafes until midnight is a cheering and inspiring thought. It shows that they were not oppressed by the weight of the responsibility they carried as the representatives of an athletic nation at the meeting of the world's athletes. One knows that at the sound of the pistol they strained every nerve to win, but the heats and finals of the day over they put all thought of them aside, and were content to treat their visit to Stockholm as a holiday. Sitting up at the cafes until midnight is no doubt, going too far, but it is at any rate a more human picture than that of the Americans, looked up under the disciplinary gaze of the trainer.

Herein lies the essential difference between the outlook of English and Americans on the question of sport. The Englishmen, while desiring with all their hearts to win, look upon the whole thing as a game, and contrive to get a lot of good fun out of it. It is much better to win than to lose, but if a better man comes along—well, accept the fact with the minimum of heartburning, and say it was a good race anyhow. But with the Americans there is only one end in view, no matter how it is achieved and that is to win. Any idea of competing for the love of the game or for "the sport of the thing" is not for a moment countenanced. An American sprinter is just as serious and businesslike about his race as an American speculator "bulling" or "bearing" stocks on Wall Street.

American athletes are manufactured just as systemtically as automatic cash registers. The same keen selection is applied to their production as is lavished on telephones, typewriters and other manufactures typical of American genius. The youth at the college who shows that he has some aptitude for jumping is specialised in jumping just as carefully as Mark Twain's famous frog. He is not allowed to devote serious attention to any other branch of sport, his mission in life henceforth being to see that no Englishman beats him at a jump. And the same rule holds good throughout American athletics. In England there is none of this. Like Topsy our athlete just grows, and the whole world of sport is open to him from polo-jumping to spillikins, with nobody to say him nay.

Athletics in America are organised like a department store. It is essential that the other competitors must be beaten or there would be no profit in running the show. And acting on the same principle a larger amount of money is sunk in the enterprise. "Money talks," and you cannot have crack long jumpers or sprinters unless you are prepared to lay out the cash. Expensive and autocratic trainers are engaged and the promising college youth who is so constructed by nature that he is capable of making a terrific burst across the grass for a hundred yards or so knows that his future is all right and that money will be spent freely to get the last ounce of energy out of him. As a consequence of all this, the United States possesses a large team of athletic specialists trained each in his own department to win, and made to perform for the delectation of the great American nation.

And in this matter of mere winning we must not forget the capacity of the American nation for tremendous enthusiasm. The heats in the Presidential race, just concluded, show us what can be done in this direction. The American can work himself up to a pitch of excitement and emotion that leaves the quieter Briton standing. Whether it be a brand new religion, Republican Congress, or the winner of a beauty competition enough enthusiasm and to spare can instantly be found for the cause in hand. The terrific earnestness and emotion of a crowd following the changing fortunes of a baseball match is a phenomenon never approached in this country of football. And the American athlete is just the same as his followers. He is capable of a sudden "burst" of energy and exaltation, inspired by the overwhelming desire to beat the other fellow, such as is never felt by the most ardent English runner or jumper.

It all comes down to this: which is the more important, the game for its own sake or another fifth of a second knocked off the record? There is no doubt about which is the American point of view. Are we right in clinging to our own view that the true spirit of athletics matters more than the mere winning of races?

Personally I think we are. The fact that an English competitor is beaten by a fifth of a second by an American is no reflection on the physique and vigour of the English race as a whole. The real object of athletics is to improve physique and stamina, and it is better to have a lot of people excelling in sports than to have a few who are superexcellent judged by inches and fifth of seconds. There are more people who engage actively in games in England than there are in any other country. In America the crowd yells encouragement to the carefully nurtured specialists, and lets its own exertion end there.

Far from there being any cause for despair, I think we may blow a modest blast on our own trumpet. And it is that England is far and away the most "sporting" country in the world; not merely in the number of people who play at games, but judged by the generous spirit we extended to our successful antagonists. A remarkable example of this "sporting" spirit was shown last year. A French aviator won £10,000 in a race round England, and was most enthusiastically applauded for his great feat. But that is not the point. We were so filled with admiration for the gallant struggle of the second man in the race, also a Frenchman, that we raised £2,000 by subscriptions and presented it to him as a mark of our esteem for a good fighter. And such a thing, I think, would not have happened in any other country in the world. In some, indeed, the winning foreigner would have been lucky to escape with his £10,000.

Finally, in spite of the fact that we do not specialise, Jackson, of Oxford University, made a world's record in the 1,500 metres.

FOOTBALL IN CALCUTTA.

The six-a-side Football Tournament—the first on so big a scale ever held in Calcutta—began on the 29th ultimo when three games were played. The games were of 7½ minutes each way with an interval of a couple of minutes between. The off side rule does not come into force and corners count when goals are level. On the opening night the Black Watch "A" team had a comfortable win from the Y. M. C. A. whom they beat 3 to nil—Pattison, O'Donnell and Egerton being responsible for the scoring. Sova Bazar had the best of their match with the High Court, and won by 2 goals (both scored by D. Mookerjee) to nil. The Black Watch "B" team and the Nationals played a very level game. Each team scored a goal.—Lomas for the soldiers and Peters for the Nationals—but the Black Watch having a corner to their credit were thus victorious. On Tuesday, the 30th ultimo, the Mohan Bagan Reserves beat Lansdowne by 2 goals to nil after a fast and well-contested game: the Y.M.C.A. "A" team accounted for the Police by the only goal scored for which Goonjer was responsible: Greer Sporting beat St. Xavier's by 1 to nil after having matters all their own and missing numerous chances of scoring. On the 31st the Orientals knocked out the Rovers by 4 goals to nil, and both the Eastern Bengal State Railway teams were disposed of. The Port Commissioners defeating the Railway "B" team by 2 goals to 1 and Rangers "B" team beating "A" team by 3 to 1. On Friday, Kumartoli beat Chinsurah Sporting by 2 to nil; the Telegraph Store Yard beat Bow Bazar by 5 to nil and Presidency College and the City Athletic drew with a goal and a corner each. This match was replayed on Tuesday when the City Athletic won by a goal to nil. On Friday, Calcutta won both their matches comfortably, "B" team disposing of the Post Office by 3 to nil and "A" team putting out the Medical College by the same margin: the third match between Mohan Bagan and the Middlesex was a most exciting affair, the Indian team eventually winning by 2 goals to 1. Four games were down for decision on Saturday. The Medicals "B" had matters all their own way and easily beat the Bristol United "A" by 5 goals to nil. The Rangers "A" quenched the aspirations of Chowringhee by 2 to nil. Dalhousie "A" beat La Martiniere by 3 to nil, the school team having hard luck in not scoring. The Middlesex "B" met Bristol United "B" and were lucky to win by 2 to nil, their display being most disappointing. On Tuesday two games were played in the second round: Mohan Bagan "B" beat the Port Commissioners in a fast and exciting game by a goal to nil: and Black Watch A beat Greer Sporting by 1 goal and 2 corners to a goal. Results at a glance:—

Middlesex "B" beat Bristol United "B" 4—0.

Second round.

Black Watch "A" greer sporting by 12s to 19.
Mohan Bagan "B" beat Port Commissioners 1-0.

So far Mohan Bagan, Calcutta "A" the Black Watch "A" and "B" and Middlesex "B" seem likely to go through the later stages, they certainly should win their matches this week.

The Sarma Cup, the Trades Cup, the Elliott Shield and scores of other competitions are now in progress and will probably carry on the soccer game till October.

Rugby has begun, but the numerous small soccer competitions as formerly prevent clubs making a show in the games under the handling code. It is good news that the United Services have decided to enter the Senior League again. Their names was absent from the list of fixtures published last week, but they now make the fifth team in the League, the revised fixture list of which will be found below. The United Services won the Indian Field Cup in 1910 and 1911, but it remains to be seen what they will do this year. Captain Treachard, and Messrs. Duncan, Leonard, Chase, Pargiter and Boome we hear, will turn out again and most of the new players are expected to give a good account of themselves.

The Customs should do great things and in a practice game against the Police last week, they shaped exceptionally well. The Police have seven officers in their team, Mr. Lowman and Mr. Roddes being both useful. They were not quite up to the standard of the C.F.C. on Monday, however, and were defeated by 22 points to 8. The Barbarians are led by Minet and are mainly composed of the old Nomad team which gave several good exhibitions a couple of years ago.

Calcutta is happy in having a big field to pick from this year and should win the League while in the Cup Tournament we anticipate some fine games in which the premier Club should figure prominently. J. A. Brown, Studd, Dompster, Carrie, Cunningham, Cumberlidge and Cole are all available once again and some of the new men who have been tried are very promising. The Club met the Police on Monday evening and had the best of their opening League encounter. The first half was fairly evenly contested, the C.F.C. getting over with two tries and the Police with one. Studd and Leonard scored for Calcutta and Wilson for the Police. The attempts to convert were unsuccessful. On changing ends, the game was very one-sided. Calcutta pressed throughout and Studd, Brown, Cunningham and V. Sherman all got over with tries, Cunningham converted two of these and the Police failing to score again were beaten by 2 goals and 4 tries (22 points) to a try (3 points). This score might have been larger had Calcutta taken advantage of several opportunities of scoring from dropped kicks. The other game in the Senior League between the Customs and the Barbarians, and the junior match between "H" Company Black Watch and the Messengers were postponed.

The United Services having entered a team in the Senior League the dates have been altered and are now as below.

5th August Calcutta vs. Police, Calcutta ground.
5th August Barbarians vs. Customs, Customs ground.
7th August Calcutta vs. Barbarians, Calcutta ground.

At Tureberg the second control Kolehmainen was still in front, with McArthur second, Gitsham (S. Africa) third, Lord (Britain) fourth and Ahlgren fifth. Sollentuna was the half way mark and here Kolehmainen had lost the lead to Gitsham; McArthur, Lord and Speroni next in order, followed by seven Americans. Returning through Tureberg Gitsham was still at the head of affairs, Kolehmainen second, McArthur, Speroni, Jacobssen, Lord, Piggott (U. S. A.) Tewanima (U. S. A.), Strobino (U. S. A.) and Smith (U. S. A.) next. At Stocksund Kolehmainen had fallen back and Gitsham continued in front with McArthur second, Strobino third, and Jacobssen fourth, Duffy (Canada) fifth, McArthur and Gitsham entered the arena together and in a splendid finish the former breasted the tape first and collapsed. Gitsham was second, Strobino third, Sockalexis fourth, Duffy (Canada) fifth, Jacobssen sixth. Then came Gallagher (U. S. A.) Exleben (U. S. A.), Piggott (U. S. A.), Forschaw (U. S. A.), Fabre (Canada). The first Britisher to appear was H. Green (thirteenth) Lazaro the Portuguese fell unconscious 7½ kilometres from the stadium and was removed to hospital, where he subsequently succumbed without regaining consciousness.

BULLS: A clergyman took occasion to reprove some of his congregation for sleeping in church, and observed that it was one of those sins people committed with their eyes open. An old lady in church after a crowded service was heard to say: "If everybody else would only do as I do and stay quietly in their seats till everyone had gone out, there would be no crush at the door." An Irish Methodist clergyman, in an outburst against the Devil and all his works, consigned his Satanic majesty to "the bottom of the boticmless pit." An Irish servant girl wrote home to her sister that "the people she was with were so rich, that their flannel petticoats were made of silk. And there is another domestic "bull" worthy of a place in any collection:—Mistress: "Why don't you keep the baby quiet, Kate?" "I can't keep him quiet, ma'am, unless I let him make a noise." The old church-yard notice must also find a place in this collection:—"No one buried here but those living in the parish."

THE famous professor beamed on his East End audience as he commenced his lecture on the beauties of English poetry. "Ah, friends," he murmured, "there is more even in the question of finding rhymes than you might imagine. It is easy to fit rhymes to some words, as, for instance, 'police,' 'release,' 'theft,' 'left.' But what do you get for 'burglary?'" "It depends on the judge, gov'nor," piped a woman from the body of the hall. "Yesterday my husband got five years."

"THE LITTLE HORROR!"—"Mamma, our governess can see in the dark." "How do you know that." "Last night out in the hall I heard her tell uncle Jack that he hadn't shaved!"

MOTOR MEMS.

LONDON, Friday, 12th July, 1912.

THE result of the Grand Prix race at Dieppe was a notable triumph for the British motorcar industry in general and for the Sunbeam Company in particular. Of the 47 cars that started on Tuesday roughly one-third were of British origin, and the same proportion held for the 15 that succeeded in finishing within the time limit on Wednesday, so that British makers proved themselves able to hold their own with foreign manufacturers, many of whom have devoted years of special attention to the production of racing cars. The performance of the Sunbeam cars, which were practically standard models such as are used on the road every day for touring purposes, was especially meritorious. Three out of the four that were entered survived to the finish, gaining the third, fourth, and fifth places, together with the Coupe de l'Auto and the team prize. So far as the last was concerned they were first and the rest nowhere, for although a number of firms entered three and four cars, the Sunbeam Company were the only makers to be represented by more than one car in the final list. The uniformity with which their cars ran was also remarkable. Two of them completed the 20 circuits of the course within 1½ minute of each other, so that their speed was almost identical at about 65 miles an hour, while the third ran throughout at practically 60 miles an hour. On a broader view the most striking feature of the race was the comparative inefficiency of the very large cars. Judged by cylinder capacity, the Peugeot which secured the Grand Prix was not much more than half the size of the Fiat which gained the second place, and the latter with 6,500 c.c. extra capacity actually took 12½ minutes longer to complete the course. The Sunbeams, again, had a cylinder capacity less than half that of the Peugeot, yet the winning car of the three was only 40 minutes behind it in time and attained an average speed only some three miles an hour less. These performances on the part of small cars of 12-16 h. p., and in essential respects ordinary touring models, suggests the question whether it is worth while to construct huge cars which are useless for any purpose but racing, and which are both costly to build and extravagant in tyres and petrol. It may be mentioned that the victorious Sunbeam cars will be on view all this week at the company's London showrooms, 72, Bond Street.

IT is not altogether surprising that appliances which enable the engine to be started from the driving seat have not evoked great enthusiasm among motorists who employ paid drivers, for they may be excused for thinking that the task of turning the ordinary starting handle does not impose any undue strain on the muscles of their servants. Even the owner who drives his own car, though he may have recollections of unpleasant moments when the accidental stoppage of his engine has obliged him to descend from his seat and indulge in the uncongenial operation of "cranking up" in the middle of a crowded street, may reasonably doubt whether it is worth his while to add to the weight and complication of his car for the sole purpose of avoiding such occasional annoyances. But the inducement becomes greater when a double purpose can be served, as is the case with many of the "self-starting" contrivances now on the market. For instance, those which, like that fitted to the Adams car, depend on compressed air are available also for inflating the tires, and thus save the owner-driver from a good deal of unwelcome exertion in the event of a puncture. In the acetylene appliances which are so popular in America the gas performs the double duty of starting the engine and providing for the lighting of the lamps, which are an indispensable and constantly-used adjunct of every car. In the Cadillac car the same double service is fulfilled by electricity, and a dynamo, which is normally engaged in generating current not only for furnishing light but also for igniting the explosive mixture, reverses its function and rotates the crank-shaft when the engine has to be started, acting as a motor driven from the battery of accumulators it has itself charged. This arrangement allows the driver to enjoy the comfort of being able, by moving a switch on the dashboard, to control all his lamps and to start the engine from his seat; but it evidently puts a heavy responsibility on the electrical equipment, and it is natural to ask what happens should the dynamo break down. The answer is that, although the starting handle is not carried permanently in position, it can quickly be fitted in place, when it becomes possible to crank up in the ordinary way, and that the ignition is meantime served by the accumulators, or, if they should be run down or otherwise disabled, by an emergency set of dry batteries. The standard Cadillac engine has four cylinders with a bore and stroke of 4½in., and is of 32 h.p. by R.A.C. rating, so that it has an ample reserve of power to meet the comparatively small demands of the electrical apparatus.

The number of different alarms attached to motorcars at the present time seems ever on the increase, and the sounds they give forth range from a whistle or bell right through the whole gamut of sounds, and include grunts, snorts, orchestral music, post horns, etc., We do not question the fact that in the present congested state of our streets distinctive warning signals are a necessity, but the different sounds of existing alarms now on the market rather tends to defeat the object for which they were produced. In the old days practically every motorcar was fitted with a hooter, and though the note might vary in power, yet the sound was generally the same. Pedestrians and horses, immediately they heard a hooter, were aware what was coming and made way. To-day, however, the diversified sounds made by approaching cars have a tendency to cause confusion among pedestrians, and it is impossible to expect horses to become familiar with such a large number of warning signals. We hold the opinion that were the notes of a horn, whether electric, bulb, or exhaust operated, to be standardized pedestrians and horses would more readily recognise its note and the amount of confusion reigning at the present time would be considerably reduced.

One often meets the man who boasts of his mileage on a particular car, with a specified type of tyres. At first sight his figures look impossible beside those of others with which they are compared. And yet his statement is doubtless accurate. The method of driving accounts almost wholly for the difference in wear.

The careful driver is he who imposes upon tyres the minimum stresses, he never skids his tyres, and takes corners carefully. These two points are of paramount importance in reducing tyre costs. Taking a corner at too high a speed not only abrades the tread of the tyres, but it sets up rigorous strains upon the fabric itself, which in a short time assert themselves to the detriment of the whole structure. Even worse than this, in its immediately destructive effect upon the tyre tread, is skidding. And this is largely due to improper control of the throttle or accelerator. The actual difference in cost is hard to specify exactly, but it must be obvious to the thinking man. The tyre tread which has skidded for a few turns has lost more in actual material than the travel of some miles would have taken from it. For the heat energy of mechanical motion, which would have propelled the car for some considerable distance on its ball bearing wheels, has instead been reconverted into heat by the destructive attrition of the tyre surfaces in contact with the road, therefore 'ware skidding.

Some Useful Notes.

When a tyre, otherwise perfect in condition, wears away abnormally, the trouble is almost invariably caused by the wheels being out of line with one another. In such cases the wheels should at once be corrected. Bad alignment also gives a car an increased tendency to skid, because the wheels are always slipping when the car is running. For this reason motorists should have their wheels periodically tested for alignment.

The washing of a car is a task which needs to be carefully carried out; good paint and the best effects of the painter are ruined through careless washing. A room with a temperature of 50 degrees is the best in which to wash and keep vehicles, also one in which clear cold water can be used with freedom. After washing, the body should be dried with a soft, well-worked chamois skin. Warm water should not be used. It is not advisable to use soap, except on the undersides of the mudguards.

One thing that a new car-owner or driver should impress on his memory very firmly is that water is a good conductor of electricity, and that, consequently, no part or parts of the ignition apparatus should ever be wet unless it is impossible to avoid it, and then it should be wiped dry afterwards. If the car be washed with a hose and the magneto is wetted it is liable to short circuit across the water inside, with the result that it will refuse to produce the necessary current.

The road wheels of a car should, as mentioned above, be occasionally tested for alignment. This can best be done by measuring the distance between the two front tyres at a certain height above ground. The wheels are then turned about and the distances measured again. If the results obtained are found to vary, the wheels are out of alignment and the cause should be found at once if the tyre bills are to be kept to a minimum. A slight collision will often bend the front axle or the steering pivot to some extent, and this will generally be found to be the reason for the occurrence of the trouble.

The Story Teller.

THE DOCTOR'S PONY.

"Can he jump?" said Corney Keogh, our new doctor. "See here!" and he crammed his pony at the practice hurdle in the compound, sent it flying right and left, and landed sitting in our new flowerbed, while the fat pony picked himself up, and looked at his master with an air of pained surprise.

"Well, that's not quite as well as he can do if he tries," Corney explained, with a grin; "but he's a fine 'lepper' sometimes. Anyway, he can trot."

"Trot, can he?" said Evans. "He don't look like it!"

"That's the charm of it, me dear boy. He doesn't, but he'll trot any pony in this station for six miles along a road any day of the week you like to bring one."

"Well, he don't look it," repeated Evans.

The animal under discussion certainly did not look all his owner described him. He was a fat, placid-looking pony, about 12 hands 3 inches, and spent most of his time dozing outside the hospital while Corney was inside looking at the patients, or outside various bungalows where he happened to be calling.

His name—"Piggy"—pretty well described his nature and appearance.

"He certainly doesn't look like a trotter," mused Evans; "but you can't always tell. Anyhow we'll bring one to trot against you."

Evans belonged to the Horse Artillery Battery, the officers of which prided themselves on being always ready to bet on anything from flies on sugar to the Derby.

We had not many trotting ponies in the station. We mostly kept them for polo and racing; but Evans had a very smart country-bred—The Widow—which was the best all-round pony in the place, and by common consent the battery finally nominated her to trot the redoubtable Piggy.

The conditions were settled on a rousing guest night at the gunners' mess. They were to ride a straight six miles from the village of Patal-Pani along the high road, which was to be considered the course, and not to be left. Stakes 200 rupees aside, and the usual rules for trotting. They were to finish at the tennis grounds, where the band would be playing and tea and things going on. Evans made this latter arrangement. He was engaged to be married, his best girl was in the station, and he wanted to spread himself a bit before her. We were all requested to wait at the home end, and not to impede the race by coming out to look on.

It was a splendid afternoon when the match came on. The band was tomtomming away, a few couples were playing tennis in a listless sort of way, but most of us were intent on waiting for the finish of the match, and getting a laugh at Corney Keogh and his pony.

The competitors had driven out during the afternoon; their ponies had gone before them, and they were due back at about six.

The battery were there to a man, and our men were there, too, in dozens, lining the road; and rupees and quarts of "four 'alf" were in a fair way to change hands in very large quantities. The betting was, of course, in favour of The Widow. Nobody quite saw how Piggy could hold her for a moment; but a few of us, who thought Keogh couldn't be quite such a lunatic as he seemed, backed him in a mild and precautionary way.

Speculation and expectation were at their height as six o'clock came and passed, and at 6-12 by the watch of the gunner who fired the evening gun there was a yell of "Here they come!" and a little cloud of dust appeared in the distance on the straight white road.

Nearer and nearer it came, till to our utter astonishment we saw Corney Keogh trot comfortably in on Piggy. Amidst cheers and shouts of derision he rode up to the gate of the tennis ground, threw his leg over his pony's neck, caught him a friendly pat on the quarter as his syce came up to take charge of the conquering hero, and walking up to the refreshment table demanded a peg.

"Where's Evans?" we all asked.

"Oh! he's back there somewhere," answered Corney, quietly. "I didn't see much of him after we started."

About 6-45 another cloud of dust appeared, and from it there emerged The Widow, a mass of sweat and dust, covered with wheals from head to tail, her flanks a mass of blood; with Evans—his face like a peony, and looking as limp as a wet rag, cursing like any trooper, to the evident and loudly expressed admiration of the assembled gunners and drivers.

"What's happened!" we asked.

"Happened?" he grasped, after putting down a long-peg tumbler, the contents of which had hissed down his throat in one gulp—"happened? everything's happened from start to finish."

It may be better to give Evans' account of the race in his own words, leaving out some of his higher flights of rhetoric.

"You know where the road takes a turn round that plantation about half a mile from Patal-Pani?" he began. "Well, we were going hard round there, I leading easy, when suddenly we came on a bally great elephant, as big as a bungalow, standing right across the road. No horse will face that, you know. The Widow gave a scream, turned round like a tumbler pigeon, gave two bucks, and off she went across country Hell-for-leather, both my stirrups lost, and over cotton soil full of cracks. She went a mile and more before I pulled her up, and then, of course, I had to get her on to that road again, at the place where she went off. But do you think she'd face it? Not she! That idiot of a mahout sat there on his elephant, and grinned stolidly while I cursed and yelled at him till I was hoarse.

"I wasn't going to be done, you know. I got her past, but it took half an hour. I fairly broke my best whip, and cut her flanks to ribbons. Well, I got her going again, but she was in such a fiend of a temper she wouldn't trot, but kept breaking and losing time till I was fit to kill her.

"She gave in at last, and went well for a while, till we came on a herd of buffaloes—dozens of them, as thick as bees on the road, and all across on either side of it. Of course, the hounder in charge was as deaf as a post, and never heard me coming, and the more I yelled the less notice he took, till I swiped him over the head with the remains of my whip; then he got in amongst them, yelled out something, and they all stopped. I had to cut my way through that herd like a cavalry charge—regular Balaclava, in fact; and when I got away again, and along the road a bit, I came up to half a dozen coolie women, with those great long, ten-foot faggots on their heads, legging it along as gay as you please. Well, I didn't sing out to them till I was quite close, then, instead of edging off the road, they all stopped, faced inwards and blocked the road with their blooming faggots, nearly taking me out of the saddle. I cursed them a lot, but bless you, they didn't mind—didn't understand. They only smiled and discussed my personal appearance among themselves.

"It cost me three rupees to get past that lot, then away I went again. We were all right till we reached that well close by the road a couple of miles from here. Just as I got there, trotting strong and well, out flew a blooming pariah dog like a rocket, and off went the mare again across country forty miles an hour, with the dog at her heels yelling and snapping. I cursing and pulling for all I was worth. That lot took another quarter of an hour off.

"Well, you think that was enough for one day, wouldn't you? Not a bit of it! I caught up a woman on the road next, she had about a dozen brass milk-cans on her head. Just as I caught her up, she gave a start and a jump to one side, dropping the whole shoot on the floor with a clatter like the Day of Judgment, and away went The Widow into the side of the road, and landed me into a cactus bush. I am full of prickles now, and couldn't sit down in the saddle for the rest of the journey. Here I am, anyhow. Where's Keogh? Come in? Well!"

"I say, old man," I said to Corney, as I strolled into his bungalow a few days after the race, "how did you do it? Straight?"

"You'll keep it dark?"

"Of course," I answered.

"Well," he continued, "you see my syce comes from these parts, and knows every mother's son in the place that owns a cow, or a pig or a dog, and if, with the aid of twenty rupees in a bag, he couldn't arrange for enough traffic on that road to shame an Irish town on a fair day, well who could?"

"But your pony," I asked; "didn't he mind them all?"

"All what?"

"Why, the elephants, and dogs, and things."

"Mind?" Why the blazes would he mind? He's blind!"

Bore: "Ah! I see you're rather busy now. I'll look in again when you have a couple of hours to spare." The Editor (wearily): "Oh, thanks! Then you'll be present at my funeral."

Guest: "Look here; this mirror is so fearfully dirty that I can't see my face in it." Hotel Servant: "It strikes me you ought to be thankful for that, instead of makin- trouble about it."

Mr. Wirks (looking over the paper): "Cheap, Drug, and and Co. are selling off all patent medicines at half-price." Mrs. Wirks: "Just our luck. There isn't anything the matter with any of us."

Gentleman (who has just picked up a sovereign, to tramp who claimed it): "But how can you prove it belongs to you?" Tramp: "Why, guvnor, you can see for yerself, I've got a 'ole in me pocket!"

THE SUPPLY OF ARMY HORSES.

To the July number of the new journal, The Bloodstock Breeders' Review, Mr. Robert Bunson contributes an important and outspoken article on the pressing problem of horsing the army. The author commences by stating that it is not his intention of joining the flock of advisers and advocates of new schemes which would cost the country dear without producing satisfactory results, but that he suggests a means of solving the problem by reviewing the plans adopted by other countries and more especially Germany. It is admitted on all hands that in Ireland the British Government has a horsebreeding country whose capabilities, if properly looked after and encouraged, cannot possibly be surpassed. At the same time he asserts that there is no other country in which horsebreeding has been so mismanaged by Government. "Not with the help, but in spite of Government aid," he writes, "Ireland produces still the best horse, although it is slowly losing ground. It is high time that the right men should appear on the scene and bring about an entire change. Nobody feels this more than the Irishman himself. He deplores the fact that so many of the best mares leave the country and that the 'crocks,' which nobody wants, are left to him for breeding purposes; he regrets that so many unsuitable stallions—serving at a very low fee—are used for hunter breeding; he laughs scornfully at the 'help' given by the Government, the upshot of which is the rooting out of the invaluable native horse and the substitution of a weak breed obtained from the continent."

Mr. Bunson then proceeds to deplore the fact that the old Irish draught horse and the Connemara pony—types of horse of the very finest quality and unrivalled as a stock from which to breed hunters—have been allowed to die out. And yet the Government not only permitted this extermination, but actually aided it by sending hackney and Anglo-Norman stallions into the country with the object of "improving" the native hunter. The remedy, it is urged, is not far to seek, for all that is necessary is the adoption of the remount system which is now working so satisfactorily—in spite of much less favourable natural conditions—in France, Germany, Austria Hungary and other continental countries.

It is stated on the best authority that within a few weeks of the issue of the order for mobilisation the number of remounts that would be required for the British Army would be about 60,000 and that afterwards from 3,000 to 5,000 per month would also be wanted. Where are these horses—which are probably below the real number which would be wanted—to be obtained, expecially in view of the fact that the English reserve of omnibus-horses has now practically ceased to exist? The story of the straits to which we were put during the Boer war in this matter is surely not yet forgotten, and it must aways be borne in mind that several of the markets then open to us would almost certainly be closed in the event of a European war.

The Prussian system of breeding remounts is then reviewed in detail; and, although this is far too long to recapitulate on the present occasion, it may be mentioned that the provision of trained remounts is an essential part of the scheme—a circumstance which doubtless accounts for the relatively small wastage of horseflesh during the great Franco-German war on the Prussian side.

"The Prussian Army now buys every year about 11,000 remounts and, furthermore, 1,000 remounts go every year to the armies of Saxony, Bavaria and Würtemberg Nearly all these are bred by Prussian farmers and bought from them as three-year-olds by the Remount Commissioner. They remain one year in the so-called Remount Depôts, where they are broken to saddle or harness by specially able soldiers drafted to these depôts from all regiments. The remounts go as four-year-olds to the different regiments, where at first they are ridden by the older soldiers and later on by the recruits."

The main object of the Prusian Government is the supply of a sufficient member of stallions of the proper stamp, and to this end a number of stallions have been established in various parts of the country, which serve at headquarters, whence the animals can tour the neighbouring district. In a large area of country the brood-mares to be served by these stallions are owned by small or medium farmers, who use them without exception in ordinary farm work. The Government grants an annual subsidy of £172,341 in aid of the improvement of national horsebreed.

England, however, requires only half as many remounts as Prussia, and as breeding and upkeep are much less expensive than in Germany, an annual grant-in-aid of some £80,000 (in addition to the first costs of founding the studs) would probably suffice.

The present King's premiums are, it is urged, absurdly inadequate; besides which the necessity of a national scheme initiated and carried out by Government is absolutely imperative.

At the conclusion of his masterly and convincing article, of which we are able to give only a very inadequate summary, the author puts the following question:—

"Is there an easy way of furnishing remounts to the British Army? Decidedly, yes! employ the Prussian system in Ireland and the question is solved. And not alone the remount question, but the Irish question as well, because the adoption of this system would mean prosperity for Ireland."

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

The Second Day of the Calcutta First Monsoon Meeting provided very good sport indeed and there was likewise plenty of bustle and brio about the entertainment, very different from the mournful travesty of a race-meeting that is being enacted in Poona at the moment and which has been compared impartially to a garden party and a Dorcas gathering for making woollen waistcoats for the unredeemed cannibal or New Guinea Gazecka! There are nine or ten firms operating in the big ring in Calcutta and numerous other smaller fry in the second enclosure, but we do not, strange as it may sound to some people in Western India, find the moral atmosphere overpowering or ourselves any appreciable distance nearer the ultimate (supposed) goal of all who have anything to do with the turf! The bookmaker, like a good many other things in this mortal existence, is a necessary evil—if evil indeed he is—and in India, at any rate, the owner will find it, and has found it in the past, impossible to get along without him. The totalisator is of no use to the man who has to bet in fairly big money. It is of no use to even the modest bettor who may want, say, his £20 each way on a horse he may fancy, and to the plunger who may not want to bet in anything less than a "monkey" the machine is totally useless, because if A. is the one big fish who is having his bet on in any particular race and B. C. D. E., etc., are the smaller fish who follow A's example A's price is returned by the machine at something like 10 to 1 on! A blind tote might obviate this, but to the owner who has to conduct his stable upon strictly business lines and is compelled to cut his coat according to his cloth it is imperative that he should know exactly what profit he can count upon, what odds he is going to get for his money. It is of no use to such an owner whom it has cost, say, Rs. 2,000 to get his horse to the post fit and well to win a certain race (this quite irrespective of original purchase money) to be able to get—if he is very lucky—Rs. 300 out of the machine! If he cannot know beforehand that he can cover expenses in stakes and bets he obviously is not likely to last very long. It pays an owner to average his money at even 2 to 1 or 6 to 4 if he knows that he can get a fair wager on at those odds and he knows that he is going to get, say, Rs. 3,000 back! The bookmaker pays without charging the owner or the backer for the privilege of having had a bet; the machine pockets 10 per cent. which it promises to ultimately return in the form of bigger stakes: but we rarely hear any more of it! In some parts of the world where there is a big cash-betting public the machine may answer; in India we do not honestly believe that it will ever suffice and the sooner this is recognised in Poona the better. The Indian owner cannot carry on the game on the small stakes that he wins: he is compelled to bet to pay his way and if the means of betting are taken away from him there is only one possible result: he must and he will put up the shutters. In no country in the world is the Ring better controlled than it is in India: welshing is virtually unknown: and the financial stability of all those who are given permission to bet by the Turf Clubs is guaranteed. The Bombay Government in straining at a gnat has swallowed a camel. If it had devoted its energies to putting down the unauthorised and uncontrolled "bucket-shops" in Bombay and left the licensed Ringmen alone, it would have been doing far better work. Sir George Sydenham Clarke, has, however, achieved his end, as he has succeeded in wrecking what was once one of the cheeriest and best meetings in the whole racing year. We hope that His Excellency is gratified by the success he has achieved at Poona!

In the Calcutta big Ring at the Monsoons we have Messrs. Harding, Coutts, Ducasse, Monte, Russell, Pell, P. M. Dass, Jackson, Harris, Pymm and there is plenty of business for all of them, but although the Ring is lively and full of punters we do not suppose that any great damage is done one way or the other at the end of the meetings. One or two people possibly get down, as they will do at bridge or any other game of chance combined with skill, but this is no argument for the abolition of the Ring as a pest and a plague spot upon the earth, for you might just as forcibly argue that because A. has superior information to B. on the stock exchange, or in the cotton or jute market, or has known when to back coal shares and when to leave them alone because they are "stiff as a crutch", that A. should be suppressed and B. put into a glass case and labelled "this side up with care" or "fragile: stow away from the boilers." The whole of this grandmotherly legislation is a farce, and a stupid one at that, with not even a single amusing scene in it. If it is possible by such means as have been employed in Bombay to arrive at a state of affairs that would cause the lion and the lamb to lie down and roll on the turf together, to make them feed out of the same manger and brouse upon the same clover, if it were possible to bring back the Arcadian state when tailors' bills were unknown and a daisy chain and two penny-whistles both played at the same moment (and probably even then very discordantly), were the fashion, if it were possible to handicap all the "clever boys" of this earth back to the Hobos and the Hoodlums—by the simple process of banishing bookmakers and delivering ones-self of a wealth of copy-book platitudes: then we would say, by all means wade in! But as none of these things have happened, or are ever likely to happen so long as poor weak human continues to be poor weak human nature, can we be blamed if we are inclined to say cui bono, or what about it?

Saturday's card comprised six races, three of them over hurdles, a by no means extraordinary proportion during the Calcutta Monsoons, at which meetings jump racing flourishes more than at any other time of the year. We have ere now known there to be four hurdle races and only three flat races in a card of seven. It goes to prove the argument that has so often been put forward that the more jump racing you have the more will it flourish and it is a strong submission in favour of having steeplechasing during the rains and a jump course in Calcutta itself to supplement Tollygunge. The jump racing on Saturday last was exceptionally good and we started the proceedings with the first Division of the Amateur Hurdle Plate, for which seven went out, Farthing Bun and Fame being the only two that were backed. It was, as anticipated,

I claim to have the largest town Turf Accountants' business anywhere in India or the Far East, and I am prepared to back my assertion to the extent of 1 lakh of Rupees and stake the money. This challenge holds good for 1 month from date and is to be determined on the volume of business transacted from 1st December 1911 (the date I opened up business in Calcutta), until August 1st, 1912, all winning wagers naturally having been paid in full on demand. I do not propose to include my Branch establishment at 59, Phayre Street, Rangoon, but to rely solely on 8, Lall Bazar Street, Calcutta.

a match between this pair, as although Jaguar ran well for the first 1¼ mile his condition stopped him when the pinch came and the other two made a race of it. Fame was going every bit as well as his rival up to the last obstacle but on the flat Farthing Bun's superior pace told and she was able to win by half a length with a little in hand. Mr. Evers rode the winner in very finished style and it was the first of a succession of victories, as he appropriated three other races, thus winning four out of the six. If he had ridden Pilot, as it was at first arranged we believe that he was to have done, and had Convent Girl got away, he might well have won the whole card.

The Fort Plate came next and what promised to be an interesting contest was marred by the bad start. The old Carandini gate was used, but things did not pan out much better than when the single-rubber May gate was used the previous week. A good number of the horses engaged in this race had not, so we were informed, seen a gate for some time: but whatever the cause two of them that were backed were late away and some others, not so much fancied, were left. Lasso opened proceedings by charging the ropes and breaking away and Wassail also got entangled, Mr. Kenworthy being pulled out of the saddle. Sandbeck and Isabela both gave a lot of trouble and both were left, as also was Night Rider. Bushey Dame, who was favourite, was away late and was asked to make up her ground at a pace that destroyed any chance she may have had. In any case she was well beaten a good furlong from home. Lasso slipped his field and though Wassail at one time looked dangerous, he was beaten the moment his rider asked him the question and Lasso won comfortably by three-parts of a length. Lady Douglas ran well considering that she has done very little work and Haut Park also performed better than we expected to see him do. The running of both Bushey Dame and Convent Girl may, we think, safely be disregarded as they neither of them got the best of the start.

The August Hurdle Plate produced seven runners, both Sea Lad and Sholto being struck out. It was booked a certainty for Proprietor and so it proved, but he had not quite such a solitary journey in fact as it was expected he would, for The Priory II. was at him all the way and headed him two fences from home for a short space. Superior condition, however, told and Proprietor returned to the charge and, wearing his challenger down, won by a length. The winner had 10st. 11lb. and was in front practically the whole way. This was Mr. Evers' second winning ride. The Priory II. is an improving one and is bound to catch a race with any luck before the season is out.

The Second Division of the Amateur Hurdle Plate drew the smallest field of the day, as only four ran, and of these Finn Ma Coule might just as well have remained at home for he was beaten before they had jumped a fence or, in other words, in the first hundred yards. He is a bag of bones. Reinforcement fell at the first one giving Major Bennett a nasty shaking and he also cut his head open and was temporarily knocked out of time. His injuries were promptly attended to by Dr. Elmes, the Surgeon to the C.T.C., and he is now, we are glad to learn, none the worse. These two circumstances reduced the race to a match between Pilot, who started at even money, and Lady Leonard, who was 6 to 4. It was a close contest and we think the better horse on the day won. Mr. Thomas rode the winner in nice, quiet style and sat still at the crucial moment when Lady Leonard came at him on the flat. Captain Johnston-Stewart's mare ran a good one, but she is a small thing to carry a packet like 11st. She is, we understand, for sale and is just the kind of mare to win the Calcutta Paperchase Cup, as she is a first-class jumper and as handy as a cat.

The Monsoon Plate came next and Chin Chin was picked in spite of the 10st. 9lb. and backed both ways. She, Sea Lad and Wise Hawk were the only three touched to win, though Sholto had a few supporters for a place. Whatever chances Chin Chin may have possessed were effectually extinguished by her jockey's tactics as he took her straight way to the front and raced with everything that came near him. Sea Lad held a nice position throughout and Mr. Evers came at the exact moment and got his run before Williamson was able to get his on Wise Hawk, who was somewhat late away and is notably a slow beginner. It was a very good performance on the part of the winner, who was giving away 12lbs. Wise Hawk was coming up hand over fist at the finish and was only beaten a length.

The Pony Handicap for which a field of ten went out again proved a victory for the Dehra stable as, thanks to Mr. Evers' excellently-timed race, Miss Clare was enabled to win from the favourite May Kenley and the 30 to 1 outsider Ormley, the latter of whom had made most of the running. Miss Clare had 10st. 11lb. and Mr. Evers rode her the race of his lifetime and showed himself a considerably better judge of pace than his opponents.

The Second Extra Meeting at Poona last Saturday looked at one time as if it would have to be postponed on account of rain, but Jupiter Pluvius was kind and stayed his hand during racing hours and the programme was put through without a downpour. The threatening weather, however, kept away a large number of the Bombay contingent and the race special was poorly patronised. Poona racegoers, however, gave the meeting their support, and all true sportsmen are doing their best to help Major Hughes and the executive in their difficult position. Everything possible is being done to maintain the character of the fixture, but the abolition of the bookmaker is a blow from which a recovery is doubtful. That the betting public and the owners do not appreciate the totalisator is evident and the machines had even less support on Saturday than at the first meeting, the largest amount being taken in for a win being Rs. 5,760 and for places Rs. 4,820 as against Rs. 7,370 and Rs. 3,430 at the previous meeting. The system apparently offers no inducement to the owners to speculate and no big commissions were put through on their account. The racing was good and the public managed to get on to winners most of the time.

The Lilliput Trial Plate was the first of the seven events coloured on the programme and brought out a field of twelve, Creditor receiving most support. He ran most disappointingly, however, for after following his stable companion, Sharar, in the lead to the three furlongs he was done with and Sharar went on with Raspberry, Burg and Grequa in close attendance. On turning into the straight Sharar dropped back and Raspberry came away to repeat his win of last week by a length and a quarter from Grequa: there was a good race for second place, Burg being beaten a neck.

Six went out in the Arab Welter Plate and English Mail and Highflyer made all the running. Morea flattered his supporters after half the distance had been covered, but it was only a flash in the pan. At the turn the outsider Makeb came up strongly and nicely ridden by Captain Fell was landed a winner by a length and a quarter, from English Mail, who just squeezed home a neck in front of Highflyer.

The New Arab Novice Plate came next, sixteen facing the starter who got them away to a good start. Fathi Beg was first to show out, attended by Bahiz and Morley. At the half mile Bahiz took command and Fathi Beg and Morley dropped back. Zuheir came through at the turn and challenging Bahiz at the distance soon had him settled, winning comfortably by a length and three-quarters, the longer distance being apparently much more to his liking than the 5-furlong race in which he failed to place last week. Brown rode the winner and scored the first of a series of four successes for Byramjee Rustomjee's stable. Straight Shot, who finished third, paid the splendid divided of Rs. 611 at the totalisator. His rider, Gooloo, had his license taken away by the stewards for interfering with kuhu.

The next item was the New Stand Plate for horses, eleven turning out. Lithosian got away in front and made all the running: Malmsey, Solution and Rubytin were his nearest attendants till they turned into the straight when the order was: Lithosian, Malmsey, Yvette and Metal Boy. Yvette challenged Lithosian at the distance, but in spite of a good effort Lithosian stayed him out and won by half a length. Metal Boy finished third and might have had more to say at the finish had he got a better start. This was Brown's second win.

In the six-furlong Karli Plate for Arab ponies for which there were ten starters the public put all their money on Majeed, who had run well last week, and as it turned out their confidence was not misplaced. Sinclair and Fadro made the running to the turn where Majeed and Baloz came through, the favourite, ridden by Brown, drawing away from the distance and eventually winning a good race from Fado, who ran very well, Baloz third.

The Ahmednagar Plate brought out fifteen arabs and Regent earned another winning bracket and gave Brown his fourth win. Secretary jumped off in front, followed by Bustan, but the latter was very soon done with and Secretary made the pace to the half mile, where he was joined by Regent, Shawcutt and Last Chance. Harry Johnson came through as they turned into the straight and a good race home ensued. Opposite the stands Regent shot to the front and won comfortably by two and a quarter lengths from Shawcutt, with last Chance third and Harry Johnson fourth.

A half mile Selling Plate closed the card with fourteen starters. Magistrate, Tide and Nasbad Pasha made all the running and though the others closed on them at the home turn, the trio came away again in the straight. Nasbad Pasha winning by three-quarters of a length, the same distance between Tide and Magistrate, the latter of whom should run better at no distant date.

The Gymkhana meeting at Kirkee, which had been postponed on account of rain, was successfully put through on Thursday, the 8th instant. There was a shower after the first race, but thereafter the rain held off and a most enjoyable afternoon was spent. There was a large and fashionable gathering, including the whole of Poona and Kirkee society. The Colonel and officers of the 3rd Sappers and Miners were "at Home" and H. E. the Governor's string band was in attendance. The programme of eight races provided excellent sport and a feature of the afternoon was the fine riding of Mr. Corbould-Warren, who rode three of his own horses to victory and also the riding of Captain Fell, who won three times—on his own Selim, on Major Greig's Castaway and on Captain Alderson's Patchwork. The Hunt Cup was won by Mr. Stallman's Silverbolt nicely ridden by Mr. A. Wilson, while the Holkar Purse—the open race—was won by Mr. Baboo's Agent on which A. Ferguson had the mount. Details will be found in our Turf columns.

An attempt is being made to give an extra fillip to racing in Madras by the formation of a Griffin Club, for the prospectus of which we have to thank the Honorary Secretary. The Club has been started to meet the wishes of sportsmen who are not willing or able to pay several thousands of rupees for English or Australian races, but would take an active interest in racing if they could do so at a reasonable cost. A scheme has thus been introduced to purchase ten or more horses of a suitable class for backing or hunting purposes with the object of popularising racing locally. Subscriptions have been invited for Australian Griffin horses at Rs. 600 each landed in Madras. At least 10 subscriptions must be obtained for the scheme to be carried out. A member may take any number of subscriptions, which may also be taken in partnership. An expert committee consisting of Messrs. A. P. Symonds, P. Hannyington and A. H. Steele will choose the horses, which will be a good class of Australian hack about 15-0 to 15-2 and up to weight, which after having been raced will be suitable for hunting, hacking or general district work. Every effort will, of course, be made to choose as level a class as possible. A purchase of this description on a wholesale scale will result in members obtaining for Rs. 600 a horse which would probably cost Rs. 700 or Rs. 800 if bought singly. The total amount subscribed will be spent in the purchase of the horses and no fund or club will profit in any way should there be a surplus. The Madras Race Club has arranged to give three races at the next December meeting to be run for exclusively by Griffins imported under the scheme in question and subscribers must enter and run their Griffins in some of these but shall be under no obligation to run their horses after that meeting. The number of partners in each horse is unlimited and there is every hope that the scheme will meet with generous support. The Griffin Club has been formed under the auspices of the Madras Race Club and has the interest and patronage of the Stewards. All details can be had by anyone interested in the scheme from the Honorary Secretary, Madras Griffin Club, Island, Mount Road, Madras.

The skeleton of Flying Fox, the Duke of Westminster's famous racehorse, bought by M. Edmond Blanc for the record price of 37,500 guineas, is a notable feature of the Horse Museum opened last month in the ancient chateau at Saumur, where the French cavalry school is situated. The plaster casts, drawings, and skeletons trace the evolution of the horse from the Tertiary period up to the present day, and there is a very fine collection of trappings, caparisons, bridles, bits, and spurs of all periods.

As will be seen from his advertisement in our columns to-day Mr. Joe Lee, the well-known Turf Accountant, claims to have the largest town Turf Accountants business in India or the Far East and is willing to back his claim to the extent Rs. 100,000 which he has deposited with the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank. We fancy no one will have the temerity to try and disprove Mr. Lee's assertion.

The Seventh Test match was stopped by rain. On Tuesday the scores stood South Africa 329, Australia 219, but the following day no play was possible owing to rain and the match was declared drawn.

The following are the results of other important cricket fixtures in England during the past week:—

The match between Warwick and Worcester was drawn, Warwick leading on the first innings.

The following matches have been abandoned owing to rain, neither side scoring points:—Derby versus Essex at Derby, Gloucester versus Somerset at Bristol and Kent versus Hants at Canterbury.

The matches between Lancashire and Yorkshire at Manchester, Middlesex and Sussex at Brighton, Notts and Surrey at the Oval, and Northants and Leicestershire at Leicester, all resulted in draws, the first named eleven leading on the first innings.

The South Africans defeated Leicestershire at Leicester by sixty runs.

Kent defeated Notts at Canterbury by an innings and 120.

Northants beat Sussex at Northampton by forty runs.

Yorkshire beat Essex at Leyton by ten wickets.

The matches between Somerset and Worcester at Taunton, and Warwick and Gloucester at Birmingham were abandoned owing to rain, neither side scoring points.

The match between the Australians and Durham, at Sunderland, ended in a draw.

Lancashire defeated Derbyshire at Manchester by 248 runs.

Middlesex and Surrey drew at the Oval, Middlesex leading on the first innings.

The Eighth Test Match began at the Oval on Monday in cold and threatening weather. The South Africans batted first and made 95—Snooke and Taylor making 23 each. Barnes captured 5 wickets for 28 and Wooley 5 for 41. England's first innings produced 176, of which Hobbs scored 68. Faulkner took seven wickets for 84.

The match was resumed on Tuesday when the South Africans went in again and made 93, Nourse contributing 42. Barnes bowled well, taking 8 wickets for 29 runs. This left England with 13 to make to win and going in again they scored 14 without loss and thus won by 10 wickets.

Ernest Barry, Sculling Champion of the World, has been challenged for the title by Durnan, the Canadian, the race to take place on the Thames in the autumn.

We regret to learn of an accident to Colonel Marshall of the Sherwood Foresters while playing polo at Secunderabad on the 6th instant. He collided with another player and both came down; Colonel Marshall's pony fell on him and he was picked up unconscious. He recovered soon after, however, and we hear there are no serious effects from his fall.

Commenting on the Olympic Games at Stockholm "Rapier" writes in the Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News. The flattening out of our best amateurs has been caused by two things. By Sweden, where Athletics are a part of the national education and by America, where University Athletics lead to University professorships of Athletics that are paid posts, just like any other professorships. The latter leads to extreme specialisation of the most fit and the few, and is no national asset because it does not improve the bulk or the many. The former is concerned with the bulk of the population: it is connected with the national army, and has made Sweden the base of all that is good in school physical training. If our own Government can be got to look at training in physics for the Army as one of the first duties of the subsidised schools, that also would be a great national asset. If they will not do that, specialism on the lines of the American Universities is still possible to us, but assuredly it is not desirable, so long as we wish to maintain athletics in the bulk of the people by means of its amateur popularity. The one thing certain is that if amateurs are paid, and subsided to train for Olympic events, they will also be paid and subsidised to train for other events, and will cease to be amateurs altogether. The fact is, our men are up against "shamateurs," not amateurs, and whether it is right and proper to maintain the difference between the latter and professionals in this country, that question ought not to be settled by the wants of Olympic contests. As it seems to be impossible to compel other countries to abide by the spirit of the rule of non-payment of Amateurs for these contests. There is only the alternative of sending professionals to compete, or not competing at all. The present rules do not admit professionals in name, but they do so in fact, and will have to be changed in order that the best men, regardless of expense, may compete, as they always do in every phase of life between foreign nations. It was different in the real old Olympic games, when Greek met Greek, and permitted no foreigners. Then amateurism meant the same for all. Now it does not.

An Olympic Meeting was held under the auspices of the Berlin Sports Club at Berlin on Sunday the 21st July. Thirteen American Olympic competitors participated, including Meredith, Lippincott, Berna, Rose and Wright. The Americans were distinctly below their Stockholm form. Rau, Charlottenburg Sports Club, won the 100 metres, beating Lippincott. Time 10-7/10secs. The German record which is held by Ran is 10½secs. Lippincott's World's record is 10-3/10secs. The most exciting event was the 800 metres race between Braun (Munich) and Meredith, Braun winning easily in 1min. 54-7/10secs. The German record which is held by Braun is 1min. 54-1/5secs. Meredith holds the World's record of 1min. 51-9/10secs. made at Stockholm where he beat Braun. Lippincott won the 200 metres, beating Rau in 21-9/10secs. Berna in attempting to lower his own World's record for the 3,000 metres (8mins. 44-3/5secs.) covered the distance in 9mins. 2secs. The 1,500 metres handicap was won by Grawse, Germany, with 100 metres start, Sheppard scratch was fourth. Wright, the American, won the High Jump with 5·86 feet, and the Pole Jump at 3 metres. Tiresias, Greece, won throwing the discus 40·36 feet. Rose, America, putting the shot 14·51 metres.

Mr. "Charlie" Harvey, the well-known American sportsman, who is Secretary of the New York State Athletic Commission, and now on a visit to England, has stated that he had travelled to Stockholm with the idea of persuading the Olympic authorities to include boxing in their future games. He says he was quite successful in his mission and that Baron Pierre de Couberchin, the President of the Olympic Games, had definitely promised him that amateur boxing should be included in all future programmes in countries where the law would allow such contests to take place.

In a recent contest at Los Angeles, Owen Moran, the English boxer, met Jack White, another Britisher and after having the best of the fighting all through was disqualified in the ninth round for using his elbow in clinches.

Bombardier Wells made good in his second fight in the States and gave a very fine exhibition when he put paid to the account of Tom Kennedy, an American critic summing up the battle as the finest, cleanest fight seen in an American prize ring for twenty years. Kennedy was much advertised as a White Hope till he met Al Palzer. The fight went 9 rounds, the gong saving Kennedy from being knocked out and his seconds refusing to let him go on. Kennedy trained seriously and had another cut at Palzer last November when he outboxed the Iowa farmer for ten rounds and was entitled to the verdict. His next opponent was Carl Morris but he was badly battered by the big fellow from Oklahoma. Against Frank Moran he put up an unsatisfactory display and was written down as a "hopeless White hope" but he seems to have done better lately, handing out a defeat to Andy Morris and drawing with Jim Stewart, who is to be the Bombardier's next opponent. Kennedy and Wells were well matched as far as size went but the Bombardier was on top in science all the way. Kennedy rushed in at the start trying to get at his body but Wells kept him away with jabs and jolts in the face. The American kept on coming and showed speed and cleverness but couldn't keep the pace set by the Bombardier. In the third round Wells slackened appreciably in his speed but continued to have the best of the round. The fourth session found Wells feeling the pace but he kept his opponent out with some hard punches. Then he put in a burst of speed and made Kennedy look like a novice. In the fifth round the Bombardier had recovered himself. Kennedy tried to rush him but was met by a straight left drive which sent him reeling. Thereafter Wells jabbed him in the face again and again. The American, though a beaten man, fought pluckily on. Wells hooked and jabbed him at will but though going weak the American did his best to get in a winning punch. He landed once on the Bombardier's jaw and shook the Englishman pretty badly but Wells pulled himself together and coming in again thumped his opponent with fierce left jabs and right hooks. On coming up for the eighth session Wells went for his man, drove him to the ropes and dropped him with a left to the chin. He waited in the centre of the ring for Kennedy to rise and when he was up again at the count of six the Bombardier came again and with a right to the jaw put the American out for the count. Kennedy was heavily punished while the Bombardier left the ring practically unmarked. The American critics have received the Bombardiers victory very well. They declare him to be the cleverest heavy-weight since Jim Corbett and the hardest puncher since Tom Sharkey. Everyone seems anxious for a return match between Wells and Palzer and if it comes off the Englishman will have a host of friends as it transpires that he was suffering from dysentery when the first encounter took place. Palzer is in no hurry just now as he is occupied trying to get Jack Johnson into the ring with him, but no promoter seems inclined to put up the match.

There was no race at the Calcutta Swimming Baths last Friday as the building has been in the hands of cleaners and is now looking very bright, one of the most popular of the improvements being the six electric fans which have been installed over the dressing boxes in place of the old punkahs. To-morrow night the C.S.C. will hold the two lengths hurdle race.

J. G. Hatfield, the Middlesborough swimmer who represented Great Britain at Stockholm and showed such remarkable form in the swimming events at the Games, has just won the 500 yards English Championship at Weston-Super-Mare, his time being 6mins. 18-4/5secs. He completed the 500 metres in 6mins. 56-4/5secs. and thus established a World's record for this distance. The previous best was put up by F. Beaurepaire, the Australian, 6mins. 57secs. The record for 500 yards stands to the credit of the late B. B. Kieran who covered the distance in 6mins. 7-1/5secs. at Leeds in August 1905. Kieran was credited with 6mins. dead at Southport a month later but this has apparently not been passed by the International Federation.

The Channel Swimming craze has broken out again. Jabez Wolffe made another attempt on the 22nd ultimo, entering the water from the French side, near the Grisnez semaphore. He apparently got about a mile from Dover when he had to abandon the venture. Fred Record, the Rochester long distance swimmer, made an attempt on the night of the 23rd July, starting from Cape Grisnez, but after getting 8 miles across he was caught by a strong tide setting towards the French coast and after a big struggle had to give it up. An American lady long-distance champion, Miss Rose Pitsnoff, from Boston is now at Dover taking practice swims previous to making an attempt to swim the Channel on or about the 22nd August. She intends making her effort to cross the Straits of Dover, starting from the South Foreland.

The Mud sports at Bombay last week attracted another good attendance. There was an interesting programme of six events, all keenly contested and the Band of the 1st Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway Volunteers enlivened the proceedings. Tilting at the Ring and Tent-pegging for men opened the ball and was won by Mr. L. Graham with Messrs. Abercrombie and Maclean next in order. Tilting at the Ring for Ladies was won by Mrs. McCausland with Miss Dunsford second. The jumping was not so good as usual but Mr. J. W. Knight Bruce gave a good performance and won from Mr. J. R. Webster, and Mr. H. W. Moulton. Mr. Knight Bruce also carried off the Polo Ball race—these two wins helping to increase his lead in the aggregate scores for the season. So far he is top with 48, Messrs. L. Graham and C. C. Bamber next with 28 each. Of the ladies Mrs. McCausland and Miss Dunsford have 16 points each. The Crawford Market Stakes, a nomination event in which the ladies hurriedly filled baskets handed to them in accordance with the orders shouted out to them by their partners, ended in a win for Mr. C. C. Bamber partnered by Mrs. McCausland. Five came out for the scurry which closed the programme, an exciting finish giving victory to Mr. Huntley on Twopenny who beat Mr. J. L. Thomson on Biscuit a length, and Mr. H. W. Moulton third a head a way.

The first dog show to be held in Darjeeling is fixed for the 19th October. The show is to be held under I.K.A., rules and the Columbia Rink will be the venue. Sixty-nine classes appear in the schedule, the prize list has been liberally supported, Captain J. D. Byrne and Messrs. Horace Johnstone and Mr. Medley have undertaken the duties of Judges, and a successful meeting is expected. Entries close on the 15th September, but late entries, accompanied by extra free, will be accepted up to the 30th idem. Further details, schedules, etc,, may be obtained from the Honorary Secretary, Mr. K. C. Mackenzie, Darjeeling Gymkhana Club.

The following interesting particulars on the speed of birds appear in the Scotsman:—A well-known West Highland naturalist once brought a friend's carrier pigeon from St. Andrews to the village of Kirkmichael, Perthshire. At the hour of noon, precisely the bird was given its liberty. It instantly soared up with a spiral flight until it was almost lost to view, then, straight and swift as an arrow from a bow, it shaped its course southwards. As the College bells were chiming one o'clock on the same day it reached its dove-cote in St. Andrews—eagerly watched and waited for by its owner. The distance covered is about fifty-four miles as the crow flies, so that the pigeon must have travelled at the rate of very nearly a mile a minute. Sir Ralph Payne Gallwey has calculated that a pheasant, with the wind behind it, flies at the rate of forty yards per second, or a mile in forty-four seconds. Mr. Griffiths, a London gunsmith, made interesting investigations in 1887. With the help of a chronigraph he found that pigeons let out at one end of a closed shed in New Forest flew at the rate of thirty-four miles per hour; pheasants at the rate of thirty-three miles per hour; and partridges at the rate of twenty-eight miles per hour. In the open, however, these rates were increased by from ten to fifteen per cent. It should be noted that if the birds had been flying down wind, to their rate of speed would have to be added the velocity of the wind itself.

In his "Journal of a Sporting Nomad" (Lane), Mr. J. T. Studley describes a novel form of hyena trap in use at Chimoio. It consisted of a round piece of dried ox-hide, as hard as a board, three feet or so in diameter, in which a very small hole, no larger than a small apple, had been cut. Radiating from this hole were series of V-shaped pieces. The trap was set as follows:—A hole was dug in the ground about 1 foot deep and 6 inches in diameter. Into this hole a piece of meat was placed, and the ox-hide plate was laid over the place containing the meat, the two holes being one over the other. The ox-hide was then pegged down with wooden pegs in three or more places. The hyena, on finding the bait, forced his head through the small hole in the ox-hide to obtain it, the cuts in the hide giving way sufficiently for that purpose. The beast seized the meat, but on trying to withdraw his head had to use considerable force, which naturally drew the pegs that held the ox-hide to the ground, the result being that the poor brute had a collar securely fastened round his neck which he was quite unable to get rid of. He could not run or walk, and even had he been able to go any distance encumbered by such an obstacle, would have been brought up short in the first patch of bush or grass he encountered. He was thus completely handicapped and could be despatched quite easily.

The question whether fish can reason has been the subject of some recent experiments made by M. Oxner and presented to the Academie des Sciences says the Shooting Times. Some claimed that a fish had no memory, because, after he is hooked for the first time, he does not profit by experience, but can be caught again when the hook is well concealed. M. Oxner, in the Monaco oceanographic establishment believed otherwise. First he used a well-concealed hook, and could then catch the same fish day after day; but this only proved that the hook was so well concealed that the fish was not aware of its presence, and, since he thus found no difference between the bait and ordinary food, there was nothing to prevent him from taking the same bait. Then Oxner concealed the hook, but two inches above it he attached a small paper square. In each tank he placed a single specimen of a fish which had been recently captured. For several days it refused the bait, but on the eighth day the fish bit, and, after unhooking it, Oxner replaced it in the water. On the three following days the fish also bit and was caught, but on the twelfth day, warned by the bit of paper, it no longer touched the bait. On the same day the paper was removed, and then the fish took the bait. On replacing the paper, the fish refused to bite for three days, after examining the bait several times. On the next day it approached the paper square, then descended and very carefully nibbled the bait until it had eaten it all off the hook, but without swallowing the latter. This was repeated for a number of days. The same experiment was made many times with fish, and the result was the same. He concludes that at first the fish is indifferent, and it takes the bait, but the association of ideas of the pain caused by the hook and of the colour of the paper take effect after a few days. The result is that the paper acts as a warning signal, in spite of the attraction caused by the food. But by degrees hunger overcomes the prohibitive effect, and the fish begins to take the food, but with caution, and, finding that this succeeds, it continues the practice.

The Electric Theatre have put on two very good programmes during the past week. The first of these, besides an interesting film delineating the logging industry and several comic pictures, included two sensational dramas. The Dead Man's Child was full of thrilling situations, in which a villainous looking Oriental doctor and a clever detective play big parts. There are daring plots, drugging, abductions, mysterious underground passages, wonderful escapes, and in the end the detective boards a moving train and with the assistance of the guard, captures one villain, hurls the other to his death and rescues the heroine. The Girl Spy before Vicksburg is an incident of the American Civil War, in which a Confederate girl disguised as a soldier of the Union, blows up an ammunition convoy and in the pursuit which follows makes a thrilling escape. The programme was changed on Saturday and the chief items of the new list were the Golden Belt—a lengthy film in which a miner on his way to bank his "dust" carried for safety in a belt, is bound, gagged, and thrown into a cellar, and robbed of his wealth. His dog however, comes to the rescue and forces the villain to disclose the whereabouts of his master and assists in the recovery of the belt. Through Twisting Lanes is another excellent film, the pictures of ferrets are most interesting, the comic films up to the usual humorous standard, while the English gazette included pictures of the Funeral of Field Marshal Sir George White, the Annual Actors' Fete at the Botanical Gardens and other events of interest.

London Week by Week.

London, Friday, 26th July 1912.

The Insurance Act tragedy is still running strong, causing blasphemy in the many and laughter in the few Mark Tapley's who can take credit for being jolly under conditions of national degradation. Now the doctors of Great Britain have finally decided to break off negotiations with the Government for service under this infamous Act.

The delegates at the representative meeting of the British Medical Association at Liverpool decided on Saturday by 181 to 21 for breaking off, and the resolution was ratified yesterday.

Thus, the present position is that the Government are enforcing taxes for an Act whose chief benefit they are not in a position to give.

Sir James Barr, Consulting Physician to the Royal Infirmary, Liverpool, on his election as president of the association for the year, described the Act as "the most gigantic fraud which has ever been perpetrated on a confiding public since the South Sea Bubble."

Mr. Andrew Lang, the distinguished writer and critic, died at Banchory, Dee-side, on Sunday, at the age of sixty-eight. He was one of the most versatile men of letters of modern times. He was historian, poet, novelist, and the range of subjects covered in his books and innumerable magazine and newspaper articles was enormous. He wrote about golf, ghosts, Homer, crystal-gazing, blue china, Aristotle, early religions, old books, spiritualism, angling, dreams, cricket, folklore, and old French poetry. He helped in new translations of the Odyssey and the Iliad, wrote biographies of Lockhart and Sir Stafford Northcote, and prepared a delightful series of fairy books.

His output, indeed, was so varied that an American once suggested that the name Andrew Lang represented not one man, but a syndicate of authors. Perhaps it was his wife's help that enabled him to publish so much. "Mrs. Lang," he once said, "always helps me with my fairy stories, and looks after the morals of them." On another occasion he said that she "shared his literary toils, curbed his literary enthusiasm, cut out all his best passages, and corrected all his dates, in which he was notoriously erroneous." He was educated at Edinburgh Academy, St. Andrew's University, and Balliol. As his work indicates, he was an enthusiastic golfer, cricketer, angler, and collector of old books and china.

You might have cut half a dozen men of letters out of this mighty journalist, and shared out his books among them fairly, so that each should be well on his way towards academic honours and high places at literary banquets. But he had made the journalist's renunciation. In an age which keeps the highest chair for the specialist, he would not limit his interests; he would give the public the best of his thoughts on all the hundred matters in which he himself took delight. He would leave Scottish history for Czech fairy-tales, and turn from the Odyssey to the chronicles of Cock Lane. The zest that he brought to the study of Homeric hymns did not fail him when he came to parody Thomas Haynes Bayly.

The spirit of revolution is indeed abroad. A writer in one of the papers wants to revolutionise that sacred institution, the honeymoon. He—it must be a man—says that the new home is the proper place in which to spend the honeymoon, and that the idea of spending it at the Italian lakes or at a fashionable watering-place is absurd. Does this Goth realise that he is asking woman to surrender her one month of happiness untinctured with domestic worries? Is he not content to let her enjoy a few weeks of romantic spooning free from the clatter of the pots and pans, the anxieties of the larder, the plague of servants conscious of her inexperience, and the weekly grabbings of the Insurance Act? What, give up the tell-tale rice, the wedding favours on the railway carriage door, the giggling of chambermaids and waiters, the extortionate hotel bills, the tearing from place to place to find distraction from one another's company—give up all these, and go straight from the church or the registry office to the newly-furnished villa with the pretentious name of Sans Souci! Why, the suggestor of such a mad scheme deserves to be torn to pieces by wild brides.

The Neverwazzers are at it again. They are holding the yearly exhibition of their works of art in the Royal Albert Hall.

All London—with minor exceptions—is going to see them, for the Neverwazzers' works of art are the most astonishing that are to be seen this side of the moon.

They are called the Neverwazzers by those who say that their ideas of art are like something that never was.

One of the rules of the Neverwazzers (who call themselves the Allied Artists' Association) is that every member may send in three works, which shall be exhibited, unless they are calculated to lead to riot, civil war, or police intervention.

All kinds of people with all kinds of intellects and all kinds of ideas on art have spend hours gazing at the most masterly of the Neverwaz pictures, which is called the "Creation," without gaining the smallest glimer of a notion as to what it means.

It is the work of Mr. Percy Wyndham Lewis, and is as large as a wall. There are yards of purple and pink and yellow and terracotta and mauve spread about it in indescribable shapes, as if Mr. H. G. Wells had tried to paint a map of the moon while he was asleep. In the centre there are what some people declare to be the heads of a man and a woman. Down at one side there seems to be half another face wedged in between lumps of something with a kind of double-jointed tentacle hurling an ink-pot through space.

Very steady gazers say they have detected distinct signs of another face on the lefthand side of the picture, and of another arm holding a cup, and of yet another head up where the sky should be; but all that the average onlooker feels sure of is that he is gazing at yards and yards of curves and angles of colour, something like a pile of silks at a bargain sale mixed up with the picture in a kaleidoscope.

The next great Neverwaz triumph is Mr. H. Phelan Gibb's "constructive cartoon," but this shows less imagination than Mr. Lewis', for it can nearly be understood. It is of colossal size, and shaped like the doorway of an Egyptian temple, broader at the bottom than the top. Its prevailing tone is mauve. At one side is what looks like a sandstone cliff about 200,000 to 250,000 miles, high, curling over at the top into what threatens to become an arch. From the abysmal depths on the left spring cathedral-like shafts, with arches which fade half-way, like the smile of the Cheshire cat.

At the bottom of the picture is what looks like the Old Roman Bath, lined with linoleum. The whole conglomeration give you an enjoyable sensation of mystery. You feel that if you looked at it long enough—say a hundred thousand years—you might finally guess what it means. Anybody can buy it for £200.

None of the other Neverwazzers approaches the sublime heights reached by these two epoch-making productions. There is a painful Coronation picture, with a Macbeth stream of kingly heads winding away in a kind of green vapour scarf above the head of King George, but this is not in the true Neverwazzer style.

There are many other contributions, some of the "blink" class—you blink when you look at them—and some of the "dab" class, composed of orderly arrays of dabs of colour placed like a mosaic of cough-lozenges, but some of these are really beautiful, and fall away sadly from the Neverwazzer standard.

But Mr. Jacob Epstein makes up for all these happy strokes with a monumental statue reminiscent of Assyria and the Euston Road. It is called "Maternity," and nothing more need be hinted about it, except that it would be more in place in the chamber of horrors at the Royal College of Surgeons in Lincoln's Inn Fields than in a public exhibition.

There are other sculptures as beautiful as this is ugly, and among other wonders is a case of lovely metal-work and jewellery made by a man who works on a farm in West Australia.

HUNTING LEOPARDS WITH DOGS.

A few years ago I had an opportunity of seeing a little of a form of sport that is very rarely practised, and is, indeed, unknown to the great majority of sportsmen in India, viz., hunting leopards by the aid of dogs.

There are many hindrances in the way of getting any of this sport; the chief one being the difficulty of getting to the right place at the right time. Leopards or panthers (I am not naturalist enough to determine the difference) are excessirely common in the Lower Himalayas in winter; but in the summer the melting of the snow gives them a much greater range of country, and it is consequence much more difficult to find them; on the other hand, summer is practically the only time you can get away in India; the leave season in the Bengal and Punjab Commands extending from 15th April to 15th October. Once it was my fortune to get away for a week or two in the beginning of January, and I started with the idea of going into the interior on the far side of a hill station, and getting black bear among the snow. I had the very vaguest ideas as to where I was going and what I was going to do; but while I was at Pathankote (the terminus of the railway on the road to Dalhousie), asking the natives where the game was in the winter, my servant produced a native who lived about twenty miles further on the main road; he declared the country round his village stank of panthers, and said that he had a collection of curs with whom he had frequently bayed them. I did not have much belief in his story, but no other plan seemed feasible, and I started. His village was a place called Duneira, half-way between Dalhousie and Pathankote; there was a very comfortable dak bungalow there, and though there was no snow it was raining and very cold, and I was glad to find myself in comfortable quarters, with a blazing fire when I got in in the evening.

The next day, Pupi Singh, the man who had taken me in tow, took me over to his village to see his pack, and a queer lot they were. There was a big bony Rampur hound, two or three nondescript spaniels and a little liver-coloured chap with one eye, that may have been anything. Queer lot as they looked there was one significant thing about them, and that was the number of scars they were covered with. A lot of them were caused by porcupines, who live in long tunnels that go winding in and out among the rocks on the steep sides of the hills; these are very narrow and have branches all over the place, so that a dog who goes down after a porcupine and either takes the wrong turn when he wants to get out, or finds he cannot turn round at all, is in a hole in more senses than one.

The third day after my arrival we were delayed till evening by the absence of the men, and it turned out that the little fellow, who had already lost one eye in an encounter with "quills," was still so keen that he had gone down one of their tunnels, and his owner had had to sit outside till evening, at the entrance, waiting for him.

But to get to our panthers. On the morning of the third day after my arrival Pupi Singh collected all the lads of the village and all the available curs, and we started to beat up the side of the hill, I being posted near the top. As we got near the place we were going to beat we were delighted to hear the harsh, hacking cough of a panther coming from the thick jungle. All the natives, who had come out armed with every description of offensive and defensive weapon from axes and knives down to clubs and old flintlocks, got in line with their respective dogs and began to beat. It was not long before we heard them giving tongue, and almost immediately a native, who was posted with me, touched me on the arm and pointed to Spots, who had got a good start and was sneaking along within 20 yards of where we were posted. I should have fired at once, but my companion whispered to me to wait, that he would cross into the open in a minute and give me a clear shot. However, the panther knew more than that, and before I got my head on him dashed to the right into thick bush. Almost immediately the dogs were among us, and we started on his trail shouting and yelling to encourage them. Round a spur we went clambering up the hillside and forcing our way through the bushes, which were so thick that, though we knew from the barking and yapping the leopard was quite close, we were unable to see him. Then we came out on an open watercourse and there we saw him sneaking over the boulders. I hit him in the ribs, and as he rolled over a native plugged him through the head with his old flint-lock. No one alone could, of course, keep pace with a leopard, even if he did not lose him; but the dogs keep baying him, and the few minutes he wastes before he breaks his bay gives one time to come up. Small curs are the best, as all you want to do is to stop him. If you use big dogs, who would go in and try to tackle him, the chances are they would be killed right off.

After this we decided to move off a couple of marches to the west where the jungles were said to be pretty full of game. On the way an incident occurred, showing how casually young India treats his religious tenets when away from home. A doctor who was going home was staying at the dak bungalow and had asked me to secure him a peacock if I could, as he wanted to take a skin home with him. On the second day's march I saw a fine old peacock sitting sunning himself on a low tree. I hadn't a shot-gun with me, so getting as close as I could, let him have a round from my ·500. I did not hit him—went just over him—and the old bird looked up over his back to see what was the matter. My second barrel went just under him, and he stuck his head down sharp to see what was whistling underneath. The effect was so comical and the peacock looked so horribly puzzled, that I could hardly hold my rifle for laughing, especially when the third round went through the quills of his tail and it dropped as if on a hinge. Then I heard a bang from underneath the tree and the bird collapsed. Now to kill a peacock is an abomination to a Hindu—only second to killing a cow—so I was rather surprised to see a couple of my young Hindu friends loafing up with the defunct bird. 'Sahib,' they said, "you say you shot him, or we'll get into terrible trouble at home."

We pitched our camp on the side of a well-wooded nullah and tried beating down the streams. We had no sport for a day or two, nothing coming out but barking deer, and the jungle was too thick to get a reasonable shot at them as they passed, but then our luck turned again. While I was sitting at breakfast we heard a tremendous hullabaloo across the valley. I never heard such a row. My men recognised it at once. A panther must have been trying to carry off a calf, and what we had heard was the water buffaloes bellowing. Water buffaloes don't look a particularly warlike class, but when once roused they'll be put upon by nobody—even a tiger they don't fear when there are two or three of them together. We collected our pack and went best pace across the valley towards the sound. On our way we picked up a poor little cow calf, scored over the withers and back; she was still trembling violently, and had evidently just been dropped by the panther.

We divided into two parties along the banks of the nullah the panther had gone up, and put the dogs in at the bottom. In a minute or two they hit off and went best pace up the hill. We followed as fast as we could, but found it precious hard work. From the yapping of the gallant little dogs we knew they were on our friend, but ever and again the sound was so far off that pursuit seemed almost hopeless. Then they would bay him for rather longer than usual, and we would find ourselves close to our game again. Once the panther doubled and must have passed within a yard or two of me, as the first I knew of it was by catching a glimpse of the dogs hurrying past. Precious glad I was that I had not met him in that thick jungle; a rifle under such circumstances would be about as much use to you as a stick. I fancy we were in a good deal more danger from each other's weapons than from the panther. I could not put my rifle at half cock, as I might meet the panther doubling back at any minute, and to go jumping down rocks and plunging into dense undergrowth with a loaded ·500 in your hand is by no means the safest way of passing a morning. We got close to him at last; I fancy he had been winded a bit, and I caught sight of him with his back to a rock surrounded by all five dogs. They kept a respectful distance from him, and, though Spots kept darting at one or the other, they got out of his way all right, and he did not dare to leave the shelter of the rock for fear of exposing his rear. I think a bayed panther is about the ugliest-looking customer I have ever seen. His ears were laid back flat against his scalp, and his lips were drawn back showing a most business-like set of teeth; altogether he was a picture of demoniac fury. A bullet in the shoulder settled him all right. He was a fine panther, about 7feet; I forget the exact measurement.

A day or two after we had an exciting five minutes. We had put the dogs into some long grass, and they hit something off at once. We had a very fair run for a few minutes, and then a man near me let off his flintlock. The report was answered by a "whoop," "whoop," and something crashed through the jungle to the right. A few seconds after it was evident from the row we heard that the dogs had bayed their quarry. Now a panther, though he has sense enough to get out of the way instead of fighting when he can—a proceeding which has earned him most unjustly the reputation of a coward—is a precious nasty customer to tackle when wounded. He is lighter than a tiger, but just as quick, and the chances are that scratches from his claws will give you blood poisoning if he succeeds in getting in. So altogether I did not quite like the prospect of pushing my way through bush, where I could not see a yard in front, right on the top o. him. However, I could not well hang back when the natives were anxious to go in, so had to make the best of it. I caught sight of a dark mass struggling among a crowd of dogs and fired into him twice. It was not a panther at all, but a magnificent old boar—about the biggest I have seen. My men knew all along what it was, and thought that I did, too. They laughed at the idea of going into thick bush on to a panther who was tackled by dogs, saying it would be simple suicide.

This was our last run, as I was re-called a day or two afterwards. I sent Pupi Singh some half-bred terriers and spaniels, intending to come again, but, unfortunately, some regulations which prevented natives keeping firearms were abolished, and when next I visited the place the game was too scarce to make it worth while to stop. Some very good sport might be obtained by men who have to remain in the hills during the winter with bear, as well as boar and panther, if they organised a pack of small dogs. Half-bred spaniels and terriers would, I think, be best; too plucky dogs would probably die early.

WEST INDIAN SPORT.

The West Indies have hitherto scarcely been regarded as a field for sport, but it may not be amiss to describe such sport as there is in these tropic islands. For one thing, West Indians themselves are very reticent on the subject, because most of them have fallen into the usual groove of tropical life, and do very little gratuitous energising beyond the accustomed riding from one estate to another, besides dancing and cricketing. For this reason sport claims little of their time, and many are unaware of such forms of sport as lie at their very doors, or if they know it they care little about it. The game at hand forms a curious miscellany, and no one kind is considered more legitimate food for the gun than another except, perhaps, such as is fit for the pot—the pepper-pot which absorbs everything that comes in its way, and is not considered really seasoned until it has been cooking on and off for seven years. Perhaps the commonest of the birds are the little ground doves, which abound everywhere, but though they are so common hitting them is not like knocking sparrows over in a farmyard and they make very good eating. An afternoon's efforts, confined solely to ground doves, is by no means to be despised, and the sportsman who is natural enough to want something to show for his pains has plenty of opportunity.

Snipe abound in the swamps and marshes of Trinidad and Jamaica, but not every sportsman cares to run the risks of fever in these climates, although with due caution there is no reason to fear any ill results. Many an expedition is set on foot for the ever-fascinating alligator shooting. Even if the alligator is mortally wounded and not killed outright he generally manages to make his way to the nearest water and sink, with no chance of being recovered for the next four hours. After that time the body rises to the surface, and skinning commences at once, for delay is dangerous in the tropics. The guides at Trinidad will promise to show at least one alligator in a long day on the swamps, and this scarcely seems an idle boast since most expeditions are successful, although they do not always bear any trophy on their return.

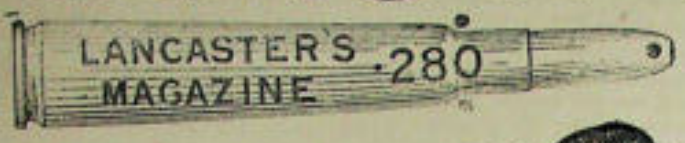
In some of the islands, particularly the old half-deserted Virgin Islands to the north, where ponds are frequent, duck abound, but the difficulty is to reach them, for riding in the scrub is rough work indeed. Yet those few whites who remain seldom use the opportunities they have for shooting the duck, although the latter might well form a staple dish in houses so near to the ponds. But the pride of the old planters intervenes, and they could never allow the coloured population to declare that they relied on their guns for food. A childish objection, perhaps, but a necessary one; for the fight between white and black would be very unequal were the former to allow themselves even seemingly to be placed on a level with the children of the slaves, or to lower their dignity in the smallest degree. In the same way it is often a loss of caste for an English "buckra" to walk any distance in the West Indies unless he is regarded as an eccentric, who prefers walking to riding, in which case he stands a good chance of losing caste all the same, and cannot command the same respect in the eyes of the coloured people as one who regards appearances. The result of this prejudice is the practical preservation of the ducks for visitors, who are always cordially invited to shoot by the owners of the estates where the sport lies, for West Indian hospitality is as strong as ever, although financial circumstances have curtailed the lavishness with which it used to be dispensed.

Thus it is at St. Kitt's where one isolated estate has become the roving ground of wild cattle to the number of two or three hundred so that the estate is useless for all but salt-drying. With true West Indian courtesy the owner will generally concede permission to shoot the cattle provided all is done in fair sport and not for mercenary motives. And it is sport indeed. The parent stock may have been tame once—perhaps twenty or thirty years ago—but the cattle are as shy as deer, and very difficult to approach. In fact, it is seldom possible to get at them in the daytime, and only during one hour of the night when they come to drink at the single pool of fresh water on the estate. They may approach without a sound, and at the rustling of a leaf they are off with little likelihood of making a second appearance. If not mortally wounded they can get away into the bush with little chance of being successfully tracked in the thick undergrowth. They are four or five herds among them, each inhabiting its own hill, which is kept against all comers, so that many a fight occurs, often ending in both combatants falling over the cliffs into the sea.

Deer used to abound in Barbuda, but now they are few and more strictly preserved, and it is difficult to obtain an opportunity of stalking them. A few agouti are to be found in St. Kitt's, but they are rare and not often met with. Monkeys are common in the wilder parts and they make very good eating, but by laws of etiquette the head is never brought to table—it is too suggestive! The best way of hunting them is with dogs—little mongrels of the lurcher type, which silently steal in and out among the trees, and with marvellous agility overtake any monkey they are lucky enough to find on the ground. Should a monkey be "treed," they catch him just the same by an elaborate system of siege and strategy combined, the result of long experience in days when they must either kill or go hungry.

The mongoose affords some little sport in its way, though he is not a native. The rats became so destructive in the cane brakes of Jamaica that steps had to be taken for their extermination, and by a happy thought, such as introduced the rabbit into Australia and the sparrow into America, the mongoose was imported, and as hoped, destroyed the rats. Now, when it is almost impossible to keep fowls on many of the estates and the small birds are being gradually exterminated, the question arises, how to get rid of the mongoose! The answer is yet unknown, and the planters are shy of trying new remedies after the appalling series of "cures" in St. Lucia. Convicts escaped—years ago. Snakes—the terrible "fer de lance"—were introduced, as a cure and proved effectual. Only they were too effectual, and the mongoose was introduced from the Jamaica canefields to cure the new plague of serpents. The mongoose fulfilled the contract, and now wants "curing" on its own account. At present all that can be done is to catch as many as possible in traps and train the dogs to hunt them. With fair law and cover near, the mongoose has a good chance of getting clear away; but on the flat the dogs will generally get the best of it. But this is a regular sport among the coloured people, and in time may prove the unconscious remedy if the dogs learnt to hunt by themselves. It is hard to tell whether the dogs would want "curing" in their turn should they run wild and grow into the greater evil.

Trinidad is almost a little South America, from which continent it is distant only a few miles, and as such it differs somewhat from the remaining islands. Yet the larger portion of the South American fere are absent, although in an unfortunate moment the spotted tiger-cat, or leopard, as it is called, managed to cross-over a few years ago, and has apparently begun to flourish in the land; but it has not yet done much harm on the better populated estates. But there is a kind of wild boar which leaves its traces everywhere when once it has attacked an estate. However, there is a certain amount of satisfaction in hunting this beast for the flesh is excellent eating and it is no mean quarry for the hunter.



Such is the mixed assortment of wild game to be found in the British West Indies. Fishing is scarcely known except in one or two of the islands—Dominica and Grenada, for instance—where some excellent mountain mullet may be taken with a fly, but only a few anglers beyond the casual visitor ever disturb the streams, and the rod is seldom used.

"What were you and Mr. Smith talking about?" asked her mother. "Oh, we were discussing our Lith and Kin," replied the young lady. The mother looked dubiously at her daughter, whereupon her little brother, wishing to help his sister, said, "Yeth, they wath, mother. I heard 'em. Mr. Thmith asked her for a kith, and she thaid, 'You kin.'"

Prison Visitor: "This confinement must distress you greatly." Convict: "Yes. I find the prison bars grating." Prison Visitor "Ah, life to you is a failure. Convict: "Yes, it's nothing but a sell.

Secretary:—MR. OWEN SYMONS.

First Day, Saturday, 3rd August 1912.

THE meeting opened this afternoon in splendid weather and a big attendance thronged the stands and enclosures, the gathering including the élite of Colombo and Up-country society. The absence of H. E. the Governor was greatly regretted, but Lady McCallum was present, as were H. E. Admiral Sir Alexander Bethell, Sir Hugh and Lady Clifford, and other notabilities. The programme of seven events was carried through without a hitch and capital sport was witnessed. The chief race of the day was, of course, the Governor's Cup and all six horses entered faced the starter. The public fancied Sweet Sound and Balgowan, but though placed this couple both finished behind Knox, who won comfortably by five lengths. The race was marred by an accident, Warrayure coming down at the turn in the straight. He broke one of his legs and had to be destroyed, while Butters, who was riding him, got a bad fall and had to be carried in. The Civil Service Cup race dwindled into a match between Rose Royal and Galileo, the former leading throughout and winning comfortably. The Omnium Stakes was won by Mr. E. L. F. deSoysa's Muskerado, the Byculla Stakes by Mr. R. E. S. deSoysa's Little Boy, giving Drew his second winning ride Lord of the Plains won the Flying Stakes, Sebrof the Bachelors' Purse, and Manchester took the Desert Stakes, surviving an objection for a cross which was overruled. THE TURF.

SANDOWN PARK.

LAST Friday "Sunny Sandown" belied its character. After Newmarket's tropical heat, the fall in the temperature was so marked that an overcoat became a necessity when, to general dismay, the long-threatened rain set in, and in gentle, but penetrating, fashion, continued all the afternoon. It was by no means "King's weather", but the presence of his Majesty ensured a large assemblage of society, which included most of the principal patrons of the National sport; and the glamour attached to what promised to be—and proved—an exceptionally exciting Eclipse Stakes, brought down the sporting public en masse. A rare sight was afforded by the densely-packed enclosures, which even the forthcoming Bank Holiday meeting may fail to eclipse. Results:—

LIVERPOOL.

Attractive programmes are the rule at Liverpool, but Wednesdays was rendered more so by the inclusion of the Molyneux Plate, a sprint race, in which several horses who hold a liability in the Stewards' Cup were engaged, and their meeting was expected to throw a deal of light on the Goodwood event. Five of these—Great Surprise, Borrow, Cigar, Mahsud, and Prester Jack—duly turned out. In view of the fact that Great Surprise is such a favourite with racegoers, it was not surprising to find him heading the market, despite his great impost of 9st. 12lb. Cigar was also strongly befriended, while there were many backers of Highwayside. Strangely enough, Prester Jack, who has before shown a distinct partiality for the course, and was moreover, well handicapped, was ignored. He, however, was the only one of the Stewards' Cup horses to make anything of a show. Results:—

The programme on Thursday which is sandwiched between the initial stage and the Cup afternoon is comparatively light, but still a card of much attractiveness, and endowed with liberal stakes, provided food for reflection and speculation. Chief interest was centred in the valuable Breeders' Produce Stakes, and as some of the smartest was centered in the valuable Breeders' Produce Stakes, and as some of the smartest juveniles of the season were on hand to compete for the prize, it had the appearance of providing a tussle worthy of its value. Apart from any other there was a desire to see how Bonnie Bird would acquit herself. Her early triumphs earned for the daughter of Missel Thrush and Vortex a reputation of invincibility, but this was tarnished when at Epsom she failed by a head to beat Chickweed. In mitigation of that defeat it was said the Foxhill youngster was not at her best. On that occasion she was subjected to driving, and this so often has a detrimental effect that it made room for further doubt. Results:—

THE ESSEX CHAMPIONSHIPS.—Some six thousand spectators attended the thirty-first annual championship meeting of the Essex County Cycling and Athletic Association at Witham on Saturday, when the racing, which was interesting throughout afforded some surprises. A case in point was the defeat of J. A. Hickling in the mile cycle championship, of which he was the holder. Although winning his heat in the fastest time he was unplaced in the final, which went to E. T. Beck, of the Epping C.C., in 2mins. 45 ⅖secs.

The curative action of Gonosan is attributed to its being antiseptic and sedative. Manufactured by J. D. Riedel, Berlin, under most Hygienic condition with Purest Santal oil and Kawa Kawa, and quite untouched by hand during the process of making. No injection required. Procurable at all chemists and general stores all over India.

The first violent inflammatory symptoms quickly disappear after treatment with Riedel's Gonosan Capsules and leave no bad after-effects. No better preparation now in the market, prescribed and certified by the leading Specialists of the day. Try it—insist on Gonosan, refuse substitutes. Procurable at all stores and chemists.

WINCHESTER

THE DREADNOUGHT OF THE JUNGLE.

The .405 Winchester fears nothing alive. It is powerful enough to stop any animal, no matter how big or how dangerous. Its 300-grain, soft-point bullet has a ton and a half of energy, and when it strikes, it mushrooms and delivers the whole of this tremendous energy with terrible shocking effect. There is an immediate collapse—the animal drops as though struck by a thunderbolt. The rifle holds five of these cartridges, which can be fired in rapid succession. Its action is reliable and strong, and its shooting straight and true. As a big-game gun of exceptional power it has no peer.

LOOK ONE OVER AT YOUR GUNMAKER'S.

E. F. Ledran, of the Essex Beagles, scored a double success in the foot-racing events by carrying off the 100 yards in 10 ⅘secs. and the quarter-mile in 53 ⅘secs.

The three miles open scratch flat race for the Atalanta Cup produced a great race between F. J. Bridge, of the Salford H., and G. W. Hutson, the A.A.A. four miles champion, in which the sprint home Bridge won by 8 yards in 15mins. 5 ⅘secs. F. E. Roberts, the long distance walking champion of Essex, won with ease the two miles walking championship of the county in 15mins. 11⅘secs., and another comfortable victory was that of G. Nicol, Polytechnic, H. in the 500 yards open scratch race which he captured in 59⅘secs. An even easier win was that of F. G. Harmer, who again secured the 300 yards hurdles championship his time being 41⅘secs.

Other champions were :—One mile flat H. J. Chapman Southend H., 4mins. 39secs. Half mile flat A. Lewin, Essex Beagles, 2mins. 7⅘secs. Essex Territorials 1,000 yards championship Corporal E. H. Barnes, Essex R. E., 2min. 34 ⅘secs.

The half mile inter-club cycle race for the "Robert Cook" memorial trophy went to the Colchester Rovers C. C. with 13 points and the one mile inter-county relay race for the "Robert Cook" memorial cup resolved itself into a duel between Surrey and Essex, in which Surrey won.

SCULLING AT ETON.—The School Sculling was decided at Eton on Saturday. The course was from Jacobs' Island up stream to the Rushes, and back to Brocas Rails—a distance of nearly three miles. The final heat resulted in a victory for F. F. V. Scrutton, captain of the boats. Mr. R. S. de Havilland (O.U.B.C.) acted as starter, judge, and timekeeper. Details :—

FINAL HEAT.

Windsor Station.—F. F. V. Scrutton (Captain of the Boats) ... 1
Eton Station.—C. F. Wilson 2

Won easily; twelve lengths between second and third. Time—15mins. 11secs.

MOLESEY REGATTA.—London R.C. won five events at Molesey regatta on Saturday, although in two races they were helped to victory by the mishaps of their opponents. Their successes were gained in the senior fours, in which Kingston R.C. met with an accident to their rudder-line; senior eights; senior pairs, in which London Hospital collided with a boom; Thames Cup fours, and senior sculls (W. J. M. Harris).

London Hospital won the Garrick pairs; Thames R.C., the junior eights; Anglian B.C., the Thames Cup eights; Beaumont College, the Public Schools Challenge Cup; Kingston R. C., the junior fours; and C. W. Stacy (Thames R.C.), the junior sculls.

GOLF.

H. VARDON vs. E. RAY.—H. Vardon and E. Ray took part in two exhibition matches on the South Herts Club's course at Totteridge on Saturday. Vardon beat Ray over 18 holes in the morning by 3 holes up and 2 to play, and in a four-ball match in the afternoon Mr. W. H. Scarborough and Vardon defeated Mr. A. C. Lincoln and Ray by 1 hole. Vardon accomplished each round in, approximately, 69 strokes.

At the 15th hole in the morning Vardon was behind a big tree from his drive. To carry the obstacle was impossible, and to try a shot between the low-hanging branches and the hedge suggested a big risk. He took his brassie, and brought off an intentional slice which made the ball curl round the tree and finish on the green. He played faultless golf, except for taking three putts on the second green, and turned 4 up. He looked like winning the 11th, but Ray, after three indifferent shots, holed a very long putt and obtained a half. At the 12th Vardon broke the head of his favourite driver, but divided the whole. Ray reduced his opponent's lead to 3 holes at the 14th, where he ran down a putt of eight yards for a 3, but two halved holes followed, and he was beaten on the 16th green.

In the four-ball match Vardon won the 1st hole for his side in 3, but Mr. Lincoln and Ray took the lead at the 5th, the amateur winning the 3rd in 3 and the 5th in 2. Mr. Scarborough holed a chip for a 3 at the 9th, and the match turned all square. The homeward half was very close. Mr. Scarborough and Vardon went to the front for the first time at the 15th, and although losing the 16th, where Ray had a 3, they won the 17th and halved the home hole.

SUNNINGDALE vs. SCOTTISH UNIVERSITIES.—The Scottish Universities Golfing Society played the last match of their London tour at Sunningdale on Saturday. The contest, which was by foursomes over 18 holes, resulted in a halved match, each side having won four games. The results were :—

TENNIS.

MR. EUSTACE MILES AGAIN SUCCESSFUL.—At Lord's on the 23rd July Mr. E. H. Miles successfully defended his claim to the M.C.C. gold racket by defeating his challenger, Major A. Cooper Key, by 3 sets to 1.

Mr. Miles could not find his game in the first set—the light was not good at this stage, and this seemed to affect his play—and Major Cooper Key won after 1 all, 2 all, 3 all, 4 all, and 5 all. In the second set after the score had been called "2 all" Mr. Miles got going, and, hitting hard, took the set by winning four games off the reel. Mr. Miles had matters very much his own way in the third set, Major Cooper Key's only success being in the first game. The holder led at 4—1 in the fourth set, winning the third and fourth games each to "love." Subsequently Major Cooper Key took the sixth and eighth games, Mr. Miles winning the set at 6—3 and the rubber with score of 5—6, 6—2, 6—1, 6—3.

Hunting.

OOTACAMUND HOUNDS.

IT is given out that the Ooty Hunt races will take place on the Hobart Park Course on Wednesday, 18th September, and the Point-to-Point races on the Wenlock Downs on Saturday, 21st September. Entries are expected to be up to the average number for the various events, but it is early to give prospects yet.

The very inclement weather experienced during the latter half of July necessitated the abandonment of one or two hunting meets, but since the 30th genuine monsoon weather has prevailed and we have been able to hunt four days a week again.

On Tuesday, 30th July, meeting at noon at Windy Gap, jacks were not in evidence and it was late before one was found, a real tough old dog, which gave a rattling run from Lawley's Course past Stoker Shola to Herbert Plantation, to Briar, up the Dartmoor Valley to Somerdale Estate and thence to the Dumsandle bungalow where he got away in the ten bushes—25 minutes' fast going without a check.

On Thursday morning, 1st August, from Sandy Nullah Toll Bar, we drew up the Demon Valley and to Rocky, running a jack to top of Waterfall Gorge. Contrary to custom he doubled back by Karimuli Mund to Brooklands and over the Sigoor Road to Hanging Shola and past Rockwood Spinney to the woods near Brookhampton, thence across the Havelock Road to Churchill, quite near the heart of Ooty, covers which the Hunt has seldom visited. the going being too cramped hounds were got together with some difficulty and taken back to Lascelles Cover, where a jack was started and run to a drain near the 6th hole on the Golf links whence he was bolted and despatched.

Saturday, 3rd August, meeting at Fairlawns Bridge at noon, the hunt had two short runs, but they were spoilt by sambur crossing the scent and misleading hounds. Not being out myself I cannot recount details of this day's sport.

Monday, 5th, at Lake End. A lovely morning attracted a large field. After a long draw we found near Gold Mine Crossing. The jack led over Sandy Nullah stream to Stoker Shola and thence to the Devil's Dyke, on to Yemakal, Duff's Earth, Bacon Wood and Briar to Staircase and Martyn's Shola, where he was lost: a long hunt.

Tuesday, 6th noon, at Briar. A long draw westwards: hounds got on to a line near Bracken Swamp and carried it to past the Badamakod Stream where the pack split up, the majority hunting a jack past Kenecdehill Dumsandle, the rest barking back towards Paragon Shola. Difficult country to work, lots of jacks and too few Whips to keep hounds together.

POONA AND KIRKEE HOUNDS.

ON Sunday, the 4th August, hounds met at the 8th milestone on the Bombay Road and a big field of over seventy turned out. Among those out were Mr. Dunlop, M. F. H., Mr. Heugh Symons, and Capt. Lumsden, R. N., Mr. Fardoonji, General Sir Arthur and Lady Barrett, Miss Vangoetham, General Barter, Colonel and Mrs. Fowler, Capt. Harvey-Kelly, Capt. Charrington, the Zemindar of Sivagiri, Mr. and Mrs. Andrews, Capt. and Mrs. Vines, Capt. and Mrs. Sydenham, Colonel Evans, Miss Barrow, Capt. Popham, Mr. and Mrs. Collum, Major Jourdain, Major Nevinson, Mr. Greenshields, Capt. Sarson, Mr. Wynne, Mr. Logan, Capt. Stokes, Capt. Berkely, Capt. Chaytor, Mr. Summers, Major Henderson, Mr. Bailward, Mr. O'Donell, Major Kemble, Capt. Lucas, Capt. Cooker, Capt. Vachell, Major Martin-Miller, Capt. Stewart, Mr. Murray, Capt. Cooke, Capt. Denton, Aga Cassim Shah, Mr. Whaley, Mr. Knight Bruce, Mr. Johnson, Major Westmoreland, Hon. Mr. Millett, Hon. Mr. Quin, Mr. Mackey, Capts. Mercer and Weldon.

Hounds moved off towards the north and soon picked up a line. They followed this up at a great pace and eventually forced the jackal into the open where they pulled him down after a fast 20 minutes. The brush was presented to Mrs. Sydenham.

The nullahs between Bhosari and the Bombay Road were then tried and after chasing a fox for some time hounds got on to a jack which did not go far and was run into and killed after ten minutes, Lady Barrett receiving the brush. Thereafter hounds were again on the line of a fox which gave them a slow run for about an hour when they were whipped off.

On Tuesday, 6th August, a small field met the Master at Sendura and a good run of 22 minutes rewarded them. The going was rather heavy but Lady Barrett was up at the finish and received the brush. The venue on the 8th instant was the sixth mile on the Ahmednagar Road, the field numbering 50 and including 6 ladies. Amongst others were Hon. Mr. Claude Hill Trevor, Field Master, Major Westmoreland, Sir Arthur and Lady Barrett, Miss Van Goetham, Mrs. Birkett, Mr. H. S. Symons, Major Jourdain, Major Robinson, Capt. Betkley, Mr. Edwards, Mr. Logan, Capt. T. Lucas, Hon. Mr. Millet, Capt. Weldon, Capt. Startin, Capt. Langrishe, Capt. Utterson, Capt. Chaytor, Mr. Bailward, Major Bowen, Major Henderson, Mr. Carey, and Capt. and Mrs. Sydenham. The first jack put up made for Temple Hill and ultimately ran into view. Then turning to the right he got into some prickly pear and could not be dislodged. A chinkara was next put up and a good chase ensued, the hounds losing their quarry after a run of nearly half-an-hour.

The correspondent of the London Sportsman writing from Stockholm says :—I am afraid a lot of balderdash has been written in the papers concerning the failure of the British team, and the supposed cause of it. At any rate the telegraph, has been busily engaged in ticking off paragraphs which have been quoted here and caused a great deal of discontent, not only among the diverse sections of the British team, but among officials of other nations, who are thereby being given the impression that our well-known boast of being able to take a beating is no longer well founded. There are, however, several home journalists here who have been intimately identified with athletics for many years, and emphatic denials and repudiation of the action taken up in some quarters have been expressed by them.

It is unfair, because our men have not been in the winning line all along, to saddle the responsibility on those in charge. When the position is analysed to its foundation it amounts to this : some of our men have been disappointing, and have not justified their selection but the marjority, not a few, but a good percentage of them, have done a little better than they have ever done before. Surely this is cause for congratulation, especially to the trainers. But we have not won. Why ? Simply because we have been up against a superabundance of world beaters. America, for instance, have had half-a-dozen men in for a race fit to win, while we have had but one, and, as in the case of G. R. L. Anderson, even the slightest accident puts us right out of the running.

Take the swimming. Harry Taylor and T. S. Battersby have been unable to find their true form, but the others have all done excellently, particularly young J. G. Hatfield, who though he had to play second fiddle to that wonder from Canada, R. G. Hodgson himself got inside world's records. Is this not enough for our stay-at-home sportsmen. Walter Brickett, the popular trainer of the team, needs no words from me to sound his praises, but I feel in duty bound to put on record an idea of the tremendous work he has got through. He has almost lived at the Bath and no matter what time one has turned up his familiar figure with the Union Jack tied round his waist has been there, never tiring in the coaching of his boys. Modestly enough, however, he attributes their success to the remarkable influence for good that prevailed among our officials. Brickett has very carefully nursed Hatfield and before the games he prepared one for something out of the ordinary from his Middlesborough youth. He is naturally very proud of his charge. Brickett's spare time in Stockholm has been very profitably spent and, unless I mistake not the results of his labours will be evident among the young swimmers before long. In the first place he has been studying the methods of the American phenomenon Duke Kahanamoku, the most popular man in their team, who has a wonderful straight leg action, using his two huge feet as screws, like the propellers of a boat. Duke has kindly demonstrated to Brickett how he gets through the water so quickly and the lesson will not be wasted.

An almost similar state of affairs existed in connection with the athletics : there have been disappointments, others have improved so much that they have been little worse than the record-breakers, but to make up for all we have had one brilliant success, one worth coming all the way to Stockholm to witness, the one real setback experienced by the confident Americans, the unlooked for triumph of the Oxonian, A. N. S. Jackson in the 1,500 metres. I do not wish to traverse ground already worn nearly bare, but the more one reflects on the overpowering of world beaters, J. P. Jones and Abe Kiviat, the more astounding is the performances of the old Malvern President.

Of other members of the team nothing but rank bad luck has to be written. W. B Applegarth ought certainly to have been in the final of the sprint instead of D. F. Lippincott—I will draw a veil over the start of that particular event. A great calamity to British hopes occurred in the hurdles when G. R L. Anderson fouled the last obstacle but one, for in a fair run race no one could have prevented him winning the final, as even Americans themselves have admitted. Eddy Owen, the Broughton harrier, had the unusual experience of being badly tumbled over in a couple of races ; his old club mate W. Scott badly hurt his leg in the cross country race while J. T. Soutter will not be able to end his athletic career as he had hoped by helping Scotland against Ireland next Saturday.

The latter's effort in the 1,600 metres relay race was referred to in my letter of yesterday but a great mistake was made when the name of A. H. Jacobs was omitted from the team for this event. Second medals would have been assured and the American would probably not have had such an easy canter. Still on the whole there can be little cause for complaint. Alec Nelson's position has been no sinecure, and though the general arrangements have not been altogether to his satisfaction, we consider the team have, under the circumstances, done extremely well. He has also benefitted by the experience, has seen where faults can be remedied, and given the opportunity he should be able to create much improvement in the future.

As regards the general racing the Americans have easily topped the board by winning 16 of the 31 events, but the outstanding feature was of course the extraordinary running of the Finlander, Hannes Kolehmainen. His two 10,000 metres and two 5,000 metres races the first four days of last week were quite enough for one ordinary Olympiad, but he followed these by winning the cross country event—no light physical feat. Jean Bouin, the Frenchman, must also be congratulated on his running in the 5,000 metres, while J. D. Meredith's run over the 800 metres and half mile was really as great and full value for the world's record he obtained. Yes, the 1912 Olympiad will have to be written down as one of the wonders of the age.

In another place the Sportsman's correspondent says:—Adverse comments concerning the alleged lack of sportsmanship on the part of everything British has caused much annoyance here, not only among the home journalists, but responsible Swedish officials in every branch of sport have entirely disassociated themselves from these unfavourable comments. Mr. C. L. Kornerup, one of the leading authorities on sport in this country, was very indignant when speaking on the subject and his opinion may be taken to be worth some weight seeing that he is Secretary of the International Sports Association of Sweden, of which the Crown Prince is Chairman, was the founder of the Swedish Football Association and President for several years and is now Chairman of the Propaganda Committee of the Olympic Games. He wished it to go forth emphatically that local officials had nothing but the highest praise for the conduct of their English visitors. The general accusation of lack of sportsmanship, he said, must not be taken seriously, but put down to the action of some irresponsible individual anxious to create ill-feeling between the nations. It was absolutely untrue that the Swedish Press had unanimously condemned the English tactics. He had read most of the comments on the games and had not seen anything to justify those particularised. In the past they had always looked to England for the correct thing to do in sportsmanship and the conduct of their representatives in these games had not lessened Swedish admiration for the high standard set up and they would still look to England for an example in the future. Mr. Kornerup particularly referred to the suggestion of brutal and unfair play and the deliberate intention to injure opponents in the football final. It was ridiculously untrue, he declared, to say that the players on both sides attempted to injure each other. It was a very fine game indeed and played by two very great teams. With regard to the accident to the Dane, Buckwald, who broke his collarbone in a collision with Vivian Woodward, there was no better refutation than the statement of the player himself who personally told the Crown Prince that the affair was a pure accident. It was a great pity that these incidents had cropped up, for though sensible people would ignore the statements, they would tend to undo in some quarters the great amount of good that had been accomplished towards the universal entente cordiale.

BRITAIN AND THE OLYMPIC GAMES.

The Olympic Games of Stockholm have or should have taught the British authorities a sharp lesson. Against the splendid American team they were helpless, and, moreover, could not hold their own against Swedes or Finns in some of the more important contests.

There is always a hard luck story to tell when you are whacked, but this time there was not much hard luck. England's athletes went out to be beaten, and those who based their expectations on actual knowledge were not much in error.

But for the glorious and memorable surprise sprung on the Americans by A. N. S. Jackson, the young Oxford runner, who won the 1,500 metres race—a contest which was looked upon as little less than a certainty for either Kiviatt or Jones, of the American team—our showing would have been worse, for our victory in the relay race was a fluke.

Bad luck came when Anderson fell at the second last hurdle in the semi-final, when winning comfortably. He just touched the previous hurdle, got a bit out of his stride, took the next one low, came down on it with his other foot and fell heavily.

He told me afterwards that he thought he got his foot into one of the holes in the track made at the start of the 400 metres race, but I fancy it was touching the previous hurdle that unsteadied him and made him fall.

Then we ought to have had Applegarth in the final of the 100 metres. I was in a perfect position to see who broke the tape, and nothing will ever convince me that he did not beat Lippincott in that race. He might not have beaten Craig in the final but he certainly ought to have been included in it, and it will be remembered that he finished a good third in the 200 metres.

Beaten on our Merits.

These things apart, we were beaten on our merits, and but for our swimmers and our oarsmen we should have cut but a sorry figure at the Games. And it is none the less annoying when we are met by people who might have been consulted with the inevitable. "I told you so."

Our system of athletics is all wrong, and unless something is done at once and kept up during the interval between the fifth Olympiad of Stockholm and the sixth at Berlin in 1916 we shall do no better. That is as sure as that the sun will rise to-morrow.

Haphazard training, our men are taught no scientific methods but just run as well as they can, and train themselves, will never beat the discipline and enthusiasm of the Americans, unless, indeed, we are fortunate enough to find half a dozen Jacksons before the Berlin reunion.

Without wishing to attack anyone, I say now, after thinking the whole thing out, and after seeing the wholesale defeat of our men, that with the same training and coaching as that given the American team we could have won a majority of this year's track events.

And the Amateur Athletic Association and the British Olympic Committee are responsible. In the case of the Association it is more or less because the public mistrust them, and in the case of the other because they do not know and have no power to act if they did.

They say we want money, and the public will not subscribe. So Mr. D'Oyley Laffan told me in the train on our way home. I then told him that they could never get a popular subscription while the Amateur Athletic Association was constituted as it is.

The British sporting public is a very well-educated one, despite everything that can be said to the contrary. They know that members of the Amateur Athletic Association are on the executive of that body because they have axes to grind. Some hold watches and are paid for it ; some make handicaps and are paid for it ; and there are judges and other officials who draw money because of their officials connection with that body.

Rotten System of Government.

The split between the Amateur Athletic Association and the National Cyclists' Union was another disturbing factor. The bitterness of that fight opened the eyes of a lot more people to the rottenness of the system of government of British athletics.

What is wanted is a central body of experts, whose judgment is unimpeachable and who will, as it were, form a second chamber, superior to and independent of the branch associations, such as the Amateur Athletic Association and the National Cyclists' Union, the Amateur Swimming Associations (although that is better managed), the Football Association, and even the Rugby Union.

A National Athletic Council is what is wanted, with good, responsible sportsmen at the head, and until we get it we are bound to be back-marked in future struggles with the Continent and America.

Such a wave of enthusiasm for athletics has swept over the Continent, and it is governed under such admirable conditions in many countries, that the task of winning events at future Olympiads will become harder at each gathering.

In Sweden they have their National Sports Association, and in America their try-outs are watched by men who know an athlete how to train him, can spot his defects, and improve his physical attributes.

What would an American trainer have done with Seedhouse, for instance, and would the coach of an American team have allowed his boys to show such deplorable tactics as ours did in the team race ! He would never have had another chance had he done so.

What can you think of a team the manager of which had a couple of Appeals Committees over him on the battlefield ? Would Mr. Sullivan or Mr. Halpin, of the American, have consented for one instant to such an arrangement ? Ask them.

Victory of Tactics.

The Americans are great in tactics. Tactics won them the 800 metres race, in which Braun, the German champion, was the best man. Tactics would have won them the mile but for the fact that they thought Owen and Baker were the best of the Englishmen and Jackson a negligible quantity. Owen was knocked over on to the grass, and Baker was shut in, and finished with a badly damaged ankle.

We don't want these tactics in British sport ; we don't want men in the sprint, the quarter, the half and the mile to run as if in a team race. But we do want our men to know that they have to meet these tactics, taught by the shrewdest old athletes who ever wore a shoe.

We saw it in the Halswell incident in London. We had it in a good many races in Stockholm. There is always a counter to every move, and we want our men to learn the move and the counter before Berlin comes along.

Another thing we want is the elimination of the pot-hunter : the partial suppression of the handicap system. We want to induce our athletes with esprit de corps. Inter-club matches, such as the 'Varsity sports, would put us on the right road. Men would learn to run for their clubs, and in four years' time would have learnt the lesson properly, and would run for their country.

We might not find a Thorpe, probably the best all-round athlete the world has ever protuced; we might not find a Kolehmanien, or a Jackson, or a Braun (who did not win), but we should put a side in the field who would not be humiliated, and have mud thrown at them for not doing the impossible. It was like putting an army of untrained men, armed with pikes, into the field, with a well-drilled force, with every modern scientific implement. The result was inevitable.

There is just one chance for us. Let the British Olympic Committee at once get a commission appointed to enquire into and suggest reasons for the failure of the British athletes at Stockholm. And when they suggest remedies let them be tried.

The first note of the débacle was struck when the british horde of athletes came into the arena on the opening day of the games, dressed in atrociously-fitting blue uniform suits, and tried to look at their ease against the immaculately garbed Americans. It was but the beginning, and the end was worse.

P. J. Moes.

AMERICA AT THE 1912 OLYMPIC GAMES.

The Olympic games of 1912 are over, and American sportsmen have every reason to be satisfied with the performances of the United States' representatives. In the "field" contests America gained 25 firsts 17 seconds, and 20 thirds—129 points against the whole British Empire's 19 firsts, 21 seconds, and 21 thirds—120 points; whilst Great Britain alone, independent of her Dominions and Colonies, only secured 10 firsts, 15 seconds, and 18 thirds, thus scoring 78 points.

The result of this year's games undoubtedly shows that method and discipline are the golden rules to be followed if success is to be attained.

All the United States' athletes were kept strictly to the business in hand. They took their races seriously and specialised at their various distances and their organisation—from training to diet—was complete.

The Englishmen, on the other hand, were really badly organised; the men were left pretty much to themselves; and in several instances, the training for these International races was anything but systematic.

As a matter of fact, there was no comparison between the American runners and the representatives of the other nations in the attention paid to details. With the one no detail was too insignificant to be ignored, with the British and other athletes very little attention indeed was paid to things such as start, stance etc., which, apparently, they thought of minor importance.

Yet, in several instances, it was these very things that led up to the American successes.

One of the greatest performances of the whole meeting was that of J. E. Meredith (U.S.A.) in the 800 metres. Melvin Sheppard, who won the race last time, in 1min. 52⅘secs. was out to land it again and he realises that his career cannot last much longer, so he wanted to establish a record. He certainly beat his old time; but he ran up against a boy in Meredith, who proved too fast for him, though, in order to win, Meredith had to cover the distance in 1min. 51 $\frac{9}{10}$ secs. and the winner is still only a boy, and when he goes to Pennsylvania and gains in strength and pace, he ought to turn out one of the marvels of the track.

It was really the race of a lifetime, for surely such great runners as Sheppard, Braun, Edmundson, Davenport, Brock, Putnam, Meredith, and Caldwell have never before been brought together in one heat. It was a fast race and keen struggle up to within 50 yards of the post. Sheppard made the pace a cracker, and looked all over a winner, when, nearing the tape, Meredith tore past him, and won by a yard.

Strange to say, though having extremely fast men in the 100 metres, the Americans feared they would not be able to win against G. H. Patching, of South Africa, whose 9⅘ secs. in the A. A. A. Championship had made them ponder, and caused them to watch his work on the track with great concern.

But, as the result proved, these fears were groundless, for, in the final, their sprinters jumped straight off the mark into their stride and actually filled the first three places. D. B. Lippincott's 10⅗ secs. establishes another record, as the previous best for the distance was 10⅘ secs.

C. D. Reidpath also clipped ⅕ of a second off the 400 metres record, winning the event in 48⅕ secs. as against Lieutenant Wyndham Halswell's 48⅖.

A. L. Gutterson's jumping aroused great enthusiam among the experts, and he came in for many hearty congratulations when it was announced that he had put new figures in the book. He cleared 24 feet 11⅛ inches as against the previous best—24 feet 6¼ inches set up by F. C. Irons.

As was generally expected, M. J. Macgrath had matters pretty well all to himself in the hammer-throwing, yet he seized the opportunity to add 2 feet 2 inches on to the length of J. Flannigan's former successful effort, and placed a throw of 179 feet 6½ inches to his name.

One well-known English critic in referring to the games says: "America had a good team and well trained. Folk may sneer at American 'commercialism in sport,' and declare that not for anything would they prepare for athletics as the Yankees do. Let not these people forget two things—that the Americans are respecting the Olympic laws, and that they are being copied by other nations."

FOOTBALL IN CALCUTTA.

The Six-aside Competition for the Indian Daily News trophy is drawing to a close but the games during the past week have not been very exciting. The Middlesex and Calcutta "B" teams put up a good game, each side scoring three goals, but an odd corner to the military team gave them a win. The Town Club beat the Rangers by 1 goal and 2 corners to a goal, and the B'ack Watch "B" ran rings round the Orientals, defeating them 5 to nil. On Friday the best game was between Calcutta and Dalhousie "A" teams, Cacutta winning by 2 goals to 1; the Telegraph Store Yard beat the Moslems by a corner to nil and the City Athletic beat Jora Bagan by 1 goal and 2 corners to 1 goal 1 corner. Four games were down for decision on Saturday and two fair matches were witnessed. Y.M.C.A. "A" team, beat Mohan Bagan "A" team by 2 to nil, causing some surprise and the Rangers "A" defeated the Medicals "B" by 2 to 1 in a well-contested game. Middlesex "B" beat Dalhousie "B" comfortably by 2 goals to 1 and Sova Bazar beat Kumartoli by 2 to 1. On Monday Calcutta were to have met Mohan Magan "B," but the native team were engaged elsewhere and did not turn up, Calcutta thus getting a walk over: of the other games the Black Watch "A" had little difficulty in beating Rangers "A" by 3 goals to 1 and Y.M.C.A. "A" after a good game with the Town Club won by an odd corner, the score being 2 goals 2 corners to 2 goals 1 corner.

The result of the match between the Black Watch and the Greer Sporting Club which ended in a win for the Black Watch caused a protest by the native team who considered they had not been properly dealt with. The I.F.A. Council have however decided that the Black Watch won the game fairly and the protest was set aside.

Calcutta is carrying all before them in the Rugby League. They followed up their victory over the Police by defeating the Barbarians on the 7th instant by 27 points to nil. The Barbarians are more or less of a scratch side, but they played pluckily, though quite outclassed by the Reds. In the first half Leonard got over with the opening try and Cumberlege added the extra points. Leonard next dropped a fine goal. Carrie crossed the line a little later but the try was unconverted and another dropped goal by Kerr brought the score to 16 at half time. Although Calcutta pressed almost throughout the second half the Barbarians did not let them through easily. Three more tries were registered, Cumberlege converting one of these the scores being 2 goals, 2 drop goals and 3 tries to nil in favour of Calcutta at the finish.

The United Services and the Customs have met twice to date. Their first encounter was well contested and the United Services only won by 6 points, a penalty goal to nil. On Monday last they met once more, a very exciting game ending in a win for the United Services by 16 points to 14. The Riversiders went off with a rush and a nice bit of work by Galbraith let Williamson in to score and convert his own goal within three minutes of the start. The United Services then changed the venue and the Customs' backs were kept very busy. Roome eventually barged through and scored, but the attempt to convert was unsuccessful. The Services, however, continued the pressure and Lilly got over between the posts. Walsh again failed to convert and half time arrived with the score 6—5 in favour of the Services. Play was faster on changing ends and Lilly got through soon after resuming. Walsh adding the extra points. The Customs were next prominent and after some good work they were awarded a penalty kick, but Williamson failed to score and Leakie getting possession took the ball down. He was stopped but he got away again soon after and scored the fourth try for the United Services and added the major points himself. The Customs played hard and Williamson, who was in splendid form, got through with a swerving run and scored a try which he converted. A little later he dropped a very fine goal and time was called soon after with the score: United Services 2 goals 2 tries, Customs 2 goals 1 dropped goals.

On Saturday playing on their own ground the Police beat the Barbarians by 18 points to nil. The visitors were not at full strength and the Police had all the best of the play. In the first half Loman dropped a goal and Leonard got over with a try which was not improved upon. On changing ends North, Loman and Wilson scored tries, one of which was converted and the Police thus won by 1 goal, 1 dropped goal and 3 tries to nil.

The best Headlight.

The C.A.V. Model "G" Headlight is admittedly the best and most efficient on the market. It is immensely popular; the demand for it being ever on the ascendant. Its powerful beams brilliantly illuminate the darkest nights, while its fog-penetrating qualities are most marked. A user writes: "The light was magnificent through the dense fog on the Lammermuirs" A unique feature of this lamp is that it never dazzles.

Motoring.

LONDON, Friday, 26th July 1912.

MOTORISTS in general are apt to make strange use of this word "silence." The dictionary defines it thus:—"The condition prevailing when there is no noise". It is a common thing to hear a motorist describe an engine as "absolutely silent." It is incorrect and misleading. Any engine at work makes a noise, although there are degrees in such noise. There are conditions in which it is not heard, but that is where other noises preponderate. Thus we have seen, remarks the Motor News, a chauffeur commence to turn the starting handle of a car standing in the street, under the impression that the engine had stopped, whereas it was still running. A case like this is generally cited as an example of the wonderful "silence" of the car. Silence is a positive thing—there are no degrees. Either there is noise or there is not. An engine making noise is not "silent," although surrounding sounds may drown its beat. So that absolutely there is, we fancy, no perfectly silent car, and the word is used erroneously to express degrees of sound or noise.

A CORRESPONDENT wrote recently to the Motor Press to object to the omission of the date of the car from the description sent to him in reply to an advertisement for a second-hand car wanted. Now the date, in itself an excellent, in some cases an infallible, indication of the style of the car, is not quite so good a criterion of its value as is often supposed by the second-hand car buyer. Condition is of greater relative importance. It may well be that the purchaser does not want to saddle himself with an obsolete type of car, which would be very costly to repair because of the difficulty of replacing worn parts except by having them specially made. But, apart from this consideration, which is certainly a weighty one, there is the fact that some cars, comparatively new in point of style, are worth very much less than an older one. The use to which this one has been put, and the abuse to which the later type of car has been subjected, leave a balance greatly in favour of the older type. Age in motor cars does not necessarily imply senile decay.

THE Touring Club of France, which has a membership of 130,000, has organised a vigorous campaign against the disfurement of the country with advertising signs. An article in the official journal contains the following sentence:—

"O Nature, when will it be possible to see thee without the horrors which disfigure thee? When we have found a way to purify our landscapes from the leprosy of advertisements."

Meanwhile pressure is being brought to bear upon the Government, and three methods have been suggested of dealing with the question of these advertisements, namely:—

1. To boycott the advertisers by abstaining from buying their wares, and from going to their hotels.
2. To make all such advertising illegal.
3. To levy such a tax on it as will limit or end it.

A fourth way has been unofficially suggested, which is nothing less than a general public destruction of the offending announcements, in fact a St. Bartholomew's Day for rural advertisements.

The system which is most likely to prove effective is a heavy tax on the advertiser and on the land owner who derives revenue from the advertisements erected on his land.

THE following are the mechanical details of the "winged motor car" which accomplished a run of 320 miles from Paris to Lyons last week.

The motor car is propelled by means of a two-bladed wing-propeller constructed on the principle of the action of a bird's wing and attached to a shaft at the rear of the car. The propeller is 45 inches in diameter and is protected by a cage. Its maximum number of revolutions is 2,200 per minute. The chassis is that of an ordinary motor car, with the motor and radiator in front. It has a torpedo body built for three persons and designed to offer the least possible resistance to the wind. The motor, a 10-h.p. Labor, controls a shaft running the whole length of the body, with a chain transmission rotating the wing propeller at the rear.

The wheels of the car run free. Beside the driver there is one single lever, which controls at the same time the clutch and the forward and reverse movement of the wing. There is also foot brake acting on the back wheel to be used in combination with the reverse action of the propeller to stop the car. The change of speed is simply regulated by the acceleration or diminution of the speed of the motor.

The weight of the car is 12 cwt. On the trial trip to Lyons with baggage and passengers on board it weighed just over a ton. The time for the run of 320 miles from Paris to Lyons was 19hrs. 30mins., from which 5hrs. 6mins. must be deducted for stoppages. The average speed by this calculation is therefore twenty-eight miles an hour, although the road is a very hilly one. At certain points the speed exceeded sixty miles an hour.

THE best way to carry spare inlet and exhaust valves is to slip the stems through a block of wood of slightly greater diameter than the head of the valve. The spring and washer will keep the block from working off, and no amount of rattling in the tool kit will injure the head of the valve so protected.

THE wheels of a car should be periodically jacked and tested, not only for smoothness of running, but also for side play. If, in spinning a front wheel, a sharp click occurs now and again and the wheel is momentarily checked, it is probable that there is a chipped or split ball in the bearing which should be removed at once or it may do such serious damage as to necessitate the renewal of the entire bearing.

MANY motorists seem to forget that it is just as important that the oil tank should be kept well filled, as it is that they should not run out of petrol. The car owner who fails to provide sufficient lubricating oil for his car has a poor idea of economy. It is a good plan to adopt a system for oiling and greasing a car—on a time table or schedule against forgetfulness. Investigation has shown that most of the troubles that beset the new car owner are due to a lack of knowledge or to carelessness in oiling or greasing his car. To guard against this, most manufacturers provide purchasers of their cars with a lubricating schedule, which can be nailed up in the garage and acts as a constant reminder.

THE ignition wiring of a car should be examined very carefully for signs of wear in the insulation. It is often found that at certain places the wires are exposed to continual, though slight friction, which ultimately wears through the insulation and establishes a short circuit or escape for the electric current. The timely application of a little insulating tape will often save much trouble in this respect.

SHE: "And how is your bachelor friend?" He: "When I saw him last he was mending very slowly." She: "Indeed! I didn't know he'd been ill." He: "He hasn't been—he was sewing fresh buttons on his underwear!"

IN a small town in Cheshire, a group of barnstormers was playing to meagre audiences. The villain dragged the shrinking heroine down the stage to the footlights, and in her ear he hissed, "Are we alone?" "No, guv'nor," interrupted the lone occupant of the gallery, "not to-night, you ain't: but you will be to-morrow night!"

JUST as a train was about to start from a busy station a boy ran up to the ticket-inspector and whispered, "Sir, there's two men travelling on this train, and neither of them has got a ticket." The inspector searched the carriages through, but without avail. Then, seeing his informer standing near the barrier, he shouted, "Where are the two men who are without tickets?" "On the engine!" replied the boy, as he placed himself beyond the official's reach."

The Story Teller.

"DELILAH."

WE were discussing the parson and the sermon generally one Sunday at lunch; and Gregson, who had got as far as his second glass of brown sherry, remarked in an abstracted way:—

"That allusion of his to poor old Sampson brings a peculiarly saddening recollection to my mind."

"How's that?" someone asked.

"It recalls another woman of the Philistines I once came across."

"Well, it'd puzzle them to cut much hair off you, old man," said Harry Burch, one of our captains.

"It wasn't me she operated on, though she did fetch my wool off in the other sense. It was Tommy Batson, of the other battalion—you may have heard of him, though he has gone long ago."

"Little chap that used to ride, wasn't he?" I asked.

"Yes, he used to; he rode once too often for me—drat him!"

We did'nt guess Gregson to go on, for we knew that the yarns of all sorts with which he was literally stuffed—some of them personal reminiscences, and some pure fabrications—flowed out better of their own accord: so we never appeared interested when we wanted to know anything. You see, we knew old Gregson.

Presently he rambled on:—

"It was when we first went out to the Shiny, and thought in our innocence that there was oof to be made out of owning horses. I don't hold that idea quite so much now. There was another fellow, called Smythe, and he, Batson, and I formed ourselves into a syndicate, and bought up a big waler belonging to a fellow in the 20th Dragoon Guards, who was going home. He was a slippery sort of gee that had never been raced; and he didn't care particularly whether he stood on his head or his heels, or neither, so he was called Acrobat.

"There weren't many people could ride him; but Tommy Batson didn't set any more value on his own neck than anybody else did for him, so after a few hair-breadth escapes he and Acrobat got to understand each other a bit. Of course, as usual, we were all as hard up as blazes; but a friendly aunt of Smythe's happened to snuff out at the time, so he put down the dibs. That was his part of the show; I did the training, and Tommy the riding—so the labour was pretty equally divided, as you can see.

"We began with a sky meeting at Nagar, just to see how we got on. Well, the old horse fairly came off, and we walked out of that several hundred rupees to the good. We dropped most of it in Bombay, but pulled it back again at Poona; and when we had been to a few more places we were very well pleased with ourselves.

"Well, in an evil moment we heard of a meeting at a small up-country place called Thundipore. We knew it wasn't a big affair but the amount of money flying about there seemed to be perfectly appalling, and we thought we might as well have some of it. There were a lot of planters there, a few soldiers, some Civil Service fellows, and a sporting rajah or two in the district: so you may imagine that there was a rupee or two amongst them.

"We got down there about a week before the meeting, and looked around us at what was going forward, and the more we looked the more we liked it.

"They didn't seem to have anything that could stand alongside our horse—some of them we had met before, and the others we didn't think much of. However, there are more ways of killing a dog than by hanging him, ain't there?

"They all seemed to have their own opinion of Acrobat at Thundipore, and all dropped in and wanted odds about him. They came it so thick that Smythe began to look blue: but a thought of recent successes and what we had seen of their cracks soon made us feel jubilant again.

"Well, the night of the lotteries came—the one before the races. They had them down at the club. Smythe and I went down, leaving Tommy Batson to dine, go to bed early, and keep himself fit: and if things had seemed balmy before they were perfectly blighting that evening.

"I had seen a few lotteries before, but nothing to come up to that one. Of course, you know the principle of them. The horses are all drawn for in the first instance, then each is sold by auction, and whatever he is knocked down for goes to the man who has drawn him, and a corresponding amount to the pool, which the buyer of the winner duly takes in.

"They all seemed to want to buy our house, and run him up like a suburban villa. We wanted him, too, and had to go up correspondingly.

"Of course we could have allowed him to go, and let them down gently on the course next day; but we had done so much about him before that we had to win, so we wanted him in the lottery. We stuck to them, and sat them out at last. When poor old Smythe got home and made a rough calculation, his face would have made a good study, I tell you!

"We found Tommy in bed, but awake. He got up and joined us in the sitting room in his pyjamas.

"Tommy was rather pleased with himself. He had been out for a stroll after dinner, he said, and had come across a lady he had known under other circumstances—we didn't press him as to what they were. She was the wife of a planter living a bit out of the station, and was so glad to see Tommy again that she wanted him to come out for a ride next morning, and back to chota hazri. She had heard of his arrival, in fact and had come down purposely to find him, her husband having gone down to the lotteries.

"'You can't go,' said Smythe. 'There's lots depending on that race. You must stop here and sit tight.'

"'What bally rot!' replied Tommy. 'There's no gallops to do, a canter will do me good, and I'm not likely to over-eat myself at chota haziri, am I?'.

"Then I chimed in, like a fool.

"'Oh! Tommy won't hurt; he's old and ugly enough to take care of himself. So Smythe gave in, saying we weren't to blame him if anything went wrong, and Tommy went off next morning before we were up.

"I must own to a certain feeling of uneasiness when I went to look at old Acrobat, and, observing that he was in a rather worse temper than usual, reflected that the only man who could ride him was out of our sight and restraining influence, and trapesing, about the country with a—presumably—pretty woman. I prayed inwardly that she might have black hair, and not be particularly desirous of keeping Tommy out in the sun; for Tommy had his weak point like the rest of us, and a woman with a particular shade of auburn hair could do anything she liked with him.

"Well, during the morning a coolie arrived with a note from Tommy, saying he was staying to breakfast, but would come in later; and about noon came another to say he was stopping to lunch, and would join us on the course.

"Things began to look serious then. Smythe ramped up and down the room and cursed like a trooper; he wanted to drive off at once and bring Tommy back by main force. However, he only sent back a note telling him not to be a blooming idiot, and to come in at once. Needless to say, Tommy took no notice of it, so all we could do was to kick our heels about and hope for the best, till it was time to get down to the course and take his racing kit with us.

"There was no sign of Tommy, however, when we got there. Ours was to be the fourth race. After the first I said to Smythe:

"'What do you think about it?'

"'Think! he replied; I think we're blooming well had this time. The little beggar won't be worth putting up after all those meals and bucketting about all day!'

"I won't say what his remarks were after the second race had been run and there were still no signs of Tommy.

"We started around then, and searched all over the course for the twentieth time—not a sign of him was to be seen.

"After the third race I went to get Acrobat ready, while Smythe hung about to look for Tommy. It was not till after he saddling bell had gone that I saw a particularly smart pony trap drive up to the stand, and there was Master Tommy, with a smile of intense satisfaction on his face, seated beside the very smartest and prettiest little woman I had seen in India, and with—horror of horrors!—the very brand of auburn hair I so much dreaded, done in the very way Tommy most admired. We met him as he got out, and, without giving him time to see the lady into the stand or anything else, ran him into the dressing-room and stuffed him into his boots and breeches, while Smythe stood round and solemnly cursed him for all he was worth. Tommy never answered, but only smiled complacently—and we knew that when Tommy did nothing but smile he had all the whisky on board that he could carry conveniently.

"We got him weighed and trotted him down to that post with hardly a moment to spare, and only felt relief when we saw the old horse start more or less kindly, and get well into his stride at once. It was a long race, and there looked to be some stayers in the field—eight of them, there were—and they were all watching Acrobat and waiting on him—Tommy leading by a length or so, and appearing very much pleased with himself as they passed the stand for the first time.

"We watched him anxiously through our glasses. He kept on smiling; then, finding he could keep his lead, he apparently got a bit above himself and began to show off and increase it, touching old Acrobat up with the spur once or twice, which was always a bad thing to do. Then, as the others came up to him again, he shook his mount up a bit—this with half the course to go, and for no apparent reason! When they came towards the stand the second time the old gee's eyes were showing their whites in a most ominous way, and his ears were well back; but Tommy was still smiling, though to our horror we noticed that his legs were moving a little too much, and he seemed a bit short of wind.

"Smythe ran down to the rails and hurled objurgations at him as he passed that should have pulled anybody together, but only evoked a placid smile from Tommy and a roar of laughter from the crowd. The climax came at the turn beyond the stand. One of the field drew away and came up to Acrobat. Tommy caught his horse by the head and tried to keep his lead, but Acrobat didn't respond; then Tommy drove both his spurs in, and caught him one over the flank. It was all over then. Acrobat gave a couple of bucks shot Tommy over his head, and went home. Batson broke his collar-bone. We wished it had been his neck, and told him so every hour for months."

"What did you put it down to?" I asked.

"We could never get anything out of him except that he'd only had claret for breakfast and one peg at lunch. He stuck to that."

"Wouldn't give the lady away, eh?"

"That's about it. We just managed to pay our way out of the place, but it broke us all. So now you see why I feel so strongly with poor old Samson on the subject of Delilah."

SOMEONE or other once said, "It's a poor rule that won't work both ways." Well, try telling a mother that she looks so like her daughter that you cannot tell them apart. And then try it on the daughter.

THE LATE MR. A. O. HUME.

MR. ALLAN OCTAVIAN HUME, whose death took place, after a long illness, at his residence in Upper Norwood on 31st July, was a many-sided man, whose claims to remembrance are therefore proportionately wide and comprehensive. The youngest son of the great reformer and economist, Joseph Hume, the deceased gentleman was born on 4th June 1829, and was in due course sent to the East India College at Haileybury to be educated for the East India Company's service. This he joined when only seventeen years of age, as a Collector and Magistrate in the Bengal Civil Service. From this rank he was eventually promoted to Commissioner of Customs, and then to Secretary to the Government of India for the Department of Revenue, Agriculture, and Commerce, a post which he held when the present writer joined the Indian Zoological Survey in the middle seventies. At the outbreak of the Mutiny, Mr. Hume, then a Magistrate at Etawah raised a local force, with which, like many other civilians, he did good service in several engagements. For this he received the thanks of the Viceroy and a C. B. ship; the latter honour being the only recognition of his manifold services ever accorded by Government. He retired from Government service in 1882, and settled at Norwood in 1890.

From his parentage and bringing up, it could hardly be expected that Mr. Hume should be naught but a strong radical and a reformer; this predominant trait in his character leading him to found and organise in the early eighties the Indian National Congress, of which the first session was held in 1885. This Congress, we believe, was founded without any revolutionary ideas, being primarily intended as a safety valve for the ventilation of native opinion. Another of his hobbies was spiritualism, and we believe, what is termed esoteric Buddhism, which he studied in association with Madame Blavatsky, who was a frequent visitor to his beautiful residence in Simla. His radicalism persisted till the last, as till quite recently at all events, he was president of the Dulwich Radical Association.

Eminent as was Mr. Hume as an administrator and politician, his chief claim to permanent recognition rests on his work as a naturalist and more especially on the magnificent collection of Indian big game skulls and horns, birds, and birds' eggs he brought together at his residence in Simla. The great bulk of these he presented to the British Museum (Natural History):—an act of generosity the more noteworthy on account of the circumstance that he had received a very handsome offer to purchase the collection of birds from a Foreign Government. The gift of these collections took place at various times between 1885 and 1891; the specimens of birds and eggs amounting to something like 70,000. To pack and despatch these to London, the late Dr. R. Bowdler Sharpe was specially sent to Simla by the Trustees of the Museum. Mr. Hume reserved a few of his best Indian big game heads, with the understanding, we believe, that these too were to come to the national collection after his death.

Writing of the Hume collection of birds, Dr. Sharpe, in the History of the Collections in the British Museum (Natural History) states that not only did Mr. Hume collect vigorously himself, but he employed naturalists in all parts of the Indian Empire, and himself conducted expeditions to Sind and the Mekran Coast, the Andaman and Nicobar Islands, the Laccadives, and the hill regions of Manipur, etc.

"His assistant, William Ruxton Davison, was provided with a staff of taxidermists, elephants, etc., and travelled for Mr. Hume in various districts of British India, during the space of thirteen years. Davison was a skilled taxidermist and collector, and his explorations in Tenasserim and the Malay Peninsula resulted in the discovery of many new and interesting species. Mr. Hume also supplemented his own endeavours by the purchase of several other well-known collections, such as the late Mr. Mandelli's series of Sikkim and Tibetan birds, the late Mr. W. E. Brooks' collections from the plains of India, and many others. For fifteen years he brought out a journal, "Stray Feathers" (1873—1888), in which he published the results of his own efforts and those of his colleagues.

"The Hume collection was one of the most splendid donations ever made to the nation and added to the Museum, which had previously but a poor series of Indian birds, the largest and most complete collection of birds and eggs from the British Indian Empire the world has ever seen." Writing, in the same volume, of the Hume collection of mammals, Mr. O. Thomas refers to "the magnificent collection of heads and horns of Indian ruminants found by Mr. Hume during many years, including a number of record heads, and numbering 223 specimens. Also 371 skins of Indian mammals obtained in various districts with his famous collection of birds, and including the types of Prionodon maculosus, Sciurus rufigenis, Mus humei, and Sciuropterus davisoni."

In addition to the aforesaid "Stray Feathers," Mr. Hume's zoological works included "My Scrap Book; or Rough Notes on Indian Oology and Ornithology"; "Nests and Eggs of Indian Birds," of which a second edition was brought out by Mr. E. W. Oates; "The Indian Collectors' Vade Mecum"; in conjunction with Mr. Davison, "A Revised List of the Birds of Tenasserim"; and, in co-operation with Mr. C. H. T. Marshall, "The Game Birds of India, Burma and Ceylon," which is the finest of them all.

With a peculiar and absolutely characteristic manner of his own, Mr. Hume was one of the kindest and most hospitable of men, and his house at Simla being open to all workers in Indian Natural History. To him and his wife and daughter the present writer owes a debt of gratitude for having been nursed through a severe enteric attack contracted during a journey through Rupsu. Indeed, it is not too much to say, that, humanly speaking, it is to the Hume family he owes his life on that occasion, which was an autumn in the late seventies.

With the exception of Colonel Godwin Austen, who is happily still with us, A. O. Hume was the last of a distinguished band of naturalists which included John Anderson, W. T. Blanford, and E. W. Oates, and who did so much during the last three decade of the nineteenth century for Indian Zoology.

ERI SILK.

The Agricultural Research Institute at Pusa, which our readers may be reminded, India owes entirely to the generosity of an American gentleman, is continually endeavouring to promote industries which it is hoped may prove beneficial to the country as a whole. Its latest effort in this direction is an endeavour to promote the cultivation and use of a local Assamese product known as eri, or endi, silk. From what we are told in a recent issue of the entomological series of the memoirs of the Indian Department of Agriculture by Messrs. Maxwell-Lefroy and C. H. Ghosh, it appears that eri silk is the product of the caterpillar of a large and handsome moth, somewhat recalling the Ailanthus silk moth of Japan. This moth is a native of Assam, where the caterpillar feeds chiefly upon the leaves of the castor oil plant.

For a long period the silk of the cocoons has been spun and woven into cloth by the Assamese for local use; and recently a certain quantity has been exported to Europe with such portions of silkworm and tussore silk as cannot be reeled, but are capable of being used in making spun silk. The reason for this association is that eri silk cannot be reeled or wound in the ordinary manner, owing to the fact that the cocoons, in place of consisting of a single continuous thread, are formed by the caterpillars in separate flaky layers. The cocoons likewise differ from those of silkworm silk in the circumstance that the moths can make their way out at one end by merely pushing aside the constituent layers, without cutting or softening the fibres; the end selected for the emergence not being really closed, but merely blocked in such a manner with loops of silk, that while the imprisoned moth can easily make its way out, would-be intruders from the outside are unable to effect an entrance. Owing to this circumstance the silk can be used without sacrificing the life of the insect by which it was made; and altogether apart from other considerations, this has the great advantage of rendering the silk acceptable to Jains and other sects who object to use material which can be obtained only by the taking of life.

Although hitherto restricted to Assam, the cultivation of eri silk can almost certainly be extended to other parts of India possessing a suitable climate, as indeed is practically proved by the erection of special breeding sheds at Pusa, where many broods of the caterpillars have been raised and developed into the adult moths. Although, as already mentioned, the silk cannot be reeled directly off the cocoons like silkworm and tussore silk, it can readily be spun in the same fashion as cotton, and subsequently woven into a most excellent and durable cloth. This cloth is, indeed, the most durable yet known in India, being far superior to all kinds of cotton-cloth, and therefore admirably suited for all kinds of jungle and shikar wear. It takes dyes remarkably well, especially the ordinary Indian vegetable dyes, which are in reality much better suited to silk than they are to cotton. In Assam the natives spin eri silk with an ordinary spindle; but a machine is already in use for this purpose at Pusa which, of course, gives a much larger output with the same expenditure of labour.

It is recommended—partly, it would appear, in respect to the difficulty of procuring a sufficient supply of food-plants for the caterpillars—that the culture of eri silk should be carried out at a number of small stations rather than at a few large stations. Even at the present time there is a considerable demand for the cocoons, which if it holds and increases may be met by an increased production on a small scale in numerous separate localities.

"It remains to be seen," writes Mr. Lefroy, "whether it will be profitable to take it up on a large scale for sale in India or Europe; the sole disadvantage is the immense amount of space required for rearing the worms, and we do not at present advise anyone to take it up on a large scale unless the spinning and weaving can be taken up with it and finished cloth produced."

Needless to say, the authorities at Pusa have our best and most cordial good wishes for success in this experiment.

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

THE third day of the Calcutta First Monsoon Meeting on Saturday last was signalised by some very good racing, and in almost every event we witnessed good contests and good fields. The recent rain had made the going decidedly holding and when the hurdle races were being run it was observed that in places the fields galloped through sheets of water and mud, but on the flat course, although it was slow, the grass-covered sand provided a sound and good galloping surface. The attendance was good and there was a lively amount of speculation in the Ring, even though the bookmakers reported that there was very little ready money. This, considering that there are only about three or four heavy bettors in India, and that one of them is at the moment absent in England, is not surprising. As a matter of solid fact, both here and in Western India the amount of race-course betting is very small compared to even one of the smaller meetings at the Parks at Home and the hare that has been started about the heavy gambling on race-courses and the grand-motherly legislation that has been undertaken are extremely foolish when viewed through glasses that are not smoked by ill-informed prejudice. There is no heavy gambling on race-courses in India for the best of all possible reasons that the average race-goer is a small bettor and cannot afford to be otherwise. The men who do bet in big sums can be counted on the fingers of one hand and can well afford to indulge themselves in this or in any other hobby. There are few cases, comparatively speaking, of men who have been ruined on the Turf in India and the Defaulters' List and the small amounts for which default has been made are the best answer to the stupid agitation which has been started on the other side of India. It is the exception rather than the rule to find a backer who has the equivalent of a ten-pound note on a race in India, the majority of the backers being content with a ten-rupee note representing the large sum of 13*s.* 4*d.*, and any bookmaker with any experience at all of India and the average run of the speculations at the various meetings, will bear out this statement. The man who can afford to keep a steam yacht, or a grouse-moor has surely a right to do so, in the same way as he has a right to put five hundred pounds into a company, or on a horse, or in the purchase of shares! The Poona results so far are proof positive of the ineptness of this recent legislation and we are told by not one but many of those, who are at present assisting at the Western gathering, that if this state of affairs is to prevail next year the majority of the owners will up stick and come eastwards to race at Calcutta in the autumn, giving Poona a very wide berth.

THERE were only six races in Saturday's card, three of them over hurdles, as the Stewards divided the amateur jump race a proceeding that some owners of flat race horses seemed to think unnecessary and it was advanced that it was now the turn of some of the flat racing division to be given two races in one card, seeing that the jumpers have been more than once favoured in this direction. The Stewards, however, were quite justified in dividing last Saturday, as there were twenty entered and of these fourteen started—six in one division and eight in the other. The first race on the card was the Division I of the Amateur Hurdle Handicap, which, when Pilot's number was found to be missing from the frame, owing to his having hit his leg at exercise, was booked a good thing for Lady Leonard with Fame and Frank the only two others backed. Lady Leonard won after a good tussle with Frank all the way to the last obstacle; here she shook off her pertinacious challenger who had had all that he wanted and she also had no difficulty in keeping Fame at bay. Mr. Kenworthy rode the winner in very good form.

ONLY seven out of the twelve left in went for the Entally Plate, Betty Birr, on the strength of her having dead-heated with Pilot in the Amateur Plate (6 furlongs) on the first day, being in hot request. The horse-watchers and their clients were also, so it was reported, backing her on the strength of a clocked gallop. It was all wrong, however, as the little mare was one of the earliest beaten and the second favourite, Bushey Dame, found no difficulty in scoring. Pyers Mostyn ran second and his jockey reported afterwards that although the horse caught hold and galloped till the home turn, the moment he reached that point he threw up the sponge and would not try another yard. Bushey Dame won comfortably with the big weight of 10st. 5lb. in the saddle.

THEN followed two more jump races—the Open Pony Hurdle Handicap and the Division II. of the Amateur Hurdle Handicap. A good field of eight went for the former event, Miss Clare, Late Night, whom Mr. Evers has sold to Mr. McCall, and Clear Out being the only ones not declared. Clear Out's declaration to start went amiss as also had that of Rowley Mile in the preceding race, and as that of Politesse did later: these declarations having all somehow or other found their way into the wrong boxes. The two selected for this race were Glory, who started at 5 to 4, and Ormley, who was at twos, but there was also a lot of money for Wal at fives and Etna at sixes, but we understand that the owner had very little on the ultimate winner, Master Val, late Edwards, who started at twelves. Ormley ran very badly and so did Etna, who was never in the fighting line at all and was in the back row most of the way. It was her first time out over hurdles and she may not have been particularly happy. We expect a better performance when she has had more practice jumping. The race resolved itself into a duel between Master Val and Glory, a most exhilarating contest taking place over the last three fences, Master Val, well ridden by Randall, only winning in the last stride by a neck. Two strides before the chair they were an absolute dead-heat and no one knew till the numbers went up what had won. Ida Coil showed promise in this race and will improve on this performance, as she is coming on and a good school in public like this will have done her good.

ANOTHER much-fancied one went down in the Amateur Hurdle Handicap Division II., for which Daisy Priam was picked to win with Peer Ray second choice and practically nothing else backed, as the owner of the ultimate winner, Rough Luck, had the large sum of a ten-rupee note on at 12 to 1. Daisy Priam ran badly and was well beaten two fences from home, whilst Peer Ray, who is very unschooled, was late in going after the leader, Rough Luck, who was in many people's opinion very lucky to win. He jumped well but is a very bad-mannered little horse and was at his old tricks bounding and rearing all over the place at the start. Rifleman also gave a good deal of trouble and on one occasion jumped through the rubber of the starting-gate. It was a slow-run race and the soft course was not improved by the two races that had already previously been run over it. Rough Luck got to the front soon after the third fence and won the rest of the way nicely ridden by his owner.

THE disappointment of the day was Wise Hawk, who was greatly fancied for the Kidderpore Plate, in which he looked on the handicap to hold a particularly good chance, besides being over a distance that suits him a great deal better than a 6-furlong dart. He never got going and was well behind the ruck all the way over, performing the reverse of generously to all appearances. This form is too bad to be his true running and the horse must either be seriously amiss, or else has turned into an arrant rogue. According to our reading of the race he never galloped a single yard and must be on this performance awarded the rogue's badge unless there is some other explanation. But whilst Wise Hawk covered himself with ignominy his great little rival, Sea Lad, who also had a good following, performed with great brilliance and bravery. His onslaught upon Santoinette, who was going very well at the distance and looked very like winning, was a thing most racing men would go far to see. Mr. Evers rode him beautifully and the horse responding gamely to his jockey's call came through like a flash in the last furlong and a half and beat Santoinette home a neck. Light Metal, who had 7st. 4lb. or 2st. 12lb. from the top weight, was third, only a head in front of Pressy, who was conceding her 13lb. It does not make Light Metal out a great deal of use at the moment.

NINE went out for the Selling Race out of the twelve left in and it was said that Rowley Mile's declaration was forgotton or he would have made up the baker's dozen. Her stable greatly fancied Winsome and Major Ormond Winter got up himself to ride her. She soon touched a short price and was at one time at 6 to 4, her actual S. P. being about two's taking the average of the Ring quotations. Haloya was well backed at threes and there was also a bit of money for Murmur and old Jack Sheppard. Winsome ran forward most of the way but was beaten at the end of the straight the moment Haloya and Jack Sheppard challenged and the former went on to win fairly comfortably by two and a quarter lengths, two lengths between Jack Sheppard and Winsome and Lady Ratcliffe, who dead-heated for third honours. This last-mentioned fact deprived Winsome's backers of the chance of saving anything out of the wreck in place bets. Details appear elsewhere.

THE programmes of the Second Calcutta Monsoon Meeting were considered by the Stewards on Monday last and will shortly be published. It is, we believe, decided to have a four-day meeting instead of only three as so far advertised. This will mean that the meeting opens on Wednesday, 4th September, and finishes on Saturday, 21st September, the two intervening days being the 7th and 14th.

THE C.L.H. hold their regimental gymkhana on the 31st instant on the Ballygunge maidan and a good programme has been put forward. There is no racing in Calcutta on that day.

THE entries for the fourth day of the Calcutta First Monsoon Meeting are very good on paper, but as there were in three of the five races advertised a number of double entries the Stewards decided to frame an extra race and put in an amateur flat race which has drawn 21, and it is said may be divided. The class is so widely divergent that we do not envy the handicapper his task.

As a result of recent adventures Lola, Reinforcement, Ida Coil and Foxglove are all going tender if not actually lame and Pilot is also still an absentee. The going in Calcutta owing to the recent torrents of rain is very treacherous at the moment.

THE Third Extra Meeting at Poona opened in a drizzle but these depressing weather conditions did not obtain for very long and the sun soon dispersed the clouds and the remainder of the card was put through in fine weather. The attendance was larger than on either of the previous days and the race special from Bombay was better patronised. The public used the betting machines fairly well but the totalizator continues to have little attraction for the owner. In this connection the Stewards of the W.I.T.C. were to meet to consider the situation created by the poor support given to the totalizator. We also learn that house-owners, hotel-keepers, and trades people in Poona are thinking of memorializing the Governor. They represent that their livelihood depends on the Poona Season which has been practically killed by the restrictions imposed on racing.

Fields on Saturday were good and the programme of seven events provided excellent sport. The Little Beginners' Plate opened the ball, sixteen facing the starter. Reminder, who had won a race at the First Extra Meeting but was disqualified for crossing, was the public fancy and he fully justified the confidence placed in him as he led most of the way and won very easily from Mahboob. The closed race, the Club Plate, brought out five, Pretty Good Sort owned by Captain Fell and Mr. Wilson and ridden by the former was the tip and the mare made no mistake, winning comfortably from her stable companion Silver Bolt.

Then came the first division of the Lohagoan Plate, for which eleven came under starter's orders. Aasud, late Far East, had matters all his own way and won in hollow fashion by four lengths, nicely ridden by Brown. Byramjee's stable also took the next race, the Monsoon Plate. The public backed Lord Merv as if all was over, but though he flattered his supporters till the distance from here he was done with and could finish no nearer than fourth, Brown riding a fine finish and landing a victory for Macann by a neck from Malmsey.

The Medium Plate brought out ten, Mil leading from short to finish and winning comfortably by half a length. The totalizator paid Rs. 112 on a win ticket—the best win return of the afternoon.

In the Hopeful Plate Bustan made the running to the bend where he was done with, leaving Gowahajmer and Wireless in front. At the finish Lord Durham came with a rush and challenged the leader, Gowahajmer just staying him out to win by half a length.

The Second Division of the Lohagoan Plate brought the programme to a close. Nine ran and Majesty was the favourite but was never in it. Brazee, Galiard, and Baloz were prominent all the way, the last named staying out a challenge from Fado at the finish and winning by half a length.

For the Derby of 1914 no fewer than 392 entries have been made. This is easily a "record" number. The previous best total was that of 371 in 1910. For this year's Derby there were 359 entries; for next year's the aggregate was 328. There were 363 for 1911, 300 for 1909, and 290 for 1908. The advance now obtained is, of course, a healthy sign. The Oaks of 1914 has also closed with the splendid total of 304 entries. This figure compares with that of 260 for 1912 and one of 264 for 1913. Particulars of the entries made in New York and Paris have not yet been received. They number 65. So far as we know at present the biggest subscriber is Sir John Robinson, who has nominated twelve of the yearlings he is sending to Doncaster in September. Among them are a colt by St. Frusquin out of Golden Hope, who is three parts brother to England; a colt by Gallinule out of Thampa Bay; another by Cicero out of Pindi; a colt by St. Amant out of Ardmore, and two colts by Desmond—one out of Yankee Melody and the other out of Sunburst. The Duke of Portland and Colonel Hall Walker have both entered ten. His Grace's team includes four colts by William the Third; two each by Marco and Eager, one by Colin, and one by Missel Thrush.

Seven of the Tully-bred yearlings that have been nominated are by White Eagle, and another is Carrickfergus, a half-brother, by Count Schomberg, to Prince Palatine. There is a Derby "ring" about that name Carrickfergus, and its bearer is a very promising colt indeed. There is the classic stamp on him already. Seven of the Sledmere string have been put into the Derby. They are colts by Desmond out of Altesse, St. Frusquin, out of Hackler's Pride, Sundridge out of Ladytown, and Desmond out of Little Eva; fillies by William the Third out of Game Chick, St. Fruquin out of Lady Linton, and Desmond out of Veneration II. The last-named is, of course, a sister to Craganour.

The Duke of Westminster, Sir R. Waldie Griffith, Mr. August Belmont, and Mr. Leopold de Rothschild all name six; Lord Derby, Mr. Arthur James, Mr. E. Kennedy, and Mr. Charles Carroll have made five nominations each, and four entries have been made by Mr. Buchanan, Sir Ernest Cassel, Mr. Hulton, Sir Robert Jardine, Mr. J. B. Joel, Mr. S. B. Joel, Major Loder, Mr. L. Neumann, Lord Rosebery, Mr. J. C. Sullivan, and Mr. Reid Walker. The King is represented in the Derby by Sunni, by Sundridge out of April Princess, and by Brakespear, by Spearmint out of Guinea Hen. For the Oaks, His Majesty nominates La Marquise, by Marcovil out of Princesse de Galles, and by White Locks, by The White Knight out of Loch Doon.

It is particularly interesting to find that three of the entries for the Derby come from South America. Mr. Luis Castells has put in a bay colt by Spearmint out of Reine Claude, and a brown colt by Radium out of Trefle, while Mr. W. Paats, the manager of the Ojo de Agua Stud, has nominated a bay colt by Cyllene out of Charmazel named Argentino. When I saw Cyllene shipped for Buenos Ayres at Southampton four years ago Mr. Paats told me that he should give consideration to the idea of mating him with a few mares to English time with a view to sending the produce to England to race. With regard to the yearlings nominated by Mr. Castells, the owner of Your Majesty, they are, of course, the children of mares bought in foal on behalf of that gentleman by Mr. Tanner at the December Sales in 1910. Reine Claude (by Persimmon out of Luscious), carrying a foal by Spearmint, cost 1,700 guineas, the vendor being Lord Hamilton of Dalzell, and Trefle, by Sainfoin out of Cimiez, sold by Major Roberts fetched 900 guineas.

From a Bangalore correspondent:—An important case, which will interest owners as well as trainers, was argued in appeal against the decision of the Amildar of the Bangalore Taluq, who sentenced Mr. Rungaswamy, son of Mr. Rungiah Gouden of the Nilgherries, and his clerk, Thomas, to a fine of Rs. 200 each for removing five race-horses, valued at Rs. 20,000, without the consent of P. McQuade, trainer. The appeal was argued before the Deputy Commissioner and District Magistrate on the 5th instant by Mr. Surya Narayana Rao, assisted by Mr. Surya Prakas. Counsel for the appellants began his arguments by stating the facts of the case. He narrated the circumstances which led up to the removal of the race-horses from the custody of McQuade by the appellants. He then proceeded to show from the oral evidence and from the exhibits in the case that McQuade was only a servant of Mr. Rungiah Gouden and quoted several authorities to show that the possession of the servant is the possession of the master. He argued that McQuade had no lien upon the horses either by contract or by law and that a removal of the horses from McQuade either by or on behalf of Mr. Rungiah Gouden could not be looked upon as a theft since Mr. Rungiah Gouden was taking away his own property from his servant who had its custody. Counsel then went into the question of whether the removal of the horses was dishonest. He said that dishonesty, in accordance with the Indian Penal Code, implied the idea of wrongful gain and wrongful loss. In this case there was no wrongful gain to the appellants and no wrongful loss to McQuade, who had his remedy in a Civil Court for any wages that he might consider to be due to him, and McQuade had no authority either by law or contract to retain valuable horses costing Rs. 20,000, for the payment of any small sum which he considered to be due to himself. He added that the removal of the horses by the accused was under a bona fide claim of right. Mr. Rungaswamy being as much the owner of the race-horses as Mr. Rungiah Gouden himself, since both being members of a joint undivided Hindu family. Counsel then characterized several of the findings of the Lower Court as incorrect and concluded by stating that no criminal case had been made out against the accused and prayed that they might be acquitted. Mr. Vardachar, who appeard for the respondent, replied briefly stating that McQuade was not a servant of Mr. Rungiah Gouden and that he had a lien on the horses. He said that illustration J. to Section 378 of the Indian Penal Code was exactly in point, namely, "if A owes money to Z for repairing the watch and if Z retains the watch lawfully as a security for the debt, and A takes the watch out of Z's possession with the intention of depriving Z of the property as a security for his debt, he commits theft, inasmuch as he takes it dishonestly." On the analogy of the illustration, McQuade had repaired the race-horses by having trained them and he was entitled to retain them until he was paid for the repairs. Counsel concluded by stating that the removal of the horses while there were disputes by Mr. Rungiah Gouden and McQuade as to the charges for training was dishonest and that therefore the decision of the Lower Court was correct. Counsel for the appellants then made a brief reply. Judgment has been reserved and will be delivered during the course of the week.

In consequence of the enquiry by the Rangoon Stewards into the running of d bb g Ludo in the Rangoon Handicap at Rangoon on the 22nd June 1912 the owner, Maung Maung, the trainer, Mg. The last of the triangular test matches between England and Australia began at the Oval on Monday, the weather was showery and England had first lease of a soft wicket. When stumps were drawn for the day 233 had been scored for the loss of 8 wickets. Hobbs (66) Woolley (62) and Rhodes (49) were the chief contributors.

The innings closed for 245 on Tuesday. The Australians then went in and had made 51 for two wickets when play ceased.

There has been no little discussion in connection with the method of scoring in the triangular cricket tournament. Should Australia win this final test match England and Australia will finish level. The Board of Control therefore met on Monday to consider the proposal to play a fourth test between England and Australia if this should be necessary. This was, however, overruled and it was decided that the winners of this match should be declared champions of the triangular contest. If the present game is not finished in six days another meeting of the Board will be held.

The following are results of the important cricket matches played in England during the past week:—

Kent beat Somerset and Taunton by eight wickets.

Yorkshire beat Middlesex at Leeds by 197 runs.

The match between Australians and Worcestershire at Worcester has been abandoned owing to rain.

Kent beat Gloucestershire by nine wickets at Cheltenham.

Sussex and Essex drew at Eastbourne, Sussex leading on the first innings.

Yorkshire beat Notts, at Harrowgate, by an innings and 102 runs.

The Australians drew with Gloucestershire at Cheltenham. Warwickshire drew with Surrey, at Birmingham. In these two matches, the first named team led on the first innings.

The South Africans defeated Sussex at Brighton, by four wickets.

The matches between Lancashire and Middlesex at Liverpool, and Hampshire and Essex at Southampton were abandoned, neither side scoring points.

The Presidency vs. Parsees cricket match will take place at Poona on the 26th, 27th and 28th instant. The following will represent the Parsees:—Dr. H. D. Kanga (Captain), M. B. Vatcha, M. D. Parekh, J. S. Warden, J. Elavia, H. F. Mulla, R. P. Meherhomji, D. K. Kapadia, D. D. Driver, J. Elchidana and P. D. Chotia. K. M. Mistry and Bulsara are unable to take part owing to indisposition. The following are probable selections for the Presidency team:—F. L. Sprott (Bombay), Major Greig (Poona), J. S. Milne (Bombay), W. S. Halliley (Bombay), Major Heath (Ahmednagar), S. Cooper (Ahmednagar), T. H. Watts (Bombay), H. Cheetham (Kathiawar), Captain Turner (Karachi), Captain Haughton (Poona), P. M. D. Sanderson (Bombay), Travers (Karachi), or Chetham (Karachi).

The British Medical Journal has discovered a peril to health where one would least expect to find it—on the cricket field. Some of our bowlers, we are told, indulge in a practice which lays them open to the danger of contracting lockjaw.

"A few weeks ago," says the writer, "an objection was made upon an English cricket ground to an Australian player, on the ground that he had used some powdered resin in order that his fingers might get a firmer and surer hold upon the cricket ball. Without expressing an opinion as to whether this be right or wrong according to the ethics of our great national game, we have no hesitation in saying that for sanitary reasons it is far better than the plan adopted by many of our own bowlers.

"One of our best professional bowlers wets the tips of his fingers against his tongue every time that he walks from the wicket on his way to take his run before delivering the ball. And we have seen a member of our own profession—an excellent all-round cricketer of the present day do exactly the same thing. We should have expected him to set a better example.

"Other bowlers, not finding the surface of the ball quite to their liking, rub it in the dust of some bare patch near the wicket. To this we raise no objection. It takes off the human moisture and grease, and renders the touch more pleasant.

"The customary licking of his fingers by the bowler is nearly as bad as the licking of the ball itself. Were there a crack or some other raw surface upon the bowler's lip, it would be a perfectly simple thing for the germs of lockjaw which the ball had picked up from the dust of the field—their natural home—or even for the pallid, corkscrew-like microbe of another terrible disease, to find an entrance into the living tissue, and there to establish its loathsome colony."

After a series of twelve trial matches at Capetown the following footballers have been selected to represent South Africa in the Rugby football tour in Great Britain in 1912-13: Full-backs, G. Morkel and Meintjes: three-quarters, Stegmann, Mills McHardy, Vanderhoff, R. Luyt, Krige G. Morkel, and Wrentmore; half-backs, F. Luyt, Immelman, Dobbin, and McCulloch; forwards, Knight, Delaney, Shum, D. Morkel, Braine, W. Morkel, Francis, J. Luyt, Ledger, Louw, Thompson, Cronje Millar, and Van Buuren. The right is reserved to call upon Roos, De Wit, and Joubert, who are now in England.

The Council of the Football Association, at their meeting at Bournemouth on Saturday, came to a very important decision regarding the Football Association Cup Final Tie. They agreed that in the event of each side being level at the end of ninety minutes' play at the first meeting, an extra half-hour shall be played. This is a move which will doubtless receive a general welcome from football enthusiasts. Recently drawn games at the Crystal Palace have been too frequent, and there has been consequently a danger of this great event of the Association football season losing some of its popularity. The last three Cup Finals were left undecided at the first meeting, much to the disappointment of thousands of eager followers of the game who made long journeys to London from the far North and the Midlands to witness them. At the replays it has been customary to play extra time should the sides be level. The Council's decision will make the chances of drawn games less likely, and the play under the new conditions will probably be more keen.

The Calcutta Swimming Club held a two lengths "Clothes" handicap at the Baths last Friday evening with the following results:—

Heat 1.—H. Jefford scr., net time 49secs., 1; F. Vandyke, 3secs. start, 52-3/5secs., 2.

Heat 2.—G. S. Young scr., net time 49secs., 1; H. Hainsworth scr. (slowed down) 2.

Final.—Young, time 47-4/5secs., 1; Hainsworth, 50-3/5secs., 2.

The following are the entries to date for the Durand Football Tournament:—South Lancashire Regiment, Royal Scots, Gordon Highlanders, Black Watch, Connaught Rangers and the West Riding Regiment.

The Bombay Gymkhana were compelled to abandon their weekly mud sports meeting last Wednesday owing to the heavy rain and consequent sodden state of the turf.

Bombardier Wells, the English Heavy-weight Champion, having disposed off Tom Kennedy, has left the States and returned to England. No immediate matches could be fixed up for him; Palzer was apparently not at all keen on a return encounter, the Iowan's aspirations being all centred in the endeavour to get Jack Johnson into a ring with him. The Bombardier proposes to be in England about three months, after which he will return to the States. He is very popular across the Herring Pond and has been promised several matches—Jim Stewart, Carl Morris, Luther M'Carty are likely opponents, while a return encounter with Palzer and a problematic match with Johnson are also talked of. As soon as Wells has had a rest, he is willing, he states, to meet any heavy-weight in England including Gunner Moir. This must be good news to the Gunner who has been running after Wells for a second battle for a long while.

Joe Jeannette is most anxious to get another crack at Jack Johnson and complains bitterly at the way his repeated challenges have been ignored by the Champion. Jeannette has accepted with alacrity an offer made by Mr. Victor Breyes for a match with Johnson to be staged in Paris. "Lil Arthur" has been offered $30,000 for his end, win, lose or draw, but so far has made no move.

Jennette is confident of licking him and has declared that after beating Johnson, he will retire from the ring and hand over the title to the white man whom the public believes stands out as being able to defend it.

Anthony J. Wilding, All-England Champion of the last three years, has decided practically to retire from first class lawn tennis. Business calls prevent him giving all the attention he would like to the game, though whenever possible, he hopes to still take part in tournaments. Whether he defends the Championship or not next year entirely rests on his work next July.

A very representative gathering of sportsmen met at the Manchester Hotel on Thursday in mail week when the Athletes Advisory Club held an open discussion on the athletic failures of Great Britain at the recent Olympic Games and considered remedies for the future. Lord Desborough occupied the chair and in an introductory address referred to the object of the gathering and said, it was essential that we should adopt similar systems to those in vogue in other countries. In the first place, they must arouse public interest and get their sympathy and support, and then they must obtain a sufficient supply of money for the purpose in hand. He had often been asked what amount would be required and he estimated that at least £5,000 a year was necessary, with an additional £5,000 for the year of the Games.

Supposing the money was obtained, the question of its allocation would have to be considered. He was convinced that they were not democratic enough. They would have to devote it by agreement to the Associations who wanted it most. Our expenses to Stockholm £4,500 were not near enough and they should spend more. Their athletes ought to stay at one hotel, where those in authority would be able to see that they were comfortably housed, well cared for and given the best advice. Men should be collected some time beforehand for the purpose of training, on similar lines to those adopted in connection with the University Boat House. A suggestion had been made regarding an Empire Team, but each colony had separate representation on the International Olympic Council and were, of course, entitled to send seperate entries. It was mooted at one time that the forces of the Empire should train together, but for some reason or other this fell through. He personally saw no objection to an Empire Team: perhaps, they might find a Zulu who could throw the javelin as far as Lemming. In conclusion, his lordship said it was no use going into the next Games unless they had public support and money. It would not do to wait until the last moment, and it was equally objectionable to go through and do badly.

Mr. J. M. Andrew thought they were all agreed that if they were to take part in future Games, they must do things well or not at all. They had heard a lot about the lack of money, but in his opinion the greatest mistake was the lack of organisation. Amateur advisers were all very well, but they wanted a properly paid official who understood the duties if an improvement was to be effected.

The Rev. R. C. de Courcy Laffan replied to the statements made regarding the transport of the team and said, it was not possible for the men to travel together. If they had had the money they would have taken one hotel, but the response to their appeal during the past four years had not been satisfactory. He considered Lord Desborough's estimate of the cost was too low. Other countries had of late years been applying science to their methods, and this was what they would have to do, for they had the material. Some had argued that they should not have gone to Stockholm, but, after London they were compelled to return the compliment.

Dr. A. Abrahams regarded Olympic winners as phenomena, while Mr. C. A. Glaeses suggested that what was wanted was the fostering of the Olympic spirit among athletes. Mr. A. S. Groye, the Honorary Secretary of the Advisory Club, had a word to say in favour of amateur matches, in which he was supported by Mr. G. J. V. Weigall, and Mr. P. J. Moss appealed for democracy.

Mr. J. G. Merrick, President of the Canadian Athletic Union, was called upon and made an interesting speech, reviewing the methods in vogue in America and Canada, and dealing at length with the proposed Empire combination. They were in favour of it and so were South Africa and Australasia, but the only difficulty so far was Great Britain, who really ought to take the lead. The smaller Continental countries may raise objections, and many difficulties would no doubt arise, but no obstacle ought to be placed in the way of the Empire team training and travelling together.

A resolution that a committee be formed to discover and foster latent athletic talent and to approach the various governing bodies on the subject was eventually lost, but it was afterwards decided to adjourn the meeting until a later date.

Our Madras Correspondent writes:—A field of twenty including one lady met at the Adyar Club on Saturday, the 10th instant, for the second paperchase of the season. Shortly after 5 o'clock a move was made across the river at the Boat Club ford to the starting point, which was in one of the recently ploughed paddy fields just over the river. At first the course lay through these fields and then through a gap in the hedge into the Begum's compound. The going here was excellent, and after negotiating a couple of jumps the trail led out on to a sandy lane leading down to the river. Running down stream along the bank there was another jump to face before reaching the ford opposite the kennels. After the recent rain the river had risen slightly during the last few days but one rider evidently mistook it for a water jump and made a desperate but determined attempt to "do it in one." However, all were soon safely across, and with a left-handed swing up the bank a series of bunds were encountered, after which the course took a turn half right towards the Saidapet Veterinary College Hospital. A bush fence and mud wall were the next obstacles, and then turning sharp, to the right line headed for the Mount Road and Long Tank. The road was crossed near the banyan tree at the southern end of the Tank, and after negotiating the tank bund the course lay through plough towards Kodambakam. The field then apparently settled down for a run across the Tank, but to their surprise, a sudden sharp turn to the left took them towards Lushington's Gardens and the winning posts which were in the bed of the Tank at the back of Lushington's Garden's Compound. The course which was an excellent one arranged by Mr. J. B. Cunliffe was about three miles. Mr. F. E. L. Worke was first home closely followed by the Minor Zemindar of Paralakimidi A move was then made to Lushington's Gardens where Mr. and Mrs. Todhunter very kindly dispensed hospitality on a profuse scale to both horses and riders.

Most of us are familiar, by experience or vicariously, with beginner's luck in ball games, especially in golf. That, indeed, is why golf is so universally popular. The first time a man takes a cleek in his hand and says, "Here is a little white ball on a small mound of sand; let us hit it a very hard blow," he suits the action to the word, lets fly, and sees his ball career blithely into space in the desired direction. He walks after it and, perhaps, finds it some few yards from a grassy parapet with some loose sand lying in front of it. His mentor, with a cynical smile, says, "This is a bunker. You had better take this mashie," handing him a small and deep-headed iron club. The novice says, "Oh, a bunker!" swings the mashie and lifts the ball on to the green. Another walk brings him to his ball lying three yards from a little hole with a tin to receive the ball. He is handed a putter, he looks from his ball to the hole, hits the ball sharply and decisively, and sends it scuttling to the bottom of the tin. His mentor congratulates him, still with a cynical smile, and he says, "Why, that is nothing! I could do that with an umbrella." His first progress round the links is triumphant. Perhaps he has an incomprehensible failure here and there. But, in the imprudence of his first elation, the deep significance of these failures is lost upon him. He goes home saying, "I shall take up golf. It is a pleasant game. Splendid exercise, fresh air, and all that. Quite easy, too. I shall soon be what they call a scratch player. Any one who has been trained to ball games can play golf."

That is beginner's luck. It has long been a mystery. But Colonel Melville, in a speech at the Royal Sanitary Institute Congress at York last month has exploded it. In the beginning of a new muscular movement "the executive muscles concerned act at random, their antagonists being at the same time actively relaxed," whereas, later on, both executives and antagonists contract, destroying the initial freedom of movement. That is an interesting explanation. But it is depressing, for it typifies the triumph of matter over mind. Moreover, it is insufficient, for things are not always thus. The beginner does admirably at golf. But he does vilely at lawn tennis or squash racquets; he makes a fearsome burgle of the first attempt to cast a fly with a rod; he is dangerous with a gun; he misses the whole butt with a rifle. There is more in the beginner's luck at golf than can be easily explained. It is uncanny. Is it due to the malevolence of Bogey, who thus secures new slaves to grace his perpetual triumph!

The two programmes presented at the Electric Theatre during the past week have been up to the usual high standard of excellence with which this moving picture enterprise is now associated. In the programme put forward last Thursday the piece de resistance was a remarkable film entitled "The Red Rose of the Apache" which presents scenes of high and low life in Paris, introduces the famous Apache dance and ends with a tragedy and the brave conduct of the Hooligan hero. Another excellent film deals with the reformation of a New York burglar. There are the usual comic pictures and some charming views of the Trainons and other places connected with the life of Marie Antoinette. In Saturday's programme another of the popular cow boy series entitled "Ranch Pals;" the "Days of '49," a story of the gold fever in Colorado in that year and the "Serenade" a costume drama of the time of Cardinal Richelieu were the principal items. The English Gazette this week contains some most interesting events, views of the fleet at Spithead and of the flight of a Hydro-Aeroplane, a Fire Brigade competition, and cross country racing by Bavarian army being especially good. The change of time for the start of the Matinée performances from 6-30 to 6 P.M. is much appreciated by the public, as we are now able to get home in time for dinner without a rush.

London Week by Week.

London, Friday, 2nd August 1912.

It has been a dismal, wet week and the only bit of humour we have had to console us has been the caperings of that fatuous person Dr. Devaynes Blair, Bishop of the Falkland Islands—nothing less, if you please. He is a hustler pure and simple and like most of his class he grows peevish when those he attacks decline to be hustled. With amazing pushfulness and a blatant puffing of himself and his intention to screw £100,000 out of our pockets he came over to England last year to raise the coin and his methods ever since have reminded one of nothing so much as a Yankee bagman with a new cure-all pill. But the average Britisher has for once recognised that charity begins at home and apparently he doesn't care a tinker's curse for the bishop and his miserable little islands, which he vaguely locates as somewhere in the South Atlantic Ocean. So the money isn't coming in. At this he is furious and he resolves to frighten the British public. Now he once served in India and ought while there to have picked up some modicum of common sense, but he didn't; therefore he has threatened to resign if he doesn't get the £100,000 and he raised a good laugh when he made this awful announcement in last Saturday's Times.

So far all was well, and in the high Roman manner. But a terrible anti-climax was provided in Tuesday's Times, where the stupid prelate explains that his bombshell has gone off prematurely. He writes:—

> Sir,—I was astonished to see my letter under the heading "Threatened Resignation of a Bishop" in the Times of to-day.
> The publication of this is premature. I had not intended it to appear for another week, and only then if lack of response made the step necessary.
> I have not yet sent this letter to some hundreds of those who have failed so far to reply to my first personal appeal, but from whom I still look for some definite help.
> The mistake has arisen through misunderstanding. The exigency of the case makes this announcement imperative. I beg you to give it prominence.
> Believe me yours sincerely,
> L. F. Falkland Isles.

The Lodge, Sandy-lane, Guildford, July 27.

The editor of the Times appends the following footnote: "We regret the misunderstanding; but no condition as to the day of publication was made when the letter was brought to the Times."

So now we get in our second laugh and it strikes one that "L. F." of Falkland (should not the first initial be a "B" by the way?) won't get in his money.

The cocksure custodians of the Royal Academy treasures have been raising a smile too. Last Saturday morning three were stolen from one of the rooms: they were in a locked glass case at 9 A.M., an hour afterwards they were non est. Of course they will not be traced save by a fluke; our police don't find much that disappears in this way. But it is interesting to recall that at the time of the disappearance from the Louvre of Leonardo da Vinci's "La Gioconda" Mr. John Bailey wrote to the Times suggesting that greater vigilance should be exercised at the Royal Academy. He stated that when he visited the two Diploma rooms, the Gibson Gallery and the room in which the Leonardo cartoon is kept, "there was not a trace of any guardian or official, and if any of the three strangers (two other visitors and himself) had been an expert thief I imagine he could have cut the cartoon out of its frame and carried it away under his overcoat."

To this Sir F. A. Eaton, the Secretary of the Royal Academy, replied in a letter published in the Times of 26th August 1911:—

"I would merely remark that if Mr. Bailey had attempted to remove any picture in the Diploma or other galleries he would soon have found out whether there was any one looking after them; also that though the staircase may be long there is no way out of it except through the entrance hall, where there is always a porter."

Quite so. Yet the miniatures have gone. Funny isn't it?

The strike chaos and muddle is not over yet it seems. In a verbose and largely incoherent manifesto issued on Saturday, the strike "leaders," Ben Tillett and all, advised the dockers to return to work at once, "rather than accept abject humiliation." On Monday the very men, Ben Tillett and all, who had signed this manifesto, called on the dockers, at a meeting in Southwark Park, not to go back to work until all their demands had been granted, and to fight on to the bitterest end. This was the result of a violent demonstration by the fanatical strikers against their so-called "leaders" and of the loud cries of "Treachery."

In a situation so truly Gilbertian and so tragi-comical, only one thing is really evident, and that is not new. It is the utter worthlessness and incompetence of the "leaders" of these unhappy men. These agitating humbugs called a wanton and futile strike to show their power. Now, when they find themselves thoroughly and deservedly beaten, they also find that every vestige of their control over their dupes has vanished. As a consequence affairs may drift from bad to worse for the men until the limit of misery has been reached. Clearly enough it would be a waste of time to discuss or to sign agreements with trade union "leaders" whom their "followers" repudiate, and who accept repudiation with so facile a haste. But if there are no responsible leaders, and if there is no discipline, how can this miserable strike ever be ended? The real hope is that the men who want to work will at last assert themselves and exert their influence, and that new leaders may be found. All the wild talk of eventual triumph for the strikers is perilous nonsense. If the men have still any confidence in Tillett and Gosling, they are incredibly gullible. They prove, indeed, that they have no such confidence. But unorganised resistance to the bitter end means real tragedy. The present muddle is, for all its absurdity, a deplorable business.

Sir Charles Pontifex, K.C.I.E., died at his residence, 5, Wetherby-gardens, South Kensington, shortly after half-past three last Sunday afternoon. He had been suffering for some years from heart disease and for the past five weeks had been confined to his bed.

Sir Charles, who was born on 5th June 1831, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1854, becoming Judge in the High Court of Judicature, Bengal, in 1872. Ten years later he was appointed legal adviser to the Secretary of State for India, which position he held until 1892.

As a young man Sir Charles was well known as a tennis player and cricketer. He played for Cambridge in 1851, but was prevented by illness from doing so in the following year. In 1853, however, he captained the eleven. He was a left-handed bowler and a fair bat. For years Sir Charles was a constant attendant in the pavilion at Lord's, and he also spent much time at his club, the Athenæum. Cycling and golf were the outdoor recreations of his later life. Two or three years back his health gave way, perhaps as a result of over-exertion on his tricycle, and he was compelled to give up his old pursuits and familiar haunts almost entirely. He belonged to the Armourers' Company, with which his family had long been associated. He was a good raconteur, and had a ready wit.

Another distinguished old Anglo-Indian has passed away. Mr. Allan Hume, C.B., died at his home in Dulwich on the 30th ultimo, aged 84. He did good service all through his official career and after his retirement—as most of us Europeans think—discounted much of it by evolving the Indian National Congress. However, don't let us dwell on this painful episode.

During his long career he devoted most of his spare time and much money in collecting material for a great work, "The Birds of India." By his own efforts, and the assistance of 40 or 50 willing helpers in all parts of India, he succeeded, after a quarter of a century's work, in gathering together in the museum of his Simla house an enormous collection of bird skins and eggs. The manuscript for the book was almost complete, but it was never to appear. During the winter of 1884 the greater part of the invaluable papers were stolen from his museum during his absence and, it is supposed, destroyed. He had to give up what had been the ambition of his life. His collection, consisting of 63,000 bird skins, in perfect condition, and 19,000 eggs, he generously presented, in 1885, to the British Museum of Natural History. So important and valuable was the gift that Dr. Bowdler Sharpe, head of the Ornithological Department of the Museum, was sent out to Simla to take over the collection and bring it to London. He also presented 200 heads of the different species of horned wild animals of the Indian Empire. It is understood that the remainder of his collection of large fauna, now at his residence, will pass to the Museum.

He wrote various ornithological monographs, and in collaboration with Colonel C. H. T. Marshall (who was responsible for the illustrations rather than the text) he brought out in three large volumes, "The Game Birds of India, Burma, and Ceylon," published in Calcutta from 1879 to 1881. His botanical hobby was industriously pursued until his last illness. He founded and endowed the South London Botanical Institute at Tulse Hill, and gave it his collection of from 30,000 to 40,000 sheets of preserved British and casual alien plants, brought together chiefly by his own labour, in all parts of the British Isles. Always fond of theological disputation, he took up Theosophy at one time, and Madame Blavatsky resided at his house in Simla when she visited India; but differences arose, and he separated himself from the cult. Like many other Indian princes the Jam of Nawanagar (Ranjit Singhji) is not a good paymaster. He shares their penchant for running up big bills—indeed he does this apparently as easily as he runs up big cricket scores—and like the rest when brought to book he tries to wriggle out of his liabilities by claiming to be outside British jurisdiction. There have been many such cases in England recently, yet the stupid British shopkeeper goes on burning his fingers, and he will continue at the silly game till Government steps in and protects him.

In the House of Commons on Tuesday Mr. George Greenwood asked the Under-Secretary for India whether his attention had been called to the claim of a London company against the Jam Sahib of Nawanagar for £900 in connection with work done for his summer "palace," whether his Highness repudiated the claim, and whether any steps had been taken by the Secretary of State in the matter.

Mr. Montagu said the facts were as stated in the question, but it had not been the practice of the India Office to interfere in such cases.

Mr. Greenwood pointed out that this Indian native claimed to be outside British jurisdiction, and asked if there were not means of forcing him to go to arbitration, as this was one out of many cases.

There is at present no means of putting the stopper on these quaint Orientals and it is not likely that there will be. When we see Government practically encouraging the young Indian to come over here and study anarchy, bomb manufacture, sedition and everything else that is damnable, what hope can there be that poor confiding British tradesmen will be shielded from the onslaughts of the modern "sign and not pay" Indian potentate.

You will have in your epitome of English Sport this week some details regarding the big sculling match for the championship of the world between Britisher Barry and New Zealander Arnst. I saw a little bit of Barry's preparation and twice before the race I had a good look at the work Arnst was putting in. I was not impressed with it and I was one of the three London sporting scribes who tipped Barry to win outright—and with no "ifs" and "buts" about it. There is really no comparison between the two men as scullers. Barry's sculling is a very near approach to perfection, while Arnst is extremely unattractive in his body form but has good blade work, which gives him his pace. Although Barry's stroke at the finish appears to lack power, he is very long. All his movements are beautifully together and perfectly timed. His pace and strength as a sculler are due not only to the excellence of his form, but also to the fact that he does nothing to stop his boat, which always travels straight and evenly, and has that appearance of easy gliding which comes from correct body form and an easy and smooth recovery. Arnst is possessed of great power, which he fails to utilize to its full extent because he bends his arms, especially his left arm, and shoots his slide. His form on Monday was probably not quite so good as he showed on the Zambesi, while Barry's sculling has, on the other hand, improved since then considerably. Arnst sculled most courageously and well, but Barry's very much better style gave him the race.

The reconstruction of central London is proceeding apace, and only those who have been absent from the Metropolis for some years can realise the extent of the changes. Westminster is the centre of the reconstruction process. Scaffolding is now the fashion in that city. The old buildings are being, or have been, demolished, and more or less beautiful successors have risen, or are rising, in their places. The old Aquarium has given place to the fine new Wesleyan Hall, lavishly decorated, while the new quarters of an old club have been rapidly run up near by. Caxton House sprang up almost like a mushroom on the site of the Imperial Theatre, the home of some of Lewis Waller's triumphs.

To a person who has not been to Westminster for some time Great George Street will present a strange spectacle. Practically the whole of the north side has been demolished to make way for Government buildings, and the finely built Institute of Civil Engineers now stands in a dismantled and dejected state. Across the street, further to the west, the engineers are making a new home, and, from the peeps we have through the scaffolding, an ambitious architectural effort is promised us. The top of Princess Street, near Princesgate, is smothered in scaffolding, and provides a tricky passage for pedestrians and wheeled traffic.

Not content with these efforts, the builders have razed to the ground the Middlesex Guildhall, and already a new building, which, fortunately, has not a brick exterior, is rising midst a melee of woodwork, almost under the shadow of the old abbey of St. Peter's. Further south the home of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and various other people is a comparatively recent erection; while the whole of the buildings which extended on the north bank of the river from the Victoria Tower Garden to Lambeth Bridge have been swept away. In their place we are promised an extension of the garden—beautified by a group by Rodin—and a widening of the roadway. On the opposite side of this road grimy old masses of brick have met their doom and new erections have sprung up, while there is a good deal of open space awaiting the builder. Shortly we shall have a new Lambeth Bridge, and further down the river, on the opposite side, a grand new County Hall. Thus we move along.

A REMEDY WHICH REALLY GROWS HAIR.

We have received from one of our readers the following formula which he considers as being of great value. Our correspondent says:—"This mixture is a tonic for the hair which if applied morning and evening with the tips of the fingers, so as to cause it penetrate well into the scalp, will certainly make the hair grow, will cure baldness, will restore to grey hair its natural colour, and will destroy dandruff. Mix ½ dram menthol crystals dissolved in a teaspoonful of alcohol with 30oz. bay rum, and then add 1oz. Lavoza de Compasee. If desired, half a teaspoonful of French Pea Flour Perfume, which imparts a very pleasant scent, may be added. Shake well, then let it stand for half an hour, after which the lotion will be ready for use." Some readers without doubt will be desirous of trying this remedy which can be prepared by any chemist. Our obliging reader finishes his communication with the following advice, which shows the faith he has in this remedy. "As this lotion really produces a growth of hair it should not be applied where hair is not desired."

THE GRIFFIN IN INDIA.

Alas, no! The Griffin in India is by no means that sporting-looking animal, part lion, part eagle, which in our heraldic ignorance we are apt to confound with the winged dragon, and to associate in our walks past the new Law Courts with the old site of Temple Bar. Alas, no! Would that he were; for then there would be no scarcity of sport to which the term "noble" could in justice be applied, whilst our Lord Mayors Mansion House banquets would escape for once their wearisome monotony, in the pleasurable anticipation of a gastronomic novelty. Is it possible to fancy a battue with rocketing Griffins! or, better still, imagine, if you can, a drive of these glorious animals. How your heart thumps with almost audible pulsations as you observe that pack of Griffins, their wings outstretched, coming silently and steadily down wind towards you, at the rate of some sixty miles an hour. How you drop the leading brace, right and left, followed possibly by a third as they are fast disappearing—and the subsequent retrieving of the game! Why, St. George on his barebacked steed would never realise the sport, could he return to share in it, whilst he would sit aghast at the summary disposal in one drive of sufficient game to have lasted him a twelvemonths.

But away with such idle frivolities! Unless the old lady is still alive who believed her nautical grandson's story of bringing up on the fluke of his anchor a wheel of one of Pharaoh's chariots in the Red Sea, in preference to his tale of a flying-fish, it is scarcely necessary perhaps for me to say that the Griffin in India is the newly arrived youngster, the embryo organiser, administrator and sportsman, before whom the vastest possibilities lay, and out of whom are manufactured those admirable examples of civil and military officials who are to be found broadcast throughout the country, the product of our nationality and of our system combined, and to whom is due the credit of making this grandest dependency of the British Crown one of the existing wonders of the world.

But, much as I should like to paint in glowing colours the unwearying, self-sacrificing devotion to duty, and the absolute integrity and strict impartiality, which mark our countrymen in undertaking, even when young in years, the vast responsibilities they do with such success in the distant East, I feel that my theme is the Griffin, and that to him must my remarks be confined. Let me go back, then, in memory some thirty-two years, when I first embarked on Indian service, and endeavour to recall the prospect before the newly arrived youngster. How I envy his sensations on first landing, especially if this be his first foreign station and his first acquaintance with the East. The novelty of the ordinary sights, the astonishment at native customs and everyday occurrences, such as the caste marks of the men or the rings in the noses of the women, the variegated colours of pugarees and cummerbunds, with the street scenes, bullock carts, bheesties, camels, and perhaps an occasional elephant moving calmly amidst the crowd—these and numerous other Oriental sights combine to render an Indian town, on first acquaintance, very like a scene from the Arabian Nights tales, an experience quite different from any yet met with. And as our Griffin travels up-country he finds that, whilst the novelty of first impressions naturally wears off, there is still much to excite his curiosity, and possibly his admiration; whilst the special features of a tropical country, the new character of the trees and vegetation, the different varieties of insects and birds, together with, if he is marching, the abundance of small game and the possibility of deer or larger animals, all combine to make him realise that he is at last in the land of sport and adventure, offering grand unexpected opportunities, far beyond his preconceived expectations.

Most of the country through which I marched as a Griffin is now traversed by the railway, and although for this reason, and in consequence of the increased number of shooters, sporting localities have doubtless contracted, necessitating greater distances, still the actual circumstances cannot have changed, but must be much as they were; and therefore in basing this paper upon my personal experiences, I fancy, it will be up to date and will fully accord with the experiences of to-day.

It is needless for me to recommend sport, in the various phases it assumes, as the absolute duty of every Griffin; for it is bred in the bone, and it is surprising how the most prosaic subaltern, who perhaps at home may have never enjoyed the opportunity, will develop into an enthusiastic first-rate sportsman as soon as he finds himself in the position to engage in it. India is par excellence the land of the poor sportsman, for not only does the pay go further than at home, but sport is more generally obtainable and at less cost. Stations vary, but as a rule quail or partridge shooting costs nothing beyond the cartridges; deer and similar game can be obtained at a short distance. Pig-sticking and big game shooting of course require more elaborate arrangements and are more expensive, especially in view of the blank days, which run up the cost.

Those blank days! Is it to prevent life from being too enjoyable, or is it to render our appreciation of red-letter days all the keener, that we are all obliged to experience constant disappointment in every sport? Who does not recollect that first right and left at the end of the covert in full view of the other guns, with the Squire's cheery shout, "Well done, my boy!" or that 20lb. salmon, hooked, played, and gaffed without assistance, our record fish up to that date or that glorious burst in the best run of the season, when, more by good management, and helped by a light weight, we managed to get well away and to retain our place in front to the finish! It is the seldom recurrence to all but specially favoured mortals of these really memorable events that constitutes their charm and preserves them, as we increase in age, green and fragrant, a constant source of pleasurable recollection, when blank days and other trials and disappointments are forgotten. It is for this that I feel constantly thankful for my Indian sporting experiences, days unhappily never to return, but affording in my present more prosaic existence a never-failing delightful memory. It is for this, if for no other purpose, that I would exhort every young subaltern who has the opportunity to lay up for himself a store of such recollections whilst his sporting proclivities are strongest and his energies and bodily powers at their best.

I lay special emphasis on the word "subaltern," because I believe that like "poor Jack," there must be a good cherub aloft looking after him in the almost daily risks he runs from his rashness and inexperience. If his anxious father or his fond doting mother could only see their precious boy riding that partially broken waler at his first steeplechase, or recklessly rushing in at polo on his overweighted pony, or wading up to his middle in a tropical sun after duck and snipe, or standing on the ground to receive that tiger or bear shortly to be driven towards him, or that race for first spear over broken and treacherous ground, his eyes only on the cunning and crafty animal before him watching his every twist and turn and leaving to his trusty Arab the duty of picking his way—if, I say, his parents could only see their son in the keen enjoyment of any of these situations, a man in every sense, learning, self-reliance, steadiness of nerve with quickness of hand and eye, they might be fearful whether he would be one of the very small percentage who annually come to grief, but they could scarcely fail to be proud of him as a typical Englishman, practising the pursuits that best develop the qualities necessary to fit him for his duties wherever he may be called and rendering him fearless in their strict performance. It is because India offers such grand facilities that it makes such an exceptional training ground.

It will not be possible for me to follow our Griffin into every variety of sport. Although India is the poor man's paradise, where the influence of the pocket is not the all-important factor it is in most other places, still sport must be generally worked for, as the better it is the more competition is there regarding it. It is not every one who goes in for big game shooting or for high-class racing. Like other pursuits in life, it is useless to attempt those the blue ribbons of Indian sport, without intending to enter into them thoroughly; but to the least sporting of individuals may come the opportunity of winning small gymkhana station races or a shot at big game, and many a man who went out to shoot snipe or quail has returned the proud possessor of a tiger's skin. I recollect two such instances, and, curiously enough, in both the lucky men were surgeons. The first case occurred when part of my battalion was on the march from Deesa to Mount Aboo. I was not with it, but I heard that news was brought into camp of a tiger in the neighbourhood, and that every one who could turned out, armed with Snider rifles and miscellaneous weapons of every description. They were all Griffins, and had never yet seen a tiger outside a cage. The animal was beaten out with considerable noise, almost mobbed, when it seemed suddenly to disappear. There was no proper shikari with the party, which broke up, and wandered about in the endeavour to solve the problem. Eventually a native caught a glimpse of an animal's eye in the thick foliage of a small tree; the surgeon, who happened to be at hand, made out the creature, thoroughly cowed and crouching on the lowest limb, and brought it down with a Snider bullet. It turned out to be a young lioness, very far away from her usual haunts; for lions are not often heard of at such a distance from the desert country.

In the second instance, the officer was taking a walk before breakfast, armed with a single 16 bore rifle, in the hope of meeting peafowl. On cautiously approaching the edge of a dry nullah, he heard a light rustle among the leaves which might have been caused by one of these birds; but, on turning towards the noise, he saw a tigress disappearing through the bushes as she mounted the opposite bank. To fire his single barrel and then to bolt towards camp was the work of a moment, but when he returned, better armed and accompanied by beaters, he found that the small bullet had done its work, and that the animal, shot through the heart, was lying exactly where he had fired at it.

An amusing occurrence happened to a senior officer of my battalion, who did not profess to be a sportsman, or, in fact, to use a gun. He had once been persuaded to form one of a party to shoot jungle-fowl, which run through the thick jungle like red-legs, and are therefore most difficult to see and shoot, so that several guns are generally desirable. During the beat two tigers appeared together before the astonished Major, who was exhorted by his native attendant to fire: but, to the immense disgust of the latter, he quietly put up his gun, saying in his best Hindustani, "You don't take me for a bloomin' idiot, do you?" or words to that effect. The animals of course made off and were not again found, and very angry were the other sportsmen that a chance which so seldom occurs, of a right and left at tigers, should have been offered to the only one of the party who would not avail himself of it. To justify the Major—who was a capital officer, with any amount of pluck—I may add that as he was no sportsman, I very much doubt if he carried ball cartridge for eventualities, as the others did, and he could scarcely have been expected by the greatest Griffin out, even with the laudable object of affording promotion, to tickle up the tigers with No. 6 shot.

Before I relate a few of my personal experiences of Griffinhood, as typical examples of the rashness of embryo sportsmen, let me offer one recommendation about weapons. I shall not attempt to mention any particular gun or rifle. Those now in use may be superior to what were thought the best a quarter of a century ago; but certainly then, as now, the necessity to sporting rifles of a flat trajectory within sporting distances was recognised as an essential. My battery consisted of a double 12-bore rifle, an Express for deer, with a pair of 12-bore unchoked shotguns, and I much doubt if this could now be improved upon. However, the suggestion I wished to make—one which is, I think, of the utmost importance for big game sportsmen—is, that the stocks of all the weapons used should be of uniform pattern as regards bend, length, and cast off. I am not aware if this has ever been before proposed, and whether I am liable to the charge of plagiarism, but with me the idea is original. In these days of trysguns, there should be no difficulty in obtaining a stock to suit, and that found to fit the shotgun should be used for the rifle.

The reason is obvious. It is but seldom that a standing shot is obtained at driven game. The animal is usually in motion, and more often than not going at a smart pace, for which an allowance when firing must be made. With a snapshot the fits of the stock is everything, enabling the rifle automatically to cover the mark; and although when an animal is clearly seen or is stationary more precision in aiming is desirable, there are often instances when there is no time to aim, or when in the dark it may not be possible to do so, and in these cases a well-fitting stock will often enable one to bag game that would otherwise have been clean missed or perhaps would have got away wounded. Let me simply instance the case of a charging tiger, where there may be only time to throw up the rifle and fire, or where the state of the nerves may interfere with a careful aim. How many lives have been sacrificed in such a case to the long straight stock with which so many rifles are fitted, causing a snapshot to be low and therefore misplaced? Quite recently I was seal shooting from a boat with such a rifle. A seal we were chasing suddenly appeared some twenty yards away, offering a snapshot. I threw up the rifle and fired, the bullet striking the water some eight or ten inches below him, the result entirely of the long stock.

Very shortly after our arrival in India, the following amusing occurrence happened to some of our sporting non-commissioned officers. A party of them had been granted a shooting pass on brigade holiday, and the return of one individual minus his thumb necessitated a court of inquiry, at which it transpired in evidence that of the four who went out, one was "told off" to shoot the tigers, and carried his military rifle. Another was intended to shoot deer, and carried a gun with ball cartridge. The third was to reserve himself for duck and snipe for some extraordinary reason; whilst the victim of the accident was supposed to shoot anything that came in his way; and as there were more doves about than anything else, he naturally did most of the firing. When the paper he had provided for wadding was expended, he took to camels' droppings, of which there was a bountiful supply on the sandy plain, and the round pellets clogged when rammed down, thus doubtless causing the explosion. This was an experience of Griffinhood with bazaar guns; but our men afterwards became excellent sportsmen, and on a brigade holiday it was little use visiting a swamp within twenty miles of the camp, for Tommy Atkins would invariably be there at daybreak, having started at midnight or earlier to walk out. Our sergeant-major, one of the best rifle shots in the battalion, was a keen sportsman, and bagged a tiger with his military rifle close to Deesa.

For big game shooting, the services of a good shikari are essential, and, as in similar cases elsewhere, good treatment and liberal payment are the best incentives to success. I cannot impress upon the Griffin too strongly that, in spite of a dark skin, human nature is the same in India as it is in other countries, and I find it hard to limit my admiration for the sterling, plucky natives I have met, whose equals in their own special qualities it would not always be easy to find among more civilised nations. Treat them kindly and considerately and you will rarely have cause to complain; your sport depends upon them, and whilst they often incur great hardships and risks to show it to you, it may so happen that your own life may come to depend upon their staunchness. The best plan is for the shikari to receive a small monthly payment, with a bonus for each animal bagged, provided the sahib shoots it. Never permit your shikari or a native to shoot; for, post him as you like, an animal in his endeavours to avoid the Griffin he has seen, heard, or smelt is apt to give the silent native the shot, and it is most mortifying thus to lose the sport. I would far sooner the animal got clear away. This only happened to me once, very shortly after my arrival in India and I at once adopted the rule of withholding the reward unless I personally bagged the game. In this way I enlisted the best exertions of my shikari and of the beaters, and made them realise that it was the sport, and not the dead animal only, I wished for.

A capital story of Griffinhood used to be told in the 27th Inniskillings, when I knew that excellent battalion. Two young and newly arrived subalterns went out to shoot duck in a large jheel where the rushes and other aquatic plants grew profusely. Each sportsman used a small native boat propelled by one man, who, probably to facilitate taking to the water, either involuntarily or for retrieving purposes, wore nothing whatever but a small loin cloth. The duck soon began to rise, and the shooting amidst the rushes became fast and furious, when the shot from one discharge happened to reach the other boat, causing the native to throw down his paddle and to yell with agony, as he rubbed his bare skin that smarted severely although not broken. The gross indignity of having one's personal attendant thus suddenly assailed and disabled was too much for the equanimity of his master, who shouted out, "What the deuce do you mean by shooting my man?" and at once put up his own gun to inflict upon his neighbour equivalent retaliation. It was the turn this time of the other boatman to roll on the bottom of his boat, bewailing his death at the hands of the sahib and calling down curses upon the latter's posterity. Intense indignation filled the first sportsman's breast at this deliberate offensive return, upon his innocent and unsuspicious boatman, for what was in his own case but an unfortunate accident; so, not to be behindhand in the administration of this rough and ready justice, he let fly with his left barrel, again extorting from his friend's boatman an agonised shriek. This fire was promptly returned with a similar result, and honour having been satisfied by the discharge of a full broadside—for it was before the days of breechloaders—they amicably came together to compare damages and to drink a friendly glass, before resuming operations against the duck.

Let me now relate my first attempt to interview a tiger. I was, of course, most keen to effect the introduction, but my sporting knowledge and my equipment were by no means commensurate with my eagerness, and it amuses me now to think what a thorough Griffin I was. I had been ordered to Mount Aboo within a month or so of my arrival in India, and I at once let it be known in the neighbourhood that I would give twenty rupees for every tiger I shot. Accordingly, on returning one evening to my tent, after a long day's cricket, in just sufficient time to dress for dinner, I found two natives, who had been patiently waiting for hours, ready to conduct me to a "kill" some miles away; and they explained that, as the moon was favourable, I should probably be able to bag the tiger by sitting in a tree over the deceased bullock. The men were only ordinary villagers, but I at once acquiesced in their proposal as if they had been trained shikaries, and proceeded to make arrangements by getting something to eat and changing my clothes. I had only a 12-bore gun with some ball cartridges, but I strapped round me my military revolver, as well, I believe, as a large hunting-knife, and, encumbered with extra wraps for the night, set forth. It was now late, and the distance proved to be further than I anticipated, so that by the time we approached the "kill" it was perfectly dark, the moon not having risen. The natives pointed out, more by signs than by speaking, a single, large tree, which surrounded by dense scrub jungle could just be made out looming before us. It was under this tree that the "kill" lay; and we at once proceeded in Indian file, one native leading and the other behind me, to creep towards it as quietly as we could. I soon made out distinctly the sound of some animal tearing at the carcase, and the leading native, whispering the one word "bagh," or tiger, began to push his way through the thick bushes towards it.

I must say I thought it a most risky proceeding to interrupt so rudely in absolute darkness the royal repast; but as the villagers showed no hesitation whatever, I determined that I would not be the one to do so and therefore we continued forward, able just to distinguish the large tree in front, low growls or snarls being audible from below it. As we emerged into a small open space where the dead bullock lay, we heard a heavy animal jump into the jungle on the opposite side, growling as he went. I was immediately assisted on to one branch of the tree, one of the natives sitting on another, whilst the second native returned to his village, which was not far off, and there we sat for several hours, vainly expecting the tiger to return to finish his meal. The whole proceeding was, in a sporting sense, most ludicrous, for the villagers ought certainly to have known that a tiger, thus disturbed, would never return; and I have often since thought that either the animal was a hyaena, which I do not believe was the case, or that the absolute indifference to danger showed by the men was a curious example of that native contempt I have often heard of begotten of familiarity with tigers from childhood. About midnight I thought it time to end the farce, so, firing off my revolver to scarce away possible intruders, we descended the tree and made our way back to camp.

My next attempt was more fortunate. I had by this time engaged a shikari, sharing his expenses with a brother-officer, as great a Griffin as I was, and under his guidance we had already had some excellent sport with the hill sambur. My equipment still only consisted of one 12-bore gun, whilst my companion had, in addition to a 14-bore gun, an old single-barrel rifle which had either burst at the muzzle or had been desperately cut down, but which was, in consequence of being shortened, absolutely inaccurate. On this occasion we were just concluding tiffin when our shikari was announced. He had come in with the news that there had been a "kill" only a few miles away, and he proposed to take us there before dark to sit over the carcase. I encumbered myself again with my revolver and with perfectly unnecessary clothes, but we arrived with ample time to spare, and were met by natives who had been posted in trees to watch the ground; they reported that they had seen the tiger go towards the dead bullock, and that he was now engaged devouring it. Accordingly it was decided at once to attempt a beat. My companion was posted about two hundred yards to my right, and we were both on the top of a steep slope that well commanded the ground in front and offered a very secure position. The natives from the neighbouring village, who had been collected in expectation that we should require their services, were sent by a detour to form a line beyond the "kill," in order to beat up towards us, the shikari accompanying them.

Almost as soon as the shouting and tom-toms started I detected the tiger creeping through the bushes directly towards me, and had the native with me only kept silent I might have had a close shot; but his volubility in pointing the beast out at once caused our detection. The animal stopped about one hundred and twenty yards away, looking at us and growling, his hind quarters covered by a bush, and only his chest and one shoulder exposed. The distance was too great for a smooth-bore gun, and the target was very small; but I went down on one knee in orthodox military fashion, and, after a careful aim, fired. Away bounded the tiger to the right, untouched, taking the bushes in his stride like a greyhound, a most beautiful and marvellous sight. I wish I had measured some of his bounds. The bushes were as tall and taller than I was, and he simply cleared them without any apparent exertion. I gave him the left barrel at considerable elevation, and then, reloading as I went, set off to run after him, with what object it would be difficult now for me to explain. As I ran I heard a shot, followed by two more, and upon coming into an open clearing, I found my companion sitting on the dead tiger. It seemed that as soon as he saw the animal coming in his direction, but too far away to offer an easy shot, he ran to head him as if he had had a rabbit to deal with, and just as he arrived breathless and perspiring at the open clearing, the tiger with one of his immense bounds landed in it over a bush. A snapshot with the erratic single rifle resulted in the animal being struck above the eye, the bullet glancing off without penetrating, and merely removing half an inch of skin. It, however, stunned the tiger, and before he could recover himself my companion gave him both barrels of his gun. The joke between us was that, as my companion had left his cartridges behind when he started to run, he would have been obliged to ask me to complete the operation of finishing off his tiger unless he had managed it with his gun. Verily, we were two thorough Griffins, and hardly deserved to come so well out of the adventure. The tiger, with his feet tied together, was slung on a pole; we arrived at the mess tent in the middle of dinner, and placed him in triumph on the ground near the head of the table, amidst the envy of the officers and the admiration of the men, who flocked from their tents to see the first tiger that had been bagged in the battalion. It is needless to say that we were both confirmed big-game shots from this moment, and I at once wrote home for a heavy rifle, which arrived before the beginning of the next hot season. By this time I had mastered the rudiments of the language, and may be said to have emerged to a great extent from the period of griffinhood.

I have no space here to dilate upon the delights of life in India under canvas, far from the haunts of civilisation, an open-air existence occupied entirely with sport, and in which each day affords a new experience. I arranged during the ensuing hot weather for such a trip with another subaltern, and at the end of our two months the bag consisted of one tiger, four bears, five panthers, together with several sambur, cheetal, and little chinkara or ravine deer as well as small game. I propose to relate the circumstances connected with the tiger, because there was a well-marked exhibition of griffinhood about them that entitles them to record in this paper. Our custom was to change our camping ground entirely upon the reports of big game that were received from natives despatched for the purpose. One day we were upon the point of striking camp, and nearly everything was packed, when khubbar was brought in of a particularly large tiger upon whose account we had really come to that neighbourhood, but which had disappeared upon our arrival, only now to reappear just as we were leaving. It seemed that he had taken up his quarters in a well-known cave quite close to our camp; so we decided to devote the morning to him moving in the afternoon to our new ground as already arranged. On arriving at the cave, we found that there were two front entrances—one, the larger and more important, being evidently the front door of the establishment, whilst the other was merely a sort of crevice in the rock, very much of a back door. From this latter exit, however, there was a regular well-trodden path that looked as if it was often used.

We tossed for choice of places. My companion won and selected the principal entrance, from which the ground sloped downwards towards the smaller; consequently he was more favourably placed than I was and could better see and command the whole of the ground between us and the cave. This ground was fairly open, but there were bushes and long grass upon it, with large trees at intervals, preventing a clear view. My shikari wished me to sit on the top of a huge boulder of rock, undoubtedly the proper place because of the security it afforded; but on going there, I found that I could only see from it a portion of the ground, that near the stone being hid by its curvature and by the vegetation that grew upon it. For this reason, and also because I was exposed on the top of the rock to my companion's fire, of which I was far more afraid than I was of the tiger, I decided to stand on the ground under the shelter of the boulder, where I should be about four yards from the path I mentioned. A palm tree grew here, and I took my post behind it, rifle in hand, my shikari holding my gun, a second gun being in charge of another native behind him. I was trying for the first time a percussion shell that had been sent out with my new rifle—a most pernicious invention, let me remark—and my intention was to put the shell in the right barrel and a solid ball into the left.

The beat began, an infernal din of tom-toms, crackers, and shouting, smoke balls being thrown into the cave to assist its occupant in making up his mind to evacuate. The tiger was an old hand, and probably knew what it all meant; so he first tried to break back through the beaters, the increased noise they set up plainly indicating what had occurred. Not liking the look of affairs in this direction, he re-entered the cave, and in another moment I saw him issue from the crevice and come at a steady trot down the pathway directly towards me, his eyes on the ground and his fat cheeks wobbling as he trotted. He was an immense brute, the largest I have ever seen, with enormous shoulders and powerful limbs, and a big head with a good deal of hair about the ears. As soon as he appeared, I covered him with my rifle, intending, in accordance with the instructions that had been given me by experienced sportsmen, to shoot him as he passed me. The theory is that a wounded tiger generally goes straight ahead, and that if shot when approaching, he is far more apt to charge than if allowed first to pass, because in the latter case he would have to turn from his course to come at you.

Acting upon this advice, I proposed to delay firing until he was abreast of me on the path; but it was not to be; for my companion, catching a glimpse of the striped jacket through the grass, very unjustifiably, for he knew I was posted thereabouts, fired across me, and I heard his bullet go ping as it struck the ground and went ricocheting away into space. The tiger stopped abruptly, a noble sight. Lifting one paw from the ground like a pointer, and turning towards the place from which the shot had been fired, he showed his teeth and growled softly to himself. It flashed upon me that it was now or never, for if he turned his head and saw me, he would have been upon me with one bound, so I gave him the right barrel through the chest. He rolled over. I gave him the left behind the shoulder, and, taking the gun from my shikari, finished him off by a shot through the head. I found that providentially I had mistaken the cartridges, putting the solid ball into the right barrel and the shell into the left. The former had made a fearful wound through the entire body, whilst the latter had only burst outside, blowing away a piece of skin the size of my hand, but inflicting no real injury. Perhaps the action of the shell might have been better on the flesh of the chest than on the rib bones behind the shoulder; but I was thankful for the escape, and after one more very similar experience, which I will relate, I gave up percussion shells and used solid balls only. I paced the distance the tiger was from me when I fired, and found it to be seven yards.

When all was over, I found the native to whom I had entrusted my second gun at the top of the palm tree. I neither saw nor heard him climb up it, but as he had neglected his duty and might have cost us our lives in attracting the tiger's attention, I administered a gentle castigation as a slight corrective, with the full approbation of my shikari, first explaining to him the enormity of his offence. It is curious that the tiger never saw us. The creatures' habits being to a great extent nocturnal, their eyes are doubtless not adapted to the strong glare of the midday sun, whilst it is possible that the sudden awakening and the involuntary forced exit from a dark cave proved as dazzling to him as I am sure it would have been to me under similar circumstances. My shikari, I think, deserves great credit for his staunchness, handling my gun when required, and never attempting to fire himself, although he knew I was a Griffin and had never before shot a tiger.

The animal measured 10 feet 6 inches from tip of nose to tip of tail, but as the tail was short and thick, the body was unduly large. We skinned him on the spot, in the midst of a tropical storm which had been threatening all the morning, and which made us decide to remain that night where we were, without unpacking anything. There were two ill effects from this heavy rain. The skin became so saturated as to defy all efforts to cure it, and it eventually rotted away, whilst the white ants, the most insidious of Indian pests, ate through the bottom of my wooden tub, quite an inch thick, simply honeycombing it in the night, and destroying the mosquito net which was packed at the bottom.

Let me conclude by relating another incident to exemplify the untrustworthiness of percussion shells. One evening my shikari proposed that, as there was no other sport on hand, I might sit over a small pool of water within half a mile of my tent, which, he said, was frequented by a bear. I accordingly had an early meal, and took my post behind a temporary screen of bushes before sunset. As soon as it began to grow dark the bear came on the farther side of the water, next the thick jungle, and, before drinking, sat, upright for some purpose, his back being towards me. I had placed a percussion shell in the right barrel and a bullet in the left, and I aimed about the centre of the back, as near the level of the shoulder as I could estimate. Directly I fired I heard the thud of the hit, with the noise of the explosion, and the poor brute rolled upon the ground in agony, roaring and shrieking in such a manner that the servants in camp thought he must have had hold of me. My shikari said, Maro, sahib, maro (Fire, sir, fire); but in my griffinhood, and feeling, I must say, the greatest compassion for the unhappy animal, I very mistakenly said, "No, he is dead," and refrained from giving him the second barrel, until the bear, probably hearing our voices, picked himself up and proceeded to move away. I at once realised my mistake in having thought the bear a disabled and dying animal, due to my inexperience, and took a snapshot; but I evidently missed, for he disappeared into the darkness.

There was nothing for it but to remain where I was and wait for daybreak. I am sure now that I should have done better had I returned to camp, but I was young and keen, and decided to remain. At the first streak of dawn I was up, expecting to find the bear close to, as he would no doubt have been had the shell burst after penetration. The ground where he had rolled was saturated with blood, and the trail was well marked at first and easily followed; but as we went on, the marks became less and less, the thick hair no doubt absorbing the blood, which congealed and hardened. The skill of my shikari in following the track was wonderful. A speck of blood on a leaf or on a stalk of grass, the scratch of a nail on the ground, the displacement of a stone or of a twig, or the bending of a plant or bush, were sufficient, and we hardly delayed a moment over the barest rock. Whenever he was at fault he took a cast forward, and generally at once hit on some indication to show which way the animal had passed. We followed the poor brute over one big hill, down into the opposite valley, and to the top of another hill. At one spot we again found the ground saturated with blood, where he had been scratching in a dried-up pool in a vain attempt to obtain some water. At last we came on wet blood and other fresh indications, and my shikari warned me to be prepared, for he could not be far off; and at the moment we were cautiously advancing, expecting to meet him, we traced the trail into a large cave, the fresh blood on its side showing that he could only have entered when he heard us coming. I never bagged that bear; and although I soon subsequently discovered that noise is customary with them when wounded, still I have never quite recovered the remorse I suffered at witnessing the agony of that animal, and to me it is now a painful reminiscence. It was past two o'clock when I returned to camp and broke my fast.
