EQUINOINT
IS A SCIENTIFIC CERTAINTY

"EQUINOINT" causes no Pain.

"EQUINOINT" leaves no Blemish.

"EQUINOINT" cures by Absorption.

"EQUINOINT" is as easily applied as Paint.

"EQUINOINT" removes the Enlargement, and you can work the Horse all the time.

"EQUINOINT" will cure the worst case of Sprung Tendon, Bog Spavin, Curb, Splint, Thoroughpin, Windgalls, Sprung Hock, or any other Joint or Bursal Enlargement.

"EQUINOINT" will produce excellent results while the horse is running out, for he will not bite at it, and flies shun it.

"EQUINOINT" treatment has entirely superseded the painful and unnatural practice of FIRING, and the expert opinion of prominent Horse Owners in all parts of the world is irresistibly in favour of "EQUINOINT" when legs give trouble in any way.

"EQUINOINT," which is manufactured in England by the Proprietors, is unapproached by any other preparation, especially in deep-seated cases. :: :: DO NOT ACCEPT SUBSTITUTES.

WINCHESTER

.22 Caliber Automatic Rifle.

This is the only automatic rifle using rimfire ammunition, and consequently it is inexpensive to shoot. It's rapidity of fire makes it a great game getter, and for shooting rabbits, birds and other small game, it has no equal. For running game it is particularly desirable, as a succession of rapid shots may be fired with accuracy while holding the rifle on the game. It holds ten strong shots, each of which is fired by simply pulling the trigger. Shoot one and you'll realize it's great effectiveness. It is strongly made and simple to shoot.

Winchester Rifles are Sold by All Dealers.

AMATEUR HANDICAP (closed as per Special Condition) Rs. 500 to the winner, Rs. 300 to the second, and Rs. 200 to the third. A high-weight handicap for horses which have never won a flat race, hurdle race or steeplechase value Rs. 500 or over. G. R.'s. Professionals 5lb. extra. 7 furlongs.

THE TURF.

LIVERPOOL.

VERY flat and uninteresting, from a local view-point, would be a Liverpool Cup without a Stanley House candidate competing, and on the present celebration Lord Derby had Donnithorne and Hair Trigger II. to select from, and elected to run the son of Chaucer. The latter, a sire that has extended his racecourse excellence to the stud, where he has given us such a great performer as Stedfast, himself scored a double success in the Cups at Aintree in 1905 and 1906, and Friday last Lord Derby's little horse, Donnithorne, was well expected to win, and was always steady in the market. Results:—

Lomond's resuscitation to racing trim was the feature of Saturday's racing at Hurst Park, and his return to robust health may revolutionise the St. Leger market. He may not have been as heavy in muscle as he was before his severe illness, when at one period his life was almost despaired of, so terribly acute was his attack of blood-poisoning. What must have delighted his owner most was the fact that by winning the Duchess of York Plate, as he did, evidence was forthcoming that his illness had left no detrimental effect behind, and that he has only to go on steadily improving to vindicate the opinion of his trainer that the son of Desmond is the very best horse he has ever had anything to do with. Early operators in the ring could have traded at even money, and the odds demanded at flag-fall might not have been so long had not Jaeger unshipped his pilot on the way to the post and covered some distance before he was caught. Results:—

GOODWOOD.

The King headed a goodly company of society for the opening day at Goodwood where the racing was well up to the usual standard.

What an unlucky race the Stewards' Cup is for Poor Boy was again exemplified, as once more he had to put up with second place, being beaten two lengths by Golden Rod. This is the third time Mr. Joel's horse has occupied that unenviable position, as in 1908 he was beaten by Elmstead and in 1910 by Golden Rod. Results:—

HAMPSHIRE v. YORKSHIRE.—Yorkshire accomplished a magnificent performance at Southampton in beating Hampshire by nine wickets. Had the wicket not been ruined by rain it is probable that they would have had to be content with 3 points, but their feat of beating their opponents' total of 441 by 52 runs was a brilliant one. AMATEUR PUNTING CHAMPIONSHIPS.

The Thames Punting Club held a most successful afternoon's sport in Shepperton Reach. The amateur punting championships secured by entries, necessitating twenty heats being decided. Lord Desborough presented the prizes at the conclusion of racing. Details:—

Single Punting (Juniors).—Final heat: F. Thompson beat A. H. Davis in 4mins. 30secs.

Amateur Punting Championship.—Final heat: F. C. Covell beat J. A. C. Croft, who went overboard half way down to the turn.

Single Punting (Senior).—Final heat: F. F. Wingrave beat F. Thompson easily in 4mins. 28secs.

Single Punting (Juniors, in 2 feet punts).—Final heat: M. Winstanley beat W. S. Beare by three-quarters of a length in 4mins. 35secs.

Single Punting (Novices).—Final heat: B. M. Sell beat R. Kusel easily in 5mins. 15secs.

Double Punting Championship.—Final heat: F. C. Covell and H. Graves beat M. Winstanley and G. L. Walter by three-quarters of a length in 4mins. 25secs.

ROWING.

INTERNATIONAL SCULLING CHAMPIONSHIP.

BARRY BEATS ARNST.—On the 29th July the towpath at Putney presented an appearance worthy of a 'Varsity boat race day. It was just an oilskins and sou'-wester kind of day. The wind blew in gusts, and the rain clouds galloped overhead like a race of watercarts. But the moisture did not frighten off the Barry enthusiasts. They came in shoals from further down the Thames, with stout, wet-reverting soles to their boots and a Billingsgate aroma. But it took something more than the population of breezy Billingsgate to line the Thames Championship Course on both sides. London must be a City of sculling enthusiasts.

From Putney as far as one could see on both sides of the river the banks were lined, and every window had a head or heads and shoulders. Everybody got more or less gloriously wet, and what is more seemed to enjoy it. The Star and Garter and other Thames side hostelries floated Union Jacks in honour of a great occasion. Barry was as usual highly popular at Putney. He is an idol, and as he floated off he got a highly flattering roar of recognition. He was out first. Arnst followed five minutes later. Just as the rain storm was drawing a curtain across the river the "They're off" signal was given.

Arnst immediately went to the front, he having put in two more strokes (34—36) than Barry in the first minute. The New Zealander kept forging ahead, his powerful striking taking him past Craven Steps a length to the good. By the time the Crabtree was reached Barry was two lengths astern. But he was in no way flustered, and was rowing neatly with a grace that showed the perfect oarsman.

Barry now commenced to decrease the gap, and at Harrod's Stores Arnst's lead was reduced to less than a length. Barry was putting in some telling work, and in spite of Arnst's greater weight the experience of the Englishman on his "own water" stood him in good stead. He kept on gradually but surely reducing the lead of Arnst, and at Hammersmith Bridge was not more than half a length behind.

A hundred or so yards further on the inexorable Englishman had drawn level with and passed his Zambesi conqueror, and from that point he was always ahead.

There was about a quarter of a length between the boats at Biffen's and about the same at Chiswick Church.

After that Barry went right away, and shot Barnes Bridge three lengths ahead. Arnst spurted and reduced the gap to two lengths.

Tremendous cheering greeted Barry as he arrived at the Mortlake Brewery, by which time Arnst had had enough, and ceased to row.

Barry passed the winning post 20 lengths ahead in 23mins. 6secs.

Hunting.

POONA AND KIRKEE HOUNDS.

HOUNDS met at Dighi on the 11th instant when a field of some seventy turned out. A jackal was soon found among the rocky ground to the left of the road and made his point in a westerly direction over some excellent galloping ground. A sharp bend to the right by the quarry made hounds overrun the line but they soon found the scent again and he was killed in the open near Bhosari after a good run of twenty minutes. The brush was presented to Mrs. Sydenham, another jack was put up near Dighi and he ran to the south as far as the Mula Mutha river and along its bank to the Kalas village where in an attempt to scale a wall he fell back amongst the pack and was quickly despatched. The run occupied twenty-five minutes and the brush was given to Major Kemble, R.A. Amongst those out were:—Lady Barrett, Mrs. Birkett, Mrs. St. J. Graham, Mr. Shuttleworth, Mr. Dunlop, M.F.H., Mr. Hengo Symons, Alister Forbes, The Gackwar, The Zemindar of Sivagiri, Colonel Persani, Hon. Mr. Clende Hill, Hon. Mr. Millet, Major Henderson, Colonel Impey, Col. Arnold, Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Carmichael, Capt. Chaytor, Mr. Railward, Capt. and Mrs. Sydenham, Capt. and Mrs Vines, Mr. and Mrs. Cotlum, Major and Mrs. Davie, Major Barton, Major Bower, Capt. Forsivall, Mr. Greensmields, Capt. Sarson, Capt. McCalden, Major Cuming, Capt. Denton, Capt. Stewart, Capt. Lucas, Wilson, Cooker, Mr. Carey, Capt. O'Brien Butler, Mr. O'Donnell, Col. and Mrs. Fowler, Mr Harvey-Kelly, Mr. H. S. Symons, Mr. Logan, Major Jourdain Capt. Weldon, Capt. Utterson and many others.

A small field of sixteen met the Master at the Aga Khan's bungalow on Tuesday, the 13th instant. Those out were the Master and his two whips, Mr. Johnson and Capt. Aga Qasim Shah, Lady Barrett, Mrs. Carmichael, Mrs. Birkett, Mrs. Fitzgibbon, Capt. and Mrs. Vines Capts. Chaytor, Stewart, Leahy, T. Lucas, Messrs. Carey and O'Donnell and the Gackwar. A jackal was turned out of some bahul near the Ahmednagar road and made for the hills across some very heavy going. Hounds ran out of scent after a run of about twenty-five minutes and although they picked it up shortly after they were soon at fault once more and were whipped off.

On Thursday, the 15th, the seventh mile stone on the Nasik road was the rendezvous and about fifty including the following ladies were out:—Mrs. Carmichael, Mrs. Birkett, Mrs. Sydenham, Mrs. Vines, Mrs. St. J. Graham, Mrs Symons and Miss Campbell. Hounds found amongst the rocks to the west of the road and the quarry made for the north. He was headed after going a mile and a half, a large herd of cattle eventually spoiling the line after a run of about twenty minutes. A fast customer was unearthed near Bhosari and went off in the direction of Chinchwad. Nearing the village a chink jumped up in the middle of the pack and took most of it after him. Four couples, however, followed the original line and crossed the river, scent eventually failing after a run of nearly fifty minutes.

OOTACAMUND HUNT.

DURING the past week the weather has been on the whole favourable for hunting, though hardly enough rain has fallen to make scent lie well.

Thursday, 8th August.—A gray drizzly morning, when a field of about 20 met the Master at Pykara Finger Post. Amongst them I noticed Sir Harold Stuart, Hon'ble H. Clark, Colonel and Mrs. Butler, Colonel Maxwell, Major Shanahan, Captains Watson and St. John, Mr and Miss Davidson, Mrs. Cammell, Mr. and Mrs. Harrison and Mr. Morrell. We moved off down the Sigoor Road, drawing past the Rifle Butts to Rockwood where hounds spoke to a line but could not make much of it. After some delay they were taken to Lascelles and on working back to Brooklands another line was started but scent was stale. Eventually at Newmarket a jack was found which ran circuitously towards Rallywood to Bluegums and Staircase where he got away. On Lawley's Course, another jack was viewed and hunted back to Staircase where in the scrub at foot of hill scent lay better and hounds were able to bring him to book in the bog near top of Fife's Nullah.

Saturday, 10th August.—Sheffield Corner at noon. Only a small field were out. Drawing through Andy into the Parson's Valley, for a long time pottering about "we hunted and hunted, but nothing could we find" till a jack got up in Yemakal, "and that we left behind" because he went to ground almost immediately in an inaccessible rocky earth. Another long draw until at 4 P.M., after some of the field had gone home, a stout running jack was found at Rallywood which made for Nanjamad; very fast going over the stream towards Schmidt's Shola and thence to Butsie, where a few riders were able to get on to fresh horses, and so on to Melkarai village where the jack made good his escape. A very fine run. Hounds did not reach kennels till nearly 7 P.M.

Monday, 12th August.—At Lake end early, a large field. A lovely morning, too fine for hunting and scent did not lay well, but we were lucky to view a jack away near New Covert before the sun got well up; hounds were quickly put on to his line. Doubling back he ran through Mill's Covert and over the Municipal Stream to the Golf links, thence to Rockwood and close by the Rifle Butts where firing was in progress, to the shelter of Aramby wood: here hunting was difficult, but the Master helped hounds a lot and the line was carried through to past Tudor Hall and the Delvinton Road, where he finally got away near the Todamund in Ooty itself. It is odd that of late jacks have taken to running towards the inhabited districts for safety. It is everywhere now "the call of the City" not "the call of the wild!"

Another jack being reported in Brooklands, most of the field went with the hounds to try for blood but the beggar did not give them a chance of tasting it, skunking near the numerous earths there.

Tuesday, 13th August.—To the Coffee Shop at noon. Only a small field assembled. We moved off in the direction of Glenmorgan Estate and drew for a long time before hounds spoke to a scent near Peermade Mund which fizzled out. Shortly after they ran a jack through the steep and wooded hill sides to N.E. in West of Ampthill Wood where hounds got divided and some time was lost before they were got together again. I cannot tell you what happened after, because a dicky near hind leg prevented further hunting that day for.

Poultry.

POULTRY NOTES.

[BY P. A. V.]

From that go-ahead country, the United States of America, comes news of the great use and value of lucerne as a poultry-food. A writer in a recent number of your American contemporary, Poultry, goes into the etiology of things and tells us how exactly the idea first occurred to put lucerne to poultry use. I will spare the writer his trouble and pass on to what concerns us most, its present development and its future prospects. Lucerne is very rich in protein, a component of the whites of eggs, richer than any other forage crop; dry lucerne hay contains one-third more protein than wheat-bran which had before now been considered the standard protein food. Lucerne-meal is thus a really good feed for laying hens and growing chicks. All kinds of poultry eat it greedily and when fed to growing chicks, it gives them strong, vigorous muscles and large, hard, firm bones. Fed to laying hens, it provides them the very material needed in making eggs and they lay regularly, the eggs being very fertile. A combination of productiveness and fertility that has long been sought is brought about by making use of this comparatively new feed. A combination of lucerne-meal, beef-scraps, ground-bone and a few other ingredients of minor importance makes the best feeds for chicks and laying hens that can be secured.

When any of the hens are noticed to peck the cockerel's combs, they should receive treatment at once; else they become very fond of the blood they draw in this way, and the male birds seem to like the attention given to them by the hens and stand perfectly still to have their combs disfigured. As soon as a hen is noticed to be picking the male bird's comb, she should at once have her beak cut and, if the flesh of the comb has only been slightly bruised, its condition can quickly be restored by being bathed in water in which a few drops of a solution of permanganate of potash has been placed and, after being wiped perfectly dry, a liberal application of carbolised vaseline.

Practically all poultry diseases are preventable. To prevent disease, the cause must be removed or avoided. The more common predisposing causes are insanitary surroundings, poorly-ventilated quarters, crowding, vermin, dampness, foul ground, impure food or water, mould or rust, careless feeding, draughts, exposure to chilling winds or storms without proper shelter, insufficient exercise and last, but not least, breeding from debilitated or unhealthy birds. All of the above causes may and should be avoided. Many poultry ailments are caused by some microscopic germ. The poultry man who exercises good judgment in handling his flock and gives them good care will seldom if ever have any cause to fear disease germs. Every fowl that is sound and healthy possesses well-developed disease-resisting qualities. It is only when the birds are run down and out of condition that disease-germs find things favorable for rapid development and so cause trouble. The utmost care should be exercised to breed only from strong, sturdy, vigorous, hardy, healthy, well-matured specimens and be sure that this stock has been healthy at all stages of its growth. So far as possible, breed only from birds that have never had a day's sickness. This applies to both sexes.

Given healthy fowls, we should keep them healthy by good care and management. Too often, the poultry house is a filthy, insanitary place, full of stagnant air and crowded far beyond its capacity. Pure fresh air, day and night is one of the prime essentials for keeping fowls in good health. Crowding on the roost is another common cause of taking disease, cold, and should be avoided. As a rule, all that is needed to check sudden colds is an abundance of pure, fresh, dry air to breathe, in quarters that are not crowded and free from draughts. Sunshine is a great purifier and natural disinfectant and the poultry houses should be so arranged that there will be an abundance of sunshine in the buildings on fair days. Exercise is also essential to health. When the birds are confined and cannot have free range, they should be provided with clean, bright litter to scratch in. Foul drinking water and filthy drinking vessels are a prolific source of trouble. Use only pure fresh water from a source you know is not contaminated and supply it in clean receptacles. Particular care should be taken in regard to the animal food fed.

Athletics.

THE WALKING HABIT.

Time was when walking tours were almost modish. There was a distinct type of man who walked just as there was a distinct type of man who fished. The fisherman is with us still; he continues for ever like the brook in which he dallies with fish: but the walker, from various causes, has declined. Walking has ceased to be an art; it cannot be called a pastime; it is simply a nuisance. But twenty years ago in the summer heats the Swiss valleys were crowded with pale curates and with many other grades of strenuous English men hard at it heel and toe making a real business of the boot. This was before the evil days of Bridge and frozen food and the tourist hotel where morning breaks at nine. The lark who called our fathers is out of favour now. We stagger from the mattress to the piping of a bedridden bird and ring the bell for a cup of tea or half a bottle of Vichy before we face our breakfasts with a cream-laid tongue.

Here and there, it is true, a man may still be found who knows the pride of mileage and the joy of the open road, but he is not as other men. Probably he will know little of Bridge beyond the fact that it is customary and it is unlikely that his chin would always meet with the approval of a lady or a barber. He has never formed the hotel habit, or if he has ever done so, he has perceived the error of his ways and conquered it. He has done a greater thing. He has fathomed the true inwardness of a shocking old suit, and the joy of the wind on the heath. He knows the delirium of the air before the sun has warmed it. He knows how the larches wave against the sky "when, merry, merry England has kissed the lips of June." He knows the real glory of summer and he spends as much of it as he can upon his feet. He knows what his feet are for. He knows a good deal about his feet. You might even find him at times pouring brandy into his boots or soaping the inside of his socks. He travels light, but in his "gibecière" there is room for a Horace. In solitary places he sings, but not necessarily in tune, and he never cuts his name on gates. If you were to quote Dr. Johnson and to suggest that "one green field is much as another green field" you would hear his real opinion of you—and of Dr. Johnson, too; and if he took the trouble to parley words with such a lost soul as yourself it would be to speak of Hazlitt and of Richard Jeffries and of Borrow.

Of such stuff is your walker, embryonic and slumbering in every true-born Briton, ready, it may be, to be awakened, to shake off the hotel habit and get back to the open road.

But the tyro must not expect to be created full fledged in a day or even in a summer. He must be patient and remember the slow growth of Rome. He may even find it necessary to trick himself by artifice into the walking habit. It would be well, for example, to undergo his first walking tour in high altitudes where he will learn that champagne may be absorbed by the lungs as well as by the gullet: and he will learn that to "wet his whistle" thus has the double advantage of economy and immunity from bile. He drinks, is drunk, magnificently drunk, without incurring the wrath of moral critics. He draws the teeth, as it were, of his spiritual adviser, and concurrently, he develops a love for the rod pole, and perch. Again, while the walking habit is being formed, and to induce it, he may indulge in picture postcards—for a time. These he should dispatch constantly to all his friends. Thus, he will not only cause his friends to be envious, in itself a pleasing thing, but he will also acquire the reputation of being something of a traveller, of one who gets about the world and this will lend him lustre and prestige and help him to persevere. It will be permissible too, and even desirable to flirt with facts to some extent upon the backs of his picture postcards. Thus, when he has walked ten miles he must be careful to say that he has walked fifteen or even twenty carrying this principle to believable limits, for it is important that high opinions should be held of his stamina. The moral effect of such opinions will help him enormously. He must, of course, remember to watch his post marks while he is tampering with geography.

In his 'prentice days he may expect his feet to fail him, and his spirit, too, sometimes. The hotel with its bemlock will sing like a siren and he may succumb to it, for the old Adam, like the younger Charles, may take an unconscionable time to die. There will be times at first when he will come to loathe the very sight of his knapsack: in a paroxysm of fury he may even hurl it into a ditch, or cut it into a train, or get into a train himself. But this he must most rigidly conceal. Should such a thing occur he must hurry to his picture postcards and deliberately busy himself up with mis-statements. In such an emergency he may say almost anything. His only chance is to deceive himself, and this may perhaps be done by deceiving his friend first. Their belief in him as a walker must be preserved at all costs in order that it may contribute to his own belief in himself. Otherwise, the hotel will get him and he will walk no more, nothing, in the end, of goat. But the above devices will be only temporary. The necessity for subterfuge will vanish. The more he walks the less he will prevaricate. His nature will change. In all the affairs of life he will cease to be oblique. In time the elves will come out of hiding to "do him courtesy," and when that has happened he will never disgrace himself or them again. He will be of the brotherhood, and clean.

CRICKET IN POONA.

Bombay Gymkhana vs. Poona Gymkhana.—The annual match between these teams began on Monday, the 12th instant, Bombay batting first. Their innings closed for 263. Reid was out with the score at 191 having contributed 86 by free batting. Sanderson also played a good innings of 71, while Halliley, Hurlbatt, and Cudlip also made useful scores. Batting on Monday and Tuesday Poona replied with 218, Colonel Arnold playing a fine innings of 68 not out Haughton 41 and Gore-Brown 40 being the other principal contributors. Going in again Bombay put up 220 for three wickets and declared. Halliley made 68, Sanderson 53 not out, Reid 53 Byrne 51. In their second innings Poona compiled 183 for 5 when time was called. Colonel Arnold again played good cricket and was not out 68, McLeod made 39 Anderson 20 and Colonel Rosher 21. Bombay thus won on the first innings. Score:—

FOOTBALL IN CALCUTTA.

The six-aside Competition was brought to a conclusion on Saturday last, the 17th instant, when Calcutta "A" team won the Cup put up by the "In ian Daily News." The four games in the fourth round were interesting, though the sodden state of the ground was scarcely conducive to good football, and the play must be considered quite poor in the circumstances. The Middlesex "B" team met the Black Watch "A" team and at the start the Fort team looked like winning, Piggott the Middlesex custodian, being kept very busy. He saved many shots in his usual masterly style and play being transferred at length to the other end the Mids scored a goal. On changing ends the exchanges were very even but the Middlesex again got through scoring another point. The Highlanders were unable to respond and retired beaten 2 to nil. The Black Watch "B" team gave a fine exhibition in their match with Sova Bazar, defeating the native team by 4 goals and 2 corners to nil. The match between the City Athletic and the Telegraph Storeyard was rather a slow affair, the Telegraph men winning by a goal to nil. The last game of the evening—between Calcutta "A" and Y.M.C.A. "A"—was the most interesting. Both teams were in fine form. Lesdon, Roetti and Sherman displayed their sprinting powers and the match was played at top speed throughout. Sherman and Fenn scored for Calcutta but in spite of desperate efforts and several opportunities the Young Men could not score and Calcutta won by 2 to nil.

The semi-finals and final of the tourney were played on Saturday afternoon last and it is disappointing to note that Calcutta's victory appears to have been brought about by a misunderstanding. In the first of the semi-finals Middlesex "B" met and defeated the Black Watch by 3 goals to 1. Bateman scored all three goals for the Mids, 2 in the first half and one after the interval. Lomas put though for the Highlanders, scoring from a penalty in the second moiety. Calcutta had little difficulty in beating the Telegraph Storeyard—McDougal scoring three times without response. After a rest the Middlesex and Calcutta took the field for the final game. Play was well contested throughout each team scored from a penalty kick, Bateman for the soldiers and Sherman for Calcutta. The Military team were alleged to have also scored two corners in to one by Calcutta and most people thought that the soldiers had won but the referee declared the match a draw and ordered extra time. During this after Sherman had sent wide from a penalty Chisholm scored for Calcutta who thus won by 2 goals to 1. At the conclusion of the game the Cup was handed to the winning team by Sir Lawrence Jenkins with an appropriate speech. Teams were as follows. Complete results of the tournament will be found below.

Calcutta "A."—Davey, O'Shea and Fenn; Sherman McDougal and Chisholm.

Middlesex "B."—Piggott, Clarke and Welch; Staines, Bateman and Golding.

Referee.—C. R. Clayton.

Appended are results to date:—

Before leaving the subject of the tournament we might mention that some correspondence has taken place as to the failure of the Mohan Bagan team to turn up and play their fixture with Calcutta in the third round. It seems that Mohan Bagan were also engaged in a tie of the Cooch Behar Cup on the same day and the six aside fixture could not be postponed. As it happened their Cooch Behar Cup match on the day in question fell through and the native team could easily have come across and played Calcutta who waited for them as long as was possible. The circumstance seems difficult of explanation few being able to comprehend why Mohan Bagan should set aside all their chances in a tournament which they had been well supported to win.

The Surma Cup competition was brought to a conclusion last week when "F" Company Middlesex Regiment beat the Medical College in the final by 2 goals to nil. Their first meeting ended in a pointless draw but in the replay the soldiers won as stated.

Some good rugby matches have been played during the last week. On the 14th instant Calcutta beat the Customs by four tries to nil and the United Services defeated the Police by a goal and a try to nil. In the first game Calcutta had not out their best combination but the new players did well. Their opponents were two short but showed their usual bustling tactics. Calcutta early established their superiority and the forwards were seen to better advantage, the inclusion of J. A. Brown, the old Interna tional, doubtless helping a great deal. The threes were rather slow to take advantage of opportunities and had a strong defence to face. Had the Customs a set of forwards equal to their backs they would be a hard team to beat. Rose scored the first try but Studd's kick at goal failed. Kerr was next through and once more the effort to majorise was unsuccessful. Brown then got a try which was unconverted and the interval arrived with the score 9 points in favour of Calcutta. On crossing over Customs line was only crossed once Leonard getting over after a fine effort. The extra points were not added and though Calcutta looked like getting through on several subsequent occasions the Riversiders kept them out.

The United Services and Police match provided rather a scrambling game, the forwards having most of the play. Neither side was fully represented. The United Service backs were superior to the Police lines of defence and Sawdy, Walsh and Lilley were seen to advantage the scoring being due to their efforts. A good run by the trio in the first half let Sawdy in with a try which Walsh converted. In the second session the United Service did most of the attacking but they could only score once again, Walsh crossing the line but failing to add the extra points.

Two games were played last Saturday and both were very one sided displays. In the first Calcutta scored 25 points against the Police without having the line crossed, and in the other the Services beat the Barbarians by 41 points to nil. Calcutta made two tries (credited to Sherman and one converted by Cumberlege) and a dropped goal by Durnford, and led at the interval by 12 points. On crossing over, Durnford, Stubbs and Cumberlege scored tries, the first of which was majorised. Play throughout was in the Police "25" in spite of the efforts of Wilson who played a great game. The United Services-Barbarians match was a procession. Chase assisted the Services for the first time this year and signalised his reappearance by scoring four of the nine tries registered, Lilley, Sawdy, Chevrett and Leahey (2) being the other scorers. Seven of the tries were improved upon and the United Service thus won by 7 goals and 2 tries (41 points) to nil. Lay of the Barbarians was hurt and had to retire early in the game.

On Monday the Customs played their return match against Calcutta, and another good game was witnessed, Calcutta were first to attack and J. A. Brown ran in with a try. No goal resulted but shortly after Cunningham was through with a try. Again the attempt to convert was unsuccessful. The Riversiders next showed to advantage and Galbraith got over with a try which Williams majorised. In the second session there was a lot of scrambling play. Calcutta crossed the Customs' line twice, Studd and Cunningham being responsible. One of these was converted and the Riversiders being unable to score again Calcutta thus won by a goal and three tries (14 points) to a goal (5 points). Kerr was badly kicked in the head and was removed in an unconscious state to the General Hospital. The return match between the United Services and the Police the same evening was a very level affair, victory eventually resting with the Services by an unconverted try—scored by Trenchard—to nil.

Calcutta will be represented at the Bombay Rugby tournament this year and a team leaves for the Western Capital next week. The 15 will, we understand, comprise the following:—J. A. Brown, Dempster, Bryce, Johnston, Cunningham, Kingsford, Durnford, Scott Brown, Wilson, Leakie Rooms and Trenchard and others. Appended is the League table to date:—

OLYMPIA HORSE SHOW.

The directors of the International Horse Show may congratulate themselves upon the success which attended their efforts to make their Sixth Annual Show even more popular and attractive than its predecessors. The attendance on the opening day was somewhat disappointing, doubtless owing to the counter attractions of Ascot, but the evening performance was well supported, and on my arrival I was astonished at the vast crowds who occupied almost every available seat around the huge tan ring, as the photographs published of Olympia in some of the daily press had led me to imagine I should find but a meagre attendance.

The only disappointing feature in connection with the whole event was the somewhat poor display put up by the British officers in the jumping competitions as compared with our friends from the Continent.

Personally, I do not think that their pluck, judgment, or horsemanship was to blame for their inability to carry off the prizes. Indeed, the general opinion seems to point in the one direction—that their horses were not trained for show jumping.

In the early stages of the Show, the horses did better than in the finals, for they quickly learnt that the obstacles, difficult though they appeared at first, would yield to the least brush, with the result that they made but half-hearted attempts to jump them clean.

With regard to the training schools on the Continent, and the methods employed there to teach the animals to jump bigger than is absolutely necessary and clear the top bars without disturbing them, an interesting letter appeared in the columns of a morning paper during the progress of the Show. "It is a pity," the writer informed us, "that the judges do not insist upon the bandages being removed from the legs of many of the Continental horses when they enter the ring, since it would, in the majority of cases, reveal sores and wounds which have been inflicted by means of a long strap studded with nails." This strap, he stated, is stretched slackly across the top of the jumps over which the horses are put, and at the least signs of laziness when taking it, it is pulled up tight, bringing the sharp points of the nails in contact with the animal's fetlocks.

The methods which the writer describes are to our minds unnecessarily cruel, as surely a horse could be kept up to the mark and made to jump big without employing means which, besides being excessively cruel, would tend to disfigure and injure a valuable animal!

The British hunting men put up a much better show than the British officers, despite the fact that the English hunting field is probably one of the worst schools in the world in which to teach a young horse clean jumping.

Beyond a few big five-barred gates and wire there is hardly a fence to be met with during the average run with hos is that cannot be broken through, and it does not take a horse long to learn this either.

Alarm, a big brown horse who is the property of Mr. J. Drage, won the Hunter Championship, to the surprise of many who watched this great, powerful animal's performances. Alarm would certainly not prove many people's fancy for a fast run over the shires, and I would sooner have seen the Cup won by Mr. Simpson-Hinchliffe's entry, Broadwood, who struck me as being the beau-ideal of a thoroughbred hunter, and succeeded in securing a first prize.

In the high jump, some remarkable performances were witnessed. Confidence, a Canadian horse belonging to the Hon'ble C. Sefton, clearing the poles at 7 feet 5½ inches. Amongst our Army officers, there was no one who gave so fine an exhibition of horsemanship as Lieutenant Geoffrey Brooke, who made a most brilliant win of the Connaught Cup, also the Cup given by the Daily Mail.

This year the King Edward VII. Cup has gone to Russia. Lieutenant D. Ivanenko, Captain d'Exe and Captain Paul Rodzanko being the representatives of the country which has secured this coveted trophy.

The coaching Corinthian proved as popular as ever, and from the few of these equipages which one sees on the road-to-day, one wondered from whose stables the number of coaches which appeared in the ring at Olympia could have come.

Only twenty years ago, four-horse teams were an every-body sight in the West End. To-day—well, the sound of the once-familiar coach horn in the streets generally heralds the approach of some horrible travesty, advertising a boot paste or cheap brand of cigarette.

A familiar little face so popular amongst the patrons of the International was unfortunately missing this year. I am referring to Miss Helen Preece, who, despite her youth, has been one of the most popular competitors for some years past. She is, at present, I understand, competing at the Stockholm Olympic Sports, and we wish her every success.

Lord Lonsdale, without whom the Show would seem but a strange affair, was present as usual. A more dignified figure than his Lordship when judging in the ring or handling favours to the foreign competitors it would be hard to imagine. But there is another side to his personality—one which it does one good to see, too.

The costers rightly regard him as their special "pal," and when one night he appeared tripping the light fantastic with a typical "coster lady" who enjoyed the affair as much as did his Lordship one could not help feeling the infection of the true spirit of mirth and jollity which seem centred in the personality of this popular sporting peer.

Now that the Show is over, many of us are full of good suggestions for improvements in the next.

With regard to the management and the publicity department, there seems but little left to be desired. The book which they issued for the first time this year, entitled "Types of British and Continental Horses and Ponies exhibited at the International Horse Show, Olympia, 1912," is one that deserves the highest praise. Beautifully printed and illustrated, it contains photographs of every type of horse and pony exhibited at the Show, together with a complete and interesting history of their origin, etc. I have a copy with me now, though what it costs to buy and whether the management have any other copies to dispose of I cannot say. I would recommend all lovers of horses who are not already in possession of one of these little books, however, to lose no time in making inquiries at Hanover Square with a view to getting one.

It would add to the general interest of the Show not a little if the entries to the harness, hack, and hunter classes could be somewhat curtailed. At present there are far too many representatives sent in by professional dealers and drivers who naturally regard the affair in the light of a gigantic advertisement for their establishments.

I hesitate to offer suggestions myself to such an able and experienced management as the present board, but surely professional dealers and others might be limited to a certain number of entries, which would prevent that somewhat monotonous parade of harness, hunters and hack animals, the endless succession of which must be as tiring to the judges as it is to the public!

With regard to the actual judging, the general opinion seems to be that there is room for improvement here too, though one says so without wishing to be in any way discourteous to those gentlemen who spent what must have been many trying, long hours in the ring, concentrating all their attention upon the many different classes which were paraded before them.

One readily recognises the difficulty in eliminating a vested interest from the judging ring, though personally I do not think the present judges are ever otherwise than fair in their decisions. It would be better, however, if the services of more judges could be secured for future Shows, such classes as trotting, road coaches, private coaches and harness, being judged by men who have special experience in these particular branches.

Taking it all round, however, this sixth great annual event was an unqualified success, and there is but little doubt that it has, and will continue to do, untold good to the welfare of the equine world so long as its management rests in such able hands as those of the present promoters.—Polo Monthly

The Story Teller.

BARNEY McDONOUGH'S COW.

It was pay day at "The Bluff," one of the largest sugar plantations on the Richmond River. All the hands were gathered together at the homestead waiting for their pay. The owner, Mr. Hervin, paid promptly and cheerfully; and always treated his "employays" (as he termed them) to a stiff glass of liquor on "dollars" day. One of the hands, a regular new-chum, had been in the place twelve months. He, anxious to learn colonial experience, had engaged for the first year at the princely remuneration of £20 per year for the "run of his clover."

Now, when he found himself the happy owner of £15 (the rest had been deducted for clothes, tobacco, etc., sold by this "employerre" at a bare trifle above cost price), he felt that he was a sort of embryo millionaire, as it were.

"£15 odd, an' all or a hape," said Barney to himself. "Whoi, I nivvir was so rich in me loife before. Bedad thin, I'll just ax th' boss how I'll invist me money. I belave there's a dale to be made in cattle, now that th'dairyin' industry is goin' ahead so fast."

Mr. Hervin, on being interrogated as to the safest and most profitable way of investing such a huge sum, laughingly said, "Oh! buy a cow, Barney, as a start towards dairying," never for a moment dreaming that his "employay" would start in cattle traffic. Barney thanked his employer for his gratuous counsel), and withdrew.

One of the neighbouring "cookies" did a good thing with Barney by selling him a cow for £12, which was at least 100 per cent. too much. Bursting with pride, Barney betook himself to the homestead, to relate how promptly he had followed his master's advice.

"My good man, you surely did not believe that I was in earnest?"

"Oh! yis, sirr; I quite belaved yer worrd," said Barney with an uneasy feeling that he had been too precipitate, altogether.

"Well, Barney, a horse would suit you much better. I'll make a deal for you—if you like," said the boss of "The Bluff."

"Barney respectfully refused to accept the offer. He thought he would play a lone hand this time. He soon informed some of the neighbouring cookies and butter splashers that he wanted a horse for a good cow, that had cost him "ivirry pinny ov £12."

"Then Johnnie McFadden offered to let Barney take his pick out of a mob of twenty unbroken horses in one of his riverside paddocks. Barney carefully explained that he wanted to have "the choosin ov th' baste all to himself." McFadden was quite agreeable. Such a plan simplified matters. On the day appointed, Barney went over to "Gundalbimba" (McFadden's abode).

"Give me a quid, Barney," said one of the boundary riders, "and I'll pick the best blanky moke in the blank lot."

"Git away, ye omadhaun! D'ye think Barney McDonough don't know a good honist baste whin he sees him?" said Barney, with a most knowing air.

"You'll be had bad, Barney—as sure as eggs is eggs."

"Open his mouth and count his teeth, Barney, before ya buy."

"Take care that Johnnie don't trade off a steer on ta you, Barney, old flick."

So the hands poked borak at the innocent son of Erin. Barney was impervious to all such badinage. He had made up his mind to silence the scoffers by picking the best horse. He walked about with one eye shut; pointed out imaginary defects by design and real defects by accident.

Finally he "tuk his chice." And the hilarity of the small crowd was most pronounced. Barney's chice was a big, rawboned chestnut colt, about the ugliest and unlikeliest animal in the mob. Bill Tyler, the local wit, dubbed the colt "Barney McDonough's Cow"; and the name tickled the superfine fancy of the bystanders (who mostly sat on rails, by the way) so much that it was universally adopted.

Johnny McFadden offered to break the colt in. Barney was to come over in a week's time. Of course, every hand about the place rolled up to see Barney witch the world with noble horsemanship. One of the rousabouts slily stuck a good-sized quartz nugget under the saddle; and so Barney's first ride lasted for about ten seconds; then he went soaring heavenwards, only to come down in a tangled, dishevelled heap. Somebody suggested that Johnnie McFadden was responsible for the artfully placed pebble. Johnnie drew himself up stiffly, and remarked—

"If you was anything but a blank ijit you'd know that I make jokes" (here he paused to give a fearful emphasis to the remainder of his observation), "I don't play 'em, like some blank jackasses."

It was unanimously agreed that Johnnie was innocent of any knowledge of the nugget.

"Ye must break him in entoirely, Johnnie," said Barney.

So "The Cow" was thoroughly broken in. Barney had many pleasant trips on him. He was the proudest man on the River on Sundays for then he rode his moke all over the place. One day it struck him as being necessary that the horse should have a name.

I'll give th' baste a dacint name. I'll call him afther th' blissid pathriot, Robert Emmett, thought Barney.

Nobody save Barney ever spoke of the horse as Robert Emmett. Far and wide he was called "Barney McDonough's Cow." In two years the horse filled out wonderfully; but he was ugly as of old.

One Christmastide some of the Barharbour "sports" got up a grand race meeting. The prizes were remarkably liberal. The Barharbour Handicap of 40sovs., and the Maiden Plate of 25sovs., were the chief items. It struck Bill Tyler that he could knock out rare fun if he could only persuade Barney McDonough to enter Robert Emmett for the Barharbour Handicap and for the Maiden Plate. Barney was a bit "tanked" when the insidious proposal was made to him, and he willingly consented. What fun the sports had when they heard of Tyler's successful strategy! Johnnie McFadden determined to make a joke. He interviewed Barney.

"Is it true that you have a book on the races, Barney?" he innocently asked.

"Phwat's a book on races at all, at all?" said Barney.

"Why, a book for making wagers, of course."

"Oh! th' divil a wager I'll make. I do be thinkin'me good money has gone already in inthrins.

"Not at all, Barney old flick. You'll scoop the bloomin pool with that noble animal, Robert Emmett.

"D'ye honestly think I've got the ghost or a show, Johnnie?"

"My colonial oath! You've got a soft snap, Barney."

"Go 'long wid ye, Johnnie. It's only pullin' me leg, ye are."

"No, I ain't, Barney. You're on velvet right enough."

Race day came, and Barney was resolved before the first race that nothing would do him but he must ride Robert Emmet in the Maiden Plate. Six horses had accepted. When Barney did his preliminary canter the crowd roared again. It was funnier than the Chinese Derby at Cooktown.

Barney, however, didn't seem to be such a mug on a horse as he had been. Ridiculous odds were laid against Robert Emmett, especially by the Lesmire and Grafton bookies. George Henson quietly took up all the money he could.

"What on earth are ya up ta?" asked Bill Tyler. "Why you d—d goat, Barney's moke ain't got a hundred ta one show, unless the others fall several times each. You're balmy."

"Perhaps! Twenty to one was too much for me. I couldn't help taking a few wagers on the orf chance," said Henson.

Bill Tyler was too disgusted to reply. He went and had a "Jimmie Woodser" for satisfactin.

The race was a mere procession. Robert Emmett took the lead at the start and ran home an easy winner by ten lengths. None of the jocks troubled to watch Barney McDonough's moke. They felt certain he would soon shoot his bolt; and while they cunningly waited on each other, Barney stole a march on them. "The race was thrown away," was the general opinion; and those who had laid against the winning horse were only too eager to get back their stuff and a bit over; and so they laid heavily against Robert Emmett for the Barharbour Handicap the big race. Barney soon got gloriously flooded, after his win in the Maiden Plate. Of course, the 'cute division thought that he would ride his horse in the big race. George Henson was too smart for them. He engaged a jockey who had been knocking about the district for some time and laid him £20 to nothing about the race. When the horses came out for the event of the day, the bookies and others were a bit surprised to see a strange jockey up. Still, they felt pretty safe. No one believed that "the Cow" could gallop. After a clever ridden race, the strange jockey landed him a comfortable winner. Barney and George won £65 in stakes and about £150 in wagers.

The whole affair was a cruel take-down for the 'cute ones. Here was a nag that they had seen hundreds of times. A local man had raised him. A new-chum jackeroo owned him; yet that jackeroo had just swept the board!

Bye and bye the truth came out. It was simplicity itself. Robert Emmett's speed had been discovered by accident. George Hensen and Barney were out riding one day on the North Beach, and the former, who was mounted on a very speedy hack, laughingly said to the latter—

"I'll give you a hundred yards start and race you to Postmaster's Gap" (about a mile). Barney agreed and to his astonishment, he simply lost his rival.

The mare was tried several times on the quiet; and it was found that the ugly brute was quite a flyer, and a plucked 'un to boot. George Hensen trained Robert Emmett at his place; and it was determined to have him entered somehow for the Maiden Plate and the Barharbour Handicap. Bill Tyler made the matter of entry for these races very easy. He and Johnnie McFadden lost about £50 between them. Johnnie was sore over his defeat for a long time. He used to speak of the gallant and speedy Robert Emmett as—"a gory, ugly old cow wot wasn't fit ta feed crows on."

Barney invested winnings in a dairy farm, and is now a prosperous buttersplasher. "The Cow" has never raced since that memorable meeting.

"No," said Barney, when pressed to make a racer of his horse. "Robert Emmett has an unbroken riccord, and I intind him forr to kape it. Besides, I promised Father Mennis that I'd nivvir race agin—an' I won't!"

And he didn't.

Two little town boys staying in the country found a wasp. "See, Bill," said one, "'ere's a grawss-'opper!" "No, it ain't," said Bill "it's a butterfloi!" "I tell you it's a graws-'opper. See me plice 'im on the back of my 'and and mike 'im jump." He placed the wasp on his hand, with the natural result, but the boy was plucky. "Criky! Wasn't his feet hot!" was all he said.

Her Family.—An artist who occupied a studio on the top floor of a large building was always friendly with the woman who cleaned his rooms. "How many children have you, Molly?" he asked one morning as she was polishing the floor. "It's elven I have, sir, I thank ye for askin'. It's lucky I am, sir, bless 'em. I have four be the third wife of my second husband, and three be the second of me first."

A Duty.—"Remember, boys, that in the bright lexicon of youth there is no such word as fail," said the teacher, emphatically. The boys seemed duly impressed. Shortly a youth raised his hand. "Well, what is it, Leopold?" "I was merely going to suggest," recalled the lad, "that if such is the case it would be advisable to write to the publishers of that lexicon and call their attention to the omission."

Paying Their Way In.—The young couple had taken a house in the suburbs of Boston for the summer and they were bedecked with company. The men were enjoying the cool of the evening on the piazza, when one of the party remarked to his host—"Do you know, Fred, there's something the matter with your front gate? It took all my strength to open it. It needs oiling or shaving or something——" "Neither one, old man: It's all right. Everyone that comes through that gate pumps two buckets of water into the tank up there on the hill."

POLO IN ENGLAND.

ALTHOUGH practically three weeks of the already too short London polo season was lost this year by reason of wet ground, the past three months' play was quite up to the average. Outstanding features were the successes of Mr. Schwind's Wild Horse team, an Argentine combination, for whom Mr. John Traill and his cousin, Mr. Joseph Traill, played particularly well, and the victorious career of Mr. Buckmaster's famous Old Cantabs, who swept the board and proved themselves to be beyond dispute the best team of the season.

Considerable interest, of course, attached to the doings of the Duke of Westminster's Eaton team, for the Duke is to be the sponsor for next year's attempt to recover the International Cup for America. At first Eaton carried all before them, for Mr. Cecil Nickalls, the Duke of Westminster, Mr. C. D. Miller and the Earl of Rocksavage had had plenty of practice during the winter at Cairo and Cannes, and afterwards at Eaton (Chester) and were consequently in form and used to each other's play, besides being beautifully mounted. But when the other teams got going they met with reverses, and it was soon seen that they were by no means up to the international standard.

This fact the Duke and his advisers soon realised, and before the season ended Mr. Buckmaster and Mr. F. M. Freake who have this year been right at the top of their form, and who have for the past fifteen years constituted the backbone of the Old Cantabs, were invited to join forces with Eaton and make trip to the United States in 1913. At No. 2 and No. 3 the partnership of Mr. Freake and Mr. Buckmaster has always been an ideal one. It is an open secret that the intention is that Captain Hardress Lloyd, who captained the 1911 England team, should play back, and Captain Leslie Cheape, who had the uncommon experience of reading his own obituary notices last year, should fill the position of No. 1, but it is by no means certain Lloyd will be available, and in that case Captain Cheape would be at back and Captain R. G. Ritson, another player with a great Indian reputation, would fill the breach at No. 1. Captain Ritson was unable to show anything like his true form in London this year owing to serious indisposition, but Captain Cheape played so brilliantly that he has had his handicap raised to 10 points, the only others with this rating being Mr. Buckmaster, and the four Americans who beat us in the international matches of 1909 and 1911.

With regard to the principal tournaments, chief honors, as already stated, went to the Old Cantabs, who last year were reported to be disbanded. They followed up their Champion Cup and Ranelagh Open Cup successes by defeating the Royal Horse Guards, this year's Army Polo Champions in the match for the magnificent Ranelagh gold trophy, known as the King's Coronation Cup. In the Champion Cup final, however, they made a very poor start, and midway through the game the Tigers had a big lead of six goals to one, and looked like certain winners. But then a piece of very bad luck befell the French Count de Madre's team for Mr. H. G. M. Railston (Rifle Brigade), their No. 1, met with a nasty accident which quite put him off his game and in the end the Cantabs just won their fifth Champion Cup by the odd goal in fifteen.

The Roehampton Junior championship was won by the Pilgrims, a team run by Mr. Alfred Grisar, a dashing and well-mounted Belgian player. Well served by ponies bred in South America, the Argentine Wild Horse team gained well deserved wins in both the Social Clubs and Whitney Cup tournaments. At the outset the team was appraised at a very low handicap, but Mr. John Traill and his cousin, Mr. J. Traill, both quick and brilliant strikers, have now had their ratings increased to nine and eight points respectively. Practically everyone is now agreed that the abolition of offside by Hurlingham has greatly improved the game, both from the point of view of players and spectators, and the handicap system, another American innovation, has also proved to be a great success.

INTERNATIONAL LAWN TENNIS.

PROBABLY at some future date an historian will arise who will try to trace the influence of sport on the relations of nations. When that occurs the Davis Lawn Tennis Cup ought to occupy a prominent place in his pages, for, as year succeeds year, its effect is becoming more widespread and the struggle for its possession keener and more strenuous than ever.

As every sportsman knows the trophy is held by Australasia, as Messrs. Norman E. Brookes (Australia) and A. F. Wilding (New Zealand) won it for the "Land of the Southern Cross" in 1907 and have succeeded in holding it since. Whether they can successfully defend it this year is doubtful, for though Mr. Wilding is, physically, as fit as ever, he trains for his lawn tennis as carefully and assiduously as a boxer or sculler for their matches. Mr. Brookes has been bitten by the golf "maggot," and spends more time on the links with his clubs than in the tennis courts with his racquet.

In fact, Mr. Brookes can be practically wiped off the list of "probables," but the New Zealander is still a lawn tennis enthusiast and retains the English championship. The only rival to the game with Mr. Wilding is his love for motor-cycling; but the English authorities object to record breaking on the road, especially in the dusk of evening, and more than one magistrate has tried to break the New Zealander of this weakness by the imposition of substantial fines.

In this year's competition England, represented by Messrs. C. P. Dixon and A. W. Gore in the Singles, and H. Roper Barrett and C. P. Dixon in the Doubles, have knocked out France (Max Decugis and A. H. Gobert, and W. H. Laurentz (Doubles), so they have to meet America to decide which country shall send a team to Australia to oppose the holders.

This trophy is recognised as emblematical of the world's championship, and all players owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Dwight F. Davis of St. Louis, who, by presenting the valuable silver challenge bowl, has probably done more to popularise the game throughout the world than any other single individual, and August 1900 is really a red-letter time in international lawn tennis history.

The matches between England and America that year were played on the ground of the Longwood Cricket Club, Boston, during the first week in August 1900. M. D. Whitman, D. F. Davis and Holcombe Ward were the American team; while A. W. Gore—still one of England's foremost players even though in "the yellow leaf and sere"—E. D. Black and H. Roper Barrett crossed the Atlantic to do battle for their country. America won by 3 matches to 0, 10 sets to 1 and 76 games to 50. The only set they lost was the first between Davis and Black.

England sent the brothers R. F. and H. L. Doherty and Dr. J. Pim in 1902 and the matches were decided at the Crescent Athletic Club, Bay Ridge, New York. Dr. Pim proved the weak spot in the side, America again winning—this time by 3 matches to 2, 12 sets to 7, 100 games to 74. Dr. Pim was beaten by both W. A. Larned and M. D. Whitman; while Whitman also beat R. F. Doherty in the Singles. In the Doubles the Dohertys beat D. F. Davis and Holcombe Ward in a four set match by 3—6, 10—8, 6—3, 6—4.

By the way, it was during this tour (1902) that the famous brothers won the American Doubles Championship—the first time the title had ever been won by foreign players.

England issued a fourth challenge for the Cup in 1903, and this time they "lifted" it. Again the brothers Doherty were sent over with E. S. Mahony as their companion, while America depended upon the brothers Wrenn and W. A. Larned. A few days before the International matches R. F. Doherty strained his shoulder and had to default to Larned in the final match. Several days rain, however, gave him a good rest, and he was quite fit when the other contests came to be played. The Dohertys again beat the Wrenns in four sets, while H. L. beat Wrenn easily in straight sets, and on the last days the brothers beat Wrenn and Larned in Singles, each in five close sets. This victory gave the international championship and the Davis Cup to England for the first time.

With the old players dropping out and the young ones not proving of a like class, Australasia won the trophy in 1907 by Messrs. N. E. Brookes and A. F. Wilding, and whatever country wins the preliminary competition must send their men to Australia in search of the Blue Riband of the Lawn Tennis world.

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

THE Calcutta First Monsoon Meeting came to a very successful conclusion on Saturday last when we saw better and bigger fields than at any of the previous three days and some excellent contests. The card averaged ten starters in each race and throughout the four days we have an excellent average to look back upon. There have been 25 races run and 201 horses and ponies have started for them thus giving us a fraction over eight runners in every race which may, we think, be safely stated to be a record for these meetings. The biggest field that has started during the past four days is 14 and the smallest two, out of an acceptance of five, and the next smallest numbers of runners are four, five and six; in every other race out of the 25 there have been fields of seven and more starters. In five races only have the numbers reached double figures, but the average of the rest has been very steady, and in a number of events in each day's card have we seen fields of eight and nine start. In such circumstances there would seem to be every encouragement to the stewards to extend the season to at any rate the customary eight days, instead of stopping short at the seventh day on the 14th proximo, and it would in our humble opinion be quite possible to race on till the end of September and hold nine meetings, as was done last year, when the muster was not as good, either as regards quantity or quality. The Poojah holidays fall late this season and there will not therefore be anything in the way of an exodus from Calcutta till the beginning of October at the earliest, and so far as the racing population is concerned it is not likely to move off so long as there is any prospect of a continuance of these meetings. All the stables now here with the exception of an unimportant detail or two have every intention of remaining and as there is nothing to attract any of the present gathering elsewhere, Poona this year holding out singularly little inducement, it is safe to speculate upon there being continued and steady support for any programmes that the stewards may see fit to put forward in excess of those already published. Owners were somewhat perturbed when the programmes of the Second Monsoon Meeting made their appearance to find that there were no races for the 14-2 class on the flat and only one pony flat race over the three days, but this little oversight is we hear being rectified and the needs of this large and particularly good class attended to by the introduction of extra races. At present there are only five races in each card of the Second Monsoon Meeting, but a proviso is included at the foot of each programme for an extra race. There are no "consolation" events so far catalogued which may be taken to mean we presume that the stewards have every intention of holding an eighth day even if the meetings are not extended to last year's number.

UP to last Saturday morning it looked as though we should have been racing on a fairly dry course, as there had been a break in the rains of about three or four days and the tracks had had an opportunity of drying up; but about 11 o'clock in the morning a heavy rain-storm accompanied by thunder and lighting swept over the town and the place was quickly back to its old swampy condition, the rain making both the flat and jump courses heavy and the former extremely slippery in places, especially at the various sharp turns which would have been improved by a copious dressing of cinders. The sharpest turn on the jump courses is the one out of the straight on the pony course and there have been two falls at it this season, one schooling when Edwards (now called Master Val) slipped up and one on Saturday last when Ida Coil, who had a good chance in the pony hurdle race came down with Mr. Kenworthy and gave him a bad shaking, but fortunately doing no other damage, though he was very lucky to escape, as a good many of the field went over the fallen man and pony but managed to miss him. There was another fall during the afternoon, but not due to the slippery going, as Vandaburg jumped into the last flight and rolled over but did no damage to Mr. Platt, who was riding him. The slight rearrangement of these hurdle courses which has been suggested by those best in a position to judge, the men who ride, has been treated with indifference and passed over. It is obvious that practical experience must be of far more value than theory, and it has been shown that the run-in and the run to the first fence is all too short and that there are various other obstacles on the course, a slight alteration in the position of which would effect a great improvement, but things remain as they are presumably because it is too much trouble to alter them. The flat course also will need widening if fields are to increase as they have done. At the time the sand track was laid down it was pointed out that it was very narrow. The retort was, if we remember, that it was as wide as the training track; but as that track is itself very narrow this was scarcely any argument. There is not room for more than eight or nine horses comfortably on the sand course at any starting post, and at the 7-furlong post space is particularly circumscribed the start being also on a slight bend. Little differences, and alterations very often make all the difference and it is a pity to see an otherwise up-to-date course like Calcutta, indifferent to the carrying out of small improvements which would add vastly to the comfort and utility of the course and which could be carried out at small expense and trouble.

THE feature of last Saturday's meeting was the fine performance of Sea Lad, who scored his fourth successive victory at these meetings and won the Belvedere Plate, 5 furlongs, with 10st. 2lb., beating Chin Chin, 10st. 9lb., by a neck in the extremely good time, considering how slow the course is, of 1min. 4⅓ secs. This 14-2 pony by Albatross, dam unknown, has proved himself a redoubtable little champion and he will have put up a finer record this season than even he did last season when, out of his seventeen starts he won eleven races and was placed upon very nearly every other occasion. He also had the distinction of winning a jump race run under recognised rules with the record weight of 14st. 9lb. vide the last Pindi Meeting when Sea Lad won a steeplechase with this big weight in the saddle. His most valuable win last year was when he secured the Second Pony Steeplechase at Tollygunge, Rs. 1,470, with 11st. 13lb. up, beating Bandy Leg twelve lengths in a common canter. It is his recent performances, however, that are so attractive and we take it that this "pony" may now be considered to have moved up one and to be quite good enough to hold his own in a first-class handicap on the flat or over fences. We do not yet know how good he is or is capable of being made, but we shall be very surprised if he does not come out in the cold weather and place a very good race to his sporting owner's credit. We understand that so far as the monsoon operations are concerned Sea Lad is now to be retired and we think he has every right to declare his innings closed at any rate for the present, for he has done nobly and has scored, as one might say, "all round the wicket," over all distances on the flat as well as over hurdles. He is certainly one of the best jumpers in training and we shall not be surprised to find him heavily engaged in the first-class horse steeplechases at Tollygunge in the coming cold weather. When he returned to the paddock on Saturday last he was greeted with round upon round of applause and some of it was also for Mr. Evers, who has ridden him in all his races and done him such ample justice. To see him go out after Chin Chin on Saturday and catch and beat her in the last few strides was a sight to do the heart good.

As to the rest of the racing it may be characterised as good all through, even though backers probably did not at times consider it amusing! Favourites did not come home in every case by any manner of means and in two races victory rested with long-priced outsiders whom very few people expected, but who, if rumour does not lie, were expected by their immediate connections, who helped themselves to the good things with no unsparing hand. The first of these was Pyer's Mostyn in the Oriental Plate, the first race on the card. This horse has run very unkindly up to date, and though he has on one occasion run forward till he got to the straight, he is reported to have then deliberately thrown up the sponge. On Saturday his closing price in the ring was about 20 to 1 and 5 to 1 a place. In the race he jumped out in front, was never headed and won comfortably from Wassail, Proprietor and Bushey Dame, who were all in a heap just behind him. He did not run as a rogue runs and showed no inclination at all to stop. He is an extremely good looking horse and is now in very good shape.

A VERY good field of nine went for the Ellenborough Hurdle Plate and with Proprietor and Sea Lad out of the way they made another "rogue," The Priory II, favourite with four others all asked for, Fame, Maisonette, Herald and Idle, Sholto also having one or two friends. It was a very good race indeed, and after Keenadan who went out with the running was finished with—about 3 furlongs from home—The Priory II., Fame and Idle took it up. There was a very spirited contest between the two first-named and there was nothing in it either way, all the rest of the journey home, The Priory II. winning by a neck, both jockeys hard at work. Herald again ran very disappointingly, as he was well in at the weights, but he was a long way behind all through. Sholto also showed no signs of his past form and is apparently a long way off his best.

THE Amateur Pony Hurdle Handicap brought out a field of ten runners and was a very pretty race to watch, as they all got the course bar Ida Coil, who slipped up as already mentioned at the first turn. There was first of all a rush on Reuben, who touched 6 to 4, but money then came in for Captain Donald Wood's Winna and Reuben's price expanded to 2's, 5 to 2 and ultimately threes and in some quarters fours and evens a place. The Winna division, however, stood very staunchly by their mare and there was plenty of money for her right up to the finish. Hobson's Choice was also backed and came up level favourite with Reuben just before the volumes closed. We again saw a very fine finish as it was a toss up which won till the last hurdle. Here, however, Winna was going unquestionably the better of the pair, and though game little Reuben fought on under his crushing impost of 12st. 2lb., the mare beat him at the finish three-quarters of a length. Mr. Murland, 10th Hussars, rode the winner in very good form. Captain Donald Wood, the owner, is in the Rifle Brigade and is very well known in Calcutta, where the pony's victory was well received, both for the owner's sake and that of the 2nd R. B. who were extremely popular when stationed in Calcutta.

THINGS went a bit "agley" in the Second Pony Handicap also, as the public went for Miss Clare and the winner's stable for their other one, Gatling Gun, who was a better favourite at the start than May Kenley the ultimate winner. Gatling Gun was getting 11lb. from his stable companion, but on last Saturday's showing, in our opinion, 21lb. would not even bring them together. Miss Clare, who had the big weight of 10st. 6lb., made a good offer, but May Kenley won comfortably and in very good style. We consider that this mare has improved a good 7lb. to 10lb. on her cold weather form. She has never looked so well since she has been in the country. The Beldevere Plate has already been referred to.

THE Amateur Handicap brought out fourteen and Lady Leonard, Jaguar and Frank virtually monopolised the market, as there was hardly any money for anything else. The stable, so it is said, had a long shot on Dooneen at the nourishing odds of 20 to 1 and later fifteens, but no one else touched her, for if there was anything that was badly in to Frank it was this mare. She must have improved at least 21lb. on her last season's form, for although it was said Frank got blocked when he was about to make his run, Dooneen won with a bit in hand and was never troubled. Details appear elsewhere.

It is we understand just as we go to press by no means certain that the Stewards of the C. T. C. intend to extend the present Monsoon season beyond the 14th September in spite of the fact that there are more horses here this season than we have had for some years past. If there is no racing on the 21st there will be no chance for the non-winner at the meetings, as there are so far no consolation races included in the programmes.

The Fourth Extra Meeting at Poona was well attended, but the Totalisator does not get the support that was hoped for it. The sport was interesting throughout, but the weather conditions were not of the best, the afternoon being dull and showery. The race special from Bombay arrived too late for its occupants to reach the course in time for the first race. This was the second division of the Novice Plate for maiden Arabs. Mahboob on recent form had most friends but could only finish third. He made all the running, but opposite the stands was challenged by Solar Star and Ferozeshah and a splendid finish was witnessed, Solar Star beating Ferozeshah a head, same distance away Mahboob third. The totalisator returned Rs. 363, on a ten rupee wicket about the winner.

The Arab Pony Welter Plate brought out nine and the winner turned up in Baldwin, who was receiving 15lb. from Baloz, who finished second. Maasai made the pace attended by Baloz and Sharar, Baloz taking command in the straight. It looked as if he would win comfortably, when Baldwin came through at the finish and just snatched the verdict by a neck.

Fourteen stripped for the second division of the Novice Plate. Tezab, Different and Agent ran prominently all the way, Different winning easily by a length from Tezab—a big improvement on his previous performances this season.

The Tallyho Plate, a handicap hurdle race for horses, attracted half a dozen, of whom Parkhill was best supported. Old Deputy made all the running and had a long lead about half way round, but at the turn Parkhill and Mary B came alongside and the favourite showed out from the last hurdle and won with his head in his chest by a length and a half: Mary B defeating Deputy by three lengths.

A baker's dozen came under starter's order for the 6-furlong Ascot Plate, which included among other well-known performers the new Australian importation Kurnell, which was making his first appearance in India. He did not show up at all in the race, for Paul Pry led from start to finish and beat Malmsey half a length; Sequent third two lengths behind.

The Old Stand Plate provided us with a splendid finish. Sir A. A. Apcar's champion Vavasor carried most of the public money, but the winner turned up in Valerius. Pelargonium, Mayfly IV. and Valerius were prominent to the four furlongs, where Valerius took charge, attended by Beckmesser, Mayfly and Vavasor. This quartette entered the straight in a bunch and in a fine finish Valerius won by a head: Vavasor's run was a bit late and he was placed third a head behind Mayfly: a neck dividing third and fourth.

The Satara Plate gave Regent his third win this season. He ran prominently most of the way and came away comfortably at the finish, beating Money Gold by half a length.

The Arab Novice Plate brought the programme to a close. Thirteen started and Shirsab, France, Wireless and Nakib were in front to the turn, where Nakib took command and came home an easy winner by two lengths from France: Noor al Malik finished a lucky third ten lengths behind, just beating Wireless a head, a verdict which might have been altered had Wireless been ridden out.

Subject to the approval of the Calcutta Turf Club it is proposed to have race meetings in Bangalore on the 5th and 8th October and at Mysore on two days towards the end of the same month.

The local final of the Polo Cup offered by Country Life for the Southern Army to commemorate the Coronation was played at Bangalore last Saturday between the 7th Hussars "A" team and the team comprising Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers, the Hussars winning by five goals to three. The winners meet the winners of the Secunderabad tournament at Poona in October to decide the ultimate possession of the Cup.

The Calcutta Swimming Club hold a two lengths sealed handicap to-morrow afternoon—the last event before the annual autumn meeting, which has been fixed to take place on Friday, the 20th September. The big meeting will as usual include handicaps, the six lengths Bath Championship, a ladies' race, a display of diving and water polo.

The Gulmarg Polo tournament for the shield presented by the late Raja Sir Amar Singh, K.C.S.I., was brought to a conclusion on the 16th instant. Six teams entered: 1st Cavalry Brigade, Subalterns Rifle Brigade, 1st D.Y.O. Lancers and three scratch teams. The first game was between the 1st Cavalry Brigade and the Pilgrims, a good game ending in favour of the Cavalry by 7 goals to 5, Ogilvie for the winners and Melville for the Pilgrims being most prominent. In the second game the Rifle Brigade Subalterns beat the 1st Lancers by 4 goals to 2 after rather a sticky game, Gillies playing best for the Lancers and Riley for the R.B. The Riflemen next met the Busters, but the scratch team were much too good for them and beat them by 14 goals to 3. Major Buist was a tower of strength for the winners, while Riley played a stout game for the losers. The Tallyho team and the 1st Cavalry then tried conclusions, a level game ending in favour of the Cavalry by 5 goals to 3. The final brought together the Cavalry Brigade and the Busters, the Cavalry winning by 5 goals to 2.

The Poona Horse Show will be held on the 18th and 20th September. An excellent prospectus has been arranged and 32 classes are carded, divided among the following sections:—Chargers, Hunters, Polo Ponies, Hacks, All Comers, Harness classes, jumping competitions and championship classes. Major J. H. M. Davie, 34th Poona Horse, has undertaken the duties of Honorary Secretary and has the assistance of the following committee:—

The Hon'ble Mr. C. H. A. Hill, C.S.I., C.I.E.; H. O. Quin, Esq., I.C.S.; Lieutenant-Colonels F. C. Logan-Home, 26th (K.G.O.) L.C.; J. C. C. Perkins, D.S.O., M.A.D.; Majors T. St. A. B. L. Nevinson, R.F.A.; F. Eassie, D.S.O., A.V.C.; A. G. Bremmer, R.E.; J. E. Hughes, 27th Light Cavalry; Captains A. A. Mercer, Dorset Regiment; V. A. Coaker, 3rd Skinner's Horse; J. H. LANGFORD AND MCVEA met for the fourth time on the 3rd instant at the Sydney Stadium, when the Boston Tar Baby was awarded the verdict—a popular decision. Arthur Scott refereed and the betting at the start was 5 to 2 on Langford :—

Third Round.—Langford tried fighting in clinches and the referee strenuously interfered. Langford landed heavy lefts on McVea's body and jaw. McVea landed a left and a right on the head. Langford replied with a left hook to the ear, a right cross to the mouth, a left to the stomach and a right to the jaw in quick succession. McVea was rattled and Langford was cheered.

Fourth Round.—McVea began with a left to the head and then twice to Langford's stomach and left and right to the jaw and ear and right cross to the jaw. They clinched, Langford fiercely attacking. The police cried "Stop" and the men were ordered to their corners and Langford cautioned. The police insisted on no in-fighting amid pandemonium. McVea's round.

Fifth and Sixth Rounds.—Langford forced home his attack, repeatedly scoring.

Eighth and Ninth Round.—Very fast, there being a lot of milling with Langford the better.

Tenth Round.—Langford landed a left on the mouth, drawing blood and a right cross to the jaw. McVea clutched the rope. Langford then delivered a tremendous blow to McVea's jaw. The men went to their corners amidst excited cheering. Langford's round.

Eleventh and Twelfth Rounds.—McVea's blows were lacking in sting and the crowd urged on Langford, who repeatedly punished McVea.

Thirteenth Round.—McVea's face was swelling and he looked troubled. Langford was confident.

Thenceforward it was a repetition. Langford aggressive and McVea retreating. In the last round both were cautious. After a clinch McVea got in a left and right to Langford's face and Langford a left to McVea's cheek. The decision in favour of Langford was unanimously approved.

WE must apologise to our readers for the non-appearance this week of "The Vagrant's" letter which did not come to hand by the English mail.

WE would draw the attention of our readers to the advertisement appearing further on in which the Trustees of the Port of Karachi invite tenders for a 4 per cent. debenture loan of 30 lakhs to be expended on improvements in the port.

Two good programmes were presented by the Electric Theatre during the past week. In the first a romantic drama entitled the "Duke's Plan," and the "Chauffeur's Love Dream" were the principal films. There were some excellent pictures of squirrels, hedge-hogs and other little pets, while "Troublesome Secretaries" made the house rock with laughter : this was indeed one of the funniest films recently put on. The programme put forward last Saturday included a very fine performance of the celebrated story of Lady Godiva's ride through Coventry and the evil fate of Peeping Tom. "The Lonely Inn," a tragic drama, "Scenes in Morocco," another of the Coy Boy series, further adventures of Tweedledum, and several other comic items made a most enjoyable evening's entertainment.

ENGLAND won the last of the test matches and thus secured the triangular championship. As noted in our last, England batted first and made 245, the Australians replied with 111, Kelleway being top scorer with 43. England's second innings produced 175 and they disposed of the Australians for the meagre total of 65 and thus won by 244 runs.

APPENDED are the results of important cricket matches played in England during the past week:—

The match between Lancashire and Warwickshire at Manchester was abandoned, there being no play owing to rain.

The match between Gloucester and Surrey at Cheltenham was abandoned without play owing to rain.

Kent beat Leicester at Dover by an innings and twenty runs.

The matches between Hampshire and Sussex at Portsmouth, Somerset and Worcestershire at Stonebridge, South Africans and Yorkshire at Sheffield, and Notts and Middlesex at Nottingham, were drawn, the firstnamed team leading on the first innings.

The matches between Middlesex and Surrey at Lord's and Kent and Gloucester at Dover, were drawn, the first teams leading on the first innings.

The matches between Essex and Hampshire, Sussex and Northants, Worcestershire and Yorkshire and Leicestershire and Warwickshire were abandoned owing to rain. No points were scored.

A MOVING picture firm has been taking some remarkable pictures at a water-hole in Abyssinia of animals which come to drink there. It is the etiquette of the jungle for the elephant to drink first. No matter how many animals are around the water-hole, they all stand aside for the greatest beast of all. Many of the animals come forty or fifty miles for a drink, and there is a truce between even the most deadly enemies. After the elephant comes the rhinoceros. Although most of the other animals observe the water-whole truce faithfully, two rhinos will fight over their precedence. The cinematograph operator obtained wonderful pictures of two of these huge animals going at it hammer and tongs. The fight only ended by one of the animals being killed. When the rhinoceros has finished, the giraffes drink their fill, followed by zebras. Zebras always travel in herds and sometimes forty or fifty will arrive at the water-hole at a time. According to the etiquette of the jungle, however, they only come in fourth for the drinking stakes. The first four animals are fixed in order, but the rest get a drink just how and when they can.

THE annual Resolution of the Government of India regarding the destruction of wild animals has just been published. A serious feature is the growth of the cases of snake-bite. The total mortality amongst human beings caused by snake-bite rose from 22,478 to 24,264, and here again Bengal heads the list with 9,344 deaths. There was a noticeable increase in the Bhagalpur Division, where the high rate of mortality is said to have been due to heavy floods, which were accompanied by an immigration of a large number of snakes into the villages. To the same reason are attributed many of the deaths from this cause in Eastern Bengal and Assam, though the victims to snake-bite in this province were less in number by 350 than in the previous year. The next highest mortality occurred in the United Provinces, which return 5,761 deaths as compared with 5,436 in the previous year. In the Bombay Presidency, the United Provinces, and Eastern Bengal and Assam the use of Sir Lauder Brunton's lancets is reported in a number of cases to have resulted in a high proportion of cures. As in previous years, however, the statistics relative to the successful use of this instrument can only be accepted with reservation.

The number of cattle killed by wild animals is reported to have been 91,709, against 93,070 in 1910. But there can be little doubt that this return does not include many kills which really occur, although there was a substantial decrease in Bengal as compared with the previous year. Nearly one-quarter of all the cattle killed in India were destroyed in this province. Out of the total number of 12,247 kills of cattle in the United Provinces, 11,774 occurred in the Kumaon Division alone. Leopards, tigers, and wolves are the chief animals which figure in this return, and approximately half the total number of cattle killed fell victims to leopards. In the Bombay Presidency wolves were again very destructive to cattle, killing 6,701 head.

The number of deaths among cattle attributed to snake-bite is returned as 10,533 as compared with 10,990 in 1910.

THE fifth of the series of mud sports in connection with the Bombay Gymkhana was succesfully put through on the 21st instant. The turf was in excellent condition and the competitions were most interesting. Individual Tent-pegging opened the programme and was won by Mr. L. Graham, with Mr. Wallace second and Mr. J. W. Knight Bruce third. The next event was an affinity race—ladies tilting at the ring and gentlemen tent-pegging. Miss Dunsford and Mr. J. R. Landon were first with Captain and Mrs. Langstaffe second. Mr. Landon also won the V. C. race partnered by Robinson, with Messrs. Webster and L. Graham second, and riding Peggy he finished first in the Pony Scurry, Mr. Knight Bruce on Sorab second and Mr. L. Graham on Amir third. The individual jumping for horses and ponies was won by Mr. Knight Bruce, Messrs. Robinson and Webster filling second and third places. In the Treasure Trove Stakes—a ladies' nomination—gentleman rode the course carrying chatties filled with bran. In these chatties a coin was concealed and each rider's lady

KOH-I-NOOR PENCILS

One "Koh-i-noor" outlasts six ordinary pencils, and does better work all the time.

It's a real pleasure to use a "Koh-i-noor" Pencil—such a velvety touch it has, so durable it is. Some people don't trouble about the make of pencil they buy, which is a mistake. Is it not worth while specifying "Koh-i-noor" and thus secure a Pencil which writes smoothly from beginning to end, does not break, and outlasts six ordinary Pencils? Reuter wires out that a bag of for brace of grouse had been secured by Lord Sefton's shooting party at Mellowdale in Lancashire last week and calls this a record. It may be a record for that part of the country but certainly not the record for a single day in the British Isles. On 24th August 1904 no fewer than 1371½ brace of grouse were killed at Broomhead in Yorkshire and other bags of over 1000 brace are also on record.

As will be seen from our epitome of English sport this week Lancashire were the first county team to inflict defeat upon the South Africans. In this match Lieut. J. R. R. Brooke, well known in Bombay cricket, made 30 and 27 for Lancashire.

A REMEDY WHICH REALLY GROWS HAIR.

We have received from one of our readers the following formula which he considers as being of great value. Our correspondent says:—"This mixture is a tonic for the hair which if applied morning and evening with the tips of the figures, so as to make it penetrate well into the scalp, will certainly make the hair grow, will cure baldness, will restore to grey hair its natural colour, and will destroy dandruff. Mix ¼ dram menthol crystals dissolved in a teaspoonful of alcohol with 30oz. bay rum, and then add 1oz. Lavona de Compose. If desired, half a teaspoonful of French Fon Fleur Perfume, which imparts a very pleasant scent, may be added. Shake well, then let it stand for half an hour, after which the lotion will be ready for use." Some readers without doubt will be desirous of trying this remedy which can be prepared by any chemist. Our obliging reader finishes his communication with the following advice, which shows the faith he has in this remedy. "As this lotion really produces a growth of hair it should not be applied where hair is not desired."

AN OLD INDIAN HUNTER.

Assuredly it was one of my lucky days when old John Marceille—as a matter of fact his "given name" was Jean Baptiste—invited me to accompany him on a duck-shooting expedition to Island Lake; for up to that time I had met with no really competent professor of "Indian hunting," and had, in consequence, come to the conclusion that the many yarns told by white settlers about the doings of certain old-fashioned practitioners of the art were nothing more nor less than ingenious tangles of "onlikely Yankee lies," as they say in Western Canada. But those two or three days spent with a native hunter of the old school, whose inborn genius had been developed by half a century's experience in the backwoods and on the high prairies, changed my opinion considerably; and, before I had known him for a year, my faith in Fenimore Cooper's "Pathfinder" and other heroes of my boyhood was as lively as ever.

Though he was at least three parts Indian—his father was a French half-breed "hunter of the plains," his mother belonged to a nation of the Wood Crees—and possessed the bronzen complexion, coarse blue-black hair, and hawk's beak peculiar to the red man, in mental power and steadfastness of purpose John Marceille was the equal of most of his Anglo-Saxon neighbours. Accordingly, he had always managed to live decently and to keep up a little home of his own, even in those dismal years when the buffaloes went out and the railways came in, and so many of the half-breed hunters and freighters were compelled to earn their daily bannock by collecting buffalo-bones to be made into manure for export, by hauling wood and water for the mounted police, or by "taking treaty" along with the ordinary denizens of the Reserves.

Like many other members of "the tribe of the Metis" this old man was very much of a gentleman, though he lived in a mean little log-hut and had married a very dirty and cantankerous, swampy squaw, who was, however, a most ingenious cook. In all his dealings a fine sense of honour was apparent; and a certain simple-minded courtesy, which seemed to me the perfection of good breeding, made him the most charming of hosts. In particular, John Marceille never forgot that courtesy is the better part of charity; and the poor, shiftless, broken-down "yellow faces," whose little "tepees" of interwoven spruce boughs were so often to be seen behind his house, not only received daily rations of flour and potatoes and salted fish but were also treated as equals and allowed to play their part in the entertainment of the most distinguished visitors. I dare-say there was a drop or two of gentle French blood in his veins—for was not Canada, whence came the forefathers of the Metis, built up on the bones of the ancienne noblesse of France?—which found an expression in these acts of a kindly and considerate hospitality.

After our hunt at Island Lake—a broad piece of shallow, alkaline water surrounding a great dome-shaped bluff of tamarac—I never arranged a sporting expedition without first of all visiting John Marceille and trying to enlist his services as guide and hunting companion. He had little real love for farming and even less for his wife, whose all-round "cussedness" was proverbial in the settlement, and old as he was, if only he could find any sort of an excuse for neglecting his farm would make no bones about coming away at an hour's notice. On one occasion, indeed, we slipped off along a by-trail while she was actually returning from a visit to her nearest neighbour; and when she sighted us from afar, and began to flounder across a stretch of new breaking, waving her skinny brown arms wildly and shrieking out incoherent reproaches, the old man's averted face wore an unctuous look of solemn glee—something far too deep and heartfelt to be expressed in chuckles. A fortnight later, when we sneaked back in the windy dusk of an October day, it was somebody else's turn to score, and the old man was clearly on tenterhooks; indeed, but for the fact that our buck-board was well loaded up with wild-fowl, prairie chicken, sandhill crane, and other good gifts, I don't think he would have ventured home that year.

The more I saw of his work by field and flood, the more I was struck with his ability. In the first place, he was a remarkably fine shot, never missing and seldom "tailoring" his game, although he used a primeval H. B. Co. muzzleloader, apparently held together by numerous bits of wire and binder-twine, for which no English schoolboy would have bartered a serviceable catapult. But it was not often he gave me an exhibition of marksmanship; for like most old-timers, he had learned to shoot in days when powder and shot were hard to come by, and the waste of a single charge was looked upon as a deadly sin. You must remember that as often as not the hunters employed by "The Company" received a small quantity of ammunition in lieu of provisions; so that the unthrifty hunter—like the man who lost his small change in the "Pilgrim's Progress"—went on his way "with many a hungry belly," and was sometimes reduced to a diet of poplar-bark. Many years ago while hunting in the "country of the North Wind"—Kewatin is the name on the maps—old John had been compelled to live upon "jackrabbit's pemmican" for a season, and that bitter experience of a very cheerless form of vegetarianism had given him a somewhat exaggerated idea of the value of ammunition. Accordingly, his ideal of a really sporting venture was to slip up to a string of water-fowl disporting themselves at the edge of a slough, or a family of chicken following mater-familias across a meadow of the prairie, wait patiently until they had deployed into line, then let off his gun at short range, and bag half a dozen or so with one shot. The way in which he contrived to conceal his movements from their watchful beady eyes even in places where there was hardly enough cover to hide a gopher, and the cleverness with which he imitated the various "calls" so as to bring his prey within easy distance, were really amazing. When, however, he thought it worth while he would sometimes pull off a thoroughly sporting shot; and he could reload his antiquated single-barrelled muzzle-loader so quickly that anybody who heard but could not see him at work would have sworn he was using a double-barrelled breech-loader.

After all it was his practical knowledge of the habits of the wild creatures of the North-west which made him the best of hunting companions. It is not too much to say that he knew Saskatchewan—which is about as big as France—as well almost as a Scotch gamekeeper knows his own mooreside; so that he could always tell what to look for in any particular spot, and just where and exactly how to find it. In the matter of "tracking" he was a very Sherlock Holmes, and could follow game almost as well in the spring or in the fall, when a broken twig or a displaced leaf forms the only available evidence, as in winter-time, when the great palimpsests of the snows if rightly read supply the hunter with all the information he requires.

When hunting from a camp, by the way, he generally made a point of coming in and going out each day by the same trail—a habit of his which at first puzzled me not a little. His reason for this practice is worth considering. Moose and deer and all the small fur-bearing animals, so he said, will seldom or never cross a man's trail; and, when they happen to come upon it, will often turn off and travel miles in a direction nearly parallel to that of his scent; so that the hunter who came in by the way he went out, and now and again forked off for short distances, was likely to do better than if he tried to look over a lot of fresh ground in the afternoon. One decidedly sportsman-like trait was his dislike of the use of poison, which he never used, albeit he must have known that it is cheaper and more effective than trapping. Among many other gifts, he had the Indian's discriminating eye. Not only could he see a flight of birds many miles away, but he could also tell what they were and exactly how many they were. On one occasion I made this faculty of his the subject of a little experiment. After drawing a number of noughts and crosses on a chip, I moved it before his eyes for a few seconds—not more than five or six. As long as the total number did not exceed fifty he could always tell me without hesitation the exact numbers of the two species of signs, and for much greater numbers he could always give a pretty close guess. In the matter of hearing—perhaps owing to his age—he was inferior to many of the Reserve Indians, who can count the number of horses in an approaching patrol of the N. W. M. P. when they are still miles away.

Unlike the vast majority of the French half-breeds, John Marceille could express himself in good "Prairie English"—which is not by any means the same thing as the hackney dialect of the Western States, albeit, a trick of dropping into Cree whenever he became excited, and his frequent use of the long-forgotten proverbs and bywords of the old-time voyageurs and coureurs des bois made it somewhat difficult for a "tenderfoot" to follow him all the way. Though he had the gift of holding his tongue in quite a number of languages, he did not always choose to exercise it and after a good day's work and a good hearty supper—to say nothing of a glass of grog—would often become quite garrulous on the subject of the old fur trading days quorum pars magna fuit. If, however, we had had bad luck, he would chew the quid of reflection, and never open his mouth all the evening except to wish me good-night. Much as I prize my trifling experiences of sport in the Saskatchewan and the many practical hints I received from him, I prize even more the occasional glimpses—too few and never to be renewed!—which his rambling discourses afforded of the spacious life of the North-west that was.

The yearly "Running of the Buffalo" by the hunters of the Red River Settlement in the good old days, when the chief factors of the Hudson Bay Company ruled from the Bay to the Pacific and from "the Lime" up to "the Circle," was a theme of which the oldman never tired; and as I have never read any adequate account of "that almightiest big picnic ever you heard on"—to quote the enraptured phrase of yet another old-timer of the Saskatchewan—I shall here set down in order all that he told me from time to time about the "summer hunt," together with a few facts gleaned from other trustworthy sources. As early as 1820 the number of ox-carts assembled for the summer hunt exceeded five hundred, and one year, between 1840 and 1850—he could never remember the exact date—when John Marceille drew a hunter's pay for the first time no fewer than fifteen hundred carts and waggons and more than two thousand men, women and children came to the time-honoured trysting-place in a hollow of the high prairies, a day's journey from Fort Garry. A hunter's wage consisted in those days of Hudson's Bay "blankets" or notes to the value of £3 sterling; the women, whose duty it was to skin and cut up the carcasses and make them into the famous pemmican, received £2 5*s*. apiece; and each of the boys and girls, who assisted the women and did the "chores" for the whole camp, obtained the sum of £1 as a quid pro quo. Seeing that the summer hunt generally lasted a full three months nobody can say that these people were well paid for their work, especially when it is remembered that buffalo running was an arduous and risky pursuit, and that now and again Blackfeet and other "wicked" Indians would take it into their heads to hunt the outlying hunters, though they seldom ventured to meddle with the main parties.

Many of the hunters of the plains were also farmers in a small way, so that a start was not possible until after seeding. For the same reason it was necessary to return before harvest-time. But as soon as the spring rains were fallen and their long ribbon-like plough-lands were newly clad in a shimmering silken vesture of delicate green, they would hitch up their trains of oxen or "Shaganappies"—i. e., native ponies—and trundle off in their springless wooden-tired carts along the Southern Freightors' trail which ran from the Red River to St. Paul's in Minnesota, and was in those days as grassless and "well-beaten" as the famous Santa Fe trail between Arkansas and New Mexico, to the time-honoured road rendezvous. There they would camp until all the hunters on the roll had arrived—spending the interval in casting bullets, putting a last polish on their long-barrelled flint-locks, and mending their carts—which did not contain a pennyweight of iron—with wooden pegs of birch. If anyone had succeeded in begging or borrowing a dram or two of "pink-eye" whisky, he would save it for the eve of the day arranged for the start.

That last evening at home—always supposing the weather was fine—was a time of revelry; and many of the Red River settlers, who did not intend to make the hunt, would come down to the camp to help in the fun. After sundown great watch-fires would be kindled within the circle of carts; and the older hunters would sit on their heels in the wavering firelight, exchanging horns of "tangle-leg" and tales of adventure in every nook and corner of the unexplored West while the younger chatted with the women and girls who sat on or under the carts. Then in a curiously sudden expectant hush—that strange inevitable silence which sooner and later falls upon the noisiest of such gatherings—somebody would begin the beautiful lovelorn ditty of Ala Claire Fontaine; long before the end of the first verse all the men would be singing or beating time, and when it came to the refrain

Il y a longtemps que je t'aime,
Jamais je ne t'oublierai,

the women's voices would soar above the men's in a sudden gush of sound, fresh and clear as the fountain of their ditty. Then, perhaps, "Lochaber No More" would be sung by the many Scotchmen and Scotch half-breeds in the gathering, and after that saddest and most haunting of all melodies, the dolorous interminable lay of "Bold Brennan on the Moor" (such rhymed histories of highwaymen were and still are surprisingly popular on these prairies) would be chanted slowly and solemnly by some soloist of established reputation: at last a fiddle would be pulled out of its moose-skin bag, and the stirring strains of the "Red River Jig," which old John confessed to be "pins and needles in his legs" whenever and wherever he heard it, brought all assembled to their feet. Next to a plaintive ditty the hunters loved a rollicking dance; and having once begun, they would not stop until the sun was under their feet and their bonfires were but heaps of warm crumbling ash.

On these occasions particular attention was paid to the moon. If her appearance was such that "a man could hang up his kettle handily on her horn," everybody knew there would be at least a month of fine weather to follow; if not, the Indian by-word, "buffalo grow fat on a week's rain," would be quoted with approval.

At sunrise next morning the roll was called over, and immediately afterwards, at a meeting of the chief hunters a leader and his staff, captains, guides, and a crier were appointed. The leader had authority over the whole party, and at the beginning and end of each day's march issued general orders through the members of his staff, who also acted as police; the captains with their men took it in turn to patrol the camp and mount guard; the guides, in addition to conducting the hunters from one good camping-place to another, were also the standard-bearers of the party; and the crier, who called the people together whenever the "law of the hunt" had been violated, not only proclaimed the sentence of the court, but also executed it. This "law of the hunt" was a very simple matter. Stealing, the running of Buffalo on the Sabbath day or before the general order to do so had been given, the firing off of guns when in the country where the herd was known to be, forking off, lagging behind, or going before without the leader's permission—these were the only offences for which definite punishments were assigned. Stealing was regarded as the most serious of all possible crimes, and the punishment enacted was thought to be correspondingly severe. If anybody was convicted of theft, even if he had stolen only a sinew, he was solemnly brought into the middle of the camp and his name called out three times by the crier, the epithet "thief" being added at each repetition. The half-breed hunters of the plains justly prided themselves upon their honesty, the disgrace of being publicly called a thief appeared to them infinitely greater than the shame of a flogging and was taken to heart even by the most reckless of that devil-may-care race.

For a first offence of any other sort the offender's saddle and bridle were cut up; if he offended a second time his coat was pulled off his back and cut up; and for third offence he received a sound flogging with a "black snake," or leathern whip. It was the duty of the officers, one and all, to see that the camp was properly set out at night. The carts were drawn up in a close circle, and within this the tents were pitched in double and treble rows, the women and children sleeping in the innermost. If danger was apprehended the oxen and horses were tethered inside the corral, and the men slept with their guns loaded; otherwise the cattle were allowed to graze on the open prairie.

Long before the buffalo was sighted they could be heard by the experienced hunter. Though he was then a mere boy, hardly in his teens, old John had a very vivid recollection of entering the summer pasturage of the buffalo for the first time in his life. One windy morning, three weeks after they had left the Red River, his father asked him if he could hear the bulls, and when he said that he could hear nothing but the wind, all the men laughed at him, and his father was not very well pleased. By-and-by they came to a badger's hole, and his father pulled him off the cart and told him to put his ear into it, and when he did so, he heard a low far-off rumbling sound "like the wind in a poplar-bluff, or the noise the Saskatchewan makes when it moves out in the spring," which was nothing more nor less than the roaring of the bulls—ten thousand of them, I suppose. That happened in the early morning, and it was not until noon that a man standing up on horseback could discern what seemed to be a long streak of greyish cloud, resting on the high western rim of the horizon. When the sun was setting this cloud was resolved into two vast herds of buffalo, all of them moving at the same slow pace and grazing as they went. Everybody wanted to be at them, but the authorities would not hear of it, for a night alarm would sometimes frighten the herds as much as a prairie fire in the fall, and cause them to stampede for fifty miles or more. At about ten o'clock next morning the hunters were made to fall into line, and the crier was ordered to cry the "Ho!" which was the signal for a general attack.

The quaint expression "Here's a ho!" which every native of the North-west utters before gulping down his dram or "horn" of whisky, is really a reminiscence of this ancient signal to begin the fun, and not, as the more popular explanation would have us believe, a silly reference to the opening phrase of Isaish lv.

The hunters would enter the chase with their mouths chockful of bullets, loading and firing from horseback, and leaving the ownership of the slain to be settled afterwards. When loading, they poured the powder from the palm of the hand and dropped a bullet from the mouth into the muzzle of the piece, and they fired without putting it up to the shoulder and in such haste that sometimes the bullet had not had time to fall down the barrel. No wonder that their guns, which cost "the Company" from fifteen to twenty shillings each, and were not exactly masterpieces of the gunmaker's art, frequently exploded! It was no uncommon sight to see a hunter who lacked a thumb or a finger or two as a consequence of such an accident. Sometimes, also, in the excitement of the moment, he would swallow an ounce or two of lead. Those of the women who had a practical knowledge of herb-doctoring administered their thrice-decocted remedies to the victims of these casualties, and received fees for their trouble, a robe or a bag of pemmican, or the like.

Day after day, week after week, until it was time to turn back or the buffalo had fled into some part of the plains infested by the Indians of the United States, who had no respect for the letters H. B. C. inscribed on the flags, the hunters would harry the rear of the herd, slaying hundreds between sunrise and sunset, and going back on their trail at nightfall to join the women and children and arrange the camp. The work of skinning and breaking up the slaughtered animals and making the choice parts into the famous pemmican, or cutting them up into long thin shreds to be dried in the sun, fell upon the women and their assistants, whose labours were often prolonged far into the night.

Other curious facts observed by the old-time buffalo-runners deserve to be mentioned. Thus clean killing was not altogether necessary, for the herd could always be relied upon to finish off a wounded comrade, though in so doing they sometimes spoiled the robe. Also the country in which the herd was pasturing for the time being swarmed with grizzy bears, who had acquired a taste for flesh and lived upon the herd all the year round. These fourfooted hunters, either because they preferred to do their own butchering or because they respected the rights of fellow sportsmen, never meddled with the carcases of the beasts which had been shot. Old John had an idea about these grizzlies of the plains, which does not exactly fit in with the theories of naturalists or with the experiences of big-game shooters in the past. According to him, this particular race of bears ceased to exist shortly after the extinction of the buffalo in the seventies, and the bears to be found in the foot-hills of the Rockies are a somewhat different race, neither so big nor so wicked as the others, who sometimes weighed as much as twenty hundredweight.

The Hudson's Bay Company always did their best to prevent the indiscriminate slaughter of the wild animals, upon whose welfare their own ultimately depended, and the buffalo-runners in their employ seldom or never killed either the calves or their dams, so that the extinction of the buffalo cannot justly be attributed to the Company's policy of supplying their many northern posts with pemmican, the most nutritious and most portable of all prepared foods. In old John's opinion we must blame the "free traders," more especially the Yankee dealers, in peltries, who in 1870 had nearly a score of factories on the Bow and Belly Rivers. Until these people were driven out by the 'red-coat rider' or North-Western Mounted Police, that particular corner of the territories was, to use Colonel John Hay's delightful phrase, "a first-class gilt-edged Hell;" and to judge from the stories of their doings, which are still told over North-Western camp fires, their establishments were cities of refuge for all the worst villains of the Western States. These men gave the Indians liquor—the vilest of pink-eye in exchange for skins and furs, and, in spite of many brutal outrages on the weaker and less warlike nations, never lacked customers, thanks to the Indian's ungovernable lust after fire-water, for which, having tasted it once or twice, he would give anything and go anywhere. At one time there were more than a thousand Indian hunters in their employ. Of course, the finer furs which were only to be found high in the north seldom or never came to their factories, for in those days only the friends of the company could obtain the supplies necessary for such a journey, and this army of hunters accordingly would hunt buffalo all the year round and even kill during the spring. Calves were never spared—not even if they were only an hour old—owing to the fact that their tender and supple skins fetched a good price down East, and of the full-grown beasts only the robes and tongues were taken, the carcase being left to rot where it fell, though large numbers of the Red River half-breeds hunted again in the fall, or even wintered on the plains in order to get the robes when they were covered with the thick winter's growth of hair. Everything they shot was duly turned into pemmican.

So it will be seen that old John had justifiable reasons for his opinion on this point. And a very similar abuse of their opportunities by the petty traders on the Mackenzie's upper waters is responsible for the scarcity, or perhaps actual extinction—for ten years back only four or five small bands were known to exist in all Athabasca—of the "wood-buffalo," once so common in that region. As soon as the whole of the vast territory to the north of the Saskatchewan River (even as I am writing I can hear the deep thrilling sound of the newly released waters of that noble stream, 'tis the drone-note in nature's slumber song to-night) has been explored and exploited by the miners and their many camp followers, I suppose the moose and the cariboo and the musk-ox will in their turn travel that dark mysterious trail—so deep in the dust of death that the heaviest footfall therein is noiseless—which leads away into the land of the obsolete. The buffalo of the great plains have long since departed to that place, and it will not be long before the last of the Indian and half-breed buffalo-runners has followed to the trysting-place.

When I was told that "old man Marceille was terrible sick and down-hearted, and the old lady"—i.e., his Indian wife—"'ud be real glad if I'd send him up a bit of a cheerful message," I had a presentiment that if I wished to see my old friend and hunting companion again I had better take the message myself. He was well on in the seventies, which is a great age for a man of mixed blood, for more than half a century he had roughed it on the high prairies and in the backwoods, and never troubled about keeping a balance of strength at the Bank of Life; and when I came to think of it, I remembered noticing more than once that summer that he had lost something of that vivid brightness of look and stealthy alacrity of movement which distinguished the North-Western hunters and trappers from the farmers and other "more mechanical persons." We had settled to cross the north branch as soon as ever the first flurry of November snow had fallen and to camp out until Christmas or perhaps even longer in the territory which borders on the famous "Peace Country" of the old fur-traders, and on many a fine summer's evening we had talked over our chances of making a good hunt until the owl's mellow reduplicated plaint warned us that it was time to turn in if we meant to be on the river at daybreak. Thrice that summer I had pitched my tent on the high river bank a little distance below his shack for a week or so, and I had spent my days fishing for sturgeon, "gold-eye," pike, etc., in the north branch of Saskatchewan. During June and July that swift and beautiful stream, which is three hundred yards wide at its confluence with the muddy sluggish "prairie drain" called the south branch, is full of clear snow-water from the far off Rockies, and in bright weather is as blue as the Danube is said to be above the Iron-Gates, so that, even if an afternoon's angling failed to provide enough gold-eye for the morrow's breakfast, or a pike or two—the old man's old lady had a knack of stuffing and cooking these fish to perfection—inveigled out of the shadow of his own particular boulder, the ecstacy of the swim through the cool gliding levels of central current was always a sufficient compensation. One sometimes hears of a species of northern trout—probably Hearn's salmon, which is common enough in many rivers of the Hudson's Bay watershed—being caught on the upper waters of the North branch, but I never succeeded in finding one hereabouts.

As a rule we visited our sturgeon nets—there were three of them—before breakfasting, which meant an hour's canoe voyage long before the sun looked over the high steep banks of the river. If any of the nets were broken, we sat down "right there," and mended it, which was uneasy work for a breakfastless man. That was a poor year for sturgeon fishing; nevertheless, we caught as much as we cared to eat, and the rest the old man peddled round the neighbourhood, so earning enough to keep himself and his old lady in tobacco for quite a time.

On the last evening of my third visit, it was the end of July, and the fireflies were almost as numerous as the mosquitoes—the old man set up three long sticks at equal distances apart immediately in front of the door of his shack, and then, sitting down in the doorway, began a Cree chant, as full of vain repetitions and apparently as meaningless as the "counting-out verses" used by children. A long spell of silence followed, broken by a sudden cry of "one-two-three mouswa." He had been practising the heathenish art of divination from the flight of fireflies formerly used by the Wood Crees, and had learned thereby that we should kill three moose during our winter's hunt. As far as I could understand his explanation, the two spaces of sky defined by the three sticks formed the soothsayer's templa; and the number of fireflies seen in the left or "bad" interval was substracted from the number seen in the "right," or interval of good omen. I could not persuade him to repeat the incantation.

The very next time I saw him—alas! for the tragic irony of happening!—it was clear that he had his orders for a longer and more fateful journey. I found him seated in his wife's rocking-chair on the sunny side of his dwelling, with his ramshackle muzzle-loader laid across his knees and a fringed mooseskin coat thrown about his shoulders, and at first sight hoped he was not so ill as I had feared. It was characteristic of the plucky old fellow that up to the very day of his death he insisted upon being dressed as though for hunting and taken out into the open air. It was not long before I knew that both the messenger and his message had arrived too late. Though his eyes were wide open and the calm expression of his face showed that he was not in pain, he took not the slightest notice of my presence, and was unable or unwilling to answer me as long as I spoke in English. When, however, I managed to grind out a word or two of Cree—his mother tongue—a look of childish curiosity came into his faded eyes, and the phrase "aneena eelo!" (who's this?) fell from his lips suddenly, and with startling clearness. Not another word did he utter during my stay, although his wife—such are the ways of Indian women—rated him in many words for his lack of manners, and actually threatened to shake him! Remembering that both Indians and half-breeds hate to be stared at by their acquaintances when they are ill, and often creep away into some solitary place in order to die, just as most wild and many tame animals do, I stayed no longer than was necessary to see that he and his wife had everything they required.

A week later I saw him buried at the lonely little cemetery below "The Pines." On that occasion more than fifty teams were tied up to the fence—a signal proof of John Marceille's popularity among his neighbours far and near. I cannot say the funeral ceremony was conducted decently and in order; for when it was time to lower the coffin, two men—carpenters by trade—had a loud and angry argument as to the proper method of letting it down into the grave.

But towards the end of the service there was a shower of rain, followed as usual by a sudden cessation of all the busy, wandering sounds in the surrounding levels of wind-blown prairie. It was as though nature herself, having hushed the many voices of her smaller children, was standing in tears at the grave of a fosterchild. The most memorable of Virgil's lines—the untranslatable sunt lacrimæ rerum, et mentem mortalia tangunt—came into my mind, and has for me henceforth a new and nearer meaning.

MRS. GREIG: "What are you burning, my dear?" Mr. Greig: "The letters I wrote you before we were married." Mrs. Greig: "You heartless wretch! Have you no sentiment, no—" Mr. Greig: Please be quiet. I'm doing this for your sake. I'm trying to fix things so that if I die nobody can dispute my will on the ground of insanity."

A CERTAIN town in the North produces bright boys. The other day one of them asked his teacher, "How much brains has a hog in his head?" She replied, 'Science has not determined that, Thomas." "Well, I have," said the boy. "It would take a philosopher to tell that," responded the teacher. "but you may tell." "A hog's head full!" rejoined the grinning urchin.

ELEY CARTRIDGES

—essential to good sport.

The most accurate and reliable of cartridges may not always suffice to ensure good sport, but good sport is out of the question without them.

Eley Cartridges do all that the best cartridges can do in this direction, with a trustworthiness which has won for them a measure of success greater probably than any other cartridges in the world.

Two 'Eley Loaded' Cartridges:

Eley 'Acme'
A bright orange 2-inch deep-shell Cartridge, loaded with Eley (42-gr.) Smokeless Powder.

Eley 'Elold'
A light maroon Cartridge. Loaded with Eley (33-gr.) Smokeless. Light recoil; absolutely waterproof.

The above, and other Eley Specialities, may be obtained from Gunmakers and Dealers in Ammunition, everywhere.

A SMALL boy sat lustily crying on a doorstep. "What's the matter?" inquired a small girl passing by. "Are you 'urt yourself?" The boy, stopped in the middle of a howl and stared scornfully at her. "What do you think?" he said. "Should I be sitting here making this row if I hadn't?" And he began again louder than ever.

"OF course, I'm a friend of the working man," said the aspiring politician. "Then why don't you work occasionally yourself?" asked one of his auditors. "Oh, that's simple enough. I don't wish to crowd some more deserving man out of a job."

Racing.

FLAT RACING IN ENGLAND.

1. LINCOLN TO GOODWOOD.

ALMOST up to the last the opening meetings of 1912, Lincoln and Liverpool, hung in the balance owing to the shadow of the Great Coal Strike, which had now been in progress for more than four weeks. That the curtailed train service so occasioned would necessarily affect the success of each meeting was certain, but the Stewards of the Jockey Club ruled, and caused it to be generally known, that the bare fact of the public being debarred from reaching the course cannot justify the abandonment of any meeting. The point to be considered was "Can the horses be got there?" For this the Railway Companies assured that arrangements were already made, but there arose the further difficulty of finding sufficient police to ensure order. From day to day no one could say what trouble would arise, and various districts could not be deprived of their usual complement of the men in blue. Sundry minor Jumping meetings had to be given up from this cause, but in the end satisfactory arrangements were made by the Clerk of the Course with the Chief of the County Police, whereby an adequate number of police were promised for the Lincoln meeting, to the joy of all sportsmen who had grown weary of the illegitimate game, as sport under National stunt rules is commonly called.

"A policeman's lot is not a happy one" runs an old popular song—nor is a trainer's. The drought of last year harassed their minds while the incessant rains of early spring had the same effect by rendering the gallops once so hard into quagmires, with the result that at some quarters training operations were more or less suspended. For example Morton, who usually sends a fancied candidate to the post for the Lincolnshire found it impossible to get his charges in racing trim and both Sanspot and Spanish Prince were scratched. In the end quite an average field both in quantity and quality faced the starter, including the crack Hornet's Beauty, the favourite Warfare, upon whom in spite of his poor form there was a rare gamble, the long-bottled-up Uncle Pat, with Long Set and Mercutio, the winners of last year's Lincolnshire and Cambridgeshire. Mercutio was not in the same form as last year and his owner Mr. Hibbert was very frank in his public announcements that he now had but little faith in Forfarshire's son. Hatho, however, had no end of confidence in Long Set, although he seemed by no means leniently handicapped in carrying 8st. 2lb. instead of the 6st. 12lb. he had in the saddle when successful at the Houghton Meeting. Mr. Joel's horse, however, is another example of great improvement later in life than is usually expected, and, moreover, he relishes soft going. He was soon at the head of affairs, and coming right away won in a canter by four lengths from Uncle Pat and Warfare, these three occupying the leading positions in the market just as they did in the race, although of the two Warfare was best backed down to 3 to 1. The winner was foaled in France out of a French mare Belle Perdue by an imported English sire Rabelais, and has proved a rare bargain to his owner, who purchased him for some £500 out of a selling race at Lincoln in 1910. Later with 9st up he added the Newbury Spring Cup to his triumphs thus making what I believe is a record for an ex-plater, namely, three successive big handicap victories. Yet this is the horse that was beaten in last year's Hunt Cup when carrying only 6st. 12lb. Far from being helped by his light weight of 6st. it was this very circumstance which caused the downfall of Warfare, for his jockey, Longhurst, good boy as he is, could not possibly hold him together. I know that the trial on the strength of which his connections backed him was something quite out of the common, but he lives to fight another day. The Lincolnshire must not be quitted without referring to Hornet's Beauty, who here met with his first defeat in England. The "Irish Express" as the gelding is jocularly called, is no longer under the care of Mr. Peebles, having been transferred to Leach's charge at Newmarket, together with the other horses belonging to Sir William Cooke. Discussion was rife as to what weight he would receive, and, when the official handicappers' estimate of 9st. 6lb. was known, but little surprise was expressed, and he at once became a popular fancy and over-night was actually favourite at 4 to 1 in a strong market. As in the Cambridgeshire, he was destined to cause more heart-burning, for on the morning of the race he was found to be lame, the trouble arising, I believe, from muscular rheumatism, and not from any accident. It was plain the gelding was in no state to do himself justice, and it was largely to satisfy the public that Sir William let his fine horse run, but could make no show, and was eased when pressure was found to be useless.

The Liverpool District was from its position naturally more affected by the strike than was Lincoln, and not till the eve of the meeting was it officially announced through the Lord Mayor of Liverpool that the necessary police were forthcoming whereby the croakings of the pessimists were silenced. The strike, however, had at least one very regrettable effect on Aintree, in that it robbed the meeting of the personal patronage of His Majesty, who, staunch to his duties and to the welfare of his people, declined to leave London till the clouds cleared and thus forewent his promised visit to Lord Derby to witness the great Chase. An important alteration in the conditions of the Grand National was early announced, namely, that 10st. should be the minimum impost instead of 9st. 7lb. as heretofore. The wisdom of the change was much debated, but on the whole it seems a salutary one, for it should tend to decrease the number of "Cat's meat" runners whose room is preferable to their company, while it gives the real good horse, the top-weights better chances, provided, of course, the handicapper does not increase the weights all round—on the other hand it cannot make much difference to the lowest weights, for if they cannot win with 9-4, 7lb nor can they win with 10st.; it is the course and not the weight that beats them. It is very seldom that a horse handicapped below 10st. has proved successful, the last to my mind being The Soarer, whom another 7lb. would assuredly never have stopped. It was generally agreed that it would be unfair to ask any horse to carry more than 12st. 7lb. over the tiring Aintree four miles and a quarter, so that satisfaction was expressed when it was found that Mr Topham had not exceeded the former recognised limit in estimating the burden for Sir C. Assheton-Smith's Jerry M., who under a similar burden had run second to Jenkinstown two years ago. He had a worthy rival in Rathnally, last year's unfortunate second, who was robbed of the spoil by Castern's swerving into him. Even before the entries he was on everyone's tongue as the probable winner, and as little as 10 to 1 was then taken. His allotted weight was 11st. 11lb., and as time wore on he shortened to five. Coulthwaite being so confident as to avow that he would not be afraid to tackle Jerry M. at even weights. Jerry M. carried plenty of muscle and bloom, and reflected great credit on his trainer Gore, who had had a somewhat anxious time with the gelding, but Rathnally was not in appearance the Rathnally of last year; the reason therefor is hard to discover, for there is certainly no trainer in England better capable of training a National winner than Coulthwaite, who by the bye is retiring from his profession. Bloodstone was there, a brilliant chaser, but more suited to Park courses, so was Axle-pin, Lord Derby's purchase. Casey the standing dish, Rory O'More and two previous winners in Jenkinstown, and the luckiest of the lucky, Glenside, twenty-four runners in all. After the usual vicissitudes, Rathnally falling at the third fence and Caubeen jumping well till the fourth fence from home which brought him down, Jerry M. and Bloodstone who had been leading for the last half mile, cleared the last fence together, and a shout of applause went up when Jerry M. was seen to forge ahead in the straight. Right gallantly did he battle under his 12st. 7lb., and won by six lengths from Bloodstone with Axle-pin third and Carsey fourth. There was every attendant circumstance to make the victory a popular one, the property of a sportsman who had lavished money on buying the best chasers, joint favourite with Rathnally, Jerry M's sweet temper and pluck won for him well-deserved cheers. Something must have been wrong with Rathnally, his jumping of the first two fences showed that plain enough, and he again disappointed when beaten on his merits some two days later by Lord Rivers. He is still young, and at his best, is really a splendid chaser, so that it is to be hoped that he, like the gallant son of Walmsgate, will ere he retires be rewarded for his unfortunate second of a year ago by winning the Blue Riband of the Chase.

Epsom Spring Meeting provided good sport; as did Newmarket Spring and Craven Meetings, but all racing at this time was somewhat spoilt by the ground becoming very hard through the prolonged drought of April, a month which usually gives more than sufficient visits of Jupiter Pluvius. The tit-bits of the Epsom programme are the great Metropolitan, than which there is no prettier race to watch, for the horses' start and finish in front of the stands, and the City and Suburban Handicap. Hartigan's Stable secured both these events by the aid of Accurate and Chili II. The former, a wiry staying mare is the best that can be said of her, was favourite for the long race, and had a lot of commoners to beat. There really seems a great lack of good class long distance handicappers, when such races as the Ascot Stakes, the Chester Cup and Goodwood Plate have all fallen to second raters. The Policeman, the resuscitated Rathlea and Irish Marine. There is sore need of a Kilbroney or a Willonyx.

A few days before the City and Sub., to use the popular abbreviation, the unfortunate Sir Martin again fell lame and Hornet's Beauty never being trained for the race, left Mushroom and The Story to carry the heaviest burdens in a small field. Common's son, who was attempting to win for the second time, a feat never yet accomplished by any horse, although the race has been so long established, has met with anything but leniency from the handicappers, so that, game as he is, he has been unable to take a prize, his best effort being a good third to Donnithorne in the rich Manchester Cup. Chili II., last season known as the Chelys colt, belied his dam's name (it is ancient Greek for a tortoise), for, although beginning slowly, he was too speedy for Lonawand, who was giving 22lbs. and was beaten a length with the well-backed Moscato third. Although starting at the outside price of twenties the stable were by no means without hope, and played up some of their Accurate winnings to a merry tune.

The Kempton Jubilee, the last of the Spring handicaps, was chiefly remarkable for the disgrace of Hornet's Beauty. Leach, his trainer, from personal observation of the gelding's action and from private trials in which he had smothered Mabsud, himself a good winner with welter weights up in sprint races, was confident that the unraced son of Fredennis was again at his best. Yet he never showed a particle of that machine-like galloping which had so fascinated the public, and coming round the bend actually last finished in the rack. Considering too he was a hotly backed favourite, it was a pitiable display, as surprising as was the easy character of the win by Bachelor's Hope, a brother of last year's winner, Bachelor's Double, both being of course by the Irish sire Fredennis. The colt was known to have the gift of going, but he is most unreliable and more than once had let the stable down; only a fortnight previously he had deliberately cut it, when seeming to have the City and Suburban at his mercy. Still Mr. Persse his trainer, and Mr. Dermot McCalmont who is now in India, by no means let him run unbacked, with the result that he shortened from twenty to one overnight to elevens. Sir Martin, though running untried, was greatly fancied, but he is no longer the horse he was, and needs a lower weight than his 8st. 11lbs. to enable him to win. The old Yellow Jack Mustapha too was one of the field, which is tantamount to saying that he gained a place, third this time, for the winner and he were split by Whiskbroom, who ran a game horse, but seven furlongs or at the most a mile will always be his best course.

To quit the monotony of discussing handicaps and turn to the classics, which make Turf History. Seldom it is that two such strong winter favourites so utterly disgraced themselves as White Star and Lomond have done. On the balance of two-year-old form they were undoubtedly the best of their year, though I for one sounded a forewarning note in respect of Mr. Joel's colt, that owing to his lack of size he would not be relatively so good as a three-year-old as at two years. For the failure of Desmond's son there is some reason, and it would be unjust to form any opinion of his merits on the strength of one inglorious performance when suffering from nascent boils on his legs; in the case of White Star, however, who was so confidently expected so create a record when the Derby should fall to Town brokers in successive years, there is no excuse. The truth probably is that he is cursed with a touch of the white feather as well as being a horse of no great merit. His first appearance was in the Two Thousand Guineas, where he was a well backed favourite at evens on the strength of a trial said to be even more severe than Sunstar's trial last year and with the weight of the Joel dollars behind him. A field of fourteen opposed him, including Hall Cross, who was well fancied at fours and five), the curiously named Jingling Geordie, Cylgad, Loss, Absurd and the eventual winner Sweeper II., whose two-year-old form had shown him to be quite in the front rank of last year's youngsters. The Rowley mile is not a severe test of stamina, but even this course proved too far for White Star, who cracked up when lying second about two furlongs from the winning-post. Sweeper II., with Maher in the saddle, then took the lead and easily withstood the challenge of the 100 to 1 outsider Jaeger and Hall Cross who followed him home in that order. The American-bred son of Broomstick and Ravello, one of the few American classic winners since Iroquois won the Derby after being beaten in the Guineas, is very pleasing to the eye, for he is a lovely golden chestnut with fine limbs and beautiful action and, but for being somewhat dipped in the back, no fault can be found with him. He is the property of Mr. Duryea who bred him at his stud in France and intended to race him there. There is, however, a rule to the effect that a colt foaled in France and leaving the country within six months of his birth is disqualified for racing. This rule was unwittingly broken when the foal accompanied his dam to England on a mating mission, and consequently Sweeper II. was given into the charge of Mr. Persse at Stockbridge, who is never likely to fail in getting the best out of his cattle.

The Newmarket Stakes run some fourteen days after the Two Thousand is not strictly one of the classics, though this year it aroused almost as much interest. Excuses galore were of course made for White Star's performance in the Guineas, and a second trial led his connections to believe more than ever that that form was wrong. In this race too we were destined to get our first glimpse of Mr Hulton's Lomond, whose preparation, not facilitated as it was by the hard ground at Epsom, was being timed for the Derby. He was thought to be quite fit enough to win this race easily, and with slight odds laid on Wootton's charge he and Mr. Joel's colt monopolised the betting to the exclusion of the other three winners, Cylgad, Tagalie and Catmint. Not many so great surprises have occurred at Newmarket than when White Star and Lomond ran an ignominious last and last but one to the other three who finished in the order their names are written. Lomond ran well for half the distance when he completely cracked up and was eased by Frank Wootton, when he saw pursuit was useless on a horse that could no longer race. Thus were snuffed the Derby chances of the two winter favourites about whom coupled some had been rash enough to take 6 to 4!

To contest the One Thousand a beautifully bred lot of fillies turned out, no less than five being young branches from Major Eustace Loder's Derby winner Spearmint; Isinglass claimed a representative in Virginal's daughter Bellisle as did William the Third in Bill and Coo, the aptly-named filly out of Cocoa, while Gallinule had two to represent him with St. Frusquin, Polymelus and Thrush one each. The Kingsclere filly Bellisle, who had proved herself perhaps the best of her age last year, was naturally favourite on that score, but she was hard pressed in the market by Pelkerris at twos, with Charmian, also fancied, beyond which three twenties were offered. The fair sex, whether equine or human, are seldom implicitly to be relied on, especially the former, and when Tagalie, whom it was only decided to start some few hours before the race sailed home an easy winner from Alope and Bellisle, she gave rise to the usual remark that fillies are kittle-cattle. It is a matter for regret that Bellisle has not with increased age developed that stamina one would expect to find in one of her breeding, for she had shown such promise. I am afraid, however, that later running at Epsom and Ascot show only too plainly that, as in the case of many another filly, she has failed even to maintain her whilom good form.

Regarding it merely as a race, the Derby proved a disappointment, although the glamour which is inseparable from the great Epsom race was by no means dimmed. Owing to the misfortune to Lomond, Coriander's breakdown at Chester, the deterioration of White Star and the scratching of Sir Ernest Cassel's Newmarket Stakes winner Cylgad through a mishap some three days before the race, there was no horse of real merit in the field, which comprised a score of runners, many of whom were forlorn hopes started on the off-chance or the property of sportsmen possessing a laudable delight in merely seeing their colours carried in the world-renowned classic race. The first and second in the Two Thousand, Sweeper II., with Maher in the saddle, and Jaeger headed the market at twos and eights, while the King's horse Pintadeau had a host of royalists waiting to cheer him home, if he were only good enough, of the others Tagalie, the only filly in the race, Mordred and Catmint are the only ones worth mentioning. The last named son of Spearmint is a magnificent type of racehorse standing over 17 hands and if there is any fault to find with him it is that his body is too heavy for his legs; as age strengthens the latter it is quite likely that as a four-year-old he will outstrip all those of his age who now have the foot of him. If they were a poor lot in class, there yet seemed every prospect of an interesting contest, for it is many years since the Derby was regarded so open a race, but the unexpected happened when, after an excellent start, Tagalie took the lead, coming down the hill before Tattenham Corner and cantered on an easy winner, never even being pressed by her immediate followers Jaeger and the dark outsider Tracery. Mr. Raphael's filly, who thus compensated her owner for the narrow defeat of Louviers by Minoru, is a raking iron grey and was, of course, in receipt of 5lbs. sex allowance all round, but this poundage had nothing whatever to do with the result, and the old adage of the grey mare proving the best horse was exemplified once again. As a two-year-old the daughter of Cyllene and Tagalie was by no means a wonder, and even in the Spring of this year she was never looked upon by her trainer Waugh, of Newmarket, as even entering into the Derby picture, but a course of sea bathing evidently benefited not only her legs which were somewhat dicky, but also her whole constitution. She was admirably ridden by J. Reiff, who with his brother Lester some ten years ago so well known on the English Turf has long since migrated to France, from whence he makes occasional visits to the land where he first made a name, on one of which occasions he rode Orby to victory in the Derby for Mr. Croker in 1907. Now-a-days it is quite customary to see a minor invasion of jockeys from France on the occasion of any special event or principal meeting; in the Derby there were four, all of which goes to show what a dearth there is of talent and horsemanship in the country, which has long been looked upon as the maker of jockeys; moreover, it is a dearth which threatens to become even worse now that nature is asserting herself in driving F. Wootton's lowest riding weight up to 8st. 7lbs., which will mean fewer mounts, and with advancing years, retirement. Tagalie is not the first grey to triumph in the Derby, for Mr. Hunter's Gustavus, the hero of 1831, and again Frederick, the property of Mr. Gratwicke and winner in 1829, were both of that colour, while the French horse Holocauste was undoubtedly up to the average Derby winner when he fell at Tattenham Corner in Flying Fox's year, and had to be destroyed. Sloan, indeed, who rode the colt, still believes he had the measure of the Kingsclere crack, when the accident befell his mount. There certainly exists a prejudice against grey horses, but the reason therefore is not easy to fathom, they are certainly picturesque and, taking into account that they are far outnumbered by their more orthodoxly coloured brethren, have shown as much merit. The reason that there are so few lies in the fact that a grey is never foaled, with but very few exceptions, except through a grey sire or from a grey dam. Once the colour is lost, it is lost for good; there is no throwing back—a grey may continually get chestnuts or bays, but the latter will never throw a grey except from a grey sire. Mr. Raphael's filly, of course, inherits her colour from her dam, who was by the well-known French stallion Le Sancy who got so many greys of merit. Since the Derby, Tagalie has sadly blotched her escutcheon, and The Oaks was the occasion of her first downfall. Looking at her form of only two days previous it seemed folly to expect any of the moderate field of fourteen fillies to lower her colours, but the race for the Derby evidently took more out of her than was thought at the time. At the very point where she raced in front in the Derby there did she compound in the Oaks, and left the finish to the despised thirty-three to one chance Mireka, a stable companion of Catmint under Jennings' care. After seeing the latter perform ingloriously on Wednesday Jennings lost the little hope he once had in the daughter of St. Frusquin and Musa, but, ridden by Childs from France, she won easily enough from the handicapper Equitable, with Bill and Cao third. Since then a complete rest and more sea-bathing at Yarmouth does not seem to have freshened up Mr. Raphael's filly, for she failed again at Ascot and could make no impression on Stedfast and Prince Palatine in the Eclipse Stakes, so under the circumstances she is not likely to find many favouring her chance for the St. Leger, although it is run in the mares' month. This last of the Classics is now only some six weeks distant, and promises to be more interesting than at one time was expected. There is not much doubt that while nursing a leg in the stable, Mr. Hulton's Lomond ought to have been winning the Derby. The trouble was serious, but it is a subject for all-round congratulation that it has not been serious enough to place him hors-de-combat for the whole season. His re-appearance took place in the Whitsuntide Plate, over a mile at Hurst Park in late July, where his solitary opponent was Jaeger, who under the conditions of the race was conceding 10lbs. Lomond was in no racing trim, for he is only now recovering from the effects of boils, but he beat Jaeger pointless and even if the weights had not been in his favour he would still have accounted for the Clarehaven Lodge colt. By St. Leger Day much of the now flabby flesh that covers the son of Desmond will, under Wootton's skilful handling, be changed for muscle, so that there is every prospect of seeing the old Lomond on the Doncaster Town Moor. I think he will prove too good for Tracery, who on his Derby third and two wins at Ascot looks like proving his most dangerous rival, while Bontor, who has shown great improvement, as likewise Maiden Erleigh, are not to be lightly discarded. There is no betting on the race, but when books are opened I think we shall find frequent enquiries for the above four, all of whom show stamina which it is now only too plain Jaeger, Sweeper and Co. lack.

Among the juveniles there are four really good colts in Shogun, Craganour, Golden Sun and Rock-flint. The first named is an inmate of the famous Epsom Stable presided over by Wootton, which also shelters youngsters of no mean order in Queen's Man and Fairy King, both of whom won good races at Goodwood. Shogun is a chestnut by Santoi out of Kendal Belle, and was previously named Knockderke, neither of which names is very euphonious or suitable for such a smart colt. He made his début at his home meeting in April where he won the Hyde Park Plate from a fair field at the outside price of twenties, though this price by no means represented the opinion of the stable. The fact was he is a big colt, and was at the time very backward, and for that reason was not seriously fancied. At Epsom summer meeting he won the Woodcote Stakes, and then essayed to break the record by winning the New Stakes, and Coventry Stakes at Ascot, the former of which he easily appropriated, but in the latter he met more than his match in Mr. C. B. Ismay's Craganour, who, being a maiden, was in receipt of 10lbs. from Mr. Hulton's colt. The latter is by Desmond from Veneration II., and far from belied the reputation he has gained in private, when he publicly trounced Shogun by three lengths, though like his Epsom rival he was destined to taste the bitterness of defeat when he succumbed by a head to Rockflint at Goodwood at even weights. Almost the exact counterpart of his sire Rocksand, this son of Trigger is quite in the first class, but in spite of the Goodwood Race I would prefer Craganour, for it was jockeyship more than anything else which won the race. Maher was on the back of Rocksand's son, and rode one of those marvellous finishes of which he is capable, especially on two-year-olds, while Saxby on Robinson's charge was hardly seen to his best, and hung back a bit in the middle of the race till he was some three lengths to the bad. Mr. J. B. Joel's Golden Sun is, as one might guess, a daughter of Sundridge and Golden Lassie, and has two easy victories to his credit, but perhaps his best performance was when he ran Shogun to a head at Goodwood at level weights. Rumour says that his superior lurks in the same stable, Morton's to wit, in the dark colt Sun Yat, who went to Ascot with confident expectation that he would justify his early promise, but the colt with many others of the Wantage horses contracted a cough and returned home without appearing in public. Other smart youngsters may be named in Louvois, a half brother to Louviers, who was runner up in the Derby in Minoru's year, Jay comet, Thistleton and the filly Eastern Rose, both the latter in Wootton's charge. This stable really seems to have enough and to spare of juvenile merit. If no misfortune bars their path it is probable that the close of the season will see Craganour and Shogun firmly established as the best of their year—and perhaps Mr. Hulton's day of revenge for the fates' unkindly treatment of Lomond for the Derby is not far distant.

The four-year-olds Prince Palatine and Stedfast, without proving themselves equine wonders, have done well and taken their share of the season's plums. Form has shown them to be as nearly as possible one and the same horse in racing merit, though the Prince fills the eye more favourably, perhaps owing to his size, which is characteristic of nearly all the defunct Persimmon's offspring. The two met in the Epsom Coronation Cup where the St. Leger winner through being short of a few good gallops and also dwelling at the start succumbed to Lord Derby's colt by three-quarters of a length, though in Justice to the winner it must be owned he lost ground in taking Tattenham Corner a bit wide. They did not meet again till the rich Sandown Eclipse Stakes, but both in the meantime had gained important victories, Stedfast at Ascot in the Rous Memorial and Lady Lightfoot's son in the Gold Cup. Owing to the latter being defeated somewhat unexpectedly at Newmarket by the three-year-old Lance Chest, Stedfast was a slight odds on favourite for the Eclipse, with Prince Palatine at five, while of the other runners Tagalie alone was slightly fancied. A finish as stirring as the dead heat between Neil Gow and Lemberg ensued, and the two raced together the whole way up the straight with indomitable courage, Prince Palatine having in the end a head advantage. Among our sprinters pride of place belongs to Great Surprise, the doubtfully bred son of Avidity or Fariman ex Armorel. He has won a good series of races including the Great Surrey Handicap at Epsom, where in spite of 10st. 8lbs. in the saddle he established a record for five furlongs in covering that distance in 55¼ seconds. A sixth furlong is a little bit beyond him, but over this course Spanish Prince, Sunflower II. and Golden Rod are still a best in themselves. That smart three-year-old sprinter Braxted has much deteriorated, and I fancy that attempts to make him a miler has not only spoilt his speed but also soured his temper, for he has not a solitary race to his credit, although he has been again and again well fancied.

Ascot with its rank and fashion deserves somewhat closer attention than the casual references scattered through my notes. How the meeting has altered since it was first established in 1711 under the patronage of Queen Anne, when highwaymen ready to plunder the fortunate, infested the bye-ways! Since then all is altered, and money has been lavished on course and stands, and yet methinks there is room for further change. I refer to the ridiculous naming of some of the races. Such as the Hardwicke Stakes, the Rous Memorial, it would be little short of a crime to alter, but what can one gather from "The Second Year of the Forty-ninth New Biennial Stakes"! the word Biennial might make one think it was a race for two-year-olds; not a bit of it; it is for "threes" and "fours" and again, "The Second Year of the Fifty-ninth Triennial Stakes" for two-year-olds? The York executive has endeavoured to perpetuate the names of well-known horses of past years, and we have the newly established Voltigeur handicap; there is too the better known Flying Dutchman's handicap. Cannot Ascot follow suit with the Persimmon Stakes, the Victor Wild Plate, the George Payne Memorial Stakes—surely it is time that other father of the Turf besides Admiral Rous had some race to recall his memory.

France did all they could to win the Gold Cup in sending over Basse Point; a mare that had been showing great form across the Channel and also Comburg, and the general opinion was that the French mare would win, but in spite of Lord Derby and M. Fairie shirking the race for Stedfast and Lemberg, England found a worthy champion in Prince Palatine who won easily from Basse Point in the very fast time of 4 mins. 27⅖ secs. The popular handicap The Hunt Cup fell to a fully exposed horse in Eton Boy, who had repeatedly run second and third in good handicaps, in more than one of which he had been the victim of misfortune. Hailing from a small stable, Carter's at Epsom, he was backed into favouritism by his owner Mr. Nickalls and by the public who followed his lead. Long Set again ran a fine race, getting second with 9st. 4lb. in the saddle, but Whistbroom hardly displayed the speed which had just previously carried him home a winner in the Victoria Cup at Hurst Park, which has now become the premier seven furlong handicap of the late spring.

A three-year-old which was well backed was the cleverly named Ask Papa by Matchmaker out of Pop-the-Question. I heard a wag, when besought to back the colt, reply in the doggerel lines—

"Go Ask Papa, the maiden said,
He knew that her papa was dead,
Knew the life the old man had led,
Therefore he understood when she said
Go Ask Papa."

In the result the wag had the laugh on his side.

Jaeger, Tracery and the filly Polderis each won good races, the last named taking the Coronation Stakes for fillies, a race which has more than once proved a stepping-stone to the St. Leger, as was the case in Throstle's year, but I doubt very much if Mr. Sol Joel's filly will spring another such surprise on the Doncaster moor.

To the best two-year-olds Shogun and Craganour I have already referred; others of this age in Rosewortby by William the Third, Diadimenos and William of Orange all gave promise of making horses of merit.

Goodwood, the closing scene of the half-year, was terribly marred by rain. Only those who have experienced a driving rain on the Ducal downs know the discomfort of a dripping Birdless Grove. Still every cloud has a silver lining, and on occasions the sun shone out as it did when Golden Rod carried Maher's 8st. 13lbs. to victory in the Stewards' Cup, which in spite of its low value retains all its old hold on the public. One of the worst flatcatchers I remember was favourite for this race, Grammont to wit. How expensive he has proved to Fallon's clever stable and the public, who follow him blindly, may be gathered when it is recounted that he was scratched from the Hunt Cup after no little public money had gone on him, was made a hot favourite for the Wokingham Stakes and ran unplaced to Sorrow, backed down to fours for the Stewards' Cup and again two days later carrying heavy metal, he has not once even run into a place. He is a gay deceiver; he can but be won't; avoid Grammont! The Goodwood Cup has long fallen from its high estate; save for the fact that it fell to one of our best sportsmen in Mr. Buchanan by the aid of Fullibar line who beat King William and Tootles, the race calls for no comment.

Goodwood closed with a sensation, the suspension of Frank Wootton for a month for reckless riding on Stedfast at Liverpool. The punishment, meted out by the Stewards acting on their own initiative, would seem severe but for the fact that Wootton has twice been before them for similar conduct; on the other hand, it cannot have been very flagrant, or else the Liverpool Stewards would have taken cognisance of it. No one, however, will for one moment cast aspersions on the bona fides of the Stewards of the Jockey Club, Lord Villiers, Hon. F. W. Lambton and Major Eustace Loyler. I understand too that starters have had it strongly impressed upon them to enforce on jockeys with far greater strictness the due observance of rules and regulations relating to starting. It is high time that they did so. All too many starts have not been what they should be; cases of purposely hanging back on horses not really wanted to win have not been rare; cases of horses, or rather the jockeys riding them, not taking their allotted place have been more frequent still, and a case could be quoted where a horse won a race through "pinching" a berth belonging to another. Starters already have sufficient power to deal with such behaviour, and the leniency of heretofore will rightly no longer be displayed. Jockeys will have to mend their ways or they will be in trouble.

There is no body more conservative than the Jockey Club, and consequently changes in Turf regulations are few and far between, and are only introduced after mature deliberation.

It is admitted by all that the latest regulations regarding the naming of horses have been long sorely needed. Henceforth or to be exact, from next season onwards, no three-year-old or upwards may run un-named. Further, a list of well-known horses, whose names are not allowed to be repeated, is to be prepared by Messrs. Weatherby; one can see how necessary it is to make certain names unavailable, when one realises that there is now running in England a plater named Hippia, who is very far removed from Baron Rothschild's Hippia who won the Oaks in 1867. So the powers that be are alive to their duties and work together for the good of the glorious institution, the English Turf.

WINCHESTER

.401 Caliber High-Power Self-Loading Rifle.

Besides being the most powerful recoil-operated rifle made, the Winchester .401 Caliber High-Power Self-Loader is the simplest, strongest, most easily operated and most rapid shooting of all rifles of this type. For hunting game, the self-loading type of rifle is ideal, providing it is reliable; and when you can get the power and the swiftness and ease of action of the .401 Winchester, you have a battery that prepares you to meet any game alive. Just look at these figures: velocity of bullet, 2142 foot seconds; energy, 2038 foot pounds. These figures show that the .401 is more powerful than the .303 British, and in addition you have the increased rapidity of fire. This is further augmented by the interchangeable magazine system, the simplest, quickest and most effective method of loading ever devised.

THESE RIFLES CAN BE SEEN AT ALL GUNMAKERS'.

THE TURF.

GOODWOOD.

THOUGH there was a considerable shrinkage in the attendance on Wednesday consequent on the untoward weather conditions, the meeting, as a whole, has proved particularly successful, another big crowd assembling for the winding up stage. With the exception of a brisk shower during the progress of the opening event the weather was favourable, whilst, though one or two of the fields were somewhat on the small side, the racing was excellent. As on the previous afternoon, the King formed one of the party from Goodwood House, whither he returned after racing.

Won by two lengths; a similar distance away Madge Whinstone was third.

BRIGHTON.

It was a far remove from holiday weather which visitors on the front at Brighton on the 6th instant encountered. Blinding sheets of rain were driven before half a gale of wind, and though there was a subsequent improvement the storm broke out afresh midway during the afternoon, and the half-drenched onlookers had the unique experience of seeing a race being run on one side and on the other—a little way out at sea a schooner, stripped bare of her sails and totally disabled, being pulled by a tug to safer shelter. The usual big crowd put in an appearance, but the racing was of a decidedly holiday type, fields being on the small side, and sport not too exciting.

THE OVINGDEAN PLATE—Of £100, for two-year-olds. 5 furlongs.

Mr. E. Hulton's b f Maycup, by Cupbearer—Maypole, 8st. 9lb.	W. Huxley 1

BRIGHTON.

It was a far remove from holiday weather which visitors on the front at Brighton on the 6th instant encountered. Blinding sheets of rain were driven before half a gale of wind, and though there was a subsequent improvement the storm broke out afresh midway during the afternoon, and the half-drenched onlookers had the unique experience of seeing a race being run on one side and on the other—a little way out at sea a schooner, stripped bare of her sails and totally disabled, being pulled by a tug to safer shelter. The usual big crowd put in an appearance, but the racing was of a decidedly holiday type, fields being on the small side, and sport not too exciting.

THE OVINGDEAN PLATE—Of £100, for two-year-olds. 5 furlongs.

Mr. E. Hulton's b f Maycup, by Cupbearer—Maypole, 8st. 9lb. ...	W. Huxley 1

BETTING: 9 to 4 on Flanders, 6 to 1 agst. Collared, 7 to 1 Adelante, and 10 to 1 Prince Cherry (offered).

Won by a length and a half; three lengths separated the second and third.

Fortunately for the enjoyment of the huge crowd of holiday-makers which assembled on White Hawk Hill on Wednesday there was a welcome improvement in the conditions under which racing was resumed, for though little sunshine was in evidence there was an entire absence of rain, whilst the wind, if a trifle boisterous at times, lacked the keenness of the opening afternoon. Fields were again on the small side, but much more interesting racing was provided.

THE SUSSEX PLATE (handicap)—Of £274. 6 furlongs.

Mr. L. Clow's b f Wethers Well by St. Brendan—Prosperina, 4yrs., 9st. 4lb. Donoghue 1

Won by a length and a half; a length away Sen Sen was third.

It was not a particularly brilliant wind up for the conclusion of the Brighton fixture, for the card, already reduced to half a dozen items, was further curtailed when Marforio was allowed to walk over for the Southdown Plate. A fair number of runners put in an appearance in the remaining events, but the racing was of small account, there being no corresponding attraction to that which had been furnished the previous afternoon by the meeting of Lomond and Etheric. There was again a capital attendance, but the weather remained gusty and towards the close pouring rain drenched those who were unlucky enough to be unable to gain shelter.

THE BROOKSIDE PLATE—Of £100, for two-year-olds; colts 9st., fillies and geldings 8st. 11lb. 5 furlongs, 88 yards.

AUSTRALIA vs. SOUTH AFRICA.—Soon after stumps had been drawn at Trent Bridge, Nottingham, on Tuesday night, rain again began to fall smartly. There was every appearance of more dirty weather, and about ten o'clock a perfect deluge set in. This lasted until nine in the morning, but the outlook subsequently underwent a change, for while rain fell in torrents in the town the sun was shining over the cricket ground. It was decided, therefore, to take luncheon at half-past one, and in the event of the weather keeping fine make another inspection of the wicket. Just before two o'clock, however, another heavy shower fell, and it was then decided to abandon the match as a draw. Full score and analysis:

ROWING.

THE WINGFIELD SCULLS.

By his victory in the Wingfield Sculls on the 2nd instant, W. D. Kinnear, of the Kensington B.C., joined a select band of amateur scullers. He has now held them for three successive years, and is thus one of four men who have done so. The great A. A. Casamajor, one of the finest amateur scullers ever seen, and who was unbeaten in public in any race held them for six successive years (after his first defeat of H. H. Playford rowing over five times); F. L. Playford, who witnessed yesterday's race, won them five times on end, and Guy Nickalls three. Others have won three or more times, but these series have invariably been broken. Kinnear, who sculled in singularly good form, had only one opponent, E. D. P. Pinks, and won handsomely enough.

La Burgoyne followed the contest, and aboard the boat, besides Mr. Playfoed were several old champions, amongst them being Messrs. F. I. Pitman (now the manager and honorary secretrary), G. E. B. Kennedy, H. T. Blackstaffe (who showed the winner up from a cutter, in which was another old champion in J. de G. Edye), and A. A. Stuart, whilst the world's champion, Barry, and the English ex-champion, Sullivan, also followed. Kinnear, who weighed 12st. 7lb. to Pinks' 12st. found it difficult to get away at the start, and to Hammersmith it was quite a good race to watch, but thereabouts Pinks' left arm went and afterwards the Kensington man had an easy journey home. Neither man steered at all a good course, but that was not the fault of the pilots. Mr. Lumb directed Pinks, but he yawed all over the river after Hammersmith, and sculled dead behind Kinnear for a long way. Possibly his arm caused him to be helpless. Kinnear appeared to be too near Middlesex at Chiswick, and shot across the river too soon. The conditions were good, and for a wonder there was not a great deal of traffic on the river. Altogether the winner sculled strongly and well, and gave some idea of what a formidable man he must have been at Stockholm. Pinks who was well trained by Phelps, was quite good until his arm gave out.

At the close of the race Mr. Pitman, in handing back the Sculls to Kinnear, referred to his victory in Stockholm, and said that he no doubt could take on any amateur from Putney to Mortlake and beat him. He hoped, however, that next year there would be more than one challenger.

In the toss for stations Pinks won and chose Surrey, and they were started thus:—

Surrey Station—E. D. P. Pinks, London R. C.

Middlesex Station—W. D. Kinnear, Kensington R. C.

Both got away well, Kinnear pulling 9, 17, and 30 in the first minute to Pinks' 8, 15, and 28. For about a quarter minute the boats were level, but then Kinnear began to go away, and in a good race up to Craven Steps then led by three-quarters of a length, his time being 2mins. 47secs. The Kensington man was clear at Craven Football Ground, where he was sculling 24 to his rival's 23, and going further away passed the mile post with a two-length lead in 4mins. 49secs.

Afterwards both sculled 23 a minute, Pinks, who steered erratically, throwing away a great deal and placing himself at a disadvantage in sculling through Kinnear's wash. Still at Hammersmith Kinnear led by only 2½ lengths, the time being 8mins. 50secs. and 8mins. 57secs. Afterwards both steered badly but Kinnear easily went away. At Chiswick Steps his time was 14mins. 13secs. to Pinks' 14mins. 30secs. after which the latter, who kept in the tide, made up some distance in going across the river to Middlesex. This, however, made little difference, for afterwards Kinnear went further ahead. Pinks once stopping for a stroke and being in difficulties. At Barnes Bridge, where his time was 19mins. 40secs. Kinnear was 21secs. in front, whilst his win in the end was the more pronounced by Pinks sculling into the bank, his left arm being so bad that he could not control his boat. In the end Kinnear won by 35secs., his time being 23mins. 51secs. Mr. F. I. Pitman was umpire and starter and Mr. Fred Fenner distance judge.

SWIMMING.

ONE MILE CHAMPIONSHIP.

Under the auspices of the Exeter Swimming and Life Saving Association, a gala was held at Exeter on Saturday, the principal event being the National Mile Championship. The competitors in this were H. Taylor (Hyde Seal), holder, J. G. Hatfield (Middlesbrough), F. P. Giles (City of London Police), and H. Smith (Teignmouth). W. Foster (Hyde Seal) was to have competed, but, owing to an accident sustained during the week, he was prevented from so doing. The race was swum in a heavy downpour, and from the commencement resolved itself into a duel between Taylor and Hatfield. Both used the trudgeon stroke, and it was early evident that Hatfield, who is a much younger man, was the more powerful swimmer. He gained advantage at the end of every lap, and his time for the half-mile was 12mins, 14½secs. Continuing to swim gracefully, and without much apparent effort, the Middlesbrough man won by forty yards in 25mins. 2½secs. Taylor was second, and Giles third. The record is 24mins. 17½secs. made by T. S. Battersby on 7th August, 1909 at Southport.

5,000 YARDS CHAMPIONSHIP.

The 500 Yards National Swimming Championship was decided at Weston-super-Mare on the 6th instant before a crowded attendance. Unfortunately the race was deprived of much of its interest owing to the fact that only three swimmers competed for the honour, J. G. Hatfield, Middlesbrough, the National Champion, P. Radmilovic, Weston-super-Mare, National 100 Yards Champion, 1909, and W. J. Kimber, Welsh Half-mile Champion. Holder of the championship is H. Taylor, Hyde Seal S. C., and the prize consisted of the perpetual Challenge Cup presented by Sir Geo. Pragnell. The distance represented 15 lengths of the bath.

A capital start was effected. Radmilovic got away first, but Hatfield took the lead at the conclusion of the first length and kept several yards ahead of his rivals for three lengths, after which he increased his advantage, so that when half the distance had been completed he had a clear lead of 15 yards. It was evident the result lay between the famous Weston polo player and the Middlesbrough swimmer. Radmilovic made a desperate effort to overtake Hatfield, and at one time reduced the latter's lead, but the issue was never seriously in doubt, and Hatfield won comfortably by twenty yards from Radmilovic. The time was officially given as 6mins. 18½secs. Keiran's record was 6mins. 7½secs. Hatfield successfully attempted to break Beaurepaire's 500 metres record, completing the distance in 6mins. 5½ secs. as against 7mins. 21secs. by the Australian, who put up his record in 1910.

GEORGIA lawyer (to coloured prisoner): "Well, Rastus, so you want me to defend you. Have you any money?" Rastus: "No; but I'se got a mule and a few chickens and hog of two." Lawyer: Those will do very nicely. Now, let's see; what do they accuse you of stealing?" Rastus: Oh, a mule and a few chickens and a hog or two."

"I SMOKE nothing but a pipe now." "Practising economy?" "No; but the fellows who used to treat me to cigars apparently are."

A VERY loquacious female witness, whom the opposing counsel could not silence, so far kept him at bay, that, by way of browbeating her, he exclaimed: "Why, woman, there's brass enough in your face to make a kettle." "And sauce enough in yours," she rejoined, "to fill it!"

Hunting.

POONA AND KIRKEE HOUNDS

The eighth mile stone on the Bombay Road was the rendezvous on the 16th instant: the field numbering over fifty. A jack was soon put up who ran in a circle and was despatched after a short ten minutes, the brush being given to Mr. Hughes. Another was turned out of a nullah shortly after and made for the Nasik Road. After a mile he turned to the left, crossed the Bombay Road and the Railway not far from the level crossing near Chinchwad Station. The gate-keeper caused considerable delay by refusing to open the gate but was eventually prevailed upon and the field were up with hounds, at Chinchwad village: here a fresh jack was put up which went to ground near the river soon after and could not be dislodged. Hounds were then whipped off and the field returned to refreshments kindly provided by Miss Moxon. The field included Hon'ble Mr. Claude-Hill, General Barter, Hon'ble Mr. and Mrs. Carmichael, Miss Palin, Colonel and Mrs. Fowler, Major and Mrs. Hughes, Mr. and Mrs. Vines, Mr. and Mrs. Corbould-Warren, Colonel Arnold, Mr. and Mrs. Colhum, Captain and Mrs. Sydenham, Captain Langrishe, Major Bowen, Captain McCudden, Mr. Harvey-Kelly, Majors Jourdain and Robinson, Mr. Logan, Colonel Perkins, Mrs. Symons Greenshields and Robinson, Captains T. Lucas, Conker, Wilson, Startin, Major Barton, Captain Furnival, Captain Utterson, Mr. Heugh Symons and Mr. Alister Forbes from Bombay, Mrs. Birkett, Major and Mrs. Davie, Mr. Wren, Mr. Ewbank, Captain Chaytor, Captain Stokes, Mr. Bailward, Mr. O'Donell, Mr. Atkinson, Captain Berkel-Captain Biley, Mrs. FitzGibbon and many others.

On Tuesday the 20th hounds met near Hadapsur a small field meeting the master, the paucity of numbers being due to the dance the night before. A jackal was turned out of a guava plantation near the Sholapur Road and made his point for Foxhill; then turning to the right he crossed the railway but was pulled down very soon after. The run occupied about fifteen minutes, Mrs. Sydenham getting the brush.

Last Thursday a field of sixty turned out at Yerowda jail. Amongst those out were:—Miss Wheeler, Miss D. Campbell, Miss Crawford, Miss MacGeorge, Mr. and Mrs. Corbould-Warren, Mr. and Mrs. Vines Captain T. Lucas, Captain Conker, Mrs. FitzGibbon, Hon'ble Mr. Claude-Hill, Hon'ble Mr. Curtis, Major Westmoreland, Hon'ble Mr. and Mrs. Carmichael, Hon'ble Mr. Millet, Major-General Barter, the Raja of Akalkote, Colonel and Mrs. Fowler, Colonel Evans, Major Newinson, Captain Furnival, Major Martin-Miller, Mr. Carey, Captain Leahy, Major Bowen, Mr. Greenshields, Major Paxton, Captain Chaytor, Captain Stokes, Mr. Wynne, Mr. Logan, Mr. Atkinson, Colonel Arnold, Major Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Colhum, Miss Braidwood, Nawab of Wai, Captain Sydenham, Mr. Bailward, Mr. O'Donell, Mr. Pogson, Captain Utterson, Captain Weldon, Colonel Guy Moore, Mrs. Hughes, Captain Sarson, Mr. Eeles, Mr. Robinson, and many others.

The cactus on the road to Loahgan provided a jackal which made for the Sisters' Hill. He ran in a circle, was twice headed, and came out again close to the jail: here he was again headed and went into the tank where the pack followed him and killed him before he reached the other side.

OOTACAMUND HOUNDS.

Sportsmen who remember that good horse Matesmata will grieve to hear of its untimely end out hunting on 15th instant; while being held, together with other horses by one syce, during digging out operations of a jack which had gone to ground near Aramby Wood, it got its hind legs down a hidden culvert ditch very deep; hanging on by its foreleg for a while it sank down and fell over on its back in the boggy bottom of the drain, whence all efforts to extricate it proved fruitless. Some 24 hours afterwards it was got out with ropes but not before being so severely strained that it succumbed. A great loss to its owner, Captain Merrick, the M.F.H., especially as the horse stood a good chance for the coming point-to-point and other hunt races.

On Thursday morning, 15th a large field met at Brookhampton. Hanging Shola being drawn blank we went to Rockwood, where a jack was started, but he declined to give us a run in the open except for the short distance across the rifle range, where bullets were flying, to Aramby, through the wood to Tudor Hall and as far into Ooty as Monte Rosa to an earth from where he was dislodged and despatched. A warning to skulkers! A good many of the field went home from here and so missed a fine run we had later from Point-to-Point Covert to Staircase, across Dartmoor, into Yamakal, round Baron Wood, by Fife's Nallah and to Bamboo Shola, where the jack beat us, the pace having been very fast.

On Saturday, 17th, a few only went out to the midday meet at Sultan's Shola. The going was dry and the sun rather hot, so scent did not be well. Working west towards Headnells and then round home downs it was late before a jack was viewed on Newmarket. Hounds were put on his scent and he gave a fair run going towards Parlock, thence through Staircase Shola to Governor Shola, along the road to Sheffield Corner on to Rees Corner and thus heading for Parkie he ran to Denmark and Fairlawns Bridge, to lie on the steep slopes of Cairn hill he got away. Hounds having had a long trying day were taken home, reaching kennels as late as 7 P.M.

Monday 19th.—The meet was at Lake End at 7-30 A.M. Not being able to hunt that day nor to collect any information of the sport I must leave it a blank.

Tuesday 20th.—Windy and upset noon. A very small field and only one Whip to help the Master. Near Puddier's Shola hounds got on to a jack, a stout running one, which led them at a great pace through Paragon over the old Pykara road round Pykara Hill, left handed by Dormer and back through Chemmund to Briar and then on towards Readnells, about two hours going during which time hounds got clean away from the field and were lost to sight and sound. Without a pack, the hunting of the usual quarry had to be abandoned and the problem to solve was where to look for hounds! I don't know what happened after 3 P.M. as I went home very wet and with a tired out horse.

Football.

FOOTBALL IN CALCUTTA.

On the 21st Calcutta met the United Services in their return fixture. It was an interesting and strenuously contested game from start to finish. The Services had out a very fine team and were only just beaten six points to five. The first advantage was to Calcutta, Sherman making a mark but Cunningham's attempt to place a goal missed by inches. The Services had the best of the subsequent play and put in several fine runs. They did not however, get through till shortly before the interval when Sawdy took the ball down and the forwards dribbled it over the Calcutta line, Duncan being credited with a try and the extra points being added by Chase. On changing ends Calcutta showed great improvement and did most of the attacking. A penalty for off-side against the United Services gave Calcutta a chance but the kick went wide. At length Durnford got over with a try, the kick from a difficult angle being unsuccessful. Shortly before time Cunningham got over with another try which he failed to majorise. There was no further scoring, the Services being thus beaten by the narrow margin of six points to five. Calcutta have one more League engagement, the match against the Barbarians, but it appears as if this match will not be played owing to the inability of the Barbarians to turn out a full team. On Saturday it had been arranged to give the Calcutta team selected to go to Bombay a chance of playing together but illness and injuries prevented this taking place. The Customs were to have played the Police but this match fell through and a game was played between the Customs and a Calcutta team comprising most of those going to Bombay; the game was a good one, the Customs being defeated by 28 points (4 goals and a try) to 10 (2 goals).

The Customs met the Police on Monday evening and beat them by 11 points to 3. The Police were not at full strength and were assisted at back by Gunner Gooch of the U. S. team. The opening half was well contested; the Customs were first to score Lavett getting over with a try which Williamson failed to convert. An attempt by Galbraith to drop a goal shortly after was unsuccessful and there was no further score till half time. On resuming North scored a try for the Police, but this was not converted. In the closing stages of the game the Riversiders asserted themselves and had the best of the exchanges. A good run by Lavett, Williamson and Galbraith ended in the last-named getting over with a try to which Williamson added the extra points and just before time Lavett crossed the line with another try. This was not converted and time was called with the score: Customs 1 goal 2 tries (11 points). Police 1 try (3 points).

THE HARRIS TOURNAMENT.

The tournament opened on the 19th instant when the Royal Irish met the Dorsets in the presence of a large crowd. The initial play was fairly level. The Dorsets forced a couple of corners which they could not improve upon and then the Royal Irish got away and scored. A run by the Dorsets was unsuccessful and they were forced back to their own territory, where the Irishmen got a corner and just missed scoring. The Dorsets next pressed and forced a corner but play was again transferred and the Irish kicked a goal, following it up with a third before the interval. On resuming the Dorsets made desperate efforts to score but the Irishmen kept them out. Up and down play followed and the Dorsets lost opportunities of scoring and just before time the Irish put on another goal and thus won by 4 to nil. On the 20th instant the Loyal North Lancs. met the Norfolks and a good game resulted in a draw of a goal all. The Norfolks scored in the first half and the North Lancs after the interval. The game was replayed last Thursday when victory went to the Norfolks by 2 goals to 1. The opening play was rather sticky, but after the Norfolks had drawn first blood the game became more interesting. The North Lancs. made great efforts, but were still one down at the interval. On changing ends they rushed down but the Norfolks custodian cleared and the ball was taken to the other end where the Norfolks scored a second point. Nothing daunted the Loyals pressed vigorously and at length put the ball through. They did their utmost to get through again, but all their efforts were futile and they retired beaten by 2 to 1.

The Warwicks met the R. F. A. on the 21st instant and beat them 3—1. The first half was very well contested—the Warwicks were first to score, but the Gunners managed to equalise before half time. In the second period play was again very level and there was no further score. Extra time was decided upon and during this the Warwicks scored a goal without response and won as stated.

The Naturalist.

THE MOST TERRIBLE SERPENT IN THE WORLD

To the man who has spent years in the solitudes of primoval forests, who has slept under the trees of the deep moist jungle, grasping his rifle, and pitting his own acute faculties against those of the tiger, the elephant, the panther, the bear, and the wild dog, the subtle appreciation of esoteric signs which inform him of the presence of wild things is developed to an extent absolutely wanting in the town dweller. What this faculty is may be elementarily realised by a study of that enthralling book "The Tribes On My Frontier," in which an observant gentleman chronicles the movements of wild things in his compound invisible to the opaque intelligence of the average citizen.

When we came to Bassein a little more than three and a half years ago, we lived in the small bungalow on the creek side, within a short distance of the Roman Catholic Church. Our practised eye, i.e. practised in jungle lore, noted the tangled growth of underbrush, the sedges growing from the creek side almost into the godowns, the heaps of broken old bricks and tiles littering the compound. "Ideal place for snakes," we remarked. And we were pleased. For we love nature so much that our greatest delights is to live among snakes—the more venomous the better—or wild animals—the more dangerous the better. We should infinitely rather have a fine healthy cobra or hamadryad rustling about our premises than a modern society lady mincing about them outraging nature with a monstrous nat and skimpy hobble skirt restraining the free motion of her limbs.

Just at nightfall we heard a peculiar weird noise from the sedges which informed us that a snake was swallowing a frog. We went out with a stick and a lantern and despatched the snake we knew quite well, from the squeaking noise of the frog, we should find in the sedges. A splendid Russel's viper he proved. We bore him into the house, the inmates of which, of course, had heard and seen nothing—were surprised that a snake should be about and looked alarmed when we informed them that a bite from the handsome brilliantly-marked reptile would result in certain death. In the early morning we noted four dull heavy lines in the dust of the compound, as though a fragment of loaded rope had been dragged across the surface, and we knew that our grounds were affording hospitality to at least four snakes, probably venomous ones. In the course of a month we killed one black cobra one brown one, and two of the small deadly panni chittas. We related our experience to an old resident of Bassein.

"Why," he said incredulously, "I've been living in Bassein for thirteen years and I have never seen any snake but harmless water snake!"

And he gazed at us impeachingly as much as to say:—"My dear Chappie, your snakes are visionary!"

We said firmly that we had now been a teetotaler for quite a length of time; that the days when we used to see Rats and Triceratops and Gigantosaurus and Tyrannosaurus and Whales and Unicorns and Sea Serpents and Dinosaurs and Dragons had departed for ever—that no longer did distractingly pretty little nymphs—we hate big women—dance tantalisingly in our dreams and make mocking faces at us.

He sniffed sceptically and said emphatically:—"Never saw a venomous snake in Bassein in an experience of thirteen years!"

Well, we shifted into the bungalow which is now adorned by our presence. Occasionally a snake was killed by our servants and our neighbour's durwans, but the compound appeared to be remarkably free from snakes considering that it abutted on a creek.

"After all, there appear very few snakes here," we cogitated.

As though to dissipate our optimism, one morning word was brought us that a snake had been seen upstairs in the children's nursery.

What sort of a snake?

A small greyish-coloured harmless looking thing.

"It is very far from being harmless," we rejoined. "That is the house krait, whose chiefest pleasure is to get into bed with you and, when you roll on him, resents what he considers premeditated insult, by giving you a nip which results in death; or the snake creeps into your boot, and when you shove in your foot, lays hold of your big toe, with the result that there is a funeral—not the snake's—in the house."

We turned the children's nursery upside down, stopped up every crevice, bolted and barred the door on the inmates when they retired at night, and left our own bedroom door, on the opposite side of the passage, invitingly open in order to facilitate our own acquaintance with the snake.

The reptile could not get into the nursery; but a lady who slept in the adjoining room, on awakening one night, saw the krait, erect on its tail, apparently contemplating her face!

Her horrified shriek brought us running to her aid. We tried to grasp the snake sufficiently close to the head to prevent it from biting—we are expert in catching snakes in this way—; but it wriggled from under our hand and effected its retreat into a hole in the boards. The lady transferred her cot into the nursery, while we swore at the snake thus upsetting our household arrangements.

Apparently finding the nursery door barred, the krait came into our bedroom next night, as we intended she shou'd.

It would be mere iteration to describe how he always escaped us and got into his hole.

One evening, about five o'clock, we heard the noise of a frog being swallowed by a snake. We were busy writing, and shouted to the cook to proceed to the noise and kill the snake he would find there.

He returned in triumph with—our friend the krait! We could hardly be mistaken, we were so familiar with the snake's appearance, and all doubt has been removed by the fact that we have never since seen a snake in the house.

Some two years ago, about nightfall, word was sent us that a very large snake was in the hut of one of our neighbour's durwans. The snake was so large that the durwans were afraid to attack it. We hurried into the hut with a short length of male bamboo we use as a walking stick, only in time to see the tail end of the snake vanish through the hole in the wall by which it had entered the hut. We then heard a "flop" or "splash" in the water of the creek as the snake plunged in, which showed that it was a large and heavy one.

Some time subsequently—about a fortnight afterwards—at nightfall our cook rushed up the stairs shouting for help. We ran to his assistance:—

"Allah! Allah!" he yelled, "kisai budda samp!"—which may be loosely translated into "By the Piper that played before Moses, what a devil of a big snake!"

We gave him a gentle cuff to check what we considered gross exaggeration.

"You affliction," we said. "Have you never seen a cobra or viper before?"

"Cobra," he retorted, "this snake is bigger than twenty cobras!—"

"There it goes into the creek," he continued, as a heavy flop or splash sounded from the stream—it was too dark to see anything.

"Describe the snake," we directed.

"Well, it's twice as long as you are," said the cook.

That would make the snake twelve feet in length!

"And," he continued, "it has a hood like a cobra!"

Ha!—a twelve-feet hooded snake could only be the hamadryad, or, to give it its scientific name, the Ophiophagus elaps, the most deadly, belligerent, and dangerous snake in the world. Here was a discovery truly! And our thoughts reverted to our thirteen-years-old resident who had never seen anything but a harmless water-snake in Bassein! Here was the most fierce and terrible serpent in the world—as dangerous as a tiger—dancing the cake-walk about our compound!

We recalled how on every occasion the snake swam away in the creek. The hamadryad is as much at home in water as on land.

We cross-examined the cook rigorously.

"In our opinion you're a fool," we said urbanely.

"That snake would make a fool of anyone," he assented.

"How so?" we demanded.

"It hunted me for my life," he declared.

"But so large a snake cannot have a hood," we affirmed.

"This snake has got everything, may the devil admire it!" he maintained.

We crossed over to our neighbour, Mr. Ramgopal, our well-known legal luminary (who, by the bye, will be with us again next year).

"There is the most dangerous snake in the world lurking about your premises and mine," we said to him. "This species of snake attacks people without provocation with the greatest ferocity and fights to the death. It would really be less dangerous to have a tiger about the place, because a tiger would keep to himself, but this beast comes into the houses and drives the inmates out; our cook has had a very narrow escape. The bite of this snake is immediate death and it will certainly bite someone if we do not make an end of it."

"How are you so sure it is the kind of snake you describe," said Mr. Ramgopal. "Have you seen it?"

"No," we rejoined. "We have not seen it; but we are quite satisfied it is a hamadryad from the description of the servants who have seen it."

We then went on to describe how we had been in the habitat of these terrible serpents in the Maliahs of Ganjam, that we had shot the largest one on record—eighteen feet in length—and how we had sent the skin to the Madras Mail from Ganjam for all the sportsmen and naturalists of that presidency to see.

After detailing the above facts to Mr. Ramgopal, we offered a large reward to anyone who should call us immediately to the snake when it should appear again.

About a month afterwards we were having a bath in the morning, when Mr. Ramgopal's billiard marker shouted from the latter's premises:—

"Oh sahib, here's the big snake!"

Hoping no ladies were about, we emerged nude from our bath, like Venus rising from the foam, and ran to meet our enemy the snake, tucking the bath towel about our hips as we ran.

Flop! Splash!

"Confound it; there's the snake plunged into the creek again! How the beast eludes one!"

Two years passed away.

One fine morning a large gang of convicts under their warders proceeded to dismantle an old ruin on the jail premises opposite our bungalow.

Suddenly there is a terrific commotion, a pillaloo which we generally associate with Donnybrook. The convicts close their ranks and brandish axes and heavy bamboos.

Standing on the end of his tail, towering above their heads, with expanded hood and darting sting, is a magnificent hamadryad! He has come out to fight the crowd! He will never retreat! He will fight to the death!

The convicts utter a terrific yell of apprehension and defiance and brandish their axes and long heavy bamboos.

This appears to madden the hamadryad. With a hiss like a steam engine he launches himself on the crowd. One convict meets him with a blow from his long heavy bamboo, and this man the serpent makes the sole object of his attention during the rest of the fray! His frantic blows bound off the long lithe sinuous body of the fiercely-attacking snake as though they had alighted on gutta percha! The serpent gets under the bamboo, and it looks as though all is up with the man—when some ten comrades of the sorely-pressed convict, noting how intently the snake is driving home his attack on this one man, close on the reptile in rear with long and heavy bamboos, and a fortunate blow breaks its spine. It is comparatively easy work after this, though the snake strikes out on all sides as far as it can reach.

There can be no question that no single man could have beaten off the fierce sustained attack of this large and terrible hamadryad.

We taped the reptile as it lay—11 feet 8 inches.

"Ah," said a warder, "it requires a sahib with the physique of Mr. Owen, our chief jailor, to fight a snake like that! The only thing for ordinary men is to run away from it!"

If citizens or visitors wish to see what the most terrible and deadly-venomous serpent in the world, popularly known in its habitat, the Ganjam Maliahs, as the man-eating snake, in Bengal as the keuta, in India and Burma generally as the hamadryad, and to science as the Ophiophagus elaps, they may gratify their curiosity by calling at the editor's bungalow, Jail Road, where the snake is on view.—Bassein News.

BETTING AND SANITY.

THE meek withdrawal of the Gambling Advertisements Bill, of which the Bishop of Hereford was the legislative godfather, is a hopeful symptom of the trend of understanding at Home. True, the Bill was introduced in, and withdrawn from, the House of Lords where individual courage and robust common sense still enjoy freedom of exercise ; but having regard to the number of persons whose private convictions are wholly at variance with those they support publicly, the collapse of the latest attack on the freedom of the subject is a matter for congratulation. It is difficult to believe that even Dr. Perceval imagined that this amazing Bill would pass : it proposed, among other ends scarcely less drastic, to make the following proceedings punishable as misdemeanour :—"To print, publish, sell, circulate, or publicly exhibit any newspaper, circular, coupon, or document whatsoever, which contains any advertisement or notification by or on behalf of any person, club or association as to betting on any race, game, fight, sport, competition or lottery, whether within or without the United Kingdom, or which contains any announcement of betting odds or starting prices or other advice or inducement to bet on such event."

It was "a tall order." As we take in the full sense of the breathless legal phraseology, we catch ourselves wondering what can be the atmosphere breathed by the men who imagine that the British people would ever bow to such extraordinary moral dragooning as it proposes. The good Bishop stated that he had the assistance and support of one of the greatest of living jurists, Sir Edward Fry, in framing his proposals. English judges above all men are sane and practical, and the only conclusion is that Sir Edward Fry advised the Bishop and his friends to ask for a great deal more than they were at all likely to get, on the chance of getting anything on the familiar principle of asking for ten times the sum in damages you are prepared to accept. When we look a little more closely at the features of the Bill, its sweeping absurdities become manifest. What, for example, constitutes an "inducement to bet"? The bare sight of the announcement of a race-meeting, to a good many of us unregenerate beings, suggests opportunity "to have a bit on." It is in itself a reminder, though the advertisement says no more than the name of the meeting and the dates of the races. Far more of an incentive were the advertisement of the abandoned railway company which actually intimates facilities to attend the meeting: attendance connotes betting and the mention of special trains inobviously "an inducement"; and when we come to close quarters with the business and contemplate the daring statement that such horses have arrived and that such jockeys will ride, we realise that we are fairly within the meshes of legal "inducement"!

Now, if there is one thing more certain than another, it is that racing cannot exist without the aid of newspaper support, in the shape of advertisement, whether of dates and stakes or of reports of races run; and the only conclusion is that the excellent Bishop cherishes design to make an end of racing altogether; and not racing alone, for his Bill would have produced equally final results to football and other games round which men congregate. We are never surprised by any dexterity or "slimness" on the part of modern politicians whose cleverness is far in excess of their wisdom; but we must confess that we should hold it far more in accordance with the traditions of the episcopal bench, were Dr. Perceval to bring in a Bill which boldly and frankly sought an end of racing altogether. We can respect an enemy, we cannot respect an assassin.

People who work much among the poor at Home make no secret of it that much hardship and penury arises from betting, and they affirm that women are as culpable as men. Legal enactments notwithstanding, the practice of wagering in (street) holes and corners continues to flourish. Once "in a blue moon" Tom or Bill wins a sovereign or two from the bookmaker and the success of Tom or Bill, expressed in new belongings, advertises for all times the glowing possibilities of half a crown put on the right horse. People who work much among the poor admit this "evil," but they speak and write of it with what some eminent ecclesiastics must feel to be shocking lenity; those who work among the poor grow very humanised if they were not extremely human to begin with. They have knowledge, once held, but perhaps forgotten by bishops, of the drab existence led by the workers; they realise the natural craving for excitement, the colour that posibilities of winning a sovereign lends to back-street life; and they are lenient. They content themselves with urging that the sum risked shall not be more than the bettor can afford to lose. There is proportion in betting as there is in everything else; if the man risks a sum he can afford to lose he does nothing at which even a bishop need carp; if he risk more than he can afford to lose he is a fool; but he pays the bill and his folly is his own affair. When a fool involves his family in trouble the case takes on a new complexion; but we are not prepared to condone the restriction of the many for their sake of protecting a few from the consequences of the own folly, even though they involve others in their disaster.

The proposal that the Post Office should be saddled with the duty of moral police and empowered to refuse the facilities of the post to any person suspected of sending circulars relative, not only to races but, to competitions of all sorts which involve the expenditure and winning of money, inspires wondering dismay. Could the promotors of this extraordinary measure have realised what their proposals involved? It closed up, or sought to close up, the advertising stock-broker; he is not in the first rank of his calling, but he is not a criminal? It forbade, or sought to forbid, transmission to those harmless journals which revel in "prize competitions;" a sufficiently innocuous form of winning (?) money it might be supposed. It is difficult indeed to see where the projected campaign would stop; perhaps the most striking proof of its absurdity was that that shining light of elevated morality, Mr. John Hawke of the Antigambling League wrote to Lord Durham—Mr. John Hawke seeking aid from Lord Durham presents a picture that appeals to us—saying that his League deprecated the Bishop's measure. Mr. John Hawke has been less in the puplic eye of late than he was a few years ago. He seems to have employed his time in growing wiser.

It is to that hard-headed peer who has ever the courage of his opinions and wins the respect of friend and foe alike by his plain speaking, that we look for enlightened guidance. We refer to Lord Newton. He admitted that betting and gambling were made far too easy for the general public and that many betted who would refrain but for the incitement of circular and opportunity thrust under their noses. But betting in itself is no crime and if it were a crime it would not be stopped by enactment. His views were those ourselves have always held; make bets recoverable by law; legalise betting; and make it a source of revenue. It is as impossible to stop betting as to dry up thirst; and it is quite as legitimate to turn the one to the public advantage as it is to the other.

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

The St. Leger betting of the past fortnight has displayed Lomond as a strong favourite and the best price that he has touched has been 9 to 4, his previous quotation since his "regeneration" having been 2 to 1 and he has now again gone back to that mark. After his defeat in the Newmarket Stakes it was found necessary to throw him out, as he was troubled with boils or inflamed surfaces behind the knees and also in his heels, but his recent performances plainly say that this temporary ailment has not damaged him and that his connections now believe him to be as good as ever he was. If he is "as good as ever he was" he is very good indeed and it would be, in view of the reason for his early three-year-old failures, a great mistake to forget what he was as a two-year-old and what he gave promise of being as a three-year-old. His victory in the Duke of York Plate, 1½ mile, at Hurst Park, did not mark him out for preferment, as his only opponent was Jaeger, who kicked the boy off on the way to the post and then bolting the reverse way, collided with the dolls and was more or less damaged. In the Brighton Cup, 1¼ mile, Lomond started a hot favourite and was beaten a head by Etheric, to whom he was giving 10lb., that horse having just previously won the Perkins Memorial Plate, 1 mile, at Newcastle, Harestones and Long Set finishing second and third. Lomond then won the St. James' Stakes, beating White Star pointless and his victory is described as a very stylish one indeed, and it is said of him that he won galloping on at the finish and would have won the farther the farther they went. The stable seem well satisfied and as Wootton does not back a horse or allow his patrons to do so unless he has the race won before ever one of his goes on to the course, it is a tip worth regarding.

The Yankee-bred Tracery by Rock Sand out of Topiary is being backed and his third in the Derby is said to be the first foundation for it backed as it is by a recent win in St. James' Palace Stakes at Ascot, for the support that has been accorded him. He also won the Sussex Stakes, 1 mile, at Goodwood, again beating Sweeper II. (whom he had defeated at Ascot) and Apprentice ran third. He is ticketed as one who improves every time he starts and is evidently in the enjoyment of the confidence of his supporters.

Mr. Solly Joel's Maiden Erlegh by Polymelus (by Cyllene) out of Plum Tart, won the Knowsley Dinner Stakes at Liverpool in July: he won the Ascot Biennial in June, beating Lance Chest and Mordred, and at Epsom he won the Chipstead Plate, beating Sea Water and Ormuz.

Hector, who is owned by Mr. Dugdale and is by St. Amant out of Hecuba, won the Triennial Stakes at Ascot, beating Sweeper II. and Jaeger, and the St. George's Stakes, 1 mile 3 furlongs, at Liverpool; Jack Saw second, White Star third.

Catmint who has recently been mentioned in the betting and is now on the 9 to 1 mark, is by Spearmint out of Red Lily and is owned by Mr. Leonard Brassey. He won the Prince of Wales' Stakes, 1 mile 5 furlongs, at Ascot, beating Fantasio and Lorenzo and the Gratwicke Stakes (1½ mile) at Goodwood, beating Belleisle and The Tylt. He ran third it will be remembered earlier in the year in the Newmarket Stakes behind Cylgad and Tagalie, and if there is any truth in that form this horse must be somewhere in the fighting line next Wednesday. Sweeper II. they will not have as a stayer and Tagalie, who is also on the 12 to 1 mark with Sweeper II., has never done any good for herself since she won the Derby and the critics do not seem to be overfond of the grey mare concerning the value of whose brilliant performance at Epsom there seem to be many opinions. On her form in the Derby, however, she ought to be named as a possible for 1, 2, 3, and her earlier running was very consistent, as she capped her win in the One Thousand by finishing second to a very good horse in the Newmarket Stakes and at her next essay she cleared out all the colts in the biggest of the classics. It may well be that the cry of "fluke" may have been raised too soon and that the grey mare may yet once again prove herself to be the better horse.

There is a rumour to the effect that the Irish three-year-old Ardigon by Captivation out of Gransha may come to India, but we have no reliable confirmation so far. He won one race as a two-year-old and he has won three times this year, the Epsom Town Plate, 6 furlongs beating Peggy Hyland, Royal Engineer, Ruddy Sheld Drake, etc.; the Prince of Wales' Welter Handicap at Chester, Kilbirnie being second, and the 5-furlong Grove Welter Handicap at "Alley Pally." He is said to be a very game, consistent colt and the report is that a well-known Anglo-Indian patron of the Irish buyers was intending to get him for an Indian owner. He is class enough for any of our short races out here at a time when we have very few sprinters of outstanding pretensions.

Mr. R. Craig McKerrow is expected back about the end of November and does not, so far as our information goes, intend buying any more horses. He has already sent out Little Slave by Littleton out of Slave Lass, a four-year-old colt who won the Shepperton Handicap Plate at Kempton, 1 mile, in May, beating Pretty Bold and Whispering Captain, and also Yute. He was ridden by Colin Barrett and Mr. McKerrow had to pay 840 guineas to keep her.

Proprietor and Sea Lad have both been sent back to Dehra and will not return to Calcutta until the cold weather meetings. Both have won at the Monsoons and ought to be very much to the fore in jumping events next cold season, especially Sea Lad, who has done remarkably well and won four times straight off the reel.

D. Norton, the well-known trainer, has arrived from Dehra Dun with the pony Spook and the English jockey F. Hardy. Norton was at home this summer and has only recently returned. Hardy will ride for Messrs. Dass and Norton during the season.

The Calcutta Second Monsoon Meeting opened on Wednesday, the 4th, but as this journal goes to press before the occurrence of the racing the following notes have necessarily been written before the results are known. The card is a poor one owing to the Selling Race for horses to be sold for Rs. 500 having fallen to pieces and the Stewards having decided not to frame another race to fill the gap. It was not considered likely that a selling race on these terms would fill and it is doubtful whether the race on identical conditions included on the third day's card is likely to meet with any better fate. There was every reason on the other hand for knowing that a 14-2 race would fill well, but on neither the first day nor at any of the subsequent meetings are there any races included for this class. Considering that some of the best fields we have had so far during the first Monsoon Meeting have been in the 14-2 events the omission seems to be difficult to understand. The open hurdle race also will very probably provide a poor field, but in the other three races we may see fair musters. Five events in an afternoon, however, is a very poor entertainment and the public as well as the owners feel much as Oliver Twist did. The handicapping of Winna in the Amateur Hurdle Handicap has also given rise to much criticism. This 14-1¾ pony has run twice only over hurdles, both being closed pony events. In the first of them she was a moderate third: the second one she won getting 9lb. from the runner-up Reuben, who she beat all-out by three-quarters of a length. For these two performances she has been put in at 12st. 5lb. top of the horse class in the closed hurdle race and is asked for one thing to give Fame, who ran The Priory II. to a neck in the Ellenborough Hurdle Plate, 7lb. Taking a line through Fame, who is handicapped at 9st. 10lb. in the Open Hurdle race on Wednesday, this pony Winna would be in that race at 10st. 3lb. and would be only getting 3lb. from Idle and 16lb. from The Priory II. In the closed horse hurdle race for one unimportant win against a field of ponies she is asked to give away weight to Farthing Bun, winner of many races, Fame ditto, Frank ditto, Rough Luck a recent winner and Daisy Priam also a winner. If she has been placed top in a closed pony race after one win she would have been badly treated, but to be asked to give away weight to all the best of the amateur class of horses is unjustifiable. She has never done much good on the flat, and her exploits over hurdles are not such as entitle her to such marked distinction. If a horse were sent up to the top of the class for one success there would be a good deal of comment, but this mare is a pony and she has been put into a class above and is at once—and presumably propter hoc—been awarded the maximum weight in the apportionments. Mr. Holder has done so well on the whole that we cannot understand by what method of reasoning he arrives at this curious result.

This paper will appear after the races have been run, but we shall not be surprised to find the following amongst the list of winners: The Priory II., Light Metal, Frank, Circus Girl, and Bushey Dame.

So far as present information goes the Stewards do not intend to extend the Calcutta Monsoon Season beyond the present advertised limits, i.e., the 14th September, and although many owners we hear are anxious for at least one extra day on the 21st it is not likely that this will be found to be feasible, as it is said that continuing racing late into September throws such a large amount of heavy work upon the C.T.C. staff in order to get things ship-shape for the cold weather. Whether this is so or not we cannot say, but the C.T.C. is a rich organisation and manual labour is very cheap and the preliminary operations of preparing the galloping surfaces at Calcutta and Tollygunge not particularly arduous. Last season we had nine days' racing in the Monsoons: this year our racing dates are curtailed by two and owners of non-winners are not unnaturally somewhat disappointed at there being no "consolation" day.

The Fifth Extra Meeting at Poona was held on the 27th ultimo, a general holiday in the Western Presidency. The important cricket match between the Parsees and Presidency doubtless kept away a large number of people from the race course, but there was a very fair attendance nevertheless and a full card of seven events provided good sport.

The Sydney Plate opened the proceedings, Mauveron leading from start to finish and winning very easily from Mandeville by five lengths and giving Brown his first of three winning rides.

Sixteen went out for the Holiday Plate, six furlongs, for Arabs. Regent could do nothing on this occasion and finished nowhere. Sunspot and Fathi Beg were prominent to the turn, where they were joined by English Mail and Bahiz. France came through in the straight and followed home by English Mail won by three lengths; Sunspot finished third and paid the handsome dividend of Rs. 174 on the tote.

Fourteen came under starter's orders in the Lilliput Novice Plate. Tezab running in the van all the way was challenged in the straight by Agent, but Brown kept Tezab in front to win by a head.

The Moderate Plate provided a splendid finish, the duel between Black Douglas and Bachelor's Knot being perhaps the most exciting event of the afternoon. After Bright Metal, Mayfly IV. and Milford Lake had led in turn Bachelor's Knot took command at the half mile and was joined by Black Douglas in the straight. A great race home ensued, the black carrying 10st. 2lb. to victory by a head on the post.

Another big field went out in the Arab Medium Plate, an outsider in Mexico getting home in front, nicely ridden by A. Hoyt. Shirsab and Ghalyum led early in the race but gave place to Mexico, Berar and Crown Prince. At the turn Lord Durham came through, but Mexico stayed him out and won by a length and a quarter.

The Summer Plate gave us another fine finish. Malmsey led out at the start, but Chobham and Lord Merv soon took the lead and showed the way to the turn. Chobham, Malmsey, Yvette, Lord Merv came into the straight in a bunch, but Victo suddenly appeared out of the ruck and looked like winning, but Chobham stayed off his challenge and Brown landed Mr. Garda's horse a winner by a neck; Malmsey third.

The Hadapsar Plate brought out ten, Minerva, Fado and Ream showing the way to the turn. Ream and Fado were then done with and Minerva was joined by Zinfandel and Sweden and a good race ensued, the last-named winning by a neck with a head between Minerva and Zinfandel.

The racing at Poona on Saturday gave us another excellent afternoon's sport and concluded the extra meetings prior to the big meetings which commence on Saturday next. The card of seven events opened with the Maiden Arab Plate for which there were eleven starters, this proved a comfortable win for Wireless, who came through in the straight and beat Noor-ul-Malik by a length; Highflyer, who ran prominently all the way, finished third and provided his backers with Rs. 132-8 on a place ticket at the machines.

Next came the second division of the Strangers' Plate with thirteen starters. Reminder was most fancied but could finish only third to Imperial and Ream, who finished first and second, the former winning an exciting race by a head: this couple was also well backed.

The first division of the Strangers' Plate gave Mubrook an easy win from Tenebreuse and Solar Star. Egyptian flattered his supporters as far as the bend, where he was done with and Gowajhmer, who carried most money, was never prominent.

The August Plate of one mile for horses created considerable interest, as the field of sixteen included many well-known performers, amongst them Vavasor, Black Buck, Lumination, Punt, and the three new importations, Saxonite, Kurnell and Gunboat. Vavasor was the street corner tip and never left the issue in doubt, for he came away in the straight and, nicely ridden by P. Kuhn, won comfortably by half a length from Franconi with Beckmesser third a similar distance away.

The Dhond Plate resulted in a fine finish. Young Japan made all the running till they entered the straight, where Last Chance and Thaboor took command and in an exciting finish little Harrison steered Last Chance to a victory by a head on the post.

The Garrison Plate gave us another close finish, Bombastic just defeating Lord Merv by a head and giving Brown his single victory during the afternoon.

In the Neral Plate Pendil was considered the goods, but the winner turned up in Balox, whose recent performance had given a line to his present success.

A home correspondent, alluding to the opening day of the recent Brighton meeting, writes:—

"In all my journalistic career, and it is of considerable length, I have never been out in such a day as yesterday, and some of the oldest racegoers with whom I had a chat this morning quite agree with this view.

Mr. Arthur Coventry, the starter, had a particularly rough time of it, as he always rides to the post on a hack. Yesterday he employed a small brougham for the return journey, and but for its aid he might have been washed away entirely."

In India where the wearing of puttees is so general by sportsmen and others the name of Messrs. Fox Brothers and Co., Ld., of Wellington, Somerset, has long been associated with the best that can be had in this connection. The public will therefore be interested to know that the firm have recently brought out an improvement on their well-known "spiral" puttee. For a long time faced with the difficult problem of how to counteract the natural tendency of a cut or raw edge to fray, they have by the aid of some ingenious machinery at length succeeded in producing their shaped spiral puttees with fast woven edges that cannot fray and the firm claim their Improved Puttee as the only perfect puttee, inasmuch as it combines the three essentials—elasticity, shape to fit any leg, and an unfrayable edge that will always look neat.

So far as sculling goes, writes a London Correspondent, the present year of grace is altogether a red-letter one. England boasts undisputed supremacy both in the amateur and professional worlds. And just, so long as Barry maintains his present form and elects to defend his title, we shall hold our own with the world's professionals. But what of the future? Frankly, the outlook is not rosy. Albany, perhaps, may develop into a champion, but who else is there likely to take up Barry's mantle? I do not write this in a despairing mind, yet it behoves those who have the aquatic welfare of England at heart to see to it that other youngsters are well looked after and encouraged. On this point I shall have something to say another day. With amateurs it is refreshingly different. Rarely, if ever, have so many really promising scullers been in evidence as is the case to-day. Amateur sculling has taken a new lease of popularity, presumably, and with the best results. The position is rosy in the extreme. Legion is the number of aspirants to sculling fame now knocking at the door.

It is a great pity that more of them did not compete for the amateur Championship last Friday. As it was, W. D. Kinnear (Kensington R. C.) the holder since 1910, had a very easy task once again.

By Royal Warrant to the KING.

His solitary rival, E. D. P. Pinks (London R. C.), winner of the "Colquhouns" in 1909, proved no match for the Olympic champion. He sculled well for a distance, but at the mile post his left arm gave way and all was over. The time (23·51) was only so-so—for obvious reasons. One sincerely hopes a better entry will be received next year and henceforth for this most important event. Even if actual victory is not attained, the experience gained in the preliminary heat racing is invaluable. Last year Kinnear rowed over. This year he was opposed by one sculler only. Surely, in the face of the amateur sculling boom just referred to, such a state of affairs is anomalous.

Edward Durnan, the Toronto sculler, has challenged Ernest Barry for the World's Championship and £500, the race to be rowed on the Thames in the autumn. Barry is willing to race Durnan, but emphatically declines to allow the challenger anything in the way of expenses. Barry is quite within his rights in his desire to abolish the "expenses" question. In his race with Arnst it was a different matter. The New Zealander, being champion, was entitled, by immemorial custom, to require that every challenger should come and scull him on his own water. In conceding this privilege he had a right to be paid for so doing as he was clearly only bound to defend his title in New Zealand. Now that Barry is champion the same rule applies to him.

The most interesting item of boxing news from America is that Jack Johnson has at last signed articles to meet Joe Jeannette at the St. Nicholas Athletic Club, New York, on 25th September. This will, of course, be a no-decision contest, for awards are prohibited in New York. Johnson is for ever retiring and reappearing. When he recently opened what he called his "eat emporium" in Chicago, it was thought that he had at last done with the ring, but the guarantee of £5,000 for a ten rounds bout has evidently proved too much for him.

The men have met on seven occasions up to date, Johnson losing once on a foul. The record of their meetings is as follows :—

9th May 1905.—No decision. Six rounds, at Philadelphia.

25th November.—Jeannette won on a foul in two rounds, at Philadelphia.

2nd December.—No decision. Six rounds, at Philadelphia.

16th January 1906.—No decision. Three rounds, at New York.

15th March.—Johnson won in fifteen rounds, at Baltimore.

20th September.—No decision. Six rounds, at Philadelphia.

26th November.—Drawn. Ten rounds, at Portland, Me.

In the matter of victories the men are all square. Jeannette has a lengthy ring record, and has defeated, amongst others, Sam McVea, Sandy Ferguson, Ben Taylor, Jack Scales, and Al. Kubiak. He has lost and drawn to Sam Langford. He has been a claimant to the championship of the world, and has for years done his best to force Johnson into a match. He was a visitor to England and France in the spring of this year.

It was generally believed that the Madison Square Garden Club would have got the match, but Johnson demanded a £6,000 guarantee. Now he is to get £5,000 and 50 per cent. after the first £10,000 of the receipts. Twelve months or so ago it was publicly stated that Johnson was barred in New York, but that seems to have been removed now.

"Porky" Flynn, who went to England as one of Langford's sparring partners, and who was defeated by Bombardier Wells at Olympia, was badly beaten on recently at the St. Nicholas' Club by "Gunboat" Smith, of California. Flynn, since he arrived in England, has had much experience in Australia, but he was not always successful. He was severely punnished by Smith, who sent him to the boards in the sixth round with two tremendous righthand swings to the jaw.

A couple of interesting matches have also been fixed up. Ad. Wolgast, the light weight champion, and Packy McFarland have been matched for a ten-round bout at Madison Square Garden on 3rd October, the weights to be 9st. 9lb. Matt Wells, the English light weight champion, and Jack Ward are also to meet shortly for £500 a side. It is understood that this will not interfere with Wells' return match with Fred Welsh for the Lonsdale belt and the Lightweight Championship in October.

The return match arranged between Carpentier and Klaus have been declared off. Carpentier has decided to take a good rest and his place will be filled by Marcel Moreau, who will meet Klaus in a twenty-round contest in Paris on Monday next.

There seems to be some activity among heavy weight boxers in England and we read of several big matches in the near future. P. O. Curran and Gunner Moir are to meet early this month: a return match between Moir and Bombardier Wells is also being talked of. Tom Cowler, the Cumberland champion, is the latest aspirant to honours in the heavy division. He recently knocked out Ian Hague in the ninth round at Mexboro after having the Yorkshire man beat to a frazzle during most of the journey. George Rodel, the South African and Bandsman Rice are expected to be matched with Cowler very soon and, should he make good, there is any idea of his meeting the winner of the Curran-Moir contest and even flying at higher game in the shape of the holder of the Lonsdale belt.

In the 100 metres swimming race for the Criterium Internationale at Joinville-le-Pont on the 15th ultimo the Australian Cecil Healy was first in 1min. 4secs. beating another Australian, Boardman, by inches.

The two lengths sealed handicap race was held by the Calcutta Swimming Club on Friday evening last with the following result :—

F. Vandyke, 5secs. start, time 45⅘secs.	...	2

Particulars of the tragic death of the late Mr. Hubert Latham, the aviator, are given in the Paris edition of the New York Herald. The despatch, which is undated, states that Mr. Latham, on the morning of 25th June, accompanied by a native, was shooting on the right bank of the Chari River, near its junction with Dahr-Dalamet, close to the Gayes rapids. He had wounded a rhinoceros, and was about to finish off the animal when his heavy calibre rifle burst. Mr. Latham seized another rifle from the native and fired, killing the rhinoceros. At this moment a buffalo, until then hidden in the tall grass, came into view. Mr. Latham fired again, but only wounded the buffalo, which charged and tossed him three times. The unfortunate man gave one cry and fell dead. The body was brought to Fort Archambault the following day, and buried there on 30th June. Only a short time before his fatal accident Mr. Latham was, it is reported, slightly injured by a wounded buffalo.

THE athletic pride of England is roused, judging by the large amount of correspondence which has appeared in the home papers concerning Great Britain's record in the recent Olympic games at Stockholm and the manner in which well-known public men, not hitherto particularly interested in this branch of sport, have expressed their opinions on the subject. Suggestions, valuable and otherwise, which aim at the recovery of our laurels at Berlin in 1916, are being scattered broadcast, and no doubt much good material will be forthcoming, which should lay the foundation of, perhaps, our rejuvenated and renewed athletic supremacy.

In recent issues of the Sportsman have appeared a number of articles and letters on the lessons of Stockholm and the preparations for the games which are to be decided four years hence, and it was to obtain a criticism of the opinions expressed therein that one of the representatives of our London contemporary interviewed the Rev. R. S. de Courcy Laffan at the offices of the British Olympic Council. The reverend gentleman first touched upon what had been termed the lost opportunities of the past, and declared that the reason for it all was very simple. They had not had the money, and so had been unable to carry out schemes of organisation and training, which were so desirable if any success was to be obtained. Had the public come forward with subscriptions it would have been possible to have accomplished those things.

Regarding the lessons of America and the suggestion that we did not take our athletics seriously enough, Mr. Laffan partly agreed with this. We had been carrying on too much by rule of thumb, with the inevitable result. What we particularly and primarily required to do was the adoption of scientific methods, and he cared not whether they copied the ideas of America or any other nation in this respect. This was what was being done in other countries, and was the secret of their success, for the athletic authorities had been studying, by means of photographs, the best models of runners, jumpers, etc., finding out what was the right technique, and anatomically working it out detail by detail, in order to obtain a maximum result with a minimum effort, which was, after all, the whole object of training.

How we in this country would be able to secure this desideratum was a question of momentous importance, and would have to be very carefully considered. We must have a man who thoroughly understood the work and the best methods to employ. Personally he did not know where the right man was to be found; he did not think there was a man in the country who could undertake the responsibility.

The suggestion that the team should be collected for six weeks before the Games for training purposes was impracticable, while the idea of one writer that it should be extended to six months was ridiculous and quite out of the question. Six weeks, however, was put forward seriously, but he did not think the 'Varsity representatives would be able to do this, and certainly the athletes living under ordinary conditions would find it impossible. In most cases employers would not allow their men who happened to be selected nine weeks' absence from work, for that is what it would amount to, the six weeks' special training and three weeks, with travelling, of the Games. The most he could hope for was that the team could be together a week or ten days before the actual competitions commenced.

Mr. Laffan did not think the need existed for the team to be under the supervision of one trainer for so long a period as six weeks ahead. Assistant trainers should be scattered about the country who should learn the right methods, what were right and what were wrong movements, and they would be able to give all the personal attention required to likely candidates. Then, of course, the selected representatives could finish their preparation under the eye of the head trainer.

With reference to the employment of track tactics Mr. Laffan at once stated that if these were essential to the success in the Olympic Games he would be very much against our taking part in the international fixture. But he was convinced they were not necessary. What we in England had got to do was to continue to teach other nations our ideals of what sport really was. He fully believed that at Stockholm there was an improvement, a very great improvement, towards the elimination of the undesirable element, and that competitors were being educated up to our standard and ideas of what was fair and what was not. The ideal state was not reached yet, but there was a movement in that direction. We certainly had athletic ability enough in this country, which, if properly organised, was good enough to win even against tactics which we would not care to adopt.

So much has been heard of the monetary side of the question that it would be interesting to know what course will be taken when funds are forthcoming, for pertinent inquiries have been made as to who will control them, the British Olympic Council or the Amateur Athletic Association, and which of the two bodies will carry out the organization, and, of course, pay for same. Mr. Laffan was questioned on this particular point, but can say nothing at present. Considerable correspondence was, he said, going on at the moment on this very question, and the matter was, as yet, in an embryo-stage.

THE South African Cricket Association have approved the suggestion that England should visit South Africa in 1913-14 and that Australia should visit South Africa in 1914-15.

APPENDED are the results of the important cricket matches played in England during the past week.

Sussex beat Warwick at Hastings by an innings and 71 runs.

Yorks beat Somerset at Taunton by an innings and 136 runs.

Middlesex defeated Worcestershire at Lords by ninety-six runs.

Surrey beat Essex by an innings and ninety-one runs at the Oval.

Hants defeated Warwickshire at Bournemouth by six wickets.

South Africans defeated Gloucestershire at Bristol by two wickets.

The matches between Kent and Australians at Canterbury; and Sussex and Yorkshire at Brighton, were drawn, the first named team leading on the first innings.

THE next All-India Hockey Tournament has been fixed to take place at Allahabad from the 20th to 25th January next, entries closing on the 11th idem.

THE Annandale Gymkhana Club at Simla held a general meeting on Thursday last when the accounts for 1911-12 were passed and certain new proposals discussed. It has been decided to employ a European groundman who would have to live at Annandale. In view of the larger winter population it was proposed to cater for them with a special winter programme, discussion of which together with the fixing of dates for next year's fixtures—race, horse show, polo, etc.,—being adjourned to a meeting to be held on the 3rd October.

THE sixth of the Bombay Gymkhana mounted sports meetings was held on the 28th ultimo in threatening weather and with a sodden turf. There was a big entry despite these unfavourable conditions and a very enjoyable afternoon was spent. Mr. J. W. Knight Bruce was again prominent and still further increased his lead in the aggregate. He won the bareback bending race and in company with Mr. R. Bannerman was second in the Tent-pegging by half sections. This event went to Messrs. L. Graham and J. R. Landon. The Ladies' Tennis Ball race was won by Miss Patterson and Mr. Brown with Captain and Mrs. Wagstaff second. Messrs. Robinson and Landon took the jumping by half section and the Horse Scurry was won by Mr. G. J. Huntley on Tuppenny, with Mr. Landon on Biscuit second and Mr. Tremearne on Harkaway third. The Woolwinders Stakes in which the ladies had an opportunity of trying their skill and patience in unwinding wool from a skein into a ball, saw Miss Dunsford and Landon in first but they were disqualified and the race awarded to Mrs. MacCausland and Mr. R. F. Cooke. A couple of foot races for children completed the programme.

WE regret to learn of an accident to Major Dennistoun, who fell while out hunting with the Ootacamund Hounds on the 29th ultimo and broke his collar bone.

THE following eighteen teams have so far entered for the Durand Football Tournament: South Lancashire, Royal Scots, Black Watch, Gordon Highlanders, Connaught Rangers, West Ridings, Lancashire Fusiliers, 3rd King's Royal Rifles, No. 5 Mountain Battery, 2nd Battalion, East Yorks, West Kents, 3rd Royal Fusiliers, Royal Irish Rifles, North-Western Railway Volunteers, Simla Football Club, 13th Hussars, 4th King's Royal Rifles, and the May Moths club from Simla.

The Handicap Tennis Tournament at Simla has been fixed to be held during October, entries closing on the 23rd instant.

The Men's Singles take place from the 7th to the 12th October and the Men's Doubles and Mixed Doubles from the 11th to the 19th. Two silver cups have been offered for the Singles and four cups each for the two Doubles. The committee consists of Colonel A. B. C. Williams (President), Mr. H. B. Holmes, Kunwar Maharaj Singh, Dr. E. R. Gray, and Mr. E. H. K. Skeen (members), and Major L. E. Kershaw and Mr. T. McDonnel (Secretaries).

We are looking forward this month to the publication of a serial periodical entitled Major Cooke's Sporting Stories. These stories deal with Big Game Shooting, Polo, Fishing, Hunting, Racing, etc., and are chiefly the experiences of a military officer who has been over a quarter of a century in the East. Many of the stories have already appeared in the columns of the Indian Field under the nom de plume of Abahil, and in other sporting journals in India and at home, and we feel sure that all sportsmen will welcome the new publication, as its author, Major S. A. Cooke, is a well-known figure in Indian sporting circles. Officers and others are invited to send in contributions and substantial prizes are being given for the best original short stories and articles. Particulars and conditions of competitions will be found in the first issue. The price is to be a rupee a copy.

Messrs. Wm. Blackwood and Sons, of Edinburgh and London, are about to bring out a new and original book of sea "yarns," dealing with life and adventure in the Merchant Marine. It is entitled yarns from a Captain's Log, and is the joint work of "John Bowline, Skipper" and R. R. C. Gregory. Many of our readers will be interested to learn that "John Bowline" is the pseudonym of Captain Street, a former skipper in the P. and O. service, whose name is a household word in shipping and social circles at so many of the Australian and Eastern ports. His collaborator, too, is well known, especially in London and the home counties, as the author of the story of Royal Eltham, an old world English village, a work in which his late Majesty, King Edward, took a lively interest.

The new book consists of thirty-one yarns of "Sail" and "Steam" depicting in a realistic way, through dramatic episodes and weird characters, the comedy and tragedy of the seaman's life "Bill Harding", the old Boatswain, a thorough-going sea-dog of the old school, a martinet afloat, but a mere babe in the hands of "shore-going" knaves at the ports, figures prominently. His characteristic "dog-watch" yarns are a special feature of the book, as, also, are the old "Chanties" with their melodies reproduced in musical notation, and scattered about the book, just as they were sung,—quaint examples of "fo'sle" minstrelsy. An overseas edition will be issued both bound in paper covers and in cloth.

Representatives of the various teams taking part in the Quadrangular cricket matches in Bombay met last Saturday at the Bombay Gymkhana to discuss whether the state of the Gymkhana wicket permitted the matches being played thereon. The ground was inspected and it was decided that it was unfit for play—the matches will therefore take place on the Marine Lines Maidan and the preparation of this ground has been taken in hand.

The Senior League "Soccer" tournament at Rangoon has been won by the R. G. A. and the Second League by the Rangoon College. The Government High School won the Junior Challenge Cup.

In the second programme presented by the Electric Theatre last week the "Auld Lang Syne" film was repeated by special request and this admirable series of pictures was again much appreciated. "Wonders of Plant Life" was a wonderful film showing the opening of flower-buds, the pictures being taken by speed magnification. Scenes of life among the Bedouins," a drama entitled "The Thread of Destiny" and a couple of comic numbers made up the programme. On Saturday we were given an exceptionally good show, the principal item of which was the "Prison on the Cliff," one of the most exciting dramas yet produced at the Electric Theatre. This introduced a perilous escape from a tower and a desperate struggle with the rising tide. "The Lady and the Burglar" was full of dramatic sensations and the comic pictures, "Black Swindle," and "The Men Hater's Club" in particular, being very funny indeed. The English Gazette also portrayed a number of interesting events.

We reproduce to-day an interesting article on tigers and their calls, written by one of our valued contributors, W. S. T., for the Rangoon Gazette and which was published in the issue of our Burma contemporary dated the 12th July last. We should be glad to hear the ideas of our shikari readers on the subject.

We have just received from Messrs. Manton and Co., the old established firm of gunmakers, a copy of their notes on repairs to sporting weapons. This interesting little pamphlet is admirably got up and has been published to assist customers whose weapons require repair, and by explaining the work entailed prevent the forwarding of incomplete weapons. There are interesting details on all manner of repairs and adjustments and sportsmen would do well to possess themselves of a copy of this useful brochure.

A man staying at a hotel asked the person next to him if he would please pass the mustard. "Sir," said the other, "do you mistake me for a waiter?" "Oh, no, sir," was the immediate reply, "I only mistook you for a gentleman."

During one of the Belfast riots, a man was asked by a mob what his religion was. He did not know whether his interrogators were Catholics or Protestants, but he looked at their weapons, their bludgeons, and their firearms, surveyed all carefully, and answered, "Gentlemen, I am of the same opinion as that gentlemen there with the big axe."

London Week by Week.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

Friday, 16th August 1912.

This was the wettest August Bank Holiday week within memory, utterly dismal and depressing.

Just as, last summer, everybody was longing for rain as a relief from the torrid heat, so we are all now weary with waiting for warmth and sunshine and a change from the daily downpour. The continuous rainfall will have ruined the summer unless we soon have an extraordinarily dry and warm period, to last through September.

People are returning from the coast disgusted at the increasing wetness, preferring to spend indoor holidays at home, or returning to their offices and postponing the remainder of their vacations. Boatmen, landlords, and hotel-keepers up the river have suffered heavy losses. This is one more of the many spoiled week-ends. In agriculture the damage to the fruit and corn has been incalculable. Sport has been interrupted everywhere since the drenching day of the Oaks race. Three Test matches came to no definite conclusion through rain. There was rain at Goodwood on two days. Cowes has been a cheerless place for the King and the yachtsmen.

Cricketers have worn their sweaters on more days than in any recent year, and Bardsley has provided himself with one that reaches to his knees. Sir Archibald White and Bird have buttoned sweaters like overcoats!

The British Rainfall Association now tells us that we may suppose ourselves in "for a period when wet years will outnumber the dry."

"Penal Servitude for Wild Women in Ireland" was the cheering announcement on the contents bills of the papers on Tuesday evening. Sentences of five years' penal servitude were passed at Dublin on two of the four suffragettes who were charged with conspiracy to do grievous bodily harm and malicious damage to property, and with attempting to set fire to the Theatre Royal, Dublin, on the occasion of the Prime Minister's visit to the city. As that extraordinary person, the present Home Secretary, has no jurisdiction in Ireland it is to be hoped that the convicts will not be immediately released. We have grown quite tired of that particular line in broad farce in England.

No responsible person, man or woman, will consider the sentence passed on these female pests at all excessive. Their crime was arson in its most contemptible form. In order to advance a political and constitutional "cause," they attempted to set fire to a theatre when it was full of men, women, and children. They did this because Mr. Asquith was to address a meeting in this theatre the next day. They had all the paraphernalia of the customary anarchist—bombs, gunpowder, etc. Fortunately they were not expert in the use of the weapons of anarchy. For this crime five years of penal servitude is not one day too much, and we all earnestly hope that Mr. Birrell will not be tempted to follow the idiotic example of Mr. McKenna in similar cases. Any remission of these sentences would be the worst sort of folly.

The whole suffrage movement is now sharply divided between the sections of madness and reason; and we are bound to say that the section of reason is quite unimportant. The sane suffragists have been unable to prevent the crazy crimes which have destroyed their cause. Their influence is infinitesimal. They have to recognise that, for the time being, they have been worsted by the excesses of their so-called friends. These women, or Maenads, hold the field for suffragism, and they hold it at the point of the bomb. They have reduced the whole feminist movement to the degraded level in which all the baser passions are wildly loosed, and they have made war on civilisation. It is, of course, a grotesque campaign which can have only one end, of which an earnest is given by the sentences passed in Dublin. But since it is obvious that no progress of any sort is possible until law, order, and decency have been vindicated, the saner suffragists must surely agree that these sentences are both lawful and expedient.

Mr. G. E. Buckle is retiring from the Editorship of the Times. Mr. Geoffrey Robinson has been appointed to succeed him. The Times stands at an altitude of its own among all the journals of the world: its editors, from that fact, and in addition to their own abilities and personality, are figures of high importance and authority.

It is twenty-eight and a half years since Mr. Buckle became editor, and he was then twenty-nine years old. Now, when fifty-eight he is beginning to feel the strain of a strenuous and responsible post. Only the eminent Delane has held it longer than Mr. Buckle, and Delane, who began at twenty-three, broke down and retired at sixty, and died two years afterward.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson is thirty-seven years old. He was formerly in South Africa as a correspondent of the Times, and came to London to join the editorial department. In February last he was appointed a director of the Times Publishing Company. He was educated at Eton and at Magdalen, Oxford, and is a First-classman and Fellow of All Souls. He was a clerk in the Colonial Office, then private secretary to Lord Milner in South Africa, and editor of the Johannesburg Star.

The composition of the Indian Civil Service Commission has, I observe, aroused a perfect outcry of hostile criticism in India. And well it might! How do they arrange these things: surely names selected at random are put in a hat and drawn out as partners are drawn for in the clown events at up country gymkhanas!

This may be bad enough, but what shall be said of or done to the shallow and pretentious Ramsey Macdonald who has, made an insane attack upon Anglo-Indian Civilians. In the House of Commons the other night this virulent socialist who once made a week end visit to India made this remark.

> "When a person goes to India, and, in Anglo-Indian language, gets "sunbaked," he is not good for anything, although he thinks he knows everything, and, while he ceases to be a Westerner, he never has the sympathetic or mental capacity to become an Oriental, and we find him in the end reproducing, in his own personal characteristics, all the vices of both worlds, and showing very few indeed of the virtues of either.

Protests were raised against this description of Englishmen who have spent the best part of their lives in India, and the Times voiced the general feeling when it suggested that the appointment of Mr. Macdonald upon the Commission which is to inquire into the public services of India shall be reconsidered.

"The appointment is a scandal," was the comment of Sir Henry Craik, M.P., the well-known authority on India and the member for Glasgow University." If it is not too late it certainly ought to be cancelled. That a man should be on this Commission who enters upon this work in a spirit of virulent partisanship and violent prejudice cannot but rouse indignation on the part of the whole of the Civil Service, and must have a most unfortunate effect."

Sir John D. Rees, in an interview said:—

"I think it most improper that a man should be appointed on this Commission who has proved his unfitness for the office as Mr. Macdonald has done in the House of Commons. All the Secretaries of State for India and Under Secretaries, including Mr. Montagu, have never missed an opportunity of expressing a high opinion of the Civil Service. Mr. Macdonald who has no qualifications for the position in which he finds himself, has been at great pains to prove to the House how utterly unqualified he is and how utterly unhappy it is that he is on the Commission. The whole Civil Service in India would welcome on the Commission a modest and real representative of labour, but they will resent the presence of a man who has endeavoured to disparage men immeasurably superior to himself in knowledge and experience."

There must be some gentlemen on this precious Commission after all; are they going to sit with a specimen of the lower orders who would be infinitely more comfortable and certainly more at home in a pig stye!

In my last I told you of the mysterious theft of miniatures from the Royal Academy. This week they have been as mysteriously returned, undamaged, through the post. Of course we shall never know who abstracted them and it really doesn't matter. Obviously someone wanted to teach the self-satisfied, cocksure custodians a lesson. You will recollect how absolutely certain they were in their public announcement some time ago that it was impossible to steal anything from the Academy without detection following ere the booty reached the outer gates!

Persons have been known to deplore the possession of such a name as John Smith or Henry Jones. That may seem to argue in them some lack of family pride, but the temptation to an almost morbid sensation of being buried in oblivion is inevitable. What, then, must be the emotion of a Charles Street, a King Street, or John Street? The humane spirit cannot dwell comfortably on that emotion. The street is not supported by that particular form of self-esteem which we call family pride, and which is so valuable a lever of character in all classes of society. The street has no father. It cannot shelter itself behind the conviction that what was good enough for one generation is good enough for the next. If the feelings of these streets, which find themselves units in an ocean of Charles Streets, King Streets, and John Streets, are pitiable, what of those who live in a city largely composed of such streets? Their feelings are often those of wrath and indignation, and these are vented on the unhappy streets. There may be excuse for thoughtless profanity on the lips and in the heart of a man who has wandered miles to find himself in the wrong Charles Street.

But he should really blame the unimaginative follies of the age which named the streets so carelessly. He must, at all events, acknowledge his debt of gratitude to the London County Council for the great work of renaming streets on a more intelligent plan which is proudly revealed in a new municipal volume. There is still, as is evident, much good work to be done, and the ideal of a distinct, pleasant, locally associated name for every street, square, row, crescent, gardens, grove, alley, court, end, lane, mews, place, road, walk in the metropolis may be beyond the reach of human ingenuity, imagination, and research. But the County Council is hard at work, axe in hand, hugging the satisfaction that in its campaign of destruction and regeneration every John Street to which the axe is laid blesses the executioner with its expiring breath.

America has sent London a new play funny and exciting enough to draw crowded audiences to the New Theatre for many a day to come. It was introduced there this week by Mr. Allan Aynesworth, to inaugurate his actor-managership, and, to use an American phrase of the theatre, it "handed out" laughs and thrills without one moment's cessation.

"Ready Money" is the title of this comical detective drama, invented and written by Mr. James Montgomery, an American dramatist hitherto unknown in this country. There is money all over the play and detectives are racing at full speed to try and discover where it came from. "Ready Money" is a play of gold mines, financiers, and police; a hero made rich by an adventurer's counterfeit banknotes, and no one a penny the poorer for the trick.

It is a breathless business, in which everybody in the story does just what the audience hopes they will do. It is full of the most comical exaggeration; even the hotel waiter admits to having made fifty thousand dollars by tips. Finally, in sore distress, the hero honours counterfeit banknotes. From that moment he is literally surrounded by police. Never before did detectives put men through such an ordeal of cross-examination, and never before did detectives meet with such a defeat. The brilliant adventurer beat them at every turn, the hero did nearly as well.

It is all capital sport of the stage; intensely funny because it is all taken—as it ought to be—half-seriously, and last night's audience shouted and laughed at the Mephistopheles-like adventurer that Mr. Aynesworth gave them with such good humour, and at the innocent daring of the get-rich-quick hero that Mr. Kenneth Douglas enacted with such admirably assumed innocence.

It was the first play of the new season, and the laughter that followed it was the best criticism.

When the Alhambra Theatre, which closed on Monday night for seven weeks, re-opens in the autumn it will have dispensed permanently with the claque that for many years has been installed in the gallery to applaud the artistes. The Alhambra was not the only theatre that up to quite recently employed applauders, but with the disappearance of the claque there an ancient institution which still flourishes in Continental theatres will cease to have a permanent home in London.

The professional applauder will not, however, entirely disappear, for the reason that some artistes who are comparative strangers are willing to pay for a reception during the first nights of their engagement. There is at least one claque master in London, with a band of trained hand-clappers, who finds the business a paying one, and there are managements that like to employ him.

The Covent Garden management has always set its face against the claque. On the other hand, some operatic artistes have been known to employ applauders. One great singer some years ago was approached on her arrival in London by a man who said he could place a claque at her disposal. The singer declined. "In that case," said the man, "we shall applaud you at the wrong time," and to

It is the last stripe that breaks the horse's back, and we fear greatly for the effect on that noble but almost extinct animal of the introduction of a new and hated rival in the zebra. A commercial zebra, too, for it is a tradesman of South London who has brought on the new animal to mock at the old horse from between the shafts of his trap. This is not fair. Already the London horse has to stifle his sobs as best he may in the presence of motor-vans and taxicabs. Already he has to gaze with pathetic dignity on the landaulette which has put down the victoria. He has for many years seen his own ranks grow thinner as mechanical traction devours the streets which once belonged to him. Now, as if all this were not enough, he must face a zebra with a shy disdain. We weep for the horse. He was man's friend whom man loved with a personal affection which can never be lavished on machinery. He was, and is, so much man's friend that he can never be allowed wholly to die. In the hunting field, on the racecourse, in the Row, the best sort of horse will survive; the cavalry and the batteries of guns will use him—if they can find him. But the hansom horse, the smart butcher's cob, the heavy, hairy, mild-eyed carthorse are going—going—gone. The old must give way to the new, and the horse to the motor. But we would not have lost him for a wilderness of zebras.

Everybody knows the story of Xerxes having advertised a huge reward to be given to the man who could invent a new pleasure. It is conceivable that a student of criminology, wearied by the eternal repetition of the same old forms of wickedness, might, but for the fear of the law, offer a similar inducement to the genius who would discover some new form of crime. Probably the reward, if offered, would go unclaimed, for the powers of man are as rigidly limited for evil as for good, and a new crime is almost as unthinkable as a new colour, which scientists tell us is an impossibility. People of less inordinate desires in the way of originality will find plenty of interest in "Cameos of Crime," by H. Hervey (Stanley Paul and Co. 12s. 6d. net). Mr. Hervey tells us in his brief and modest preface that he has passed five-and-thirty years in India and much of that long period in remote villages and jungles where the white conqueror is practically unknown and consequently where the imported restraints of Western law are negligible quantities. In such places the ground-plan, so to speak, of criminality may be of the old familiar pattern, but there are rich opportunities for the artistic differentiation of details. Mr. Hervey sheds good stories, tragic, comic, pathetic, and occasionally ghastly, with a rich profusion, and his book is thoroughly interesting from cover to cover.

Here's a dreadful business. It is alleged that ladies who help at bazaars also help themselves and make "a respectable amount of pin money" by rendering incorrect accounts of their sales. Sir George Alexander says the practice has become "perfectly scandalous" in extent. But what can be expected of a method of raising money that blackmails tradesmen, compels people to buy what they don't want at double its value, encourages gambling, develops the feminine gift of persuasive invention, and generally demoralises everyone who has anything to do with it?

A FEW NOTES ON TIGERS AND THEIR CALLS.

There is no doubt that the tiger calls sometimes like a sambur, as has been described by Major H. H. Harington and Mr. J. W. Best in the Bombay Natural History Society Journal of the 31st October 1911, Vol. No. 1 but no one appears to have attempted to give any reason why these calls should be uttered by the animal at all. The call or "titting" of a tiger, as the Burmese refer to it, is often heard in Burma, but is not necessarily only a hunting call or one uttered when one tiger is keeping its mate notified of its whereabouts.

If anything, in my humble opinion, the note is one of apprehension uttered by the animal when it is in doubt or when it has been disturbed by human beings, or when in the vicinity of its kill. For instance at Sinbo in the Myitkyina district when I was sitting up for a very large male tiger, which I eventually bagged, the beast, although the machan was situated within about 150 yards of a village, and by the side of an open cart road, turned up in a neighbouring plantain grove within about 150 yards of the kill and began uttering his "titting" calls at intervals at about 6-30 P.M., when there was still plenty of day light. At the time a few villagers were passing to and fro between the tiger and its kill along a cart track which led to the village, whilst others were driving their cattle along the same road. I knew perfectly well at the time that the animal which was emitting the calls could only be the tiger I was waiting for, and that they could not have been made by a sambur because, apart from former experience of tigers calling, I knew that no sambur ever entered the plantain grove in question.

There can be no doubt that this tiger was very anxious to get to its kill, a large cow, which, when I first saw it and had dragged out to a suitable site for a machan near the road, was situated in a dense patch of tree jungle about 40 paces to the rear of the spot where the machan was put up.

Of course, one can only make conjectures as to the animal's reasons for making these "titting" noises, which remark indeed applies more or less to all the sounds emitted by other four footed animals which bellow, roar, or have some call or other of their own. It seems to me nevertheless reasonable enough to assume that this tiger whilst on the move towards the carcase of the cow which he had killed the evening before, and had had as yet only one meal off, was somewhat perturbed in mind on hearing human voices, and the deep notes emitted from the wooden "kalauks" or bells hanging round the necks of the cattle as they were being driven past into the village to be penned in for the night, in close proximity to the spot where he had left his victim and that these subdued notes or calls were uttered by him either whilst in a suspicious or discomfited frame of mind, or as a sign of his displeasure or as a warning to both man and beast that he was in the vicinity, for it had no mate with it. It seems strange, on the other hand, if this were true, that the animal should imitate so closely the call of sambur, unless it were that by so doing it hoped to deceive any human beings or sambur that were close by and lure them to their destruction by getting them to approach in the direction of the sounds emitted by him.

On another occasion in Arakan at a place called Lehnyindaung, I was informed rather too late one afternoon to enable me to have a machan erected before dusk, that a tiger had killed a cow about four days before my arrival in the paddy fields near some low lying hills, and that there were still a few bones and one leg of the animal left which would probably be visited as usual by the tiger that night as he had been seen in the vicinity the night before. I accordingly hurried away at once to the spot and arriving there at about 5-30 P.M., had the remains gathered together out of the small nullah where they lay amongst the undergrowth, and taken to a more suitable spot at the foot of a solitary tree in the open fields where they were firmly tied down and staked to the ground. All this handling of the remains no doubt would seem rather strange to the sportsman in India where tigers are not so confiding and where they would not be so likely to visit the kill in consequence as in Burma, a country where they are not as a rule as wily, not being hunted and shot at so much as animals in India, where they are hunted by elephants also and where the jungles are not so dense.

But I am wandering from my subject. Whilst the men were only half finished with the erection of the machan, it being then nearly 7 P.M., the tiger from a neighbouring height at a distance of about from three to four hundred yards, began "titting" for all he was worth at regular intervals. There was not the least doubt that in this case the tiger had been on the move down the bamboo covered hills towards the kill and had been brought up suddenly on hearing the men talking and using their wood choppers in the vicinity of the kill, and that it was then only that the short, sharp, nervous notes or call of alarm began to be uttered at intervals.

There is no mistaking the calls when they are emitted in a locality where there are no sambur or when emitted by a small sized tiger, as they are sharper in tone and shorter if anything than those uttered by a large tiger, when of course the calls have a more clarion-like ring about them, similar to the bells uttered by a full grown stag sambur, although the tone and length of the note is sharper and shorter in the case of the latter. The difference in the bells for instance of a large stag sambur and a full grown doe are not always distinguishable, whereas it would be easier again to distinguish between the bell of a young or half grown stag or doe from that of an old male. Then again the imagination would be more likely to run riot and the "titting" sounds uttered by a tiger would appear more like those of a sambur when uttered in close proximity to the sportsman seated on a machan than from say a distance of 100 yards when the difference between the two calls would in my opinion be more apparent. It would be by no means easy always for a European sportsman to distinguish between the bells for instance of an immature sambur and the "titting" calls of say a young or even a small sized although full grown tiger, and I quite agree with Mr. Best when he says that even local jungle people cannot always distinguish between the two calls. The correctness of the conjecture as to which animal was calling, a sambur or a tiger, would to a certain extent often depend a good deal on the state of the weather and stillness of the air and other conditions prevailing at the time when they were heard, and also the distance. For instance if it were raining and the wind was blowing it would naturally enough not be so easy to discriminate between the two calls as if they had been emitted on an absolutely still night. If the calls again were heard at say a distance of 300 yards it would be less easy to distinguish them at that distance than from say 50 to 80 yards.

On another occasion W. and I were out fishing for mahseer on the Lemro. He tied up for a tiger one night on the Lemro above Pengwa police post and bagged the animal, a small though full grown male, which was skinned in camp and its body left lying on the river bank close by, as the Chins, who usually eat anything, would not touch the meat being afraid of the "nats" i.e., the local spirits of the woods, who were said to be an evil lot in these parts, and the vengeance of the dead animal's mate, which I hoped might turn up in the vicinity. On the following day the tigress killed a young mythan calf within 200 yards of our camp. I had a machan erected on the spot, but I am afraid the noise made by the men in putting it up alarmed her as she must have been lying up close by, the cover being good, for she never came near the kill although I thought on one occasion that I heard a stealthy approach and then an equally stealthy retreat. However half an hour after hearing what I took to be her approach and her departure she made the welkin ring with her sharp "titting" calls as she circled our camp and walked up and down stream without going near the body of her mate or the mythan calf, which I left to itself, descending from the machan at about 9 P.M. Her suspicions had evidently been thoroughly aroused, for not only did she not even go near the body of her mate during the night but she did not even have another meal off the mythan calf after I left the machan. On this occasion some of the Chins told me when asked as to the reason of her calls that she was calling for her mate, whilst others said that it was the animals' custom to call like that at night and when thoroughly alarmed.

I have never heard two tigers calling or "titting" to each other in the jungle, although I have heard and read of the experiences of others who have heard them. I daresay it is common enough in India and perhaps others have heard it often enough in Burma too. I have enquired of hunters of all nationalities in this country to explain why tigers should call by "titting" like a sambur, but none of them could ever give me any really satisfactory explanation, and not one of them even put forward the theories that they did so (1) to warn or call a mate (2) as a note of doubt or alarm, (3) to deceive sambur and other game so that they might make a rapid detour and stalk them or make them fall an easy prey by stampeding them towards them, or by causing them to stand stock still through fear till they had stalked them. Why should a tiger want to call at all in order to deceive or cause game to stampede into him when he is capable of stalking and springing upon animals without these artifices, especially when the ground is damp? The answer to this would in part no doubt be that the odour which emanates from a tiger, especially during the wet season, tends to warn most animals of his presence, and that he has great difficulty in stalking during the hot season except in the beds of streams and at pools owing to the dry condition of the ground. It is well-known that during the dry season in Burma at any rate, from March to the end of May, when the ground is usually covered with a layer of dry leaves and vegetation, master stripes is very hard put to it for food, for he then owing to the dryness of the ground finds it no easy matter to approach undiscovered any four footed animal and has to subsist almost entirely on such food as tortoises, snakes, birds, crabs and insects, in fact any living thing he can get hold of.

With regard to the reason for tigers roaring I have noticed that they invariably roar when they are either (1) in pain, or (2) when roaming in virgin forest and in jungles situated a long distance from human habitations where they are not molested, or (3) if they have a kill in the jungle some way from villages, or (4) whilst in search of a mate. I have heard tigers roaring in Burma on many occasions, but to the best of my recollection these roars have always been uttered in large evergreen forests up in the hills, or in forests in the plains a good distance from any habitation. I have never yet heard a tiger roar when approaching a kill situated say in the vicinity of a village, although I once heard a tiger roaring in the jungles miles from any habitation round a kill both when approaching and leaving it. A wily cattle-lifter or man-eater that prowls from village to village on the other hand seldom if ever utters a sound of any description unless an occasional growl or grunt, and appears and disappears like a shadow. I have heard a tiger roar on three successive mornings on the Myitkyina Pidaung plain at about 4 A.M. whilst the brute was returning to its lair in heavy jungle after feeding in the open on the remains of a tsine (Bos sondaicus) that I had shot. Tigers again for no apparent reason sometimes begin roaring at intervals whilst on the prowl almost immediately after dark when they have risen from their lairs, as do apparently lions in Africa. Tigers that have been shot at and missed, or which have been wounded or recover, or which have been disturbed from time to time by human agency, seldom if ever however utter a note of any description when on the prowl.

A tigress shot by me at Nanya-seik in the Myitkyina district, Upper Burma, and which used to visit nightly and prowl round and even through Nanya-seik village, walking in under the houses carrying off dogs and goats much to the consternation of all the inhabitants, used to begin roaring vigorously at about 7 in the evening as soon apparently as it left its lair on a neighbouring range of thickly wooded hills situated about two miles from the village, the roars becoming louder as it approached and then ceasing altogether when with about half a mile of the village. This animal and another one shot by me at Kamaing made no "titting" noises or calls when approaching their kills, but the one shot at Kamaing was killed in dense forest about two miles from any habitation at 5 P.M. I saw this animal saunter up to the kill in a leisurely, listless fashion, as if bored to death, the weather being very warm at the time. The animals shot at Sinbo and at Nanya-seik were shot in January in the cold weather, whilst W. shot his at Pengwa on the Lemro in March.

"A Shore Burman" writes to the Rangoon Gazette dating Mandalay Shore, 13th July:—For the information of your correspondent "W. S. T." whose interesting article "A few notes on Tigers and their Calls" appeared in your paper dated the 12th instant, the well-known Burmese proverb "Lu kyauk yin hit the kya kyauk yin tit the" will tell "W. S. T." or any one who is in doubt as to the cause of tiger's tittings that tigers tit only when they are alarmed or frightened."

THE IDIOSYNCRACIES OF TROUT.

It is one of the merits of those pastimes which we designate as sport, in distinction to those which we call games, that into most of the former the idea of competition does not enter, except incidentally. We are obliged to accept racing, which is always in the category of sport, as an exception, and there are also "athletic sports," specially so called, in which the competition idea is of their essence. But in the majority of the greater sports, such as shooting, hunting and fishing, any notion of emulation is only quite secondary. Men may, and do, "shoot jealous," "ride jealous," even "fish jealous," but the very fact that we stigmatise them with the special mark of jealousy indicates that it is not a sentiment which commonly comes into these sports, and conveys the very just criticism that it ought not to come into them. He who really deserves the name of sportsman engages in these pursuits for the amusement that they give him, not for the sake of proving himself better than his neighbour. Nevertheless, by way of comparison, there is no crime in estimating the relative abilities of men at any one of these, and it occurs to me that it would be an interesting form of competition, which might teach us much, if we could set down on a good trout stream two anglers of whom the one was a past master at the art but knew nothing of the stream, while the other was only a moderate craftsman but had an intimate knowledge of the water. It would be curious to look into the baskets of the two men at the end of the day and see which had made the bigger catch.

The comparison would not be quite fairly instituted if the one who had the master's skill was well acquainted with neighbouring rivers and rivers very like in character that to which he was being introduced for the first time. In that case the conditions would not be sufficiently strange to him to make the handicap an equal one, for it is hardly to be doubted that in neighbouring streams flowing through similar country the trout develop very similar habit', so that the knowledge of the river that he did know would help a man very much in conjecturing the habits of the trout in the other, which he did not know. That would not make the competition fair. On the other hand, it is not necessary to take the case of a man who has had no acquaintance with any other streams than those which must perforce be fished with the fly when it is dry, and to set him down to compete in a fast-flowing creek or river with one who knew it intimately. That on the contrary, would be giving too much advantage into the hands of the man of local knowledge. The comparison that it would be interesting to make would be between an angler of fine skill who possessed a good working acquaintance with wet-fly streams in general, and one who was less finished in the art but had learnt, by long experience, the ways and the wiles and the lurking places of the trout of his own familiar river.

It is more than likely that there are a great many good all-round fishermen who do not realize how different the habits of trout are in different, though seemingly very similar, streams. They differ in a variety of ways, in the lures they take, in the manner in which they rise to the fly, and, above all, in their favourite places for lying in wait for it to come to them. There is, as we all know, a difference between the fish of the same river at different times of the year and at different stages and temperatures of the water, but besides this the front of some rivers show a penchant for certain positions, demanding of the angler a certain mode of showing them the fly, and it is the knowledge of these idiosyncrasies which gives the man who lives on the river's bank such an advantage over the stranger. Anglers, it is not to be doubted, have their idiosyncrasies likewise, and these are probably determined largely by the success which Fortune has sent them in this sport which, above all others, seems to be in the hands of that most capricious goddess. It may be that the one man has acquired a mode of throwing the fly which causes it to float down in the most natural manner to those fish which have stationed themselves in that part of the water which is well known as "the hang of the stream." For my own part, I have to confess that it is a portion of the river which I have fished diligently with conspicuously little result. Doubtless it is my own lack of skill which is to blame, for there are those who speak of finding it very productive. Personally I have had most of my modest share of success in little backwaters and still places just out of the main current, where, as it seems to me, the big fish have generally taken up their quarters. For this reason, when I come to a strange stream I am always on the lookout for nooks of this kind, and pay them a particular attention, but very likely I should do a great deal better if I cast the line of invitation—so frequently declined, without thanks—elsewhere, and it is extremely probable that one who knew the stream would know too that these are not where the good fish are to be found. I confess to this idiosyncrasy in order to show how easy it is to form predilections of the kind and how probable that other anglers are similarly guided, or misguided. We all know that a favourite lie for fish is under the bank against which the wind is blowing, whither it carries the flies. There are times and seasons when fish are to be found in that situation in every river, but besides that there are certain rivers in which it is there, and it is hardly too much to add, there only, that you will find all the fish. Those who know these rivers well adopt one way of fishing to serve them almost all through the year and in almost all conditions of the water, throwing against the bank and letting the fly fall off the bank into river. In this way, as they maintain—and the success of their practice justifies the statement—that the food commonly comes to the fish on these rivers. Of course the dodge is no new one; it is perfectly well known as a mode of letting the fly fall lightly and naturally, but it is not on many streams that it is to be looked on as the recognized and most approved way of offering the fish the fly. It will be understood that I am writing now of the trout of the wet-fly streams—not but what in these nooks and backwaters of which I speak it is not well now and again to float a dry fly over the fish—not of those where no self-respecting fisherman ever offers a trout a fly otherwise than floating on the surface, and where no self-respecting fish is ever supposed to take one below the surface. (I may confess, with shame, and in parenthesis, a scepticism whether a few of these trout are not caught now and then below the surface, and whether a few more might not occasionally be taken if the fly were more often so offered to them. This, however, is rank heresy.) What I set out to say, before this confession of heterodoxy, was that it does not appear to me that there is the same difference between fish in different streams that are essentially dry-fly waters as there is in those which flow from less limpid sources.

I may be mistaken, and it may be a mistake due to my inadequate acquaintance with these priceless rivers, but it is the view to which a certain small experience has led me. Is there not, after all, a greater family likeness, or at least a less accentuated difference between these rivers than between the many various and delightful streams which flow through and out of all kinds of soil? I think so; and this perhaps may be the reason why some stream fish have formed their life habits more on one common and constant plan. As a rule the food in these streams is so plentiful, the hatch of fly so abundant, the way in which it is conveyed along the placid surfaces so wide and equable that the fish, when they go out to feed, have only to station themselves anywhere in the broad flow of the river. They do not need to make a nice choice of their restaurants; they find their meals brought to their mouths on the great highway of the river. Still it is true that the big fish keep the choice stations. I perceive that I am filling the highway too full of rising fish. But there is truth in the comparison and in the contrast. At least, I believe that there is.

BRIDGE QUERY.

To the Editor of "The Indian Field."

Sir,—The Declarer—his declaration finally accepted—before a card is played—hands his cards across the table for his Dummy to look at to show why he has taken him out.

Is it, or is it not, against the etiquette of the game?

Opinions of those who consider themselves authorities differ.

The rule that Dummy should not leave his seat, go round the table and overlook his partner's play and hand—seems to infer it is not advisable that Dummy should see his partner's hand.

Halloa! Halloa!

HAVE YOU A LAME HORSE?

HOW DO YOU TREAT IT?

DO you get the Horse fired and blistered or do you sell him for an old song? We introduce to your notice a Treatment which is far superior to the old-fashioned and cruel firing. A Humane Treatment, of wonderful curative properties, which will cure the worst case of LAMENESS without stopping the Horse in his usual work. SPRUNG TENDON, CURBS, SPLINTS, BOG SPAVIN, THOROPIN, WINDGALLS, SPRUNG HOCK or ANY other JOINT or BURSAL ENLARGEMENT will permanently yield to this Treatment.

"EQUINOINT" causes NO PAIN and leaves NO BLEMISH.
"EQUINOINT" cures by ABSORPTION and is EASILY APPLIED.
"EQUINOINT" removes the Enlargement and YOU CAN WORK THE HORSE ALL THE TIME.
"EQUINOINT" is made in England, and is the Product of many years of Experiment.

THE PUBLIC MAY OBTAIN SUPPLIES FROM

LEWES.

RAMELY has the going at Lewes been in better order than on Friday, and the attendance proved the best seen here for a long time, the Astley Stakes again proving a great attraction This race, however, only brought out eight runners, and odds of 5 to 4 were laid on Meeting House, the newly-named Noonday colt. Carrying the traditional light blue hood, he lay up at the start with Poulette and Sirabia. In the dip Poulette gave way, and Mr. Raphael's filly had to play an indifferent second fiddle to the good-looking son of Voter, whose victory makes him out better than Sarcingle. Results :—

WINCHESTER

.35 CALIBER REPEATING RIFLE

AN EFFECTIVE BIG-GAME GETTER.

There's no question about it — when you go after big game, you want a rifle that has power. You get it in the .35 Caliber Winchester Repeater. This rifle handles a cartridge having a 250-grain bullet, which has a muzzle velocity of 2200 foot seconds and a muzzle energy of 2687 foot pounds. Think of this tremendous energy being expended inside an animal, as it is when a soft-point bullet is used! And you have five cartridges all told, which can be fired in rapid succession. What animal could withstand the terrible shocking effect of such a battery? Many so-called big-game guns seem mere toys in comparison. The .35 Winchester has a strong, simple and reliable action, and a short 24-inch barrel, which is easily handled and yet shoots straight and true at all ranges effective for big-game shooting.

ALL GUNMAKERS CARRY THESE RIFLES.

Also ran: Sondrio (H. Jones); Samaran (J. H. Martin); Dukelet (Piper); Kiltoi (Wm. Griggs); Normandy Boy (Higgs); Quickford (W. Saxby); Brigham Young (R. Stokes); The Mad Hatter (Heckford); Coshma (Quinn); Cassetta (Earl); Valentine (Waite); Work Girl (F. Hunter); La Beffa (Robbins).

BETTING: 9 to 4 Maycup, 5 to 1 each May Mint and Quickford, 6 to 1 Normandy Boy, 7 to 1 Samaran, 10 to 1 each Bramble Jelly f and Kiltoi, 100 to 7 any other.

Won by a neck; two lengths separated second and third.

KEMPTON PARK.

We saw a St. Leger trial at Kempton on Thursday, which—in a season of so many three-year old nonentities—was particularly satisfactory. By winning the St. James' Stakes, hard held and in the commonest of canters, Lomond carried us all back to the pleasant recollections of him in his two-year-old days. Results:—

DOCTOR ROSS STRASSBURG introduced Gonosan in the treatment of the most painful of diseases to which mankind is liable. It is better and safer and more effective than other preparations of Copaiba Cubeb, or plain Sandal wood oil. The same is the verdict of other Specialists who have patiently tried it. It is the latest Scientific Remedy and has never known to fail. At all Chemists and dealers.

Hunting.

POONA AND KIRKEE HOUNDS.

Sunday, 25th August.—Hounds met at the 7th mile stone on the Alandi road and a good field assembled. A nullah near the rendezvous yielded a jack which made for the west, crossed the old Bombay and Nasik roads and then right handed over the Bombay Boat and across the railway near Pimpri to the river. He swam across with hounds close behind him and they rolled him over on the opposite side; the run occupied 23 minutes and the going was fair, except near the river where it was very heavy. The Master then drew near the Rifle Butts and a vixen and a cub were chopped in covert, the field returning to refreshments kindly provided by the Raja of Akalkote. Among those out were:—Mrs. Birkett, Mrs. Fitzgibbon, Mrs. Sydenham, Mr. and Mrs. Collum, Captain and Mrs. Vines, Mrs. Andrews, Miss Wheeler, General Barter, Hon. Mr. Curtis, the Raja of Akalkote, the Nawab of Wai, Mr. Captain, Miss Birdwood, Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Carmichael, Captain Lumsden, Mr. Dunlop, M.F.H., Mr. Heugh Symons, Captain Chaytor, Major Nevinson, Captain Furnival, Major Martin-Millar, Major Robinson, Mr. Logan, Captain Stoker, Captain Berkeley, Mr. Wynne, Mr. Sailward, Major Westmoreland, Mr. O'Donell, Major Henderson, Major Bowen, Captain Langrishe, Captain Leahy, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Eeles, Mr. Ferdoonji, Colonel Arnold, Colonel Perkins, Colonel Evans, Mr. Ewbank, Mr. Cowie, Hon. Mr. Claude Hill.

On the 27th ultimo we met at the eKennels and notwithstanding the dissipation of the night before a field of nearly thirty turned out including, among others, Lady Barrett, Mrs. Fowler, Mrs. Sydenham, Mrs. Vines, Miss Rousaac, Hon. Mr. Claude Hill, Hon. Mr. Curtis, General Barter, Mr. R. W. Dunlop, M.F.H., Captain Lumsden, R.N., Mr. Heugh Symons, Mr. Ferdoonji, Colonel Perkins, Colonel Arnold, Captain Vines, Captain T. Lucas, Captain Coaker, Captain Vachell, Captain Potter, Major Eassie, Mr. Cowie, Mr. Nehar Singh, Mr. Willoughby, Captain Walker, Colonel Logan-Home with three whips, Messrs. Whaley, Aga Cassim Shah, and Johnson.

A jackal was found at the back of Kennels and overtaken on the Ginbet Hill after a short run of ten minutes. Another gave us a run of eight minutes and was also accounted for. Captain Lucas then viewed a fox who gave us a nice little run before scent ran out and the field returned to the Kennels where they were entertained by the Master.

Last Thursday hounds met at the 7th mile stone on the Bombay Road, another large field turning out. The sugarcane coverts, which usually hold a jack, were drawn blank, and after several other fruitless draws hounds were put on to a jack which had been viewed making for the hills. The pack divided soon after getting on the line, the majority of the field following six and a half couple which had gone to the left, discovering after ten minutes that their quarry was a chinkara. The other division followed the jack past Chikli on nearly to Talavoli, a fine run of forty-five minutes ending in a who-hoop, Mrs. Carmichael getting the brush. The followers of the chink had meanwhile turned out a jackal near Chinchwad Station and he was run into after twenty minutes' fast galloping. The brush was presented to Miss D. Campbell and the mask to Lady Barrett. The field then assembled for breakfast at the meeting place where they were the guests of the Raja of Akalkote. Those out included: Lady Barrett, the Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Carmichael, the Hon. Mr. Claude Hill, Captain and Mrs. Vines, General Barter, Colonel Evans, Mr. Carey, Hon. Mr. Curtis, the Zemindar of Sivagiri, Sir Arthur Barrett the Nawab of Wai, Major Jourdan, Major Westmoreland, Major Bowen, Mr. Logan, Mr. Brotherton, Mr. and Mrs. Collum, Colonel Arnold, Captain Chaytor, Mr. Greenshields, Mr. Robinson, Captain Sarson, Captains Coaker, Lucas, and Davis, Mrs. Fowler, Captain Harvey-Kelly, Mrs. Andrews, Miss Crawford, Miss Campbell, Mrs. Fitzgibbon, Mr. O'Donell, Major Daunt, the Raja of Akalkot, Captain McCudden, Messrs. Johnson and Knight Bruce, Captains Leahy and Weldon.

[By P. A. U.]

A good many chickens have on the end of their tongue a small scale which fastens itself on to the tongue and needs removal in early chickenhood. This process is called "pipping" and although the opinion is prevalent that all chickens require pipping, this is not really the case, as a larger number of chickens are free from the scale on the tongue than those which have it. As it is not an infrequent thing, however, it would be well for everyone to carefully examine the tongues of their chicks and see if they are free from these small scales. The scale can easily be peeled off by inserting the finger nail of the first finger under one side of it, then with that finger and thumb the scale can easily be peeled off, the scale will be found to resemble a quill pen-nib in shape and texture. After the removal of the scale, the birds thrive wonderfully and the difference is quickly noticed.

It is some times a matter of surprise to housekeepers to find so many scraps when they are kept throughout the day until the next morning. The scrapings of dishes and many little things are frequently thrown away by people as the dishes are washed up after meals, whereas if they were saved they would make a good and nourishing breakfast for the fowls and one which would be enjoyed by them on account of the variety provided day by day. Those birds which do not relish this kind of breakfast may be considered out of health.

Where house scraps are not available, a nourishing meal can be made by mixing ground oats, crushed wheat and middlings together, occasionally adding some biscuit meal. If fowls are to lay well, they must be fed well—that is to say, their food must be of good quality. The best is always the cheapest in the long run.

It is not unusual to have some of the chickens lose the use of their legs. These are generally the largest of the brood and they suffer on account of having overgrown their bone-strength. To prevent this, the chickens should have bone-meal or flint-dust, mixed in their soft food twice a week after they are a month old.

Many people have an idea that young ducklings cannot be reared profitably unless there is a pond or stream for them to swim in but this is altogether a mistaken idea for when the young birds are being reared for the markets or for killing purposes, they should not be allowed to go in the water, as they will grow much faster and fatten quicker, if they do not swim at all. The secrets of successful hatches of duck-eggs are (1) to set eggs from hardy unrelated stock of large size; (2) to make the nest on the ground, so that there is some moisture to soften the inner membranes of the eggs; and (3) to keep the young birds growing from the time they are hatched.

As soon as all the birds are hatched off, they should be placed in a wooden box with cotton wool at the bottom and this should then be put in a room where there is a small fire for a few hours, while the hen has her dust bath and a good feed and a run after her long period of confinement; it will be remembered that duck-eggs require 28 days to hatch, in place of the 21 days taken by hen's eggs. Young ducklings should be done well and never allowed to get poor, as they are ready for the table when nine or ten weeks old and for the last fortnight they should have a little hay put into their food which should consist of ground—oats, barley-meal and middlings in equal proportions and made crumbly or mixed with milk and boiled wheat after they are six weeks, as this makes the skin whiter and improves their flavour. It may here be mentioned that ducklings should never be kept for more than 11 or 12 weeks at the outside as, if so, they do not grow any larger than they are then, until after they have moulted and got their adult plumage.

The plan of bringing up a brood of turkeys for home consumption has proved a great success, because there is a delicacy of flavour about the young home-reared birds which is not always found in those that are purchased and, as the cost of rearing is very small, compared with the amount of flesh the birds put on as the result of their inherited size, the experiment effects a great economy when the festive season comes round and the turkey is in request. In purchasing eggs, therefore, people must be careful to get those from healthy stock, because the chicks bred from parents with a strain of tubercular disease or taint from inbreeding in them will not thrive, no matter how well they are cared for. Healthy parentage is not only essential to the well-being of the young birds but is absolutely necessary if they are to thrive. The eggs take 28 days to hatch and, when the young chicks are hatching off, they should be taken away from the hen as they are dry and placed in a box near the fire to keep them warm until the whole brood is off. The chicks do not require any food until they are fully 36 hours old and the first feed of the young turkeys shou'd consist of split groats that are perfectly sweet and, if a few of these are sprinkled in front of the chicks, they will eat them greedily. Three hours afterwards give them a mixture of fine scalded biscuit meal mixed with a few breadcrumbs moistened with the beaten up yolk of a fresh egg. This is not necessary more than twice, as after this they will thrive on biscuit meal and fine middlings made into a crumbly food. The young birds should be fed every three hours for the first month and then once in four hours for the following month and after this four times a day. They should always have perfectly fresh water by them in a small trough and a saucer or tin of fine flint grit, so that they can help themselves to it. The object of everyone who feeds young turkeys should be to get them to eat as much as possible and to accomplish this pains must be taken. There is not any better food for them for regular use as soft food than scalded biscuit meal but rearers should not on any account give the young birds anything which is wet or sloppy. They are very clean in their ways and like crumbly food but not anything which adheres to their beaks. Soaked bread should be avoided unless the birds are constipated, when a feed of this may be safely given, as it is relaxing. Where they are protected from damp and have good food and a regular supply of sharp but fine grit, they will thrive and grow well: but if they are allowed to get a chill—they are most subject to chills—they will die from it: or if they are not fed regularly—that is to say if several meals are missed out—they run down at once: and if not supplied with grit sufficiently sharp to masticate and so help them to assimilate their food quickly, they will die. The necessity of a supply of sharp grit is becoming much better understood than it was formerly. A supply of fresh water for young turkeys is essential this being given to them in a perfectly clean saucer and renewed twice daily.

CRICKET IN POONA.

PRESIDENCY vs. PARSEES.—The annual match between the Bombay Presidency and Parsee teams began at Poona on the 26th ultimo in perfect weather and on a hard and true wicket. The Presidency won the toss and elected to bat, Major Greig and Cheetham opening the innings. Greig scored freely from the start but the partnership did not last long, Cheetham being caught after scoring 6. Then Colonel Poore came in and the Hampshire veterans treated spectators to a fine display of batting. They took charge of the bowling and piled on the runs fast. The first century was very soon signalled and they continued to score rapidly till Poore was bowled by Driver. He made 76 by free and stylish batting though he gave three chances. Greig, who had 74 to his credit was then joined by Captain Tillard. The second century was signalled shortly after and the next important stage was when Greig reached his century. With the score at 228 Tillard was stumped when stepping out to meet a delivery from Parekh. Captain Haughton followed him in and the scoring continued steadily, the score being 283 for three when they stopped for tea. On resuming Major Greig was caught off Elavia's second ball, having compiled 142 by faultless cricket without a single chance. His innings occupied three and a half hours and included fifteen fours. Cooper next in was bowled for a duck, Halliley failed to score and then Gore Brown joined Haughton. The latter was bowled with the score at 304, having put together 28—a patient innings. Gore Brown was stumped very soon after, and Platt who was last man was bowled after making a single the innings closing for 311, the extras yielding 16.

The Parsees then went in and lost Driver and Elchidana with the score at 28. Gazdar and Canteenwala continued the innings next day. The latter was out for 3 with the score at 31 and Dr. Kanga took his place. The new comer and Gazdar made a stand and the Presidency had to give most of their bowlers a turn. Scoring, however, was very slow and it reached 80 when the partnership which had lasted over an hour was dissolved. Gazdar's wicket falling to Greig. Warden was next man and the score was taken to 106 when Kanga was caught and bowled by Halliley; Kapadia took his place and played a vigorous innings retiring to a catch by Haughton after he had scored 42 and the score had been carried to 181. Parekh joined Warden but with the score at 207 Warden was out leg-before-wicket, having contributed a well played 42. Chotia followed and made 5 and then Elavia came in. Scoring was slow but the score was taken to 247 when the tea interval arrived. On the resumption Elavia was caught for 21 and Watcha was last man in. Parekh was caught at the wicket when he had made 50—a lucky innings. The total was 276—Watcha contributing 4 not out and extras 21.

The Presidency opened their second innings in the fading light and made 46 for one wicket when stumps were drawn, Cheetham having been bowled for a single. Greig and Poore carried on on Wednesday and scored steadily. Poore gave another attractive exhibition but was caught when he had scored 34, with the total at 76. Tillard was next in but was bowled for nothing and Haughton took his place. Greig gave another very fine performance and put together 66 before he was caught with the score at 120. Anderson and Haughton were then associated and after a ten minutes stoppage owing to rain the score was taken to 152 when Anderson was caught for 14. After tiffin the team collapsed. Haughton's innings closed for 35, Gore Brown failed to score, Halliley was out leg-before-wicket after scoring 7, Platt made 1, Wilson 13 and Cooper was not out 0, the innings totalling 177.

The Parsees were left with 213 to make to win and three hours in which to knock off the runs. Kanga and Elchidana opened their innings the latter being dismissed without scoring. The second wicket (Kanga 25) fell at 51 and Warden joined Driver. This couple scored vigorously and the 100 was up at tea time. They continued to score fast on resuming and it was not till Driver had put together 60 with free hitting that he was caught and bowled. Kapadia was next man. Runs came quickly but at 170 Warden was dismissed and Chotia came in to partner Kapadia and together they hit off the required runs the total being 215 for 4 wickets—a six wickets victory for the Parsees—a victory scored in the last over of the day. The Parsee bowling was very high class while their batting was full of vim and forcing the play they beat time and won a well merited victory. The Presidency batting was good and the two Hampshire cricketers gave a splendid exhibition—but the bowling of the team was not very deadly. Appended are scores:—

MAJOR GREIG'S XI. vs. HINDUS.—A team captained by Major Greig met a representive Hindu eleven on the Poona Gymkhana ground on Friday and Saturday last. The Hindus won the toss and batted first compiling 216 all out. Bals played a fine innings of 75, while Mehendale 59, Vithal 38 and Mehta 20 were the other principal contributors. Tillard was the most successful bowler, taking 6 wickets for 40. When play closed for the day Major Greig's eleven had scored 87 for one wikset. Continuing on Saturday they were dismissed for 144. Haughton batted well and seemed well set when he was bowled for 45. Major Greig contributed 12, Anderson, Rosher and Platt being the only others to reach double figures. The Hindus then went in again and made 104 for three wickets when they declared, Vithal being unbeaten with 55 to his credit. The European team were left with 177 runs to get in 70 minutes to win. They made a grand effort and Greig and Haughton carried on a vigorous partnership, the score being 98 when time was called, Greig not out 54 and Haughton not out 32. The match thus ended in a draw. FOOTBALL IN CALCUTTA.

SOME of the minor "soccer" competitions have come to a conclusion during the past week. The Elliot Challenge shields brought together the Presidency College and the Medical's Indian team. The former were the better team and won by 4 goals to 1, though the game was by no means so one-sided as might be imagined from the score. This is the seventh occasion on which the Presidency College have won the tournament since its inception. Their first success was in 1904 and they held the shield till 1909 when the Scottish Churches took it from them. In 1910 the Presidency College were again successful, but last year the Scottish Churches were holders. Bishop's College won from 1891 to 1898, St. Xavier's in 1899, the C. M. S. High School in 1900 and 1902 and the C. E. College in 1901 and 1903.

The Lakshmidas Cup was won by "B" Co. the Black Watch who beat the Middlesex team in the final by a goal to nil, the Middlesex being distinctly unlucky to lose. The Gladstone Cup ended in another win for the Black Watch, the band defeating "F" Co. the Middlesex by 2 goals to nil in the final.

The Trades Cup final brought together the Nationals and Chandernagore (holders); the match was to have taken place on the 29th ultimo, but the ground was declared unfit for play after the recent rain. Play was possible on Tuesday and a good game was witnessed ending in a goalless draw.

The Rugby Senior League was concluded last week and the Calcutta Football Club have carried off the Indian Field Cup for the fifth time. They won it the year of its inception in 1904, but the West Ridings took it the following year. Calcutta were top of the league in 1906, 1908 and 1909; The Gloucesters in 1907 and the United Services in 1910, 1911. The latter team have again a very useful side this year and their only defeat was by Calcutta. The Customs showed great improvement as the season progressed, and the Police kept all their engagements and played hard throughout, though their play was not quite up to the standard of the others. The Barbarians were unfortunate in not being able to command a large choice of players and they very seldom turned out at full strength, having eventually to scratch.

The final table excluding the Barbarian matches is as follows :—

	P.	W.	D.	L	F.	A.	P.
Calcutta ...	6	6	0	0	100	13	12
United Services ..	6	4	0	2	32	42	8
Customs	6	2	0	4	44	49	4
Police ...	6	0	0	6	24	81	0

The return match between the Customs and the Police was played on the 28th ultimo. The Police started with only ten men, but two others were impressed during the second half, and though they played pluckily throughout the "Bobbies" were no match for the Riversiders, who led at half time by eleven points to nil. Galbraith and Williamson (2) got over with tries, Williamson adding the major points to one of his efforts. Only one try was scored in the second moiety and this was unconverted, the Customs thus winning by 1 goal and 3 tries (14 points) to nil.

The Calcutta Rugby Challenge Cup Tournament begins on the 14th September and the C. F. C., representatives of which are now taking part in the Bombay tournament, should make a big bid for victory in our local competition. So far we hear of three up-country teams coming to Calcutta for the Cup—the West Ridings, holders, the Leicesters from Southern India and the King's Own Regiment from Lucknow, who won the trophy when stationed in Fort William in 1904.

The following are representing Calcutta in Bombay :—Lieutenant Bocquet, Messrs. Lilley, Leaky, Durnford, Wilson, Scott-Brown, Bryce, Johnston, Macpherson, Captain Green-Armytage, Lieutenant Roome, Messrs. Pooler, Dods, Dempster and Campbell.

They have drawn a bye in the first round, and meet the Madras in the semi-final this evening. The only game in the first round that between Bombay and Madras ended in a win for the Madras team by 6 points to 3. The Royal Irish Rifles and West Ridings who drew byes in the first round, met in the semi finals last evening, the game ending in a win for the West Ridings by 4 goals and 8 tries (44 points) to nil.

THE HARRIS TOURNAMENT.

THE Northumberland Fusiliers met the Warwicks in the semi-finals on the 26th ultimo. The Warwicks ran away at the start and put on two goals before the game was ten minutes old. Then their opponents transferred operations and after several attempts scored a goal. They continued to attack but could not get on terms and half time arrived with the Warwicks once more on the offensive. They kept up the pressure on changing ends, but the Northumberland team frustrated all efforts to score. They were awarded a free kick soon after, but the kick went over the bar and the Warwicks goal had another escape. Other chances were not improved upon and the game was settled a few minutes before time when the Warwicks got away and scored once more, thus winning by 3 goals to 1.

The final was played on Thursday last between the Royal Irish Rifles from Nasirabad and the Warwicks from Bombay. There was a big crowd of spectators and a good game was witnessed. The Royal Irish, who were favourites, pressed at the start, but it was not long before the Warwicks got possession and forced a corner; nothing resulted but a penalty was awarded them shortly after. The Irish custodian brought off a fine save but was beaten by a hot shot a little later. The Warwicks continued to have the best of the exchanges and just before half time they got another corner from which the ball was netted. In the second half the Royal Irish attacked and scored from a penalty. They continued to press for a spell but were beaten back and all their efforts to get on terms proved unavailing. Play then was up and down the field till the Warwicks were awarded another penalty from which they scored a third point. The Royal Irish were unable to respond and were thus defeated by 3 to 1. At the conclusion of the game General Sir A. Barrett congratulated the team and Lady Barrett presented the cup to the captain of the winning team.

THE BOMBAY HARWOOD LEAGUE.

THE Harwood League was brought to a conclusion on Saturday last when the R. A. Temperance Association met the Y.M.C.A. and beat them in a very one-sided game by 7 goals to 1. It may be noted that the game proved to be a contest between a team which headed and another which finished bottom of the list. The R. A. Temperance won the trophy with 11 wins 2 draws and only one beating out of 14 games, scoring 24 points. The R. Warwicks, who have just won the Harris Cup at Poona, are runners up with 21 points and the Y.M.C.A. bring up the rear with only two wins to their credit. Appended are the final placings in the League :—

GOLF IN BOMBAY.

R. BOMBAY G. C. vs. PALI HILL G. C.—A team of golfers representing the Royal Bombay G. C. engaged the Pali Hill team in singles and foursomes on the Bombay course on the 27th ultimo. This was the return to the matches played some weeks ago. On the first occasion Pali Hill was easily beaten, but this time, though again defeated they put up a much better performance. Bombay won the Singles 5—3½ and the foursomes 2½ to 1½. Scores :—

WEEKLY COMPETITION.—The weekly competition of the Royal Bombay Golf Club—medal play over nine holes under handicap—was played on Thursday last. The course was in excellent condition and some good returns were made. 18 Seniors went out and both Jessop and Cook beat Bogey, the former returning a fine card of 39 made up as follows. 4, 5, 5, 4, 5, 5, 3, 3, 4=39. Of the 21 Juniors who started F. Kideon did best with 44—6=38.

SUGGESTED ALTERATIONS OF THE RULES.

THE Royal and Ancient Club, the governing body of golf, gave permission in May last to the Rules Committee to submit certain suggested alterations in the rules of the game. The committee's proposals are now announced.

Perhaps the most important are those concerning "lost ball" and "ball out of bounds." Under the present Rule 21, the penalty in match-play for a lost ball is the loss of the hole. For this it is proposed to substitute a penalty of stroke and distance. In regard to "out of bounds," the current penalty for which is loss of distance only, the committee suggest that the punishment be increased to loss of stroke and distance. If this cannot be agreed to, they recommend that the penalty be left to local rule. In a note the committee intimate that it appears impossible to obtain agreement of golfing opinion on the subject of a suitable penalty for a ball which is "out of bounds." The conditions under which the penalty is incurred vary greatly. They are of opinion that the penalty should be stroke and distance, unless modified by local rule.

In the definition of a hazard the committee propose to delete "rushes," inasmuch as they are hard to define, and leave them to be legislated for, like trees, hedges, fixed seats, fences, gates, railways, and walls, by local rule. They also suggest that a club may make a local rule for grassy hollows, and with that end in view the words "unless excepted by local rule" are placed after the definition of a ditch as a hazard.

The following new definition is proposed "An umpire decides questions of fact; referee decides questions of golfing law."

The wording of Rule 2 is improved without altering the meaning of the rule. The following addition to Rule 4 is recommended: "A player is entitled at any time during the play of a hole to ascertain from his opponent the number of strokes the latter has played, if the opponent gives wrong information as to the number of strokes he has played he shall lose the hole, unless he corrects his mistake before the player has played another stroke."

It is suggested that Rule 18 be altered to read as follows: —

If a player's ball when in motion be interfered with in any way by an opponent or his caddie, the opponent's side shall lose the hole. If a player's ball when at rest be moved by an opponent or his caddie, the opponent's side shall lose the hole, except as provided for in Rules 9 (2), 16, 22 (3), 31 (1), 32 (2), and 33.

The committee intimate that "interfered with" will cover the case of a player's ball being struck by an opponent's ball through the green before the former has come to rest.

Paragraph 1 of Rule 23 (2) is redrafted so as to avert misunderstandings which have been numerous in the past. It now reads:—

In order to save delay, if a player after making a stroke be doubtful whether his ball is out of bounds or not, he may at once play another ball as provided for in paragraph (1) of this rule, but if it be discovered that the first ball is not out of bounds, it shall continue in play without penalty.

In Rule 25, giving permission to remove steps or planks placed in a hazard by the green committee for access to or egress from such hazard, a clause is added giving permission to remove similarly any obstruction mentioned in Rule 11. In regard to disputes (Rule 35), the committee propose that "if the players have agreed to an umpire or referee, they must abide by his decision." This presumably precludes a reversal of such decision by the Rules Committee.

In the special rules for match-play competitions the committee suggest that the punishment for waiving any penalty incurred by an opponent shall be loss of hole instead of disqualification. They consider that the latter is too severe.

In Rule 1 of the rules for three-ball matches it is proposed that a player desiring a ball to be lifted must, unless it be played, have it lifted before any other ball is in motion.

The rules for Bogey play founded on the rules for stroke competition are offered for acceptance by the Royal and Ancient Club, who will consider all the suggestions mentioned above at their business meeting next September.

THE SIND CHAMPIONSHIPS

The Sind Lawn Tennis Championships were brought to a close recently at Karachi and results are appended. Although thrown open to all Sind, Baluchistan and Bombay Presidency—only two outside competitors entered, Mrs. Ravenhill from Hyderabad and Mr. Colter from Quetta. The Karachi Gymkhana provided the other entries. The tournament was most satisfactorily carried through and Mr. Cocke is to be congratulated on the success of his efforts. Mr. Hudson won the Men's Singles, Mr. Colter and Capt. Turner the Men's Doubles and Capt. Turner and Mrs. Ravenhill the Mixed Doubles. Results:—

CHEATING AT LAWN TENNIS.

First-class lawn-tennis players indulge in foot faulting quite as much, if not more, than their humbler brethren, but in one particular breach of the rules, the fair-dealing afternoon sportsman glaringly outrages the conventions in a way which the expert would shudder at. This is in the matter of returning a ball before it has crossed the net. No first-class player would ever dream of standing close to the net that this was possible. But watch the average club player. His idea of net play is to stand so that if necessary, his racket can reach, at least three feet, the other side of the net.

He makes violent plunges at the ball, and when he misses it, which happens nine times out of ten, he glares at his unhappy partner, who has previously been frantically coursing from side to side of the court in a frenzy of anticipation, and shouts "Yours!" Now, this is neither playing the game nor good manners, but what should bring down the heavy wrath of every responsible club official is the inveterate habit of this sort of player of—more often than not—showing his racket well over the net, and thus flagrantly outraging the laws of the game. It is not always possible to improve a man's manners, but it is possible to see that he observes the strict rules of the game or—if he declines to do so—to impose the penalty.

The rule says that the ball cannot be struck until it has actually crossed the net. The player who does so is stealing an unfair advantage. If the ball is returned before, so to speak, it has completed its mission, it is grossly unfair to the original striker, because, presumably, when he hit it he took certain contingencies into his reckoning. For instance, he judged how the ball would come to the man who has to return it, and there are a number of possibilities such as the ball hitting the cord and just dropping over. By poaching an advantage of possibly three feet, a player alters completely the understanding which is at the root of the game.

In friendly games there is a natural—though none the less unjustifiable—reluctance to apply the rules absolutely strictly, but, as in the case of foot-faulting, it is this very hesitation which fosters the bad habit. A person who stands close up to the net and returns a hard drive is generally somewhat pleased with himself, and it seems, perhaps, a little cruel to point out that the point is really his opponent's, because his racket was over the net when he struck the ball. But it should be done, and then that club nuisance, who thinks that he is a budding Doherty, because he occasionally succeeds in getting back a ball which he never would have done if he played the game, would gradually disappear.

Most players are aware that if the racket touches the net the point counts against the striker, whether the ball is returned or not. But the majority think this only applies when the touching of the net occurs as part of the stroke itself, that is to say, when the racket hits the net and the ball at practically the same time. Quite a number of people are not aware that even if the racket touches the net, some time after the ball has been struck and returned, and as a consequence of a "follow-through" action, the point counts—none the less—against them. On the other hand, Rule 17 (d) clearly states that "it is a good return if a player's racket pass over the net after he has returned the ball, provided the ball passes over the net before being played and be properly returned."

Boxing.

DEATH OF AN OLD TIME BOXER.

On the 5th August Nunc Wallace, in his day a bantam weight of high degree, was found dead in bed at his house in Farringdon Road, Stroud Green.

Of the career of Wallace, a correspondent writes:—"I am an old-timer; in my day the Ring had a different atmosphere than now: perhaps not an atmosphere that was always exhilarating; but the men in it were men of steel. And Nunc Wallace was one of them. Like the true bantam—game, always game. Not a boxer in the scientific way, maybe; call him a fighter, a fighter by nature, by instinct, and you hit him off to a nicety.

"Five feet two inches high he stood, that's all; but he had the heart of a giant. In everyone of his many and strenuous contests he hung on to the last gasp. For endurance he was a wonder.

"As a youngster he first set us talking by his success in several glove competitions. But it was with the 'raw 'uns,' as we old stagers have it, that he made his reputation. As a knuckle fighter he was as nearly unbeatable as could be. I should say, speaking from memory, that as such he was never defeated. Before he came to London—to the old brigade a different London from what it is now—his first really big engagement was a terrific affair with Charlie Jones, of Birkenhead. Wallace, whose surname was Edward, by the way, was next matched with Billy Willis, of Bloomsbury. What was then regarded as a small fortune—a hundred guinea purse—subscribed by members of the Pelican Club, was put up. That was in October, 1868.

"For sixty-two rounds the contest lasted—the time occupied was 1 hour and 32 minutes—and at the end of it all—I shall never forget it—Wallace was declared the winner. Next he worked his way into the final of one of the beg competitions arranged at the Royal Aquarium by Frank Hinde, and met Bill Goode. Wallace was beaten, but in March the following year he succeeded in turning the tables. A year later he fell before Morgan Crowther; but Wallace jumped at an opportunity of making atonement that came later, when George Camp, of Bermondsey, who up to that time had never known what defeat was, came forward and sought him out.

"The two were matched under the Marquis of Queensberry Rules. Small gloves were used, and there was £500 a side, the largest side-stake up to that time for bantam-weights.

"The meeting was at the Ormonde Club in January, 1890, and at the end of fifteen rounds Wallace won.

"Next he met the wonderful coloured boxer, George Dixon, for the bantam-weight championship of the world at the Pelican Club. That was in June 1890. It was a tremendous affair, lasting eighteen rounds. Wallace lost, but he made a brave show; the fact that he stood up for eighteen long rounds against such a remarkable fellow as Dixon is enough to prove that Wallace was a great boxer.

"Afterwards he had a second contest with Camp for £200 a side, and was again successful in eighteen rounds.

"Wallace was in the Ring several times subsequently, but the last really important contest was with Tom Gardiner.

"Those who know Wallace were totally unprepared to hear of his death. He was at Sandown Park on Monday, and it was only the other day that I saw him as one of the seconds at the Albert School of Arms."

FORTHCOMING SHOWS.

The schedules for the hill shows are now available, and at the eleventh hour Mussoorie fanciers have decided that there is not sufficient time to make the necessary arrangements, so for this season the show is off. Let us hope that next year the same fanciers may be found and that they will awake from their lethargic slumbers in ample time to make the preliminary arrangements, well in advance, and thus ensure a successful show taking place during the season 1913.

Simla notifies that their Championship Dog Shows under Indian Kennel Association Rules will take place on Saturday, the 21st September, entries close on the 7th, but late entries will be received up to the 14th idem. The Honorary Secretary is Major F. B. Lawrence, "Dyerton", Simla, from whom all particulars may be obtained. He is ably supported by a very strong Committee, and the card seems a fairly generous one: however no mention is made of the probable judges which I think is a mistake, as owners naturally wish to know beforehand whether their dogs are likely to be judged by competent members of the fancy, and it is only fair that a list of probable judges should be published with the schedule. Simla at all events should experience no difficulty in procuring suitable judges.

The Naini Tal First Championship Dog Show also takes place on the 21st September and considering that the Executive of this show had its schedule, etc., out weeks before the announcement appeared re the Simla show, it is not clear how the Indian Kennel Association, which is the controlling body in India over kennel matters, came to sanction two championship shows for the same day. The result, however, is, that one of the shows must suffer on account of entries, and as owners will naturally select the nearest and most get-at-able place, it would appear that Naini Tal must suffer. This seems a pity when one considers the few summer shows we have, and that the Executive of this, the first Naini Tal, Show had its notice out weeks ahead of Simla. The Indian Kennel Association is surely not so overworked that it can make this an excuse, and it would seem that such a state of affairs requires some explanation.

The Naini Tal authorities in addition to the usual classes and fourteen special prizes also offer 20 silver cups for competition at the show. Entries close on the first of next month, but late entries will be accepted up to the 10th on payment of extra fee. Further particulars can be obtained from the Honorary Secretary, Hunter J. Phillips, Esq., "The Haining" Naini Tal. We wish the venture every success.

The First Darjeeling Championship Dog Show under Indian Kennel Association Rules will be held on Saturday, the 19th October next. The Committee is a very strong one with His Excellency Lord Carmichael, K.C.I.E., K.C.M.G., as President, and Mr. K. L. Mackenzie, Honorary Secretary. There are 69 classes which include variety classes, 3 specials presented by the Indian Kennel Association open to members of the I. K. A. only, also 5 Special Prizes open to all for the following:—

1. Best dog in show.
2. " opposite sex.
3. " imported.
4. " Bred in India.
5. " Property of a Lady.

And, of course, there is the Calcutta Kennel Club silver cup open to members of the Calcutta Kennel Club only.

The probable judges are:—

Mr. Horace Johnstone.
Mr. L. Medley
Capt. J. D. Byrne R.G.A.

The capabilities as a judge of Mr. Horace Johnstone are too well known both at home and in India to call for comment; however, it appears problematical whether he will be fit and well enough to fulfil his engagement, as he has been confined to his bed for some weeks past. The Committee of the Darjeeling Show would therefore be well advised to have its eye on an equally able and business-like judge, as this being the first show the success of future fixtures will, in a great measure, depend on the judging and whether owners are satisfied with the results.

NONE of the schedules issued contain any information as regards railway concessions either for the dogs or those accompanying them. This is important information and usually finds a place in the show schedule. Committees of shows might note this for future guidance.

PROPOSED FOX-TERRIER CLUB.

THERE can be no question as regards the popularity of the Fox-terrier in India, and all true fanciers must admit that the time has arrived for the inauguration of a special club to guard and further the interests of the Fox-terrier in India.

The writer has been advocating the formation of a Fox-terrier club for the past few years; but like most things in India, it takes time to accomplish; however, the necessary papers have been received from home, and it now rests with those interested in the movement to come forward and support the venture.

There seems to be some misunderstanding as regards the status of the proposed club, so perhaps it may be as well to mention that the club must be independent and self-supporting, governed entirely by its own Committee and members. It will form no branch of the Calcutta Kennel Club, but will be a specialist club in every sense of the word.

On the other hand the club will be registered with the Indian Kennel Association which is the controlling kennel authority in India, and will also be registered with the English Kennel Club, and affiliated to the Kennel Club and Fox-terrier Club. The support of the above is already practically assured, but in the first place before any further action can be taken it will be necessary to get out a list of members, elect officers, etc., and make rules. The subsequent procedure will follow in due course.

A copy of the latest rules of the Fox-terrier Club, together with scale of points, etc., has been received (scale of points will appear later) and it is to be hoped that all Fox-terrier fanciers, who have not already done so, will send in their names to the writer, care of Editor, when a meeting will be convened with as little delay as possible.

The Fox-terrier Club was the first-born of the Kennel Club, so it seems only natural considering the popularity that the breed enjoys out here, that an All-India Fox-terrier Club should be the first specialist club in India.

Motoring.

MOTOR MEMS.

LONDON, Friday, 2nd August, 1912.

SPEAKING generally, those who complain bitterly about the excessive expense of motoring, and many of them are men of moderate means, have themselves largely to blame. The expense can be immensely reduced by careful driving. The difference in this respect between drivers is enormous. Some treat their cars as though they were living organisms and could not be more careful than if they were driving a valuable thoroughbred horse, while others—frequently, we may add, skilled drivers in the ordinary acceptance of the term—force their cars at high speed over exceptionally rough surfaces and take corners fast. Between the two classes of drivers there would probably be a difference of from 15 per cent. to 30 per cent. in the running and depreciation expenses. There are innumerable little items in ordinary driving where cars can be saved, such as picking one's course carefully, avoiding ruts, potholes, and loose stones, and changing early on steep hills, especially on gradients where the low speed has to be resorted to.

MOST drivers consider it infra dig, to change early on to the low speed. If the hill is so steep as to necessitate the use of the low speed there is considerable difficulty in changing before the car has come to a stand still, and unless the risk is incurred of changing with the engine running fast, the strain when the car is picking up again both on tyres and transmission system is very great. There is the possibility also of coming absolutely to rest before one has time to let the clutch in again, and if the hill is so steep as to necessitate changing on to the low speed, the strain of a standing start must be excessive and is very likely to cause derangement of the clutch. The man, therefore, who desires to take no chances and who wishes to get up these extra steep grades with a minimum of strain should get into his low speed before he reaches the steep section, so that by the time he strikes it the engine will be running at least at its normal speed and the car pulling steadily and smoothly.

If by any chance it becomes necessary to start on an excessively steep gradient a careful driver should shed his passengers so as to relieve the strain, and should get one of them to chock both back wheels so as to simplify the restart.

The dashing and flashy driver who throughout recklessly ignores running expenses may regard these precautions as unnecessary. These suggestions, however, are made in the interests of the man of moderate means to whom reasonable running and depreciation expenses are of vital importance.

TWIN tyres are becoming very popular in France, and are even being used for comparatively small cars. A French firm which is closely in touch both with the tyre and motor business assures us that even on small cars they are more economical in the end. There is certainly one great advantage, namely, that the owner of the car so fitted is seldom held up by punctures. If one tyre is burst there is no necessity of stopping until one's destination is reached. It would be exceedingly unlikely that both tyres on the same wheel would be punctured in the course of a single day.

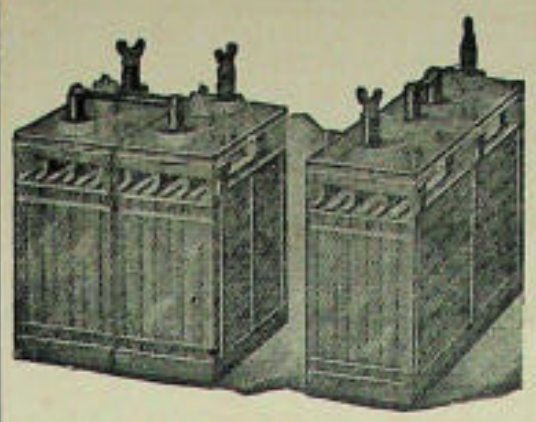
"FIXES for Pedestrians." Thus the heading of a paragraph in a morning paper the other day, and I need hardly say that I pounced upon it at once, wondering whether the bottom had fallen out of the universe or what. I do not quite know how to comment upon the information that paragraph conveyed. It came from Vienna, and the gist of it is that the police of that city—taking the view, mark, that pedestrians are chiefly to blame for accidents—have issued new and stricter regulations for those who proceed on foot. Thus the pedestrian will be required to keep to the footpath, and if he wishes to avoid conflict with the police he must cross the road by a direct line, taking the shortest path. "Persons walking along the street lengthwise, and thus endangering their own safety, that of others, and of the traffic, will be reprimanded by the police, and in case of the directions of the policeman being disobeyed, they will be subject to fines varying from 1s. 0d. to 2s. 6d." Whew! Fancy such regulations being issued in the United Kingdom. The Times would have to be enlarged to accommodate the stream of angry letters that would pour into Printing House Square, the half penny papers would go into hysterics, and the person responsible for the issue of the regulation would run a serious risk of being lynched.

A FEW years ago the most familiar sights of London's streets were the large number of horsed-omnibuses, hansoms, four-wheeled cabs, or "growlers," as they were facetiously called, no doubt on account of the proclivity of the drivers to "growl" at the amount of fare received. It seems only few years ago that they monopolised the streets with their lumbering roar, and the tinkle of the bells of the hansom cab in the small hours as it conveyed some belated pleasure-seekers home were then as common as the hum of the taxi is at present. We were jogged up to business of a morning on one of these old rattling commuters, with short trips in a hansom should greater speed be required. Now, however, the day of these vehicles is nearly past, and an announcement has been made that a horse omnibus of the old "knife-board" type, with back to back benches on to top running lengthwise, and a four-wheeled cab are shortly to be placed in the London Museum, Kensington Palace, which already has a hansom cab. It seems strange that these old public servants, which have rendered good service, should now be relegated to the list of things that are nearly forgotten, and a certain amount of sentiment attaches to their departure, but in these days of improved road traction their extinction was inevitable.

HOW often one notices the carelessness employed in the treatment of hoods, leading to their rapid deterioration. Here mere thoughtlessness is the usual cause. To the rich man no doubt the renewing of a hood may not be of any consequence; but to the majority of motorists it is a distinct consideration, and the condition of the hood may seriously prejudice one's chances of selling a second-hand car. One has seen hoods practically wrecked in a year through carrying parcels, small hand bags, etc., in the folds and considerable damage also may be caused through not fitting the frame work properly into position and stripping it, so that there can be no shake or movement, and also arranging the folds of the hood properly and making sure that they do not get caught in such a way as to produce holes through fraying. As a rule little plates and bearing pieces are supplied where the various sections of the framework come in contact. Care should be taken that these are fitted into position and unless they are strapped tightly so as to be held in this position the screws holding these bearing pieces may be torn out of the wood work. Another precaution which should be taken is to thoroughly brush the hood after a dusty ride, and this should be done before the car is washed and after the precaution has been taken of removing the cushions.

Most people do not like driving with the hood up; it obstructs the view and causes distressing draughts, consequently after a shower the hood is frequently lowered. It would be wiser to keep it up for a while until it is dry, and if this precaution is not taken it should be raised the moment the car reaches the garage and allowed to remain up until perfectly dry; otherwise the fabric is certain to rot and depreciate rapidly.

THERE has been a good deal of loose talk about hunting up substitutes for petrol, and alcohol is at present first in the running for the vacancy when it occurs. It may not be out of place to throw a little light on the subject by means of figures. It has been said that figures can be made to prove anything, which may be true if they are twisted and selected to suit the case advocated. Let them speak for themselves. Professor Wright, one of the chief authorities on agriculture in this country, assured me some time ago that if the price of potatoes fell below £2 per ton (2s. per stone) the ground would go out of cultivation, so that we may start off with the assumption that three-pence per stone is the bed-rock price at which potatoes can be raised at a profit in this country. But to obtain a correct supposition it is necessary to say that potatoes as grown in this country at present are not suitable for alcohol production, being deficient in starch and sugar compared with potatoes grown specially for the purpose. On the other hand, should attempts be made such as have been found successful in Germany, to cultivate the starch-producing roots, some expense would be incurred which would at most for a time be found commensurate with the increased yield. It may be assumed that the British potato contains 18 per cent. of matter capable of conversion into alcohol, which is 2 per cent. more than the average of various specimens tested. That means that out of a ton of potato a (2,240 lbs.) there is a weight of 403lbs. capable of conversion into alcohol. Now, Pasteur demonstrated a long time ago that alcohol weighs approximately half the weight of the starch or sugar from which it is produced. It is evident from this that the alcohol produced by a ton of British potatoes would weigh about 202lbs. As it would never pay to extract the last drop of water from the alcohol—these liquids are too averse to separation—and if the distillate be assumed as 96 per cent. pure, the weight per gallon would be about 8·2lbs. so that from a ton there would be produced about 25 gallons of alcohol suitable for fuel. Evidently 25 gallons for £2 makes the price prohibitive.



CALCUTTA MOTOR CYCLE RACE.

MOTOR cyclists in Calcutta had evinced the greatest keenness in the race on the Barrackpore road which had been fixed for Sunday, the 1st September: the necessary police permission had been obtained and a course of about eleven miles was arranged. The start was made from Emerald Bower, the residence of the Maharaja of Tagore and the finish just outside Barrackpore was witnessed by a very fair crowd. There had been 32 entries and of these twenty-six took part. The handicapping was in the hands of Mr. G. C. Sweet, who has had a deal of experience of handicapping at home and his efforts on this occasion met with very general satisfaction. Messrs E. Hall, F. G. Read, and L. Charles acted as timekeepers, Mr. J. W. Cunningham as Judge, and to Mr. G. S. Ford was entrusted the difficult task of sending off competitors on their journey. There was some delay at the start owing to mishaps to some of the machines, but they were at length despatched. There were three or four spills during the race, but luckily none attended with serious consequences.

The police arrangements were excellent, the road being closed to ordinary traffic and the route well kept. The weather was fine and though the road was somewhat greasy, it was no worse than might be expected at this time of year.

The winner was Mr. J. Johnson, whose time, less his handicap of 5mins 55secs., was 6mins. 56⅘secs. Mr. Robertson who finished seventh, might have done much better had he not taken a fall on route which lost him some valuable time.

Mr. H. Lee riding a twin cylinder "Indian," which is the identical machine that finished second in the International Senior Tourists' Trophy Motor Cycle Race in the Isle of Man last year, started from scratch and finished fifth, but established a speed record for road racing in India. He did sixty miles an hour, the previous record being fifty-five miles on a measured mile track at Hazaribagh on a Rex about three years ago. Mr. Lee's time for this course was 8mins. 4⅘secs. On the arrival of the last competitor an adjournment was made to the Travel and Adventure.

THE NILGIRIS.

ALTHOUGH much has already been said of those pleasant ue Mountains, the Nilgiris, I have still an idea that a few words of appreciation of its many "luxuries" might not be wholly unwelcome on the subject of a truly artistic environment.

Its oldest title, the Blue Mountains, suggest the idea of pleasantness, and on the journey up the ghaut this idea is intensified and our senses charmed by the growing landscape of hills and valleys which spreads into view at every step in ascent. Downwards stretch gloomy gorges and away towards the west the "Droog" towers in rugged massiveness, recalling to one's mind its associations with Tippu Sultan, and its history of buried treasure, watched over, it is said, by a cobra; while the fate of Tippu's victims hangs like a sombre pall over the awful depth of precipice which is in itself, perhaps, the chief feature of the ghaut scenery.

Away below the narrow gorges and jungle clothed hillsides widen to slopes of feathery bamboo, which only a year ago created so pretty a diversion of scenery by adding to its already graceful plumes the downy white flowers, which come into existence so seldom—in fact, but once in thirty or forty long years—and whose appearance is regarded by the natives as an ill omen, foreboding famines in the near future—a superstition, perhaps accounted for by the fact that only an exceptionally severe drought calls forth the flowering season of the bamboo.

As the train rises higher, scrubby jungle and bamboo cane and thickly wooded sholas come into pleasing view, so that when one's eyes pass from those verdant tints to the unprepossessing "first sight" of Coonoor with its slow flowing dirty stream and closely packed native quarters one is more than ready to continue the ghaut journey and enjoy further delicious scenery in the shape of smiling valleys (the Kati valley of which is the finest of its kind) low hills and a tinge of blue in the distance marking the far off Kundahs; while the many picturesque bits of emerald sward and dainty sholas add an air of extreme freshness to the wonderful exhilarating breath that pervades entire Ootacamund.

Ootacamund with the glorious downs as her chief attraction is perfect as a residence. When one has grown accustomed to her rather fickle climate there is no town of the hills more conducive to one's health and strength, while the well kept roads and well regulated Municipality leave nothing to be desired.

Upper Coonoor is pleasant enough with its shady roads and inviting lanes that make walking a pleasure, and though the air is not so exhilarating as that of Ooty nor as bracing as Kotagiri, yet one might do worse than spend a hot season within its precincts. One of the prettiest parts of Coonoor is the gymkhana maidan, situated immediately between the town mentioned and Wellington—a really charming little cantonment—and nestling in a cosy nook sheltered on all sides but one with densely growing jungle running down the slopes of the surrounding hills.

Ooty is lovely, Coonoor pleasant, but Kotagiri is sublime! Shut in, in no ways one can see for miles, the clear crisp air bringing into view with almost startling distinctness even the most distant scenes, added to which is Kotagiri's greatest charm, that for the most part of the year "the skies are always blue, the sun always shining."

Kotagiri is at her best during the S.-W. Monsoon, or, rather I should say, during the intervals of wind and rain. The breaks are sudden. One almost wonders at the way the rain and mist have disappeared of a morning when the previous night has been so utterly dull and rainful. But the rain has vanished, and the sky covered with foam-flecked clouds seems radiant with the sun's full glory, a strong breeze generally continues, but it is more bracing than cold, and one can walk for miles without feeling the slightest fatigue. During October and November great banks of fog sweep up from the plains but they soon disperse, and in all truth spells of disagreeable weather are known but seldom.

As a combined holiday and health resort the Nilgiris are unequalled so far as South India is concerned, but it is sometimes difficult to decide which of her three fair towns would afford the prospective visitor all that his soul craves for. Ooty is of course the most fashionable; Coonoor follows suit even to up-to-date hotels and almost every modern convenience; while demure little Kotagiri has actually plucked up courage and boldly made a bid for Fashion and her whims. Can you believe that she is really possessed of a club and golf links, which, though they are but late acquisitions, seem like old established facts.

Kotagiri, as indeed all the Nilgiri, holds unlimited scope for enjoyable interest in the variety of her scenery—one can gaze from the glorious panorama of hills and valleys, of tall peaks with heavy wooded sides, sheer heights of precipice with glimpses of silvery waterfalls; to gentle undulating country land of grassy slopes and tiny woods, where maiden hair and moss grow profusely, clinging to rotten trees and branches, and the crimson of the rhododendron lends its touch of colour to the more sober hues.

Morning is perhaps the fairest setting of the Nilgiris, when the heavy dew lies on grass and trees, and the amethyst mists slowly unfurl from the sea of cloud over the plains and creeps up the hillsides, concealing yet revealing, wreathing forests and veiling tall peaks with gentle hands that fade away as His Majesty King Sol rises higher in the heavens.

When innumerable bird voices proclaim advancing day, first the tiny black-coated Indian robin filling the air with his notes of sublime melody, later follows the thrush, bulbul and many another sweet voiced song bird. In June particularly, the Nilgiri black bird beguiles the long evenings with warblings of rare sweetness. Morning on the Nilgiris is divine, the air is full of life and exhilaration, and under the smiling aspect of Nature all things look bright and cheerful. The flowers too seem happiest at that early time of the day. The rose dew-kissed slumbers fragrantly and even the pale pure lilies seem sweetest then.

What a world of flowers these Blue Mountains are! What plant is there that will not thrive and flourish in some corner of the hills, be it ever so much of a stranger brought from far off climes. But quite apart from the imported "strangers" that have taken so happily to their new home, the Nilgiris has a glory all her own—at intervals of twelve long years she blooms forth in purple splendour. The hillsides are clothed with dense masses of the strobilanthes blossom called by the Badagas "kutta," of which there are two kinds, one flowering every seven years and the other but once in twelve—a deliciously sweet perfume is exhaled from the fragile bell-like flowers and thousands of bees hover about them all day gathering the liberal store of honey which the "little people" store away so carefully, choosing the loftiest trees or the rocky shelf of some apparently inaccessible precipice as their fortified storehouse. But all in vain! Some day or other that vile creature the Kurumba, or he who dares, exercising all the cunning ingenuity of his brain, and with the help of bamboo ladders (and pegs in the case of trees) robs and destroys ruthlessly.

The flora of the Nilgiri hills is too well known to need any comment here, but I cannot pass on without a word of admiration for the sheen of golden mimosa that floods the slopes and valleys of Ootacamund during the later months of the year, showing up vividly against the sombre background of darker hues. This exotic has taken quite kindly to its new environment and has now become a real indigenous resident. Sunsets on the Nilgiris seem to reflect the brilliance of her floral tints, even though the colours change so rapidly—fiery crimson to pale soft hues, or golden clouds that cast a radiant effulgence over the earth, giving a rosy touch to pasture lands and turning the pink-tipped young leaves pinker.

However, apart from the delightful acquisitions to one's enjoyment, in point of air and scenery, are the sporting possibilities of these hills, in which they certainly cannot be said to be lacking; although much evil has been wrought by the Budugar ryot. It is he who has cut down and laid bare vast tracts of what was once magnificent forest land, evidences of which are to be seen in the few mighty trees still remaining, spared probably because of their attributed devil-propensities and standing out gaunt and bare speaking only too pathetically of their absent companions, now dead and gone—monarchs of a primitive forest, sheltering the "jungle people" with a fitting home indeed.

Nevertheless sport with the rifle is still possible, more especially on the slopes where are found even chital and black buck, while the Kundahs, that once famous shooting ground, is particularly noted for the Nilgiri ibex. Around Coonoor and Kotagiri numerous small game are to be had, such as the barking deer, hares, jungle fowl, etc; from October to February the wood-cock and snipe pay us their annual migratory visit. The black bear is found not infrequently and affords some sport though of a more or less tame nature, whereas the wild boar despite the fact that he is generally termed the least interesting, from a rifleman's point of view affords no end of exciting as well as dangerous sport.

Tigers are practically unknown, panthers sneak around towns and villages making short work of pariah and pedigree dogs to say nothing of stray cows or country ponies and are sometimes shot by "sitting up" over a bait or carcase when the only "pleasures" are the weary vigil, and the strained position of dead silence.

The hill tribes might be said to be interesting if only in their many peculiar ideas and customs. The Todas, especially in their curious belief that the souls of men and buffaloes leap together from that marvellous column of rock known as Mukarti Peak into the "Beyond."

The Badagas are a dull, many of them handsome people, remarkable only for the unwavering doggedness with which the old world men and women cling to their ancient ideas and customs, orthodox and faithful to their religion as would please a priest of any Christian flock, were it as docile.

In comparison with the placid minds of the Todas, the result no doubt of their unvaried monotonous existence, the Kotas—from whom through an "ironical turn of fate" the sweet auburn-like little village of Kotagiri derived its unholy name—are undoubtedly clever—though dirty. Besides being the true Nilgirian blacksmiths, they also represent the "state musicians," they and their weird notes of pipes and horn are often heard as these picturesque minstrels wend their way to and fro over the hills and valleys within their "jurisdiction."

And now just a word or two more on the subject of sight-seeing. The chief places of beauty to begin with lie in the waterfalls, three fine examples of which are: the Pykara Falls near Ooty, Law's Falls more remarkable perhaps for a great dome of rock overhanging the pathway near Coonoor and St. Catherine's Falls situated about four miles from Kotagiri. The daintiest idea of beauty that one's mind can conceive are the rippling streams, with tree ferns, and moss, and overhanging foliage giving an air of infinitely cool and fairylike loveliness.

Many of the peaks are worth climbing if only to gaze on magnificent scenes stretching out as far as the eye can see, the "distance lending enchantment to the view, and clothing the mountain tops in azure hue."

From Ootacamund many excursions combining pleasure and sport may be made to Avalanche, Billikas, the Kundahs, etc.; from Coonoor Lamb's Rock, and Lady Canning's Seat, together with the Droog are easily reached, and leave nothing to be desired in the way of scenery.

Of the three Lady Canning's seat discloses the fairest view when arrived at—way down the valley stretches interspersed with rocky spurs and deep gorges, with here and there a thin line marking the ghaut railway where it is curled snake-like on the precipitous sides; to the right lie the steep heights of Lamb's Rock and in the distance the majestic Droog raises its historical head. Still further the Plains array in varying patches of colour looking so very distant and far below that one feels up on the mountains indeed.

Kotagiri is distinguished by no "ticketed" marks of beauty, for she needs none—who can dispute the beauty of fresh uplands stretching out in delicate panorama to glimpses of distant hills, while the ever fascinating view of the Plains charms one's eyes in rapture?

But above all and through all there lingers over the Nilgiris a soft and subtle charm, born not of her lovely scenes, nor of the bracing exhilarating air, but the silent fascination born of the environment of unspoilt Nature.

Over everything that charm lingers, soothing your nerves, calming your mind and—calling you back again.

Once Nature's fairest Masterpiece—
"Where every prospect pleases.
And only man is vile."

M.

WHY HE DIDN'T.—"Why don't you give your wife an allowance?" "I did once, and she spent it before I could borrow it back."

"ARE you still looking for your dog?" "Yes," "Why don't you put an ad. in paper?" "What's the use? The dog can't read."

"WHAT is an optimist?" "A man who thinks that if he puts 'Rush' on a letter it will be delivered sooner than it would be otherwise."

SHE: "I see by this paper that the average person speaks 12,000 words a day." He: "Yes; but you're above the average person, dear."

A CERTAINTY.—"Do you think women will take part in the coming campaign?" "I know two that will—Anna Nias and Molly Coddle."

A GIRL'S WAY.—"I am going to learn to swim this summer." "I thought George taught you last summer." "But I am no longer engaged to George."

PATIENCE: "When I was young I had at least fifty offers for my hand." Practice: "Those were what you might call your palmy days, I suppose?"

"Do you speak several languages, father?" "No, my son," replied Mr. Henpecke, gazing sadly at his wife; "but I do know the mother-tongue."

OSTRICH-FARMING FOR INDIA.

ALTHOUGH ostrich-farming is now a highly successful and profitable industry in many parts of the world—notably South Africa, Arizona and Australia—it is a remarkable fact that, so far as we know, it has never been tried in India. And yet there are several parts of the country in which it ought to prove a success, if started and maintained on a proper basis. We allude, of course, to the Bikanir Desert, the desert districts of Rajputana and the Runn of Cutch to which might perhaps be added parts of the Punjab and Baluchistan.

Whether ostriches ever inhabited India during the historic period, is a moot point; the late Professor Newton in his Dictionary of Birds, refusing to credit the reports of their having been formerly found in Cutch and Baluchistan. Be this as it may, there can be little doubt that the range of these birds once embraced the Kirwan district of Eastern Persia, and it is certain that in the time of Xenophon it included Assyria. Moreover, palæontological evidence proves that in earlier epochs ostriches were inhabitants of several parts of India itself.

It is, therefore, practically certain that the physical and climatic conditions of the desert and semi-deserts of India would be perfectly well adapted for ostrich-farming; although whether the birds would be able to get their own living, or would require to be fed on lucerne, could only be determined by expert examination of the country, or as the result of experiment. If lucerne cultivation was found to be essential, it would probably involve, at least in some districts, a system of irrigation, and would there add very largely to the expense of the experiment; but the profits of properly-conducted ostrich-farming are so great, that this additional item could probably be well afforded. An area of several hundred acres would have to be fenced in with wire in the district—or in each of the districts—selected for the experiment; and it would also be essential that the services of a certain number of persons practically acquainted with ostrich-farming should be engaged, by whom native employees could be generally trained to the work. In the event of the experiment proving successful, there is no reasonable doubt that ostrich-farming would form an important addition to the revenues of the country, while it would also afford employment to a large number of natives if conducted on the scale which could alone render it really profitable.

An important point would be the selection of the country from which the birds were to be brought, as ostriches from different parts of Africa differ considerably from one another in regard to their suitability to particular climatic and physical conditions; and it would therefore be advisable to obtain birds from countries which come nearest in these respects to the desert districts of India. The selection might, however, be perfectly well left in the hands of the experts chosen to conduct the experiment. In addition to obtaining birds suitable to the climate, it would also be essential to chose those which yield the best type of feathers, as there is great diversity in this respect. Attention has of late years been specially directed to this point by the ostrich-farmer of South Africa; and if South African birds were found to be suitable in other respects, the best strains of these might be tried. As an indication of the importance attached to the quality of the feathers, it may be mentioned that a few years ago as much as £200 each was the value of exceptionably fine cocks in Arizona, while it is reported that at the present time so much as £1,000 has been paid for such birds at the Cape. Good birds will yield from seven to ten pounds worth of feathers annually and exceptionally fine ones from fifteen to eighteen pounds worth. Although the hens begin to breed when four years old, they do not lay satisfactorily till their sixth year, when they at once attain their maximum value.

It must again be emphasised, that if ostrich-farming is attempted in India, it must be started and maintained on the best and most up-to-date principles, as otherwise it is bound to prove a failure. An instance of how not to do it is afforded by the attempts which have been made by the French Government to rehabilitate ostriches in Southern Algeria, where they abounded in the early 'fifties. Here there was everything in favour of the experiment, as the country produces a large number of shrubs—especially pistachios—which afford abundant food for the birds. Nevertheless, after attempts carried on by private enterprize or by the Government during a period of something like forty years, the number of ostriches in the country at the present day is actually less than it was a quarter of a century ago!

If the experiment is tried in India—as we hope it some day will be—it must be done under Government auspices, although the actual work and financing might perfectly well be left to private enterprise.

CALCUTTA BRANCH,

BY Joe Lee

Challenge

8, LALL BAZAR STREET, CALCUTTA.

I claim to have the largest town Turf Accountants' business anywhere in India or the Far East, and I am prepared to back my assertion to the extent of 1 lakh of Rupees and stake the money. This challenge holds good for 1 month from date and is to be determined on the volume of business transacted from 1st December 1911 (the date I opened up business in Calcutta), until August 1st, 1912, all winning wagers naturally having been paid in full on demand. I do not propose to include my Branch establishment at 59, Phayre Street, Rangoon, but to rely solely on 8, Lall Bazar Street, Calcutta.

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

As this portion of this journal will have gone to press before the arrival of our cablegram—published in our telegraphic columns—announcing the result of the St. Leger, comment in this issue is denied us. The feature of the market on the race during the past few days, however, has been the shortening of the favourite's price and on Saturday last he for the first time came to odds only a shade better than level money. For the past month Lomond has been at a price varying from 2 to 1 to 9 to 4, but during the latter days of last week he came to 6 to 4, and on Saturday and since Sunday to 5 to 4. At the same time there has all through the piece been a more or less intangible rumour that he is not the great horse that some people think him and he has had as may enemies as he has had friends. After his success at Kempton in the St. James' Stakes, in which he beat the diminutive White Star and St. Edgar, a very moderate horse, his praises were even more loudly sung by his supporters than they had been before, but it was also subsequent to this win that his price was returned at 9 to 4 and that there was a good deal of comment concerning him, all of which was certainly not favourable. It was pointed out, and with no little show of reason, that White Star is not within a stone of classical form and that St. Edgar has no pretensions to be anything but a very mediocre performer. Just prior to that performance Lomond was beaten a neck in the 1¼ mile Brighton Cup by Etheric, to whom he was giving 10lb., and it was then said of him that he showed that there was still plenty of room for improvement. His expedition in the Duchess of York Plate at Hurst Park, in which he had a very easy task, as Jaeger, his only opponent, threw his jockey and bolted before the race, colliding with the "dolls" and was never likely to be dangerous. So that when we come to analyse the form there is really very little in it to give us great confidence. He was all amiss when he ran in the Newmarket Stakes and the cause of his collapse has since been disclosed—trouble in his heels and inflammation behind the knee-joints; but so far as public performances go we are very little more forward with him than we were at the beginning of his three-year-old career. In many people's opinion he has yet to prove that he is as good a colt as they thought that he was at the end of his two-year-old career. Our own idea is that R. Wootton is not the man to make a serious miscalculation and that the stable support has been justified by their private information. Of the outside division Tracery, Maiden Erlegh and Catmint were recently mentioned as being favoured by those who were best in a position to know. However, it is perhaps a waste of time indulging in any speculation until we have the result of the race before us.

The first two days of the Calcutta Second Monsoon Meeting were run on Wednesday and Saturday last and on each day the quality of the sport was well up to the average standard. The Stewards have, we understand, decided to hold a fourth day and the season will not therefore come to a close before the 21st instant, the card being in process of construction. The weather is the only adverse condition against a continuance of racing all through September, and we have no doubt that if it were so desired a ninth day would fill, and fill well, for the supply of horses is good and the majority of the owners intend to remain on here till the end of the season. Mr. J. D. Scott will probably go back to Dehra after Saturday next being content to retire on his well-won laurels, but there are a number of other owners whose horses have failed to earn even their corn bill, and it is in their interests that the Stewards are extending the season. A petition signed by the owners was sent in on Wednesday evening asking for a ninth day and on Saturday last it was announced that this had been acceded to. There is another matter in connection with Wednesday's racing to which reference must be made as it has given rise to a more or less considerable tempest in a tea-cup. The fact of and the results of any turf enquiries are not communicated to the press, but as these matters are invariably public property all over the paddock, and as very often garbled versions of the nature of the charges and the verdicts gain currency, it would be a very good thing if Calcutta followed the practice observed in other countries and made an official announcement which could be published in the press. Why Calcutta, a very small concern, should arrogate to herself this superiority over established custom we know not: suffice it to say that it obtains and that it has often very mischievous effects. It is known for instance that quite recently accusations of an indefinite and extremely vague nature have been brought forward against certain owners and G.R.'s, and that other matters in which in the public idea enquiry should certainly have been held, have, so far as the public is permitted to know, been winked at. Is it unreasonable in the circumstances, and seeing that no information is given to the public, that questions should be asked as to why this is so. The Stewards may have enquired into the various cases of in-and-out running that have occurred and they may have found that the explanations offered are perfectly satisfactory, but the public are given no information and all turf enquiries are conducted on the Star Chamber principle, which in our humble opinion is wrong.

There was only a short card on Wednesday, the selling race having fallen through and the Stewards having decided not to frame another race to fill its place: we therefore had only five races and of these two of them were over hurdles. Fields were fair throughout the card and there was some racing of an interesting order. Proceedings opened with the Second Amateur Hurdle Handicap and of the six that ran we should say that five were certainly well backed. For a long time it was 4 to 1 the field and nothing was at a longer price than fours. Money then came for both Fame and Frank and they finished up with about an equal number of supporters. There was also a run on Daisy Priam at the close of operations and she carried a fair amount of metal at fives and sevens. Frank was taken out to the front by Mr. McCall, who rode him very well, and keeping the old black going won by one and a half lengths from Daisy Priam, who made a serious effort to catch him over the last two flights: Fame ran third and the weight told its inevitable tale on so heavy a course.

For the Clive Hurdle Race Herald, who has shown very poor form over obstacles so far, opened a hot favourite and had, so we understand, been backed down to a very short price at the unlicensed resorts in town. He is said to have touched level money and 6 to 4 on in the city, but his worst price on the course was 6 to 4 against. There was a little enquiry for Lady Leonard and Idle, but Herald had command of the market all through and the money was down on him in real earnest. The horse showed us a very different performance to those that he has done hitherto: he was always within nice striking distance and fenced freely and well, winning with ease from Lady Leonard by one and three-quarter lengths. Keenadan was third just defeating The Priory II.

For the Mediocre Handicap Bushey Dame looked good and such was evidently the opinion of the public who backed her. Convent Girl, however, was in receipt of steady support all through and won in good style from Isabela after leading all the way. Last time that Convent Girl was out, she got away badly and was never in the hunt owing to a bad start and being interfered with. On Wednesday she hopped out early and won as stated. The public selections again went wrong in the next race as Haut Pack, Pyers' Mostyn and Royal Colours were all better backed than Light Metal. The start was not a level one, but Light Metal was away in the first division amongst whom were Santoinette, Royal Colours and Tana. Mr. Nicoll's mare got to the front about two furlongs from home and after a fine race with Royal Colours and Tana won by three-quarters of a length, the other two dead-heating for second place. Santoinette a close third.

For the Sobraon Handicap a field of eight went out and the start was again somewhat uneven, Fireaway being left several lengths. The Stewards, upon the report of the starter, fined the trainer of the last-named for not having practised the pony at the starting-gate. Rupert was a good favourite all through and won in good style by a length from Lady Ratcliffe, Mr. Evers riding an admirable finish on the winner.

Saturday's card was a decidedly better one and in almost every one of the six races we witnessed close finishes. The punting division, who had had all the best of the exchanges on the previous Wednesday, came off second best upon this occasion, and even the most pessimistic ringman was fain to admit that he got most of "the old" back! Things started badly for backers, as the much-fancied Ormley and Master Val both failed to connect in the Second Open Pony Hurdle Handicap, the former being beaten somewhat badly in a good race to the last fence by his stable companion Alton, and Master Val fell heavily at the same place, Randall unfortunately breaking a collar bone and the pony coming back to the paddock on three legs. Randall is, we regret to say, somewhat badly injured as the bone is broken in such a manner as to necessitate an operation. As he will be kept out of the saddle for a considerable time a subscription is being organised for him and it is also hoped that the Disabled Jockeys' Fund will come to the rescue in a more lavish manner than it usually does. Randall got a very bad fall last year in Calcutta and dislocated the thigh bone at the junction with the pelvis.

For the Second Amateur Handicap Dooneen was first of all backed, but Mighty Atom displaced her in the first position just before the start and managed to win despite the 5lb. penalty she put up for the services of a professional. Dooneen was third a neck only behind Sincerity, whose performance was surprisingly good.

In the Second Amateur Pony Hurdle Race they backed Late Night and Winna, the former carrying the bulk of the money. The race was run to exactly suit Winna as the favourite and Spicy Breezes went out on a cutting down expedition and had settled one another's hash before the last fence. Winna's success in no way alters the position as regards her handicap in the horse class. She carried 12st. 2lb. here and was therefore giving Late Night 7lb., a difference in weight at which she was placed with Fame. He would be a bold man who would predict that Fame could not dust the floor with Late Night at level weights. Captain Robertson rode the winner in very good form indeed.

For the Giant Pony Handicap both May Kenley and Moira were well backed, but both went down and the winner turned up in old Pat C., who came with a very fast run in the last few strides and beat May Kenley a head when victory looked almost assured for Messrs. Valentine and Vernon's mare.

For the Ekbalpore Plate Tana was made favourite and closed at threes. She never showed up however at any part of the journey and the winner turned up in Herald, who in a close finish with Pressy, Isabela and Pyers' Mostyn did a bit more than hold his own and won with a bit in hand by a neck. Two successes inside a week is an atonement for many past failures. The winner opened at 15 to 1 and closed at 8 to 1. The last race, the Behala Handicap, was a runaway victory for the recently landed Second to None, late Dutch Packet, one of Mr. R. Powell's importations and who had been well tried and started at the short price of 6 to 4. The winner led throughout and scored in very good style. He is a performer at the unregistered meetings in Australia and is smart over short distances.

The programme for the fourth Day of the Second Monsoon Meeting was to have been ready yesterday as it was finally passed on Tuesday night.

The Bangalore Stewards met at the Race-course last Thursday (5th instant) and after a good deal of discussion on the point of converting the present tan into turf and the Steeplechase Course into the sand track, it was ultimately decided to carry the proposition of Mr. Donne, the Secretary, through. The work will be carried on almost immediately; the first to be got ready being the working track.

The Big Meeting at Poona opened on Saturday last and though not as largely attended as in previous years the gathering was the largest so far this season. The sport was excellent and the machines were very fairly patronised. An attractive programme opened with the Lilliputs, for which nine started. Mr. Lion's Pendit led practically from start to finish and won very comfortably from his stable companion Polish. Sharar was badly left at the start.

For the Criterion seven faced the starter and Lithosian was most in demand but had to be content with third place, a most exciting finish resulting in a dead-heat for first place between the Kour Saheb's Malmsey and the Jam Saheb's Metal Boy. Lithosian made most of the running but Metal Boy and Malmsey came through in the straight and the judge was unable to separate them at the finish.

The Yerrowda Plate, R. C. and distance over 7 flights, brought out a field of seven and provided another fine finish. Parkhill showed out from the first obstacle and attended by Five Crown and Mary B. led to the final hurdle where Five Crown challenged. The latter was in front for a moment but Parkhill came again and won a good race on the post by a head. Bachelor's Knot came down at the first flight and gave A. Hoyt what looked to be an ugly fall, but luckily neither horse nor rider was hurt and Hoyt rode in all the remaining events.

The Trials—the big race of the day—came next and most of the public money was on Lumination. She flattered her supporters as far as the straight where she was done with and failed to place. Vavasor came through after the turn and carried the Apcar colours to a comfortable victory by two lengths from Soultline who had run prominently all the way, and Victo finished third. Mr. Oomer's fine horse Elser dropped dead after passing the post and all sportsmen will sympathise with the owner in his loss.

Only three came out for the Arab Champion Plate and Mr. Ali bin Talib's Tajilmulook made all the running and won by three-quarters of a length from Thaboor, Valens third six lengths away.

The Ali bin Talib stable scored a second time when Gowahajmer, ridden by A. Ferguson, won the Dealers' New Plate in hollow fashion by six lengths from Lord Durham who was most fancied by punters. Wireless and Thulfa cut out the pace but Gowahajmer took command at the turn and won as he liked.

The Maiden Plate for which a dozen started gave Mr. Lion a second win, Aasud winning very easily from Galiard and Sweden. Taki Khan who had run prominently at the start finished in the rush and Fado who carried a lot of money was no nearer than fourth.

The world's horse jumping record was broken on the 17th August at a horse show in Vittel (France). The Australian horse Biskra and the thoroughbred Montjoie both cleared 2 metres 36 centimetres (approximately 7 feet 8 inches), thereby beating the officially recognised record hitherto held by the horse Conspirateur.

Only three teams entered in the VIth Division for the Country Life polo tournament and the first tie was played off on the 6th instant, when the 26th K.G.O. Light Cavalry beat the Poona Gymkhana by 10 goals to 4. The 3rd Sappers and Miners had drawn a bye. The game was favoured with perfect weather and there was a big attendance. Colonel Logan Home and the officers of the 26th Light Cavalry were "At Home" and a good game was witnessed although the handicap did not work out very well. The Gymkhana played up well and were individually good but their combination was poor, whereas the 26th who started plus 2 goals showed brilliant combined play: Popham and Chaytor were at the top of their form. The Cavalry went away at the start and Johnson and Chaytor scoring in the first period established a commanding lead. Each team hit a goal in the second chukker Wilson and Chaytor being responsible respectively. In the third Chaytor augmented the Cavalry score and the same player and Johnson put on 2 more goals in the fourth session. In this period the Gymkhana got through and Coaker scored. The fifth chukker was again in favour of the 23rd who scored 1 goal in the this and added another in the last, Popham and Chaytor being credited with the points. The Gymkhana showed up well in the last chukker Wilson and McCudden scoring a goal each. The game thus ended with the score 23rd Cavalry (+2) 10 goals; Gymkhana 4 goals. Teams:—

26th Light Cavalry.—Messrs. O'Donell and Johnson, Captain Chayter and Captain Popham (back).

The Gymkhana team.—Mr. A. Wilson, Captain McCudden, Coaker and Denton (back).

The umpires were Major Davie and Captain Gray.

The 23rd Cavalry and 3rd Sappers and Miners will now take part in the grand Final Tournament to be played at Poona commencing on the 7th October: Teams from the 1Xth (Secunderabad) Division and Vth (Mhow) Division will also participate.

The Poona Open Tournament drew four teams this year and the first game was played on Monday last when the 33rd Q.V.O. Light Cavalry met the Pilgrims (Captain Coaker's team) and beat them in a very level game by 5 goals to 4. Teams were:—33rd Cavalry—Captain W. Anderson, Mr. Collins, Captain Gillies and Mr. Wise (back). Pilgrims—Mr. A. Wilson, 12th Cavalry, Captain McCudden, 127th Baluchis, Captain Coaker, 3rd (Skinner's) Horse and Jemedar Gholam Hoosein (back). Umpires—Major Davie and Captain Chaytor.

The second game was played on Tuesday when the 26th K. G. O. Light Cavalry beat a scratch team, the Boy Scouts, captained by Lieutenant Cassim Shah. The score was 9 to 4 in favour of the 26th.

The proposed boxing match between Jack Johnson and Joe Jeannette, announced to take place in New York this month, has now been called off. Poor Jeannette must be very sore at the frustrating of his hopes on yet another occasion.

Another White Hope, Jeff Madden, has been knocked out. He met Joe Jeannette at New York on the 19th ultimo and was sent to the boards four times in the second round, with the result that the referee stopped the fight.

Jack Ward, of Gloucester, a candidate for Light-Weight Championship honours met Bill Johnson of Smethwick at Birmingham on the 19th instant and knocked him out in two rounds. This victory has induced an offer of matching Ward with Matt Wells, the English light-weight champion, and it is hoped that a contest will be brought off before Ward leaves for the States with Jim Driscoll and Fred Delaney.

The English mail brings us news that Henry Pearce has challenged Ernest Barry for the Sculling Championship of the World, the race to take place over the Thames course in July or August next year. Pearce has cabled £100 deposit as earnest of his intentions. On 29th July last year Pearce rowed Arnst on the Parramatta and was beaten by four lengths, Arnst stating that he had been given the hardest race he had ever had. Pearce has beaten everyone in Australia save Arnst.

Two more World's Swimming records were broken during mail week. At Ramsay, Isle of Man, on the 19th instant, David Billington rubbed 34secs. off his 1,000 yards record, made at Liverpool in 1906, his time being 13mins. 0-4/5secs. A new record for the Ladies' open mile was established by Miss Vera Neave who at Havre des Pas, Jersey, on the same day covered the distance in 31mins. 41-4/5secs.

The death is announced at Strasburg on the 20th ultimo of Antonio Pierri, the wrestler well known as "The Terrible Greek." Born near Athens in 1854 he was in his youth a professional strong man and weight lifter. He then took up wrestling, his style being Graeco-Roman and after many minor matches he met Tom Cannon, the English Champion, at San Francisco in 1888. It was a strenuous match which lasted over two hours and ended in a draw. In 1892 Pierri appeared at the National Sporting Club in an exhibition match with Greek George and was declared the winner. He then brought troupes of Continental wrestlers to England but seldom appeared as a principal himself his two most important matches being against Hackenschmidt. In 1903 under Graeco-Roman rules he met the Russian and was beaten in 17mins. 11secs. He then challenged his conqueror under catch as catch can rules and was again thrown in 15mins. 25secs. This was his last appearance and his subsequent endeavours were to find a man to beat Hackenschmidt. To this end he brought over Madrali who, as we all know, was beaten and had his arm broken in 44secs. Later a second match was held and Madrali was again defeated. Pierri continued to manage other wrestlers and made good money in the States and elsewhere, being a good business man and a first class "hustler." He had travelled all over the world, had visited America, Australia and South Africa repeatedly and, if we mistake not, was showing in Calcutta during the early nineties. Some of our readers may remember his visit.

The report of the British Olympic Council has been published. It again emphasizes that the failure of the British competitors was mainly due to the inability of the Olympic Association to subsidise their training.

Reuter learns that negotiations are now in progress to secure a Government grant for the Olympic games in Berlin in 1916.

The American Amateur Golf Championship, held this year at Wheaton, Illinois, has been won by Jerome Travers who beat Chick Evans in the final by 7 up and 6 to play. Harold Hilton, winner of the British Amateur Championship in 1900, 1901 and 1911, was beaten in the first round by an American named Waldo and another Britisher named Hunter gave up in a later round owing to sunstroke. Hilton's defeat is also attributed to the tropical heat obtaining during the tournament.

The Northcote Challenge Cricket Shield competition at Poona has been won by St. Xavier's College who beat the Deccan College in the final by an innings and 33 runs. Going in first they scored 259. Driver carrying out his bat for a well played 138 not out. The Deccan College replied with 81 and following on were dismissed for 145.

Appended are the results of the important cricket matches played in England during the past week:—

A combined team of Middlesex and Surrey players defeated the Australians by ten wickets.

The M.C.C. and Yorkshire at Scarborough and the South Africans and Hants at Bournemouth were drawn, the first-named team leading on the first innings.

Lord Londesborough's eleven drew with the Australians.

Mr. Lionel Robinson's eleven defeated the South Africans by 191 runs.

Surrey has beaten Warwickshire at the Oval by six wickets.

The first of the quadrangular cricket matches began on the Marine Lines maidan, Bombay, on Monday when the Parsees met the Hindus. The latter won the toss and batted first but fared very badly being all disposed of in an hour and 20 minutes for a total of 64. This was due to the fine trundling of Elavia and Parekh, the latter accomplishing the hat trick. The Parsees made 183 in the first venture, Warden contributing 115 not out.

The following are the teams:—Parsees—Dr. M. E. Pavri (captain), Dr. H. D. Kanga, Messrs. J. Elavia, D. K. Kapadia, D. D. Driver, J. S. Warden, M. D. Parekh, S. Guzdar, H. F. Mulla, J. Elchidana and R. P. Mehrbomjee. Hindus—Messrs. C. V. Mehta (captain), P. Balu, K. Date, the Thakore Sahib of Rajkote, Messrs. P. Vithal, L. Sempre, M. D. Pai, Ogad Sankar, K. Sesachari, S. Mehendle and Bhusari.

The match was continued on Tuesday, the Hindus entering on the second innings with their score 119 runs behind the Parsees. The team once more unaccountably collapsed and were all out at half-past one for a meagre total of 79. The Parsees thus won by an innings and 40 runs. Details in our next issue. The Presidency play the Mahomedans in a match which begins to-day. The Presidency will be represented by the following:—F. L. Sprott (captain), (Bombay), Major J. G. Greig (Poona), H. Cheetham (Broach), Captain E. G. J. Haughton (Poona), A. V. H. Travers (Karachi), W. S. Halliley (Bombay), T. H. Watts (Bombay), C. Wilson (Poona), Captain Yates (Ahmednagar), and two others who had not been selected when our information came to hand. Among others who were unable to accept the Selection Committee's invitation to play were Colonel Poore (Bangalore), Major Turner (Karachi), Mr. J. J. Turner (Rajkot), Captain Tillard (Quetta), and Captain Cooper (Poona).

The drawing for the Durand Football Tournament takes place to-day. The 4th Rifles team has scratched so seventeen teams remain.

The VIth Divisional Football Tournament at Poona ended in a win for the Loyal North Lancs Regiment who beat the Colaba R. G. A. by 3 goals to nil in the final. The Bombay Rugby Cup has been won by the Madras Gymkhana who beat the West Ridings in the final by 10 points to 3. The West Ridings have been holders of the Cup since 1907. Details of both tournaments in our Football columns.

The final game in the Trades Cup Football Tournament, which had ended the previous week in a drawn game, was replayed on the Calcutta maidan last Friday when the Nationals beat the Chandernagore team (holders) by 2 goals to nil. This is the National's third victory in the competition, having won it in 1900 and 1902.

One of the largest eggs in the world is said to be the egg of the Æpyornis, the biggest bird either living or extinct, being more than ten feet high and flightless. It was formerly frequently met with in Madagascar, and the eggs are occasionally found now buried in the sand, the natives using them for buckets. The egg measures 34¼ inches in its longest circumference, and 28 inches in girth. Some idea of its immense proportions can be obtained from the fact that it is equal in bulk to six ostrich eggs, or 16½ emu eggs, whilst its empty shell would hold 148 fowls' eggs, or no fewer than 5,000 of those of the humming bird. No sort of thing for an egg on toast for a sportsman's breakfast!

Mr. Stewart Edward White, an American author who has had experience as a big-game hunter, has been telling some interesting things about how a lion deals with its prey. Generally, says Mr. White, the lion springs upon the prey from behind or a little way off the quarter, and by the impetus of his own weight hurling the victim forward, breaking its neck. Then he takes his meal, curious enough seeming to be very fond of the skin. Having eaten, he drinks, and then two courses are open: either he returns to cover near the carcase and lies down, or wanders slowly homeward, apparently with intense satisfaction. When it is impossible for the hunter to see which course the lion has adopted, he can tell by the conduct of the other beasts and birds in the vicinity. "A half-dozen sour and distinguished-looking hyenas seated on their haunches at scattered intervals, and treefuls of mournful hump-backed vultures sunk in sadness, indicate that the lion has resolved to save the rest of his zebra until to-morrow and is not far away. On the other hand, a flapping snarling Kilkenny fair, or an aggregation swirling about one spot in the grass means that the principal actor has gone home."

The Nilgiri game report for 1911 is as follows:—H. E. Sir Murray Hammick accepted the position of patron to the Association in succession to Sir Arthur Lawley. New rules for shooting and fishing came into force during the year and were embodied in a pamphlet issued by the Honorary Secretary the features of which consist in the separation of fishing from shooting and in the adoption of separate rules for each; in the abolition of the anomaly that big and other game animals can be shot in Government forests without a gun license; and in the abolition also of the two months' licence at Rs. 35 and the substitution for it of a one month's licence costing Rs. 30 both for residents and visitors Sportsmen paid in fines Rs. 194 for mistakes in shooting undersized sambur stags or stags in velvet and Rs. 25 for fishing without licences.

The revenue of the Game Association in 1911 was Rs. 4,063 and the expenditure Rs. 4,263. Of the former Rs. 3,879 were paid in fees for licences of which these were 61 full season licences at Rs. 50, 22 on month licences at Rs. 30 and 26 fishing licences at Rs. 20. Trout streams were thrown open for the first time in September 1911 after an inaugural party organised by Sir Arthur Lawley at Kuromund. The fishing season was accordingly a short one but withal 299 fishes were taken. The present fishing rules allow the capture of fish of 14 inches in length. From the facts recorded above it may now be said that the introduction of trout to Nilgiri waters is a success. The heaviest trout caught in 1911 was four pounds 14 ounces.

Of game 10 saddle backs and 75 sambur stags were shot, but there were no heads among the latter of exceptional size. The hunt found the sholahs of the dairies full of sambur and deer often destroyed

This pen was primarily Designed for Ladies, Travellers, and Sportsmen, but really it is far too good a pen to be thus restricted in its usefulness. You, for instance, might prefer this type to the regular style of Waterman's Ideal. It differs, in that it can be carried in any position — upside - down, right-side-up, sideways, endways—without leaking. All the superior features and patented parts in the regular Waterman's Ideal are combined in the "Safety" Pen.

Waterman's Ideal is made in 4 Styles—Regular, Safety (as above), Self - Filling and Pump - Filling.

by wild dogs which despite liberal rewards for their destruction cannot be kept down. At Kodanad (South) sambur and wild dogs are less numerous. The Moyar valley abounds in spotted deer and 25 were shot there whose horns measured between 32 and 36 inches. In the same locality bison, once present in large numbers, have now become nearly extinct owing to the recent outbreak of rinderpest among them. Muddumully and Benai forests too have been depleted from the same cause. The scarcity of bison is serious and the committee propose to seek a remedy. Twenty tigers and 30 panthers were destroyed during 1911 and 195 wild dogs, but the latter have not diminished in any perceptible degree.

Several good examples of authors' "howlers" are given by a writer in a recent number of the Saturday Review. He discusses, for instance, gross mistakes about the moon, and as an example quotes from "The History of Sir Richard Calmady."

In this there is a statement that the husband has just come back to his wife after seeing the last guests off. It is about nine o'clock of a summer's evening, and the statement is made that a young moon was rising in the east.

"The young moon does not rise at that hour," corrects the writer of to-day's letter, "and if there was a young moon then visible it would be setting in the west."

Another author describes Burmah as being infested with deadly snakes which she calls "Rattlers." "That may possibly be a local name for some snake," says the critic, "but I never heard it used by anyone except as meaning rattlesnakes, and if she can find rattlesnakes in Burmah, I daresay she can find vipers in Ireland."

Perhaps the best example is Sir Conan Doyle's incident in "The Speckled Band," in which he describes the lightning-like ascent of a bell-rope by a venomous snake brought from India.

"As the author is a man of science," says the Saturday Review writer, "and no one has apparently seen anything improbable in the feat, perhaps I am all wrong, but is there any snake (venomous, and therefore not a constrictor) that can go up a bell-rope, hanging loose, and, of course, perpendicularly, like a flash of lightning? Could it go up at all? I feel pretty certain it could not. I cannot see how it is possible.

"I have seen a chased cobra go up a rough tree-trunk, but it was anything but upright, and even in that case it went slower than along the grass. I should have thought that if it could go up the rope it could more easily have gone up the wall."

Another good "howler" is made by Miss Beatrice Harraden who speaks of a man going quail-shooting with a rifle.

The piece de resistance of Wednesday's programme at the Electric Theatre last week was a thrilling drama entitled "Their Lives for Gold," detailing adventures of two miners who were racing for a claim. We were shown a sensational fight on the top of an express train, the wrecking of the engine, a break neck journey in a motor and the final dissolution of both contestants in an explosion, while the film introduced some very fine coloured sun-set and moon-light scenes. "Zillah," The Gipsy Princess, was another interesting film, pictures illustrating the Jam Industry and several comic items filling out the programme.

On Saturday we had a splendid bill of fare. There were three exciting dramas, the most interesting to our mind being "The Stage Driver's Daughter" with its magnificient exhibition of driving six horses at top speed. "The Adventures of Billy" introduced us to an exceptionally clever child-actor. There were three mirth provoking films, while the pictures of diamond mining in South Africa were most instructive. The English Gazette also contained many interesting items, notably the channel swimming pictures, the Athletic Meeting between the South London Harriers and a French team, the race for the Sculling Championship of the World between Barry and Arnst and other sporting events.

London Week by Week.

Friday, 23rd August 1912.

August in normal years is the time of mid-summer madness.

A great paper starts a Tom-Dick-Harry correspondence on a problem which eternity alone could solve.

Questions of no importance are raised to the dignity of the topic.

German bogies are printed day by day.

Cucumbers grow to a size colossal.

Young ladies, haggard with fear, write to the newspapers that they have seen the sea-serpent.

It is the time of small talk, seaside literature, suspended animation of criticism, and just sense of proportion. So it comes about that the death this week of the old man known as "General" Booth has been magnified by many papers into a matter of international importance, the whole world is considered to be affected. I can yet find it in me to believe that India, at any rate, is taking it quite calmly!

Alas! I spoke too soon when I ventured in a recent letter to express the hope that the Dublin Suffragette incendiaries and murder-plotters would be kept in jail for the full term of their sentences. No such luck.

Mrs. Baines of Manchester was one of the ministering angels who were sentenced to various terms for trying to set fire to the Theatre Royal in Dublin, when it was full of people, in order to show disapproval of Mr. Asquith and the righteousness of the cause of votes for women. She was sentenced to seven months' hard labour—not a day too much. She has served a little more than a fortnight of her sentence. She is free!!

Presumably she has been released because she insisted on starving herself to death, as it may be noted, Mrs. Leigh and Miss Evans, each sentenced to five years' penal servitude for their share in the same murderous outrage, are now doing. But our poor friend, Mr. William Sikes, is even now languishing in penal servitude for the comparatively mild offence of armed burglary, and many other criminals, certainly not more ferocious, certainly not less excusable, are serving the sentences justly passed upon them. If they go in for a hunger strike will they be released? Are we to suppose that the majesty of the law is an exploded myth and that any criminal can force authority to set him free? Are we to anticipate an emptying of all the jails to the great peril of civilised society? Or are we to believe that Ministers are either so utterly flabby or so bankrupt in resource that they dare not, or cannot vindicate civilisation against a band of insane women? It has been repeatedly urged that the asylum is the proper treatment for militant suffragism. Mrs. Baines should have been removed to Broadmoor, not set free to renew the campaign of arson and attempted murder.

An interesting development in the journalistic world has followed the sale of the "Sporting Times" (long known as the "Pink 'Un") by Mr. John Corlett to Mr. de Wend Fenton, the young gentleman rider and horse owner, who had previously been editing the "Looking Glass." The entire literary staff of the "Pink 'Un" resigned when the paper changed hands, and having found a suitable capitalist, they are issuing on the 30th instant, a new sporting weekly to be called "Town Topics." Mr. Arthur M. Binstead is the editor. The members of the old staff who have joined the new weekly are Colonel Newnham-Davis, the gastronomic philosopher, who signs the "Dwarf of Blood," Mr. Horace Lennard, "Rooty-Tooty," and Mr. J. B. Booth, "Costs."

The new paper, which is printed on deep blush-pink and contains 16 pages, is to be sold at 2d. The front page make-up will resemble that of the "Pink 'Un," but the heading will read "Town Topics, edited by A. M. Binstead." Mr. Binstead is also known as "Pitcher," which is a contraction of the "Tale-pitcher"—a narrator of moving anecdote and reminiscence. One of the features of "Town Topics" will be our old friend "Gal's Gossip," by Pitcher—light gossip such as has appeared in the old journal from the same pen.

"Rooty-Tooty," who contributes, got his name years ago, when, as the Paris correspondent of the old "Pink 'Un," he signed his articles "Roi d'Atout" (King of Trumps), which his sportive colleagues shortened into "Rooty-Tooty." The Paris article in the new paper will be done by Meg Villars, a Parisian actress, who will write of the gay Bohemian life of that city in which she is a bright particular star. Racing news and notes will, of course, be a special attraction. The appeal of the new paper will be even wider than that of the parent journal. Here's all good luck to it.

Albert Chevalier is without doubt one of the evergreens. Surely it must be about a quarter of a century ago that he evolved the "Old Kent Road"—the national anthem of Cockayne—yet here he is going as strong as ever at the Coliseum and attracting just as big houses as he ever did. Yes, the Music Hall has changed since that memorable night at the "Tivoli" when he rose to fame and poets acclaimed him with enthusiasm and proclaimed him Laureate of the Halls; but Chevalier is still the same and is still singing by request the same ever-green songs—"The Old Dutch," hymn of Vesta, "The Likes of Oi," rhapsody of good old times, defying the young generation; "My Flo," the romance of the coster to whom his girl meant the world.

It is not so much what he says, for the words are of archaic simplicity; it is the manner of his singing, the detail of his costume, the coif of his hair, the pose of his hat, above all his mimicry—his facial play, the twitch of his hands, the bend of his legs, which charm the over-populated Coliseum into a dome of silence. The crowd feels the artist, is spellbound, because in the finesse of his work—minutely worked out like gems in filigree—it discovers the touch of life, the humour and the pathos of the populace, the laugh that cheers like a cup and the painful smile that tells of intense feeling. When he recites—to the discreet tunes of the hidden piano—"My Old Dutch" one feels a pang in the throat; when in wordless gesture he invites his "Flo" to dance we all remember the bashfulness of our early debut; when he touches the first chord of the Old Kent Road "'Ere," it is like a regiment of soldiers, band in front, marching up from the distance; a thrill runs through the house, and sotto voce, the well-known strains vibrate through the rows. It is the triumph of the art of diction—the diction of the artist.

Sir Arthur Pinero has been saying a few things to an American interviewer which many English actors, actresses and playgoers might ponder over and be the better for carefully noting. Alluding to the Anglo-American stage he said:—

"I like your method of speaking. I can understand your actors better than our own. You enunciate more clearly. One of my great objections to actors trained on the London stage is that I cannot hear the last syllable of their words. Our actors are not trained—that is, our younger actors. They are not versatile. Are yours? We feel the need of the old stock company system, which was the most perfect training school of the actor. Do you? Look at our older players—the disappearing generation—and at yours. Every one of them was a product of the stock company. Are equally capable actors coming along to take their places? I think not.

We hear frequently that the London stage is running to trifles—that it has become anaemic. Possibly that is true. We haven't many big, vital plays with the stalwart, vigorous rules. There is a reason for it. The dramatist—I naturally take myself as an example—while he may not build his plays and characters with any special performer in view, has in his mind's eye a composite of the men and women on whom he must depend to interpret them. The public does not realise that a play should be judged by its ideal performance. They take it only as it is delivered to them. So the discreet dramatist dares no longer write up to his highest tension. He dares no longer launch into powerful themes. He writes characters and plots that are easily interpreted.

Our people want to be entertained, to be diverted, to rest their minds when they go to the theatre. Well, it is hard for a dramatist to meet all these requirements and at the same time write big, powerful, serious plays.

There are two people I have come to disregard in the theatre. I try to forget that they exist. They are the "innocent young person" and the "tired business man." I believe the latter expression is of American origin. I no longer write for any special audience. I write, instead, from within myself, so to speak. That is where my pleasure in my work lies.

I also try not to write the same kind of plays all the time. I like to vary my work. Latterly I have been rather serious, but some day I may return to lighter pieces. It will be as the impulse seizes me.

Why are London's statues so meagre in the wording of their inscriptions? asks a London daily. Why is it considered sufficient to mark a statue "John Smith" without adding on the pedestal who John Smith was and what he did to be worthy of a statue?

A valuable lesson might be learnt from the statue of Lord Clive which was last week moved from the Royal Academy to the small garden at the corner of Whitehall and Whitehall Gardens, prior to its permanent erection at the steps leading from Charles Street to St. James' Park. The inscription, "Clive, 1725-1774," will be cut into the front stone panel, but the other three sides will be enriched by bronze panels bearing allusion to Clive's work in India.

To discover how "understandable" London's statues are to the casual visitor and how much the man in the street knows about them, a Daily Mirror man recently made a tour of London, in the guise of an anxious, innocent tourist. The first statue visited, that of Prince Albert, in Holborn Circus, told little beyond the facts that it represented "Albert, Prince Consort," and that he was "Born 1819" and "Died 1867."

"Yes, it puzzles a great many people," said a policeman who was appealed to. "You would be surprised at the numbers who don't know who 'Albert, Prince Consort' was.

"Eighteen months or so ago things were even worse. It hadn't even got a name on it then."

A startling account of Cobden, whose statue stands in Camden Town, was obtained on Saturday.

"Erected by public subscription, to which Napoleon III. was principal contributor. Cobden. Presented to the vestry of St. Pancras, June, 1868. Corn Laws repealed June, 1846," runs the inscription, but a police constable supplemented this information as follows:—

"Cobden had something to do with a baker's shop near here, when bread was 10s. 6d. a loaf! He was before my time. A chap told me all about him, but I've forgotten what he said!"

In Leicester-square is a nameless statue of Shakespeare and busts of Newton, Hogarth, Hunter and Reynolds.

There is nothing to tell what these men were famed for, but, according to an elderly gentleman, who was questioned on the subject, "they were all theatrical folk. All the statues here are of theatrical people."

FLOOD SHOOTING.

To those who can get away ere the bheels drain in the Eastern districts, this is the best time of the year to secure good heads. I say heads advisedly, for the youngsters are not yet weaned, though able to "pick a bit." Fawns may be captured, but unless one can procure a good and continuous supply of milk great risk and trouble will be experienced in getting them either down country or to the nearest plantation. Though lacking the excitement and exercise of stalking shooting from dingies affords good sport if the boat is properly concealed. This admits of little difficulty, as there is plenty of ekra and other grasses obtainable to improvise a screen which will enable the sportsman to get up within easy range of his quarry. In the isolated patches, but little above flood level, but at no great distance from the higher ground, or hears at the foot of the hills, deer pass the day, swimming over to the higher grounds as the evening closes in to graze on the mosses among the boulders and light succulent grass that fringes the stagnant waters and sprouts beneath the shade of the bargon and other swamp affecting trees that Eastern India is famous for. If disappointed in intercepting the animals in the water as they pass to and fro, it is better for the sportsman to "tree" about 4 P.M., taking care that, even though well screened, the boat is some distance off, he will then be able to command a good view of the clumps and deer as they emerge from them; not that I recommend firing as the game comes out unless an exceptionally fine head offers, but they should be counted and patience exercised until the evening. Deer at this season do not roam, and unless suddenly started, invariably return to the same clump after grazing; experience showing them the security of the refuge. Moreover, they return very early. Lying in the grass refuge it is very difficult for any animal to approach them. Stripes being at great disadvantage, for he is not cut out for swimming, and after a few strokes invariably betrays his presence by the usual spluttering and labored breathing so that he seldom or ever succeeds in surprising his wished-for quarry in the fastnesses. As for outpacing them in the water that is quite beyond him, and timid as the stag is he could, if hard pressed, prod his dreaded enemy with his sharp new tines most severely.

Presuming that the quarry have been counted and the patch from which the most likely have come duly spotted, one has not long to wait for a chance, though it now and again becomes necessary to change quarters, which, however, is unadvisable unless absolutely requisite to secure a shot. One reason for shifting may be that none but does may come out of the clumps within reasonable shooting distance, though, as a rule and up till the end of the month, there will generally be a stag or two with them, but later on the lord and master's society is dispensed with, the shift, if feasible, should be made on foot, as bringing up a boat is always attended with a certain amount of noise and the sharp hearing game may be scattered by even the sound of the lapping of water against the sides of the dingy. Once the beasts are startled, you have to remain perfectly quiet for fully ten minutes to allow the alarm to subside, but if any great noise has been made you may as well return to the boat, as the animals, feeding as they do just now within a short distance of one another, seized with a regular contagion of fright, dash into the jungle, and will not make for home till well into the night. Should the hunter have been unlucky enough to provoke a scare, he need not abandon the spot, especially if the moon serves, for sooner or later the animals are bound to come back, even if it be not till sunrise, unless, indeed, it is very late in the season, when they may deem the time has come for taking entirely to the forest. All depends on the age and development of the fawns, for the does seem chary of leaving their secure retreats until the youngsters are far enough advanced to make a run for it on their own account if in peril. If the mishaps above mentioned do not take place, a couple or perhaps more decent heads may be had morning and evening until one is satisfied, or the deer show indications of facing the unknown dangers of the forest in preference to the apparent ones near their homes, when it is time to move on, repeating the process at some other likely locality.

In the neighbourhood of the hills the bheels retain the water much longer than out in the open plains, so that shooting can be indulged in much longer, and the tips of the Kuggra, as they appear above the stagnant waste, will give ample warning when it is time to get back to the main river. These clumps, though affected by deer mostly, are, of course, open to other animals, and, having assured yourself as well as you can that the boar is out of the road you may land and stir up anything that may be there; the most usual being a sow and litter of small porkers, who live in amity with the deer, it is presumed, from being exposed to a common danger of which they seem intuitively aware. Of course landing is not devoid of risk, and it is better that the axe or tomahawk should be handy, for though the male may not be present, a sow with very young pigs is pugnacious enough to give a good deal of trouble, especially if the little porkers are unable to take to the water. Occasionally these clumps are extensive enough to be considered islands, having swamp timber on them, and where this is the case, unless the grass is very thin and admits of being seen into, it is as well to pass them by, and even if the undergrowth is penetrable, little beyond a stray heron or bittern's nest is likely to be found, while there is great probability, if the place is anywhere near the mainland, you may come unexpectedly upon a buffalo and calf, an interview with whom it is just as well to avoid; nor would the bull be a pleasant beast to encounter in the swamps they love so well. If there is any indication of the clump being so tenanted, a Bengali bomb will be found effective enough in dislodging the beast, but it is prudent to back into deep water at once, as if the animal shows fight on ground where he or she can touch bottom, over goes dingy and all. Even if she or he has to swim, you are not safe, for once let the beast get either horns or back under the boat, and the sportsman will find himself and belongings scattered. Nothing else but buffalo, pig and deer need be looked for in the clumps during floods, and it is as well to mention that the deer are mostly bheelwah, seldom sambhur, and hardly ever the smaller pig, though if any of the latter are found, one can make up his mind that they have been hunted there from the nearest shore. Metna not being a swamp animals do not patronise these places, and make no show during floods, keeping well within the forest where they are fully capable of taking care of themselves. Tiger or rather tigress may be considered ubiquitous, for ever on the prowl, and generally patrol the edges of the bheels where the deer "take off" for the clumps, but so close do they crouch that keen sight is required to spot them. They do not bring the cubs near the hunting ground, generally leaving them away on the banks of a watercourse among the boulders, making straight for the lair when fired on, unless, of course, bowled over. About the end of September is the best time to secure the youngsters, but we need hardly remind our readers that cub-catching is most dangerous work, and should never be attempted single-handed, for reasons that are self-evident. When the water shows unmistakeable signs of subsiding the sportsman, however ardent, and whatever the inducement to linger may be, should retire, for the deadly malarious gases that emanate from all swamps when draining induces fever, a dose of which would not be pleasant wind up to a jaunt, successful or otherwise. To those having a bent for natural history collections, many opportunities are afforded when out flood-shooting, as pythons and other handsome snakes abound, and may be captured in a comatose state when little or no trouble is experienced in bringing them in. Curing the skins in a cramped dingy is bothersome but the reptiles may be placed under the bottom boards till camp is reached, care being taken that the gorge of the last meal has been sufficiently ample to ensure quiescence for some time; it would be rather awkward did a creature between fifteen and twenty feet in length suddenly shake off its lethargy when the boat was out in the middle of a bheel, perhaps, three miles from the nearest land. If, however, it is deemed necessary to cure at once the skin may be taken off by a longitudinal incision beneath the back covering—the junction between which and the under one is well defined and the skin placed in strong salt and water in a kerosine tin; the carcase towed astern and at nightfall submerged, pooties and shrimps will quickly and effectually clean the skeleton. Though a net may be carried, so few aquatic birds of any value breed down below, that a flock of chick is hardly worth the trouble of capturing, but there are numerous bright-head fish to be had that would form no mean addition to an aquarium. One thing we almost omitted to mention is that, as the waters drop, the seeds of many aquatic plants ripen, and should the sportsman be able to distinguish them by the foliage alone a fine collection can be made. The tall feathers of the eks, both white and pink, are in their prime at the close of the rains, and though from their abundance are little regarded here are much appreciated by people at home. The holiday season is now approaching, and though all will follow their own inclinations we recommend to such as "don't know what to do with themselves," a short trip in that part of the country that will remain open for "flood shooting" for a while.

Shooting.

To obtain a perfect sight for big game shooting at night has been the ambition of many sportsmen. Numerous inventions have been put on the market, most of them cumbersome, difficult of adjustment, or too intricate to remain long in favour. A patent has just been applied for in respect of a new night sight which is the invention of a gentleman connected with the gun trade in Calcutta, and the "Essential," as it is called, appears to be a simple, cheap, and efficacious contrivance. Its weight is 4oz. only. It can be taken off the rifle in a second, and at the same time is perfectly rigid on the Rifle when in use. There is no looking, it is simply slipped on to the Bead of Foresight, which has a slit in it for this purpose. To place the Sight in position, the wire is unwound from battery case, which is strapped to Butt of Rifle, the tube is slipped on to the front of foresight, and pressed gently home with the colored disc facing the Butt while care must be exercised in switching off Battery when not in use.

The price of the sight complete is Rs. 50, and refills for the battery may be had at Re. 1-8 each. It is obtainable from the Army and Navy Co-Operative Society, Limited, Bombay and Calcutta, and from all Gun and Rifle Makers in India.

BRIDGE QUERIES.

To the Editor of the "Indian Field."

Sir,—With reference to the Bridge query which appeared in your correspondence columns last week Rule 63 runs "Before placing his cards upon the table, the dealer's partner has all the rights of a player, etc., etc."

And it would be absurd to argue that players have the right to inspect their partner's cards before a card is played. Therefore in the case you mention there was a breach of the rules.

But taking the inspection of the declarer's hand any time after the play of the hand has begun. At all times this must be a breach of etiquette, for with the knowledge of his partner's hand Dummy is sure to prevent him from ever revoking knowing as he would the number of cards held in each suit.

It is an advantage which the rules do not give him and therefore it is wrong of him to possess such knowledge.

Hearts.

Calcutta, 6th September 1912.

To the Editor of the "Indian Field."

Sir,—Would you kindly give an opinion on the following point:—

A, B and C are playing "cut-throat" Bridge—D is dummy.

The scores are C one game up and 28 in the second game, A and B nothing.

A is dealer in second game and declares spades. B and C are partners against him.

The last three cards to be played in dummy's (D's) hand are king and 10 of diamonds and ace of spades, while B has ace, queen diamonds and a small club ♣. ♦ ♠

A leads a small diamond to his partner D (dummy), C puts on a small diamond and D puts on king of diamonds. Should B put on the ace and win the trick and then win the next trick with his queen of diamonds thus insuring the odd trick to his partner C and himself (which means that C, who is 28 up, wins the rubber), or should B throw his queen of diamonds to the king, and then make only the ace of diamonds and thus prevent C from winning the rubber? I understand "cut throat" Bridge to mean that each player plays so as to prevent each other player from winning the rubber and thus give himself a chance of winning the rubber. In the case under reference please note that B and C are partners for that hand, and B can if he likes win the game and the rubber for C. A can win only 2. B can win 2, only if he wins both diamond tricks, but by doing so he gives the rubber to C, but on the contrary by not doing so he prevents C from winning the rubber in that hand and enables himself and A to win the rubber in subsequent hands. The argument is, must B and C, when playing together against A, do their best to prevent A from winning the odd trick, even though by so doing C wins the rubber and B gains nothing.

F. W. B.

Jharia, 6th September 1912.

["Cut-throat" bridge is cut—throat. In this case B would naturally lose the odd trick if he could, at the expense of his partner.

He will then be able to prolong the game and may in the end win the rubber.

The only occasion in which etiquette arises is when B's partner or opponent require only the odd trick to win the game, it is then up to B to do the best he can for his partner, for the game must be won and he (B) cannot win it, therefore, he must give his skill to his partner against his opponent.

In all other cases B plays as he thinks best and cuts his partner's or his opponent's throat as it suits his score.—Ed.]

ELGIN TENTS

50 YEARS EXPERIENCE

in the manufacture of Tents goes a long way towards attaining perfect construction, and the fact that experienced tent dwellers realize this is evidenced by our increasing trade in this direction.

Amongst other well-known people who use Elgin Tents we may mention the following :—

Sir M. A. Stein, PH.D., C.I.E. | W B Cotton, Esq., I.C.S.
Lieut. P. T. Etherton, F.R.G.S. | Dr. and Mrs W. Bullock Workman.

Surely if Elgin Tents are good enough for such distinguished canvas dwellers they are good enough for you.

Will you let us send you our Illustrated Book of Tents ?

It is sent quite FREE on request.

PURGEN

"THE LAXATIVE OF THE FUTURE."

The BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL states:—

"PURGEN has been largely prescribed in the London Hospitals, and has in suitably graduated cases shown itself to be a useful purgative both in Children and Adults. The properties ascribed to this substance have been verified by its use in a large number of cases of constipation, in various diseases."

PURGEN acts surely, gently and uniformly, without causing any irritation or pain, and its effect does not wear off by prolonged use. PURGEN is not absorbed by the system. It has no action on the liver or kidneys, and it does not produce flatulence, nausea, depression or other disagreeable symptoms usually associated with aperient medicines. PURGEN is an especially valuable medicine for the delicate, for invalids and for children. Made up in small tablets of agreeable flavour and sold in boxes only.

Sold in Three Strengths:—

"INFANT" (for young children); "ADULT" (for "grown-ups"); "STRONG" (for invalids and chronic constipation).

English Price: 1/- per Box.

STOCKTON.

Rank and fashion of the North annually assist at the summer meeting on the Mandale Bottoms, and Tuesday was no exception, for the attendance was both large and influential. Owing to a bereavement in the family there was no house party at Wynyard Park this year, and Lord Londonderry's horses consequently ran in the name and colours of Captain Dewhurst, his trainer, as did Pitmaston in the Trial Selling Plate. Results:—

SWIMMING.

THE A. S. A. LONG DISTANCE CHAMPIONSHIP.—With the absence of the holder, M. E. Champion, Aucland, New Zaland and other Colonial swimmers from the list of entries for the National Long Distance Championship, coupled with the late hour it was necessary to start the race, this year's competition decided on the 17th instance in the River Thames from Kew to Putney (a distance of 5 miles 60 yards) fell somewhat flat compared with previous years. The race was started at ten minutes to seven. At the end of the first mile Taylor led by 20 yards from Battersby, who was a similar distance in front of Melhuish, the other competitors being some distance in the rear. Taylor, who swam splendidly, increased his lead at every stroke, passing Hammersmith Bridge 1min. 4Secs. in front of Battersby. Battersby fell back and allowed Melhuish to creep up gradually. Darkness now set in, and it was very difficult to see the competitors. Taylor won by 50 yards. Melhuish being ten yards in front of Battersby. Details: H. Taylor, Hyde Seal S. C., 1 hour 4 minutes 7⅖ second, 1; W. H. Melhuish, Wooldon S. C., 1 hour 4 minutes 48 seconds, 2; T. S. Battersby, Amateur S. C., 1 hour 4 minutes 57 seconds, 3; F. L. Buckland, Amateur S. C., 1 hour 6 minutes 53 seconds, 4.

Hunting.

POONA AND KIRKEE HOUNDS.

Sunday, 1st September.—Hounds met at Dighi village on a damp and cloudy morning, a field of about sixty, which included several from Bombay, turning out. A jackal was soon found in a nullah to the west of the road and went off at a smart burst in the direction of Chinchwad. After a run of thirty minutes he took refuge in some betel gardens but was dislodged and rushed off to Chobra village, where he ran into a house and on being evicted jumped down a well; he was hooked out with the aid of a rope and a bucket and, the general opinion being that he had earned his reprieve, he was allowed to depart. On the way home another jack was found and after a run of fifteen minutes hounds pulled him down, Mrs. Vines receiving the brush. Amongst those out we noticed General and Lady Barrett, General Barter, the Hon'ble Mr. Carmichael, Mrs Carmichael, Colonels Evans, Arnold, Perkins, Fowler and Dunlop, M.F.H., Majors Bowen, Daunt, Nevinson, Robinson, Westmorland, Captains Chaytor, Langrishe, M'Cadden, Ryley, Martin, Sydenham, Logan, Wynne, Weldon and Lucas, Messrs. Collum, A. Forbes, Graham, Corey, Furdonjee, O'Donnell and Vachell, Mrs. Fowler, Mrs. Collum, Mrs. Sydenham, Miss Crawford, Miss Colin, Colonel Logan Home, Master, Messrs. Whaley, Johnson, Cassim Shah and Knight Bruce whips.

On Tuesday, the 3rd, we had a bye day, meeting at the Aga Khan's bungalow. Those out included Lady Barrett, Mrs Fowler, Hon'ble Mr. and Mrs. Carmichael, Mrs. Fitzgibbon, Hon'ble Mr. Curtis, Captain Stewart, Captain T. Lucas, Captain Vines, the Zemindar of Sirsgiri, Captain Cassim Shah, Mr. Knight Bruce, Mr. Atkinson, Captain Law, Mr. Read. Hounds were soon on to the line of a jack who gave us a fast but short gallop, being run into after about eight minutes. A chinkara was the next quarry but hounds soon threw up and later were put on to a fox which after a good run of twelve minutes was also lost.

Thursday, 5th September.—A large field met the Master at the 7th mile on the Nasik Road. Drawing in the direction of the old Bombay road hounds got on the line of a jack who disappeared mysteriously after a run of about a mile. Another was chopped in covert soon after and then a chinkara gave the field a good gallop for twenty minutes when hounds threw up. Yet another jack was chopped a little later and, scent failing, hounds were whipped off. Those out included Hon'ble Mr. Claude Hill, Field Master, Major Westmoreland, General Sir Arthur and Lady Barrett and Miss Vangoetham, Hon'ble Mr. Curtis, Hon'ble Mr. Millett, Major-General Barter, Mrs. Fowler, Captain and Mrs. Sydenham, Mr. and Mrs. Collum, Miss Joyce Crawford, Major Daunt, Captain Weldon, Captain Utterson, Miss Campbell, Miss Palin, Captain Martin, Mrs. Birkett, Mr. Eales, Mrs. Robinson, Mr. Greenshields, Captain T. Lucas, Captain Vachell, Captain Riley, Captain Barkeley, Captain Stokes, Mr. Brotherton, Mr. Logan, Mr. Wynne, Mrs. Atkinson, Mr. Mackay, Captain Stewart, the Misses Prior, Major Bowen, Captain Leahy, Mr. Britten, Major Eassie, Colonel Evans, Captain Law, Captain Harvey-Kelly and many others.

OOTACAMUND HOUNDS.

I DID not write last week, as there was no hunting on 26th and 27th August, owing to the absence from Ooty of the Master and one of the whips. On Thursday, 29th, the meet was at Pykara Finger Post, a fine morning for a welcome change. New covert was drawn blank, but outside Mills a line was picked up and run past Bagman through Rallywood and into Monkey Shola, then past Baikie and Ursula down the Avalanche path, over the stream and on to Cairn Hill. Hounds hunted him out of this stronghold, back to Woodstock and Campbell's Copse, losing him near Kandal. During the run Captain Dennistoun had a nasty fall breaking a collar bone and wrenching an ankle, owing to his mare slipping on the side of a hill. Another short run from Rockwood Spinney to Aramby before hounds were taken home.

On Saturday, 31st, we met at Sheffield Corner Midday. In spite of a good shower in the morning the day was very hot and hounds were quite done up before the evening. The hunting at first was all round Gaylad, running to Pillay Shola and Schmidts, and the Dangar ride back to Gaylad where the jack got away. A second was found in Edward's Shola and give a short run to Tiger Shola, past Andy to Danie's Spinney where scent failed. After a pause on account of the heat until 4 P.M. another start was made and Rallywood provided a victim which courted death by running straight into the jaws of the pack. To wind up we had a merry chase after a jack which went away from Bagman towards Municipal Farm, through the Kandal Cemetery and on to golf links where the field was swelled by a vast throng of golfers and caddies, et hoc genus omne; a wild cheery chase, which somewhat disconcerted hounds, for they failed to account for the jack.

Tuesday, 3rd September.—The meet at Toda Coffee Shop was timed for noon, but on account of the heat and dryness of the ground hounds were not moved off until nearly 1 P.M. A long slow draw in the moist ground bordering on the Pykara stream up the valley towards Yemakal; it was 3 P.M. before a jack was found and he gave a brisk run back over the ground we had come as far as Kariamund Shola where he was lost. I don't know what followed as I had to leave at 3-45.

QUETTA TOURNAMENT.

THE tournament opened on the 2nd instant when two games were played: Details as under:—

23RD CAVALRY vs. STAFF COLLEGE JUNIOR.

First Chukker.—Up and down play, Buchanan eventually scoring for the Staff College. The Cavalry then pressed and Gannon equalised. Both goals were then visited in turn—a shot by Gannon just missing the flags. A run by the Juniors was unsuccessful and the Cavalry bringing the ball back Egerton scored in a melee.

Second Chukker.—The Juniors pressed at the start but the Cavalry soon got possession and attacking for the rest of the period put on three more goals, Allen being credited with all three points.

Third Chukker.—Save for a short spell in which the Juniors were prominent, the Cavalry had the best of this chukker also and scored two more goals. Egerton hitting one—the result of a long shot—and the other being put through in a scrimmage.

Fourth Chukker.—The Staff now pulled themselves together and took charge of the play. They kept their opponents busy defending and scored a second goal. A run by the Cavalry towards the end of the period proved abortive.

Fifth Chukker.—The Juniors continued to attack and Taylor gave them another goal. Thereafter the Cavalry pressed once more and Allen added to their score.

Sixth Chukker.—The Cavalry attacked vigorously but several shots went wide. Then the Staff got in a run but the ball went behind. The Cavalry took up the offensive once more and had the best of the remaining play; Egerton scored again and they ran out winners by 9 goals to 3. Teams:—

23RD CAVALRY.		STAFF COLLEGE JUNIORS.
Capt. W. T. Allen	1	Capt. C. G. Buchanan, 55th Sikhs	1
Capt. J. B. Egerton	2	Capt. P. R. Chambers, 10th Lancers	3

Capt. J. C. R. Gannon (back).		Capt. H. K. Bethell 7th Gurkha Rifles (back).

ROYAL WELSH FUSILIERS vs. STAFF COLLEGE SENIORS.

First Chukker.—The Fusiliers rushed away at the start and Ormrod opened the scoring. Another attempt was abortive and then play settled down till Johnson got away and hit a second goal. Ormrod was nearly through shortly after but Cunningham cleared.

Second Chukker.—The Staff College pressed and Ward scored. A run by Stable followed but the Seniors cleared and taking the ball down Fisher put the team on terms, up and down play closing the chukker.

Third Chukker.—Fast play in which the Staff College were always prominent till Ward gave them another goal towards the end of the period.

Fourth Chukker.—A foul against the Staff College; nothing resulted but soon after a penalty against the Fusiliers enabled Cunningham to score. The Fusiliers had the best of the remaining play but could not score.

Fifth Chukker.—The Seniors got on and Fisher scored a goal. Then the Fusiliers attacked and Stable hit two goals in quick succession. Further pressure was fruitless and midfield play closed the chukker.

Sixth Chukker.—Thomas got away and made the score 5 all. Fast up and down play followed, neither team gaining any advantage. At length Thomas hit a goal and followed it up with another a few minutes before time, the Royal Welsh Fusiliers thus winning by 7 goals to 5. Teams:—

Capt. R. B. Johnson (back).		Capt. C. C. Cunningham, 12th Pioneers (back).

SEMI FINALS.

The semi finals were played off on the 6th instant leaving the Royal Welsh Fusiliers and the 23rd Cavalry in the final.

23RD CAVALRY vs. THE "DREADNOUGHTS."

First Chukker.—Up and down play till Allen scored for the Cavalry after one unsuccessful effort. The Cavalry continued the pressure and Egerton scored their second goal shortly after.

Second Chukker.—After an unsuccessful run by the Dreadnoughts their opponents got away and a hot attack ended in Egerton putting through once more. Up and down play closed the chukker.

Third Chukker.—The Cavalry pressed throughout this period and scored three goals, Allen being responsible for 2 and Gannon for 1.

Fourth Chukker.—Continuing the pressure the Cavalry scored two more goals through Gannon and Allen. Thereafter the Dreadnoughts had more of the play though no further scoring accrued.

Fifth Chukker.—The Cavalry attacked throughout but could not add to their score. Swinburne of the Dreadnoughts had to retire hurt in this period and his place was taken by Captain Stewart, S. and T. Corps.

Sixth Chukker.—The Dreadnoughts got away and Binney scored their first and only goal. This was followed by another for the Cavalry, registered by Egerton, and the 23rd thus won by 9 goals to one. Teams:—

23RD CAVALRY, F.F.		THE "DREADNOUGHTS."
Capt. W. T. Allen	1	Mr. T. A. Swinburne, R.E.	1
Capt. J. B. Egerton	2	Mr. E. V. Binney, R.E.	2

Capt. J. C. R. Gannon (back).		Col. C. B. Irvine, I.M.S. (back).

ROYAL WELSH FUSILIERS vs. GYMKHANA.

First Chukker.—The Gymkhana rushed down at the start and Heale scored. The Fusiliers were not long in equalising through Thomas and this was followed by a good goal by Ormrod, the Gymkhana having to defend for the rest of the period.

Second Chukker.—The Fusiliers kept up the attack and Johnson hit a goal. The Gymkhana changed the venue of operations later on but all their efforts to score were unsuccessful.

Third Chukker.—The Gymkhana continued the pressure but lost opportunities and the Fusiliers then took charge of the play. Thomas scoring twice before the chukker closed.

Fourth Chukker.—The Fusiliers were kept busy defending but the Gymkhana failed to add to their score. A run by the Fusiliers at the close enabled Johnson to put on another goal.

Fifth Chukker.—Ormrod scored another and the game continued in the Gymkhana end till Webber cleared and crowned a good individual effort with a clever goal.

Sixth Chukker.—The Fusiliers pressed throughout and Thomas and Ormrod added to their score, and gave them the victory by 9 goals to 2. Teams:—

ROYAL WELSH FUSILIERS		GYMKHANA.

Also four miniatures of the Championship Cup will be presented to the players of the Winning Team by the I.P.A. and in addition four small Cups will be presented to the runners up, by the Calcutta Polo Club, as special mementos of the Tournament. The Tournament will be played under the following Rules, as laid down to govern; The Indian Polo Association Championship Tournament.

"A Challenge Cup, presented by the Indian Polo Association, will be played for each year."

"The Cup, which will remain in the possession of the Winners until the following year, cannot be won outright."

"Four miniature Cups will be presented to the players of the Winning Team by the I.P.A."

"The Tournament will be played under the Indian Polo Association Rules of Polo with the following conditions:—

1. Open to any recognized Club, which is a registered Member of the I.P.A.

2. Number of ponies limited to 24 per Team."

"The right is reserved to the Executive Committee of modifying or altering the conditions of the Championship Tournament."

J. J. RICHARDSON, Major,
15TH HUSSARS, MEERUT,
Hony. Secy., Indian Polo Association.

CONDITIONS.

The Tournament will be played off in Calcutta between the 23rd December and 1st January inclusive, the actual dates to be published later, whenever a fairly reliable estimate can be formed as to the number of teams likely to compete, and consequently the approximate number of matches, which will have to be played:—

1st Entries to close on Monday, 18th November, Entrance Fee ... ... Rs. 50

2nd Entries to close on Monday, 2nd December, Entrance Fee ... ... Rs. 100

Final Entries by letter or telegram up to the evening of 16th December, Entrance Fee ... Rs. 150

Entrance fees to go towards defraying the expenses of the Tournament. All Entries, which must be accompanied by entrance fees, also all correspondence, to be addressed to—The Honorary Secretary, Calcutta Polo Club, 9, Clive Street, Calcutta.

C. T. C. AND C. P. C. SPECIAL GRANTS.

The Calcutta Turf Club has kindly voted the following grants to the Calcutta Polo Club, viz., Rs. 500 towards the expenses of every competing Team, which has to travel from a station, which is distant 500 miles, or more, from Calcutta.

The Calcutta Polo Club will also make a further similar grant to Teams coming from a distance of over 500 miles, at the rate of Rs. 50, for every completed 100 miles, over that distance. Such grant not to exceed a maximum of Rs. 400 to any one Team.

SPECIAL RAILWAY CONCESSIONS.

Ponies at owner's risk will be charged at 3 annas per horse-box (to carry 6 ponies) per mile for the single journey, and 1½ annas for the return journey, subject to the production of a certificate from the Honorary Secretary of the Calcutta Polo Club, that the Team is entered for the Tournament.

This concession is equivalent to a single fare at the rate of 4½ annas per horse-box per mile for the double journey.

The following Railways have very kindly agreed to grant the above concessions:—East Indian Railway, Eastern Bengal State Railway, Bengal-Nagpur Railway, Great Indian Peninsula Railway, Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway, North Western Railway. The Railway Companies are also being approached with a view to accelerating the journey for the ponies of Teams coming to compete from long distances.

ACCOMMODATION.

Stable accommodation for ponies will be provided for all 1st and 2nd entry Teams entering from outside Calcutta free of charge. But as this will entail a considerable amount of arranging, notice of the number of ponies for which accommodation is required, must be sent in to the Honorary Secretary:—

(a) In the case of 1st entries by the end of November.

(b) In the case of 2nd entries such notice must accompany the entry, otherwise the C. P. C. Committee cannot bind themselves to undertake the provision of the necessary stabling.

(c) In the case of Final Entries, stable accommodation cannot possibly be guaranteed, but the Committee will do their best to make similar arrangements in the case of such entries also.

The Committee of the Calcutta Polo Club will do their best to arrange for the personal accommodation of any members of competing teams who do not otherwise intend to make such arrangements for themselves. The Committee trust that those desirous of being so provided for, will try to give as early notice as possible, at any rate either on or before Monday, the 16th December.

NOTE.

Rule XV.—Inter-Regimental Rules.

The Committee of the Inter-Regimental Tournament have very kindly given special permission for the postponement of the date, by which lists of ponies intended to be played by Teams entering for the Inter-Regimental have to be sent in, and it will, therefore, on this occasion again, be permissible to forward these lists immediately after the termination of the Calcutta Tournament, instead of by 1st January, as under the Rule.

CECIL GRAHAM,
Honorary Secretary,
CALCUTTA POLO CLUB.

POONA GYMKHANA vs. BOMBAY ISLAM GYMKHANA.—This two days' match ended on Saturday in a draw, time saving the Poona team from a defeat. Poona batted first and were all out for 143, Haughton's 74 being the only notable feature. The Islamites replied with 362. S. M. Khan 76, Shaik Mahomed 53, Abdul Aziz 42 all batting well; most of the others added useful scores and "Mr. Extras" contributed 48. The Islamites took things rather slackly in the Poona second innings and the batting side put up 288, Gore Brown played a fine innings of 122 and was well backed up by Arthur 81. The Bombay team scored 61 for two wickets when time was called, being only 9 runs short of victory. Scores:—

Football.

THE DIVISIONAL TOURNAMENT, POONA.

THE Divisional Football Tournament opened at Poona on the 2nd instant when the Royal Dublin Fusiliers from Ahmednagar met the Royal Warwicks from Bombay. The latter had just won the Harris Cup tournament and were looked upon as likely winners of this encounter but the Fusiliers were always their match. The first half was very evenly contested and ended without score. The play in the second period was again very level. Both goals were visited and each side credited with corners but it was not till shortly before time that the Fusiliers managed to get through and score. The Warwicks were unable to respond and retired beaten by a goal to nil. On the 3rd instant the Loyal North Lancs met the Norfolks from Belgaum, a fair game being witnessed. The Lancs pressed at the start and lost chances of scoring and then the Norfolks missed a good opportunity. The North Lancs were back again shortly after and opened their account. The Norfolks nothing daunted assumed the offensive but were driven back and the Lancs added to their score before the interval. On changing ends the North Lancs did all the attacking and, after several lost chances and erratic shooting, managed to put on a third goal. Their opponents strove hard to get through but the Lancs kept them out and thus won by three goals to nil.

The first of the semi-finals between the R. F. A. from Kirkee and the Dublin Fusiliers took place on the 4th instant and a really good game was witnessed. The Fusiliers did not show as good form as they did against the Warwicks, and the gunners had the best of the first half but neither team scored. On crossing over the gunners attacked vigorously and eventually netted the ball. They missed an easy chance soon after and then the Fusiliers took up the offensive but, despite all their efforts, they were unable to get on terms and were beaten by a goal to nil. Last Thursday the Dorsets played the Loyal North Lancs and put up a fast game. The Lancs went away at the start and opened the scoring. They were then called upon to defend and the Dorsets gave them a warm time. They were unable to get through however, and play became up and down for a spell and the interval arrived with the Lancs a goal ahead. Play was very level on resuming till at length the Dorsets got away and equalised. Exciting play followed. The Lancs were awarded a penalty kick which the Dorsets' custodian cleared, but the Lancs got the ball again and hinged it into the net. The Dorsets tried all they knew to score once more but without success and they had to admit defeat by 2 goals to one.

The final, between the Royal North Lancs and the 10th R. G. A. was played on Monday the 9th instant. The first half was very evenly contested and neither team had gained any material advantage when the interval arrived. On crossing over however, the Lancs had all the best of the play. They attacked vigorously and opened their account from a penalty kick. They followed this up by netting the ball on two more occasions and though the gunners had a penalty kick awarded them they were unable to score and were thus beaten by 3 goals to nil. The Cup was presented to the North Lancs team after the match by Lady Barrett, General Barrett making a short congratulatory speech.

BOMBAY RUGBY TOURNAMENT

MADRAS vs. BOMBAY.—This, the only game of the first round, was played on Tuesday evening, the 3rd instant, resulting in a win for Madras by 6 points to 3 after a hard struggle. The Bombay forwards had the most of the game but the local team were beaten behind the scrum. Bombay pressed at the start and were given a free kick for feet up. The angle was a difficult one and the place kick failed. Madras then took the ball into their opponent's territory and after a nice bit of combined play Henderson scored in the corner. The attempt to majorise by Knox was unsuccessful: midfield play till Madras were awarded a free kick, Knox's effort hitting one of the posts. Exciting play in the Bombay 25 followed—another free kick to Madras failed and the Bombay defence was well tried. They cleared eventually and play was transferred to the Madras line. Here Bombay were nearly over on more than one occasion but Smith relieved ultimately and play ru'ed up and down. Knox was next prominent for a fine dribble which enabled Morgan to get over with another try, Moir failing to convert. Bombay forwards had most of the succeeding play but their halves were smothered and the interval arrived with 2 tries in favour of the visitors. On changing ends Madras were pulled up for offside on several occasions and Bombay did most of the pressing. Hamilton and Walker were conspicuous for good runs but the Madras defence kept them out. Onslow next put in a fine run but was pulled down by Morgan. Bombay kept up the pressure and May finding touch well in the visitor's 25 gave them a chance. Hamilton got possession from the throw in and got over with a try. McMillan's kick was charged down by Knox. An attempt to drop a goal by May fell short and play returned to midfield. Towards the finish Walker and Onslow put in a good run but were stopped and the game ended with the score: Madras 2 tries (6 pts.) Bombay 1 try (3 pts.) Teams:—

BOMBAY.—May, back: Onslow, Walker, Hamilton and Parsow, three-quarters; Marsh and Killby, half-backs; McMillan (capt.), Dangal, Inder, Scott, Brady, Rice, Geddis and Kemp, forwards.

MADRAS.—Wright, back; Blackwood, Henderson, Morgan and Poxon, three-quarters; Smith and Knox, halves; Moir (capt.), Alexander, Creek, Charles, Chudleigh, Goffe, Darley and Simpson, forwards.

Referee:—Mr. Chard.

WEST RIDINGS vs. ROYAL IRISH RIFLES.—This match was played on the 3rd instant and a good game was expected. The Irish Rifles had recently won the Cup at Rangoon and were looked to to put up a good show but the cup holders early had their measure and beat them comfortably by 42 pts. to nil. Give and take play at the start till Rowe got possession and scored a try. The kick was from a different angle and failed. The Irish then pressed but were driven back and the West Ridings attacked. Two attempts to drop goals were unsuccessful and then Rowe got over with another try which was unconverted. Continuing the pressure, Bootlands got over near the posts and the extra points were added. The Irish were kept penned in their 25 and despite their efforts the Dukes got over with three more tries before the interval, Rowe, Turner and Bootlands being responsible. None of these were improved upon and half time arrived with the score 1 goal 5 tries (20 pts.) to nil in favour of the West Ridings. Changing over the West Ridings kept up offensive tactics and it was not long before they crossed the line again. The place kick failed but another try followed soon after and to this the major points were added. Turner was next conspicuous for a good run which ended in his getting over with a try. Then a fine combined run by the Dukes threes resulted in Rowe scoring. The kick failed in both these instances but after an attempt by Taylor to drop a goal had fallen short the Ridings crossed the Irish line yet again and the extra points were added. Just before time they registered another unconverted try and thus won by 5 goals and 9 tries (42 pts.) to nil. Teams:—

WEST RIDINGS.—Dennison, back; Rowe, Turner, Firth and Laycock, three-quarters; Memery and Allison, half-backs; Lt. Kidd, Lister, Shaw, Bootland, Hirst, Dodson, Widdop and Henderson, forwards.

IRISH RIFLES.—Dillan, back; Hall, Lt. Ludlow, Hewett and Rodwell, three-quarters; Millar and Vernon Woods, half-backs; Lt. Gavin (capt.), Tobin Sims, O'Brien, Shanks, Vine, Nesbitt and Woods, forwards.

Referee:—Mr. Chard.

MADRAS vs. CALCUTTA.—Played on Thursday last. Calcutta had not sent over their best team but the XV. gave a very good account of themselves and were ultimately beaten by a single try. At the start Madras got away and Moir almost scored. Play then settled down and the Calcutta forwards proved themselves the superior pack. The Madras backs could not get away and it was some time before Smith ran through and transferred to Alexander but the latter was grassed and the line cleared. Calcutta were then prominent and had bad luck in not scoring on two occasions at least in the first half. Play was in the Madras 25 on resuming but at length Henderson relieved and then Smith got away, passed to Knox who got over with a try. The place kick failed. Knox was prominent again shortly after but the Calcutta backs got the ball away. Play was very evenly contested for a spell and then Calcutta worked the ball into the opposing 25 but could not get over. Madras cleared and invaded the Calcutta end but lost chances of scoring. Time was called with the score Madras 1 try (3 pts.) Calcutta nil. Teams:—

CALCUTTA GYMKHANA.—Bocquet, back; Lilley, Lecky, Durnford and Dods, three-quarters; Scott, Brown and Wilson, half-backs; Green, Armytage, Rooms, Pocker, Johnston, Murray, Pargeter, Macpherson and Dempster, forwards.

MADRAS GYMKHANA.—Wight, back; Rowsell, Henderson, Morgan and Blackwood, three-quarters; Smith and Knox, half-backs; Moir, Chudleigh, Goffe, Simpson, Darley, Creeke, Stuart and Alexander, forwards.

Referee:—Mr. Chard.

FINAL.

THE final was played on Saturday last. The West Ridings who had held the cup since 1907 were expected to win again this year and their defeat by 10 points to 3 came as a big surprise. The game was vigorously contested from start to finish and was generally regarded as the most exciting match witnessed in Bombay for many years. Play was very level throughout the first half and the teams crossed over without any score. On resuming the soldiers got over with a try through Laycock and this remained unconverted. They continued the pressure for a spell but Madras relieved and Henderson, Morgan and Purves put in some fine combined work. Purves, the old Scottish International, running in to score between the posts, Knox majorised. The military made desperate efforts to score and Madras were called upon to defend. The soldiers showed better combination and their third line was superior but the Madras halves and back were equal to all emergencies and their forwards did good work in the loose. Just before time Morgan dribbled the ball down and scored, Knox again adding the extra points. The Dukes played strenuously till time was piped and Madras ran out winners by 2 goals (10 points) to a try 3 points. Teams as before. In addition to the Challenge Cup the winners received a handsome trophy presented by Mr. Marshall Reid, C.I.E., who used to play full back for the Bombay Gymkhana in years gone by. This trophy was won outright.

Dynamo Car Lighting.

The first to introduce electric lamps for cars we are again the first to introduce a system of dynamo car lighting which is at once the most thoroughly practical and economical proposition yet placed on the market.

The bugbears of previous systems are conspicuous by their absence The important improvements have been the means of attaining a considerable increase in efficiency and reliability A striking feature that compels admiration is the extreme simplicity that dominates the whole system

Altogether the system is a triumph of British Engineering skill and workmanship

MOTOR MEMS.

LONDON, Friday, 23rd August, 1912.

ON all hands there is evidence that very serious efforts will be made in the near future to displace petrol from the almost exclusive position it has attained as the fuel for the propulsion of motor vehicles of both the pleasure and industrial types. The steady advance that has taken place during the past twelve months in the price of spirit—an advance which in many quarters is held not to be due to the usual cause of supply and demand, but to the action of a trust—has undoubtedly led to more attention being paid to other forms of fuel. In this connection we may refer to the tests with benzol which have lately been carried out in Germany by Prince Henry of Prussia, while the new paraffin carburettors that are making their appearance on the market are further evidence of the efforts that are being made to relieve motorists of the incubus of the uncontrollably increasing cost of petrol.

IT is very hard to please the general public in the matter of horn blowing. If an accident occurs, the very first charge made against the motorist is—"You did not blow your horn." On the other hand, what is called "incessant horn-blowing," is complained of constantly in letters to the daily press. Again the quality of the horn is another subject for criticism—one man grumbles because the sound is harsh and discordant; another because it is not sufficiently arresting. Perhaps the most amusing letter on this question was one which appeared not long ago in an English daily, from the pen of a person of evidently ultra-aesthetic tastes. He resides, he says, in a town "which tries to bear the hall-mark of refinement" and naturally, in such a town the motor cars "that dash along its magnificent boulevard" and "give vent to such infernal noises that make one think its civilization can be only skin-deep" afflict its inhabitants. He puts in a plea for "the quiet, unobtrusive warnings of the motors in Brussels and Paris." "In Brussels," he says, "it is a rich bass note, which makes one feel for the moment that a Liszt rhapsody has just commenced. In Paris there are generally two short low notes, very reminiscent of the demon's 'Ha! ha!' in Elgar's 'Gerontius.' The question is, would one prefer to die to the accompaniment of a Liszt rhapsody (for assuredly one would linger to hear its continuance) or to the demons' "Ha! ha!" Of the two we should prefer the former, as attaching a nicer significance to our introduction to the next world. But, after all, most of us desire to live out our days. To which end the "pig-killing shrieks" which the writer terms the English method of warning, is more conducive.

FOR some time past—in fact since the higher taxes on motor-cars came into force—there has been a general feeling prevalent in favour of cars of moderate horse-power, say, from 12 to 15-h.p., and perhaps to 20-h.p. To a large extent this tendency has also been fostered by the much higher service cars of this type are now capable of performing as compared with a few years ago. Although most manufacturers report that the bulk of the demand is for cars which fall in the class above-outlined we are led, as the result of a letter just to hand from Mr. Chas. Jarrott, to put the question which heads this note. Mr. Jarrott writes:—"It is somewhat interesting to notice that, whereas last year there was a tendency on the part of most users to select cars of a low horse-power, this year there has been a distinct preference for cars of a more powerful type. It has been generally recognised by the buying public that in cases where covered-in carriage bodies are fitted, a margin of power is desirable, hence we have found that even for town work the demand has been for cars of upwards of 20-h.p. As illustrating this, we may mention that the total horse-power of 103 cars ordered from us since 1st January amounted to 2,315-h.p., which makes an average per car of over 22-h.p. In view of the fact that we are dealing with every make and size of chassis, this average is a somewhat interesting one."

Everyone seems to travel by car nowadays; so much so, indeed, that it is little wonder the railways complain that the coming of the motor car has worked a great deal of harm to the first-class traffic. It is simply a case of the survival of the fittest. The modern car is fully the equal of the railway train so far as reliability is concerned, and except in the case of the very long distance journeys it is nearly as fast—in point of fact, indeed, when it is a question of time from door to door, the car probably scores even in the matter of speed, while as to the relative convenience of the two methods of travel the balance is all in favour of the car. Taking that as the correct point of view, there is little to wonder at in the rapidly increasing vogue of the car. A point that seems to emphasise this is the undoubted decrease in what may be called motoring for pure pleasure. By that we mean the sort of motoring which was indulged in in the earlier days of the movement, when the car was used simply and solely to minister to the pleasure of its owner, and with very little more object in view than what was euphemistically called "a run in the car"—a run which too often ended in a crawl, even if it did not eventuate into an absolute breakdown by the wayside. All that is altered nowadays, and there is very little of this aimless motoring done. Probably ninety-five in a hundred of the cars we meet so thickly on the roads during the week-end were bound on some definite mission, and were being used in preference to the less convenient railway transport. Motoring, in a word, has arrived at a utilitarian stage—which means solidly established vogue, with indefinite scope for future expansion along the right lines. It may be that we are but setting down the obvious in saying this, but even impressions of the obvious are sometimes worth recording, if only because it is often the things which are most apparent that are often missed.

A motorist records in the Motor News how he recently avoided the necessity of making a roadside repair. He had a broken petrol union not far from home, and it was in an inconvenient position beneath the carburettor. To avoid delay, he removed the float and the levers actuating the needle valve. The needle valve was then put in place so as to close the entry to the carburettor, and the float chamber filled a little more than half full with petrol, the lid replaced, and the engine started up. By this means he reached home without refilling.

If the face of a valve, either inlet or exhaust, is found to be good or a tight fit it is seldom that inspection goes farther. Valve spindles and guides may, however, be responsible for trouble, such as erratic running, particularly at slow speeds. We all know that the word mixture means nearly everything that appertains to the carburettor and its surroundings. The proportions of spirit and air may, however, easily be upset if, from wear, the valve stems are reduced or the space between the guides enlarged, as a small amount of air admitted at this point is quite sufficient to disarrange the proper proportions. When this takes place the action of the throttle is rendered uncertain, the engine speeding up one moment and dragging the next. Unpleasant as this is in the open country, it becomes dangerous in traffic, practically amounting to having an uncontrolled accelerator.

A few words as to the care and consideration of the tyres they carry may be interesting, for it is here that undue cost of upkeep oftentimes takes place. The remark is not uncommonly heard that spare covers and tubes do not run the useful mileage that the ones previously on the car had done. This cannot be wondered at when the following factors are so constantly ignored. Extreme variations of temperature, moisture of any kind, particularly oil, are detrimental to both rubber and canvas, and yet how often one sees a cover being carried on the side of the car without any covering, and exposed to the keen draughts or sun's rays, or stowed away on the top of a covered body, where on a hot day, or at night even in summer, it is subjected to extremes of heat and cold which are bad for the materials of which it is made up. No tyre should be carried unless protected from all the elements named; a canvas or leather covering is good, white in colour for preference, as black attracts and holds the heat, and when the car is at rest the contents of the case get very hot.

Recently some of the London papers have published facts and figures with regard to the invasion of this country by the cheap American motor-car. It is now evident that some concerted action must be taken, and taken at once, by British manufacturers to stem this invasion and save a great and profitable industry, which offers a wealth of wages to the British working man.

The only way to recapture the huge trade in this class of car is for a firm of manufacturers or a number of firms to concentrate on the cheap car and turn it out in such quantities that it will pay.

There is not a shadow of doubt that if a British car could be bought for the same price it would have the preference with the public.

The enormous scale on which the cheap American cars have been dumped into this country is best shown by the experience of a writer, who, while motoring to Carlisle from London, passed an unusual number of cars, and, as he wrote, "two out of three were cheap American cars."

British manufacturers did not recognise the fact that there was a demand for cheap cars in England. American manufacturers did. Three years ago at the Motor Show at Olympia an American car was exhibited which was the very thing for the man of small means. It would hold five people, and it was nearly a hundred pounds cheaper than the cheapest British car of the same power and the same seating capacity. Then the rush began, and British manufacturers became frightened. The vast markets of the United States barred to them by high tariffs and uncertain of the fact that there was sufficient demand over here to warrant them turning out cheap cars, they waited, and to-day America has captured the cheap market.

A DOG TAX FOR CALCUTTA.

Last week a correspondent wrote to some of the local papers advocating a dog tax in Calcutta and a copy of this letter has since been sent to us, which we publish below:—

To the Editor of the "Indian Field."

Sir,—The latest account of a rabid dog running amok in Calcutta is surely sufficient to make the authorities begin to realize that it is their duty to take measures to deal with "rabies." The authorities in England took the matter seriously in hand some years ago with the result that a case of rabies is now almost unheard of at Home.

I will admit that it will be a far more difficult matter to achieve here what has been done in England, but that is no reason why some measures should not be taken to at any rate minimise if not stamp out rabies in Calcutta. As far as I am aware, the Municipality have made no attempt to deal with the matter and the police, I believe, have never made any serious attempt to eradicate from the streets the hundreds of ownerless diseased dogs which wander about the city and are a source of great danger to the public. It is true that periodically an advertisement appears in the daily papers to the effect that "stray dogs will be destroyed," but day after day at the same time as the advertisement is appearing the same diseased dogs can be seen at their same haunts. Is it that the advertisement is inserted under some red-tape rule for formality's sake, or is it that the pariah dogs not know a stray or diseased dog when he sees one? It is also true that occasionally poisoned meat is thrown indiscriminately in public thoroughfare with the result that it is more usually picked up by a well-cared for dog than by the pariah.

In England an owner of a dog over six months old has to take out a license costing 7s. 6d. for the said dog, and the result is that there is no such thing as an ownerless stray dog at Home. Is it not possible for the authorities here to do something on the same lines? If a tax is levied on dogs, I am sure owners will be as much pleased as non-lovers of dogs. There is a certain percentage (perhaps small) of natives who keep and care for their dogs and upon whom a tax equal to 7s. 6d. would probably be a great hardship. In order therefore not to discourage these individuals, I would suggest that a tax of, say, Re. 1 or Rs. 2 per dog be levied. The authorities should register the dog with a certain number, and a metal disc bearing this number should be given to the owner to be attached to the dog's collar. Any dog found without a collar and metal disc attached should be impounded, and if the dog is not claimed after a certain fixed period, the animal should be disposed of in the most suitable manner.

There is no doubt that a tax on dogs would be a means of ridding the city of a great number of animals which at present are not only a nuisance but a great danger to the public.—Yours, etc.,

I. G. T.

We are heartily in accord with the suggestions put forward by our correspondent, which to our mind appear to meet the situation. A small tax, should be levied and a metal disc to be attached to the dog's collar would speedily be the means of determining ownerless dogs. We believe a dog tax has been advocated for years for the Calcutta Kennel Club. In the absence of a similar institution to the Battersea Dogs' Home all stray dogs should, instead of becoming occupants of some out of the way police pound, be conveyed to the S.P.C.A. hospital or the Veterinary Institute at Belgatchia there under proper supervision to await for a period the arrival of their masters, failing which to become subjects for the lethal chamber. And this brings us to another point—where is our proper lethal chamber for the destruction of animals? The present methods of strychnine and lead poisoning are barbarous in the extreme and a disgrace to the city. We remember once on our way to office, and not half a mile from Clive Street, coming upon a European police sergeant with an attendant satellite bearing a basket of gobbets of meat—both intently watching a diseased mongrel staggering about the roadway. On enquiry we were told that "E'd 'ad 'is bit" which elucidated meant that the miserable brute had absorbed one of the poisoned pieces of meat and they were awaiting his death. Later in the day passing down the same thoroughfare we observed this pariah and several others lying stiff and stark in the drain awaiting the ministrations of the conservancy dom. Evidently the limb of the law had had a successful morning. Apart from sanitary considerations a way from dead dog encumbering the roadway is at no time a pleasant sight; surely it is possible to catch and remove pariahs or strays in some kind of conveyance to an appointed place and there destroy them away from the public eye.

The Calcutta police we are told are making special arrangements to deal with the question of stray dogs. On the ancient plan of shutting the stable door after the steed has escaped the Police are always very busy for a short time after one or two dogs have run amok and provided several cases for the Pasteur treatment at Kasauli. And what do their usually misdirected efforts amount to? The employment of the old, crude and cruel method of food sprinkled with strychnine and the institution of a species of Bartholomew's Eve on two days in the month. And what of those animals which escape these dies irae and have 28 days at their disposal wherein to develop hydrophobia and rush about the city biting other dogs and probably some human beings?

All this unsatisfactory state of affairs we feel sure will be avoided by a dog tax and the establishment of a proper locus where waifs and strays may be detained and destroyed if not claimed. We are certain all dog owners would have no objection to a tax did they understand that it would protect their valuable animals and lead to the destruction of the "pie" and the ultimate elimination of rabies.

THE TEST OF COURAGE.

I have seen the tiger springing
In a terrifying curve,
I have felt the python clinging
And never lost my nerve.
I've checked the charging elephant
With bullets in his brow,
And only murmured, "Well, if Aunt
Could only see me now."
But prove your boasted bravery,
And put it past a doubt,
By bicycling down Bond Street
When the taxi-cabs are out!

I've faced the fretful porcupine
And dodged his poisoned quill,
And thought, "If for a lark you pine,
This seems to fill the bill."
I've sailed the South Pacific
In a swift Peruvian bark,
They tell me I'm terrific
When I am fighting with a shark.
But to win the badge of bravery,
And all your foes to flout,
Go bicycle down Bond Street
When the taxi-cabs are out!

I've seen the hippopotamus
Rise swiftly at a fly,
And, cool as if I'd caught a mouse,
I've yanked him high and dry.
I've seen a herd of buffaloes
Come charging down on me,
And greeted them with gruff hallos!
That made them turn and flee.
But if about your bravery
There should be any doubt,
Go bicycle down Bond Street
When the taxi-cabs are out.

For motor 'buses meet you
With their gramophonic hoots,
And motor cycles treat you
To their polyphonic toots.
It's a narrow not a wide street,
And you've but yourself to thank
When out of every side street
Taxis take you in the flank.
So when some dauntless warrior
Is swaggering about,
Go hike with him down Bond Street
When the taxi-cabs are out!

UNTAMEABLE GOLF.

For some months past the Rules Committee of the St. Andrew's Club have been debating certain alterations in the rules of the game and during the last week of July the Committee handed in their proposals. We have been awaiting these proposals with some interest, for the difficulties the appointed authority was called upon to solve were not of a nature that lent themselves to the operation of rigid rule bondage. Golf is a game that stands alone in the wealth and variety of conundra it presents to the would-be maker of rules; wherein to no small extent lies its charm. There is a breadth and freedom about it which defies restraint by hard and fast regulation: for cricket, football, polo, lawn tennis—for games that are played under conditions precisely the same everywhere so far as size and nature of ground are concerned uniform rules are applicable; grounds and courts vary only in degrees of merit, but the rules that apply to the game played on the best apply equally to the game played on the worst. The peculiar position of golf in this regard was long ago recognised by the lawgivers who have allowed much latitude to "local rule." In the old days—in the days when the game was played on links and nowhere else, when the term "golf course" had not been invented because the thing itself was unknown, the rules were few and simple; probably no game requiring so much skill and establishing such hold upon the affections of its votaries was ever less trammelled by rule and law; the rules, for by far the most part dealt with actual play, for the conditions under which the game was carried on made limitations such as have been made essential under modern conditions unnecessary. We are tempted to these reflections by the fact that the recommendations made by the Rules Committee deal principally with those difficulties which have grown out of the artificial character of modern golf. "Lost ball" was always a present possibility, but "out of bounds" was a condition of affairs unknown; and it is with this tragedy that the Committee deal at considerable length. The existing rule prescribes loss of distance as the penalty for striking the ball out of bounds and this has been regarded by most as a penalty at once sufficient and appropriate: when, playing on links, the striker bungled his shot and laid his ball well off the true line to the next hole he paid for his shortcoming by the enhanced difficulty of reaching the green; he could not be penalised for going out of bounds when there were no bounds; there was nothing to prevent him from playing all round the parish if it seemed good to him; and when the game came to be played upon a "course" as distinguished from its natural habitat, the appropriate penalty, if any were required at all, was obviously a colourable substitute for that which his own lack of skill imposed upon him on the links. The Committee suggest that this punishment is inadequate, and propose a penalty of stroke and distance, tempering the recommendation with the remark that it appears impossible to obtain agreement of golfing opinion on the subject of a suitable penalty for going out of bounds. Which is exactly what might have been expected: it needs no very extensive acquaintance with golf "courses" to be able to realise their wide dissimilarity; with the best will in the world the rule-of-thumbist can never succeed in reducing all golf "courses" to that dead level of likeness which should render all equally governable by the same rule. Golf is the domestic cat among games; it declines to conform to authority beyond a point at once well defined and hazy; and this has been realised by the Rules Committee which takes judicious refuge in the corollary that its recommendation of the out-of-bounds penalty shall be modified, or may be modified, by local rule. Local rule, indeed, is the Mesopotamia of the lawgivers of modern golf. "Here is a game," they say in effect, "which is played all over the country on every conceivable sort of course; you ask us to say how a player is to be penalised for whacking his ball off the course. In one case he may find himself in long grass on ground level with the course; in another he may find it fifty yards down a chalk-pit; in a third he may have to argue with a laundress before he gains access to her backyard and retrieve his ball from the washing; how can we devise one penalty to meet all the thousand and one cases which must arise when you play the game on a "course" when that is an artificial state of play?" Small blame to diversity of opinion! and all credit to the decision that it is a thing to be settled by local rule. The charm of the game is its rich variety—one of its charms, at all events—and it is fresh proof of the merit of the game, were fresh proof required, that the Rules Committee should find themself unable to devise one rule they can even pretend will meet all cases.

They find themselves in the same case when endeavouring to deal with hazards. We sympathise with them in their decision to leave "rushes" to be dealt with by the local authority, because "rushes" are hard to define. There are rushes and rushes; also rushes ad infinitum; it was heroic to face the question of rushes at all, but we respectfully submit that it was not wise. The prevalence of this form of plant life and its diversity offers a striking example of the hopelessness of trying to grind down golf to a "pale unanimity" and we confess our inability to understand way the attempt should be made. There is a touch of despair in the decision to leave rushes to the local authority, "like trees, hedges, fixed seats, fences, gates, railway, and walls." But it is all to the greatness and glory of the game. Cat-like it goes its own way defying the rule-maker, refusing to be reduced to the bonds of a general code: the Genius of Golf must have enjoyed the spectacle of these conscientious gentlemen seeking means to standardise the conditions of play by application of uniform penalty; even when artificialised, when cabined, cribbed and confined on a "course," the game is not to be squeezed into a common mould; its freedom remains uncontrollable, each difficulty to be dealt with as the exact circumstances demand, as it were a bunkered ball.

The Rules Committee, we observe, make one attempt to elevate the moral standard of the player. The following addition to Rule 4 is recommended: a player is, at any time during the play of a hole, entitled to ascertain from his opponent the number of strokes the latter has played; if the opponent gives wrong information as to the number of strokes he has played he shall lose the hole, unless he correct his mistake before the player has played another stroke. This is as it should be; we are all of us liable to temptation.

It remains to see how the Royal and Ancient Club will regard the recommendations thus offered for their consideration. They do not meet until this month, so there is ample time for the members to think over the ideas of the Rules Committee, and weigh them by the light of experience gained during the summer holidays, when golfers seek fresh greens and courses new. The wider a player's knowledge of golf and golf grounds—we use the word to cover links as well as artificial grounds—the more clearly must he realise that the game is not one to be standardised by rule. Before that can be done it would be necessary to standardise courses and reduce them to the dead level of the cricket ground. Which is absurd.

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

The result of the St. Leger and the ignominious defeat of Lomond yet once again emphasises the oft-quoted saying that on the turf there is nothing so uncertain as a certainty. If we judged this horse's chances by the way in which he was backed for the big race it was one of the best things of the year, for he had been a warm favourite at very short odds for the better part of two months before the contest and trained by so astute a man as R. Wootton, it seemed improbable that he was being over-rated. Yet this is obviously what has happened, for not only has he been beaten but he has been disgraced, never making any semblance of a fight for it and cracking up almost as badly as he did when Wootton sent him out a supposed certainty for the Newmarket Stakes earlier in the season. In the last mentioned race there was a valid excuse for his defeat as it was subsequently announced that he was found, after the race, to be suffering from badly cracked heels and from inflammation behind the knee-joints: but there would seem to have been small excuse for Wootton's confidence as things like these must have been apparent before the horse went on to the course at all. However, there was this valid cause for his defeat and it would have been surprising if, under the circumstances, Lomond had finished anywhere but dead last. So far as the Leger is concerned there is no such excuse to be pleaded and there would seem to be small warrant for the confidence that his trainer has all along displayed. The public, however, were not unjustified in supposing that the "man at the wheel" knew more about things than anyone else, and when the stable came in and backed Lomond as heavily as they did it was only natural that everyone thought that they must know something, and that the race was a better thing for Lomond than his public performances made it out to be. These certainly were inferior, but if they satisfied Wootton they were taken to be good enough for that confiding person the Man in the Street. When we come down to the cold facts the horse was such a raging hot favourite because Wootton had practically told the world he could not get beaten. The public form was only very ordinary and was confined to two one mile and a quarter contests, in which Lomond was not meeting the best of the form, and on one occasion when he met the runner-up for the Derby, Jaeger, this horse had had an accident on the way to the post and was never able to gallop in the race thereafter, on another occasion he got beaten in the Brighton Cup by Etheric, a horse certainly not first-class, and when he won the St. James' Stakes at Kempton, he was followed home by White Star, a non-stayer, and St. Edgar, who is of no particular importance. None of these performances constituted a sound Leger gallop in public, and it must therefore have been upon the reports of what Lomond had done on his home trials that he was boomed to the top of the market and kept there throughout the piece. The Wootton luck is certainly not in: Lomond has let the stable down badly twice: Shogun, who was well backed, was beaten for the Champagne Stakes: Frank Wootton has broken or dislocated his collar bone falling off a motor bike; Stanley Wootton has been put down for alleged foul riding on a horse that has been subsequently acknowledged to be bad to ride, and R. Wootton says that the Stewards of the Jockey Club are out to "down" him and that he will sell all his horses and quit the blessed British Isles for his own land. In this connection it would seem as though all the telegrams concerning who rode Lomond in the Leger must be wrong, unless Frank Wootton made a most wonderful recovery from his broken collar-bone. He met with his accident at the end of August and the Leger was run on the 11th September. A collar-bone as a rule takes a bit longer than a fortnight to mend, and either the account of the crack jockey's accident was incorrect or this telegram saying that he rode Lomond is incorrect. It is also impossible that S. Wootton can have ridden the horse as the Stewards of the York Meeting had put him down over his riding of Fairy King at that meeting. Of F. Wootton's accident there seems to be no doubt, and the only conclusion therefore is that the telegram announcing it over-stated the case for he could hardly get up with a broken bone and ride a heavily backed favourite in an important race like the Leger.

MahER also can hardly be said to be in luck, for at the last minute he was claimed for Lord Rosebery's filly Charmian, he having up till then been booked to ride Tracery. Bellhouse, who rides more in France than he does in England, was brought over for Mr. August Belmont's colt and had the satisfaction of riding his first classic winner on the English side of the Channel. Although the three-year-old form this year is very uneven and they are voted a poor lot all round, Tracery has run well up to his Epsom performance when he finished third to Tagalie and Jaeger: but of the majority of the rest it is impossible to speak well. Sweeper II., the Two Thousand winner, was after that race boomed for the Derby, but proved conclusively that he could not stay and was one of the earliest beaten: Tagalie won the One Thousand brilliantly, she had a good one in Cylgad in front of her in the Newmarket Stakes: romped away with the Derby and was never any more use at all! Pintadeau ran promisingly at Epsom (fourth in the Derby) and if he had made any ordinary improvement, such as he was reported to have done, he should have been with Tracery in the Leger: instead of which he is down the course. White Star, Lomond, Catmint all have proved deceivers and we think it may be therefore said that it has been a year in which no good horse can be said to have established himself. Tracery won his race anyhow after leading all the way, but it is not possible to say that he had a cohort of champions behind him, for it is doubtful whether there was a single really good classic horse amongst the whole fleet of them, certainty nothing within measureable distance of the champions of recent years, such as Swynford, Lemberg, Bayardo, Bronzino, Prince Palatine, or even Sunstar, who never by the same token had the opportunity of being put to the test in the last of the great classics.

We hear from Poona that there is an alarming epidemic of fever amongst the horses. Socialist has died of it: Last Call is not in good case, and Mr. Craig McKerrow's new importation, Little Slave, is also amongst the victims.

We regret to learn of the death of the 14-1 Australian pony Etna, by Eton out of Irma, the property of Mr. B. N. Burjorjee. Etna ran twice on Saturday last at the Calcutta Monsoon Meeting and dropped down dead in her box after going home. She was not a very lucky mare on the flat and had not won for two seasons, her last victory having been the Innovation Handicap at Calcutta in season 1910-11.

Both Reuben and the English horse Keenadan came in lame on Saturday last at the Calcutta Monsoon Meeting, the going having been very hard indeed.

The third day of the Calcutta Second Monsoon Meeting was run on a very hard course and in exceptionally trying weather, the heat being intense and the atmosphere stagnant to a degree. "Sweet September" in Calcutta is a month in which any form of exercise is attended with considerable discomfort, but at the race-course we probably find a less protected spot than any in Calcutta. There is not a vestige of shade and there is never any breeze, or if there is the big range of three stands very effectually prevents it from finding its way into the spot where it is most wanted. In a long experience of autumn racing in Calcutta we do not remember having experienced a more trying day than Saturday last. The long break in the rains had rendered the courses extremely hard and it would have been a very good plan if the sand track had been watered. The water is laid on all-round the course but it is always very sparingly used and even in the cold weather when our closely-shaven course needs moisture badly, the available appliances to soften it are not used as they might be. If the sand track had been copiously watered over night for last Saturday's racing it would have been of very considerable advantage. The hurdle courses were hard and dusty and resulted in two animals breaking down. Keenadan and Reuben were very lame when they came in and jarred themselve jumping on the cast-iron course. The attendance showed somewhat of a falling-off, but in such weather there is but small encouragement to any but the "regulars" to pursue the great game.

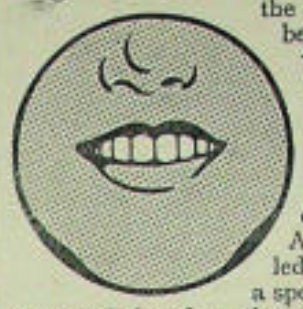
The racing was very good indeed from a spectacular point of view, in that we saw a succession of good finishes, but we doubt whether any punters will be found to concur with us if we said that it was good from any other point of view. The favourites did not by any means in all cases "connect," and in one or two races they cost their supporters a very considerable amount of hardly-earned gold! Disaster commenced with the opening event, the Amateur Hurdle Handicap, for which Fame, on which horse that good cross-country G. R., Mr. "Tybet" Hilliard, had the mount, was booked good-goods. There was an extraordinary good race as the first four were all in a heap at the finish and the outsider Rough Luck (10 to 1), on whom even his own stable had not the proverbial sixpence, won by three-quarters of a length; neck and half a length dividing Peer Ray, Fame and Frank, respectively. The handicapper and the non-betting public shared the enjoyment over this contest. For the Serpentine Hurdle Handicap Herald was justifiably selected to win even though he was in 14lb. worse to Lady Leonard. He got a very bad position at the crucial moment, was blocked at the last turn when he was coming up fast and was unable to get closer than third. He had a rough passage and galloped into the third flight thereby losing a lot of ground. Lady Leonard was well ridden by Williamson who did not lose a yard all the way round and had the inside running, which means a lot on a course of sharp turns like this.

The Amateur Pony Hurdle Handicap did nothing towards mending matters, for the majority of backers accepted the handicapper's tip and backed Winna who started at 7 to 4. Late Night was at twos, and these were virtually the only two backed. Winna, was beaten after she jumped the second last obstacle and could only scramble into third place, Late Night winning by three lengths from Spicy Breezes, who come to the front at the last turn, but was over-hauled by Late Night as they crossed the last obstacle. For the Assaye Plate Etna and May Kenley were the only two backed, the former carrying the bulk of the money, but in a very fine finish May Kenley won a neck, well ridden by J. Davis. The game manner in which the winner fought what looked to be a lost battle did one good to witness. The time, 1min. 3⅘secs., was extremely good for this course, and it has to be borne in mind that May Kenley had a big weight like 10st. 3lb. in the saddle.

The Moderate Selling Handicap witnessed the defeat of another favourite as the "talent" went for the jady Best China and Red Tape was also better backed than the ultimate winner, Politesse, on whom her stable had nothing but a saving wager of something less than the equivalent of a couple of sovereigns each way. She had given them no encouragement to back her and her public and private performances were something less than mediocre. She, however, won a neck from Carnival catching Mr. Das' old mare in the last few strides and winning well ridden by Major Winter.

The last race, the Farewell Plate, was the worst upset of the lot, as Chin Chin and Convent Girl were both backed, but Royal Colours was never at a worse price than 12 to 1 and the runner-up, Winsome, was at twenties and fives a place. Royal Colours won in taking fashion well ridden by Scott's native boy Moosaudin. Details appear elsewhere.

Mr. D. J. Box, the well known horse importer, has just landed a shipment, including thoroughbreds, polo ponies, paper chasers, saddle and harness horses, all thoroughly broken: a visit to his stable should be of interest to intending purchasers.



We would draw the attention of our racing readers to the sale advertisement of some of Mr. T. G. Evers' horses, which appears in our sporting columns.

The second day of the Big Meeting at Poona on the 11th instant provided excellent sport. There was a big attendance which included Their Excellencies the Governor and Lady Clarke. Sir George Clarke evinced great interest in the Totalisator and was shown the working of the machines by Major Greig. Fields were on the small side but the racing up to the usual high standard to remember that of all the duties which we owe to ourselves for health and comfort's sake, the proper care of the teeth is one of the most important.

It will always be well

One should realise—and recent investigations have proved it again and again—that the condition of the teeth has far more influence upon our general well-being than most of us suppose. The protection of the teeth, however, can only be considered as sufficient when the tooth-destroying substances which are the causes of fermentation and decomposition, and which renew themselves in the mouth daily, are also daily destroyed.

As everyone must acknowledge after a little reflection, a special care is needed to keep the mouth free from these harmful substances.

To a certain extent the tooth-brush will be useful for the removal of the impurities from the teeth, but only to a certain extent, as with the brush the surface alone of the teeth can be reached. But as the injurious bacteria are located everywhere—in the mucous membrane of the mouth and especially in the corners and folds where the brush cannot reach—one must use besides the tooth-brush, the liquid and antiseptic dentifrice Odol, which penetrates into the most hidden places of the mouth and destroys all harmful bacteria.

It is in its unique properties that Odol especially excels all other mouth-cleansing preparations. After the mouth has been rinsed with Odol its active antiseptic principle spreads itself with all-pervading effect over the entire oral cavity, the microscopically minute antiseptic element maintaining its influence for hours.

It is this lasting effect, this precious and transcendent quality which no other dentifrice or mouth-wash possesses, that gives to daily users of Odol the absolute assurance that their mouths are permanently protected against the processes of fermentation and decomposition, which, if not guarded against, inevitably destroy the teeth.

The programme opened with the International Plate for which half a dozen went out, an exciting finish between Kiora and Leo Grand ending in a neck victory for the latter, nicely ridden by Brown. Mandeville third three lengths away.

Then came the First Aga Khan's Commemoration Plate in which there were only five starters. Money Gold, Young Japan and Tajilmulook led in turn to the bend where Terror came away and won comfortably by three lengths from Tajilmulook.

The Autumn Plate which figured next brought out a field of nine and provided a big upset. Solution made the running to the turn where Bombastic and Pretty Good Sort came through and fought out an exciting finish, the verdict going to the latter by a head, Southal riding a good race. The Totalisator paid Rs. 850 on Pretty Good Sort.

The Aga Khan's Cup, the big race of the day, came next and Vavasor was most fancied. Mayfowl and Hilarity showed the way to the straight where Vavasor and Gunboat joined Hilarity in the lead. The Apcar horse looked like winning but Southall brought Gunboat along and won on the post by a head, with Hilarity third the same distance away. This was another surprise, but most sportsmen were glad to see Tom Scott put a race to his credit.

The Poona Plate provided Brown's second win of the afternoon, Lumination, on which he had the ride, beating Soultline by a length and a half at level weights.

Only six went out for the Arab Pony Derby, Pendil ridden by Brown leading from start to finish and winning by two lengths from Raspberry who just beat Galiard a head on the post.

The Dealers' Plate with seven starters wound up the card. This proved an easy thing for Abdul Malik who beat Gowahajmer by three lengths, Lookman finishing third. This was Brown's fourth win.

The third day of the Big Meeting at Poona attracted perhaps the largest crowd which has assembled on the course this season. Seven events figured on the programme and in spite of small fields the racing was extremely interesting and some excellent finishes were witnessed. The totalisators were well patronised, the takings at the machines being the largest sum invested so far. Byramjee's stable had a day out, winning five of the seven events, while Brown rode four winners in his usual masterly style.

Proceedings opened with the Poona Grand Annual, for which there were only four starters. Five Crown, though carrying 12st. 12lbs., was well backed, while Mary B. had also a lot of friends. This couple made all the running, but Five Crown was never in trouble and coming away at the last obstacle, won comfortably by a length, Monobel finished third two lengths away, but North was never in it.

The Desert Plate with eight starters was considered a good thing for Lookman and the public gave him all their support. A good many pots were therefore upset when his stable companion, Tajilmulook, came through at the five furlongs and won very easily from the favourite by a length and a half: Shawcutt third two lengths away. The winner was nicely ridden by Robinson and it was cheering to see the veteran jockey score a bracket —it is certainly not out of his turn. Tajilmulook showed better over the mile, for four days before he had been beaten by three lengths by Terror in the 1½ mile Aga Khan Commemoration Plate. The Stewards subsequently held an enquiry into the running of both Tajilmulook and Terror. The explanations of the owners were accepted as satisfactory.

The Eclipse Plate with a field of four was the next item. Hoppner made the pace to the turn where he was done with and Chobham came away to win as he liked by three lengths from Hackler's Girl: who beat Solution by a head. This was Brown's first winning ride of the afternoon.

Eleven went out for the Poona Derby with Regent most in demand. There was a lot of trouble at the post but they were eventually sent off to a fair start. Well Done was the first to show out but at the turn Crown Prince had assumed command and looked like winning: then Regent and Thulfa closed with him and in a splendid finish Brown landed Regent a winner by a neck from Thulfa who beat Crown Prince by a head. This was Regent's fourth win this season. Thulfa was also the subject of a subsequent official enquiry but the Stewards were again satisfied in this case.

Byramjee's stable also carried off the next race, the Aga Shamshudin Plate, with Lumination. Sequent and Paul Pry made the running to the straight where Lumination passed them all and won comfortably by a length: Punt third half a length away.

The Visitors' Plate brought out eleven starters and after The Cellarer had showed them the way to the turn Beckmesser, ridden by Brown, came through to win by four lengths: Metal Boy beating The Cellarer out of second place by a head.

The Wanourie Plate for which seven faced the starter closed the card and provided another excellent finish. Zoolphokar was quickest away but soon gave place to Pendil who brought them along into the straight. Baloz then showed in front for a spell but opposite the stands Abdul Malik came with a rush and won a splendid race by a short head on the post: same between Baloz and Pendil.

There will be a two days, race meeting at Ranchi during the Puja holidays—the 19th and 23rd October. Entries close on the 17th and 21st idem, and all particulars may be had of the Honorary Secretary, Mr. G. T. V. Peppe. The Stewards are: Messrs. L. J. Kershaw, L. Morshead, E. E. Ryland, H. H. Forteath, A. T. Peppe and Captain E. M. Nixon.

The English mail brings the news that Lord Derby's great four-year-old Stedfast, slipped up and fell while exercising on the road at Newmarket. Though wearing knee pads he cut one of his knees rather badly and the other slightly. The Hon'ble G. Lambton, however, hopes to get him all right again in time to take part in the Jockey Club Stakes at the First October Meeting.

The Quetta Polo Tournament ended on the 7th instant in a win for the Royal Welsh Fusiliers who beat the 23rd Cavalry F. F. by 8 goals to 2. Details further on.

The Poona Open Polo Tournament was brought to a conclusion on the 13th instant, when the 33rd Cavalry beat the 26th Light Cavalry by 7 goals to 4 in the final. The 26th had the misfortune to lose one of their players in the fourth chukker, Johnson retiring as the result of a collision. Thereafter, though his substitute played well, the 33rd had the better of the exchanges and rode off winners as stated. Details further on.

W. R. Applegarth, of the Polytechnic Harriers, winner of the 220 championship at the last A. A. A. meeting and one of the British representatives at Stockholm, has just established a record for the 200 yards, which he won at the South London Harriers Sports on the 14th instant, his time being 19-2/5secs. The previous best was 9-4/5secs. which stands to the credit of E. H. Pelling 1889, A. R. Downer in 1895, G. Jordan in 1896 and C. H. Jupp in 1904.

Arnst has now come forward with a challenge to scull Barry for the World's and English Championships and has deposited £100 with the Sportsman. He wants the match to take place before November. By the rules of the English championship Barry is bound to give Arnst an answer within a fortnight and in default of losing possession of the cup must row, if the challenger insists, within two calendar months of accepting the challenge. Barry is willing to race but is not yet ready, while he has also to consider his races with Eddie Durnan and Harry Pearce, whose challenges were made before Arnst's. Nothing definite had been arranged when the mail left England.

The Tennis Tournament recently held at Quetta have resulted as under:—

Owing to the Bombay Rugby Tournament the weekly mud sports of the Gymkhana did not take place on the 4th instant, but the following Wednesday an attractive programme was put through and was well supported. Individual Tent Pegging (Triple Pegs) was the first event and Mr. J. W. Knight Bruce put another win to his credit, Messrs. R. F. Cooke and J. Wallace filling the places. Tilting at the Ring for Ladies was won by Mrs. Wagstaffe with Mrs. Richardson and Miss Dunsford next in order. Mr. J. R. Landon was first in the Jumping Competition from Messrs. Robinson and L. Graham, and then came the V. C. Race won by Messrs. Stewart and Wallace, with Messrs. L. Granam and B May second. The Aunt Sally Stakes, an affinity event, gave Mr. Knight Bruce another win, partnered by Miss Pike, Mrs. McCausland and Mr. R. F. Cooke being second. Darkness prevented the running of the scurry which was to have closed the programme.

We would draw the attention of those of our readers interested in angling to the advertisement of Messrs. Charles B. Bates and Company, which appears on another page. This firm are manufacturers of high class fishing tackle only and are sole proprietors of the celebrated Bates' fishing lines. We would mention among some of their specialities the Bates Combination Colonial Rod which is guaranteed to stand any climate and has gained a reputation for use in all kinds of Colonial Fishing. The firm manufactures flies, rods and all angling requisites of the best quality and will be pleased to send a copy of their catalogue to enquirers.

The final match of the Quadrangular cricket fixture in Bombay began on the Marine Lines ground on Monday, the teams being the Parsees, who had beaten the Hindus, and the Mahomedans, who had disposed of the Presidency. The Mahomedans won the toss but sent their opponents in. The Parsees began badly, losing Meherhomji for one and Elchidana for 3. Then Kanga and Warden got together and carried the score to 141 when the tiffin interval arrived. The Mahomedans had a long day fielding and when stumps were drawn their opponents had put together 313 for 8 wickets.

Continuing on Tuesday the Parsees carried their total to 333 before they were all disposed of. Then the Mahomedans went in and were all out for 86. Following on after tiffin they collapsed once more and were trundled out for 70, the Parsees thus winning by an innings and 177 runs.

The Calcutta Rowing Club held a small club meeting on Saturday last on their water at Alipore and a very enjoyable afternoon was spent. The September Fours (half mile, fixed seat tub fours) had attracted three crews. The dengue fever had rather interfered with the training but vacant thwarts were filled and the crews shewed much keenness in attending practices, though the rowing itself was not of a very high standard, most of those taking part having had little previous experience. Unfortunately a day or two before the race illness deprived one crew of two of its members, but Messrs. Mosley and Norman stepped into the breach and this scratch combination turned out to row in the heat pulled off on Friday. They rowed hard throughout but were beaten rather easily, the result being:—Plummer (str.), Paxton 3, Seyfarth 2, Crawford bow, Walker cox beat Mosley str., Norman 3, Seaman 2, Scotson bow, Burke cox. The other crew (Murrell str., Rice 3, Hothersall 2, Burton bow) rowed over. On Saturday Plummer's crew (cox Burke) beat Murrell's crew (cox Walker) in a good race by a couple of lengths. Scratch fours over quarter mile brought out two crews, a hefty quartet led by Mosley defeating a four stroked by Plummer in the usual terrific scramble. Some enthusiasm seems to have at last been awakened in the Club and certain keen spirits are working very hard towards a big revival of interest and a good season in 1912. So mote it be.

The Electric Theatre continues to draw big houses and on Thursday night there was an exceptionally full house for an off evening. A good programme was presented. The film entitled "The Indian Massacre" was much appreciated, the exciting fight between Indians and Settlers, the scenes in the Indian Camp, and the thrilling rescues providing much excitement. Pictures illustrating the "Sulphur Industry in Sicily" and a clever comic film "Won by a Foot" being the best of the other items of the menu.

On Saturday we were given an exceptionally fine programme. "The Last Drop of Water" showed us more pictures of fights between Red Skins and Settlers and is full of dramatic episodes. What strikes one most about these films is the wonderful display of horsemanship of those taking part. The noble animal is very prominent in these and the Cow Boy pictures and Settlers, Indians and Cow Boys alike ride like Centaurs. "The Railroad Raiders of '62" is a representation of an actual event which took place in the American Civil War, depicting a raiding expedition by volunteers from the Federal Army. The main features of this are the capture of an engine and truck and a desperate race for life which ensues.

"Alkali Ike's Auto" and "Her Hero" were each brimful of merriment,—indeed these American comic films are far more humorous than the Continental comic pictures, in which a burlesque chase and impossible situations usually provide the laughter.

A WOMEN'S fishing match was held last month at Wollaton, in Notts, and was even funnier than its promoters anticipated. In the course of the contest the rector's dog managed to get itself hooked, and the village cat appeared upon the scene at the weighing-in and appropriated one competitor's catches before they had been weighed. This led to the suggestion that the cat should be weighed, and the woman whose catches were inside it, credited with their weight. The practical difficulty in the way of carrying out that proposal was that no one knew how much the cat weighed before it ate the catches.

One of the competitors, was seventy years old. As a girl she was a very keen angler, but "she had not thrown a line for thirty years." She did not get even a bite. But there was a consolation prize of six yards of calico to be drawn for by the three oldest competitors who did not catch a fish. The rector's dog was not in the water when it got hooked; it was trying to "retrieve" a catch, and it hooked itself accidently. However, the dog, we are told, "took it all in good part."

The competition was promoted by the rector's daughters, and thirty-eight females took part in it. Each was allowed to have a male to fix the bait. Altogether seventy-one fishes were captured. One competitor qualified for a prize with a catch weighing a quarter of an ounce, but the winning fish was a perch that scaled half a pound!

THUS the disappointed sporting correspondent of a London weekly:—A South African friend, writing to me from Perthshire, says that the present is, all round, the best season he has enjoyed in bonnie Scotland. I am glad to hear it. He pays £2,750 for the two months' rent of a moor on which is situated a tumble-down house, and to temporarily occupy this undesirable residence he has to voyage some 6,000 miles. In my opinion, the Highlands are not perfect. They have three serious drawbacks, which are deer, grouse, and salmon. Now deer in the shape of venison, grouse (especially if it could have two backs) with bread crumbs, and salmon grilled with tartaream sauce, are friends one may meet with satisfaction. But deer high up in the forest, grouse on the hillside, or salmon in the river—these are the greatest enemies a peaceable, quiet body—not desperately given to atrocities—can have.

As soon as the "velvet" is off the horns of the deer in the early days of August, your life becomes a misery through the bumpings of a three foot telescope, which plays a devil's tattoo on your ribs for a fair sixteen hours of the twenty-four. You are made to crawl along hillsides like a miserable worm, to leap from crag to crag like a giddy young goat, to "clear the ground" all day as though you were a pelican seeking asylum in the wilderness, and finally, when you have scientifically mixed your "royal," to be lectured for your "guid" by the outraged and contemptuous gillie whose slave you have been all day, and whose sport and shocking example you have become in the evening.

With grouse things are even worse. When or how you sleep on the night of the 11th is of no consequence at all. You must be up with the dawn, which perversely arrives long before it is due, and you are forthwith handed over to the suspicious dogs, the guns, a pony, and a keeper, to belong to them till night shall fall, only then to be the more despised when the tale of birds is told, and you are reminded—not for the first time—that 1,000 brace were shot over this very same ground last year.

The salmon afford a still more complete disciplinary trial of patience. The water is not quite in good order, but "we'll just try this pool, where I've seen as many as five fush on five lines at the same time." The pool is tried, as is another, till the day is done, and the basket still yawns hopelessly for its prey. "Weel," ejaculates your Highland patron, "you've dune your pairt vara weel, tis just the fush will no do his"—and home you go again, accounted a wiser—but not a fisher—man! These are some of the drawbacks to staying in the Highlands, and the wise man who has known them will go sadly away to the South again, resolving that he too must get rich and purchase a forest in which there will be no deer, hills on which there will be no grouse, and a river from which salmon will be banished by Act of Parliament. Perhaps the fact that I have been unable this shooting season to go North is responsible for this ill-tempered screed. What?

A QUEER elephant yarn is told by the captain of a trading steamboat, writes the Shooting Times. On one occasion he had on board a cargo of forty elephants. The vessel was anchored in a perfectly smooth sea off the coast of Zanzibar, but, to the great surprise of the passengers, the steamer began to roll. At first they supposed the motion to be caused by the ground swell, but when the motion kept increasing there was general alarm, and the Captain instigated an investigation. Then it was revealed that the elephants had in some way found that by swaying to and fro all together a rocking motion was produced that seemed to please them immensely. So the great heads and bodies rolled and swung in unison until the steamer, which had no other cargo and rode lightly, was in imminent danger of rolling clean over. The attendants hurried down into their hold, and, after a great deal of shouting and thumping, managed to stop the elephantine see-saw amusement.

SIR H. H. JOHNSTON'S letter to the Times in mail week on the subject of the preservation of Indian fauna is as follows:—

SIR,—Before leaving for abroad, and whilst the quiet time of the recess in political affairs affords a little leisure for the consideration of Imperial problems outside the United Kingdom, may I venture to direct attention to the important question of adequate measures being taken for the protection of the fauna of British India? A good deal has been written on this subject since 1906 in the Field, the Indian Field, the Quarterly Review, the Bulletins of the New York Zoological Society, the Proceedings of the London Zoological Society, and in the Nineteenth Century, without the resultant effect on Indian legislation which might have been expected. Earl Curzon, I believe, drafted a far-reaching measure for game preservation before resigning the Viceroyalty in 1905, but successive Administrations do not appear to have manifested much zeal in the solving of a question which is not only of vital importance to India but is beginning to interest the world outside India (see, for example, the reports of Mr. C. William Beebe, of the New York Zoological Society), I believe Dr. Chalmers Mitchell is to deal with this subject in his address to the Zoological Section of the British Association at the forthcoming meeting. Meantime I think it may be of interest if I quote from the letter of a correspondent in Burma, just received as a commentary on my article in the Nineteenth Century, for July.

When I was in Burma in 1902, the question came up and district officers were invited to send in suggestions. They all, as far as I know, declared for the necessity of some form of protection. The "thamin" deer (Cervus eldi) have been wantonly slaughtered all over Upper Burma out of pure lust of killing, and the migratory birds, such as duck and teal, have suffered a woeful diminution. Lakes which used to be crowded with them in 1885 are now solitary. The demoiselle cranes too have almost disappeared. This has not been done by the Burmans, but by Europeans and Eurasians. . . . Why Burma has been omitted from the proposed Game Act I do not know; the necessity there for preservation is as great as elsewhere. There seems to be no difficulty except the supineness of Government. Deer in certain areas may injure crops, but duck and cranes cannot do so. Leopards are too plentiful just now and need no preservation, but tigers, except in a few places, are very rare.

The question of the preservation of the Indian fauna is not merely raised by those who are interested in abstract zoology and who admire the beauty of birds and beasts in landscapes, but it is one intimately connected with the welfare of man in Southern Asia. The reckless destruction of insect-eating birds (for example) which has been going on unchecked for 50 years to feed the wicked plumage trade is causing a great increase in germ-spreading insects and ticks, and consequently of the germ-diseases which destroy human beings and the domestic animals on which they depend for their food supply. Yet the projected Game Act of 1911 provided little or no portection for insect-eating birds—merely dealt with such game birds and beasts as might (in the words of Mr. E. P. Stebbing, addressing the Zoological Society in October, 1911) be likely to interest persons with the minds conventionally attributed to country squires. Mr. Stebbing's valuable analysis of the text of the projected Game Preservation Act of 1911, has been published by the Zoological Society of London.

WE hear that H. H. the Kour Saheb of Patiala has purchased Saxonite from Mr. Tom Scott and that he will also buy Kurnell and Gunboat.

FRIDAY, 30th August 1912.

Six inches of rain in eleven hours! This is the almost incredible record of Norwich last Monday. Needless to say while that solemn old cathedral city and much of the northern portion of Norfolk is inundated, our London papers are inundated with pictures and scare accounts of the disaster. But anyhow it has been an August of misery, disaster and disappointment almost everywhere, and as July was not much better we have a lot of leeway to make up if we are to come out fairly square on the average at the end of the year. Lets hope for fair September and a golden autumn. Mind you there are some pretty pickings of weather even in October.

That charming writer of Indian novels—Mrs. Perrin—has just given us another, and it will certainly enhance her already enviable reputation. It is called "The Anglo-Indians" and in it she draws a contrast between the comfort and affluence an official and his family may enjoy in India and the flatness and comparative poverty that are likely to attend their pensioned retirement to England. We see Mr. Fleetwood, the Commissioner, and his cheerful wife and trio of young daughters surrounded by servants and luxuries in the hills or the plains or in camp and already in the reckless hospitality of the elder pair and the disdain of two of the girls for Anglo-Indian suitors and everything that is not English we augur a rude awakening for the household when their time in India is "up" and they are swallowed up in some London suburb. And surely enough that awakening comes to be detailed by Mrs. Perrin in vigorous strokes of realism. Disheartened because he is robbed of all occupation and of the sports he loves Mr. Fleetwood fades out of life, Marion and Isabel regret the suitors they dismissed so cavalierly, even their mother begins to lose her placidity and grows fretful, while Fay, the youngest and most intelligent of the girls, breaks away from the dulness and petty worries of suburban existence and goes out to make a living in the world. The contrast is very successfully brought out. Do you suggest that the author's is rather a narrow theme? Be assured that its working out admits of all sorts of interesting side-lights being thrown on Anglo-Indian life and its surroundings. We are introduced to a young Rajah and his Ranee and hear their judgments on Western civilisation. Since Fay acts as campanion to the Ranee on a visit of hers to London and the English girl's officer lover holds the position of bear-leader to the Rajah, the novelist has an excuse for giving us peeps into the more intimate life of an Indian prince and his zenana and she makes excellent use of her opportunities, treating this side of her story sympathetically but with full recognition of the gulf that lies between East and West. Finally, through the eyes of Fay herself we see what a magical effect the atmosphere and colour of India may exercise on an imaginative girl of sixteen; very dainty is this heroine of Mrs. Perrin's and we have to thank her for presenting to us one of the sweetest "flappers" created in recent fiction.

The voice of Mr. Frank Richardson has long been that of one crying in the wilderness. For years he has been inveighing against whiskers. For a time it looked as if he were fighting a non-existent foe; but suddenly, like a bolt out of the blue, an organised attempt has been made to revive the pre-Victorian side whiskers. Mr. Richardson ought to at once gird up his loins (or whatever is the modern equivalent of that operation) and go forth to do battle with the horrible revival. There occurs to him a great opportunity to prove that the pen is even mightier than the razor. The fact that some misguided youths are showing a little less of their cheek should be an incentive to him to show a great deal more of his. Side whiskers, indeed, and curled too! The unutterable infamy of the suggestion.

I see the late Mr. Edward Terry's estate has been valued at £44,056, and the net personalty sworn at £10,056. Among the bequests are £250 each to the Actors' Benevolent Fund, the Royal General Theatrical Fund, the Royal Female Orphan Asylum, Beddington, Surrey, the Royal Masonic Institution for Girls, St. John's Hill, Battersea-rise, S. W., and £100 each to the Foundling Hospital Benevolent Fund, Charing-cross Hospital, the League of Mercy, the Actors' Orphanage Fund, and the Theatrical Ladies' Guild, all subject to the proviso that they are only to be paid in the event of the estate being more than sufficient to pay the other legacies. The gross estate is the second largest left by members of the profession in recent years. Mr. Toole left £79,984, Mr. Wilson Barrett £30,862, Sir Augustus Harris £23,677 and Sir Henry Irving £20,527.

To introduce Australian plays by Australian authors to the London theatre-going public is the object of a young Australian dramatist, Mr. William Moore, who is paying a visit to this country. With him he has brought eight one-act plays, three by himself, three by Mr. Louis Esson, one by Mr. Blamire Young, and one by Miss Kathleen Watson. These names are not yet famous in the theatrical world, but their bearers hope that they will be when the new school of Australian dramatists that Mr. Moore represents comes into its own.

There is no reason why Australians should not be able to write plays as interesting as the cricket that the Australian team plays. The fact that the "dialect plays," "Bunty Pulls the Strings," and "Hindle Wakes," have been such successes encourages Mr. Moore in his expectation that plays dealing with Australian life, whose characters talk "Australian," may prove acceptable to London playgoers. And if they win favour over here their merits will then be recognised on the other side of the world.

The torrential and continuous rain that has brought ruin to the farmers throughout the country has been a golden rain for the theatrical and music hall managers in London. Never in the history of the theatre has there been such a prosperous August. There is rejoicing in every box-office from Shaftesbury-avenue to West Ham. There never was an August like this. Rain in August means money in the box-office. People want to be warm and dry in such weather as we have had, and they get tired of their own fireside and want entertainment. Of course, if there is a downpour too early in the evening it hurts the business.

The business this month at the Tivoli, the Pavilion, and the Oxford is at least 50 per cent. better than in the ordinary August. It has been a matter of capacity houses night after night. The same story comes in from our eight suburban halls.

They are doing at least 25 per cent. better than is usual for August at the Coliseum, but if they had more room they would do better yet. The August houses are always good, but there never was anything like this August.

At the Hippodrome the box-office receipts are fully 65 per cent. better than is customary at this season, and the Palace and Empire have been turning money away night after night.

At the Duke of York's "The Amazons" have been going bravely along in spite of the fact that two of the three stars are absent. "Bunty" has been busy at the Haymarket each night pulling the public in out of the wet, and "The Glad Eye" winked merrily at the Apollo, no matter what the weather has been.

On drizzly nights "The Sunshine Girl" proved the best possible antidote for the blues, while at the New Theatre, where "Ready Money" is living up to its name each night, phenomenal business is reported.

The Vagrant.

Review.

THE TRAGEDY OF THE "SHELF."

Mrs. Perrin's new book makes a very direct appeal to those who have thrown in their lot with this country. It is a story that brings a personal message to every man in the Government services and to the wife of every man in those services: a plain, straightforward tale of the tragedy summed up in the word "Retirement." There is no plot in the accepted sense of the word: John Fleetwood, Commissioner, in the Bengal Civil Service retires while still active, full of energy and capacity for hard and responsible work of the kind that befalls one in his position. He has lived the life of the majority of civilians, keeping up his position, entertaining freely and making the most of the social advantages conferred by his official standing. Mrs. Fleetwood has ably seconded him, and has done her utmost to give the two daughters who are "out" a good time, whether at Pahar Tal, where the story opens, or in the Plains. They have thought little about money. What difference can it make, asks Mrs. Fleetwood, if one asks a few people more or less to dinner? The Commissioner is a sportsman, one of the wire-and-whipcord kind who loves hard work whether it entail long days settling boundary disputes in the district or in the jheels with his gun. The two have thoroughly identified themselves with this country and, blessed with the capacity for looking upon the best side of things, do not foresee what lies before them when they go home. The two elder daughters, Marion and Isabel, are not in sympathy with their parents as regards life in this country: they have had a taste of Home life under favourable auspices, and they look forward to resuming it under the wing of aunt Beatrice, a not particularly estimable member of what calls itself a "smart set" and John Fleetwood calls "the bloated brigade." Our sympathies are with Fay the youngest over whom India has cast her spell.

This is the family we find spending their last hot weather at Pahar Tal and their last cold weather in the Plains. The picture of life under either set of circumstances is admirably, vividly, drawn with clear bold strokes: they serve their purpose with singular force as the background for the second phase: and it is the second phase that carries its warning. Never has the tragedy of the "Shelf" been set out with more unflinching truth and accuracy: the situation in which the Fleetwoods find themselves when they go Home, realise the vastness of the change that has come over their lives is drawn in a quiet, matter-of-fact spirit which only intensifies its pathos. The meaning of "Retirement" is burnt into the reader with a few graphic touches:—John Fleetwood's first walk in the London Streets in "the chill sunshine of a backward spring that has something indifferent, almost heartless, in its pale light"; the unwholesome-looking crowd in dirty clothes attracted by a cab accident: the glimpse of an old friend in a passing 'bus, "Logan was on a state elephant last time he saw him, going to open some show or other—now here he was in a 'bus squeezed up in a row of very ordinary people, looking very ordinary himself: paying a penny for his fare!" Mrs. Fleetwood, harassed and worried by the everlasting servant difficulty when, retrenchment compelling, the family take up their quarters at Wimbledon—"subside into the suburbs," as somebody puts it. The eldest girl Marion, forcing herself to believe that she enjoys the snobbish gaieties of her aunt's set, through which she means to attain her ambition—a rich mate; and succeeds. The nostalgia of Fay craving, like her father, return to this country with its social genuineness, warmth and space. Fay is a charming character and it is a delight to us when she marries Clive Somerton and returns to the East whose charm she so fully appreciates.

Every member of the family is alive: John Fleetwood, the hard working civilian, devoted to his work, fond of sport, easy about money matters, thoughtless of the future: Mrs. Fleetwood, motherly, hospitable, easy going, affectionate with the streak of self-indulgence that comes of lives cast in pleasant (Eastern) places: Marion, the ambitious, who thinks Indian life second-rate but shows "strength of character which redeems:" Isabel, rather weak and ineffectual, easily led by Marion: and Fay, whose fortunes we follow with sympathy from the moment we make her acquaintance in short skirts at the opening of the tale. Fay is purely delightful: a charming and natural touch is that when, craving for the East, she addresses in the vernacular some low class Babu student on the underground railway: she cannot explain to her pardonably irate father that she addressed not the individual but the land he typifies. The union of Fay and Somerton is brought about by easy and legitimate methods which, incidentally afford the author opportunity to exhibit the inside life of high caste natives when they find themselves in England.

Less ingenious than "The Charm," more purposeful than any novel Mrs. Perrin has yet given us, "The Anglo-Indians" is a work that provokes thought: it cannot fail to enhance a deservedly growing reputation.

CLOSE SHAVES.

The scene was an Indian cantonment. After Mess, over the cigars, the conversation had turned on snakes, which, according to the reports of the Government of India, were responsible for more than 21,000 deaths in that country during the year 1894. District officers know that the police often include under the head "Snake-bite" many casualties the causes of which their vigilance is unable to penetrate, and which for various reasons never come to light. For instance, among castes specially jealous of their women, it is more than suspected that some are secretly made away with, to reappear only in the local return of victims to snakes (not human). Still, allowing for all such cases, there can be no doubt that the true mortality from snakes is appalling, and will not diminish so long as the natives sleep on the floor or ground, walk bare-footed in the dark, and take no pains to keep at a distance from their houses, huts and villages the vegetation which harbours these deadly enemies of mankind. For years Government has been giving a money reward for each snake killed, with the result in some places, it is said, of actually encouraging the breeding of the reptiles it is desired to exterminate. The difficulty of dealing with people who would rather not destroy death in any shape, whether it be from snakes or disease, insanitation or anything else, if they can only manage to make a profit out of it, or if the remedy interferes with long-established custom, is one of those problems which only time and civilization can overcome.

We asked the Colonel, who had been many years in India, if he had ever heard of a European being bitten by and dying from the bite of a snake. He said he could only recall one case of death, when a young officer who had acquired the facility of a conjurer in handling snakes made a slip one day with a cobra and was dead in a few hours. "I remember," he added, "hearing of a subaltern who awoke one night to feel a prick and cold slimy touch on one of his fingers as he lay with a hand hanging out of bed close to the floor and suddenly believed he had been bitten by a snake. He started up, struck a light, woke a brother sub in the next room, and persuaded him to hack off the finger in question—an operation effected by a knife with some difficulty. The doctor was then sent for; in due course the wound healed, the subaltern became a colonel, and is living still, I hope."

"What was the evidence of snake-bite? Was the snake seen and recognised as deadly?

"No, as far as I remember, that was the weak point. It generally is in such cases. Indeed, I did hear it suggested that the hand might have been touched by a frog and bitten by a mosquito, and that the loss of the finger was due to a too lively imagination. In another case I heard of, the man was so convinced he had been bitten by a cobra and there was no hope for him, that he sat down and wrote a long letter to his wife in England, taking leave of her and giving final directions. Waiting for the poison to work he passed several hours of acute mental disturbance, as you may imagine, and was astonished to find himself sitting down to dinner none the worse bodily. But I can tell you of one incident in which there was proof positive of a poisonous bite, though here again the snake escaped.

"Two young fellows were out shooting in the jungle. One of them, a regular griff, seeing a biggish snake going into a hole, thought it fun to grasp the end of its tail and pull the beast out suddenly with a jerk. Before the manœuvre was completed and the snake had been flung away, it managed some how to bite the thumb of the finger. The boys with great pluck slashed the wound, and cauterised it by applying gunpowder which was ignited. Then, tying up the thumb in a handkerchief, they rode several miles into cantonment and summoned the doctor. For some hours the injured man was kept moving up and down to keep the blood circulating. Weighed down by the paralysing lethargy which snake-poison produces, he was plied with constant doses of brandy, and never allowed to sit down. When ready to drop he was supported: friendly voices, eyes, and hands did all they could to rally his energies, and never left him till early the next morning, when he had tided over the crisis, and had consumed two bottles of brandy. Ever after there was a curious twitch or tremor about his face, said to have been caused by the snake-poison acting on the nerves. He was a General when I knew him, and a charming accomplished man. That was a close shave, if you like. If the snake was a cobra, as stated, the venom must have been weakened somehow."

"Talking of close shaves," a youngster queried, "you must have had more than one, sir, when out after tiger!"

Now tigers were a subject on which the Colonel was not to be drawn. He had been known to sit through a long dinner listening patiently in silence to the vapourings of a guest who having recently taken part in two or three tiger expeditions, felt justified in imparting a few wrinkles on that species of shikar, and conceived at the end of his discourse that he had rather astonished the old man. His feelings may be imagined when he learned subsequently that the old man had killed more than a hundred tigers. "Why the deuce didn't he let on that he knew all about it, instead of allowing me to make an ass of myself?" growled the discomfited novice. It was provoking, no doubt; the Colonel never would let on about a story in which he played the chief part. So now, as on other occasions, he turned the question.

"Close shaves! I can tell you of one which happened to a dog of mine who never could resist going into the water after a wounded duck. A small, thick set bull-terrier, brindled, with a grim face, square jaw, broad white choker, looking out of the corners of his eyes sideways; he might have been a prize-fighter turned Methodist parson in some previous stage of existence, according to the Hindu doctrine of metempsychosis. I called him Grimshaw in the days of my youth, and he used to go with me everywhere, and chase every mortal thing that ran before him. Never could teach him to fetch, carry, or retrieve a dead bird, he took no interest in anything without life. But let a bird run or swim with broken wing or leg he would hunt it almost as keenly as if it were a rat. One day I was shooting ducks on a small tank, and he was in the middle of it chasing one that was wounded, when suddenly to my horror a big black duck emerged, and in a moment the dog went down under an alligator. To my surprise he rose again almost as suddenly, barked and splashed furiously, and made for the bank as fast as he could. I was ready to give the alligator a dose of shot, but apparently, for some reason which passes comprehension, he did not want the dog, or was frightened, as he did not show again. Grimshaw's troubles were not quite over, as a few yards from the bank his paws got entangled in a soft clinging weed which held him like a fly in a spider's web, and I had to send a coolie into the water to release him. Then the coolie was caught by the weeds, but touched bottom, and extricated himself and the dog just as I began to think of going in myself to the rescue. The extraordinary thing was that Grimshaw bore no marks of the alligator's teeth: the brute was a small one, and though the dog was also small, his struggles and the stones we threw in to make a noise may have led the alligator to think he had got hold of a troublesome customer whom it was hardly worth while keeping. At any rate, this is the only theory I can invent to account for what I cannot at all explain. Never again did Master Grimshaw venture into a tank. He would go to the brink and bark violently when he saw an alligator, which he often did, but henceforth he did duty as a land-lubber only, and declined to serve as a marine. Alas! three years after he fell a victim to a panther. These animals love to lure dogs into the jungle by crouching low in the dark, and running away from them till they are out of reach of succour; or else a dog hears a rustling in long grass or undergrowth which keeps on retreating as he pursues without knowing what he is hunting. Suddenly the pursuer turns, and a day or two afterwards someone beings in the skin of the pursuer. That was how poor old Grimshaw went under. I mourned him sincerely, and have never owned a dog since."

"Yes; but, Colonel," persisted the youngster who had spoken before, "it's awfully good of you telling us about poor old Grimshaw, and it certainly was a close shave as regards the alligator, but haven't you yourself been in a tight place with a tiger?"

"Ah! if you want a story of that kind," laughed the Colonel, as he lit a fresh cheroot, "ask Major C—— to tell you of his cousin's adventure with the man-eater, who used to kill the dâk-runners. That beats anything I can give you, and I've done my yarns for to-night." There was nothing for it but to call on Major C——, who gave us the story of the man eater, as follows:—

"You all know that a man-eater is generally a tiger too old, sick, or inactive to catch his natural prey in the jungles, so he hangs about a village like an area sneak, picks up goats and calves, one day falls on a helpless man, woman, or child at the edge of the forest, and having tasted human flesh, longs for more. Confirmed man-eaters, it is said, care for no other, but this I doubt; they may prefer it to any other; it is probably easier to get in many cases. But whether a tiger becomes a man-eater by force of circumstances or malice prepense, he is a terror to the neighbourhood he frequents, and, as he adds to the tale of his victims, helpless villagers invest him with supernatural attributes, and call on their gods to avert his wrath. A noted specimen of this class had killed a great number of people about a certain village somewhere in Kattywar, and had taken to polishing off dâk-runners as they passed through a narrow jungly defile, three or four miles from the village. He grew so cunning that shikaris were baffled time after time in their attempts to sight him. When an armed escort accompanied the dâk-runner nothing happened; so after some days it was thought the tiger had shifted his quarters. Then the escort was dropped one evening, and immediately another unfortunate runner disappeared. A special reward was offered by Government, but without result. For months and months the man-eater continued to kill with impunity. My cousin in the Staff Corps, a keen shikari and very determined fellow, swore he would shoot that tiger; got ten days' leave, and pitched his tent near the village in question. He tried all he knew, tied up buffalo calves, beat the jungles with three or four hundred men, even accompanied a dâk-runner at dusk through the fatal defile, but in vain. At last he resolved to personate the dâk-runner himself and go alone. Attired as a native and armed with rifle and pistol, he slung a mail bag over his shoulder and started on his perilous adventure one evening at sunset. Jingling a number of little bells attached to his person, after the manner of dâk-runners, he trotted on till he reached the place of evil omen. Then all at once with a bound the man-eater appeared in the middle of a road not twelve feet wide, facing him. The man pulled up short at a distance of some fifteen yards, raised his twelve bore, and, by the mercy of God, dropped the tiger stone dead with a ball in the brain. A marvellous exhibition of nerve, wasn't it? When the villagers came to realise that their enemy was done for at last, there was a tremendous scene. The dead body was hoisted aloft on a hastily constructed litter, and escorted by a torchlight procession through and round the village, men and boys shouted and capered with delight, while women wept and chanted songs in praise of the victor. Prayers were offered up, and libations of liquor poured out so freely that few of those who attended the man-eater's obsequies that night could have gone to bed sober. As for my cousin, you may be sure that his prayers and thanksgivings were not less earnest than those of his admirers—I might say worshippers—for they almost worshipped him."

"A splendid fellow that cousin of yours, C—" said one man, while others indulged in exclamations to the same effect. "No wonder the villagers almost worshipped him. It was a regular case of S. George and the Dragon."

"And yet," observed the Colonel, "we are still called a nation of shopkeepers, and certain Little Englander M. P.'s encourage Congress-maliahs to spread the notion that Englishmen in India are selfish beasts who love to oppress the natives."

Fishing.

TENCH FISHING.

The only tench fishing I have had has been in still water. Tench are, of course, caught at times in rivers, but angling for them in running water is very uncertain work. I remember being pointed out a celebrated tench hole in the Huntingdonshire Ouse: it was a deep quiet corner with a mud bottom and an abattis of branches and roots all round. These places in rivers have to be well ground-baited with worms beforehand to bring the fish on the feed.

Some years ago I belonged to a fishing club at Brighton. This club had angling rights in a number of ponds and lakes. These were a group of small ponds on a farm near Burgess Hill which held numbers of tench. I caught several in one of these ponds, but never succeeded in making a bag. Tench are capricious fish, and it is only occasionally that one finds them really properly on the feed.

Those I caught at Burgess Hill were always taken in the evening, just before dusk. I found a small lob-worm was the best bait. The pond was full of small rudd, and unless one used a fairly big worm these small fry would constantly hook themselves and disturb the water.

Another thing is that the tench has a particularly sensitive mouth, and unless the hook is thin in the wire and well buried in the worm, he discovers there is a foreign body in the bait and ejects it before one has time to strike.

The Burgess Hill fish were small, about three-quarters of a pound to a pound.

Near Newton Abbott I have had some rather unusual tench fishing. About three miles out of the town there is a shallow lake, the owner of which has very kindly given me permission to fish. Stover Lake is very prettily set in the centre of a thickly wooded valley. It is artificial, there being an embankment along one side. Off this bund one can reach deepish water, but one or two good pitches have to be ground-baited beforehand to bring the better fish round.

Unless this is done the bag will consist entirely of diminutive roach and perch.

Out of one side of the lake goes a shallow canal about twenty yards in width. This canal has practically no current, as it dies away eventually into a very diminutive stream. There is nowhere more than three and a half or four feet of water, so that the fish can be seen quite plainly as they cruise about. The bottom is a combination of weeds and deep mud.

This shallow canal holds a good many fair sized tench and fishing for them is most interesting work. The plan is to steal quietly along the edge of the water and look out for a tench. Having spotted a fish within reach, the tackle baited with a worm is gently swung out so as to drop just in front of the tench's nose. The chances are that he will not look at it, but turns disdainfully away. Sometimes, however, your wiggling worm is regarded with favour, and putting down his head and lifting up his tail, the tench sucks in the bait: a twitch of the wrist sends the little hook home and then comes an anxious time as a fat two pounder plunges for the nearest weed bed, straining your gossamer gut almost to breaking point before you can turn him.

The tackle I have used has been the very finest possible roach gut with one or two shot to sink it quickly, but no float. The hook was very small and fine in the wire, and was most carefully hidden in the worm, except for the point, which was just through the skin of the lob, and therefore ready to take hold of the tench's leathery mouth in response to the lightest of strikes.

I have been three times to this Stover canal and have caught five tench. They were all taken in the same way, viz., by looking for a fish and then swing the worm gently in front of him. The whole operation of sneaking in the worm was always plainly visible. Sometimes the fish would get between the angler and his bait, but if the tench stands on his head, shows his side and waves his tail, it is a sign that he is sucking the worm off the bottom, so that it is time to strike. I lost about six fish which were very lightly hooked. This is inevitable when one has to use small hooks.

The five tench taken were 1lb. 7oz.; 1lb. 11ozs.; 2lbs. 1oz.; 2lbs. 2ozs. and 2lbs. 11ozs. This works out to an average of exactly two pounds each, not bad sized fish for such a small piece of water.

Two friends who were my companions on two occasions, got four tench and a roach between them. The best tench was 2lbs. 7ozs., the other three about a pound and a quarter each. The solitary roach was a very good specimen, weighing 1lb. 10ozs.

I have gone into this fishing in some detail, as I do not recollect ever having heard of tench being caught in this way before with the fish in full view all the time.

It is rather curious watching a tench which has been sailing slowly about, suddenly go to ground like a rabbit. These fish burrow right into the soft mud underneath the weeds. You can follow their course by the lines of bubbles which rise to the surface. Tench constantly associate together in pairs. Sometimes one sees even three and four in a family group. A pair of tench often cruise slowly about in company; at one time side by side, at another time in Indian file, one close behind the other. No doubt they are male and female fish.

In the Stover Lake canal, as in Sussex ponds, I have found a small lob-worm to be the best bait.

Stover simply swarms with small perch, and if either a brandling or small red worm is used, a perch probably comes along and takes it before the tench have a chance.

I like what are known as maiden lobs, i.e., small lob-worms which are smooth all the way along and have no knot in them like the large lob-worms.

It is well known that jack, though they will occasionally take a small tench when very hungry, do not as a rule prey on this species of fish. The mucous with which tench are covered may possibly be the reason. I have seen a tench of a pound and a half sail quite close past a three pound jack and neither fish appeared to take the slightest notice of the other.

Tench are quite decent eating; that is, they are about as good as perch. Though they live in muddy stagnant water, the flesh never tastes muddy. I have known trout on the other hand which were almost uneatable, owing to the reservoir in which they lived having a muddy bottom. When a tench is first caught it is an extremely handsome fish with its bronze green sides and brilliant ruby eyes. The colours however fade very rapidly, and by the time one gets the fish home, it is an ugly dingy looking beast.

THE TARANTULA.

To the Editor of the "Indian Field."

Sir,—A couple of days ago, I found a Tarantula Spider (Lycosa Tarantula). I severed the head from the body with a knife leaving the legs less one pair on the head portion, thinking it would kill it. The head portion went away full of life and remained alive full of attack when approached. I put it beside a hole I found in the ground, and about an hour and a half afterwards went back to see if it was alive. I found it just as "bobbery" as ever, so thinking it might be lonely (!) brought over the body portion to it which it savagely attacked and began to eat. The whole thing seemed so utterly incredible that I showed several people who were there the head devouring its own body.

Can you or any of your readers, tell me if this is a common trait of this particular Spider?

I have been trying to catch another to repeat the operation, but haven't succeeded so far.

It went for a black beetle which we gave it also and tried to kill it but found the beetle a bit too tough and gave up the task after about five minutes.

Many queer things come out of this queer place, but the above "beats Banagher" hollow so I thought it might interest you.

THE TURF.

HURST PARK.

A DRENCHING wet morning in town last Friday depleted intending visitors, and the half filled specials proved indices to a comparatively small attendance, but those who braved the elements were rewarded by what now-a-days, may be looked upon as a fine afternoon. The going was heavy, but flukes panned out well, and with two winners each the honors of the afternoon were divided between F. and P. Hartigan. Results :—

EQUINOINT

A Wonderful Remedy for Lame Horses.

Read the Experiences of Others

F. W. FOSTER, Esq., writes:—

"Snowball" took Fourth Prize for England at Olympia after "Equinoint" Treatment.

Marsh Farm, Etwall, Derby,

The tins of "EQUINOINT" I had from you I tried on "Snowball" with a "big knee," which two Vets. said would never go down. I am pleased to say after one dressing of "EQUINOINT" it is perfectly right. This horse won at Olympia, in a class of 210, after the "EQUINOINT" treatment.

T. G. LITCHFIELD, Esq., writes:

NO MORE BLISTERING.

Spring Park, Shirley, near Croydon.

I have great pleasure in sending you my testimony about "EQUINOINT." It has done wonders for my horse. After ten weeks of rest and blistering treatment (under my Veterinary Surgeon's advice) it was still as lame, and as a counsel of despair I was told to work it gently. Then I heard of your "EQUINOINT," and tried it. After ten days I found the lameness gone, and tried to work the horse gently, gradually increasing the amount of strain, and was glad to find all lameness gone. I cannot help putting it down to your "EQUINOINT," and shall use it again instead of blistering.

That surface water quickly drains off the Knavesmire was proved on Tuesday morning by the diminished areas of pools of water scattered over its green surface, the evidences of the three past days' floods. A comparatively dry night had worked wonders, and only a few slight showers fell yesterday morning, high-floating, grey clouds allowing transitory glimpses of sunshine. During a mild, dull afternoon the welcome change came a bit late to strengthen confidence, and the attendance, which included several prominent patrons of the National sport, was not quite so large as usual in consequence, while the going was exceptionally heavy, the horses finishing very tired. It was extremely fortunate that on such an important occasion for Yorkhire as the Ebor Handicap, the Clerk of the Weather should have been propitious to the enormous crowd that filled the spacious new stands on Wednesday. The pride of the morning looked almost too rosy, but the weather held up till the programme had nearly been run through, and then the showers were light. It was not surprising that the going had thickened from slushy to sticky, and consequently more holding than on the previous day. This, however, did not militate against good fields, although it did against public form, and students of the book were floored by a day of outsiders, to which the pencillers will look back more pleasantly than the latest. WINCHESTER

THE DREADNOUGHT OF THE JUNGLE.

The .405 Winchester fears nothing alive. It is powerful enough to stop any animal, no matter how big or how dangerous. Its 300-grain, soft-point bullet has a ton and a half of energy, and when it strikes, it mushrooms and delivers the whole of this tremendous energy with terrible shocking effect. There is an immediate collapse—the animal drops as though struck by a thunderbolt. The rifle holds five of these cartridges, which can be fired in rapid succession. Its action is reliable and strong, and its shooting straight and true. As a big-game gun of exceptional power it has no peer.

All Wednesday night it rained like hades, but the day turned out the brightest and best of the three so far as atmospherical conditions went. On the other hand, the going, if possible, had gone from bad to worse, and the Knavesmire was in a more swampy state than on Tuesday, the straight yielding showers of spray and horses slithering all over the track, and with three more outsiders proving victorious, the meeting will have an unfortunate reputation for surprises. Prince Christian was again present, but the attendance all round, as usual, was not up to that of Wednesday.

CRICKET.

THE persistent deluge was carried right through the week, and Saturday was absolutely the worst and wettest day of the six. As on Friday, first-class cricket was a blank, the rain ruining everything. Not a ball could be bowled in any one of the seven matches in progress, and the Australians left Cardiff in the morning without having begun their intended game with South Wales. Kent suffered most, as, with an innings to play, at Dover, they only wanted 57 runs to beat Gloucestershire. The scores in the various matches were as under:—

GONOSAN (CAPSULES) unlike other preparations of Sandal wood oil do not affect the kidneys or disturb the stomach and are well tolerated by patients even after prolonged treatment. When prescribing insist on "Gonosan." It gives best results. Trials by the medical profession solicited to whom samples and literature will be sent free on application to Holzmüller and Schmidt, Calcutta.

DOCTOR ROSS STRASSBURG introduced Gonosan in the treatment of the most painful of diseases to which mankind is liable. It is better and safer and more effective than other preparations of Copaiba Cubeb, or plain Sandal wood oil. The same is the verdict of other Specialists who have patiently tried it. It is the latest Scientific Remedy and has never known to fail. At all Chemists and dealers.

ELGIN PAULINS

DO NOT neglect your property during the rains. The outlay of a few rupees on an ELGIN PAULIN will save the amount many times over. Your goods are as safe and dry under an ELGIN PAULIN as under a roof.

ELGIN GROUND SHEETS and PAULINS are made of very best waterproof materials and some qualities are guaranteed rot-proof as well. They are strongly sewn and securely fitted with eyelets and lashings. In price they compare favourably with other makes, while in actual wear they last twice as long.

ENGLAND XI vs. AUSTRALIANS.—Following upon the tremendous downpour at Norwich earlier in the week, the weather on Wednesday turned quite bright, and a full day's cricket took place in the match between an England Eleven and the Australians. Naturally, however, the effect of the sunshine on the soft turf was to place batsmen at a great disadvantage, and in the course of the day twenty-five wickets went down for an aggregate of 290 runs. The progress made with the game on Tuesday afternoon, however, having been limited to the scoring of 72 runs for five wickets by the Australians, even the pronounced success enjoyed by bowlers yesterday did not suffice to bring the match to a definite issue.

The Australians' innings was finished off by S. G. Smith and Morris, the Durham county professional, in an hour for the addition of 64 runs. Bardsley for his 47 batted an hour and thirty-five minutes, and among his hits were two 6's and four 4's. In less than an hour before lunch the Englishmen lost six wickets for 45 runs, and on resuming the innings closed for 79. After lunch Whitty took the last four wickets in five overs and a ball for 15 runs, and for the whole innings had a record of seven wickets for 40.

In the second innings of the Australians, Smith and Morris again bowled effectively, six wickets having fallen for 79 when the Colonials declared. Wanting 136 to win, the home side had scored 68 for four wickets when the game was left drawn. Score:—

Pigsticking.

THE BOAR'S REVENGE.

Pogson was fat, and comfortable. Pogson loved a good dinner, and an easy chair; and here he was, sitting on a hard saddle astride a venerable old Waler, with one loose hand clasping a hog-spear, while the other nervously fingered the coarse stiff reins, as he clutched, and fumbled at the solid old horse's mouth, while his anxious eyes, watched the scene before him.

In front was the dearu, sun baked, and hard as a rock, with nullahs, fissures, and cracks, that crossed, and recrossed each other, until they met the huge grass, that fringed this white weather-beaten plain, like a gigantic pair of whiskers; in this waving sea of grass, the heads of a long line of coolies, rose, and fell, like the floats of some fisherman's net, in the wake of a couple of elephants, that tacked here and there, like fishing smacks, to allow their white-coated leathery lunged cargo, to shout, abuse, and encouragement, to those below, or dispatched orders, and directions, from the three laughing, and chatting horsemen, that rode parallel with the bobbing line of heads.

A minute later, a loud shout rang out, and the line broke like a string of beads, as an elephant swung round with a squeal; another shout, and then a babel of voices, and a black dot, danced, and hopped its way through the shimmering heat of the plain beyond; Pogson's goggle eyes turned to watch the horsemen; one was plunging and struggling through the long grass, while the other two already clear, were racing across the seamed face of the dearu, to cut the pig off from its only place of refuge, a large green patch of jowâ, that stood out crudely, some two miles away, amidst the soft yellows, and greys of the landscape; a horse fell, and then with a scramble; galloped with head and tail erect, after its companion. But Pogson had seen enough, and with a glance down at the sleepy old Beggie horse he bestrode, he reflected with a sigh of relief, that he was just as safe there, in the shade of the mimosa tree, as he would have been in his hotel in Calcutta; hardly had these reflections crossed his mind, before the old horse threw up his head, and with pricked ears, stared at the jungle before him, and then Pogson saw the "beast."

In front of him—not twenty yards away—a huge boar was standing just inside the low fringe of grass, that bordered the tangle beyond; it stood there the very personification of majestic fearless strength; so motionless it was, that if it had not been for the smouldering rage in its eyes, and the slight tremour of its bristling mane, it might have been taken for some statue cut from marble.

Pogson with the cold sweat of fear, running down his face, realized that he was alone with the animal, and his soft, flabby form, seemed to shrink, and collapse; as if the icey hand of death, had struck at his heart, and as he sat, a mere quivering mass of nerves, round the corner of the grass, came a sniffling mangy cur, nosing his way, ever nearer to the boar, until suddenly he faced him, and almost simultaneously a squeal rang out as the dog rolled over on his back, ripped from ear to ear.

Round went the horse, with the half fainting Pogson still clinging to his back a sobbing shrieking yelling madman, crazy with terror, while behind ever gaining came the beast now almost level with his legs, he progged wildly back with his spear, and with a jerk that almost threw him from the saddle, it shot from his hand, and some thing went crashing to the ground behind him.

On the walls of Pogson's house in Bayswater, scowled down a mighty Boar's head, with a broken spear shaft, protruding from one eye socket, while underneath a neat little brass tablet recorded the fact, that this was the record pig of Junglipore; and whenever Mr. and Mrs. Pogson had guests to dinner, the oft repeated tale was told, how this giant of the jungles, found his match in Pogson's cool courage, and wrists of steel.

Now Pogson liked whisky, as well as a good dinner, and a comfortable chair, and much to litt'e Mrs. Pogson's secret unhappiness, both the story, and the "pegs" increased in strength.

One night after dinner Pogson sat facing his guests—the counterpart of himself—as they lounged smoking and drinking round the lamplit table (for the electric light had gone wrong that night), Pogson related some of his experiences in the East, and then, so as to show up the grizzly old trophy, he carried the lamp to the sideboard and placed it immediately beneath, and almost touching the savage shaggy head, and began the account of his adventures with the 36 inch Boar.

The whisky, and the story were almost finished, when a peculiar thing happened, suddenly Pogson stopped, and with eyes starting from his head, pointed a trembling finger, to the peg's head on the wall; his companions starting to their feet, and looked round; and there in front of them was the Boar's nose, and mouth curling up into an expression of unutterable contempt, and derision; and Pogson fell fainting to the ground.

When Pogson could speak, he murmured something about the Mystic East, and a request for the Boar's head to be buried at once, He now never drinks "pegs," and is silent about his adventures in India,—and Mrs. Pogson is silent too, about the heat of the lamp having melted the wax in the nose of Pogson's one and only trophy, and somewhere under two feet of London clay, rests the record pig of Junglipore, with a peaceful smile under his distorted swollen nose.

Hunting.

OOTACAMUND HOUNDS.

13th September 1912.

THE hunting news is very meagre; sport last week being of the poorest description on account of the hot days and dry going; the heavy rain of yesterday and to-day will probably prevent to-day's meet, but it should make the going good again for the rest of the season.

Saturday, 7th.—The meet was at Fairlawns Bridge at midday, a start being made an hour later. After drawing for some time a jack was viewed on Bagman slopes, and hounds were put on to a poor scent, but they managed to get a view of him once and the pace got hot for a while over the side of Jackal hill through Monkey shola to Mathavi where he got away. Returning to Bagman another jack was found near Hills which gave a short run and got to ground near Municipal crossing.

Monday, 9th.—Golf corner at 7-30 A.M. A very little rain had fallen on the downs, not enough to make scent lie. Nearing New Covert a jack was sitting out in the open and nearly got nobbled by the leading hound, but he managed to dodge into the covert, whence he gave us a run across the swamps to Municipal hill and through Dairymaid past Cicilia and Ursula, on to Porcupine retreat, where a number of fresh jacks enabled him to divert his pursuers. Another short run from Jackal shola round Denmark plantation gave hounds a taste of blood.

Tuesday 10th.—The meet was at Briar at 7-30 A.M. Hounds ran a jack towards the ghat which got away in the tea at Duncanale, after which I don't know what happened, but I think all went home.

POONA AND KIRKEE HOUNDS.

8th September.—A field of about sixty including several from Bombay met the Master at Kalas, a jack was soon turned out and gave us a sharp burst of about fifteen minutes at the end of which he was pulled down. Another was put up shortly after but hounds overran the line, they picked up the scent, however, and ran him down after a very short run. A fox was the next quarry and provided a fast twenty minutes gallop. He was put up near Dhigi and made his point for Kalas and then turned in the direction of Bhosari hounds losing him soon after passing the village.

12th September.—The eight milestone on the Bombay road was the rendezvous and another big field assembled. Hounds were soon on to a line and the quarry gave us a good run of nearly half an hour, being eventually run into near Bhosari, Miss Van Goetham being given the brush. A second jack led us towards the Sister's Hill and gave us a fine gallop. He eventually took refuge in a shallow well where he was surrounded and killed, the brush going to Miss Palin. Among those out were:—Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Carmichael, Hon. Mr. Millet, General and Lady Barrett, General Barter, Col. Evans, Col. Arnold, Major Nevinson, Capt. Sarson, Mr. Greenshields, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Logan, Mr. Wise, Miss Campbell, Mr. Dunlop, M.F.H., Capt. Lumsden, R.N. Capt. the Hon. Hugh Thellusson, Mr. Eeles, Capt. and Mrs. Sydenham, Mrs. Fitzgibbon, Mrs. Fowler, Miss Palin, the Misses Prior, Mr. Reade, Mr. O'Donell, Capt. Stewart, Capt. Lucas, Capt. Vachell, Capt. McCudden, Capt. Harvey-Kelly, Capt. Stirtin, Major Daunt, Capt. Longrishe Major Bowen, Capt. and Mrs. Vines, Capt. Weldon, Capt. Utterson, Capt. Law, Mr. Brotherton, the Nawab of Wai, Mr. Furdonji, Mr. Captain, the Zemindar of Sivagiri, Col. Logan-Home and Field Masters Hon. Mr. Claude Hill and Major Westmoreland, Messrs. Whaley, Cassim Shah, Johnson and Knight-Bruce. The hunt point to point races have been fixed for the 3rd October, and the published programme announces five events, viz., the Welter Cup, the Light Weight Cup, The Pony Cup, The Diana Cup, and The Loyal North Lancashire's challenge cup.

THE QUETTA TOURNAMENT.

FINAL.

23RD CAVALRY (F. F.) vs. ROYAL WELSH FUSILIERS.—The final in the tournament was played at Quetta on the 7th instant when the Welsh Fusiliers beat the 23rd Cavalry by 8 goals to 2. The Cup was presented to the winners at the conclusion of the game by Mrs Sclater and General Sclater made a congratulatory speech. Details:—

First Chukker.—Both goals were visited in turn and Ormrod drew first blood for the Fusiliers after a good run. Stable followed this up with a second soon after. Fast and level play closed the chukker.

Second Chukker.—The Fusiliers pressed till Egerton cleared and transferred play to the other end where the 23rd looked like scoring. They were kept out, however, and a good run by Ormrod and Stable ended in another goal.

Third Chukker.—A rush by the Welsh was stopped and Allen getting possession ran down and scored the first goal for the Cavalry. They attacked again but the Fusiliers cleared and play became general till Johnson and Ormrod got away and scored another goal for the Welsh.

Fourth Chukker.—The Fusiliers ran rings round their opponents in this period and put on three goals—Thomas, Stable and Ormrod being credited with the points. Towards the close Allen got away but failed to score.

Fifth Chukker.—The Cavalry attacked vigorously and after several attempts another goal was scored by Allen. Then the Fusiliers pressed but there was no further score.

Sixth Chukker.—The Fusiliers got out and Ormrod hit a goal. Fast well-contested play followed for the remainder of the period, time being called with the score: Royal Welsh Fusiliers, 8 goals; 23rd Cavalry, 2 goals. Teams:—

POONA OPEN TOURNAMENT.

33RD CAVALRY vs. PILGRIMS.—The Tournament opened with this game on the 9th instant, in the presence of a large gathering of society who were entertained by Colonel Cadell and the officers of the Brigade R.F.A. The game was a good one and resulted in a win for the 33rd Cavalry by 5 goals to 4.

First Chukker.—The Pilgrims pressed and were awarded a free hit for a foul by the 33rd. Nothing came of it but soon after Anderson got possession and scored a goal for the Cavalry. The Pilgrims were next prominent but their effort went wide. Another run by the 33rd ended in Gillies adding to their score.

Second Chukker.—Up and down play, Wilson at length getting away to score the Pilgrims first goal. Midfield play till the Pilgrims' ground was invaded, and Anderson scored in a melee. Both teams then attacked in turn but there was no score.

Third Chukker.—The Pilgrims attacked vigorously and Wilson at length hit a goal. The Cavalry then changed the venue but the Pilgrims cleared and Wilson coming away put the teams on terms.

Fourth Chukker.—Midfield play gave place to a determined attack by the Cavalry. They were awarded a free hit but this and others efforts to score were unsuccessful. Towards the end of the period, however, they managed to put the ball through.

Fifth Chukker.—The Cavalry ran down but were stopped and the ball returned to their territory where Wilson once more equalised. Up and down play. The 33rd had a shot which went out wide. Then the Pilgrims had a chance from a free hit for a foul. This was met however, and the 33rd attacked strenuously: one shot was fruitless but Collins scored just before the close of the period.

Sixth Chukker.—The Cavalry pressed but Wilson cleared. The 33rd returned to the charge but the ball was taken back to their territory where the Pilgrims tried to get on terms. Their efforts were unsuccessful and they had to retire beaten by 5 to 4. Teams:—

Umpires:—Major Davie and Captain Chaytor.

26TH (K. G. O.) CAVALRY vs. BOY SCOUTS.—The Hon. Mr. Claude Hill was "At Home" to a large gathering on the 10th instant, when the 26th Cavalry met the Boy Scouts, a scratch combination got together by Capt. Aga Cassim Shah. The Boy Scouts though not so well mounted as their opponents played strenuously throughout and though beaten by 9 to 4 gave a very good account of themselves. The 26th were in excellent form and gave a fine exhibition of combined and individual play.

First Chukker.—On starting Cassim Shah ran down and just failed to score. Up and down play followed and then the Boy Scouts pressed once more and Warren opened their scoring. A run by Chaytor and a successful hit put the teams on terms but before the close of the period the Scouts got through and Warren hit a second goal.

Second Chukker.—The Scouts ran down but were stopped and Johnson getting possession equalised, Chaytor scored in a scrimmage soon after. Fast play followed up and down the field till Cassim Shah rushed the ball down and transferred to Gray whose shot just missed by inches.

Third Chukker.—The Cavalry attacked and Chaytor hit a goal. They continued to press till Warren cleared and put in a good run, nothing came of it and Chaytor and Popham were next prominent but there was no further score in this period.

Fourth Chukker.—The Scouts had to bring the ball into play as a penalty for a cross. They took it down the ground and Gray scored a good goal. On changing ends the 26th attacked and Johnson scored, Chaytor following this up with 2 more goals in quick succession.

Fifth Chukker.—A free hit for a foul against the Cavalry was not turned to account and then play centred in the Scouts' territory, a scrimmage in front of goal enabling Chaytor to score a goal.

Sixth Chukker.—Fast up and down play. Popham invaded the Scouts end and ridden off passed to Johnson who put the ball through. Then Gray transferred play to the other end where Cassim Shah hit a goal. More play in the Cavalry ground till Chaytor cleared, a couple of runs by the 26th failing to materialise. Final score: 26th Cavalry, 9 goals: Boy Scouts, 4 goals. Teams:—

26TH (K. G. O.) CAVALRY.		BOY SCOUTS.
Major Henderson	... 1	Capt. Cassim Shah	... 1

Capt. Popham	(back)	Capt. Cornould-Warren R. F. A.	(back.)

Umpires:—Major Davie and Captain Coaker.

FINAL.

33RD CAVALRY vs. 26TH (K. G. O.) LIGHT CAVALRY.—These teams met in the final on the 13th instant when the 33rd Cavalry won by 7 goals to 4. There was a big gathering of spectators including Their Excellencies Sir George and Lady Clarke and all Poona Kirkee Society. The R. A. M. C. were "At Home" and the string band of the 107th Mahrattas played a fine selection of music. The game was very level for three chukkers but in the fourth, Johnson was thrown in a collision and was unable to continue playing. Rissaldar Mul who took his place played well but from this point the 33rd increased their score eventually winning as stated. The Cup was presented to the winners at the end of the game by Lady Clarke and Sir George condoled with the 26th and congratulated the 33rd.

First Chukker.—The 33rd attacked immediately and kept up a strong pressure till Chaytor cleared and the ball was taken to the other end. It was brought back to midfield and taken Popham took it on and drew first blood for the 26th.

Second Chukker.—The 33rd worked the ball down and Gillies, Wise and Anderson all had unsuccessful shots at goal. Then a scrimmage occurred and Anderson equalised. The same player added another shortly after and then the 26th cleared and ran down, their final effort going out wide. The ball was brought back to their territory and Gillies scored. The 26th were next prominent and after one fruitless shot the ball was put through by Johnson.

Third Chukker.—The 26th had the best of this period. Attacking at the start they were nearly through but Anderson cleared. They brought the ball back, however, and Johnson scored with a good shot. Fast up and down play closed the period.

Fourth Chukker.—Midfield play till Chaytor ran down and the 26th put in a couple of shots at goal. Johnson was next prominent but collided with Henderson and was thrown. He was stunned but came to very shortly. Unable to continue, his place was taken by Ressaldar Mul Singh. On resuming, the 26th pressed but were driven back and the 33rd coming away Wise scored a goal.

Fifth Chukker.—The 33rd were on the aggressive all through this period despite the efforts of the 26th to keep them out of their territory. Anderson scored a goal and several other shots went out wide.

Sixth Chukker.—The 33rd pressed and the Ressalder in clearing hit behind. From the penalty Wise scored a goal. Then the 26th attacked and Popham put the ball through but the 33rd were away again soon after and Gillies scored in a scrimmage.

Final score: 33rd Cavalry, 7 goals; 26th Cavalry, 4 goals.

(By P.A.V.)

Particulars are to hand of the Simla Poultry Show to be held at Barnes Court on Saturday the 5th October 1912. The list of classes runs up to 54 and in each class there are two prizes, one a silver medal and the other a bronze medal. Besides these 108 class prizes there are 16 other special prizes, the best of which is a silver cup to be presented by His Honor Sir Louis Dane, Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, the prize to be awarded for the best bird in the Show. The Show is open to competitors from any part of India. All entries must reach the Secretary not later than the 28th September 1912, and those of my readers who just only come to know of this must hurry up at once; there is no time to be lost. The exhibits, we are told, will be judged on the American score card system. Further particulars may be had from F. Rebeiro, Secretary, Simla Poultry Show, Enville, Simla E.

I am also in receipt of the prospectus of the Poultry and Dog Show to be held at Coonoor on Saturday, the 26th October 1912, by the South Indian Poultry Association, Aruvankadu, Nilgiris. The poultry entry list runs up to 41 and the Show authorities promise to provide a separate class for any new breed, provided four exhibits are guaranteed. There are a goodly number of prizes to be awarded in silver and bronze medals and also a silver cup for the best bird in the Show. I notice that a silver and a bronze medal are proposed to be given away for the best and the second best fowlhouse exhibits, value not exceeding Rs. 30. This is as it should be. All entries should reach the Honorary Secretary, L.W. Pryor, South Indian Poultry Association, Aruvankadu, Nilgiris, not later than 19th October 1912.

Advices from Home state that an International Association of Poultry Instructors and Investigators has just been established, the object of which is the interchange of knowledge and experience among those engaged in poultry teaching and investigation throughout the world. A council was elected with members from all parts of the world, India being represented by M. A. Dobbs, B.A., Agricultural College, Pusa.

Thus the London Poultry Journal: Times change and we with them. However, we maintain that the natural system of hatching is by far the simplest and most interesting to small poultry-keepers. Nevertheless, we cannot close our eyes to the fact that the artificial method is much more largely adopted each year, so the number of chickens hatched in machines, taking the country through, exceeds the naturally hatched ones. Now, we should like to point out that with the exercise of commonsense and by following the directions given by the maker of the particular machine which is used, the ordeal of running an incubator for the first time is not as great as it appears at first sight.

Those who want to make their poultry really profitable as well as a pleasure will do well to consider the necessity of setting eggs only from birds which have proved themselves to be good layers. It is not possible to overestimate the importance of breeding only from good laying strains, the strain being of very great importance, as well as the selection of the breed which is suitable for the purpose for which the fowls are kept.

In setting hens, it is always well to remember that it is advisable to thoroughly cleanse the nests which have been occupied by the hens preceding these—the contents should be carefully removed and some lime put in the nest box to sweeten it. Before each hen is set, she should be well dusted with insect powder, to prevent the possibility of insects infesting her. A good deal of trouble is caused when these little things are not attended to.

It is advisable to place some insect powder in the nest when it is made and again two days before the hen is due to hatch off, and when this is done insect troubles are prevented. Chickens should be dusted all over when they have insects on their bodies, as soon as noticed.

Green food is most essential to the wellbeing of the young chickens. Where poultry-keepers have no grass runs, they should sow lettuce seed, or mustard and cress, barley oats, or wheat in shallow boxes. If well-watered and the seeds sown on successive days, a continual supply of green food should be obtained which will help much to keep the young birds healthy. Care should always be taken to see that the green food given is fresh and crisp, and finely chopped, as unless this is done, the birds do not thrive as they otherwise would, and it is possible that a stoppage may be caused by this.

Should there be any feather-pluckers in the run, they can generally be stopped by cutting the beaks of all the birds, which is done by removing the sharp horn from the points and sides of both upper and lower beaks with a sharp penknife, as if the bird's beaks are made quite blunt, they cannot hold the feathers to pull them out, and this does not interfere with their feeding in any way. The same treatment prevents hens which have acquired a taste for their eggs from breaking the shells to get at the contents, as they are unable to use force sufficient to break the shells.

An effective preventive of leg weakness in chickens is flint dust, which strengthens the young birds and entirely prevents the loss of the use of their legs, from which so many chickens suffer. Chickens and stock birds all require an ample supply of hard and sharp grit, and that made from flint stones is undoubtedly the best and cheapest, as a small quantity lasts a long time, and fresh water daily.

Should chickens begin to drop their wings, their mouths must be examined at once. One chicken that is all right should be caught at the same time, when it can be seen in an instant if there is any difference in the mouth and throat. If there are any small white spots, they should be touched with a little roup lotion. Should the mouth be full of white ulcers and the chicks are common ones, they should be killed at once, but if valuable it is worth while trying to cure them, as this can often be done.

If is diphtheric roup the chicks have when the spots are of a yellow colour. When the spots are quite white, it is an indication that the blood is overheated, or the digestive organs are out of order. When this is the case, touch the spots with a feather dipped in roup lotion and give the chickens a little salad oil and a few small pills made from roup powder. It is a good thing to give them castor-oil in their soft food when they show these symptoms, which should be given in quantities of one teaspoonful to five chickens at three weeks old, and if roup powder is given at the same time it prevents the chickens taking cold. This treatment will stop the complaint spreading.

Mother (crossly): "Freddie, haven't I told you that you must not talk when I am talking?" Freddie: "But, mamma, you won't let me stay up after you go to bed!"

"If you don't stop nagging at me, Emily, I shall shoot myself this very minute." "Yes, that's just like you, when you know how nervous I am when I hear a shot."

Cricket.

QUADRANGULAR CRICKET.

Hindus v. Parsees.—This match was played on the Marine Lines maidan, Bombay, on the 9th and 10th instant and ended in a win for the Parsees by an innings and 40 runs. The Hindus won the toss and went in first, Vithal and Mehendale opening the innings. The latter was bowled second ball after scoring 4 off the first. Ogad Shanker who followed him was run out when he had scored a single. Mehta next in was caught and bowled by Parekh. The Thakore Saheb of Rajkote then joined Vithal who was batting steadily, but with the score at 29 Rajkote was sent back by Parekh and Balu came in to be dismissed first ball. Date, the next man, was caught off Parekh who thus performed the hat trick. Pai then joined Vithal and after scoring 5 was bowled with the score at 55. Bhusari was next man in but very soon after his advent Vithal's wicket fell, his 22 runs having taken nearly an hour to put together. Eight wickets were thus down for 44 when Sempre came in. Bhusari made 9, and after scoring 3 Seshachari was caught and the innings closed for 64, Sempre being not out 12.

The Parsees sent in Pavri and Driver, the latter being caught first ball, Warden joining the Parsee captain. Warden hit freely but Pavri only made 2 when he was caught. Kanga joined Warden and together they took the score to 39 when the luncheon interval arrived. On resuming play was slow but the score gradually crept up and the Hindus' total was passed, Kanga's wicket falling 4 runs later, the Doctor having contributed 15. Meheromji next in was nearly half an hour at the wickets before he scored, hitting a four, Balu bowled him in the next over and Kapadia joined Warden who had been scoring steadily and had 70 to his credit. The new comer made 5 when he was dismissed by Balu, who sent back the next man, Elchidana, before he had scored. After tea Mulla and Warden scored freely, the former's wicket falling to Balu when he had made 13. Gazdar contributed 6 when Balu sent his balls flying, Warden's century having been signalled just before this loss. Parekh came in with the score at 162 but was out leg before ere he had scored. Ellavia, last man, made 8 when he fell to Sempre and Warden carried out his bat for 115—a really showy innings.

Continuing on Tuesday the Hindus opened their second venture with Sempre and Ogad Shanker. The latter was bowled for a duck's egg with the second ball and Mehta took his place, being run out after scoring 5. Vithal next in made 6 and Mehendale who followed was bowled first ball. Balu then joined Sempre and the scoring was very slow. The half century was nearly reached when Balu was caught after making 12. Date did not last long and was dismissed with 2 to his credit. The Thakore Saheb of Rajkote, his successor, was out for a similar score and then Pai was associated with Sempre with the score at 58. Two runs later Sempre was caught for 29 having been at the wickets for an hour and a half. Bhusari failed to score, Seshachari made 5 and Pai was not out 13. The innings closed for 79 and the Parsees thus won as stated by an innings and 40 runs. The wicket was in favour of the bowlers but the Hindus were undoubtedly outclassed by their opponents.

PRESIDENCY vs. MAHOMEDANS.—Play opened on the 12th instant, the Presidency winning the toss and taking first lease of the wickets. They gave a poor display and were all out for 101. Major Greig and Watts opened the innings Watts having to retire third ball before a run had been scored. Cheetham who took his place was bowled when he had made 10, Travers made 2 and was caught, three wickets having fallen for 32. Houghton began well but was eventually beaten by Aziz when he had scored 14. Yates was run out after he had contributed 9 and Sprott then joined the Presidency captain. With 70 up Greig was injured, a stiff delivery from Aziz striking him on the knee. He continued to play but was at a disadvantage and was caught soon after. His innings produced 31 but at no time had he displayed his usual form. Cooper was next in but his partner, Sprott, was caught next ball and give place to Stileman. Cooper was also caught after securing a single. Halliley failed to score and Wilson came in with the score at 76. He played vigorously and he and Stileman carried the total to 100, another single was added and then Wilson was bowled off his pads, Stileman being not out 11.

The Mahomedans began batting after tiffin with Aziz and Ali. The former was caught when he had made 10 and Yusuf Beg took his place. When the score had reached 55 Ali was bowled and Salamuddin was associated with Yusuf Beg. This pair made a good stand and had taken the score to 82 when the tea interval arrived. On resuming Yusuf Beg was caught without any addition to the score, his contribution of 35 being extremely useful. Sheikh Mahomed, next man in, was sent back after making 2 and Nazir Husain joined Salamuddin. They were not long together, however, Salamuddin being caught for 26. S. A. Aziz who followed was caught after making 2 and Saleh Mahomed was his successor. The century was registered and then Nazir Husain had to leave, being run out by a very narrow margin. Tamboowalla joined Saleh Mahomed and eventually carried out his bat. Saleh Mahomed made a fine hit for 6 and was caught next ball, having scored 19. Dawood Nessey scored 2 and when play stopped for the day the score was 131 with one wicket to fall. Resuming the next day Pir Mahomed was bowled without any addition to the score, the Mahomedans leading by 30 runs on the first innings.

The second venture of the Presidency was little better than the first and the team was disposed of for 104. Greig and Cheetham opened the session, the latter being bowled when he had scored 4, Greig was out for 7, Travers, and Houghton were not long together, Haughton retiring with the score at 25. Watts added 8 and then Stileman joined Travers. Together they ran the score to 58 when Travers was out leg-before with 8 to his credit. Cooper and Stileman took the total to 70 when Cooper was dismissed for 4. Wilson then came in and the couple hit freely—but the partnership was of short duration, Wilson being bowled for 6. Sprott followed him and at this time Stileman scored freely and the century was signalled. He was out soon after with a lively 31 to his credit which included three 4's and two 3's. Sprott made 4, and Yates and Halliley failed to score, the innings closing for 104.

The Mahomedans were left with 75 to make to win and they hit off the runs for the loss of 3 wickets. Nazir Husain made 7, Tamboowalla was run out before he had scored but Yusuf Beg and Salamuddin piled up the runs, the former being caught after contributing 28. A. Aziz was responsible for 9 and was not out when the winning hit was made. The Mahomedans thus won by 7 wickets. The match was by no means a brilliant one. The Presidency gave a poor display, their fielding being the best part of their play. The Mahomedans fielding on the contrary was very slack and it was undoubtedly their fine bowling which won them the match. Score:—

CALCUTTA RUGBY CHALLENGE CUP.

CALCUTTA vs. KING'S OWN.—The tournament began on Saturday last when these teams met on the Calcutta ground, the home team being somewhat lucky to win by 5 points to 3. The King's Own played a plucky game throughout, and had hard luck in not scoring oftener. The match was keenly contested throughout and play was interesting. The home team pressed at the start and had several chances of scoring, but the Military backs kept them out and a couple of efforts from free kicks were also unsuccessful. At length the Calcutta halves got the ball and initiated a bout of passing which culminated in Langley getting over near the corner. Cumberlege took the kick and scored a brilliant goal from a difficult angle. On resuming the King's Own had more of the play, the home eight was beaten but their backs gave a sound display, Cunningham and Cumberlege in particular doing good work. All the efforts of the King's Own were frustrated and they had failed to score at half time. After the interval the visitors rushed away and an attempt was made to drop a goal. This fell short and the ball was taken back but the soldiers attacked once more and their forwards were very prominent. They had the best of innumerable scrums in the Calcutta "25" but the Calcutta backs were in fine form and broke up all the Military rushes. At length the ball was slung in from touch and Hall getting possession got over with an easy try. The place kick failed. The soldiers continued to have the best of the game to the finish but the vigorous tackling and strong defence of the Calcutta backs kept them out and they were unable to add to their score, the home team thus winning by a goal (5 points) to a try (3 points). Teams:—

CALCUTTA.—Rose, back; V. Sherman, Durnford, Cumberlege and Langley, three-quarters; Cunningham and Scott Brown, halves; Captain Armytage, Dempster, Kerr, Johnston, Bryce, McDougall, Studd and Elderton, forwards.

KING'S OWN.—Goulden, back; Saunders, Coleman, Richard and Arthurs three-quarters; Lieutenant Blackburn and Newnes, halves; Fowler, Sigsworth, Grey, Bridson, Howard, Hall, Daniels and Kilbogan, forwards.

Referee:—Mr. McBean.

WEST RIDINGS vs. THE LEICESTERS.—This match was played on the 16th instant and the result was a pointless draw. The West Ridings had the best of the play throughout and should have won but they lost many chances of scoring and the stubborn defence of the Madras team prevented their crossing over with a try on many occasions. Replaying on Tuesday, the game was a most interesting one and ended in another draw—each team scoring 3 points. The Leicesters turned out as in their first match but Carroll and Allstead appeared instead of Newton and Turner in the West Ridings team. Once more the Dukes had the best of the play and the Leicesters were kept mostly on the defensive. It was, however, another case of hard lines and lost opportunities as far as the Yorkshiremen were concerned as well as a dogged defence by the Leicesters' backs. The Ridings were first to score, Bowe getting over with a try which Dennison failed to convert. Before half time Whittle crossed the West Ridings line, no goal resulting. The second half was pointless. Teams:—

WEST RIDINGS.—Dennison, goal; Bowe, Carroll, Allstead and Firth, three-quarters; Memory and Laycock, halves; Lieutenant Kidd, Lister, Hirst, Shaw, Bootland, Dodgson, Henderson and Widdop, forwards.

LEICESTERS.—Lewis, goal; Whittle, Houghen, Trevett and Cooper, three-quarters; Atkins and Fohen, halves; Lieutenant Yalland, Green, Herbert, Norman, Twigg, Collington Clark and Witham, forwards.

Referee:—Mr. McBean.

THE AMATEUR CHAMPIONSHIP OF NORTHERN INDIA.

THE golf season ended at Gulmarg on the 31st ultimo when the prizes for the competitions won were given away by Mrs. Stuart Fraser. The Amateur Championship of Northern India had occupied the last days of August and had resulted in a win for Mr. L. R. Fowle of the 14th Sikhs who beat Mr C. N. Boist in the final by 4 and 3. Mr. Fowle showed excellent form throughout, and in addition to the Championship had earlier annexed the Hill Vase. The Ladies' Championship was won by Mrs. Nicholson, who beat Mrs. Anderson in the final 1 up. The season has been a most successful one, the number of competitors larger than ever before, while the play was of a higher standard all round. Appended are the results of both Championships:—

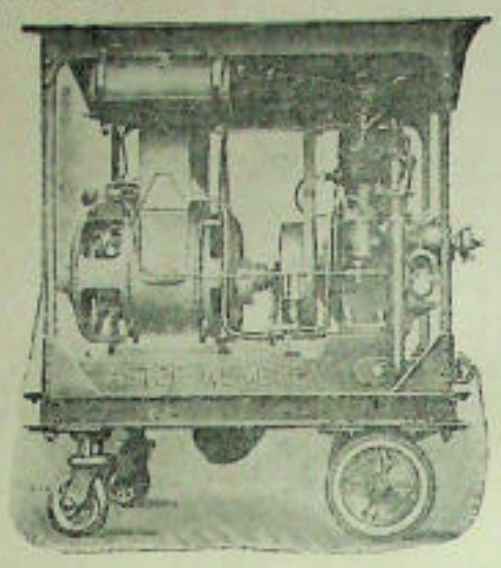
THE MULTIPLICITY OF CLUBS.

ONE'S first instinct on hearing of one-club achievements writes Mr. Bernard Darwin, is to exclaim with the non-golfing scoffer, "What nonsense it must be having all those sticks." We are the more thoroughly convinced by reckoning up the shots played in our last round on a course of average length. It is quite likely that the cleek has come once out of the bag, and that the driver, the iron, the mashie, and the putter have done all the rest of the work between them. Yet there is our bag bulging with brassies and driving mashies and other superfluities, and our small caddie grows purple in the face with carrying them all. Yet before we jettison three-quarters of our clubs and return to the simple golfing life we ought to consider the bags of some of them who could joggle with a single club far more successfully than we could, namely, the professionals. Then we began to have doubts because the professional's bag is full even to bursting and his caddie groans even more loudly than does our own.

I fancy that the solution of the question is this: that it is a great deal better to be master of a few clubs than not quite master of a great many, but if we can really be familiar with a whole armoury then the club-makers make the game a little easier for us. It is, for example, possible to extract the ball from a bunker either by exploding it out by the "volcanic" method or by chipping it cleanly with a driving iron, but unless you happen to be Mr. John Ball you will be better advised to carry a niblick and play with it. The niblick has been evolved by generations of the fingers of iron heads in order to make getting out of bunkers as easy as possible, and for the ordinary mortal any other club makes it just a little harder. But, of course, you must be on more or less intimate terms with your niblick and not bring it out brand new on the important occasion.

Multiplicity of clubs does, I fancy, do real harm not to the comparatively seasoned player but to the learner. He should all perhaps be more finished iron players if our whole stock-in-trade had originally consisted, as does that of the professional in embryo, of a single battered old weapon. For example, we most of us know that our great weakness is in playing the half-way house stroke with an iron, which comes between the wrist shot and the full shot. Mr. Hilton has been rubbing it into us again lately, while Mr. Hutchinson dins into our ears the patent fact that we play the pitching shot with cut most ineffectively. We get out of our difficulties in some sort of way by buying more clubs; instead of that half shot we play a full shot with a much set-back iron and for the pitch we take a tremendously lofted niblick, but we make a poor business of it at best. Now, supposing, when we had been learning the game we had possessed but a single straightfaced iron and no money in our pockets to buy any more, either we should have learned to play that half shot and to hit a ball with plenty of stop upon it or we should have perished in the attempt. Necessity being the mother of invention, we should probably have learned the strokes that defeat us in our old age. We might have played with all the skill of that confounded little caddie boy whom we can now see practising in the distance with his one old club. Really there seems to be something in that doctrine, usually looked upon with the gravest suspicion, that the troubles of the rich are greater than those of the poor.

RIEDELS' GONOSAN (the best combination of Kawa Kawa and Sandal wood oil) tends to simplify prognosis and treatment, and obviates complications. This is the verdict of leading Specialists of Europe and America after prolonged and patient study. At all dealers and chemists.



GONOSAN is a happy combination of Kawa Resins with Oleum Santal in the proportion of one part Kawa Kawa to four parts Oleum Santal. Cures easily, no complications. Easily digested. The Stomach and Kidneys remain absolutely unaffected. To be had of all chemists and dealers in patent medicines.

KENNEL NOTES.

WAR DOGS.

IT is understood that the home battalion of the Norfolk Regiment, by permission of the General Officer Commanding, Aldershot District, has requisitioned one of Major Richardson's trained war dogs. The dog is to be used for sentry work at night or by day in dense country, also for accompanying patrols at night. He will be experimented with at the forthcoming manœuvres.

It will be remembered that a pair of these dogs accompanied the recent Abor expedition and rendered good service.

The value of these dogs cannot be overestimated, and the time seems to have arrived for the Government of India to take up the question and consider whether it is worth a little outlay to establish, as an experimental measure, a depot in India for the breeding and training of both police and war dogs. Other countries have found these dogs of inestimable value, and there is no doubt that such dogs would be of considerable benefit and assistance to our sentries and patrols on the outposts of the Frontier, also to Police Officers in helping them to track down criminals. The scheme is certainly worth serious consideration on the part of Government.

KENNEL WHISPERINGS.

GREYHOUND fanciers will be glad to learn that the Skeltonian Kennels is once again going strong. The owner, Mrs Cuthbert Edwardes, has got together some very promising stock, amongst them a particularly smart bitch named Folly, she is clean bred all through and has done no end of coursing, picking her hares beautifully; however, Mrs. Edwardes intends to use her for breeding purposes only.

The Skeltonian Kennels is also noted for Cockers and an important addition has just been made to the breed in Skeltonian Sapper, a winner by Branksea Don (Beechgrove Top, a field trial winner, ex Beechgrove Ruby) ex. Rock Countess a winner (Ch. Rock St. Wulfrum ex Skeltonian Jet, a winner and holder of championship certificate). This dog is exceptionally well bred and comes from a good working strain, is a well shaped dog with a fine head, particularly strong in foreface, has a good mouth and retrieves nicely to hand, is very steady and has already proved himself a very successful sire. Mrs. Edwards has placed him at stud.

THAT keen lady fancier Mrs. Curran after her run of bad luck has is going home for a change and it is believed that she intends to bring out some Dalmatians. These dogs should be found very useful in this country, and it is surprising that the breed is not more popular, as they are dogs that take kindly to almost any training and are very hardy. Of course Mrs. Curran will still keep her favourites, Poodles and Australians.

THE Durbar Kennels of Smooth Fox Terriers, of which the Rajah of Pithapuram should be very proud, is now importing a team of all white Pekingese. These dogs are very rare indeed and the specimens that are coming out are all pure white and weigh less than 6lbs. each. The venture is a bold one and it will be interesting to see how these mites progress in the Southern Presidency. The Raja's string of Smooth Fox Terriers is perhaps the strongest in India, and he has some smart youngsters coming on by Ch. Avon Oxendale and Durbar Granville, etc., which will no doubt be heard of at the winter shows.

THE sporting Fox Terrier fancier Mr. D. Alexander of Dacca has lost that grand young dog Oberon; he was bred by Mr. J. C. Tinne and is by Ch. Avon Oxendale ex Ch. Sylph; he was only imported last year; however it must be some consolation to Mr. Alexander to know that he has some very promising stock by this dog which is being sent to the Ardincaple Kennels to be got ready for the forthcoming shows.

MR. DINSHAW BAMJEE, who imported that grand Bullterrier Willowdene Merry Prince by Ch. Bloomsbury Rex ex Ch. Bloomsbury Merry Girl, late last season, has now succeeded in getting him fit, and all being well he will be shown at Simla on the 21st instant, where he will be handled by Mr. Audsley, and, with any luck at all, should come out pretty near top dog.

SEVERAL new importations are expected shortly Irish Terriers being perhaps the strongest. Mr. F. M. Jowett, the famous breeder of Irish Terriers is sending out a brace of good 'uns for a fancier up-country which on paper seems above the average, and if paper records are any criterion the rest of the pack must be hot stuff. Up to this there has been nothing particularly brilliant or of outstanding merit amongst the Irish Terriers: so it seems almost time that a few real typical specimens of the Dare Devil were seen at our shows.

A rippling young Greyhound and a few Scotties are also amongst the shipment.

FORTHCOMING SHOWS.

THE arrangements for the two shows (Simla and Naini Tal) that take place on the 21st instant are well in hand, but the entries are not, it is believed, up to expectations. There is a saying "that a house divided against itself cannot stand;' this would seem to apply to these two shows, and no doubt the Simla Executive will take this to heart and next year arrange the date of their shows so as not to synchronise with fixtures already arranged.

The Darjeeling Show, so far, promises to be a huge success, and as already stated in these columns the Committee will be well advised to have its eye on a competent judge to take the place of Mr. Horace Johnstone who is still on a sick bed and it is very doubtful indeed whether it will be possible for him to fulfil his engagement. Yet, on the other hand, he is most anxious to keep his promise, and if it is at all possible he will do so, but it would be a pity if a show that promises well in every other respect were to be marred for the want of a competent judge.

What about railway concessions for the dogs attending this show?

THE FOX TERRIER CLUB.

AS the proposed Fox Terrier Club for India now seems possible and with the approach of forthcoming shows the time seems opportune for the publication of the latest scale of points, etc., as recommended by the Fox Terrier Club in their Annual Report for 1912.

POINTS OF THE FOX TERRIER.

The standard recommended by the Fox Terrier Club.

SMOOTH.

1. Head.—The skull should be flat and moderately narrow and gradually decreasing in width to the eyes. Not much "stop" should be apparent, but there should be more dip in the profile between the forehead and top jaw than is seen in the case of the greyhound.

The cheeks must not be full. The ears should be V-shaped and small, of moderate thickness, and dropping forward close to the cheek, not hanging by the side of the head like a Foxhound's.

The Jaw, upper and under, should be strong and muscular, should be of fair punishing strength, but not so in any way to resemble the Greyhound or modern English Terrier. There should not be much falling away below the eyes. This part of the head should, however, be moderately chiselled out, so as not to go down in a straight line like a wedge.

The Nose, towards which the muzzle must gradually taper, should be black.

The Eyes should be dark in colour, small, and rather deep set, full of fire, life and intelligence; as nearly as possible circular in shape.

The Teeth should be nearly as possible level, i.e., the upper teeth on the outside of the lower teeth.

2. Neck.—Should be clean and muscular, without throatiness, of fair length, and gradually widening to the shoulders.

3. Shoulders—Should be long and sloping, well laid back, fine at the points, and clearly cut at the withers.

Chest.—Deep and not broad.

4. Back—should be short, straight and strong, with no appearance of slackness.

Loin.—Should be powerful and very slightly arched. The fore ribs should be moderately arched, the back ribs deep, and the dog should be well ribbed up.

5. Hind Quarters—Should be strong and muscular, quite free from droop or crouch: the thighs long and powerful; hocks near the ground, the dog standing well up on them like a Foxhound and not straight in the stifle.

6. Stern—Should be set on rather high and carried gaily, but not over the back or curled. It should be of good strength, anything approaching a "pipe-stopper" tail being exceptionally objectionable.

7. Legs.—Viewed from any direction, must be straight, showing little or no appearance of an ankle in front. They should be strong in bone throughout, short and straight to pastern. Both fore and hind legs should be carried straight forward in travelling, the stifles not turned outward. The elbows should hang perpendicular to the body, working free of the side.

Feet—Should be round, compact and not large. The soles hard and tough. The toes moderately arched and turned neither in or out.

8. Coat—Should be straight, flat, smooth, hard, dense and abundant. The belly and underside of the thighs should not be bare.

Colour.—White should predominate; brindle, red, or liver markings are objectionable. Otherwise this point is of little or no importance.

9. Symmetry, Size and Character.—The dog must present a general gay, lively and active appearance; bone and strength in a small compass are essentials, but this must not be taken to mean that a Fox Terrier should be cloggy, or in any way coarse—speed and endurance must be looked to as well as power, and the symmetry of the Foxhound taken as a model. The Terrier, like the Hound, must on no account be leggy, nor must he be too short in the leg. He should stand like a cleverly made hunter, covering a lot of ground, yet with a short back, as before stated. He will then attain the highest degree of propelling power, together with the greatest length of stride that is compatible with the length of his body. Weight is not a certain criterion of a Terrier's fitness for his work—general shape, size, and contour are the main points—and if a dog can gallop and stay, and follow his fox up a drain, it matters little what his weight is to a pound or so, though, roughly speaking, it may be said he should not scale over 20lbs. in show condition.

WIREHAIRED.

This variety of the breed should resemble the smooth sort in every respect except the coat, which should be broken. The harder and more wiry the texture of the coat is, the better. On no account should the dog look or feel woolly; and there should be no silky hair about the poll or elsewhere. The coat should not be too long, so as to give the dog a shaggy appearance, but at the same time it should show a marked and distinct difference all over from the smooth species:—

DISQUALIFYING POINTS.

1. Nose.—White, cherry, or spotted to a considerable extent with either of these colours.
2. Ears.—Prick, tulip, or rose.
3. Mouth.—Much undershot or much overshot.

A Loyal Friend.

A DOG I know of glorious kind,
Though humble in my own degree,
Who to this lowliness is blind
And for me has a friendly mind
In spite of his proud pedigree;
And if at times we haply meet,
However wet the ground or grass
Yet nobly will he soil his feet
Rather than I unwelcomed pass.

NO SURPRISE.—"Willie, mamma has a great surprise for you." "I know what it is—big brother is home from school!" "How did you know?" "My bank won't rattle any more!

"ME no talkee Chinee velly well," explained the hostess, upon greeting the visitor from the newest republic. "No matter," responded the latter, "I can converse tolerably well in English."

COMMERCE AND SCIENCE IN UGANDA.

THE allocation of half a million from the British financial surplus of last year to the development of Uganda and British East Africa has directed public attention to the remarkable success of the Uganda Railway, and to the prosperity of Uganda itself, which promises ere long to become one of the most important of the smaller dependencies of the British Empire. The Uganda Railway, it will be remembered, was initiated and constructed by a Unionist Government; the Radicals of the time doing all they knew to discredit and throw cold water on the whole scheme. Much changes have, however, taken place since that date; and even Radicals are now compelled to acknowledge the success of the railway, and the brilliant future which appears to be in store for both Uganda and British East Africa.

The following items will suffice to illustrate the marvellous progress of the Uganda Railway; eight years ago its receipts were the moderate sum of £132,000; they have now increased to the magnificent total of £424,000; a deficit of £60,000 in the fourth year of the present century being now converted into a profit of £135,000. So great, indeed, is the prosperity of the six hundred miles of railway connecting Mombasa with the Victoria Nyanza that it is now utterly inadequate to cope with the work it has to perform, and it has consequently been decided to use £300,000 in general improvments to the line, and especially in increasing the rolling stock. Of the remainder of the half million, £25,000 is to be expended on the construction of the Uganda portion of a new line of railway which is to connect the Protectorate with the Congo Free State. Of not less importance is the grant of £100,000 for the construction of metalled roads suitable to motor traffic, on the western side of Uganda, by means of which it will be practicable to deliver the cotton crops of the interior on the shores of the Victoria Nyanza at a cheap rate.

It is these cotton crops which confer, and will in the future confer, in still greater degree, its financial prosperity on the Protectorate; for the interior of Uganda produces just those particular grades of cheap cotton which at the present constitute the chief needs of the Lancashire mills, and for which there is every likelihood of a steadily increasing demand in the near future.

It is understood that the half million, after it has been profitably used in developing the resources of this part of East Africa, will eventually be repaid into the British treasury, so that the much-tried taxpayer has, in this respect at any rate, to congratulate himself that the money extracted from his pocket has been well spent.

But it is not only in commercial matters that Uganda is steadily forging ahead; for, amid the numerous calls on their time, the officials have made (for they could scarcely have found it) leisure to establish and carry on, in conjunction with British East Africa, a scientic journal of their own, of which the fourth part of the second volume is now before us. Among other interesting articles in this issue of The Journal of the East Africa and Uganda Natural History Society, attention may be specially directed to one by Mr. R. J. Cunninghame on the so-called water elephant, and to a second by Mr. Geoffrey Williams on an apparently unknown large animal from the Uasingishu district.

In the first of these the author gives fuller notes than have been hitherto published of the "water-elephant," as seen by Mr. Le Petit on two occasions in the Congo area in 1907. This observer confidently states that the animals he saw were not small elephants, as they had relatively longer necks, shorter trunks, and no tusks; while their tracks, as seen on the shore, were quite different from those of elephants, recalling in some respects the spoor of rhinoceros. In habits the animals are stated by the natives—to whom they are perfectly familar—to be aquatic and nocturnal; most of their time being spent in the water, but feeding being accomplished at night amid the rank vegetation of the shores of the lakes and rivers. Those seen on the second occasion by Mr. Le Petit are stated to have probably dived deep into the waters of the lake, above which they were showed themselves again within the observer's view.

In the opinion of many naturalists and travellers the "water-elephant" is nothing more than the dwarf elephant of the Congo. Mr. Cuninghame, whose account is based on verbal communication from Mr. Le Petit, is, however, convinced of the truth of that observer's opinion as to the distinctness of the water-elephant, and considers that it represents an undescribed generic type. The only way to settle the question is by obtaining a specimen; and efforts should be made by sportsmen and travellers in the Congo to do so.

As regards the unknown animal of Uasingishu, this was seen at early dawn by Mr. Williams several years ago, and is described as resembling a large bear in general appearance, with all the limbs heavily furred, but the hind-quarter comparatively bare. The colour was dark, and possibly brindled. When first seen, it was sitting up on its hind-quarters in bear-like fashion; but it soon stumbled off on all fours, when it was fired at, but unfortunately missed by Mr. Williams, who is perfectly confirmed that it was neither an ant-bear nor a baboon. It is known to the Nandi, who call it "chemosit," and when one of them was shown a natural history book, he at once selected the picture of a bear as being most like the unknown animal. It is reported to have been seen again by a European quite recently; and the author once heard of a skin at Kabras, but was unable to obtain it. The Nandi also say that they once killed a specimen, which had broken through the roof of a hut by burning the whole structure, with the creature, which had previously killed all the inhabitants inside.

The "chemosit" is much dreaded by the natives, who describe it as nocturnal and something like a hyæna, in appearance only much larger, and very savage in disposition.

Even if the creature be only a bear, it would be of great interest, as those animals are unknown in Africa to the south of Atlas. But here, again, it is little use speculating as to what the animal really is (supposing it be an unknown type) until a specimen is obtained.

Fish-culture in British East Africa, by Mr. D. E. Hutchins, and notes on some of the chief biting flies of the same area, by Mr. S. A. Neave, form other items in the contents of an unusually interesting number.

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

The "First" Extra Monsoon Meeting, run in Calcutta last Saturday, was not happily named as the Stewards had no intention of extending the season beyond that limit and the curtain was in many people's idea surely down not a moment too soon. Some of our contemporaries we note congratulate themselves upon these meetings having been run all throughout in such nice bright sunshiney weather. It is refreshing to meet an optimist at any time and we supposed that there are some people in this world who are very like the eels of that painful fable. Some people are natural Salamanders and enjoy being roasted, but the average plain man will doubtless be found to agree that racing in a temperature such as that with which we have been inflicted for the past two or three weeks is the reverse of a joy. Saturday's proceedings were not of an extraordinarily interesting nature and we witnessed only an average day's sport. The going was extremely hard as was only to be expected and no artificial means had been availed of to soften the courses. Rain fell in town and in the suburbs of Calcutta on Saturday morning but it carefully omitted to strike the racecourse where it was most wanted, the consequence being that everything was in an iron-bound condition. The sand-track in dry weather is in our humble opinion a dangerous course upon which to gallop a horse and even in such weather it is not a surface upon which an owner would willingly risk a valuable animal did not dira necessitas compel him to do so. There was a card of six races last Saturday and of this list two were over hurdles and one was for C.L.H. chargers, so that left three events upon which speculators could gamble with any certainty of the money not being "in the air." Proceedings opened with the Consolation Pony Hurdle Handicap for which Ormley and Spicy Breezes started level favourites, Wal also having a good many supporters. Spicy Breezes was well ridden by Mr. Lionel Platt, who made use of every ounce of the nice weight the pony had and was rewarded by a comfortable win at the finish from Wal, upon whom Anno Domini must by now be telling.

The Consolation Hurdle Handicap for horses produced a field of seven and the newly-landed Chow Chow, trained in Bloss' stable, was forced to the head of the market by weight of money though he was obviously lacking in condition. Keenadan, who has run very consistenly, was also backed, but the winner turned up in Fame, who ran a gallant race and was well ridden by Northmore. The hard going stopped Keenadan and the beat Chow Chow, who was beaten very early in the proceedings.

For the Pony Consolation Flat Race Lady Ratcliffe was well supported, but Rowley Mile, who was in on 24lb. better terms to her than when they last met, got home very well ridden by Thakur, Major Winter's riding boy. The favourite connected all right in the next race, the Final Plate, for which Second to None went out at two's, with a good deal of money on and, leading throughout, won without any trouble from Royal Colours and Bushey Dame. Winsome and Pressy started level in the betting at two's for the Consolation Plate for Horses and after a very fine race Winsome won thanks principally to Major Winter's excellent jockeyship. For the Balaclava Handicap both Sincerity and Hard Times were backed and the former carried most of the money and although she ran the reverse of kindly had not much difficulty in winning at the finish by two lengths, giving Mr. R. Muir his maiden win under rules. Details appear elsewhere.

The Calcutta Monsoon Meeting, 1912, concluded on Saturday last after a very successful series. Although we have had one day's less racing this season than we had last, we think it will be readily admitted that the sport has been of a higher class taking it all round, and were it not for certain unfortunate circumstances in connection with the traffic of these meetings, we could say without any reservation that they had been an extraordinary success. Last season we commenced racing a fortnight earlier and the dates were somewhat differently arranged. We are not certain that it would not be the better plan to always commence these meetings earlier, for the month of September is pre-eminently the worst in the whole of the year, and our experiences of the last fortnight also, have not been particularly happy, for the weather has been of the very worst, and both horses and those who ride and train them, have felt the strain very considerably. The season has been unfortunately notable for a very considerable amount of tension between the controlling body, and those over whom they preside, and it is an open secret that there have been more disagreements and more bad feeling created over these meetings this year, than has probably ever before been the case. The principal complaint on the owners' and riders' part has been that needless reports are made by the Stipendiary Steward to the C.T.C., that after every day's racing a long list of alleged malpractices are handed up to the Stewards, and that a great deal has been made out of very little upon more than one occasion. There is the further allegation, that whilst this extreme vigilance has been exercised where the gentlemen riders are concerned, very little notice has been taken of other matters that seemed to invite an equal amount of attention. So far as the public are concerned, no information is ever vouchsafed to them by the C.T.C., in fact the officials of that Club have been told to give the Press no information whatever as to either the fact or occurrences of Turf enquiries. The Press and the public are therefore kept entirely in the dark, and as it is public property all over the paddock when anyone is up before the Stewards, and it is generally known what he is up for, there is a very pressing necessity that the custom followed in other countries should be adopted in Calcutta, namely, that when an explanation has been called for and accepted as satisfactory, an announcement should be made to that effect. As things are, save and except in a case of a grave nature, when the ultimate result is, that some person or persons are warned off the course, the public are none the wiser as to what has been done, or whether accusations such as we are familiar with, in the present season, have any foundation in fact or not. There have been undoubtedly many cases this season, where there was hardly any justification for the persons in question being asked for explanations. It is, we believe, a custom in Australia to consider that being had up before the Stewards and asked for an explanation of your horse's running leaves no stigma behind it, but in most other places these views are not held and the mere fact of an owner or a jockey being "on the mat" is in itself deemed to be a grave aspersion upon his integrity. We do not quarrel for one moment with the policy which errs upon the side of ultra-vigilance, but we think that if it is intended to strike, it is always better to be certain that there is a target in front of us, and that there is no doubt about our being able to hit it. Any other procedure is, in our view, a waste of good ammunition and is also apt to let the enemy know the weakness of your own position. Where, however, there is just cause for opening fire, it is desirable that the full weight of the broadside should be launched against the mark and we say, hit hard, and hit again and let there be no doubt about your intentions. A system which breeds such an atmosphere of mistrust, as that which at present exists, cannot surely be good. Rightly or wrongly, the Stewards are held to have been persuaded more than once, that wrong was being done, when as a matter of fact there was a perfectly feasible explanation for anything that may have happened. This, however, brings us back to our original point, namely, that it would be better in the interests of everyone concerned if the results of Turf enquiries were announced to the public through the medium of the Press. It is not in any spirit of undue curiosity that the public or the Press desire that this should be done but in order that we should not have procured for us such a situation as that which now exists. Stewards are naturally desirous as everyone else of seeing racing kept clean in every department, and their endeavours to do so are commendable in the highest degree, but there is such a thing as over-doing confidential reports, and when allegations of the nature of those which are current at the moment are made, there must be something to be said on both sides. So far, however, as the public are concerned, they can only base any conclusions upon hearsay evidence, and we have no doubt that some of those conclusions may be totally erroneous.

Turning to the statistics of the racing, two owners have come out a long way ahead of everyone else, namely, Messrs. Valentine and Vernon, who raced in partnership together, and Mr. J. D. Scott. The former owe their success in the main to the admirable record put up by that beautiful pony May Kenley, who has won three times out of five starts and is a mare destined in our opinion to come very close to the top. We can almost find it in us to regret that she should have been out so often at such a very trying season of the year, as we hold a very good opinion of her and believe her to be quite first-class. Messrs. Valentine and Vernon have, however, had a very considerable measure of success with almost all their horses and their new purchase, Second to None, named, as we believe, after a brand of whisky for which Mr. Valentine happens to be agent, has won both times that he has been out. This is a very good performance, as the horse has not been in this country much more than two months. He and Chow Chow were both imported by Mr. R. Powell and have certainly come on very quickly, especially the former. Both of them, we understand, were to the fore at the unregistered meetings in the Colonies and Chow Chow is a particularly promising jumper. Other horses in this string that have helped to bring grist to the mill are, Chin Chin, Bushey Dame, Master Val and numerous others who have run well up even though they have not won. Lady Ratcliffe for instance has shown us a very consistent record, ditto Pressy and Gatling Gun, and the feature of the stable's success which is the most present is the consistent manner in which their horses have obviously always been "out for it." Mr. Scott has had a particularly good season and has thoroughly earned all the success that he has achieved. Sea Lad's wonderful record has placed him in a considerably higher class than that to which he formerly belonged. He has won all the four races for which he started and his owner very wisely sent him back to Dehra to give him a rest before the cold weather campaign. Proprietor, Royal Colours, Miss Clare, Winna, Fame, Pat C., all trained in this stable, have likewise contributed their share to Mr. Scott's success, even though they are not all owned by the popular trainer-owner. The only ones that have not scored of the lot he brought down with him are, Val, Red Tape and Idle. There are a number of owners who come next but have only won about one-third of the sum in stakes appropriated by the two at the head of the list. Mr. Johnston-Stewart and Mr. Burjorjee have scored by the means of one horse each, the latter being chiefly indebted to that very promising hurdler Herald and Mr. Johnston-Stewart has won four races with Lady Leonard. Mr. Evers comes out top of the "Riding Averages" and has scored a very high percentage of successes, 10 wins out of 24, and there are a whole number of other G.R's. and professionals all close together. Major Winter has not had all the success he deserves but on the three occasions that he has ridden winners he has displayed form that is quite above the amateur merit. The most successful winning trainers has been Mr. Scott who has a score of eleven winners to his credit, Bloss being second with nine, Butlin third with five. The figures are published in another column.

Odol possesses
the three essential characteristics of a good dentifrice and mouthwash:

1. It is genuinely antiseptic and prevents decay of the teeth.
2. It is innocuous to the most sensitive mouth.
3. It is agreeable and very refreshing to the palate.

A liquid antiseptic is the only one which is able to penetrate all the hidden cavities of the teeth—tooth-powders or pastes never can do this—but in the case of Odol the antiseptic does its work thoroughly, the good effects lasting for hours after the mouth has been rinsed with it.

To enable owners racing at Poona to enter, the Bangalore autumn races fixed for the 5th and 8th October have been postponed to the 24th and 26th idem, entries closing on the 10th and 17th.

THE closed meeting at Poona on Tuesday, the 17th instant, began at 12-30 P.M. and finished up at 6-30, a card of eleven events being run through. In spite of the awful heat there was a good attendance and interesting racing was witnessed throughout.

The Little Arab Plate set the ball rolling and provided a comfortable win for Major Greig's Castaway, who beat Tofic Pasha, the favourite, by a neck, nicely ridden by Captain Fell, who scored twice more during the day.

The Novice Handicap, for which no fewer than fifty-nine had entered, was divided into three races and the third division was the next event on the programme, Pherozeshah, ridden by Brown, winning comfortably from Abdul Aziz.

The Kempton Park Plate proved a very easy thing for Captain Fell and Mr. Wilson's Pretty Good Sort, who won as she liked by six lengths from Silver Bolt. This race was followed by an interval for lunch.

The Open Polo Plate re-opened the proceedings and in this Patchwork had a very easy win ridden by Captain Fell. Next came the first division of the Novice Handicap, Baldwin being established favourite in a field of fourteen. He was early prominent but was done when they reached the straight, finishing in the ruck. A good finish giving Raspberry a neck victory over Solar Star, Kaharaman the same distance away third, Redmonk fourth also a neck behind.

The Arab Polo Plate gave Captain Fell's Selim an easy win and then came the new Paddock Plate with a field of fifteen. This was a big upset, the winner turned up in Haify, who paid the nourishing dividend of Rs. 373 for a win and 71-8 for a place on the Tote. The machine returned Rs. 138 on Sherab, who finished second, and Rs. 176-8 on Real, who was third.

The Sandown Park Plate was won by Mr. Greenfield's Pewter, ridden by Captain O'Brien Butler and the latter also had the winning ride on Nimar in the Lingfield Plate.

The Totalizator Plate gave us another fine finish. It looked as if Mafoota or Mary B. would win half way down the straight, but Brown brought Bright Metal along at a great pace and just snatched the verdict by a head from Mary B., Mafoota third the same distance away.

The Novice Handicap Second Division wound up the programme and proved another tribute to the handicapping, heads dividing the first four at the finish. Sinclair, well ridden by Firth, beating Mulla out of first place with Reminder third and Good Evening fourth.

THE first day of the Poona Second Meeting on Saturday, 21st instant, attracted a record crowd to the racecourse. All society was present and Sir George and Lady Clarke arrived in state to see the Governor's Cup run for and remained till just before the last race. The Totalisator did a lot of business but it was not a good day for punters.

A start was made with the All Pony Plate. Mauveron made most of the running, but after travelling in the ruck till the bend, Regalia came through from this point and won very comfortably by four lengths, giving Brown the first of four winning rides on the day.

The Lanowli Plate brought out a field of eleven. Wireless and Master Mason led in turn to the straight where Nakib came away and won very easily by three lengths.

Then came the Ganeshkhind Plate with seven starters and we were treated to a fine finish. Lumination, Paul Pry and Sequent were prominent to the bend, Paul Pry leading into the straight. Here Criton joined them and in a splendid race beat Paul Pry on the post by a head: Sequent third same distance away.

The big race of the day, the Governor's Cup, was the next item. A baker's dozen came under starter's orders. Real Gold and Regent received most support, but the latter ran disappointingly and failed to place. Real Gold, however, justified the confidence of his supporters and won in convincing fashion by four lengths. There was some delay at the start, Lord Durham, Valens, Mutrood, Real Gold and Tajilmulook giving a lot of trouble. At length the gate went up to an excellent start. Lama quickly took command, and attended by Young Salanic and Real Gold, led to the straight. Here they were joined by Tajilmulook and the two candidates from the Ali bin Talib stable were out in front from the distance. Real Gold won very comfortably by four lengths from Parliament, who came through at the finish to beat Tajilmulook a neck for second place.

The Western India Stakes with a field of fourteen, including all the cracks, provided a big surprise. The Loaf had been established favourite at the Tote but was never in the picture. He struck into the heels of something else during the race and came to grief, giving Brown a heavy fall, luckily without causing an injury, for the rider was able to ride and win the two remaining races of the afternoon. Wayward and Wild made the running to the straight where Hamara came through and won with his head in his chest by six lengths from The Cellarer, who beat Five Crown a neck. The Tote paid the fine dividend of Rs. 560 for a win and Rs. 102-8 for a place.

The New Plate provided a win for Mr. F. M. Garda's Bombastic, who took command at the turn and won comfortably by three lengths from Langton. This victory must to some extent have compensated Mr. Garda for the failure of The Loaf in the previous race.

The Kirkee Plate closed the programme and brought out a number of flyers. Rajput, Zoolphokar, Young Majub, Abdul Malik were all well supported. Rajput made the running to the turn where Abdul Malik came to the front and after a good race with Young Majub beat him by a length and a quarter, thus securing his third consecutive victory. Sinclair finished third a head behind Young Majub.

THE Official Measurer of the Calcutta Turf Club will make his autumn tour very shortly. The dates and itinerary of this tour will be found in our sporting columns.

THE weekly mud sports held by the Bombay Gymkhana on the 18th instant attracted fewer competitors than usual, but a good programme was put through. There was no scurry, which was regretted. The jumping competition was won by Mr. M. Rommmel, with Captain Maclean and Mr. J. R. Landon filling the places. Mr. Landon took the tent-pegging, being the only competitor to get all three pegs. Mr. R. Stewart was second and Mr. J. R. Webster third. Partnered by Captain Maclean Mr. J. R. Landon also won the ride and tie race, which was a most exciting event. Competitors entered in pairs and started from the first mark, one mounted and the other on foot. The mounted man rode to the second mark, handed the horse to the syce, and proceeded on foot to the third mark, where he picked up his partner, the two finishing together. The race ended in a tie between Messrs. Landon and Maclean and Graham and Webster, but on running it off Landon and Maclean won easily. The Polo Ball and Bucket Race was won by Mr. L. Graham, who, though not fulfilling all the conditions, was nearest the mark. There were two events for mem sahibs. In the Bending Race Mrs. Wagstaffe won from Mrs. M'Causland and Mrs. Richardson. The Egg and Spoon Race brought out 15 starters, Mrs. Pollock being declared the winner.

THE Poona Junior Tournament began on Monday, the 23rd instant, when three games were down for decision. In the first of these the 34th Poona Horse met and defeated the Mahableshwar Gymkhana by 6 goals to 1; in the next the Poona Gymkhana beat the Bombay Gymkhana by 14 goals to 7; and in the third the Bangalore Gymkhana beat the 127th Baluchis by 7 goals to 4. The drawings will be found in our Polo columns: details in our next issue.

Three more games were played on Tuesday evening with the following results:—33rd Light Cavalry beat 7th Dragoon Guards by 7 goals to 3; 26th Cavalry beat 7th Hussars by 4 goals to 2; 3rd Sappers and Miners beat 12th Pioneers by 13 goals to 5.

WE would draw the attention of our readers to the advertisemet appearing further on notifying several important changes in the Time Table of the Bengal-Nagpur Railway, which will come into force from the 1st October. It will be seen that the Time Table of the Bombay mail trains has been considerably modified.

THE British Olympic Council issued a preliminary report on the results of the 1912 Olympiad at Stockholm. At the outset the council points out that there is no doubt that if the Press had interested itself more keenly in the Olympic Games at Stockholm there would have been more enthusiasm in this country, and, furthermore, the failure to raise adequate funds was due to the apathy of the public, and not to want of effort on the part of the British Olympic Council.

In regard to Great Britain's poor showing in the Games, the report says:—

> The council is convinced that our failure to obtain better results at Stockholm is due, first to the failure of the general public of the United Kingdom to take the Olympic Games seriously, a failure which necessarily reacted on the enthusiasm of individual competitors, and, secondly, to the lack of adequate opportunities for training under the direction of trainers acquainted with the best scientific methods.

Continuing, the council points out that, in order to supply this lack, a very large expenditure would have been necessary, and there were no funds from which this expenditure could be met. The public will, therefore, have their choice as to whether this can be altered in the future, and theirs, says the report, is the final decision.

After dealing with the programme and results, the report sets forth tables showing the scoring of entries and points, and promises that the proportion of entries to points scored will be fully analysed in the full official report now being prepared.

This official report will contain full details of the games at Stockholm, together with notes on their management and an analysis of their results. For these details, says the preliminary report, it may be well to wait if a considered judgment upon the whole of a somewhat complicated question is to be formed.

In addition, a further document will be issued containing a sketch of the future policy recommended by the council if this country is to be represented adequately at the Games of 1916 in Berlin.

AMERICA has hitherto not taken formal notice of the criticisms made on the methods of her athletes at the Olympic Games, but the American Olympic committee on the 1st August authorised Mr. J. I. Sullivan, America's Olympic commissioner, to reply. He says:—

"Judging from the number of letters appearing in the London newspapers since the Olympic Games, one is forced to the conclusion that Great Britain's sportsmanship is of a low order if it is represented by the defenders of its athletic degeneracy, who have been writing articles for several English newspapers.

"Americans who have participated in every competition since the beginning of international competition, and who have watched America wipe England off the map, athletically, do not wonder why England cannot succeed.

"Instead of realising the true situation they become abusive, and in order to explain why Sweden and Finland defeated them they abuse American athletes. The charges that Americans pocketed the competitors of other nations is absolutely false. When our athletes went to the mark they ceased to be a team. Each American ran his own race, and did not try to obstruct any one.

"Team work tactics and obstructive methods came to us from England. Americans had many lessons in obstructing, pocketing, and in team work in the London Stadium in 1908, when many Englishmen denounced their athletes for not carrying out their instructions in team work.

"The charge of beating the pistol and knocking down hurdles shows that the critic who makes the charge knows nothing about the stand taken by the American committee. In the United States we penalise for a false start. At the Olympic Games in London they did not have penalties.

"We disqualify a man for knocking down a hurdle, and the records at Stockholm prove that we objected to 'no penalty' starts. We asked that the competitor be disqualified for knocking down a hurdle.

"Over sixty hurdles were knocked down at Stockholm, many by English cracks. It is much better to have American methods of controlling athletes than to have the methods adopted by certain Englishmen at Shepherd's Bush in 1908."

THE great drawback to most of our sports is their costliness, observes a London scribe. Hunting and shooting are the hobbies of the comparatively rich. A man must be well off to indulge in golf. Cricket takes up a lot of time and time is, now-a-days, money. As for football—there, only professionals play football. The new sport is driving a taxicab in the fine old Phaeton manner. It is relatively economical. A driver who knocked down the post of a refuge in Cheapside, struck the kerb on one side of the street, then struck the kerb on the other side, ran his cab along the pathway for twenty-five yards, and smashed the iron and glass of a shop basement, did it all for a paltry outlay of 20s. The game is so cheap that it is likely to become popular. For a few shillings more it would be possible to knock down an old lady or run over a child.

THE final match in the Inter-Departmental Tennis Tournament at Simla was played on the Kennedy House courts on the 17th instant between the winning team of the Foreign Office and a team selected from the best players of the other departments. The teams were composed of six players and the match was played in doubles. Mr. G. M. Coates and Major St. John, Foreign Office, were beaten by Mr. R. A. Gamble, Commerce and Industry and Mr. F. H. Gardiner, Military Finance. Messrs. A. H. Grant and L. H. Green, of the Foreign Office, were beaten by Mr. A. R. Murray, P.W.D., and Mr. L. A. Forbes, Legislative Department, and Messrs. Clarke and F. A. Emmet, Foreign Office, were beaten by Captain Price, Army Department, and Mr. D. MacDonnell, Revenue and Agricultural Department. Thus the team of the other departments won the match, all three pairs beating the three pairs from the Foreign Office. At the close of the match the six cups given by six Secretaries to the Government of India were presented to the Foreign Office team, which had won the whole Inter-Departmental Tournament, by Lady Carlyle.

THAT fine athlete, W. R. Applegarth, of the Polytechnic Harriers, is in splendid form just now. Last week we announced his breaking the 200 yards record at the South London Harriers Sports and now we hear that he has equalled the British record for the 220 yards. At the London Athletic Club Sports at Stamford Bridge last Saturday he won the 220 yards in 21⅘secs. equalling the British record put up by C. G. Wood at Stamford Bridge so long ago as 25th June 1887. The world's record for the distance is 21⅕secs. on a straight track standing to the credit of B. J. Wefers at Manhattan, New York, in 1896. R. C. Craig, Philadelphia, in 1910 and also in 1911 and D. J. Kelly, Washington, in 1906.

THE Golf competition for the Calcutta Cup at St. Andrews was won on the 20th instant by F. Vickerman, who beat F. Tulloch in the final by 2 up and 1 to play.

THE twenty-third season of the Calcutta Rugby Challenge Cup Tournament was concluded on Tuesday last when the 1st West Ridings Regiment met and defeated the Calcutta F.C. in the final by 2 goals and 1 try (13 points) to nil, thus winning the Cup for the seventh year in succession. Calcutta had beaten the King's Own Regiment and the United Services in the earlier stages and the West Ridings had accounted for the Leicester Regiment after no fewer than three drawn games.

Ernest Barry, the World's Sculling Champion having decided to give Durnan, the Canadian sculler, a match before accepting Arnst's challenge for a return race this year, the New Zealander withdrew his challenge and deposit and has returned to his home in the Antipodes. He has decided nothing definitely as to when he will challenge again but hopes that next time Barry will accede to his terms and go out and meet him on Australian waters. At any rate as Durnan will be meeting Barry in October the champion if he succeeds and is so minded need not give Arnst a return match until next April. If the Barry-Durnan match comes off it will be the Canadian's second bid for championship honours. For in March 1907 he visited Australia and was beaten easily by George Towns, then holder of the title, on the Nepean river.

At Glasgow, on the 20th instant, Hatfield established new figures for the 1,000 yards. He swam the distance in 13mins. 19½secs. The previous record was held by D. Billington, whose time at Liverpool on 22nd July 1905 was 13mins. 34½secs.

As will be seen from the short account in our English Sporting letter this week, Gunner Moir's career as an aspirant for Heavy-Weight Championship honours is practically at an end. Early he had shown great promise, but since his defeat by Tommy Burns the Gunner has done little of account. True he beat Bombardier Wells, but the present champion contributed a lot more to his own defeat than Moir did and if a return contest had been staged it is practically certain that Wells would have turned the tables on his conqueror. This return match had been mooted recently, but after the way Moir was extinguished by P. O. Curran we scarcely think any promoter would put up a purse for the match.

Curran has followed his defeat of Moir by beating the South African George Rodel. The match took place at The Ring, Blackfriars, on the 24th instant, when Rodel was disqualified for a foul in the sixteenth round. Bombardier Wells has challenged Curran.

Cowler, Bill Chase, and Bandsman Rice are all aspiring to the English Heavy Weight title, but so far none of them have fixed up with the Bombardier. The latter leaves for the States very shortly, and though nothing has been settled regarding his plans when there it is understood that a return match with Palzer, and a match with Jim Savage will be on the programme. Jim Savage is one of the latest White Hopes and recently handed out a big hiding to Tom Kennedy.

Bombardier Wells is a bit of a sprinter. At the Cardiff Stadium on the 2nd August he won the 100 yards handicap easily off a 10½ yards mark, in 9⅗secs., and lifted the £200 prize. Wells was married on the 7th ultimo.

Tommy Burns is making an effort to "come back" and last month fought his first battle since his meeting with Jack Johnson in Australia. The ex-Champion's opponent was Bill Rickard and the match at Vancouver was an exercise canter for Burns, who was all over his man and the bout was stopped in the 6th round.

Luther McCarty, who beat Al Palzer not long ago and was looked upon as the coming champion, ran up against a snag the other day when he met Jess Willard, a Kansas cow puncher, at Madeson Square Garden the other day. The lanky Willard had his man guessing all the way through, hammered him badly and finished up with hardly a scratch. At the same meeting Joe Jeannette met Jeff Madden, the fight being stopped in the second round as Madden clearly had no earthly with the great Jeannette.

The great caribou herds of Newfoundland are one of the most attractive features, from the sportsman's and the naturalist's point of view, of Britain's oldest colony. A most striking example of devotion to science (writes the St. John's correspondent of the Standard of Empire) is afforded by the story of how Mr. A. Radcliffe Dugmore, a young naturalist from the United States, secured photographs of the caribou herds. For six years he has spent the autumn months in the wilds of Newfoundland trying to get camera pictures of these animals. For five years he failed, but at last he has been able to announce his success. Mr. Dugmore holds the same views about the caribou as have been expressed by Mr. Selous, that they are the finest game animals in the world. Every year the great herds move from the north to the south and south-west coasts and vice versâ. The time of their migrations is uncertain being entirely regulated by weather conditions. The whole interior of the island—which has an area larger than Ireland—is one vast deer park, wholly uninhabited. A large number of the caribou in the interior do not migrate. The great deer migration is a wonderful sight. For days the whole countryside seems to be in motion.

It is not generally known that the African elephant is never domesticated, says the Shooting Times. His intelligence is much greater than that of the Indian and is of a rather different kind. It possesses a remarkable herd wisdom, which expresses itself in many surprising ways. It is generally believed that the bull is the chief fighter, and by far the more formidable. This is not true of the African, at any rate. On the contrary, it is the cow who is the fighter and protector of the herd. The bulls are of two classes—the herd bulls and the others. The latter are the old and the weak, and, having no part in the life of the herd, roam the forest singly. At the first suggestion of danger the herd bull is closely surrounded by the cows. A certain number of them, while protecting him on all sides, gently "hustle" him forward, while others charge in the direction of the enemy, whom, if he be a man, they can scent a thousand yards off, though they cannot see him until within a hundred yards. If a hunter should be so clever as to shoot a herd bull—a very difficult feat—the cows gather round and try to carry him off, and it is only when they are convinced that he is dead that they will consent to leave him. In return for the protection thus afforded him the bull cheerfully takes over the more "domestic" duties that his "wives" are compelled to neglect. Every bull elephant is a born nursemaid. Professor Akeley has often seen bulls playing with calves and generally looking after them. The herd has a remarkable organisation of its own. "Look-outs" are regularly posted, and when they suspect danger they give a preliminary warning—a sort of "on guard"—whereupon the whole herd stops feeding and listens with the trunk to the ground.

In a recent issue we advocated ostrich farming for India. We now learn that Mr. John Hagenbeck is experimenting with an ostrich farm in Ceylon. He has recently imported a couple of African birds, which are about three years old and just in their prime. They had rather a rough voyage, but are now reported to be picking up. Mr. Hagenbeck is keeping close observation on them to see how the Colombo climate affects them. If they do well, he intends to start a syndicate to run an ostrich farm, or else get Government to take it up, being fully convinced that there is a lot of money to be made from the sale of the feathers, the prices for which according to his latest information are advancing.

In a chat with a Times of Ceylon representative Mr. Hagenbeck said he had ordered the incubators from England. He could not expect any eggs just yet because the birds were not used to the climate. But he thought Ceylon ought to suit them. If they did not improve in Colombo he intended sending them up-country to see how they would do there. Ostriches were paying well in Australia, America, and Madagascar.

Mr. Hagenbeck mentioned that he had had a letter from a gentleman at Karachi, drawing his attention to the likelihood of ostriches succeeding in India.

The question was lately discussed by the State authorities, and the climate and other conditions appeared to be eminently suitable for the successful rearing of the birds. The only consideration which prevented the experiment being tried as a State concern was the difficulty in securing continuous and intelligent supervision. But the State would have no objection to encouraging private enterprise. A better position than that mentioned could scarcely be found not only on account of its climatic conditions but also owing to its situation with the proposed Karachi-Calais Railway and its comparative proximity to the new capital at Delhi and the centres of trade at Karachi and Bombay.

Mr. Hagenbeck added that if he could not succeed in Ceylon he would try that part of India.

Last Thursday's programme at the Electric Theatre contained in addition to a number of comic films some very interesting pictures of strawberry harvesting. There was another of those exciting films illustrating fighting between Red Skins and Settlers of the real Fenimore Cooper stamp, and two other dramas made up the bill of fare. On Saturday another excellent bill was put through. The pictures depicting a series of battle scenes and the more dramatic incidents of the War of American Independence were really very fine. The Girl and the Motor Boat was a most exciting drama with the poor and rich suitors, the former the favoured whom the other tries to ruin. A motor boat race is introduced which is won by the heroine and virtue is triumphant and the villain scorned. The programme had some very special comic films, that entitled Chumps alone being worth a visit to the show.

The Michelin Aero-Target Competition has been won this year by the pilot Gaubert, who carried Lieutenant Scott, an American, as marksman.

A prize of 50,000 francs was gained by dropping twelve projectiles out of fifteen on to a target measuring 20 metres in diameter from a height of at least 200 metres. A second prize of 25,000 francs was secured through depositing 8 out of fifteen projectiles on to a rectangular target measuring 120 by 40 metres from a height of not less than 800 metres.

London Week by Week.

London, Friday, 6th September 1912

Might as well assert the Britisher's privilege and begin with a grumble I suppose. I have said all I intend to say—or rather all I dare say in print—on the subject of what we had for "weather" last month, so that outlet for murmuring is closed. But here we are again: this is Leap Year and it would appear that wind and wet apart and uncomfortable months not taken into account, the very year itself is wrong. At any rate it doesn't appear to be living up to its reputation; in other words, ladies are not doing justice to their opportunities. Their privilege of proposing to a man, and of marrying him will he will he, ought to have resulted in a marked increase in the marriage rate for 1912. But the Registrar-General's just issued quarterly return shows that the rate was only 9·8 per thousand, whereas the average for the corresponding quarters of the ten previous years was 11·3. These figures are an irresistible argument for a more consistent exercise of Leap Year rights. Let the ladies, during the four months that yet remain, cast their nets, resort to their beguiling ways, and at the opportune moment pop the question, and thus remove from us as a nation the terrible stigma of excessive prudence as exemplified in a falling marriage rate.

* * * * * *

That erstwhile very attractive looking and ambitious actress Mrs. Brown Potter has not been much before the public lately; some of us had begun to wonder what new scheme for drawing attention to herself was in the process of incubation. Here it is at last. According to the Christian Commonwealth the lady announces her intention of quitting the stage for the psychic platform. She explains that ever since as a girl she read Appollonius of Tiana's description of adepts in India, "My soul has craved for a true Hindu to show me the light," adding that she has found a Hindu preceptor who understands Gosainthian occultism, who can "satisfy my longing for further enlightenment and has, indeed, already made me realise the vast difference between I and My, and the bridge that spans that gulf." My hat! I wonder if she revisited India would she have the hardihood to deliver herself of this sort of twaddle.

Titled heroines and heroes, life depicted as it is lived in Society, have palled. The vogue of the moment is the play of "atmosphere," of dialect, of the humble lives of humble people. Instance, the success of "Bunty Pulls the Strings," of several of the productions of the Irish players, of "Hindle Wakes." And to a rapidly-growing list must now be added "Little Miss Llewelyn," with which Mr. Edmund Gwenn and Miss Hilda Trevelyan made a triumphant beginning in their joint management at the Vaudeville Theatre on Saturday night. For it is not by any strength of plot or novelty of situation that the new comedy attracts and holds. It attracts by its characterisation, by its humanness, above all by its cleverly suggested atmosphere. It has humour and that rare, elusive quality called charm.

The story is this. Miss Llewelyn, the daughter of a prosperous provincial wine and spirit merchant, is a kind of Welsh Bunty. Her methods are different from those of the Scottish lassie; by soft persuasion and gentle tact she contrives to smooth out the rough places that surround her life. And, of course, she has a love affair. There has come from London to her father's shop to "learn the business." James Barrington, a distinctly aristocratic young man with a wealthy father, and he and Miss Llewelyn quickly fall in love with each other. But there is an obstacle. Miss Llewelyn is engaged, largely from business reasons, to Thomas Griffiths, the son of her father's most formidable trade rival. She discovers, however, that Griffiths has "wronged" a girl and is the father of a little boy; and very gently she makes him realise that he must marry the mother of his child. After that it is the simplest of matters for this Welsh puller of strings to persuade Barrington's father to permit a match which he must have felt was not the most desirable in his son's interests from a worldly point of view; and as by a stirring piece of impromptu eloquence young Barrington succeeds in getting Mr. Llewelyn elected as local president of the Licensed Victuallers' Association—a position he has long envied—the path of true love is left perfectly smooth.

But in such a play as this a bare sketch of the story cannot convey an adequate idea of its true worth. It is its sidelights, its touches of character, its flashes of wit, its episodes, that make "Little Miss Llewelyn" so delightful. There is beauty and pathos in the scene where the little heroine persuades young Griffiths that he must marry the girl he has wronged; there is rich humour, as well as human nature, in the scenes between Mr. Llewelyn and his wife—a squabbling, bickering pair, but lovers at heart; there is sparkle and brisk action; never a moment that is dull.

And the acting could hardly have been improved upon. Mr. Edmund Gwenn has given us many clever character studies, but his Mr. Llewelyn exceeds them all. In ever-varying mood, in the tantrums or smugly self-satisfied, every fleeting facial expression, every gesture builds up character. Miss Hilda Trevelyan was delightful in the name part—tender, yet animated; womanly yet girlish; the embodiment of feminine charm; Mr. E. W. Garden, with some of the Hawtrean manner, was an easy and agreeable James Barrington, and all the Welsh members of the company—in particular Messrs. Tom Owen, R. A. Hopkins, D. H. Munro, Ernest G. Cove and Miss Hannah Jones—hit off their characters perfectly.

Sir Herbert Tree has provided a golden setting to "Drake," the three-act drama in which Mr. Louis N. Parker has attempted to surround the life of Sir Francis Drake with romance, and to emphasise Drake's influence upon our naval growth and our naval supremacy. It is, in many respects, a pageant play. And it will be because of its spectacular beauties, and not for its story and its Imperial lessons, its characterisation, its humour, or its literary qualities, that the piece will fill His Majesty's for many weeks to come.

Mr. Parker has made no serious attempt to tell a strong story, to weave an original plot, or to make Drake out to be anything more than a mighty man of action—and he has permitted most of Drake's mighty deeds to take place "off." It is true that Drake woos and secretly weds Elizabeth Sydenham—but no uneven places are allowed to interrupt love's course; and such intrigue as the play contains is mainly concerned with the endeavours of John Doughty to upset the Admiral's plans.

And since Queen Elizabeth is nearly always most determinedly on Drake's side, he comes out triumphantly in the end without meeting with any more serious obstables than mutiny and treachery on the part of comparatively minor characters.

"Drake" is not one of those plays that bring out the best of acting, and who shall blame Mr. Lyn Harding because he is generally found barking his way through the name part? If it be true that those who have gone before sometimes turn in their graves, then Sir Francis Drake, not to mention the Good Queen Bess, must be very uneasy. Yet Mr. Harding shows dignity when dignity is possible, and he rings out his lines in a way to appeal. Altogether a very manly Drake. Miss Phyllis Neilson Terry makes much—the most, in fact—of Queen Elizabeth, a part rather out of her line, since it gives her no chance to show her girlish freshness, and it is not her fault, we suppose, that she has continually to be talking in italics, as it were.

The cast is very long, but Messrs. Bassett Roe, Herbert Waring, A. E. George, Frederick Ross and Miss Amy Brandon-Thomas, among others, are given plenty of opportunities to distinguish themselves.

All Scotch plays are not "Buntys." That is the moral of the production of "A Scrape o' the Pen" at the Comedy Theatre this week.

Mr. Graham Moffat, who wrote "Bunty," is the author. The characters are fresh and cleverly individualised. The actors are excellent and Scotch. The atmosphere is all haggis and "Auld Lang Syne." But, despite this, the play is trite, and only occasionally entertaining.

The story is "Enoch Arden" in the Doric, and the 1875 costumes are less familiar than the situations. The characters—the dour old Scot and his canny old wife, the returned prodigal, the manly husband, the comic servant, the professional mourner, the pretty wife—are drawn with skill and humour.

But a play must have a plot, and there is little or no interest in Mr. Moffat's plot.

As has been suggested, the acting is admirable. Miss Jean Aylwin, who plays the pretty wife, looks so winsome and acts so cleverly that it is regrettable she has so little to do. Mr. Graham Moffat and Mrs. Moffat as the old Scotch couple are delightfully real and "pawky," and every other part is excellently acted.

Still, after all, the play's the thing, and "A Scrape o' the Pen" is not a very great thing.

PROTECTION OF WILD BIRDS AND ANIMALS.

The following is the text (as amended in Select Committee of the Viceroy's Legislative Council) of the Bill to make better provision for the protection and preservation of certain wild birds and animals.

Whereas it is expedient to make better provision for the protection and preservation of certain wild birds and animals; it is hereby enacted as follows:—

Short Title and Extent.

1. (1) This Act may be called the Wild Birds and Animals Protection Act, 1912; and

(2) It extends to the whole of British India, including British Baluchistan, the Santhal Parganas and the Pargana of Spiti.

Application of Act.

2. (1) This Act applies, in the first instance, to the birds and animals specified in the Schedule, when in their wild state.

(2) The Local Government may, by notification in the local official Gazette, apply the provisions of this Act to any kind of wild bird or animal, other than those specified in the Schedule, which, in its opinion, it is desirable to protect or preserve.

Close Time.

3. The Local Government may, by notification in the local official Gazette, declare the whole year or any part thereof to be a close time throughout the whole or any part of its territories for any kind of wild bird or animal to which this Act applies, or for female or immature wild birds or animals of such kind; and, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, during such close time and within the areas specified in such notification, it shall be unlawful—

(a) to capture any such bird or animal, or to kill any such bird or animal which has not been captured before the commencement of such close time;

(b) to sell or buy, or offer to sell or buy, or to possess, any such bird or animal which has not been captured or killed before the commencement of such close time, or the flesh thereof;

(c) if any plumage has been taken from any such bird captured or killed during such time, to sell or buy, or to offer to sell or buy, or to such plumage.

Penalties.

4. (1) Whoever does, or attempts to do, any act in contravention of section 3, shall be punishable with fine which may extend to fifty rupees.

(2) Whoever, having already been convicted of an offence under this section, is again convicted thereunder shall, on every subsequent conviction, be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to one hundred rupees, or with both.

Confiscation.

5. (1) When any person is convicted of an offence punishable under this Act the convicting magistrate may direct that any bird or animal in respect of which such offence has been committed, or the flesh or any other part of such bird or animal shall be be confiscated.

(2) Such confiscation may be in addition to the other punishment provided by section 4 for such offence.

Cognizance of Offences.

6. No Court inferior to that of a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the second class shall try any offence against this Act.

Power to Grant Exemption.

7. Where the Local Government is of opinion that, in the interests of scientific research, such a course is desirable, it may grant to any person a license, subject to such restrictions and conditions as it may impose entitling the holder thereof to do any act which is by section 3 declared to be unlawful.

Savings.

8. Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to apply to the capture or killing of a wild animal by any person in defence of himself or any other person, or to the capture or killing of any wild bird or animal in bona fide defence of property.

Repeal.

9. The Wild Birds Protection Act, 1887, is hereby repealed.

The Schedule.

(i) Bustards, ducks, floricans, jungle fowl, partridges, peafowl, pheasants, pigeons, quail, sandgrouse, painted snipe, spurfowl, woodcock, herons, egrets, rollers and king-fishers.

(ii) Antelopes, asses, bison, buffaloes, deer, gazelles, goats, hares, oxen, rhinoceroses, and sheep.

THE PRESERVATION OF GAME AND BIRDS.

This question is one which bids fair to take upon it the semblance of the "hardy annual" ere any efficacious steps are taken to prevent the unnecessary slaughter of game and plumage birds. A comprehensive Bill for the protection of animals and birds was, we believe, actually drafted during the last days of Lord Curzon's viceroyalty, but the effort of drafting seems to have exhausted the Supreme Government and the old insufficient Acts remain the sole fence between game and destruction. It is hard to understand why the matter should have been so completely shelved; it is not as though the onus of elaborating details need be shouldered by the supreme authority—it is hardly necessary to observe that a single legislative effort would be inapplicable to an area so large and so varied as the whole country. All that is required from Simla is an act permitting the Local Governments to frame measures appropriate to the needs of each. There has recently been some correspondence in the London Times initiated by Sir H. H. Johnston, on the subject, which, by the way, he dealt with at some length in the Nineteenth Century for July. Sir H. H. Johnston touches specially upon the slaughter of insect-eating birds useful to agriculturists and the destruction of the thamin, the commonest, or once the commonest, of deer in Burma. The two subjects are approached from the same point of view, but the arguments in favour of preservation differ. Insectivorous birds deserve protection on economic grounds which cannot be urged on behalf of any deer, and for this reason it might have been well to keep the two apart. Moreover, the instance cited by Sir H. H. Johnston in his letter to the Times is applicable only to a small area. His correspondent in Upper Burma affirms that the thamin has been wantonly slaughtered all over the province "of pure lust of killing" and that the offenders are not the Burmese, but Europeans and Eurasians. Now, the amount of killing, whether of game beasts or of birds, done by the Burman is exceedingly small, in any part of the province: nearly every Burman is a Buddhist and the law against taking life is observed with a reverence exemplary to the holders of any faith. The situation in Burma therefore furnishes no base for argument applicable to other parts of the Empire where religious scruples do not come into play. As regards the rest of the indictment, that Europeans and Eurasians commit such havoc that preventive measures are become urgently necessary, it can only be assumed that Europeans and Eurasians in that part of the Indian Empire have more time for shooting than is enjoyed by their compatriots elsewhere.

A remark in the letter quoted by Sir H. H. Johnston does something to qualify the weight one could attach to the utterances of the writer. Migratory birds such as duck and teal, he says, "have suffered a woful diminution. Lakes which used to be crowded with them in 1885 are now solitary"—by which last word one would understand "deserted." Does the fact amount to much? We all know that if a lake or jheel be regularly and severely shot, the birds will cease to make it their haunt, seeking peace and security elsewhere. With all deference to Sir H. H. Johnston's correspondent one can attach no importance to the fact that resorts of duck and teal which were crowded in King Theebaw's time are deserted now. It is a case of strictly local extinction: the duck and teal have simply changed their quarters. I am entirely in accord with Mr. Reginald Gilbert, who, with thirty years of shooting experience in this country, holds measures to protect migratory birds such as duck and teal unnecessary. There is nothing so reassuring as the sight of birds migrating en masse: the beholder marvels how the land shall support such an astounding quantity of bird life.

Regarding the question as a whole, I think Mr. Gilbert hits the nail on the head when he urges that the most efficacious mode of preserving big game would be to suspend native gun licenses during the hot weather. It is during the hot weather when the water shrinks, when the drinking places in the jungle are the resort of the native pot hunter by night, that by far the greater part of the mischief is done: and the only practical mode of checking it, is to make the natives' gun licens- applicable to those parts of the year, when thirst does not bring animals easily within the range of his gun. When this question of slaughter during the hot weather over water by night was under discussion a few years ago, an authority who claimed twenty-five years' experience made the truly astounding proposition that every drinking place should be watched. Perhaps wisely he omitted to say who was to do the watching. It is not the white man upon whom rests the odium of decimating game in India. If the good folks at Home could only be brought to understand it, only a small minority of the very small European population of India do any big game shooting at all, and those who do go in for it observe not only the game regulations but the unwritten laws of sport. No doubt breaches of both occur at the hands of young and inexperienced men, but these are the exception and contribute nothing to the "decimation." The real offender is the native market hunter who has only one game law and that is not to be found out. I would not be understood to favour adoption of strong punitive measures: it is impossible to make the native pothunter understand why he should not continue to kill as his father and grandfather killed, unchecked and unhindered; he can only be firmly controlled and I would adopt the expedient of impounding his gun during the close season when there are no crops to be protected from pig and deer. This measure would inflict no hardship upon him and it would have the supreme merit of efficacy.

The idea of "sanctuaries" for birds has been suggested, but I doubt much whether this method of protecting useful and desirable species would answer. Such hardened grain thieves as the pigeons and parroquets would resort thither as well as their insectivorous friends, and unless each sanctuary were placed under the control of a responsible white man who alone could be depended on to discriminate between birds desirable and the reverse, the sanctuary would be something worse than useless. So far as plumage birds are concerned the remedy lies in closing the market for feathers; this at least could be done without serious injury to material interests.

BRIDGE QUERY.

To the Editor of the "Indian Field."

Sir,—Would you kindly give an opinion on the following Auction Bridge point.

I believe a similar case was referred to the Indian Field in May this year, but I am unable to find it.

A declares 6 clubs.
X says No.
B declares 2 No Trumps.
Y says No.
A says No.

Can X then say B must go 3 No Trumps?

This refers to rule 53, which I am given to understand has been amended.

The point being that B has made an insufficient declaration, which is passed by Y, and according to the rule no rectification can be made, but immediately after B had made the insufficient declaration X could have said B must go 3 No Trumps.

Now, I understand, when it comes round to X's turn he can make B go 3 No Trumps, although it has been passed by his partner.

OOTY HUNT RACES.

First Day, Wednesday, 18th September 1912.

THE Hunt races were held this afternoon in the Hobart Park. Recent heavy rain had made the going decidedly heavy, but the day was fine and sunny until 3 P.M. when light rain fell, but it did not interfere with the last two events. It is a pity the original time fixed for the first race, viz., 12 noon was not adhered to but changed to 1 o'clock, as it permitted of one race only before the luncheon interval which was protracted until 2-30 before the second event came on. The attendance was very meagre until the afternoon when the lawn and pavilion filled up somewhat; but seeing that the Hunt Committee continue to charge Rs. 7 gate money, and for programmes extra it is perhaps not surprising that the attendance was not larger.

The first race drew only three starters and proved a tame affair, Double Ruff winning by a street in a canter in very slow time.

OOTACAMUND HUNT POINT TO POINT RACES.

Second Day, Saturday, 21st September.

THE Point to Point Races were run off on the Downs to-day, the venue being Lawley's Course near Sandy Nullah Toll Bar, where a huge concourse began to gather from an early hour; in fact all Ooty was there, and the day's enjoyment was enhanced by delightful weather. It looked at one time as if rain might fall but it held off, while the clouds and a fresh breeze tempered the heat of the day.

A large sprinkling of tents dotted the hill side and two Union Jacks denoted the locality of the totalisators which were strongly supported by buyers of the modest two-dio tickets.

A punctual start was made, the horses for the first event going out soon after 11 o'clock for the far distant Sheffield Corner where was the starting post. A field of eleven contested this the Ootacamund Hunt Cup, the only absentee being Major Dennistoun's Scrub which went lame after Wednesday's racing. The distance was well over 4 miles of fair hunting country, and when they came in sight of the spectators on Lawley's Course it was seen that Swanley was leading with Mr. Colin Mackenzie's pair not far behind. Within 300 yards of the winning post Captain Talbot on Paddy came up with a great dash and overtook the leader 50 yards from home beating him by three lengths after a good and well-ridden race.

Captain Watson on Vendetta ten lengths behind third.

Mr. C. A. Mackenzie's br aus g Paddy, 12st.	Capt. Talbot 1
Mr. S. Cox's b aus g Swanley, 12st. 10lb. ...	Owner 2
Mr. C. A. Mackenzie's br aus m Vendetta, 12st 7lb.	Capt. Watson 3

Also ran: Mr. S. Cox's Beau, 12-7; Mr. S. Cox's Larry Boy, 12-7; Col. E. S. C. Butler's Lord Bob, 12-0; Capt. G. Meyrick's Hereward, 12-0; Capt E. L. Popham's Jorrocks, 12-0; Lieut.-Col. J. Maxwell's Pocahontas, 12-0; Capt O St. John's Captain Carrington, 12-0; Mr. F. Oswald's James, 11-3.

THE SECOND RACE.—The Ladies' Pony to Point Race was started long before the advertised time of 12-30, the field of five being sent away from below Lawley's Course eastwards to Schmidt's peg and back. Double Ruff being a bit headstrong took charge of her rider at one point overshooting the turning and taking the whole field with her. Alphabetic, which was then lying last, recovered quickest and gained a lead which she maintained to the end, winning rather easily with Double Ruff: second several lengths behind, the rest nowhere.

Major J. G. Dennistoun's b e m Double Ruff, 10st.	Mrs. Dennistoun 2
Miss Butler's bk a g Punch, 8st. 7lb. ...	Owner 3

Also ran: Mrs. Butler's Novice, 10-0; Miss Atkinson's Victor, 10-0.

The luncheon interval was a very ample one, as the Medium Pace did not start until after 2-30 P.M. The seven were taken out to Bagman and the course skirting Jackal Shola headed straight for Goldmine Crossing and thence up the hill to be finish. Mr Phillip's grey gelding Speculation, well ridden by Mr. L. Davidson, showed what a compact well built one could do, carrying over 12st, and winning with ease by some lengths from Warden.

Mr. W. W. Phillip's gr aus g Speculation, 12st.	Mr. Davidson 1
Major J. C. Dennistoun's b aus g Warden, 10st. 8lb	Owner 2

Also ran: Mr. Short's Speculation, 12-0; Capt. T. G. J. Torrie's Emperor, 12-0; Capt S. V. Hammick's Monty, 12-0; Mr. S. Bourne's Dividend, 12-0; Major C. L. Gregory's The Mog 11-0.

The Ladies' Pony Event having fallen through for lack of entries the Pony Point to Point Race followed soon after 3 P.M. starting from near Brooklands the course lay south, across the road from golf links and then over N wmarket to S hmidt's Copse, from whence it circled right handed to Lawley's Course. Saturn made the running the whole way, closely followed by Capt. Clarke's pair and they finished in this order.

Major J. G. Dennistoun's b aus h Saturn, 9st. 10lb.	Owner 1
Capt. M. O. Clarke's ch aus m Upshot, 9st. 12lb.	Owner 2
Capt. M. O. Clarke's br aus m Treasury, 9st. 9lb.	Capt. Jarvis 3

Also ran: Mr. W. F. J. Akerman's Parody, 11-0; Capt. S. V. Hammick's Dandy Dick, 11-0; Major C. L. Gregory's Diadem, 10-2.

The fifth and last Race—The Novice Cup at 4-15 P.M.—started from quite the opposite side, viz., from Braidwell's, and was a very nicely planned course going over Blackmoor, round Gibbs' Shola and then left handed down to the stream below the south extremity of Lawley's Course with half a mile uphill as finish. Matlock proved his fitness and powers of staying by winning handsomely by several lengths from Pumpkin.

Capt. G. Meyrick's b e m Matlock, 12st. ...	Owner 1
Mr. W. F. J. Akerman's ch aus g Pumpkin, 12st.	Owner 2

Also ran: Capt. F. Rainsford-Hannay's Courtier, 12-7 Capt. A. K. D. George's Stingaree, 12-7; Major C. L. Gregory's Netherby, 12-0; Mr. M Young's Nancy, 12-0; Capt. T. G. J. Torrie's Pontifex, 12-0.

The rest of the field finding the pace and the final half mile too much for them staggered home in a clump so that it was difficult to spot the third horse. And so ended as good a day's sport and as delightful a time in the open as anyone could wish for.

On Monday next the Hound Puppy Show will be held at the Kennels at noon, followed by an afternoon's hunt. There will also be hunting on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday next week.

THE TURF.

GATWICK.

BARELY has such a field of quantity and quality combined been seen out at Gatwick as that which contested the County Handicap, and Messrs. Pratt and Co. are to be congratulated on the great success that attended this new venture. As a betting medium it proved most attractive, but handicapped as he was, there was every justification for Lonawand being installed favourite, particularly when one took into consideration the fact that Wootton's stable is now in such wonderful form. Lonawand, however, is a very uncertain customer, and he absolutely declined to gallop from the moment the tapes were raised.

Borrow, who was well supported, has had a surfeit of racing, but old Mustapha again ran creditably. The finish was the outcome of a most interesting contest, and the Gallinule black and stamina asserting itself when Beaucepeth got the better of Queen Tii a quarter of a mile from home, it was apparent that he had the measure of the filly, and he followed up his Nottinghamshire Handicap success in the style of a good horse. On Tuesday the consensus of opinion among all the best judges was that Spanish Prince had not been as well handicaped for a year or more as he was in the Peveril of the Peak Plate, nor was there any doubt as to what was likely to start favorite from the moment a trustworthy market was formed on the race. He opened at a comparatively short rate, while Beaurepaire was always easy to back. That Mr. Raphael's horse has taken a dislike to racing there can no longer be any doubt, as his tail was going ominously a long way from home, where Maher was just biding his time on Spanish Prince, on whom the American jockey was content to win cleverly by three-parts of a length, a margin that he could have increased had he cared. It was always a case of "Eclipse first and the rest nowhere." Results:—

The most rapid and satisfactory results are obtained by treatment with Gonosan (Kawa Santal). It is Astringent, Anæsthetic, Anaphrodisiac. Sedative and Bactricidal—in fact the best and safest Balsam ever introduced. Booklet and sample to medical men free on application to Holzmüller and Schmidt, Calcutta.

GONOSAN provokes neither discomfort, complications, nor nausea. It is the happiest scientific combination of best Indian Sandal wood oil and Kawa Kawa. Has never been known to fail. The Stomach and Kidneys remain absolutely unaffected. Insist on having Gonosan.

WINCHESTER

BOXING.

A HEAVY-WEIGHT FIASCO.—The large crowd which assembled at the Ring on Monday night to see the twenty-round boxing contest between the well-known heavy-weights, Gunner Moir and Petty Officer Curran, must have been sadly disappointed, for half-way through the first round Mr. Eugene Corri stopped the fight and awarded the verdict to Curran.

It was altogether a tame business. The two men took the ring shortly before 10. Curran was rather the taller, but did not seem so well trained as Moir. After some scrambling exchanges and a good deal of clinching, which led to the referee warning the men, Curran hit Moir on the ear with a swinging right. The blow seemed to glance off, and everyone was surprised to see Moir fall to the boards and remain there for part of the count.

Moir rose and staggered to the ropes, but covered his head. Curran came up to continue, but seemed afraid to deal a finishing blow. He looked puzzled, as though he expected Moir suddenly to uncover and lash out.

However, as no response came to Curran's efforts, the petty officer continued to pummel his opponent, until after the contest had been in progress 1min. 25secs. Mr. Corri awarded the contest to Curran and left the ring, the petty officer thus gaining a victory which surprised him as much as it did the spectators. The two men had met before in May 1910 at Mountain Ash, when Curran won on a foul in two rounds.

THE POONA AND KIRKEE HOUNDS.

On Tuesday, the 17th instant, a field of twenty met the Master at the Aga Khan's Bungalow, those out including Mrs. Fitzgibbon, Mrs. Fowler, Mr. and Mrs. Vines, Captain Lumsden, R. N., Mr. Hugh Symons, Colonel Perkins, Mr. Wimbush, Major Robinson, Mr. Atkinson, Lieutenant-Colonel Arnold, Captain T. Lucas, Captain Vachell, Captain Chaytor, Captain Stewart Colonel Logan Home, Master and 3 whips, Messrs. Whaley, Johnson and Aga Cassim Shah. Hounds were soon on to a line which skirted the prickly pear covert on the left of the road and crossing the Nagar Road went on towards the Mula Mutha River. Here some pariah dogs diverted the attention of the pack and when brought back and put on the line again they could make nothing of it. A herd of black buck next gave hounds a run but the pack eventually switched off on to line of a jack which they lost near Lohagaon, when they were whipped off.

Thursday, 19th September.—Hounds met at Bhosari and the Master drew first towards the north when a jack was turned out which led them to Chichli, and after 15 minutes fast galloping was run into and killed, the brush being presented to Mrs. Fowler. Another jack was viewed near the Nasik Road and hounds were soon after him : the quarry took us a good line and ultimately lay up in a prickly pear covert near the Indrayani River close to Moshi. Here he was dislodged and chased into a well where hounds killed him. The jack could not be recovered and with some difficulty the rescue of the hounds from the well was effected after which the pack was taken home

CRICKET AT POONA.

OWNERS vs. JOCKEYS AND TRAINERS.—This annual match was played at Poona last week and ended in a win for the Owners by 91 runs. They batted first and scored 208, Captain Coaker retiring after he had made 51, while most of the others made useful scores. The Jockeys and Trainers made 117, Taylor 19, Firth 15 and Shan Ferguson 15 being the only batsmen to reach double figures while there was a useful contribution from "Mr." Extras. Score :—

QUADRANGULAR CRICKET.

PARSEES vs. MAHOMEDANS.—Played on the Marine Lines Maidan, Bombay, on the 16th and 17th instant, the Parsees winning easily by an innings and 177 runs. The Mahomedans won the toss and sent their opponents in, Meherhomji and Elchibana taking first knock, Meherhomji made 1 and was bowled by Aziz, Elchibana was out for 3 with the score at 18 and it looked as if the Mahomedan bowling would give them a good chance of victory but then Warden and Kanga were associated and made a great stand. Runs came fast and both men batted brilliantly. Warden put up 84 before he was caught—a fine exhibition. Kanga, who when Warden left had made 113, had been left off several times—mistakes which proved very costly for the Mahomedans. Kapadia joined him and the score was taken to 247 when the new-comer was sent back for 4. Driver next in, and Kanga scored freely and the total was raised to 288 when the Doctor was caught off Salamuddin, having compiled 150, which included 21 fours. His innings, though of great service to his side, was not free from mistakes and he was missed on no less than four occasions. Parekh came in to make 4 and give place to Mulla. The third century was registered while Mulla and Driver were at the wickets, and after Driver had been let off by the wicket keeper, Mulla was caught for 8. Gazdar did not stay long, being run out after scoring 3 and Pavri took his place, time was called shortly after with the score at 313 for eight wickets. Driver not out, 29, Pavri not out. Continuing on the Tuesday, Pavri was caught before he had scored and Elavia was last man in Driver continued to hit vigorously and ran his total to 47 when he was caught. Elavia was not out 2 and the Parsees' innings totalled 333.

Their bowling having failed them the Mahomedans could not hope to rely on their batting to pull them through and the Parsees' bundling and fielding gave them little chance. They were all out for 86 in the first innings. Yusuf Beg scored 22; Nazir Hussain 11 and U.M. Ali 13 being the only others to reach double figures. Following on with 247 runs to make to save an innings defeat the Mahomedans could do not better than in the first venture and were all disposed of for 70. To this total Said Mahomed Khan, who went in first and stayed in till the sixth wicket fell, contributed 25, S. A. Aziz made 11 and K. Tamboowalla carried out his bat for 13 : the others compiled 14 between them and there were 7 extras. The Parsees thus won very easily by an innings and 177 runs. A displeasing feature of the match was the poor sportsmanship shown by some of the Parsee spectators, who jeered the courageous efforts of the Mahomedans to pull the game out of the fire towards the end of the second day. The chief offenders appeared to be some students, to whom one whould have given credit for more sportsmanship. Results :—

CALCUTTA RUGBY CHALLENGE CUP.

WEST RIDINGS vs. LEICESTERS.—These teams having played no fewer than three drawn games met for the fourth time on the Calcutta ground last Saturday. The West Ridings had been rather disappointing in their previous matches, but on Saturday they found their form once more and won by no fewer than 6 goals, 2 dropped goals and 2 tries (44 points) to nil. The Leicesters were without six of their regular team and in spite of this disadvantage played a plucky game, though none of their efforts met with any success. Soon after the kick off the Ridings pressed and attacked almost throughout and, after an attempt to drop a goal had failed, Rowe got over in the corner. The place kick was unsuccessful. Then Laycock dropped a goal. Turner followed this up with a try which Dennison converted, and he also added the major points to subsequent tries by Allison and Bootland. The score at the interval was 3 goals, one dropped goal and a try, (22 points) to nil in favour of the Ridings. Changing over Turner dropped a goal. Tries were then obtained by Firth, Bootland, Turner and Rowe. The first of these was unconverted, but the major points were added to all the others and the West Ridings thus won by 6 goals, 2 dropped goals, 2 tries (44 points) to nil. The Leicesters are to be congratulated on the plucky game they put up, for in spite of the score being piled up against them they fought it out with great gameness to the bitter end and their keen tackling and strenuous efforts never slackened. Teams:—

WEST RIDING REGIMENT.—Dennison, goal; Laycock, Rowe, Firth and Turner, backs; Memory and Allison, halves; Lieutenant Kidd, Sergeant Lister, Hirst, Shaw, Bootland, Doughty, Henderson and Widdop, forwards.

LEICESTERSHIRE REGIMENT.—Lewis, goal; Hyde, Trivett, Newcombe and Whittle, backs; Lce-Cpl. Atkins and Foxon, halves; Lieutenant Yalland, Sergeant Herbert, England, Corporal Norman, Twigg, Witham, Clarke and Collington, forwards.

Referee:—Mr. A. J. Brown.

CALCUTTA vs. UNITED SERVICES.—These teams met in the semi-final on the 18th instant when the C.F.C. won by 2 tries and a penalty goal (9 points) to nil. It was a good game and though Calcutta had been expected to win the U. S. made them gallop to do so. Calcutta were first to attack and from a mark Cumberledge tried to place a goal but without success. The Services were next prominent but the Calcutta backs broke up their rushes and play was again transferred to the U.S. "25" where Calcutta nearly scored, Lowman just touching down in time. Calcutta continued to press, but the Services relieved time and again. Then play opened out a bit and the ball travelled up and down the field. A rush by the Calcutta forwards led to their first try. Langley getting possession started a bout of passing which ended in Sherman getting over with a try. The place kick failed and half time arrived soon after. On resuming offside against Calcutta was followed by a similar penalty against the Services, from which Cumberledge kicked a goal. Nothing daunted the U.S. played up vigorously and the Calcutta defence was considerably troubled. Opportunities were missed by both sides and then a run by the Calcutta threes looked hopeful but they were stopped. Play remained in the Services' territory and at length Brown got over with a try. The extra points were not added. The Services were next prominent for some strenuous attacks and were nearly through on more than one occasion. The Calcutta backs, however, kept them out and time was called with Calcutta in the Services "25." Final Score: Calcutta 9 points (6 penalty goals and 2 tries), Services nil. Teams:—

UNITED SERVICES.—Gooch, R. G. A., goal; Lilley and Leakie, Leonard (Police) and Lowman (Police), backs; Wilson (Police) and Abbott, halves; Trenchard, Murray (R.A.), Pargiter (R. G. A.), Chase, Duncan, Hughes (Police), Versy and Drennan R. G. A., forwards.

CALCUTTA.—Ross, goal; V. Sherman, Cumberledge, Dunford and Langley, backs; Scott-Brown and Cunningham, halves; Dempster, Brown, Stadd, Stowe, Johnston, Green-Armytage, Kerr and Bryce, forwards.

Referee:—Mr. McBean.

Final.

CALCUTTA vs. WEST RIDINGS.—These teams met in the final on Tuesday evening when the West Ridings were victorious by 11 points to nil. The absence of Cumberlege and Studd from the Calcutta fifteen proved no small handicap, but the Reds, played a good game, though beaten on their merits. The Calcutta forwards led by A. J. Brown were better than the Military pack, but behind the scrum the Ridings were superior. The Dukes got away at the start and one of the forwards got over but a try was disallowed. Up and down play followed till the soldiers notched their first point—a try by Memory, who got over in the corner. The place failed. Following this Calcutta did some good work but they could not get through. Calcutta continued to have the better of the scrums in midfield till at length their territory was invaded but a nice piece of combination by the Military threes was spoiled by a knock on. The Ridings continued to press for a spell but, at length play was transferred to the other end. It did not stay here long, however, but travelled up and down the field till half-time, the West Ridings leading at the interval by 3 points. On changing ends there was some tall kicking but the soldiers soon took the offensive once more and invaded the Calcutta "25." The forwards got the ball in a scrum and the pressure was relieved. Both teams were playing at top speed and play was most interesting. The soldiers did most of the attacking and at length Allison crossed the line with a try which Turner improved upon. Calcutta then made great efforts, the home forwards were responsible for some good work and the Dukes defence was kept busy. The Reds were almost through on more than one occasion, but their efforts failed to materialise. Midfield play was followed by an invasion of the Calcutta "25" and Doughty ultimately got over with a try near the corner flag. In spite of the awkward angle Turner added the major points and "no side" was called soon after with the score—West Ridings 2 goals 1 try (13 points), Calcutta nil. Mrs. H. D. Wood gave away the cup to the captain of the winning team at the conclusion of the game. Teams:—

WEST RIDINGS.—Dennison, back; Rowe Turner, Firth and Laycock, threes; Memory and Allison, halves; Lieut. Kidd, Shaw, Bootland, Hirst, Doughty, Henderson, Lister and Widdop, forwards.

CALCUTTA.—Ross, back; Langley, Burnett, Durnford and V. Sherman, threes; Cunningham and Scott-Brown, halves; Currie, Dempster, Stowe, Bryce, Kerr, Green-Armystage, Johnstone and A. J. Brown, forwards.

Referee:—Mr. McBean.

THE DURAND TOURNAMENT.

THE tournament opened on Monday afternoon, the 23rd instant, when two games were played in the presence of a big gathering of spectators. In the first match the Royal West Kents beat the 3rd King's Royal Rifles by 5 goals to 3 and in the other the North-Western Railway beat the 13th Hussars by 4 goals to nil.

ROYAL WEST KENT vs. 3RD K. R. RIFLES.—The West Kents went off with a rush at the start and before the game was five minutes old they had notched their first point. They kept up the pressure and very soon after added a second point, the ball being netted after the Rifles' custodian had saved one good shot. Play was then transferred to the other end where the rifles pressing managed to open their scoring. Fast play followed in which the West Kents were prominent and they registered yet a third point. Thereafter the Rifles attacked till the interval arrived, but Farbridge was able to successfully dispose of all their shots. On changing ends play was level for a spell. Then the Rifles attacked and forced a corner and from the resulting kick the ball was put through his own goal by one of the West Kent men. The Rifles continued to have the best of the exchanges and at length they scored again and thus equalised. During the closing stages the West Kents once more asserted themselves and two goals were added in quick succession. The Riflemen failed to respond and were thus beaten by 5 goals to 3. Teams:—

ROYAL WEST KENTS.—Farbridge, goal; Obee and Mulchay, backs; Beatty, Mitchel and Gibson, halves; Ratson, Page, Roberts, Phillips and Hall, forwards.

3RD KING'S ROYAL RIFLES.—Ramsden, goal; Beale and Mackae, backs; Maden, Hewitt and Richardson, halves; Smith, Smith, Smith, Shaw and Smith, forwards.

Referee:—Quartermaster-Sergeant Newman.

NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY VOLUNTEERS vs. 13TH HUSSARS.—The Hussars were first to assume the offensive and force a corner but failed to improve upon it and the ball was taken to their end where the Railway men were almost through. The Hussars then attacked and their opponents were kept busy. A couple of corners failed to give the 13th any material advantage and then play returned to midfield. At length the Railway got away and after two abortive corners they opened their account. A second goal followed this up and they continued to worry the Hussars defence to the interval, failing to improve upon a couple of corners. On changing ends the 13th attacked but their shooting was poor and the Railway team soon had them back in their own territory again where the 13th were again beaten—a third goal being registered by the Railway. The latter continued to have the larger share of the game to the end. They put through on two more occasions but only one of these was allowed by the referee. The 13th played pluckily to the end but were unable to score and the Railway won by 4 goals to nil. Calcutta readers will be interested to learn that the Smith brothers, prominent in local football some few years ago, when they assisted the Customs, are members of the North-Western Railway team taking part in the Durand and were as usual conspicuous in the game under notice. Teams:—

NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY VOLUNTEERS.—Byrne, goal; O'Connor and Crenden, backs; Asquith, Smith and Bean, halves; Halloway, Shaw, Smith, Smith and Goff, forwards.

HUSSARS.—Headly, goal; Willoughby and Anderson, backs; Hudson, Rainbird and Solsey, halves; Martin, Page, Bennett Gutsell and Taft, forwards.

Referee:—Captain Impey.

GORDON HIGHLANDERS vs. BLACK WATCH (holders).—These teams met in the presence of a large gathering on Tuesday when an interesting game was witnessed. Play was very level at the start, both goals being visited in turn. Then the Gordons attacked but the Black Watch defence was not to be beaten and play being transferred the Calcutta team obtained a corner. Nothing came of it but the Black Watch kept up the attack and the Gordons' goal-keeper was kept busy. He cleared in excellent style and the ball was again worked back to the Black Watch end where the Gordons got a corner. From the kick the ball was headed into the net, the Gordons being thus one up at the interval. On resuming the Black Watch did all the attacking. Vigorous onslaughts were made on the Gordons' goal which had several narrow escapes, two or three shots hitting the posts or bar. At length the pressure was relieved and the Gordons rushed down, a good piece of combined play by the forwards resulting in a second goal, Brown having no chance with a stiff shot. The cup holders made desperate efforts to score during the remaining play, but were unable to get any advantage, having to retire beaten by 2 goals to nil. Teams:—

GORDONS.—Riach, goal; Dempster and Walker, backs; Mathieson, Bell and Lawrie, halves; Munro, Halliday, Featherstone, Sallie and McDougall, forwards.

BLACK WATCH.—Brown, goal; Richmond and Reid, backs; Patterson, Foster and Clark, halves; Bratts, Gordon, O'Donnell, Robertson and Winters, forwards.

Referee:—Captain Impey.

MAY MOTHS CLUB vs. 3RD ROYAL FUSILIERS.—This match also played on the 24th instant was not a very interesting affair. The May Moths were unable to make any headway against the military team and a one-sided game ended in a win for the Fusiliers by 4 goals to nil. Teams:—

3RD ROYAL FUSILIERS.—Lizziemore, goal; Frame and Cowdery, backs; Lieutenant Waddel, Dudley, Gainey and Chelton, halves; Munro, Davey, Beard, Sherman and Simpkins, forwards.

MAY MOTHS CLUB.—Dewey, goal; Chinn and Corner, backs; Barry, Myers and Nyss, halves; Ritchie, O'Hearn, Donoghue, Woolden and Mendies, forwards.

MURREE TOURNAMENT.

THE tournament this year drew sixteen entries, and began on Tuesday, the 17th instant, when the Lancashire Fusiliers met the 1st Yorkshire Regiment. The game was well contested, the Lancashire Fusiliers eventually winning by 2 goals to 1. The Officers Royal Sussex Regiment, who were to have met the Royal Sussex "A" team, scratched. Two games were played on Wednesday, the 18th instant. The 4th King's Royal Rifle Corps beat the Staff and Departments by 3 goals to 1, the superior combination of the Rifles being responsible for their win. The other match between the Rifle Brigade "B" team and No. 2 Mountain Battery ended in a draw of one all. This was replayed on Thursday last when another good game was witnessed, the Gunners ultimately winning by a goal to nil. Appended is the draw and results to hand :—

ON Friday the 1st Punjab Volunteer Rifles met the Durham L. I. when the latter had a comfortable win by 6 goals to 1. The second match was between the 4th King's Royal Rifles "B" and the 1st Royal Sussex Regiment "B." This was a fast and even game. Each team scored a goal in the first half, but on changing ends the Sussex had the better of the exchanges and scoring once more won by 2 goals to 1. On Saturday two more games were played. The 2nd Rifle Brigade and the 73rd Co. R.G.A. put up an excellent game. Time arrived with the score one all. Extra ten minutes was played each way without result and the game was left drawn. In the other game the Royal West Kents easily beat the Murree Depôt by 4 goals to nil.

Friday, 20th September 1912.

The Calcutta Swimming Club held their annual Autumn Meeting at the Baths this evening and the Honorary Secretary and those associated with him are to be congratulated on a complete success. The Bath building was crammed and many had to go away unable to obtain admission owing to want of room. It was an extremely warm evening, but the excellence of the fare provided made us forget this discomfort. The arrangements were as usual tip top while a most interesting programme was put through. The racing was most exciting and some fine finishes were witnessed—good performances being put up by Vandyke, Finlayson, Young and H. Hainsworth. The feature of the evening's entertainment was, however, the display of diving which was of exceptional merit. Finlayson and his colleagues gave us no fewer than thirty-seven varieties of dives from spring—board, trapeze and roof—all finished performances and quite the best item of its kind ever seen at the Calcutta Swimming Baths. Besides the more serious racing the programme included a couple of comic events and proceedings were brought to a conclusion with the usual water polo match. The prizes were distributed by Mrs. H. A. Glucksman, who also gave away the Aggregate Cup awarded for the highest number of points gained during the season and won this year by C. S. Young. Results :—

Motoring.

MOTOR MEMS.

London, Friday, 30th August, 1912.

THE perilous excitements of the streets are likely to be made still more perilous and exciting. Experiments are being carried out in Paris with the object of producing a motor car that will jump ditches and other obstacles. It only needed the introduction of steeplechasing motor buses and subsultory taxi-cabs to make our lives really enjoyable. It will be a thrilling experience, when one is crossing the street, to be treated as a five-barred gate and dashingly "taken" by a 75 h.p. car. There will be, no doubt, some instances of a failure to clear, in which case the streets may be littered with fragments of obstacles that have not been successfully "negotiated," as they say on the Turf. That will only add to the pedestrian's fierce delights. One great advantage will be the disuse of hooters and sirens, which, since warnings will be unnecessary, will no longer be sounded. Vehicles will go hopping about like monster fleas or grasshoppers, but they will do it with mysterious and impressive silence.

The taxi-cab chauffeuse has made her appearance in Vienna and has been the subject of a lively newspaper correspondence, the ladies especially approving of her action and promising their support. One writer in a local journal is responsible for the following:—

The times have gone by when we women, supposed to be lacking in physical force, were not expected to concern ourselves about anything beyond the frills on our frocks. To-day we have made up our minds to take our seats upon those frills, and to guide the rushing automobile of the history of the world alongside of the men. If women have any common sense, she continues, they will trust themselves to women drivers whenever it is possible to do so. You can seldom drive well with a man. I have been married three times, and I know men. My first husband was a prominent h.p. (horse power), but he was too fond of spirit beating in every form. I am decidedly for women taxi-drivers. Of course they must get their licenses only after they have been thoroughly well tested. No very young girls should be licensed as drivers. I think taxi-driving is for middle-aged women only. None but experienced drivers should be allowed to take their places under the hood of the taxi, and then I am sure, if they are women, that many of the accidents in the city will be prevented.

In view of the constantly increasing cost of petrol, much attention is being given by motor car engineers to the question of providing some cheaper fuel, which will take the place of petrol.

Paraffin, the common oil in general use, though it offers great possibilities, has, in practice, until quite recently, been impossible to use because of the rapid deposit of carbon in the engine cylinders, which has led to a decrease in engine power, and also, gradually, to a complete stoppage. Moisture at the exhaust, noxious and objectionable fumes, dense smoke, and disagreeable odours were also features in the early attempts to utilise paraffin on motor cars.

A London company, the Standard Petroleum Carburettor Company, Limited, of Queen Victoria-street, E.C., claims to have perfected a carburettor which will overcome these disadvantages. In order to prove the claims made on behalf of this device, a motor car of 36 h.p. and of a recognised make, was fitted with the appliance, and left London for a 1,000 mile tour in England and Scotland on 17th August. A chartered accountant and a prominent technical journalist accompanied the car, and acted as observers throughout the tour.

In all, 1,057 miles were covered, and although some of the steepest hills and mountain passes in the country were climbed, the engine ran just as well—the inventors themselves claim a distinct improvement—as if petrol had been used.

On a motor car of this power, a mileage of twelve miles per gallon of petrol used is considered an excellent result. The distance covered per gallon of paraffin used, according to the report made by the observers, was 18·9 miles, and altogether 54·6 gallons of paraffin were consumed, in addition to three gallons of petrol, which was used for starting the engine when the cylinders were cold.

The change from petrol to paraffin is effected by means of a small lever, which is situated near the steering-wheel. The appliance itself does not weigh more than about 25 lbs. and it can be fitted to any make or power of motor car, without any structural alterations, while it can also be removed without trouble.

On the return of the car to London, the engine was examined, and the cylinders were found to be, to all intents and purposes, practically free from soot and deposit.

The general impression created seems to be that there was an entire absence of smoke, with entire freedom from disagreeable smells, when paraffin was used. The average speed maintained throughout was 24·7 miles per hour.

The observers state that the price of the paraffin purchased averaged 8½d. per gallon. This gives the total fuel cost, including the three gallons of petrol, as £2 3s. 2d. If petrol had been used, taking the present price of 1s. 6d. per gallon, the cost would have been £6 12s.

Many leading motorists are interested in a scheme which proposes a 1,000 miles race for motor cars using paraffin in place of petrol. This would seem to be a step in the right direction, and users of motors generally will look forward to development in this direction with interest.

POONA HORSE SHOW.

The Poona Horse was held on the 18th and 20th instant, and thanks to the efforts of Major Davis and his coadjutors the function was a big success. The entries were large, the class up to the usual high standard, while the arrangements were everything that could be desired. The Judges had no easy task, but their awards met with very general approbation. On the first day the Hon'ble Mr. and Mrs. Carmichael were "At Home" and the Governor's Band played a fine selection of music. On the second day Colonel F. J. Cowper, D. S. O., and the officers of the 127th Baluchis dispensed hospitality and the Band of the regiment performed at intervals. At the conclusion of the proceedings Lady Clarke distributed the prizes. Assuredly the best.

Ever since the inception of electric lighting for cars, the famous C.A.V. head, side and tail lamps have been recognised as the standard by which to judge other makes. Potential motorists fit only C.A.V. lamps; others are not nearly good enough when the most efficient lighting equipment is required to complete a car's luxuriousness. Therefore, specify C.A.V. if you wish to know the real meaning of lamp satisfaction

The Naturalist.

THE HYPNOTIC POWER OF SNAKES.

It is a popular belief that serpents have the power of capturing their victims by casting a mysterious spell over them. Even scientists have seriously considered this supposed mesmeric power over birds. Cuvier ascribed it to narcotic exudation, Audobon to the self-sacrificing audacity of nest-birds, Bompland to the "instincts of curiosity and maternal devotion," and Russel Wallace to "optic influences akin to hypnotism." The latter theory is the most generally accepted, and in the rural districts of both Europe and North America bird-charming snakes are classed with such indisputable phenomena as fish-deluding anglers. Contemporaries of more than average intelligence will describe the glaring eyes of a rattlesnake that paralysed a youngster on his way to school, and maintain that they saw it charm down a squirrel from the top of a walnut tree.

An opportunity was afforded me recently of disproving the snake-charm theory. The pharmacist of a medical college had procured a number of live serpents for experiments with certain antidotes, and during the summer vacation boarded his pets in a suburb of Bennington, Vermont. They arrived in a moderate-sized box, and, with the owner's permission, my neighbour transferred them to a roomy outhouse with a close-fitting door and a wire-screen front. Through a glass window their movements could be watched in spite of two bundles of straw and other aids to comfort. Cold weather lethargised them, but on warm afternoons four or five of ten rattlesnakes and six moccasins were generally in motion.

Were they trying to get out? Their conduct rather suggested a sanitary penchant for moderate exercises and sun-baths; and there seemed no doubt that they had a memory for meal-times. General revivals repeatedly preceded the gong by a minute or two. The owner's signboard, "Dinner at 5 P.M." attracted rather a surplus of sightseers, and when it became known that our experiments promised to solve a problem of ages entering, too, became superfluous; volunteer gifts of rats and blackbirds arrived in excess of our needs. Before the summer was over, our visitors had settled the snake-charm controversy. Twenty-eight out of thirty intelligent witnesses agreed that there is no hypnotism about the matter.

Our first doubts were aroused by the complacency of birds and small mammals and their absolute indifference to the presence of their formidable fellow-captives. Within two feet of a coiled rattler a blackbird would alight on the rim of the drinking-basin and adjust the defects of his toilet splashing water in the very face of the reptile that watched him with piercing eyes. Then, after repeated sips, he would condescend to notice the crawlers that had uncoiled by that time, and would finally hop aside just far enough to avoid a dispute regarding bathing privileges but still within easy reach. Nor had the restlessness of rats anything to do with the dread of immediate danger. They were trying to gnaw their way out, but in the intervals of such efforts were apt to run straight into the pile of straw that formed the favourite rendezvous of the serpents.

The snakes, indeed, were in no hurry to abuse that confidence. When they did get ready they scorned hypnotic artifices. A gradual elevation of the head, a noiseless approach with a short halt in reach of the bird that was picking up crumbs in his feeding corner, then a slow contraction of coils, a snaplike dart, and a leisurely retreat, as from a task accomplished. The bird had taken wing, thoroughly alarmed now, and fluttered about the wire screen in the desperate hope of finding a loophole of escape. In less than thirty seconds the poison began to take effect. The bird clutched at the screen, with his head hanging further and further back, then relaxed his grip, dangled by one foot for a while, and came flopping down on the floor. It was not dead yet, but dazed, looking this way and that and fluttering about in a strange, aimless fashion, and more than once right towards the destroyer, who at last began to manifest an interest in its antics. Once or twice the serpent coiled near the centre of the floor, seemed strongly tempted to risk a conclusive spring, but drew back again, fully aware, perhaps, that a better chance would be only a question of a moment. The bird was still on the floor, staggering to and fro, when a sideward coil-lunge marked the beginning of the end. Its foe watched it with lifted head. The chance had come. No risk of a rough-and-tumble fight now: the victim had ceased to flutter, and the old rattler quickly dragged it off to the straw pile. A full hundred experiments repeated this same sequence of manœuvres in all essentials.

The poison fangs of a snake have no proper roots, but terminate in a virus bag and are attached to the jaw by means of ligatures that make them movable to the extent of erection and retraction. This arrangement makes it difficult and rather superfluous for the snake to secure his victim at the first spring. The fangs are adapted only for a snake-bite, but their owner can afford to bide his time. The virus that has been known to overpower strong men in half an hour lethargises birds and small mammals in half a minute. Wherever stricken they are apt to collapse in sight, if not in direct reach, of their assailants, whose keen eyes detect the slightest commotion in the neighbouring weeds, but who would find it a very long time between meals if they had to rely on the hypnotic power of those eyes.—Thomas C. Hutton, in the Scientific American.

Then lisped the nymph: "Why, 13-ly."

The widower had just taken his fourth wife and was showing her around the village. Among the places visited was the churchyard, and the bride paused before a very elaborate tombstone that had been erected by the bride, groom. Being a little near-sighted, she asked him to read the inscriptions, and in reverent tones he read:—

"Here lies Susan, beloved wife of John Smith, and Jane, beloved wife of John Smith, and Mary, beloved wife of John Smith."

He paused abruptly, and the bride, leaning forward to see the bottom line, read to her horror:—

"Be ye also ready."

THE CEYLON NATURAL HISTORY SOCIETY.

CEYLON in general, and Colombo in particular, is to be warmly congratulated on the foundation of the new Ceylon Natural History Society, which, if it in any way realises the hopes of its promoters, cannot fail to add materially to our knowledge of the zoology of Ceylon, and thus of the Indian Empire as a whole. It is not, indeed, that the natural history of the island is not fairly well known in a general way; but there is still a great deal to be accomplished, more especially among the insects and other invertebrates, before our information on the subject can be regarded as in any way approaching finality and completeness. The recent discovery in Southern India of an interesting new species of tortoise, or rather terrapin (described in the Records of the Indian Museum for the current year), affords an instance of the results of fuller investigation of the fauna of the less known districts of India; and what applies to the mainland applies also, although in a minor degree, to the great southern Island.

The Society is to have its head-quarters in the Colombo Museum, and, for the present at any rate, is not to publish a journal of its own, but to make use of Spolia Zeylanica as a means of making known its work to the world. And it is in the June number of that excellent serial that the proceedings at the first meeting—held on 26th March—of the new Society are recorded. On that occasion the Hon'ble Sir Hugh Clifford, Colonial Secretary, occupied the presidential chair, and delivered an interesting address on the aims and prospects of the Society.

Its rules state that the Society has for its main object the promotion of the study of natural history in general, more especially botany, zoology, and geology;—in other words, all that is usually included under the term natural history.

In an article on the subject by Mr. C. T. Symons published in the aforesaid issue of Spolia Zeylanica it is pointed out that in the past the organised study of natural history in Ceylon has been carried on either by officials appointed by Government for this special work, or by those sufficiently keen to surmount the initial difficulties connected with individual investigation. Much of the best work, it is acknowledged, has been accomplished by the amateur; but, on the other hand, it equally true that in many cases where the investigator has not become pre-eminent, or where he has not been in touch with other workers in the same branch of science, original work has been lost to the world. It is to prevent such losses in future, as well as to promote and encourage amateur work that the Society has been founded.

At the conclusion of his article Mr. Symons observes that:—"Nature lies around us in this Island in some of its most pleasant aspects, and must impress itself even upon the most unobservant. With the seashore, the low-lying land around the coast, the central range of uplands, the jungle of various types, and the drier districts in the north, we have in Ceylon plenty of variety in a small compass, plenty to keep the worker busy wherever he may be. And the more general diffusion of the knowledge of natural history must lead to a sounder outlook on life, and indirectly to the greater prosperity of the Island."

Another article in the same number of Spolia Zeylanica is devoted to the pioneers of Ceylon natural history. Here the author, Mr. E. E. Green, points out that the earliest writer on the natural history of the Island was Robert Knox, who was captured by the Sinhalese in 1657, and kept a prisoner by the King of Candy for no less than twenty years, at the end of which he succeeded in effecting his escape. His narrative was published in London in 1681. Sir John Fryer, who appears to have visited Ceylon in the course of a tour connected with an embassy to Persia, published in 1682 an account of his travels, with notices of the animals and plants that specially attracted his attention in the different countries.

Some thirty years later Gideon Loten, a Dutch Governor of the Island, collected much information with regard to its animals and plants, which was published, accompanied by many grotesque illustrations, in London by Peter Brown in the year 1776.

Passing to the period of the British raj, we may briefly refer to the names of Alexander Moon, John Davy, George Gardener, Dr. Templeton, and Major Champion among the pioneers of botany and zoology.

Much better known is Kelaart, who went out from England in 1849 to Ceylon (where he was born) as staff surgeon to the forces, and whose Prodromus Faunæ Zeylanicæ was the earliest attempt at a systematic account of the animals of the Island.

E. L. Layard, of the Ceylon Civil Service, and his relative Sir Charles Peter Layard both contributed to the natural history of the Island, but whereas the observation of the latter were restricted to shells, the former published a number of papers on Ceylon natural history between the years 1849 and 1857; these affording the source of much of Tennent's information.

Of all Sinhalese naturalists the most generally and widely known is undoubtedly Sir J. Emerson Tennent, whose works on the natural history of the Island at once attained a deserved and lasting popularity. Omitting mention of several others, the last name we can mention is that of Captain W. V. Legge, whose History of the Birds of Ceylon, although published so long ago as 1880, still remains the best monograph of the ornithology of the Island.

With such a list of eminent names to inspire its members, the new Society ought ere long to give satisfactory evidence of its zeal.

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

The extension of the Stipendiary Steward system in Victoria on the lines first adopted in Western Australia and afterwards in New South Wales has been made the subject of a good deal of discussion in the Colonial press, and the Victorian papers without any exception are strongly in favour of the professional superseding the amateur. Hitherto in Victoria and previously in the other states of the Commonwealth also the Stipendiary occupied very much the same position as he now does in India, that is to say, he was a steward and yet not a steward, a paid detective whose reports the honorary body were anxious to receive but upon which they acted or not as to them seemed best. If they wanted his advice they asked for it, but until they did he was supposed to hold his tongue. In Western Australia they did not consider this system satisfactory and they conceived the idea of having a paid body of three stewards into whose hands all the affairs of the meetings in the State were committed and behind this executive committee was the honorary body who constituted themselves a court of appeal upon a point of racing law only as is the practice in the courts of justice. The executive committee had summary powers in all other matters and were charged with the carrying out of everything in connection with the traffic of the racing in the State. The system worked so well that New South Wales in due time followed suit and now Victoria, where stipendiaries had been employed more as assistants to the honorary body than as a controlling force, has also adopted this system and has created three appointments, of £800 a year for the senior stipendiary and £700 each for the two other members. These gentlemen have absolute control and their decision is final, excepting that an appeal on a point of law will always be allowed to the Committees of the V.R.C. and V.A.T.C. The colonial view is that a whole time professional must necessarily be better than the best amateur ever born and that it is as necessary to have a professional steward as it is to have a professional judge, handicapper, or starter. The Australasian in commending Victoria's decision to follow the lead of the sister states says:—

"It stands to reason that stewards acting at every meeting must do better work than the honoraries, who only act occasionally, and have a very superficial knowledge of the horses they are supposed to be keeping an eye on. No racing committee now would think of putting an amateur in the judge's box or of letting a member of the committee take Mr. Watson's place at the barrier, and start the Melbourne Cup. It is recognised that bad mistakes were made in judging, starting, and handicapping in the old days, when casuals officiated by virtue of their having a hand in the control of the meeting, and we never could see that the stewards were of so little consequence that any man who happened to be on the committee should be considered fit for the position."

In India we hold very similar views, but only up to a point. We have two paid stewards and they are given employment in watching races and making reports upon what they see to the honorary body, but beyond that their powers do not extend. They have no power to demand an enquiry off their own bat: they are not asked to do any share of the work in connection with the drafting of the various programmes of the meetings, the revision of any of the rules of racing, the general management of the affairs of the meeting or any other of the many duties which are committed to the charge of stipendiaries in Australia. They in fact in India occupy the position of a vigilance committee appointed solely to detect dishonesty and report cases of what they consider in-and-out and inconsistent running. There are divided opinions as is well known, as to whether this system as worked in India is entirely a success. Recently, for instance, as we know there has been a good deal of friction in Calcutta on account of, as is alleged, the unnecessary frequency with which adverse reports and allegations of dishonest running have been made by the single stipendiary to the C.T.C. now in India. On the other hand it is urged with an equal show of reason that if a stipendiary fails to report what he considers to be in-and-out form he might just as well not be in existence at all. At full strength the stipendiary stewards in India number two and their powers as has been already stated are restricted and they are employed more as race-course detectives than as stewards: they have no powers beyond those of making reports and bringing matters to the notice of the honorary body which they consider demand their attention; they are there to speak only when they are spoken to; to give their advice and opinion only when it is asked for. In our own view we think that if paid officials are employed at all, and it is held to be necessary that they should be employed in India, because the honorary body do not belong to the leisured classes and are all hard-worked business men, a heavier share of work should be placed at their disposal. We are by no means sure, that provided three whole-time officials of the necessary standing and experience could be obtained following Australia's lead would not be a very good plan. As things are at present the duties asked of our stipendiaries are of the lightest; they both get substantial salaries and leave out of India during the summer; they are not asked to do any work in connection with the preparation of the various programmes of the Calcutta meetings; the disposal of the numerous points and cases coming from the mofussil or up-country gatherings; the settling of racing dates and the revision thereof or any other of the countless details that are within a racing steward's province. The bulk of this work and the preparation of cases to go up to the stewards is thrown upon the Secretary, upon whose shoulders a great deal of work is thus thrown that it is not, strictly speaking, his business to do. The C.T.C. Rules of Racing have been inviting revision for years past to bring them up to date and make them explicit upon various points upon which they are at present distinctly complex and ambiguous. If the paid stewards were employed, as many people think that they should be employed, the work and all the other items already enumerated rightly fall within the scope of their duties. We are yearly greeted with the cry that it is difficult to find gentlemen who are ready, capable and willing to be appointed stewards, we hear dissatisfaction at times expressed at elections to that body and we are farther told that as life becomes more strenuous in business, so will honorary stewards be less able to give time to their duties, which by the same token are by no means light or easy ones. Therefore in the circumstances it seems to us that this new departure in Australia should receive more than a passing consideration. In the Commonwealth they have decided that a stipendiary must either be an officer with a full ticket or not a member of the caste at all. This is on the principle that if you are in the play you must be told the plot and that it is unfair to expect you to do justice to your part unless you are.

The Australasian in summing up the situation in the Colonies says:—"Stipendiary stewards are not new to Victoria; but hitherto their powers have been so restricted that they have not had a chance of doing much good. At Flemington and Caulfield they have had no more power than it is proposed to give them in New Zealand, and at other places they have had to act with the honorary stewards, who formed a majority at any inquiry. Now the system is to be given a fair chance. There will, of course, be an appeal from the stipendiary stewards to the V.R.C. committee. The committee cannot lose this control, but in all probability there will be no reversals as a matter of fact. It is absurd for stewards, who have seen a thing, to be overruled by men acting simply on evidence produced days after the event, but the power to review must be maintained for use where a question of racing law may be in dispute. We are very pleased that the unwieldy method of managing racing at Flemington and Caulfield is to be done away with."

In addition to the Poojah Race Meeting in Darjeeling there are a dog show and a horse show in the middle of that busy ten days of holiday. The former takes place on the 19th and the latter on the 21st, and success is predicted for both of them though at one time it was said by one of the local wags that for the dog show there were 40 silver cups and only 38 dogs! A horse show has not been held in Darjeeling for some years and though the present effort is on modest lines and is naturally confined to the local hacks and the few racing ponies that will be up for the meeting, plus classes for the Bhutia pony and for children's ponies (a somewhat large class in that salubrious sanitarium) it is probable that the show will be a pleasing interlude to the daily round. There is also to be a jumping competition and as Darjeeling will be full of visitors during Poojah week there ought not to be any difficulty about competitors or "jockeys" to ride them. The list of obstacles includes the ordinary bushed hurdles, bars, a bank and perhaps a stone wall, and the show is to be held on the Government House ground by kind permission of H.E. the Governor, who is giving his patronage and also a cup for the best horse or pony in the show.

The prospects of the Darjeeling races are said to be very good and it is expected that there will be a bumper meeting. Amongst owners likely to be represented are Messrs. Shillingford, Mackie, Price, Jones, Roland, Captain Power and H. H. of Cooch Behar or Prince Victor of Cooch Behar. There are a good many ponies to be seen working on the little Lebong course in the mornings and amongst recent arrivals on the scene are Water Lily and Pansy. Colonel A. L. Molesworth, at present commanding the Presidency Division, has recently been elected a steward of the meeting and his appointment is a sound one, as he is a keen racing man and in his younger days was often to be seen sporting silk both over fences and on the flat.

The silver cup which H.E. the Governor is presenting for the Polo Tournament, Calcutta, and which is to be won outright by the winners of the I.P.A. Championship, is a very fine one indeed and is of a massive urn pattern. It is bigger than the cup usually presented for the Viceroy's Cup and probably handsomer than a good many of those trophies. It is extremely generous of H.E. to present so fine a cup and his kindness will, we feel sure, be greatly appreciated. H.E. was anxious to present a cup to be run for at the Calcutta races this season and it is in some ways a pity that Lord Carmichael's kind and generous offer was not accepted. However, things were perhaps a little tense this year and saying good-bye to the Viceroy had left Calcutta sore! Next year, however, the Carmichael Cup will, we hope, be a feature in the cards and we suggest that it would be a graceful compliment to a ruler who has already endeared himself to the inhabitants of this province to change the name of some well-established and valuable race at the Calcutta Meetings to "The Governor's Cup" during the period of H.E.'s term of office—or permanently if so desired, and we can think of no event which presents a better opportunity for such a compliment than the Trials. It is a valuable and well-established race and next to H.M. the King's Cup and H.E. the Viceroy's Cup is the one in which there is most interest taken at the meetings. We hope that this suggestion may materialise when the programmes for season 1913-14 are under consideration.

The preparation of the training track and race-course in Calcutta is being pushed forward with all haste and we understand that both will probably be ready about the end of October or before if possible. None of the cold weather division probably arrive before the first week in November, but the interests of the local division have naturally to be considered and as there is at present no place in Calcutta where trainers can safely work horses the sooner the training track is available the better will they be pleased. Last year both the Calcutta race-course and the Tollygunge steeplechase course were extremely hard. The race-course was shaven as bare as a cricket pitch and was not sufficiently watered whilst Tollygunge steeplechase course would have been all the better for being ploughed up, and if this were done before the races are over and the course then top-dressed a marked improvement would be worked. If it has not already been done it is now probably far too late.

Why does Odol absolutely supersede all other preparations for cleansing the mouth and teeth?

Because of its remarkable power of suffusing the entire oral cavity with a thin but thoroughly effective antiseptic coating which maintains its protective influence for hours after the mouth has been rinsed with it.

No other dentifrice or mouthwash possesses this precious and transcendent quality, not even approximately.

Abbas Sheriff, the jockey, has been suspended from riding until the end of the Poona racing season, his license having been withdrawn for dangerous riding in the new Paddock Plate at the closed meeting at Poona on the 17th ultimo.

Mr. C. Bower Ismay's Balscadden has followed up his hollow win in the Prince Edward Handicap by carrying off the Newbury Autumn Cup. In the former event he put up 2lb. overweight and finished the easiest of winners by five lengths from Papavero, last year's winner and it certainly appeared as if another stone on top would have made little difference to him. He thus incurred a penalty of 10lb. and will now carry 8st. 3lb. in the Cesarewitch, but it is not expected this will seriously trouble this strong big weight carrier.

The big meeting at Poona was concluded on Saturday last and excellent sport was provided in a programme of seven events.

A start was made with the Ghorpuri Plate over a mile and for this Young Mujub was made favourite on the machines, with Lama and Lookman next in demand. Lama showed them the way to the straight, when his stable companion Aasud came away and won with the greatest ease by three lengths, the favourite finishing third the same distance away.

Only half a dozen came out in the September Plate. Hoppner, now owned by Mr. Homi Billimoria, was ridden by Brown and carried most of the public money. Hackler's Girl attended by Hoppner made all the running till they entered the straight when Brown took the favourite to the front and won comfortably by half a length.

In the 6-furlong Kharakwasla Plate for Arabs, the public went for Baloz, in spite of the weight he was carrying. He could not place, however, and Raspberry put another win to his credit, beating Prime Minister by three-quarters of a length.

Then came the St. Leger Plate, the big race of the day, a handicap for horses, R. C. and distance. Six came under starters' orders and Brown's mount Hilarity was considered the tip, Mil and Five Crown next in demand. Mil made the pace to the bend attended by Five Crown; here the latter dropped out and Hilarity came up second, but in the straight Gunboat came with a rush and took command, winning easily by three lengths from Hilarity, Mil, four lengths away, third. This is Gunboat's second big win since he was landed, his previous success being the Aga Khan Cup at the Poona First Meeting.

For the Turf Club Cup Valens was best supported, though a lot of money went on Real Gold the winner of the Governor's Cup. The latter was never in the picture, but Brown, who had the mount on Valens, brought the favourite home an easy winner by six lengths from his stable companion Parliament.

In the Paddock Plate the lightly weighted Lord Reay with little Harrison up led from end to end and won very easily by eight lengths from Forfeit.

The Khandala Plate over a mile and a quarter brought out a field of six and the victory of Mysore was a big upset. Lama was pulled out for the second time during the afternoon and was soon at the top of the betting, but could finish no nearer than third, Mysore beating Harry Johnson a length for first place. The totalisator paid Rs. 173-8 on the winner.

Mr. J. M. Ganda's fine horse The Loaf has had to be destroyed. It will be remembered that he started favourite for the Western India Stakes at the Poona second meeting, but was badly injured in the race by running into Lady Erna.

Owners are reminded that final entries for the Meerut Autumn Meeting close on the 20th instant. Programme can be had on application to the Honorary Secretary.

We have received from Mr. S. S. Chhachhi, Turf Accountant at Rawalpindi a copy of "The Army Cup Form," a small pamphlet compiled by him, giving previous performances of all the Army Cup candidates. To those who back their fancies on form this should be a useful little guide.

Reuter announces a match for the World's Heavy Weight Boxing Championship between Jack Johnson and Sam Langford to take place in Australia on Boxing Day.

Ad Wolgast, the famous American light weight boxer, is reported to have fractured his arm while doing some repairs to his motor car. This will necessitate the postponement of his match with Packey McFarland and incidentally Wolgast calculate this postponement to cause him a financial loss of 45,000 dollars.

Frank Klaus met Marcel Moreau at Aix-le-baines in a fifteen-round contest on the 9th ultimo. Klaus had the best of it throughout the four rounds that the contest lasted. He knocked the Frenchman down for seven seconds in the second round, floored him twice in the third, and in the fourth Moreau was disqualified for hitting low after being quite outclassed.

Another big fight was lost on a foul on the 10th ultimo, when Tony Ross and Joe Jeanette met in Madison Square Garden, New York. The battle lasted seven rounds, during which Jeannette always had the upper hand. Ross was badly beaten and handed out a low punch which sent the coloured man to the floor. Ross was very properly disqualified and hissed out of the ring by an angry crowd.

There is a rumour that Georges Carpentier, the French Champion and Bombardier Wells will meet at Monte Carlo next February. The match has not definitely been fixed up, for Wells' plans are to return to the States for the winter and meanwhile he has his match with P. O. Curran, and possible engagements with Tom Cowler and Bill Chase before leaving England.

Carpentier is to meet Bill Papke in Paris on the 22nd instant, and an exciting contest is expected.

Fred Welsh, the ex-champion light weight, has returned to England from the States, where he has a very successful tour. The match between himself and Packey McFarland has been called off, the principals being unable to agree on the old trouble of weight.

The All-India Boxing Tournament has been in progress at the Grand Opera House, Calcutta, since Saturday evening last. We have been given to understand that the show is being well run and that some good contests have been witnessed, but we regret that we are unable to give our readers any details as the usual compliment of a Press ticket was not extended to us.

The date for the sculling match between Barry and Durnan for the Sculling Championship of the World has been fixed as the 14th instant. The match is for £500 a side and the course will be the usual one from Putney to Mortlake.

The weekly mud sports of the Bombay Gymkhana have been concluded and the programme of the big annual meeting will be announced shortly. The aggregate competitions during the season have resulted as follows:—Ladies: won by Mrs. Wagstaff with 26 points, Miss Dunsford second with 22, Mrs. McCausland third 21. Men: won by J. W. Knight Bruce with 80, L. Graham second 62, J. Landon third 56.

A correspondent points out that at the recent big meeting of the Calcutta Swimming Club new figures were established in the timing for one length. The previous best had been 18⅘secs., but in the final of the One Length Handicap H. Hainsworth, starting from scratch, got over the distance in 16⅘secs. and was only beaten by a touch. This is a really fine performance. Hainsworth makes use of the now famous crawl stroke.

After dragging on for three months the Cooch Behar Cup football competition has at length been brought to a close, the Mohan Bagan Reserves defeating Kumartoli in the final on Tuesday by a goal to nil.

The Polo tournament in connection with the recent I.C.S. Week at Naini Tal ended in a win for the Dolphins. In the earlier round the 17th Cavalry beat the Optimists by 13 goals to 7. The Dolphins beat the 3rd Skinner's Horse by 9 goals to 6. The Kumaon Stragglers beat the Allahabad Gymkhana by 6 goals to 5. In the semi-finals the 17th Cavalry beat the Civil Service by 13 goals to 5 and the Dolphins beat the Kumaon Stragglers by 11 to 9. The final on Saturday last between the 17th Cavalry and the Dolphins ended in a win for the latter by 6 goals to 5. The Cavalry were conceding 1 goal handicap to the winners. Team were:—Dolphins—Major Richardson, Captain Baddeley and Mr. Kennedy. 17th Cavalry—Captain Kirkwood, Captain Brierley and Mr. Atkinson.

The cricket match between Naini Tal and the I.C.S. was won by the Civil Service by 9 wickets—scores in our Cricket column. At hockey the Civilians were again victorious, beating Naini Tal by 3 goals to 2. In the big regatta the Rampur Fours was won by the United Provinces Horse crew who beat the I.C.S. and the Balrampur Pairs went to the Royal Engineers.

A most extraordinary gun accident, attended by fatal results, occurred in London on the 5th September. A boy of fourteen, playing with some companions took a gun from an attick which contained some twenty muzzle loaders which had been there ever since 1870. These weapons had been repeatedly cleaned and examined all these years and no one suspected that any of them were loaded. The lad put a toy cap on the nipple of the weapon and while he was handling it the hammer fell, the gun went off and shot him in the neck.

THE Darjeeling Horse Show will be held on the 21st instant and the Dog Show on the 19th.

A SUGGESTION made by Mr. P. Chalmers Mitchell, secretary of the Zoological Society, at the meeting of the British Association is worthy of consideration. Pointing out the destruction of animal life that is going on, he said that in all the great continents there were large tracts almost empty of resident population, which still contained vegetation almost undisturbed by the ravages of man. These, he advanced, could afford space for the larger and better-known animals, and there should be established reservations, which should not be merely recuperating grounds for harassed game, but absolute sanctuaries, to which no gun should be admitted.

THE programme at the Electric Theatre on Friday last was notable for an exciting film entitled. The Parson and the Bully " which introduces a boxing contest extending over five rounds. The young parson turns up at a township in the Wild West and is told he is not wanted. He fixes up a match with the bully of the place, the stake to be the establishment of a Mission or the departure of the missionary. The match comes off—all appointments up-to-date—and the parson, who must have been a boxer of no small pretensions, eventually knocks his man out after five exciting rounds. " The Deserter " is a sensational drama—with the scene once more in the Woolly West and here again we have all our old friends, the settlers, soldiers and Redskins, with much wonderful riding, rifle practice and other thrills. The best of the comic pictures was " The Tired and Absent-minded Man " in which the dear delightful Fat man, well known to frequenters of the Electric Theatre, is the hero. The programme at the week end gave us some splendid pictures of the life of an American cadet at the West Point Military School. He was shown at work and in his leisure. Further adventures of Nick Carter, the great detective, gave us a film full of thrills. " A Fair Exchange " was another fine series of pictures in which Mexican cattle " rustlers " find their match in a bold young lady. Tontolini's efforts to secure information as a reporter is a comic film of the usual knockabout order.

HOW THIN PEOPLE MAY PUT ON FLESH.

GREAT DISCOVERY BY EMINENT SPECIALIST.

Judging from the countless preparations and treatments which are continually being advertised for the purpose of making thin people fleshy, developing the arms, neck and bust, and replacing ugly hollows and angles by the soft curved lines of health and beauty, there are evidently thousands of men and women who keenly feel their excessive thinness, and it therefore gives us real pleasure to publish herewith a simple prescription which by correcting faulty metabolism and stimulating the activity of certain sluggish vital organs quickly produces a marvellous transformation in the appearance, the increase in weight frequently averaging from 4 to 5 pounds the first week and very rarely less than 2. This increase in weight also carries with it a general improvement in the health. Catarrh, dyspepsia and nervousness, which nearly always accompany excessive thinness, all gradually disappear; dull eyes become bright, and pale cheeks grow with a bloom of perfect health.

The prescription, which contains no drugs and is absolutely harmless, calls for ½ oz. Tincture Cardamoms Compounds B.P., 2 oz. Salrado Compound, 3 oz. Elixir Simplex and enough water to fill an 8-oz. bottle, and can readily be prepared by any chemist. One to two tablespoonfuls should be taken about 20 minutes before each meal. Eat all you want but chew your food thoroughly.

CAUTION: Although the above prescription is unequalled for relieving nervousness, indigestion and catarrhal troubles it should not, owing to its remarkable flesh-growing properties, be used by anyone who does not desire to put on flesh.

London Week by Week.

FRIDAY, 13th September 1912.

"SHIVERING SEPTEMBER" is a phrase that the poet might now adopt as a companion picture to "Flaming June." Great Scott what a month it's been so far! "Come out 'tis now September" indeed; rather let us run in and shut all doors and windows and light big fires, for our friend rude Boreas has come into his own and winter is here. Yesterday in London town the shade temperature was at 42° in the early hours, a balloonist passed through a snow storm near Crawley while travelling at a height of 5,000 feet; every third man was wearing an overcoat; fires in bedrooms were fairly general at all hotels, and already the wretched coal merchants are threatening to raise prices next week. Merry times, aren't they. Surely we have bid goodbye to warmth and sunshine for this year—yet you never know in England.

THERE were remarkable scenes last Monday night in Islington, London's most populous borough, when, owing to a fire at the municipal generating station, the electric light failed.

Many streets were at once plunged in darkness, diners in restaurants could not see their food, and shops had to be closed.

Theatres, music-halls and picture palaces were without light, the performances being interrupted and continued with makeshift illuminations or brought to an untimely close. At the Northern district post-office mails had to be made up by candle light and so on. It seems that the trouble was entirely due to some small nut getting displaced!

THE best soldiers in the world have served in India, probably no braver or more brilliant officer ever buckled on his sword than General Sir Charles Gough, V.C., who has just died at the age of eighty-eight. He was born in India and his first service was with a Bengal Cavalry regiment which he joined in 1848 and from start to finish throughout the Punjab Campaign, the Mutiny, the Bhutan and Afghan wars his valour, and his brilliant achievements were innumerable: the name of Gough is indeed carved deep in the history of India under British rule.

The Victoria Cross was awarded him for valour displayed while Commanding a party of the 5th Bengal Cavalry during the Mutiny. He won it four times over. The first occasion was at Khurkowdah, in August, 1857, when he saved the life of his brother, the late Sir Hugh Gough, who was wounded, and killed two of the enemy. Three days afterwards he, hand-to-hand, killed two more of the rebels. In the following January at Shumshabad he attacked and sabred the enemy's leader. In February he rescued Brevet-Major St. George Anson and killed his assailant.

Sir Hugh Gough, who became Keeper of the Regalia in the Tower, also won the Victoria Cross. A third member of the family to gain it was Sir Charles's youngest son, Colonel John E. Gough, who distinguished himself by his gallantry in Somaliland in 1903. This is said to be the only instance of the V.C. being awarded to three members of the same family. Colonel E. H. Sartorius and Colonel R. W. Sartorius, who are brothers, have both gained it.

"A THOUSAND TO ONE on the play being a winner," was the verdict of an old first-nighter after he had seen the first two acts of the first performance of "The Girl in the Taxi," the first new musical play at the Lyric Theatre last week end.

He was listening to the audience joining the orchestra during the interval in Gilbert's haunting and exhilarating waltz, as confidently as if the refrain had been a "speciality" of the barrel organ for months instead of its presentation only having taken place a few minutes before.

The odds at the moment were optimistic. The second act, a gorgeous Paris restaurant full of colour, clever farcical acting, amusing situations, and brilliant French music had hardly atoned for an apparently empty opening.

The third act justified the prophecy, however. Moves which earlier had seemed meaningless assumed the most ludicrous importance, the threads of an improbable story being satisfactorily woven together.

The good work of the act culminates in a sprightly, enlivening quartette called "Suzanne, Suzanne," in which Miss Yvonne Arnaud, Mr. Arthur Playfair, Mr. Robert Averell, and Mr. Alec. Fraser take part.

The characters are all well portrayed, but the surprise of the performance was the success of Miss Yvonne Arnaud, a young French actress who until recently was playing a small part in musical comedy.

As is usual at the Lyric, there are the same perfect setting, the same beautiful dresses—and charming faces.

A NEW piece by a new writer always arouses special interest among playgoers, and it is a matter of satisfaction to record a palpable hit: and this we may safely do of the new three-act comedy "Art and Opportunity" just produced by Miss Tempest at the Prince of Wales' Theatre.

The attraction of the leading character in "Art and Opportunity" for this accomplished actress is self-evident. For the part of Mrs. Cheverelle, a super-Dreadnought among fascinating widows, fits Miss Tempest like the proverbial glove. From her first appearance at the top of a carved oak staircase her charm took the whole house captive. In turn she quickly twisted round her little finger every man she met, save one, the clever young M.P. who "runs" the Duke, and him she wins in the end. Having made Lord Worplesdon, the father of the boy to whom she is engaged, call her constructively an adventuress, she secures thereby the sub-acid sympathy of Lady O'Hoyle, an aunt who has come unbidden to inspect her.

Her next move is to bowl out Aunt Mary before the head of the House in an attempt to overawe her, and she obviously makes a not unfavourable impression upon the Duke, who has motored down on a similar visit of inspection. The artful widow in the next act throws over the son for the father, whom she ultimately discards for Mr. Bently, the Duke's prim secretary. His grace, almost frightened to death by the thought that she is after him, fatuously declares that Bently has done this for his sake, and so brings down the curtain with a hearty laugh.

The setting of the three acts, the Hall, Park, and Drawing-room, is appropriately rich without being over-splendid. But if the scenery is admirable how can one describe the acting. In no country could the short cast that supports Miss Tempest be improved upon. As the Duke, Mr. Graham Browne is simply monumental—the complete embodiment of good-natured stupidity. His cousin, Lord Worplesdon, finds an equally polished exponent in Mr. Charles V. France. The young men, too, Mr. Breon and Mr. Norman Trevor, are no less well fitted as Lord Gossamore and Mr. Bently. Miss Kate Serjeantson makes a formidable yet not in the least impossible Aunt Mary. Of Miss Tempest herself one can only say that she carried the piece on her shoulders to success with a smile, as though it had been the lightest of tasks. And so it was, since in Mr. Chapin's art she has assuredly found the one thing a great actress wants—opportunity.

Seven years have passed since Mr. Granville Barker's "The Voysey Inheritance" was produced at the Court Theatre, but its revival at the Kingsway on Saturday again proved that it has few equals in contemporary drama. The brilliance of its characterisation and the logical development of the romance wrapped round a question of financial probity remain as fascinating as ever.

Extremely well acted, and stage-managed to a nicety, this revival should be seen by every one to whom the stage means something more than ephemeral amusement. It marks a period and a type.

Mr. Arthur Wontner as Edward Voysey, the son who receives his father's inheritance of a fraudulent career, is unusually fine. He listens as well as he speaks. Mr. Edmund Maurice is excellent as old Voysey, and Mr. Charles Fulton repeats his notable performance of loud-voiced pomposity as Major Booth Voysey. Mr. Harcourt Williams, Mr. Eugene Mayeur, and the veteran Mr. William Farren all contribute to a perfectly balanced peformance.

If Miss Jean Sterling MacKinlay is rather too self-conscious as the level-headed Alice Maitland, her charming common-sensible manner is admirable, while Miss Grace Lane, Miss Geraldine Olliffe, and Miss Florence Haydon (a tarely excellent Mrs. Voysey) are all exactly as they should be.

"The Grass Widows," at the Apollo Theatre, is one of those Musical Comedies which in a few weeks grow so different from their first incarnation that a listener who goes to hear them in the middle of their run and remembers what was said about them after their production is apt to think that the critic who wrote about them heard and saw askew. As I feel convinced that "The Grass Widows," if they are to live, will have to change their faces and their forms not a little, I shall touch as lightly as possible upon details, fearing lest those that I single out for mention (honourable or otherwise) may be eliminated before the piece is seen by any reader of these lines.

When two couples get married in a hurry in Act I. of a Musical Comedy, and the husbands (or the wives) at once say goodbye to their better (or worse) halves, protesting that they will henceforth be strangers, we know that they will be reconciled after each has flirted more or less violently—in Act II., or if there are three acts, in Act III. Now this is precisely what happens in "The Grass Widows." Messrs. Anderson and Hartley Carrick—basing their play on that of Herr A. M. Willner and Herr Julius Wilhelm—have invented a pretty milieu for their opening act, which takes place in a school for young ladies of the aristocracy in St. Petersburg, one of the rules of which is that if any student is found alone with a man they shall be married without delay. The rest may be imagined, and it need only be added that the janitor of the academy is an Englishman who had disappeared from London on the very morning of his wedding, and left his bride waiting in the church.

The janitor is Mr. Alfred Lester, who is lugubrious as ever, and will be extremely funny in a week or so, and his bride is Miss Dorothy Minto, who has genuine humour, and will find fuller scope for it ere long. They have a duet, in which they play ducks and drakes with all the most famous personages in English history, which will be a hit, and so will Mr. Lester's funereal discourse on his own sense of humour. Miss Constance Drever dominates the scene, and with her brilliant strong voice and her verve she scored a success as Tatiana, the principal deserted bride. Her song in the last act, "My Man," brought the house down. As her confidente, Honorka, Miss Thelma Raye was very attractive. Mr. Gordon Cleather, as the chief bridegroom, sang as Musical Comedy artists seldom sing, and Mr. Bert Coote's sketch of the other lover promises to develop into a humorous picture. Mr. Dowling was amusing as an ambassador, and Mr. McKeown sang well as a Kinglet. Miss Topsy Sinden's dances are pleasing, but they are introduced apropos of nothing. The chorus was good, except in the Wedding Song, which was not in tune.

The music is by Mr. Kerker, the composer of "The Belle of New York." Except for Miss Drever's song, already mentioned, and a duet for Tatiana and Honorka in the first act, it is not above the average. The audience was very well pleased; nearly everything might have been encored.

The management of the D'Oyly Carte Opera Company, which is appearing in Gilbert and Sullivan opera at Fulham this week, has received a ridiculous request, described as "from a high official," that, in view of the fact that the funeral of the late Emperor of Japan takes place on Saturday the performance of "The Mikado" announced for that day shall not be given.

"The Gondoliers" is accordingly to be substituted.

In March 1907 much hostile criticism was aroused by the idiotic action of the Lord Chamberlain in withdrawing the licence granted for "The Mikado," the reason officially given being that the opera was "offensive to the Japanese Court," in view of the approaching visit of Prince Fushimi, the Emperor of Japan's foster-brother.

The opera was withdrawn from the revivals of Sullivan operas at the Savoy Theatre, and performances in the provinces were banned. At Sheffield, however, the prohibition was defied, and two performances were given.

In addition, naval and military bands were officially commanded not to play selections from the banned opera during the Japanese Prince's visit.

The action of the officials evoked ridicule at home and abroad. Questions were asked in Parliament, but the embargo was not withdrawn till some time after the departure of Prince Fushimi in June.

The Times published its 40,000th number last Tuesday. To emphasise the occasion the great journal issued an extra forty-four pages dealing with the history of printing, the history of newspapers, and the history of itself. This special number has as its first article "The Story of Printing," an illustrated review of the art from the time of Gutenberg down to William Morris and the present day.

The Oxford University Press, which is the only Press that can produce a list of all its publications for 327 years, has its record fully examined, and the progress of modern printing is dealt with in an article on "The United States."

To colour printing six articles have been devoted, and a similar number are written on the fascinating subject of copperplate printing and lithography. In the account of the many private presses we are promised a splendid reproduction of a page from the Kelmscott Chaucer, "The Prologe of the Manne of Lawe."

The second part of the special number is devoted to the newspaper Press, and the Times, naturally, has pride of place here. An absorbing story is told of how it came into being. "The Times of To-day," which is a separate story, divulges mysteries of an organisation about which no doubt many thousands will feel curiosity.

WITH THE BEAR AND LION HOUNDS.

To quote the immortal Jorrocks, fox-hunting is the "himage of war without its guilt, and only five-and-twenty per cent. of its dangers." In Colorado, Washington, and other American States, sport with hounds resembles war to a far greater extent than does the chase so beloved by hunters in Great Britain, for the quarry chosen is usually one which can put up a considerable fight for its life e'er the jaws of the hounds or the rifles of the hunters finally put an end to the contest.

The chief quarry hunted by such packs consist of mountain lions (cougars), bears (black and grizzly), lynx, and bob-cats, the two latter, as well as the lions, coming under the head of "varmints," for they do much damage to game, the cougars often killing cattle and horses belonging to the ranchmen.

The best-known bear and lion hounds belong to the regular guides and hunters, who conduct sportsmen on trips to the mountains, while many of the ranchmen and others keep a hound or two for their own sports and to help them to keep down the coyotes, wolves, and other vermin dangerous to stock. Ex-president Roosevelt made a successful trip for lion, bear, and bob-cat with John Goff, the best-known guide in the West, hunting the district from Meeker, Colorado. Goff has since then been appointed official lion-killer in the Yellow-stone Park, where cougar do much damage amongst the elk and other game in the reserve.

The hounds employed for this sport consist of fox-hounds, cross-bred fox and blood hounds, Airedales, cross-bred fighting dogs, and terriers of various kinds. As trailers only, the foxhounds are the most useful, while the Airedales, which can also trail successfully, are used chiefly as fighting dogs to hold the quarry at bay. Foxterriers have been used to advantage as being quick and active they can harass a grizzly at bay, when the courageous and over-confident fighting dogs will run into certain destruction, determined to get to grips with their quarry rather than to dash in, seize him in the rear, and swiftly jump clear again.

Airedales have been bred extensively for this purpose in America, and are most proficient trailers if the scent is not too cold. As all-round sporting dogs they are very hard to beat, hunting well to the gun, and retrieving on land or water. Most of the hunting is carried on in the fall, early winter, and spring, when snow is on the ground, making it extremely hard work for hounds, horses, and men, as the snow reaches a great depth in the mountains.

Hounds, as a rule, enter well to the sport, if they possess courage and stamina, for the trail of bear or cougar, when not too old, is easy to follow. Young hounds occasionally cause trouble by running deer, but a few lessons with a stick and plenty of hunting on hot trails soon breaks them from this fault. In practically every State it is unlawful to run deer with hounds; were it otherwise they would be harassed far more than they are at present, when stalking is the usual mode of procedure.

Lynx and bob-cats, the latter being more or less enlarged editions of the common tabby, as far as appearances go, are easily accounted for by the hounds alone; but bear and lion, unless quite young, are too much for any pack, and are shot with revolver or rifle when brought to bay.

With the exception of the grizzly bear, which does not climb, all the others take to the trees when hard pressed, or to some den or other hiding-place amongst the rocks and cliffs. Many of the terriers employed with the packs can climb to a surprising height, and will follow a bob-cat or lynx forty or fifty feet up a pinon tree, often to fall a like distance should the quarry make a flying leap for life. John Goff had a black-and-tan terrier which invariably did this, and was equally fond of riding on horseback. Mr. Roosevelt finally, I believe, became the possessor of this game little dog.

Both bob-cats and lynx can usually be shaken or poked out of the trees with a long pole, if the hunter will climb within reach of them, and, should the quarry leap for life, the baying pack below, fairly crazy with excitement, usually puts a mighty sudden finish to affairs. Black bears take to the trees and refuse to move until shot, while grizzlies come to bay and fight savagely, frequently moving on from time to time in what is known as a "walking bay." Lions will frequently jump, and, even if collared by the pack, will, if unwounded, get clear, leaving their mark on more than one hound.

A new sport, viz., lion-roping, was introduced by the well-known character, "Buffalo" Jones, who, with three comrades and an Indian horse wrangler, made a trip into the country of the Grand Canyon of Arizona, where lions were extremely plentiful. Many cougar were successfully roped with lariats, and taken alive after hair-raising incidents and wild excitement. Since that first adventurous expedition Mr. Jones has made a trip to British East Africa, where he roped and successfully secured a lioness. The animal was trailed with dogs, and only taken after the most determined resistance. Quoting from the New York Zoological Bulletin:—"Buffalo Jones has deposited with the Society the two-year-old East African lioness which he captured near Kijaba, British East Africa, and the animal was safely quartered at the lion-house in the Park on 15th June. To effect her capture the lioness was trailed with dogs and lassoed, when she came to bay. Some difficulty was encountered in accomplishing this feat, as the lioness displayed great bravery in fighting the dogs and men. She took refuge in a fissure in the ground, from which place she was finally dislodged by a cannon fire-cracker. As she bounded out of the shelter, two ropes were cast over her from opposite sides. A third rope over the bough of a tree raised her from the ground, and a pair of tongs, specially constructed for the purpose, was then clamped upon her nose. In this helpless state she was speedily transferred to a sledge and dragged to camp. She has an abundance of her fighting spirit, which a long, tedious voyage seems not to have dampened."

The mountain lion is a cowardly beast by nature, cunning and secretive in its ways, and averse to attacking human beings. Unless cornered, the cougar will not show fight, though capable of killing and wounding most of a pack of hounds should they close in on him. Lions are a great menace to the rancher men, killing sheep by the score, and attacking both horses and cattle. In every State there is a bounty on the head of these "varmints," as there is on wolves and coyotes, which also revel in the blood of sheep.

The hunting is usually done from camps, the hunters riding wherever possible and following on foot in places where horses cannot travel. Camp is moved from place to place as the exigencies of the sport call for. As a wild sport, this bear and lion hunting with hounds is in the very front rank. There is nothing whatever tame about it, and besides the actual sport there is often considerable danger, not only from the quarry when at bay but also from the difficulties and vicissitudes encountered when travelling in the mountains.

Good hounds and other dogs do not, as a rule, last many years, owing to the hazardous hunting which they have to do, and the mortality amongst a pack is usually great, necessitating a constant supply of fresh blood. A certain amount of feed is carried for the hounds when on an expedition, in case the supply of wild meat gives out, though usually enough is killed to amply supply both dogs and men. Black bear meat, elk and deer steaks, etc., are by no means to be despised, and in the fall, when much hunting is done, both deer and elk are in season. During the winter months, when the herds of elk become thin and emaciated through lack of food, cougars play havoc amongst them, for the poor brutes are too weak to escape.

In the Jackson Hole country, thousands of elk come down every winter to search for food, and, thanks to the kindness of many of the settlers, hay is put out for the starving beasts; yet hundreds perish annually during the severe weather.—Shooting Times.

SHIKAR IN THE SUNDERBUNDS.

Few people, if any, are aware of the splendid shooting to be had on the seaface of the Sunderbunds. You travel in comfort with every luxury that the East is famous for. Every second you see something to interest you. Pretty forest glades or clumps of jungle trees, broken by still prettier creeks, the view into which, with its sheet of calm water, is simply lovely.

Towards night, as you enjoy the otium cum dig, a distant roar, the "Oh awong" repeated at intervals, leaves no doubt as to who your would-be visitor is. After five or six roars silence resumes its sway over forest and river. In the distance you hear the soothing moan of the sea—the ever-changeless sea. Even the rocking and rolling of the budgerow, unused to such rough handling by the maha samundur (great sea) soothes one to rest and dreams of the coming morrow, when adventure after adventure, and excitement enough even to satisfy a Norse King, await the hardy and adventurous.

Early in the morning we are all up, that is, a quartette all told. One an old shikari, two younger brothers and a German gentleman. What had he not seen in the Franco-German war and in Mexico was not worth seeing. "I was going to show you, young mons, how to shoot," said he. Perhaps he did, in a way of his own. Well, after coffee—and a strong nip, even for a German—the anchors were hauled in, and in half an hour the various boats that formed our little fleet turned a bend of the river. What a glorious sight met the view. Away to the left stretched a long line of undulating sand broken by the foam-tossed breakers. A little further back a dark belt of green vegetation gave tone to the picture. On the right hillocks of sand with an abattis of wreckage barred our passage into the still coverts where the spotted deer love to rest in the cool shade of the teak trees that grow on the sand. As we move out towards the open sea, the terror of the native crew could hardly be restrained. Promises of bukshis have no effect. One by one the oars are deserted. The rolling of the budgerow is dangerous. The tow boats in front are unable to make headway against the rollers as they chase one another ashore. A distant howl discloses the fact that our water boat is wrecked ashore. In a few minutes this will be our fate. "Gat for dom," shouts our German friend, "what for he was doing here," at the same time sticking on like grim death to the mast. Now or never. Threats of instant execution effected a change in the behaviour of our crew, and in fifteen minutes we are beyond the surf, and, though tossed about, soon set sail and steer for an island twenty miles out at sea. One tow boat is left behind to bring off the crew of the wrecked boat as we sail along. Rapidly approaching the island at sea, the shore left behind is like a thin green line. The island in front can now be distinctly seen. The fleet of boats now show up, the smaller and swifter ones taking the lead as if glad of the haven in front. In a couple of hours we anchor in a bight which forms calm anchorage. First we have our hazri, then look to rifles, daggers, and hunting knives. The tow boat is alongside. We soon get over, and are landed on the lovely white beach. As we move along on the soft yielding sand, the roar of the surf drowns the noise of our advance. A boatman on the right seizes my arm. As I turn my gaze in his direction I see he is fainting. Before I can put the rifle to the shoulder, a mass of orange yellow and black dazzles the sun. Then the unbroken green meets the view. "Heavens, a tiger!" remarks my brother. "Why did you not fire." "Too late," I mutter. "Wasn't ready—better luck next time." As we move along drinking in the beauties of the scene, the outstretched hand of the boatman intrudes. This time we are all on the qui vive. As I look I see a huge doe standing on its hind legs nibbling. A sharp crack of the rifle, and the doe gallops away for a hundred yards or so, then falls. As we rush up I find I had fired the barrel with the shell in it, as part of the doe's side, or rather the skin, is blown away, death being caused more by fright and the concussion than harm to the flesh or bones, none of which had been injured in any way. Four boatmen soon sling the animal and move towards the tow boat, which is following us. As we move forward we come across a green patch of grass, with small clumps of trees at intervals; we now moved very cautiously, as it was a likely place for deer, and wherever there are deer tigers are sure to be found. As we got under a clump of trees we took shelter—one of us looking round. "There, there," pointed my brother, "look at those antlers." As I looked I could see two or three pairs, and a large one being quite white. As a rule the stags cast their horns once every year till they reach a certain age. Then they stop. These are the white horns which betoken age. I creep up within fifty yards. As I have a last look, the one with the white horns I find has several does between it and me, so have to be content with one with fairly large brown antlers. A sharp crack followed by the scattering of the deer takes place. We rush up, all have disappeared. On examining the track traces of blood are seen. This is followed as rapidly as possible, and leads into a thicket rather higher than the rest. On looking round we see the wounded stag standing some distance away in the jungle; another shot, and he reels over. As we come up we find that the first shot had only grazed his side, a branch having turned the bullet. He is dragged out with some difficulty owing to the antlers getting caught in the branches of the trees and creepers as he was being carried out.

After a drink all round we resume our stalking. After passing over a mile of sandy beach we come to some immense hillocks of sand forming quite a breastwork along the shore as we forced ourselves through the long grass. We come across a splendid head, antlers white as snow, evidently killed by a tiger, but very long ago. This was also made over to a boatman to carry. As we were admiring the antler our voices attracted the attention of a large stag, whose alarm calls brought two or three herd of deer to their feet. Another alarm call and away they went in fine style bounding one after another. The pretty creatures, I was not sorry they got away. As we advanced into the jungle just deserted by the deer, we found immense tracks of deer of all sizes, also quite a sounder of hogs, who had taken advantage of the general stampede to make good their escape. As we moved about, we were surprised to find the jungle was composed of fruit trees called by the natives kamrangah, which bears a three-cornered fruit. From the number of nibbled fruits on the ground it must have been in great request with the deer. Squirrels called to each other in all directions. They were of the kind so common in Burma, the red species without the stripe down the back. "This vas make a nice place for a pic-nic if the gals vas here," remarked our German friend. "I now propose we have beer before we go for more brutes." So we had a rest, some beer and were about to start, when the boatman came up with the skull of a large turtle killed and eaten by a tiger, as the bones of various animals strewed round proved it to be a resting-place of a large tiger. We saw a few pugs of the tiger, but all very old, more than a month, perhaps, since he had been in the vicinity. We covered about two miles of sea shore, then saw something more in the distance. On examining the object with an opera glass, we found it was a tiger engaged in licking himself with infinite pains under a large tree. We crept up to find at the last minute that a formidable creek barred the way to the point where the tree stood. On signalling to the tow boat to come up, which it did in splendid style, the oars flashing in the sun, the tiger evidently saw the flash of the oars as well, for after crossing the creek we found only a great pile of grass and leaves under the tree, with stray white hairs from the tiger, whose favourite resting-place it was. About a quarter of a mile further on, we came across a lovely glade with splendid green grass with a fringe of jungle trees all round, quite sheltering it from view; here and there we found several skulls of deer killed some time or other by tigers. As we moved about, we startled an immense iguana, about six feet in length, which made a desperate rush for the sea. My second brother shot it through the neck as it rushed past, killing it on the spot. I regretted this, as it necessitated a move another quarter of a mile, if any shooting was to be expected. Presently we came to a grand tope of frees. About two hundred yards from us quite a number of deer were moving about, some of them had evidently seen us, as they were looking in our direction and stamping their feet as is their habit when alarmed. "Mine friend, I tink, it was mine turn to 'ave a shoot," remarked the German. "Certainly," we remarked, "go ahead, my dear sir." In a little while his preparations were made. But unfortunately for himself the German gentleman did not kneel like an ordinary English sportsman under the circumstances. So that, when he fired, he found himself full length on his back—one mass of mud, the rifle being almost buried in the puddle, from which it was extracted amidst the laughter of self and brothers. The fall of a branch was the only token that the gun had been fired, the bullet having struck the branch several feet above where the deer were grazing. As we moved around the sight was imposing and grand, the sun was setting a mass of molten gold. A little further we saw a great teak tree, with some of it immense branches, wrecked far away from its native home. All silent and still—a melancholy picture. The huge tree on the white sand, the deep fringe of jungle in the distance, and the calm sea, with its ceaseless plaintive moan for what was and is not. A weapon, quick, quick, and we all laid down on the sand. Presently, on looking over the tree, we saw what had caused the excitement. Away in the distance just emerging from the jungle, could be seen a number of deer of all sizes evidently out for a play, for they were jumping about, tossing their antlers and rushing at each other like tame goats. In half an hour they had approached close enough for a shot. I fired. When the smoke cleared, a young buck was seen struggling in his last throes. By the time we got up to him, he was quite dead, and as the shades of evening were setting in, we made for the tow boat and had to be carried some three hundred yards through the surf, as the tow boats could not approach close to the place, it being shallow water. After a bath and a good dinner, we sat down to enjoy ourselves, our German friend giving us some music, which he confessed was more in his line than shikar. In the midst of his song he stopped: Oh, ech! Mien Got, vat is that!" No mistake this time what it was. The long drawn "Oh owong," pealed, rolled, and thundered over the sea,—grand, beautiful, marvellous, were the remarks. "Allah! Allah!!" muttered the boatmen at each fresh roar. "Here you manji," I called quietly, "bring the tow boat." We got in, and with long pulls the boatmen shot us along with a swiftness that brought us in no time to the place from where the roars had vibrated over jungle and sea; but all was silent as death. We landed and moved about the beach for an hour to no purpose. The tiger must have been an old hand, for he would not break cover. So, after a time we retired once more to the budgerow and dreams, the rocking of the boat soothing us to sleep like tired children.

Shooting.

SHORT CARTRIDGES IN LONG CHAMBERS.

The question of the satisfactory use of ordinary game cartridges (2½in.) in guns bored for 3in. cases has been so often that the writer has taken it upon himself to make a few tests in order to help a little towards clearing up this much-vexed question. There are many shooters whose shootings consist of much in the nature of rough shoots—that is to say, there is no specialisation in any species of game, no big day at pheasants, no organised partridge shoots or large grouse drives; consequently the bag is almost always a mixed one, which is all the more appreciated by sportsmen who shoot for the pure enjoyment of the thing and take their sport quietly and unostentatiously. Now, it is those fellows who may locate a gaggle of wild geese, when after snipe, or a stand of plover when after partridge, to whom the "game and wildfowl gun" appeals. Such a gun, to be of any practical value, must be able to shoot the game cartridge, 2½in., as well as an ordinary game gun, and the wildfowl 3in. cartridge as efficiently as a wildfowl gun. Should it make a mess of the game cartridge, throw the charge in lumps, or scatter the pellets broadcast, whilst shooting the 3in. cartridge satisfactorily, then it is merely a wildfowl gun, and nothing more, to be used solely for that purpose. Many intending purchasers of this class of gun imagine that it is prone to behave thus; hence the constant queries about it in the sporting Press.

That a gun can be turned out which fulfils the requirements of "game and wildfowl" specification is the purpose of the writer to set down. A few more words in respect of the make before we come to the tests made. It may appear odd to some that this class of weapon is advertised as bored for "2½in., 2¾in., and 3in. cases," when it is clear that if it is bored to take a 3ins. case it will take any size case up to 3ins. long. This is quite true, but it is one thing to "take" them well and quite another matter to shot them well, and it is upon the correct boring of the chamber that its ability to shoot well depends. Of course, game cartridges can be fired from wildfowl guns, but it is waste of ammunition. A 3in. chambered gun must have long, tapering cones; it will be useless for game cartridges if it has the usual short cones (a comparison of the two kinds will show at a glance what is meant). In the long cones the shoulder is absent, whilst in the short ones it can very easily be felt with the top of the middle finger, provided it be not too thick to enter the chamber. It is this short cone which spoils the shooting of short cartridges in long chambers and has made some people condemn this class of gun altogether, though when correctly bored it makes a pattern with 2½ins. cartridges equal to the best game guns, and vastly superior to most of them.

The following tests were made with a hammerless pigeon or wildfowl gun bored for 2½-2¾ins. cases, 30ins. Scimen's steel barrels, full choke, weight 7¼lb.; whitewashed iron target, 33ins. by 28ins.:—

65yds., measured with a tape: 3ins. cartridge.—3½dr. black powder, 1¼oz. No. 1 chilled shot (one shot), right barrel 25 pellets. 3½dr. black powder, 1¼oz. No. 9 chilled shot (one shot), left barrel 97 pellets.

The 3ins cartridge with 1¼oz. No. 1 shot made a pattern which would easily catch a wild goose with two or more pellets.

The second shot with the No. 4 made such a pattern that any bird the size of a curlew would have had no chance of escape within the space of the target.

COL. W. G. MACPHERSON, C.M.G. | MAJOR A. E. PANET. CAPT. E. B. JOHNSON. CAPT. E. W. CASTLE.

Honorary Secretary:—MAJOR A. F. HISLOP.

THE three days of the Autumn meeting were most successful in every way. The management had specially catered for outside interests and visitors had every reason to be satisfied. The racing was tip top throughout; there were good fields—for which the excellence of the handicapping was responsible. The public supported the meeting by turning out in force and all round the committee are to be congratulated on the results of their efforts. A feature of the meeting was the phenomenal success of Mr. Thursby in the saddle. On the second day he rode in six races and won them all, and scored four other winning brackets on the other days. Appended are details of proceedings on the second and third days.

F. W. FOSTER, Esq., writes:—

"Snowball" took Fourth Prize for England at Olympia after "Equinoint" Treatment.

Marsh Farm, Etwall, Derby.

The tins of "EQUINOINT" I had from you I tried on "Snowball" with a "big knee," which two Vets. said would never go down. I am pleased to say after one dressing of "EQUINOINT" it is perfectly right. This horse won at Olympia, in a class of 210, after the "EQUINOINT" treatment.

T. G. LITCHFIELD, Esq., writes:

NO MORE BLISTERING.

Spring Park, Shirley, near Croydon,

I have great pleasure in sending you my testimony about "EQUINOINT." It has done wonders for my horse. After ten weeks of rest and blistering treatment (under my Veterinary Surgeon's advice) it was still as lame, and as a counsel of despair I was told to work it gently. Then I heard of your "EQUINOINT," and tried it. After ten days I found the lameness gone, and tried to work the horse gently, gradually increasing the amount of strain, and was glad to find all lameness gone. I cannot help putting it down to your "EQUINOINT," and shall use it again instead of blistering.

.22 CALIBER

Rim Fire Cartridges—The Red W Brand

It's very annoying to have misfires, squibs and "sissers" among your .22 caliber cartridges, especially when you are about to "bag" something. You won't have this experience if you shoot nothing but Winchester .22 caliber cartridges with the letter "H" on the head. These cartridges are made in the most complete plant in the world by perfected automatic machinery, which insures uniform and correct priming and loading. They may be had with either solid lead or hollow point bullets. Winchester smokeless cartridges with greaseless bullets are very popular, as they are so clean to handle. They do not foul the bore. Ask for the Red W Brand.

Sport in England.

(FROM THE HOME PAPERS.)

LONDON, Friday, 13th September 1912.

THE TURF.

MANCHESTER.

WITH fields on a large scale in the majority of the events, sport at Castle Irwell on Friday was inspiriting, and in spite of a strong head wind that rendered the times slow, there was more than one well-fought-out finish. The half-gale that was blowing had the two-fold effect of keeping the rain off and improving the going. Results:—

EGERTON THREE-YEAR-OLDS HANDICAP—Of 200sovs. 6 furlongs.

Mr. N. Cockburn's Muria, by Minstead—Leg-ball, 6st. 2lb.	Ledson	1

Won by three lengths.

DONCASTER.

It was a very grey Doncaster that greeted its patrons on Tuesday, the wind, cold from the north, putting such a wintry aspect on the scene as has not been experienced for some seasons, and its only merit lay in keeping off the rain. The Londoner visiting Doncaster cannot help but notice how deftly the traffic is managed by the local police. It is a lesson even to the Metropolitan brigade, and its excellence is yearly manifest by the paucity of accidents, as traps from all parts of the sporting North roll onwards courseways. Results:—

"There may have been as easily effected wins but I have never before seen a horse make all the running in the St. Leger and score so readily as Tracery did to-day." Such was the remark of a man with a lifetime's experience of the classic races as Tracery went past the winning post leisurely gaining a five lengths' victory from Maiden Erlegh, with Hector next and the others nowhere, so to speak, so far were they behind, among the pulling up division being the favourite Lomond.

It was a remarkable race, and the chief feature may be put briefly in the foregoing few words. So it lacked the ordinary excitement incident to great contests, but the preliminaries were full of interest, and no one, not even those immediately connected with the victor, anticipated such a runaway result. It was a magnificent performance on the winner's part. The superfine critics who now declare the competitors to have been a miserable lot, are those whose wisdom comes too late to be of any practical value.

At any rate, the majority of the fourteen were of different types, but all perfectly trained, and none more attractive than the King's horse, Pintadeau, on the score of condition. But the white-faced, white-stockinged chestnut is not of the high class required for a St. Leger, Sweeper II., and the stable companion, St. Edgar, did credit to Persse's management, and when Tracery was stripped he enlisted many supporters.

The huge Catmint had developed very much muscularly and moved beautifully, and Lomond, although finer in outfit than hitherto, seemed good enough to romp away from his rivals. The blinkered Hector went very well in the canter, and yet appeared to lack class. He was relied upon for stamina, and was so well backed for a place, that, although at 10 to 1 to win, no more than 6 to 4 could be obtained against him for a place.

The grey Tagalie, heroine of the One Thousand Guineas and the Derby, looked all right, and she was just as much fancied as Tracery. Both figured on the same mark in the wagering. Mr. Hall Walker ran two, and of these Absolute, quoted at 200 to 1, wore a distinguishing cap, but Fantasio, as the sequel showed finished fourth.

Lomond fell back among the rock before half the journey had been traversed, and his chance was hopeless as the troop reached the straight. It seemed inexplicable that his trainer should have been so mistaken, but Wootton is as fallible as other men, and he had been in similar error with regard to Shogun in the Champagne Stakes. Hector held a good berth throughout the game, and Maiden Erlegh at one time was shouted as a probable winner. The shouting was obviously done by men whose wish was father to the thought, for a moment afterwards Tracery increased his advantage, and won in a style seldom seen in racing of good class.

Mr. August Belmont, owner of Tracery, is a gentleman well known in financial circles, and as a sportsman in both hemispheres. He has acted as president of the Jockey Club in America, and his colours are as well known in France as in England. Mr. Belmont has had his horses trained for many years at Newmarket in the Rothschilds' stable, so admirably managed by Watson, and this trainer deserves credit for effecting such a success. Mr. Belmont had some years ago a classic winner in Norman II., victor in the Two Thousand Guineas.

So hopeless was the task of those pursuing Tracery in the last quarter-mile that most of them eased, but Maiden Erlegh and Hector, with more stamina and also heavily backed for places, were ridden out to the last ounce. It would be of no practical good to guess which of the pulling-up troop behind the three just mentioned was probably best.

In the race there was some scrimmaging as the horses passed the rifle butts, and among those who were interfered with was the favourite, who received a slight cut on his fetlock. This made no difference to his chance in the race, but an official inquiry into the matter is probable. Results:—

FOOTBALL ASSOCIATION RULES.

For a week professional clubs have been engaged in serious football after using August as a month for training and the problem as to which teams will win the various League championships already occupies the minds of thousands of enthusiasts all over the country. At so early a period of the season form must prove uncertain if not actually illusive, although the tendency of players to remain with their clubs year after year tends to reliability in strength and gives better ground to work upon than was the case when the personnel of teams changed in most bewildering fashion, just as the individual or his committee might wish. Now we find the large majority of men wearing the same colours as in April, and some sides—Crystal Palace, for instance—leave fulfilled an engagement just as if there had been no close time. The important alterations are rather in connection with clubs taking part in the various competitions and it is strange to see the First Division League programme without the name of Preston North End, champions in the first two seasons of the League and still the most famous of all professional clubs. Bury, winners of the Cup by a record score nine years ago, will not be missed to the same extent, and the reappearance of Derby County and Chelsea may compensate for the loss of the two Lancashire clubs.

To the growth of the game as a pastime the increased entries for the Amateur Cup and the foundation of new clubs bear evidence, and so popular does the game become wherever it is offered to the public as a spectacle for recreation that in South Wales, where a Northern Union club has just ceased to exist, Merthyr Town now ranks with the foremost clubs in England, and keen to follow this example are several teams in the Southern League Second Division. Whether merely regarded as a business enterprise or the outcome of a true sporting spirit, the appearance of Association clubs in South Wales as a rival to Rugby has had an encouraging precedent in the astonishing success of two teams in Bradford, where the F.A. Cup made a home two seasons ago, and once having made an advance the game will become more attractive with the visit of more skilful teams.

With regard to the actual play this season, it may be expected that club executives will profit by criticism and encourage skill, particularly in dribbling, rather than the endeavour to win by pace and physical fitness. The want of cleverness that marked so much of the football last season had an effect on the gate at the final tie at the Crystal Palace, where old amateur players have assembled annually. The arrangement for extra time in this great event of the year may check this falling off in the attendance that was becoming very noticeable and an attempt to help forwards in their work of scoring by forbidding the goalkeeper to handle the ball outside his penalty area will brighten the game if, as intended, the new law facilities goal-getting.

For London's First League clubs this season has opened in disastrous—if not necessarily disappointing—fashion. To a close struggle to avoid reduction to the Second Division the metropolitan teams are much more accustomed than to any pronounced spell of success, although Tottenham Hotspur last winter, it is true, suffered only three defeats in their first thirteen engagements. During the past week the three London clubs engaged in two matches apiece so that a dozen points were at stake. Such an absence of success attended them in these six encounters that out of the twelve points that might possibly have accrued to the representatives of the metropolis no more than one solitary point has been secured. When Chelsea went down last Monday before Aston Villa at Birmingham the forward play of the Stamford Bridge men left something to be desired. Aston Villa are generally recognised as being especially strong this season, and with changes made in the Chelsea front rank no strong reason existed why the Londoners should not have held their own at Bolton with the club beaten on the same enclosure last Monday by Newcastle United. Again, however, defeat by 1 to 0 proved the portion of Chelsea who, to take a satisfactory position will apparently have to play exceptionally well at home. That Tottenham Hotspur were scarcely strong enough for the work in front of them the display given against Everton clearly suggested, so their defeat by Sheffield Wednesday on Saturday occasioned no surprise. Twice after being a goal behind Hotspur placed themselves on level terms, but in the end they found themselves beaten by 4 to 2. The Arsenal, who alone among the London clubs can boast a point, played in capital form against Manchester United, and only missed a victory through a remarkably fine display of goalkeeping, but yesterday their attack came badly to grief at Liverpool. These, of course, are very early days, but from what has been seen during the week Aston Villa and Everton appear certain to take prominent positions this season, while Newcastle United and Sunderland will probably also be well in the running for first honours.

Unlike those of the First Division, the London clubs in the Second League have begun their season in splendid fashion. Fulham gaining a substantial victory at Craven Cottage over Leeds City by four goals to none, while Clapton Orient, journeying up to Lancashire, accomplished a fine performance in overcoming Preston North End by the only goal of a hard match. With the exception of one man—Evans at left back for Clapton Orient—both clubs were able to place in the field teams which did duty for them last season, this in itself being a somewhat remarkable occurrence. The Orient have for two years now started in splendid fashion, without, however, being able to maintain their form to the end, but they must have high hopes this season when they can begin with a victory against a club who were in the premier division twelve months ago. Although they did not enjoy a great measure of success last season, Fulham, as already observed, made no radical changes, and the fact of starting with such a convincing victory will invest their fixtures with more than usual interest. It is a long way to look ahead, but the day may not be far distant when London will be represented by five First Division clubs. In the other games of importance, Bury retrieved themselves with a splendid win against Grimsby Town, while Lincoln City, who secured election to the second division at the expense of Gainsborough Trinity, sprung a surprise on Stockport County.

In the Southern League Queen's Park Rangers and Coventry City have each gained two victories during the week without losing a point. The success of the champions in games at Park Royal calls for no special comment, though in their first engagement they met Plymouth Argyle, who nearly wrested chief honours from them last season; but the Midland team after an exceptionally good performance in beating Swindon at home, visited West Ham United yesterday, and again proved triumphant by an odd goal. The Coventry club have a brilliant goalkeeper in R. D. Evans, the Welsh International, and the whole team play a strong, fast game that promises to make them one of the most prominent sides in the competition. Plymouth Argyle were the only other team to win away from home yesterday, while Millwall distinguished themselves by being the heaviest scorers at the expense of Southampton. Crystal Palace, playing at Swindon, and West Ham United were the only London clubs to lose on Saturday.

A LIQUEUR WHISKY !!!

TREACHER'S

"EXTRA SPECIAL"

Those who desire to use themselves a Faultless Whisky or to offer their guests something out of the ordinary, should purchase this.

It is a matured blend of splendid quality and, unlike most advertised brands, may be fittingly used as an After-Dinner Liqueur, as it is sufficiently delicate in flavour to merit being sipped alone, particularly if served in a thin glass and held for a little time, in order to allow the warmth of the hand to develop the full aroma

Mixed with milk it forms a wholesome, nourishing and delicious drink the last thing at night, and is a panacea for Insomnia.

POONA JUNIOR TOURNAMENT.

THE tournament for Sir George Richardson's Challenge Cup this year drew a baker's dozen of entries and these have provided some excellent sport. Three games were played on the first day, 23rd September details of which are as follows :—

POONA HORSE vs. MAHABLESHWAR GYMKHANA.

First Chukker.—A very level period, the Poona Horse, who started with a handicap of +1, added another point through McGregor.

Second Chukker.—The Poona Horse had the best of this and McGregor scored once more.

Third Chukker.—Continuing the pressure the Poona Horse put on another goal after two unsuccessful attempts. A run by Mahableshwar was abortive.

Fourth Chukker.—Gray was very conspicuous for the Poona Horse and scored twice in this period.

Fifth Chukker.—Mahableshwar had the best of this Session, but their recovery was too late. Platt scored one goal and time arrived with the final score : Poona Horse 6 goals, Mahableshwar 1 goal. Teams :—

Umpires :—Captain Coaker and Captain H. C. Chaytor.

BOMBAY GYMKHANA (+6) vs. POONA GYMKHANA.

First Chukker.—Poona pressed vigorously and Warren, Coaker and Swifte each scored a goal. Bombay got through at the close of the period and Stewart scored.

Second Chukker.—A slow chukker, but Poona had all the best of it and Coaker (2), Swifte and Cassim Shah scored goals.

Third Chukker.—Play was slow and very sticky. No score.

Fourth Chukker.—Poona on top all the way, four more goals being added by Coaker and Swifte—two each.

Fifth Chukker.—Another easy round for Poona ; Warren, Coaker and Swifte adding goals. Final score : Poona 14 goals, Bombay 7 goals. Teams :—

127TH BALUCH L. I. (+1) vs. BANGALORE GYMKHANA.

First Chukker.—Up and down play at the start, Bangalore scoring two goals before the close of the period.

Second Chukker.—A very level chukker. Both goals were attacked in turn Bangalore driving the ball through once.

Third Chukker.—Bangalore shone in this period and registered three goals without response.

Fourth Chukker.—The Baluchis woke up and O'Neil and McCudden scored a goal each. Then Bangalore finished up the chukker with a goal.

Fifth Chukker.—The Baluchis were again prominent and O'Neil got through once more. Bangalore did not score in this session. Final score : Bangalore 7 goals, Baluchis 4 goals. Teams :—

Umpires :—Major Bremner and Major M. H. Henderson.

Three more games were decided on the 24th ultimo when the first round was completed and one of the games in the second. Colonel Bosher and the officers of the Dorset Regiment were "at home" with their band.

33RD LIGHT CAVALRY vs. 7TH DRAGOON GUARDS (+1).

First Chukker.—Fast up and down play, the 33rd scoring twice. Wise and Anderson being responsible.

Second Chukker.—The Dragoons attacked vigorously, Lindsay and Finlay were credited with a goal each. A run by the 33rd was stopped.

Third Chukker.—The 33rd again assumed the lead in this period, Anderson and Wise adding a goal each in a hotly contested chukker.

Fourth Chukker.—Another fast period Scott of the Dragoons putting through his own goal.

Fifth Chukker.—Fast play all over the field. The 33rd scored two more goals and ran out victorious by 7 goals to 3. Teams :—

Umpires.—Captain Coaker and Mr. P. K. Wise.

Second Round.

3RD SAPPERS AND MINERS vs. 12TH PIONEERS (+ 5).

First Chukker.—The Sappers pressed throughout and scored three goals.

Second Chukker.—Bremner and Loring added a goal each to the Sappers' total, making the scores level.

Third Chukker.—Keeping up a strong pressure the Sappers scored two more goals with response.

Fourth Chukker.—The Sappers slowed down a bit in this period, but managed to put on yet another point.

Fifth Chukker.—Another easy chukker for the Sappers, who pressed throughout, Bremner scoring four more goals. Final score : 3rd Sappers and Miners 18 goals, 12th Pioneers 5 goals. Teams :—

3RD SAPPERS & MINERS.		12TH PIONEERS.

Three more games were played on Thursday last completing the second round of the tournament. Colonel V. W. Evans and the officers of the 3rd Sappers and Miners were "At Home."

29TH LANCERS vs. POONA HORSE (+ 1).

First Chukker.—Fast play all over the field. The Poona Horse made desperate efforts and at length scored a goal through McGregor

Second Chukker.—The ball travelled up and down the ground till Jackson scored for the Lancers in a mêlée.

Third Chukker.—The Lancers were most prominent in this period, but all their efforts were unavailing and the chukker ended pointless.

Fourth Chukker.—This was another blank chukker.

Fifth Chukker.—The Poona Horse got on and pressing throughout scored three goals, Campbell, Gray and McGregor being credited with the points. Final score : Poona Horse 5 goals, 29th Lancers 1 goal Teams :—

Umpires :—Mr. A. H. M. Wilson, and Captain J. H. McCudden.

POONA GYMKHANA vs. BANGALORE GYMKHANA (+ 1).

First Chukker.—Poona attacked throughout and Swifte hit a goal.

Second Chukker.—A run by Poona was stopped and Bangalore then pressed, Bassett scoring a goal.

Third Chukker.—Bangalore rushed down and scored through Ramsey, then Poona got away and Aga Cassim Shah got the ball through. A penalty against Poona for crossing was stopped.

Fourth Chukker.—Poona ran down and Coaker hit a goal. They continued to press but failed to score again.

Fifth Chukker.—Aga Cassim Shah hit a goal for Poona and then Bangalore got through and Bassett and Conran added a goal each. Final score : Bangalore 3 goals, Poona 4 goals. Teams as before.

33RD LIGHT CAVALRY vs. 26TH LIGHT CAVALRY (+ 1).

First Chukker.—Fast play in which the 26th had the upper hand. Collum and Johnson were conspicuous, the latter opening the scoring.

Second Chukker.—The 26th continued to press, but their opponents cleared and rushing down Captain Anderson scored. Fast up and down play followed, Wise scoring a second point for the 33rd.

Third Chukker.—The 33rd attacked but were stopped and play followed in midfield for a spell. Then the 26th got away and Chaytor scored.

Fourth Chukker.—A very level period : each team scored a goal—Anderson for the 33rd and Johnson for the 26th.

Fifth Chukker.—An attack by the 33rd was broken up and the 26t next had a couple of unsuccessful runs. They got in another good run just before time but missed their shot. Final score : 26th L. C. 4 goals, 33rd L. C. 3 goals. Teams as before.

Semi-finals.

The two games in the semi-finals were played on Monday the 30th ultimo. In the first the Poona Horse met the Bangalore Gymkhana. The latter receiving one goal were ultimately victorious by 4 goals to 2. The second game between the 3rd Sappers and Miners and the 26th Light Cavalry ended in an easy win by 6 goals to 1 for the 26th who were in receipt of one goal.

Final

The final was played last evening when the 26th Light Cavalry beat the Bangalore Gymkhana by 5 goals to 4. Details of the concluding games in our next issue.

Rowing.

OARSMEN AND COACHES.

THE scarcity of really good coaches and the perversity of oarsmen has lately been one of the topics of the hour among English wet bobs. Several well known writers have ventilated their opinions in print, among them "Cestrian" who insists that it is the ineptitude of some mentors which mainly accounts for the poor form seen on most rivers. He considers there ought to be some control put upon coaches of this sort, as—within his experience—there are far too many mentors in evidence nowadays whose knowledge of the art of rowing is crude in the extreme. Some others never even approached mediocrity in their own active days, yet now pose as coaches. Others, again, fully understand the theory of rowing, but seem unable to express themselves clearly. As the outcome, oarsmen are at the tender mercies of coaches who lack the necessary experience or gumption—as he puts it.

All this may be true, observes "Camisis" of the Sunday Times, yet how can voluntary coaches be put under any sort of control? Nor would it ever do to set upon his plan and compel rowing coaches to pass some kind of esthetical examination a la football procedure. The cycling authorities tried some such dodge years ago. They wished gentlemen amateurs to explain (practically) their position ere being given a permit to race. The analogy is perhaps strained, yet the principle of enforcing drastic measures is the same. And we all know what happened, i.e., all the best amateurs flatly refused to compete under such restrictions. Were such an examination made compulsory by the A.R.A., the same thing would inevitably follow. Rowing coaches would gracefully retire.

"Camisis" continues :—May I suggest that it is the inattention of oarsmen themselves, rather than such wholesale ineptitude on the part of mentors, which accounts for the alleged poor form shown on many rivers. The rowing coach must indeed have the patience of Job nowadays. It was the subject of general remark when Cambridge University rowed Harvard University a few seasons ago how extraordinarily quick the Americans were, not only in understanding what they were wanted to do, but in doing it! Per contra, when English oarsmen receive instruction they invariably row on for several more strokes ere realising that they must make a change. And even then the change is not always what is wanted. The reason cannot be from lack of real intelligence. It depends partly upon our style and partly upon our naval character. Let me explain.

Our orthodox stroke, when perfectly rowed, looks so simple, and seems so easily done, that the hundred details of which it is compacted are often forgotten. The oarsman only gradually discovers that, in order to follow out some special instruction given by his coach, he has to begin by doing something else to make it possible. Put briefly, the average Englishman constitutionally does things slowly—as one expert defines it. Anyway, he very rarely shows that military smartness in a boat which American, Belgian, or Australian oarsmen exhibit every time they visit us. Why, then, blame the long-suffering coach? The advice I once heard a famous Cambridge coach give to an oarsman who persisted in his fault was very much to the point: "Think of it, sir! Think of it! And bring your mind to bear as you row each stroke." This is exactly what every handler of an oar ought to do.

He must realise the positive necessity of not tossing a single stroke carelessly. And they will do well to consider their coaches in the light of friends, instead of—as some novices do—taskmasters of the most autocratic kind. Nor must they object to constant repetitions of the same lessons and lengthy probation. The end in view—finished work, is by no means compassed at once or in a hurry. Such a qualification can only be attained "bit by bit"—as Mr. Ashton Dilke has it in another connection. One other point needs emphasis under this heading. It frequently happens that oarsmen put up for selection are ready-made ones, hence, they do not require much, or any, instruction in rudimentary work. Yet they, too, from the various nurseries in which they have been taught to row, require more or less rounding off or polishing up to ensure complete uniformity. It is essential, of course, that even they should listen attentively to any remarks of their coaches, although they may have won their aquatic "spurs."

Here "Cestrian" scores a point. He furthermore insists that the worst coaches are generally the most vituperative. In his own words, "they hammer away at one individual and, oftener than not, several of these self-constituted mentors are so hammering at the same time. On the principle of too many cooks spoiling the broth, presumably, he decries this sort of thing, and adds "one coach only should be allowed to take charge of any crew during the various stages of practice." I agree. Dr. Warre, Mr. Guy Nickalls, and other distinguished coaches have frequently called attention to this error—for an error it is. Let us put it down to "misdirected enthusiasm." As regards "Cestrian's" other point, it is a strange rhythmical fact in connection with the embryo wet bob that (as a general rule):—

The worse he rows
The more he knows.

But I have yet to learn that it is the custom of comparative novices to take upon themselves the duties of coaches on any river, as stated. That would be simply audacity.

Now for another letter permitted by Mr. P. G. Featherstonaugh (Co. Clare). He contends we are too conservative in our methods, our ideas, and our opinions of other nations improvements in rowing. To prove his point he writes, "What is known as the orthodox British style of rowing has now attained the dangerous position of a pompous monopoly. Its exponents assume it to be infallible, despite events at Henley since 1900, and so class all other styles of rowing as 'bad' or 'ineffective.' If results be any criterion, the Belgians, the Australians, and our own Jesus College (Cambridge) crews have demonstrated to the contrary, yet this seems to matter very little to the Eton school. These will have their way and so continue to pooh-pooh any other. Such formalism (so to speak) is to be decried. If the traditional English style of rowing needs modification—as many of us insist—why not drop all prejudice on the matter and set about the task at once? Anyway, British rowing men will be well advised to test, at least, all possible improvements with an open mind. The rigid prejudice still shown in divers quarters is bad for the sport, bad for oarsmen themselves, and bad for future International fray."

POULTRY NOTES.

A number of chickens between the age of three days to three weeks old get diarrhœa. The owners or attendants should always notice the vents of little chickens, as the excreta becomes caked upon the vent, and entirely stops the passage. The bulk of it should be removed carefully and the vent bathed in warm water, wiped dry with some soft material and a little vaseline applied round the vent and where any fluff may have been pulled out. For diarrhœa it is a good plan to give one teaspoonful of ground ginger, and two teaspoonfuls of powdered chalk, this being the proportion for fifteen chicks a week old, mixed in a soft food, not all at one feed, dividing it into two or three meals on the one day. Each chick which has diarrhœa should be caught and have a few drops of sweet oil—one teaspoonful to twelve chicks—which relieves them very much.

Where many fowls are kept, and contagious disease breaks out in a bad form, it is the best plan to promptly kill the first bird that is attacked, as the first loss is often the least, but if there are not many kept and the owner has time at his disposal to deal with the first cases resolutely, the task will be easy.

When they are recovering, they should be hardened off a little at the time; first put in a snug out-house, then in an open shed. The first time they are allowed to go into the pen should be in the middle of the day; if not they may take cold again.

When the birds are breathing hard, give a teaspoonful of glycerine an hour or two after the oil. Should the rattling in the throat be very bad, dip a feather in glycerine and put it down the wind-pipe. The fowl may be distressed for a few minutes, but this will probably help the breathing after. A little green rue is very valuable in such cases. This may be difficult to obtain, but linseed is within the reach of everyone.

This should be put into cold water, and placed over a slow fire, so that it does not boil fast, but just simmer for half an hour. Give the linseed as warm as the fowls can take it, and give the birds three dessert spoonfuls each.

When a fowl catches cold, and the system is in good order, the first symptom is a little running at the nostrils. At first the discharge is clear water, but if neglected it usually ends in roup. If not taken in time and treated properly, the fowls soon begin to cough and sneeze, and the running from the nostrils may last for a long time.

The discharge from the nostrils goes harder with chickens than with matured hens, and if they do not get good attention it stops their growth. When the first symptoms appear they should be examined to see if the mouth and throat are free from white spots or ulcers and with no rattling noise when breathing.

Their nostrils should be washed with a little alum and water. It is well to dip a feather in the alum solution, and put down the fowl's throat. If it is a little sore or inflamed the alum will do it good.

When there is only a running at the nostrils, and no offensive smell, they may be allowed to run with the other fowls without any danger of their infecting the others. When this cold is neglected there is a very offensive smell from the fowl's breath and a discharge from the nostrils, dried on all round the outside, often preventing them from breathing; also thick saliva in the mouth, and if this is not stopped it soon turns to a thick mucus, and corrodes very fast, spreads down the throat, and causes the fowls to breathe very hard, and soon the worst symptoms of diptheric roup are fully developed.

In very bad cases there is a thick cheesy matter formed on the tongue, mouth, and down the throat where the food passes, and it grows very fast, so much so that in bad cases the tongue protrudes from the mouth and they appear to be trying to swallow all the time.

THE DURAND TOURNAMENT.

Lancashire Fusiliers vs. Royal Irish Rifles.—These teams met at Simla on the 25th instant, when the Lancashire Fusiliers won by 2 goals to 1. It will be remembered that the Rifles had won the last I.F.A. shield and the Fusiliers had carried off the Durnar Cup so a good game had been anticipated and spectators were not disappointed. The Fusiliers attacked at the start but could not get through. Then the Rifles obtained a corner which was improved upon. Up and down play followed but neither team could score and the interval arrived with a blank sheet. On resuming hostilities the Fusiliers attacked vigorously and at length registered a goal. The Irishmen were by no means disconcerted and play centred in the Fusiliers' territory. The Rifles forced a corner and from the kick managed to equalise. Ten minutes extra each way was played and the Fusiliers pressing most of the time scored another goal without response and thus won by 2 goals to 1. Teams :—

ROYAL IRISH RIFLES.—Coleman, goal; Boland and Caldwell, backs; Ryan, McConville and Meredith, half-backs; Toolan, Napier, Waters, Fowler and Leathem, forwards.

LANCASHIRE FUSILIERS.—Williams, goal; Hefferman and Murphy, backs; Sweeny, Russel and Walker, half-backs; Halstead, Gambles, Blundall, Spriggs and Balson, forwards.

Referee:—Captain Impey.

5TH MOUNTAIN BATTERY vs. SOUTH LANCASHIRE REGIMENT.—This was a very level game, the South Lancashires winning by a goal to nil. The Gunners did most of the attacking in the first half but lost chances owing to poor shooting and their opponents managed to score. There was very little either way in the second half and there was no further score. Teams :—

SOUTH LANCASHIRE REGIMENT.—Pench, goal; Henson and Holding, backs; McDermott, Hanton, and Collins, half-backs; Birtwistle, Stark, Price, Hughes, and Harvey, forwards.

5TH MOUNTAIN BATTERY.—Skinner, goal; Holmes and Ralph, backs; Leathem, Caffrey, and Fielder, half-backs; Sims, Constable, Newman, Dunn and Farrington, forwards.

Referee:—Quartermaster Sergeant Dorman.

WEST KENTS vs. SIMLA FOOTBALL CLUB.—The military were the first to attack. They forced a corner and were nearly through shortly after. Up and down play followed and once more the soldiers went within an ace of scoring. Play was then carried to the West Kents territory where Simla pressed till the interval, an unproductive corner being the only advantage gained. Crossing over with a clean sheet the West Kents were first to attack and just missed scoring. Simla then took up the tale and erratic shooting robbed them of a score. Time was called with a blank sheet, but in the extra period the soldiers netted the ball and Simla being unable to respond were beaten 1—0 Teams :—

SIMLA FOOTBALL CLUB.—Delahay, goal; Edge and Salt, backs; Rickets, Seavers and Townley, half-backs; Sykes, Goodwin, Baptist, Hotz and Heron, forwards.

ROYAL WEST KENTS.—Fairbridge, goal; Obee and Muldaur, backs; Gentry, Mitchell and Gibson, half-backs; Rapson, Page, Roberts, Phillips and Hall, forwards.

Referee:—Captain Impey.

ROYAL SCOTS vs. EAST YORKS.—These old rivals met on the 28th instant when the Scots were winners by 3 goals to nil. It will be remembered that these teams put up a splendid fight in the first round of the I.F.A. Challenge Shield Tournament in Calcutta last year. They met twice, the first encounter resulting in a goalless draw and the East Yorks winning by 3 to 2 at the second time of asking. On Saturday last play was very level till mid way in the first half when for a foul the Yorks were penalised in their own territory and from the penalty kick the Scots opened their account. They continued to press and having the best of the exchanges scored another goal soon after. Half time found the Yorks on the offensive but their efforts were unsuccessful. Changing ends the Yorkshire men pressed and missed a good chance. Then play was transferred to their end and the Scots were nearly through. Up and down play followed till a run by the Scots culminated in a goal. The Yorks were unable to respond and retired beaten as stated. Teams :—

ROYAL SCOTS.—Johnson, goal; Smith and Hoile, backs; Watson, Dunlop and Thomson, half-backs; Devlin, Bolton, Hastie, France, and Thomson, forwards.

EAST YORKSHIRES.—Cressy, goal; Whitby and Scully, backs; Jeffcott, Pratt, and Mason, half-backs; Dixon, Grinshaw, Lieut. Eccles, and Clucas, forwards.

WEST RIDINGS vs. CONNAUGHT RANGERS.—The game between these teams on the 28th instant was a stubbornly contested affair. Both teams played hard and the Rangers had if anything the better of the exchanges but they were unable to score and in spite of extra time being played the match ended pointless. Replaying on Monday another good game was witnessed. The Dukes pressing at the start were first to score and before long had added a second. Then the Rangers got going and after obtaining two abortive corners they put the ball through. A penalty a little later enabled them to equalise and the interval arrived with the score of 2 all. Up and down play on resuming, the Irishmen losing opportunities owing to poor shooting. They ultimately netted another goal and in spite of every effort of the West Ridings they were unable to equalise and were beaten 3—2. Teams :—

WEST RIDINGS.—Chadwick, goal; Jennings and Reynolds, backs; Kenchatt, Asbury and Coymer, half-backs; Matterson, Farrari, Blackmore, Parker and Bird, forwards.

CONNAUGHTS.—Byrne, goal; Knapps and Howson, backs; Coote, Hanlon and Jesse, half-backs; McBride, McDonald, Murray, Feeney and Kelly, forwards.

Referee:—Dorman.

NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY vs. GORDONS.—This game on Monday ended in a pointless draw.

ROYAL FUSILIERS vs. LANCASHIRE FUSILIERS.—This match which was to have been played last week but was postponed owing to bad weather was brought off on Tuesday morning last and resulted in an easy win for the Lancashire Fusiliers. They rushed off at the start and scored a goal, obtained another shortly after and added a third before the interval. The ball was netted a fourth time but the point was disallowed. On changing ends the Lancashires slackened their efforts and the Royal attacked but could not get past the Lancashire backs. Sticky play followed till the Lancs got away and scored a fourth goal. Another was put through soon after but this was disallowed. The Royals could not score and were beaten 4 to nil.

ROYAL SCOTS vs S. LANCS.—This match on Tuesday evening was a very well contested affair. Play was very level at the start and after each team had obtained corners which were not improved upon the Scots got through and scored. Play to the interval was very even, neither team gaining any advantage. On crossing over the Lancashires secured a couple of abortive corners and pressed for a spell. They were driven back, however, and the Scots put through from a penalty but the goal was disallowed. Play continued very fast, but the Scots had the better of the exchanges. They kept the ball mostly in the S. Lancs' territory and forced four corners, but nothing came of them and being unable to score again the Scots left the field victorious by goal to nil.

CONNAUGHT RANGERS vs. WEST KENTS.—This was a very level game. The first half was pointless and in the second each team scored a goal, the match thus ending in a draw which will be replayed later.

BOMBAY ROVERS' TOURNAMENT.

THE Rovers' Tournament now in progress is the 22nd annual competition of this series. Fifteen teams entered this year; of these two, scratched. A beginning was made on Saturday, the 21st instant, when the R. G. A. from Colaba met the Yorks and Lancaster Regiment under miserable weather conditions. Wind and rain militated against good play and at half time the Referee declared the ground unfit and the players left the field, the Yorks and Lancs then leading by 2 goals to 1. The replay was to have taken place on Monday, the 23rd, but owing to some misunderstanding the Gunners did not turn up: the other teams were on the field, however, and the Royal Irish Rifles gave them a practice game. The York and Lancaster Regiment and Gunners met again last Friday when the Artillery were beaten by a goal to nil

On Tuesday the Royal Irish Regiment met the Hornets and beat them by 3 goals to nil. The civilian team with the wind in their favour during the first half were able to keep on terms with their opponents, and there was no score at half time, but on changing ends the soldiers very soon showed their superiority. They scored 2 goals not long after the restart, Slater being responsible for the first and the second being put through off one of the Hornets' backs. The Royal Irish continued to have most of the play, but the Hornets got away on occasions, weak shooting preventing them from scoring. The Irish scored their third goal midway through the second half, Slater beating Navin with a hot shot. Two corners followed in favour of the soldiers, but they could not improve upon them. In spite of all their efforts the Hornets failed to score and were beaten as stated.

The Loyal North Lancs met the Bombay Athletic Club on Wednesday, the 25th, and were victorious by 3 goals to 1. The North Lancs did most of the attacking at the start, but could not beat the Bombay Athletic Club's defence. A spell of midfield play was followed by a rush by the civilians and they nearly scored from a corner. They failed to improve on a penalty kick soon after and then play was transferred and the soldiers obtained two corners. These were not turned to account and the Bombay Athletic Club got away and Woodford opened the scoring. The North Lancs pressed till the interval. On changing ends the soldiers got level, Brant beating Rockle. The same player added another goal and the military team were on the offensive most of the time. Rockley disposed of many difficult shots, but was at length beaten again by Barker. Time being called soon after.

The Cheshires and the R. F. A. from Kirkee took the field on Thursday and put up a very interesting game. Play was well contested throughout the first half and the interval arrived with the score sheet blank. On crossing over the Cheshires got busy and Eden scored a goal. This was disputed, but the Council upheld the Referee's decision. Each team then attacked in turn and the Gunners were again beaten, Eden heading into the net. The Cheshires continued to have the better of the exchanges and thus won by 2 goals to nil.

CALCUTTA RUGBY NOTES.

THE Junior Rugby Tournament for the Gloucester Cup drew six teams this year and two matches in the first round were brought off on Monday, the 23rd ultimo. Calcutta "B" met the Customs, a scrambling game ending in a win for the Customs by 16 points to nil. Calcutta played two men short and did not put a very strong combination in the field, though all played pluckily. In the first half Galbraith and Featherstone got over with tries for the Riversiders but neither was converted. In the second period Galbraith and Williamson got tries, the last named adding the major points to both; the Customs thus won by 2 goals and 2 tries (16 points) to nil. The other match between the Black Watch and the Armenians ended in a pointless draw after a well contested game. Replaying on the 26th ultimo another good game was witnessed. It was keenly contested throughout but the better condition of the soldiers told in the end, for shortly before time Ray and Bencraft got over with tries, both being converted and the Black Watch thus won by 2 goals to nil. The Middlesex were to have met La Martiniere in the first round but the latter failed to put in an appearance, and the military walked over into the semi-final where they met the Customs. A late start resulted in the second half being played in semi-darkness and the game was a scrambling one all through. The Customs put out only 13 men but they rendered a very good account of themselves and eventually won: a successful drop kick by Galbraith giving his side the victory. The tournament was concluded on the 1st instant when the Black Watch and Customs met in the final on the Calcutta ground. It was a good game vigorously fought from start to finish and the Riversiders thoroughly deserved their victory. The Black Watch put up a plucky fight nevertheless and there was no scoring in the first half. The Customs made some changes in the disposition of their team on crossing over and this led to better results, for they had the better of the exchanges and were able to score two tries, Galbraith and Williamson being responsible. The place kicks were unsuccessful and the Customs thus won 2 tries (6 points) to nil.

The annual England vs. Scotland match was played on the Calcutta ground last Friday. Neither side was at full strength and the game was not a brilliant one—a wet ball and the slippery state of the ground affecting the play. The Scottish team had the best of the game but could not score, whereas the English team got over with a try in the second half and the extra point were added, the Rose winning by this margin.

WEEKLY COMPETITION.—There was a record entry for the usual Thursday morning competition last week, no fewer than 54 taking part in the two classes. Among the Seniors Nicholson, who had won the week before from the scratch mark and had had his handicap raised to plus one, was again successful, this time with a net score of 40. Darlington and Cook tied for second place with scratch scores of 41. The Junior competition was won by M. D Crichton with 48—7=41.

THE MURREE TOURNAMENT.

On Monday, the 23rd ultimo, the drawn match between the 2nd Rifle Brigade "A" team and the 73rd Company R. G. A. was replayed in the morning. The Rifles had the better of the exchanges throughout and wound up victorious by three goals to nil. In the evening the Lancashire Fusiliers met the 1st Royal Sussex "A" team, and though they put up a good game were outclassed and beaten by 6 goals to nil. The other game was between the 2nd Mountain Artillery Brigade and the 4th King's Royal Rifles. Play was exciting throughout, and though the Rifles won by 2 goals to 1 they owe their victory to the excellent play of their goal-keeper who brought off some wonderful saves.

On the 24th two more games were played. In the first the 2nd Royal Sussex met the Durham L. I. The former had the better of the exchanges, but were unable to score, whereas the Durham succeeded in putting through once and thus won. The other match, between the 2nd Rifle Brigade "A" and the 2nd Royal West Kents, ended, in spite of playing extra time, in a draw of two all. Replaying the next day another fast and exciting game was witnessed, the Rifle Brigade team winning by 3 goals to 2. The first of the semi-finals was played the same evening, a very evenly contested affair resulting in a win for the Sussex team by 2 goals to nil. A very level game was witnessed when the Durham L. I. and the 2nd Rifle Brigade met in the second match of the penultimate round on the 27th ultimo. Time was called with a blank sheet out in the extra period the Rifle Brigade put through once and won the game.

KENNEL NOTES.

SIMLA SHOW.

The Simla Show seems to have been a success. There were 38 classes and these were judged by the following officers:—

Lieutenant-Colonel Impey, Colonel Rennie, Major Shore, Surgeon-General Sloggett, Captains Singleton and Aspinall and Lieutenant Patterson, while the secretarial duties were performed by Major F. S. Lawrence and he was supported by a hard-working Committee.

His Excellency the Viceroy's Cup for the best exhibit in the show was once more carried off by a Smooth Fox Terrier, Messrs. Patterson and Muir's Bhalwal Discoverer. This smart young dog also annexed several other specials and was placed first all through his classes.

The entries were not so large as they would have been had the show not synchronized with the Naini Tal fixture, and it is to be hoped that such a state of affairs will not be repeated.

THE DARJEELING SHOW.

As was anticipated Mr. Horace Johnstone will not be able to judge at this show which takes place on Saturday, the 19th October, as under urgent medical advice he has proceeded home, after having been confined to his bed for fifteen weeks. It is to be hoped that the voyage, together with a sojourn in the old country will speedily set him up again, and that he will return at no very distant date thoroughly restored to health. We wish him bon voyage and a good time.

It is understood that several owners in submitting their entries for this show have stated that their dogs are only entered on the understanding that they are judged by Mr. Horace Johnstone; however, as this is now absolutely impossible the Executive of the Darjeeling show should lose no time in announcing the name of the judge who will officiate in Mr Johnstone's place.

The entries are rolling in and the show promises to be a success. As the Poojahs will be on there should be a record gate.

What about railway concessions for dogs attending this show?

GONOSAN is made from highly concentrated and distilled pure East Indian Santal wood oil and Kawa Kawa, the two making the happiest combination; free from all impurities, does not disturb the stomach, is the latest and most up-to-date medicine, and far superior to other preparations of Santal in the market. At all Medicine Vendors and General Stores.

KENNEL WHISPERINGS.

The Durbar Kennels sent no representatives to either the Simla or the Naini Tal shows, as the owner the Rajah of Pithapuram suspected that distemper had broken out in his kennel so cancelled the entries for the two shows. However, as the disease turned out to be nothing contagious he hopes to be able to send some members of his kennel to the forthcoming Darjeeling Show. This kennel has been strengthened by the addition of a very fine young Smooth Fox Terrier bitch from Mr. Redmond's stock.

Messrs. Patterson and Muir have lately imported the Smooth Fox Terrier dog Discoverer which has been registered as Bhalwal Discoverer; he is by Toppington ex Lily Agnes and is a small short-backed little dog weighing not more than 13lbs. With the present craze for cobby dogs this youngster is certainly an acquisition to the breed. His owners have placed him at stud.

The last of Mr. Johnstone's fine kennel of Airedales Felden Fishergirl by Tintern Desire ex Ch. Felden Flowergirl is up for sale and is about to change hands. She is undoubtedly the best bred Airedale in India, so this is a grand opportunity for fanciers of the breed to secure something of the very best.

Mr. V. H. Everett of Howrah has just imported a smart Irish Terrier, who will probably make his appearance at the Darjeeling Show.

Mrs. A. M Robertson is also, it is believed, importing a brace of Dare Devils and they are already on their way out.

The Beyenar kennels are going strong and the owner, Mr. J. Law, has some promising puppies which will make their appearance at the cold weather shows.

Mr. G. W. Rayner, owner of the Dingle kennels, has taken up Bulldogs in addition to his fine strings of Irish and Scottish Terriers, and with Paddington Duke won a couple of specials at the Simla Show, including the Calcutta Kennel Club Cup.

We hear that the owner of the Lusp kennels of Bulldogs, Mr. P. C. E. Paul, has succeeded in breeding an exceptionally fine puppy which, if all goes well, will make his first appearance in public at the Darjeeling Show.

A couple of Lhasa Terriers, which are said to be typical specimens of their breed, have also been added to Mr. Paul's kennel.

DOG FAKING.

It must be acknowledged by all dog fanciers and particularly those who breed for show purposes, that dog faking has developed into a fine art. This can be corroborated by any keen and observant fancier who cares to run over a good many of the breeds at our shows.

The whole canine world is at the present moment discussing the subject and until the special meeting of the Kennel Club, which has been convened for 14th October, the matter will no doubt continue to loom large, and form a topic of conversation whenever two or three doggy men are gathered together. Even after that the club's action is surely to be widely discussed and criticised adversely by those few "experts" who are anxiously waiting to find fault with kennel authority.

Rule 29 of the Indian Kennel Association reads as follows:—

A dog shall be disqualified from winning a prize at shows held under I.K.A. rules, save as specified under "Exceptions," if it be proved to the Committee of the Show:—

(a) That any dye, colouring, whitening or darkening matter has been used, and remains, on any part of the dog.

(b) That any preparation has been used, and remains on the coat when exhibited for the purpose of altering its texture;

(c) that any oil, greasy or sticky substance has been used, and remains on the coat during the time of exhibition;

(d) that any part of a dog's coat has been cut, clipped singed, or rasped down by any substance;

(e) that the new or first coat has been removed by pulling or plucking in any manner.

Note.—The coat may be brushed and combed, so that old or shedding coat and loose hair may be removed.

(f) That if any cutting, piercing, breaking by force, or any kind of operation or act which destroys the tissues of the ears, or alters their natural formation or carriage, or shortens the tails, or alters the natural formation of the dog, or any part thereof has been practised, or any other things have been done, calculated, in the opinion of the Committee of the I. K. A., to deceive, except in cases of necessary operations certified to the satisfaction of the I.K.A. Committee;

(g) that the lining membrane of the mouth has been cut or, mutilated in any way.

Exceptions.

(a) Shortening the tail of dogs of the following breeds will not disqualify them:—Spaniels (except Irish Water Spaniels), Fox, Irish, Welsh or Airedale Terriers, Old English Sheep dogs, Poodles, Toy Spaniels, Yorkshire Terriers, Schipperkes, Griffon Bruxellois, and such variety of foreign dogs as the Committee may from time to time determine.

(b) Poodles may have their coats clipped.

(c) Dewclaws may be removed.

"Arbiscafle."

LONDON'S DISAPPEARING FAUNA.

That charming writer, "The Londoner," whose column of stray notes on current topics is probably the only thing worth reading in the cheaper evening papers of the metropolis, has just been offering a few remarks on London pets and domestic animals. He writes:—

But the other day I was trying to imagine for myself the vision of that heartless and birdless London in which we shall soon find ourselves abandoned as on a desert island, Alexander Selkirks with a difference. Mr. Selkirk was lord of the fowl and the beute, and he complained. I complain because I shall be left without any but human companionship.

It began, of course, with the horses. Unemotional Arabs, we are bidding Farewell to our Favourite Steeds and are already reconciled to horseless London. On a day when shillings were dropping fast into the Royal Academy's money-box I have seen the great quad of Burlington House without so much as one hijsomobile in sight. Rank behind rank lay those carriages which, fulfilling Blessed Agatha Shipton's prophecy, run without horses. The London Museum has bought a four-wheeled cab, the Zoo authorities, I understand, have the cab-horse behind the bars with a Latin name to him.

I knew that the horses were going, that the cabman was driving off with the old mare to that place at the back of the north wind where the immortal jolly postboys of yesteryear sit drinking at the Dragon. But the news that the London sparrow, missing his gleanings of fallen oats from the nose-bags, was flying after the cabhorse was disturbing news. It was, then, a procession of beasts and birds that was heading out of London.

Now that I think of it, now that my suspicions are awake, I can remember that, a few weeks ago, a Professor said that the dog was Insanitary. In that word you have the doom of poor Carlo. In vain will he plead that inspired passage of the Spelling Book which describes him as "in every way fitted to be the Companion and the Friend of Man." That was written before we had numbered the bacteria upon his ears, when we suspected nothing graver than Fleas before we knew that he harboured a host of invisible things with Latin names which must make us deny the hearthrug to him. Give a dog a bad name and doom him. In this eugenic age you can give him no worse name than Insanitary; you might as well call him Feeble Minded.

So Carlo must take his place in the procession, must follow the sparrows and the horses out of town. I cannot say that I shall mourn for him out of all reason. It is years since the sympathetic soul of my brindled bulldog soared upward to the Dog Star. There, as I humbly trust, his gentle manners and his noble birth—he was a grandpup, or was it great-grandpup, of the illustrious Dandelion?—have made him welcome in the fields where Bran and Gelert and all the hero-dogs run unmuzzled and unleashed. Since his day I have had no other hound at my heels. I am come to the belief, observing the dogs of my neighbours, that one should part with one's dog at the marches of London, at the edge of the green grass. Also I am embittered by the conduct of the nearest dog.

GONOSAN is not unpleasant to take and is not attended by those distressing effects which so often accompany the use of Balsams. It has secured unqualified praise from the leading Specialists. It gives quick relief, is well tolerated by Stomach. Permanent cure in a short time. Procurable at all chemists and dealers.

This neighbour beast hath a devil which moves him to long, calculated spells of barking. Like Helen of Kirkconnell, "night and day on me he cries," but chiefly, I think, at night, when I work late or sleep lightly. I protest that I hear him economise his hateful bay according to the best methods of voice-production. He is careful that he shall never strain the vocal chords; the brute has all the endurance of a political speaker, is pitiless as a tenor at practise. To hear him, you would say that he lay despairing on a beloved master's grave, or that the boding spectres were trooping about the house that he affects to guard. But I, who must dwell near him, believe that he is happy in his howling as any eager young pianist at his "Rousseau's Dream," that he has not a care in the world, that he would break off in the middle, of his wail to lick the hand of a burglar, taking up his bark again in time to drown the noise of the centre-bit.

The dog was bound to go infamously into print: I am glad to glance back at the paragraph and see him there clad in something of the infamy which belongs to him. When all the dogs leave London, his going will cheer me for the loss of many honest dogs with whom, now and again, I exchange a neighbourly word.

After all, the true Friend and Companion stays with us poor townsfolk. The little cat remains. Although she too, they tell me, is feeling the pinch of the times, knows the menace of the motor-car. No horses, no oats, no sparrows. No horses, no cat's meat—but the little cat must not come to want while there is meat on our own plates. I, for one, will share with her though we come to siege-rations.

BALUCHISTAN NATURAL HISTORY SOCIETY.

Proceedings of a Meeting of the Baluchistan Natural History Society held on the 25th July 1912.

Present.—Members:—Major A.M., Anscomb, V.D., Rev. Mr. A. E. Ball, Mr. K. S. Ardeshir D. Marker, Dr. Mohanlal, Captain C. H. Reinhold, I.M.S., Visitor; Mr. N. N. Bijlani, Honorary Secretary: Mr. J. W. N. Cumming.

Read list of donations made to the Museum since the last Meeting, the objects themselves being exhibited. Of these the only objects of importance were—

(1) an Indian Tawny Eagle from Quetta presented by Mr. Byramjee, which is the first of its kind in the Museum collection; and

(2) a Lytorhynchus ridgewayi also from Quetta presented by Major R. C. L. Cranford.

Mr. Ball then mentioned that on or about 13th July 1912 between 11 and 12 at night his attention was drawn to a large flock of birds which flew over his house from west to east. From their call it struck him that they were the European Bee Eater.

Captain Reinhold stated that he had also noticed a similar flight of birds on the night of the 13th July while at Ziarat and that they appeared to be going from the direction of Kurbi Kach towards Quetta.

As to whether the birds in question were European Bee Eaters, the Honorary Secretary pointed out that it seemed too early for these Bee Eaters to be migrating, as their young were hardly fledged at this time of year, and in proof of his statement he produced three very young birds (Merops apiaster) preserved in spirit which had been brought to him on 26th June 1909.

No other remarks being offered, the election of new members was proceeded with and the following names were proposed:—

Mr. N. N. Bijlani, proposed by Dr. Mohanlal and seconded by Mr. J. W. N. Cumming.

Captain J. A. S. Phillips, I.M.S., proposed by Captain Reinhold and seconded by Major Anscomb.

Carried.

J. W. N. Cumming.
Honorary Secretary.

Mammal Survey.

The Secretary said since the last meeting Mr. Crump had sent in 227 specimens from Chanda, C.P., and Mr. Shortridge 105 specimens from Shimoga and 331 from Vijayanagar (Hampi), Bellary District. Mr. Crump was now in Kathiawar collecting and Mr. Shortridge at Kolar, E. Mysore, from whence he proceeds to Coorg and the Malabar Coast. In regard to finances, the Government of India had kindly responded to the Society's appeal by giving them Rs. 7,500 which was very acceptable, but would unfortunately not permit the Society to bring out a third collector, a very desirable course if the survey was not to drag on for the next five years or longer.

Exhibits.

Mr. Kinnear exhibited the specimen of mammals which had been named and returned by the British Museum.

The Secretary exhibited the following flowering plants new to Bombay:—Mussaenda erythrophylla, from Central Africa with bright crimson bracts (in contrast to the white bracts, of the indigenous M frondosa).

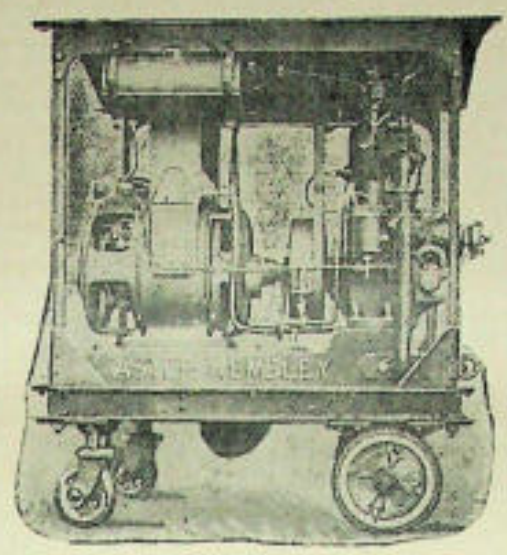
Solanum genile, with violet and yellow flowers and Odontodenia harrisi, with large pale yellow flowers and salmon centre.

Migration of Butterflies.

Attention was called to the recent immigration of yellow butterflies into Bombay apparently from the mainland. To any one about in the middle of the day the numbers of the yellow butterflies to be seen were very noticeable and as pointed out in the Times of India, this was especially so when watching the cricket on the Marine Lines Maidan. Many members and others had reported these butterflies to the Society, but unfortunately no one had sent in any specimens, so it was impossible to say for certain what kind they were. In all probability, however, they were either of the two large yellowish white butterflies Catopsilia pyranthe or crocale, or perhaps both, as well as the small black and yellow Terias hecabe.

One member whose office overlooks the harbour, reported that the butterflies seemed to come almost entirely from across the harbour and for days he noticed a steady stream of butterflies past his window. He also said he saw numbers of what from his description may probably have been hawk moths. On reaching Bombay the butterflies seemed to turn almost entirely south over and through the Fort in the Colaba direction. Messrs. Aitken and Comber writing of Catopsilia pyranthe in the "Butterflies of the Konkan" say that it is sometimes seen in swarms, and of crocale, they remark that at times too they migrate towards the S. and S. W. in countless swarms. In the early numbers of the Journal Mr. E. H. Aitken and Col. Prall also recorded the migration of the large chocolate and black butterfly Euploea core.

Plague of Caterpillars.



In many parts of Bombay there has lately appeared a regular plague of a small hairy brown caterpillar with creamy or yellowish marks. These have swarmed over the walls and floors apparently having sprung from nowhere and appear, to be wandering aimlessly about. Eventually these small caterpillars turn into yellow and brown moths called Nepita conferta. The food of these caterpillars is said to be lichen, mosses and other vegetable matter found on the walls. An interesting account of the life history of this moth is given by Mr. H. S. Wise in Vol. 2 of the Journal. In a later journal, Vol. XI. Mr. E. H. Aitken adds some further notes and mentions that the common toads Bufo melanostictus feeds greedily on these caterpillars, and as is generally the case in hairy caterpillars of moths the hairs are very irritant.

THE DEFECTIVE PUBLIC SCHOOL BOY.

If merciless cataloguing of his sins and shortcomings could work improvement in the average public school boy he ought, in the next generation or so, to be a valuable member of society. We are moved to this reflection by the trenchant criticism of the output of "Our Gentlemen's Schools" in the September issue of the English Review: the writer, who does not attach his name to his scathing indictment, was himself a public school boy who, he says, left to begin life, "a feckless, ignorant, swaggering youth," in a London Office, he was condemned as "another gentleman rotter" and, getting into a scrape which he now regards as his salvation, was sent to a German University. This experience enabled him to "recover my own self which had been crushed at the public school;" and he attributes whatever success he may have achieved in life to the regenerative operation of the German University. "Custos" regards his own case, sans German experience, as typical: he says that fully half the boys who go to our public schools "come away mental derelicts—looking at all serious things and at all men who work seriously with contempt;" and he attributes this to the fact that our public school education system is out of date. To this out of date system he refers the fact that the product of the middle class school, where, we understand, boys are made to work, is beating the Eton boy, the Rugby, the Harrow boy: to this—with some courage as it appears to us—he assigns the prominence of Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Bonar Law and Mr. F. E. Smith: whom he takes as types of the successful man of the day. The public school, "Custos" avers is the machine which turns out incompetence and inefficiency, because the masters do not care what a boy learns, or whether he works or loafs, and because the whole sense of any public school is against honest work and in favour of the cultivation of "Swank."

The utterances of "Custos" would, we think, carry more weight had he been able to shew that incompetence is peculiar to the public school boy; he does not attempt to do so and perhaps he is wise; for he need not explore our social system very widely to discover that no larger proportion of public school boys come to no good in the world than of middle class school boys. More is, or was, expected of the former and his failure is pounced upon for use as an Awful Warning. Every school sends forth its quota of youths cut out for no particular calling, endued with no particular energy and with, let us add, no particular vices; they are the colourless crowd who sink into the ruck. It is nothing new; the back benches were ever the most crowded and always will be: but it is natural enough that criticism should single out among the occupants of those benches men who have had what is supposed to be the advantage of a public school education and condemn the system by their failure. We do not doubt that something could be done to improve the system: no traditions are so hide bound as school traditions, and if the idea has grown up that it is not the thing to work the Head has his work cut out to implant new and healthier traditions. The thing can be done: the class from which our public schools are recruited does not lack common sense: it may or may not be due to the increased proportion of sons of the plutocracy at Eton, Rugby and Harrow, that the "don't work" tradition has grown up: for ourselves we doubt it; there is no democracy like a school, unless things since our day have undergone a very radical change, and the fellows who "set the time" do it by virtue of personal force, irrespective of birth and antecedents. But a statement made by "Custos" seems to suggest that a very great change has come over public school traditions: "boys at public schools don't fight now. A stand-up fight is unknown to-day. Were two boys to have it out on the old Harrow 'Miller' for example they would be sent up for punishment to the head master. Instead of fighting, the modern boys 'rag.' If this be true, and the writer we quote, refers to it as a fact well known, it is indicative of remarkable change in the spirit of school life and one, we are unregenerate to enough to deplore.

The "mass principles"—large classes and large houses where individual attention is impossible—on which the public school is carried on is blamed for the indifference to work: but it cannot explain the change of spirit which forbids boys to settle their quarrels in what we were wont to call "the good old English fashion;" elsewhere "Custos" tells us that the modern boy has not the fibre, the grit of the boy of thirty years ago, and this seems to bear relation to the desuetude into which fists have fallen. We should have welcomed light on the usages on the middle class schools, the products of which are beating the public school boy in the serious struggle for life. Is he also "spoiled and pampered?" or is he reared on more wholesome and virile lines? We are assured that "democratisation of our public schools would completely change their whole tone:" no doubt it would, but would the change be one for the better? We hardly think so; if public school life has a softening effect upon boys, it would not alter matters to introduce the traditions of what for lack of a better phrase we must call the lower middle classes. At Eton a boy at least still takes his swishing without rushing off to the nearest J. P.! And we know what is the feeling towards "the wholesome cane" in less exalted schools. If a more virile spirit is to be cultivated it will not be fostered by introduction of the class of boy who has been taught to regard a licking as an outrage upon incipient citizenship. It is curious that these "methods of barbarism," sound methods they are in our judgment, should go out of fashion in an age when overmuch attention is devoted to games; but we take courage; we find consolation and reassurance in the fact that the Army, the Civil Services and the mercantile ranks are still very largely recruited from the public schools, and that men placed in situations of responsibility rise to the occasion when the time of stress comes. We will not follow "Custos" into his line of thought where political life is concerned; but it will perhaps cross the mind of the thoughtful man that an age which appreciates what are called "Limehouse methods" is not one which can place its true value on the methods of which, say, Mr. A. J. Balfour was a conspicuous exponent: when the bludgeon and the brick bat are come political weapons the rapier must be laid on the shelf: but we fail to trace this change to any shortcoming in our public school system. "Custos" says that the crammers "are the real teachers of our gentlemen," citing Messrs. Wren and Scoones as examples: they "make men of the boys who were at public schools." We had always regarded the able teachers thus exemplified in the light of mental trainers whose mission was to get boys through those examinations the true value of which as tests for the real work of life, is more than dubious.

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

Mr. T. Pilkington's Prince Palatine has not been long in endorsing the Eclipse Stakes form as he has faithfully repeated the performance he then gave by winning the Jockey Club Stakes (1¼ mile) again beating Lord Derby's Stedfast in a close finish. At Sandown they backed both Stedfast and Tagalie in preference to the Leger winner of 1911 and the former started at 13 to 8 on, and Tagalie on the strength of her Epsom performance was at 9 to 2 against, Prince Palatine's price being 5 to 1. Lord Derby also had King William in that race, but declared to win with Stedfast, on whom Danny Maher had the ride, and they backed it as if it were all over. Tagalie was beaten a good quarter of a mile from home and then Stedfast took command and looked very like doing the trick, but Prince Palatine—whose best distance it certainly was not—came out after the favourite and a tremendous battle ensued, Prince Palatine, who was ridden by F. O'Neill, winning a short head. Lycaon, who ran second in the Leger to Prince Palatine, six lengths away. In the Jockey Club Stakes in spite of the longer distance being all in favour of a good stayer like Prince Palatine and against a horse whose staying qualities are not of outstanding excellence, they again preferred Lord Derby's horse and Stedfast started well backed at 9 to 4, Prince Palatine at the convenient odds of 5 to 1. The same thing happened as was the case in the Eclipse Stakes, excepting that Prince Palatine was able to slightly increase the margin of victory and win by half a length instead of only a short head. Stedfast won this race last year hard held from a good horse like Lemberg, Hair Trigger II. running third and Lycaon fourth, Cyrano being the only other runner and his friends taking a hopeful view of the chance once again evidently stood to him and confidently expected him to reproduce the 1911 performance. They were not far out in their calculations, and the Hon. George Lambton was hardly to be blamed for having recommended his patron to back his horse, but for the second time within a very short period the mistake has been made of despising the opposition and failing to realise what a good one Prince Palatine is.

Prince Palatine as a three-year-old had as consistent and brilliant a record as he has as a four-year-old and out of five starts he won three and was second on each of the other occasions. His first appearance last year was in the Ascot Biennial in which he only just failed to concede Bannockburn 12lb., as he was beaten a head, Persephone running third. Bannockburn was a hot favourite and Prince Palatine went out at tens. This performance encouraged his connections to back him for a good deal of money for the Midsummer Stakes at the Newmarket Second July and he started at 11 to 8 on but collapsed somewhat ignominiously to Mushroom, who won very easily, giving Prince Palatine 10lb. and probably 7lb. beating on top of that. They next had him in the Gordon Stakes, 1½ mile, at Goodwood—a distance that was found to suit him better than the two one-mile contests in which he had previously been engaged. Phalyxus, who had, it will be remembered, attained a certain amount of popularity in the Derby betting at one time, was backed for a lot of money and started at 11 to 10 on, but Prince Palatine, who was receiving 7lb., beat him comfortably by three lengths. Persephone a poor third. Then came his Leger victory and the story of that race is no doubt not yet forgotten. King William looked good in what was admittedly not a strong field, for he had had a long run of successes, and of his staunchness and staying capacity there was no reasonable cause for doubt. He collapsed very badly, however, in the race and was beaten a very long way from home. Prince Palatine took command six furlongs from home, Lycaon then lying second and leading all the rest of the way won "pulling up" by six lengths. His only other performance last year was when Stedfast beat him at Newbury in the Kingsclere Stakes, 1¼ mile, receiving 7lb. and winning easily by half a length.

This season Mr. Pilkington's horse has performed with equal consistency and out of his five essays has won three and been placed on each of the other occasions. He first ran this season in the Coronation Cup, 1½ mile, at Epsom and losing the start was beaten three-quarters of a length by Stedfast, who ran a very good race and was quickly away. In the Ascot Gold Cup, 2½ miles, Prince Palatine had no difficultly in defeating Basse Point and won cantering by five lengths, Bill and Coo being third, and the winner who started favourite never had the race in any doubt whatever. In the Princess of Wales' Stakes at Newmarket (1½ mile) in spite of the lump of weight that he had (10st. 4lb.) the stable and the public stood him and he was at 5 to 2 on at the start. He ran a game consistent race, but Lance Chest, who had 8st. 8lb., beat him one and a half length after a good race. Fantasio, 8st. 11lb., was third and was, so it is recorded, running on at the finish. The Eclipse Stakes adventure and his fine defeat of Stedfast has already been referred to and there is hardly any need to say more concerning what he is, for his remarkably good record is a sufficiently eloquent testimonial of his excellence and consistency. He is by Persimmon out of Lady Lightfoot out of Glare out of Footlight out of Paraffin by Blair Athol out of Paradigm whose dam was Ellen Horne (dam of Rouge Rose, the dam of Bend 'Or) and a No. 1 mare according to Bruce Lowe's figures. Persimmon, his sire, is a No. 7 horse descending from the tap root Teterrima, the great grand dam of Perdita II. through Hermione and La Belle Helene. Glare, Lady Lightfoot's dam, is by Ayrshire by Hampton out of Atalanta by Galopin out of Feronia (No. 8 family) and she was by Thormanby out of Woodbine, who was by Stockwell out of Honey Suckle out of Beeswing.

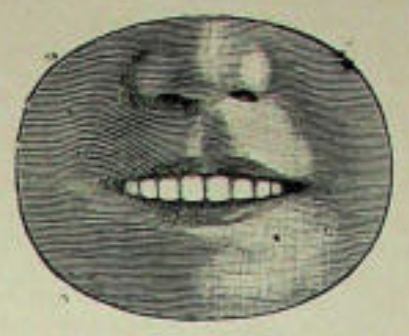
H.E. the Governor is kindly presenting a cup to be run for at one of the November Meetings at the Tollygunge Club races and H.E. will then be in Calcutta to see it run for. It has been decided to abolish bookmakers at the Tollygunge Club Meetings in future, but if it is expected that this is at all likely to stop gambling on these meetings we are afraid that it will fail in its purpose, for as everyone knows, the bulk of the betting on these and on the Monsoon Meetings is done at the town resorts over which neither the Tollygunge Club Stewards nor the Stewards of the C.T.C. have any control. The bookmakers asserted that they took more money out at these small club gatherings than they did over the Monsoon Meetings in Calcutta, and although it is no doubt with the praiseworthy desire or removing the temptation a situ that the Club executive have decided to fire the metallician out, it is not in the least likely to stop the volume of the betting that goes on, for it will merely mean that all the business hitherto done on the course will be done off it and will enrich the unlicensed operator at the expense of the licensed men. Looking at the question through a wide angle lens this is not fair to the licensed men whose scope of operation is already considerably cut down and who have a certain amount of right to consideration in a matter of this description. If banishing bookmakers from any particular spot on the surface of the earth did any real or lasting good or worked for the moral regeneration of humanity at large no one would have a word to say against it, but it has been proved by example that this does not happen, and it is never likely to happen so long as humanity is built upon the same lines and of the same material as it is at present!

The Darjeeling autumn races commence on the 12th instant with an extra day and the days of the regular meeting are the 22nd, 24th and 26th and H.E. the Governor presents a cup which will be run for on the second day. There are a fair number of ponies in Darjeeling, the principal owners represented being Prince Victor of Cooch Behar, Messrs. Price, Shillingford, Mackie, Dalzell, Power, Lall, Jones, etc. Morrison the jockey is up there, also Gee, who has a long string in training and the little course on the Lebong parade ground is very busy in the early mornings. Darjeeling has for some time past hankered to come under the control of the C.T.C. and we think that for some reasons it would be a good thing, but the course is at present hardly one that is worthy of a license, as it is at least more like a soup plate than a race-course and the contests decided thereon are more like a game of petits chevaux than races. The hill station race-courses of India are none of them particularly good, but Darjeeling, Naini Tal and Mussoorie are probably the most cramped and like a yacht's deck "two steps and over board." Simla (Annandale) used to be almost as bad until Colonel Baring, who was Military Secretary to Lord Curzon, took it in hand, cut away a big slice of the hill opposite the Grand Stand and added about a furlong to its circumference. Hurdle races are a feature of the Simla cards and even in the old days they used to take it on, but none of the hill courses, bar Ooty and Wellington, can be said to be exactly palatial and even at the courses of the beautiful southern hill stations there are one or two corners that are something more than "hairy." However at a time of year when there is no racing anywhere else the racing "nut" makes the best of things and is only too glad to be at it again no matter what the course is like or how bumblepuppy is the nature of it.

The prospects of both the dog and horse shows in Darjeeling are excellent and we hear that entries for the former are very satisfactory, whilst the support that is promised for the horse show is also of a satisfactory nature. Entries for the Horse Show in Darjeeling close on the 14th, the show day being the 21st.

Major Ormond Winter has gone up to Darjeeling and will probably be riding at the little meeting which is to be held at that station during the Poojahs.

The Darjeeling Polo Tournament for the Eroom Cup has unfortunately dwindled to a contest between two scratch teams.



Mr. T. E. Evers, we hear, leaves for home very shortly and intends hunting this winter in the Meynell country where Mr. Kenneth Hamilton also usually establishes himself during the winter.

A double dead-heat is not often recorded: our readers will find one mentioned as having taken place at Alexandra Park on the 16th September when after two dead-heats in the Harringay Plate the owners of Tinto and Myriad divided the Stakes.

There have, of course, been other remarkable incidents of the same kind. At Newcastle (Staffordshire), on 10th August 1820, four horses ran for an all-aged handicap. Mr. Mytton's Handel and Sir W. Wynn's Tarragon ran three dead-heats in succession, with Sir J. G. Egerton's Astbury third each time. In the fourth and fifth heats Astbury won right out and was awarded the race.

In a race at Carlisle on 13th May 1761, over a distance of two miles, Dr. Dunn's Cadaborn ran two dead-heats, first, with Mr. Pearson's Heart of Oak, and, second, with Mr. Dalton's Bold Briton. The colt won two other heats, and, after the sixth heat (having run twelve miles), became the winner.

On 28th September 1797, at Doncaster, Mr. Crompton's Warter also ran twelve miles to secure a £100 plate. In two of the six heats he dead-heated with Sir C. Turner's Pepper Box.

Do you Odolise?

Odol, the World's Dentifrice, is the preparation to use, for a few drops mixed with a tumbler of water form an emulsion which will thoroughly cleanse and purify the oral cavity, destroying all injurious bacteria.

It is the rinsing of the mouth and the brushing of the teeth with this antiseptic and refreshing mixture that constitutes the process now known as Odolising.

MELOX AND MELOX MARVELS.

THE PREMIER DOG FOODS.

MELOX gets Dogs into condition and keeps them fit. Is readily eaten when all other Foods are refused. It improves and strengthens the digestive organs

MELOX MARVELS, the miniature Dog Biscuits, contain many of the essential principles of MELOX and a large proportion of meat and its juices. Possess great nourishment and form a dainty change of diet.

For Hot Climates these Foods are unique, as they are essentially Bone and Muscle makers. Bitches raise healthy Litters, while bad doers and weakly puppies thrive upon it in a remarkable manner.

Numerous instances of double dead-heats will be found in olden times. At Cardiff, in 1803, Mr. Jenner and Colonel Kingscote ran two dead-heats with Highlander and Tango, and—after the fourth heat, the poor beasts having ran sixteen miles—agreed to divide the stakes, which gave them £12 apiece. At Bibury, in 1806, the Prince of Wales' Pedestrian ran two dead-heats with Mr. Mellish's Nimrod, and, after that, the prize went to another animal.

At Leicester, in 1809, Lord Lowther's Hylas (after running five heats of four miles each) won the Burgesses' Plate of £50. He ran two dead-heats with different horses

In the Durdans Stakes, at Epsom, in 1873, Mr. Parry's Arcesilaus and Mr. T. Stevens' Cranbourne ran two dead-heats, before the first-named won by two lengths.

There are several cases of three horses running a dead-heat, but only one, at Newmarket, of four horses dead-heating.

Other great racing organisations, it is understood, are to follow the example set by the Longchamps stewards on the 16th September in having every winning horse examined by an expert analyst to establish whether it has been "doped."

If carried out promptly, and if no exterior matter is allowed to come into contact with the test of the saliva, the analysis inevitably reveals the presence in the saliva of the alkaloids used for doping. These are principally cocaine, strychnine, and cafeine. On this occasion a temporary laboratory was fitted up next to some of the loose boxes at Longchamps and here after each race a veterinary surgeon appointed by the stewards took specimens of the winning horses' saliva in the presence of the owner and placed the specimens in glass tubes. These were numbered in accordance with the secret code known only to the stewards and then handed to Professor Kauffman for analysis.

The last Extra meeting but one, was held at Poona last Saturday and was very well attended. There were big fields in almost every event and the racing was excellent.

A Selling Plate for horses with five starters found Danseuse with all the public support, but she got badly left at the start and Boomey leading for most of the journey won by a length and a half from Not Yet: Danseuse ran into third place two lengths behind her stable companion.

Fourteen turned out for the Little Arab Consolation Plate and this provided another upset. Ream, Plassey, Raspberry and Mubrook were well backed, but Raspberry was left at the start and Ream never showed up. Sharar led to the turn where British King, Mubrook and Plassey came to the front, an exciting finish resulting in a win for British King by a head: a similar distance between the two others. The totalisator paid Rs. 138-8 on the winner.

The second division of the Season Maiden Plate gave us yet another big upset, Ruiz securing his second winning bracket on Mushtarak, a rank outsider, who won by a length and a half from Alworthy with Moyaid third. The totalisator paid Rs. 396-8 on the winner and Rs. 78-8, Rs. 54 and Rs. 181-8 for places.

Only four faced the starter in the Midsummer Plate, a handicap for horses. Punt ran behind his horses till they entered the straight when he came through and in spite of his big impost, won very easily by two lengths from Forfeit who beat Madrina a length.

The Cesarewitch Plate with a field of thirteen was considered a good thing for Lama, on whom Brown had the mount. The favourite ran prominently and led into the straight, but was soon passed by Money Gold and Sweden, the former maintaining his lead to the end and beating Sweden a length; Harry Johnson third.

In the Mofussil Plate eight faced the starter and an exciting finish resulted in a win for Parkill by a head, Bright Metal third three lengths away. Pratt rode a very fine race on the winner. The programme was brought to a close with the first division of the Season Maiden Plate with eleven starters. Imperial went out a hot favourite and ran away from his field from the start but they had caught him at the turn and Raspberry, who turned out for the second time during the afternoon, came through in the straight and won easily by two lengths: Imperial beating Brandy II. by four lengths.

The dates for the Gwalior Spring Meeting under W.I.T.C. Rules of Racing have been sanctioned for 18th, 20th and 22nd March 1913 and probably, we hear, an extra day's racing will be held. The meeting, although only the first and being held later in the season than will in future be the case, gives promise of Gwalior being reckoned among the first-class meetings of India, H.H. the Maharaja giving Rs. 30,000 in stakes and added money.

The dates for the Autumn meeting have also been applied for and it will probably take place early in November and be on a larger scale than the present meeting. We hear that H.H. the Maharaja is building a new hotel close to the race course and that everything is being done to insure the comfort of visitors to Gwalior for the meeting. One of the greatest attractions to owners lies in the fact that Gwalior is on the main line and when horses are unboxed they are within a few hundred yards of their stables which are alongside the course.

The Autumn Race Week at Jubbulpore opens on the 17th October with the Horse Show; the races are fixed for the 18th and 19th and a probable gymkhana meeting on the 25th, while the Polo Tournament for the Barton Cup commences on the 21st. In addition there will be the usual round of dances and theatricals and the lotteries to fill up the nights.

The Compagnie des Messageries Maritimes de France, which recently renewed his contract with the French Government for a period of 25 years, has started to build a series of fine steamers, the first of which on the list, the Paul-Lecat, just now running on the China Line (16,820 tons and 11,000 horse-power) is a splendid liner with a speed of over 17 knots and can accommodate, with all the modern comfort imaginable, about 700 saloon passengers. An illustrated pamphlet just received gives an idea of the luxurious saloons, reading-rooms, music-rooms, smoking-rooms and cabins fitted with electric fans, a great number of them being single berth cabins. The kitchen is a marvel of its kind with all the modern appliances and reminds those of very first class Hotels in Paris where, as it is universally known, the cuisine is an art.

The South African Rugby team opened their tour in England when they met Somerset at Bath on the 3rd instant and beat them by 25 points to 3. On Saturday the Springboks played Devon at Exeter and won by 8 points to nil.

In our sporting columns this week will be found the general programme of the Silchar Race and Polo Week to be held in December, the week before X'mas. The organisers of the Meet hope for a large attendance from Assam, the Dooars, Dacca, Shillong and Chittagong and especially for the presence of some polo teams from those districts. The Open Polo Tournament is for a valuable prize and framed for the purpose of attracting visiting teams. Full details may be had from Captain L. C. L. Bayley, 6th Cavalry, Silchar P.O., Cachar.

Our Ooty correspondent writes :—The season for small game opened on 15th September. Some small bags of jungle fowl, pigeons and hares have been made ; snipe are hardly in yet, only a very few couple having been secured. Big game run unmolested until 1st November. The Nilgiri Game Association license entitles the holder to shoot the following heads during this season. Cost of license Rs. 50 : 1 bison, 1 ibex, 4 sambur stags, 4 spotted deer stags, 4 antelopes, 6 jungle sheep or barking deer. The carnivora may be shot without restriction and it is to be hoped that the pest of wild dogs will be minimised by the decimation of the numbers which now exist in the Nilgiris.

The race for the 100 yards' championship of the world was decided on the Salford Rugby Football Ground, Manchester, on Saturday evening in mail week R. E. Walker (South Africa), J. Donaldson (Australia), and A. B. Postle (Australia) were the contestants, and there was a purse of £100 in addition to the stake of £100 a corner. A heavy drizzle set in some time before the event was timed to be decided, but this had very little effect on the cinder track, which was in excellent condition. Eight thousand people were present. The men were sent off to a capital start, and Postle gained a slight advantage. This position Postle maintained until thirty yards from home, where Donaldson made his effort, and he and Walker got abreast with Postle twenty yards to go, Donaldson winning a fine race by a yard from Walker and Postle being half a yard behind third. The time was 2½ yards inside 10secs.

The Madras Rugby Tournament drew only two entries this year, the Leicesters and the Madras Gymkhana, and the teams met last Saturday. A close and exciting game was witnessed, ending in a draw of 3 points each. The military drew first blood, Green getting over with a try which was not improved upon. The second half brought a try to the Gymkhana, Purves crossing the Leicesters' line. The place kick failed and the match ended in a draw. It was too dark to play extra time so a replay was fixed for Monday, the 7th, but was subsequently postponed till Saturday next.

The cross country race for the Loyal North Lancashire Regiment's Challenge Cup was held last Saturday at Yerrowda over the same course as the Poona and Kirkee Hunt Point-to-Point races. There was a big gathering of sportsmen and the race was a successful run. Three teams entered giving a field of eighteen. These were :—The Loyal North Lancashires represented by Major Robinson, Captains Barclay and Ryley, Messrs. Logan, Bell, Atkinson, Wynne, Collas and Brotherton. The Warwickshire Regiment represented by Captain Sydenham. Messrs. Whalley, Knight-Bruce and Mackey. The Royal Army Medical Corps were represented by Majors Brown, Mason and Bowen, Captains O'Brien Butler, Startin and T. Lucas.

The following was the order of finishing :—Captain O'Brien Butler 1, Captain Ryley 2, Mr. Wynne 3, followed by Major Bowen, Mr. Mackey, Mr. Atkinson, Mr. Logan and Captain Sydenham with the others at interval. The Loyal North Lancs thus won, with the Warwicks second and the R. A. M. C. third.

The programme at the Electric Theatre last Thursday gave us some really fine films. The drama "Man to Man" was one of the best of the Cowboy series yet exhibited. "Daniel Boon's Bravery" pourtrayed further exciting adventures and hair breadth escapes in the Wild West, while "The Little Widow" was noteworthy for pictures of a fire at sea and a wonderful rescue from the burning ship. The English Gazette had amongst many interesting items, pictures of the funeral of the late General Booth. We think that films of such mournful subjects might well be left out of the entertainment. On Saturday we had another full programme. The best pictures were perhaps, those of Miss Sadie, the lady champion swimmer, whose feats in the water and as high diver were most interesting. "The Masked Smuggler" was another good film illustrating the capture of a gang of smugglers by jack tars in the Georgian period. Red Indians were again to the fore in the "Blackfoot Half Breed," and the best of the comics was the "Strategy of Anne"—another one of those capital films arranged by the American Vitagraph Company.

London Week by Week.

Friday, 20th September 1912.

So war has once more been declared against the fortune-tellers, crystal-gazers, palmists, Hindoo astrologers, Himalayan fakirs, hadjis and all the other pests and parasites who have infested the West End of London for years and whose vivid sandwich boards and impudent advertisements in the press, have been suffered to offend the eye too long. There is consternation among the thievish army for the Commissioner of Police has at last taken drastic action and the mandate has apparently taken them by surprise. The Commissioner's order forbids the exhibition of any sign, notice or advertisement in any form upon any shop or dwelling-house in the metropolitan police area relating to palmistry, crystal-gazing clairvoyance or any "science" that professes to "reveal future events." Not only this. The order also prohibits the employment of sandwich-board men to advertise such professors of the occult.

Such an order effects, according to the police estimate, over 150 seers practising in Bond Street, Oxford Street Regent Street and the surrounding neighbourhood. The number in the whole metropolitan police area is, of course, considerably greater and probably is about 1,000. It is said that the tribe are shifting their quarters to the Northern and Southern suburbs, but it is, we hope, the beginning of the end and ere long their occupation should be gone and a discredit to the metropolis removed.

Ha, ha ! as they say in melodrama. Now will the rich epicure be able to understand by his own bitter experience what the increased cost of living really means. As long as it only touched him through the ineffective media of potatoes and oatmeal, he could afford to put on an air of callous indifference. But now he, too, has to suffer. His caviare will cost him more—thirty per cent. more. The sturgeons have gone on strike—at any rate, there is a scarcity of them ; hence this prohibitive price for their roes. To forty odd millions of English people it does not matter, inasmuch as caviare is still, as in Shakespeare's day, "caviare to the general," but to the balance of the population the gastronomers and the gourmets, it means cruel self-denial and hardship. The epicure deprived of his caviare on the ground of expense will be as melancholy an object as the coster during a whelk famine.

Mr. H. V. Esmond's comedy, "A Young Man's Fancy," produced last Tuesday night at the Criterion, is so simple, obvious, and ingenuous that criticism can only be cruelty.

The characters soliloquise as if the days of King George were still the spacious days of Victoria. None of them matter in the least, or are the least bit like human beings, and the complications are just mildly amusing and quickly put straight.

The Hon'ble Gerald Porth wants to marry Ella Grant, a rich American, but he decides not to marry her when his interfering Aunt Julia settles that he shall. Then he says he will marry the daughter of a Regent Street florist. He does not really intend to marry the florist's daughter. He does not marry her. But his Aunt Julia (on the flimsiest evidence) believes that he has.

That brings us to the end of Act II., and Act III. puts everything right, but as there is very little to put right, Act III. is naturally very short.

The success of the play last night was Miss Lottie Venne's Aunt Julia. Miss Venne is always delicious, and she made Act II. genuinely entertaining. Mr. C. M. Lowne, Mr. Charles Maude, and Miss Marianne Caldwell were all excellent, but one fears very much that—to quote Freddy in "The Liars"—"A Young Man's Fancy" is too jolly thin for sophisticated theatre-going London.

"The Great John Ganton," founded on Mr. Eddy's novel "Ganton and Co.," was produced at the Aldwych Theatre on Monday, and certainly Ganton was a great fellow and certainly he was greatly played by Mr. George Fawcett. For though Ganton is a familiar stage type of strong man—who does not know the imperturbable, bluff man of iron, apparently cold and hard and machine-like, but in reality with an enormous kind heart?—Mr. Fawcett by his fine playing made the fellow live in a remarkable way. It seemed quite right that he should treat his correspondence in that curt, cavalier fashion, and that he should be able to come out in his dressing-gown and answer the telephone and do all he did do before going off with his doctor into the next room to undergo a serious operation.

For John Ganton has been overworking systematically, and the strain of quarrelling with his own son and daughter and the young reformer who wants to marry his daughter, combined with the heat and the atmosphere of the yard, bring on an attack which forces him to put his suspicious distrust of the medical profession in his pocket. He quarrels with his son because Will wants to marry May Kating, the daughter of a man he hated. But May turns out such a little brick that she wins his heart, and he gives Will into her keeping before he goes off to ether and the knife. Many terrible scenes happen before the reconcilement, in all of which Mr. Fawcett shows his power. John Ganton, for instance, routs the supper party at the Chicago Golf Club, given to celebrate Will's engagement, and he buys his son out of the business; so that what with one thing and what with another we are all in a proper state of mind to appreciate the reconciliation, especially as Mr. Fawcett in that scene showed he has as great a power of real tenderness and pathos as he has of crustiness and dry comedy.

Miss Laura Cowie played the plucky little May Kating as pluckily as possible, but she had not sufficient stage experience to make the big theatrical scene, in which May browbeats the great John in his own office, as effective as an older hand at the game would have made it. Mr. Eric Maturin seemed a little puzzled about the character of young Will, whether to make him a shifty scamp or a gallant fellow. He solved the difficulty with much skill, however, and it was not his fault that young Will was so unreal. Mr. Ernest Leicester, Mr. Herbert Vyvyan and Mr. Frank Collins all did sound work and Miss Mabel Trevor played a terrific American beauty in fine style.

The latest venture at the shrine of English drama is a modern morality play by Walter Browne, with incidental music by George W. Chadwick, the play revised by Stephen Phillips, with J. M. Glover as conductor, and the whole produced by Arthur Collins at Drury Lane. And what is this morality play?

Its centre and circumference is the eternal question of love. From the moment when Mr. H. B. Irving, standing where his distinguished father stood years since delivered the prologue, until the fall of the curtain at the close of Act V., the quest of "Everywoman" in search of love was the one and only theme.

"Everywoman" is a type, and a not uncommon type, of the woman of to-day, who, passionately yearning for an ideal that has so far eluded their grasp, seek for it in a life of pleasure and excitement.

If it were the intention of the author to emphasise in lurid fashion the hollowness, the sham, the substratum of intense misery that are the concomitants of the life of a woman who thinks the tinsel and gaudiness of the fast set provide the real joy of existence, he has admirably succeeded.

Everything and everyone in "Everywoman" is typical. It is an elaborate allegory in which the depths of human pathos, of tragedy, of heart-stirring emotions are touched. And with what consummate art and grace does Miss Alexandra Carlisle play the title role! Tender and winning when in the mood, she reveals "Everywoman" when in the thrall of dark and despairing moments as the subject of a tornado of passion, the outcome of tortured hopes, fears, and aspirations. In the earlier scenes she passes through a tumult of frenzy, and then emerges into the hopeless cast-off, but in the final act she glides into the haven of peace and true love, with the discarded Modesty once more as her bosom friend, after Beauty and Youth have been consigned to their tomb.

But what a quest she had before, soiled by contact with the world, or that part of it in which she sought her ideal, led on by the ignis fatuus of flattery, she returned home to meet there that which she had previously spurned. She did not know it, but she had no more chance to grasp her ideal in her life of abandon than had the knights of old to realise their ambition who sought for the Holy Grail.

Mr. H. B. Irving, disguised more or less as Dante, and, playing up to Drury expectations, bidding us "Remember," and being generally very stately and impressive, steers a difficult barque to port.

Miss Alexandra Carlisle flatters every woman by being extremely charming in the most heavenly (if that's quite the word) gowns, skilfully modulated to the key of the moment—innocence, danger, passion, abandon, etc. If she seems to "press" a little at times she probably feels that she has a very difficult "carry."

Gladys Cooper, as Beauty, plays the part for which she is eminently suited, Miss Jessie Winter is delicate and gentle as Modesty, and Miss Patricia Collinge, gay, tender and spirited as Youth.

Mr. Fred Lewis as Wealth is excellent with a most realistic and yet symbolical make-up. The delightful candour of Bluff and Stuff, the theatrical managers, is much appreciated, as is the stage scene of the second act where the secrets and mysteries of the playhouse are revealed.

THE PRESERVATION OF INDIAN FAUNA.

Recent Literature.

The July number of the Nineteenth Century and After contains an article by Sir Harry Johnston dealing with the question of the protection of Indian fauna. It appears that Sir H. Johnston has not visited India since 1895, when, we believe, he only passed a short time in the country. But he now deplores the change that has taken place since 1895, as he gathers from books, reports, and articles in scientific periodicals. He refers not only to mammals and game generally, but devotes especial attention to the question of the destruction of birds for the sake of their plumage, regarding which he suggestively indicates the "unwisdom of our destroying allies in the battle against the diseases caused by microscopic animals, and parasitic worms; or the insects, ticks, and molecules which act as germ carriers in the spread of such parasites—parasites that not only directly destroy man himself by attacking his blood and tissues, but kill the animals and plants on which he feeds, or which are serviceable to him in other ways." This is a point of view to which attention should certainly be directed. Broadly speaking, there can be no doubt that the destruction of a species, which constitutes an interference with the balance of nature, reacts in some manner unfavourably on one or more forms of life. This is a principle of universal application. We have not observed any extensive destruction of bird-life throughout India, but the quantities of feathers occasionally seized in Burma shows that such destruction is proceeding at any rate in certain localities, whilst it also happily proves that the Government are not indifferent to it, and are taking steps to put an end to a pernicious trade. For this trade the fair sex are, of course, entirely responsible. Here is a fine field for feminine energy! How much better it would be if woman would agitate to put an end to a custom that is provocative of so much cruelty; and how much more useful than in expending their energies in struggling for votes which they will not know how to exercise, and in setting fire to theatres breaking windows, and being fed through tubes!

"Sir H. Johnston is at any rate wrong in saying that cranes cannot injure crops. The common crane does a great deal of damage to crops, and a flock of these birds will devastate a wheat field in a very short space of time."

With regard to mammals Sir H. Johnston states that "the devastation which has been wrought in the wonderful mammalian fauna of Northern India and Central Asia by British military officers since the improvement of the rifle in the middle of the nineteenth century has been appalling." It is to be feared that the indictment is fully justified, and that military officers have been the principal culprits. In fact, there can be little doubt that game would have been completely exterminated throughout a vast extent of country had not game laws been happily introduced limiting its destruction in Kashmir. This fortunately occurred coincidently with the introduction of small-bore, high velocity weapons, which have been the cause of so much destruction of game in all parts of the world.

Sir H. Johnston would have a measure of protection accorded to predaceous beasts, as we have frequently advocated in these columns, and he would set aside sanctuaries in which no form of life, not even poisonous snakes, should be destroyed. He criticises the projected Government of India Act, which leads him to conclude that this measure of legislation has not been framed by competent men, as it betrays a too common ignorance of Zoology. He wisely suggests that Zoology and kindred subjects should be included in the syllabus of examinations for all Indian and Colonial Services.

This article in the Nineteenth Century was followed by a letter to the Times a few weeks later, in which the same writer again directed attention to the subject. On this occasion he wrote chiefly with regard to the destruction of insectivorous birds; but he quoted a correspondent who wrote to him from Burma that "thamin deer are wantonly slaughtered all over Burma for pure lust of killing. . . . Migratory birds, duck and teal, suffer woeful diminution. Lakes formerly crowded with them are now solitary. Demoiselle cranes have almost disappeared. This is done not by Burmans but by Europeans and Eurasians. Tigers are very rare." We do not believe tigers ever have been very numerous in Burma, except in certain localities, while comparatively few are killed annually in that country. There must be some mistake with regard to migratory birds. Vast numbers of duck and teal have been killed each year in India during a hundred years past on lakes which continue to show no diminution in the annual supply, although their numbers may vary in particular years according to the incidence of the monsoon.

Sir H. Johnston appears inclined to write as though nothing had been done in this country for the protection of the fauna, an erroneous supposition, as we shall presently show. Mr. Buckland, following on this letter with another to the Times, deals only with the plumage question, and points out that what is required is legislation prohibiting the sale of plumage in England. On this point a writer in the Times of India says "a Bill was brought forward for this purpose in the House of Commons, but our legislators were no doubt too busy wrecking the constitution, attempting to dismember the Empire, and voting themselves salaries to pay attention to such trivial matters." A well-known Bombay sportsman of thirty years' experience, Mr. Reginald Gilbert, also wrote to the Times, advising that native shikaris should be prohibited from shooting over water from March to July, by withdrawing gun licenses during that period. This prohibition, he rightly adds, should apply to Europeans also, although they seldom practise it except for an occasional tiger. On this point the Times of India pertinently remarks—"If the continued existence of the tiger is considered desirable, as it presumably is for reasons connected with the balance of nature, we do not see why it should be shot over a pool or pot of water in the hot weather; there is no more sport in killing a tiger in this way than there is in killing a deer in like manner." This view may certainly be endorsed.

History of the movement.

The recent history, comparatively speaking, of the movement for the protection of the fauna of this country is not without interest. This movement was started so far back as in 1898, under the auspices of Mr. W. S. Burke, when, in the publication of which that gentleman was then Editor, an article on "Game in the North-West Provinces" directed attention to the manner in which game was being destroyed by bands of Gurkha shikaris. This served to direct the attention of many correspondents and readers to the general question of the preservation of game throughout the Indian Empire, and in a leading article it was pointed out that "in spite of the game-laws which are now almost universally applied over the whole Peninsula, there is no denying the fact that the quantity of game—both great and small—is steadily decreasing year by year, and it seems probable that eventually the Government Reserved Forests will alone prevent the total extinction of certain species of wild animals." Laws limiting the number of animals that any one sportsman might shoot had already been promulgated in Kashmir. Before the articles above referred to appeared, Mr. Burke had already printed as a leading article 'A plea for the tiger-cubs," in which it was urged that these immature animals should be protected in the same manner as the young of other wild beasts. It is interesting to note that only now, fourteen years afterwards, has a measure of this nature been adopted, and that not in British territory but in a Native State where a penalty of a hundred rupees has recently been imposed on the killing of tigers under three years of age.

In the same publication Mr. Burke printed a leading article in March 1899 on "The Balance of Nature." Some criticism had been directed at the proposal to protect dangerous game, apparently under the impression that this was for the benefit of the sportsman only. One critic asserted that "it is always a little distracting when one tries to understand the exact necessity for tigers and lions taking their place amid the visible creation." The same writer suggested "that the advocate for preservation should place himself in the position of men, women and children of a rural district in India in which the man-eater is an abiding terror." The critic of course in the first instance showed his ignorance of natural history, while in the second place he attempted to prove a rule by exceptional circumstances. In the article on "The Balance of Nature" it was pointed out that if the would-be philanthropist placed himself in the position of the inhabitants of an agricultural district infested with antelope and bordering on deer-stocked forests, he would soon realise the use of the animals he would condemn to destruction and would see that there is a reason for the existence even of tigers and panthers.

Soon afterwards a correspondent writing on the subject of bison and buffaloes drew Mr. Burke's attention to the ruthless destruction of these animals which had been going on in a district of the Central Provinces, "in spite of numerous exhortations in your leading articles enjoining sportsmen to be merciful." In the year 1900 an international conference met in London to determine what steps might be taken for the preservation of the rapidly decreasing fauna of Africa; and it was again suggested, in referring to the proceedings of this conference, that the Government of India should also take some measures in the same direction. Sportsmen were again asked to rest content when they had slain a sufficient number of harmless creatures of each species. The evil wrought by the introduction of the modern smallbore magazine rifle was referred to, "especially when the weapon is in the hands of one who shoots all he sees." It was then pointed out that at the present rate the almost total extinction of the larger forms of animal life was probably only a question of time, although the forests and wilds of India would afford protection to wild life for many decades to come. It was added that "the initiative in these matters must come from sportsmen themselves, until it comes to be recognised that a large bag, whether of great game or small, does not necessarily indicate a good sportsman."

At a later date, in 1901, Mr. Burke printed a leading article advocating the establishment of a department for game preservation, similar to that which had been established in the Soudan under the auspices of Lord Cromer, a system which was afterwards extended to other parts of Africa, where game rangers were appointed. On the same occasion attention was directed to the Egyptian Government ordinance providing for the export of the skins and trophies of wild beasts; while the question of licences was referred to, and the destruction going on in Native States where no Arms Act was in force was also dealt with. Other papers in India followed the examples that have been quoted, and leading articles in the Times of India and Indian Sporting Times dealt fully with the question of game preservation on the lines on which it had been treated over a lengthy period in the Calcutta sporting paper. When Mr. Burke started the Indian Field he continued to work in the same good cause and the subject has not been lost sight of down to the present time.

Result of the Movement.

We think it may be fairly claimed that the measures that have been undertaken for the protection of Indian fauna during the past fourteen years are largely due to the movement of which the history has been related above. In 1901 Lord Curzon, in replying to a memorial from the Burma Game Association, treated the subject sympathetically and reviewed the causes of the diminution of game and the direction that legislation should take to protect wild life; he dealt with the matter on lines identical with those to which we have referred in the preceding paragraphs as those of the movement by which, no doubt, he was mainly influenced. Legislative measures were considered by the Government of India, but to the best of our recollection no general legislation was undertaken. Local Governments, however, all set their houses in order so far as game preservation was concerned. In 1902 a new series of game laws was issued in the Central Provinces. In the following year excellent rules were promulgated by the Government of Bombay for the preservation not only of game, but of egrets and other birds and of fish; "the taking, killing, or wounding of big game other than tiger, panther, wolf, hyena, wild dog, pig, or bear over water or salt-licks" was prohibited; though we fail to see why tiger and bear should be so unprotected. The prohibition of killing and wounding was extended to the female and young of animals and of birds during the breeding season, and a limit was placed on the number of animals of any one species that might be killed. The Central Provinces rules were very similar in scope, and we believe laws of the same kind were passed throughout British India and eventually in most of the Native States.

In fact, the movement which we have described had the happiest results, although Sir H. Johnston writes to the Times as though everyone in the country had been supine in the matter and as though nothing had been accomplished. At least, that is the general impression given by his writings to which we have referred. In the protection of plumage bearing birds the Government of India have done all they can.

The Effects of Legislation.

So far we have referred to paper measures. These of themselves could effect nothing substantial. A Government Resolution is no more protective to wild creatures than was a Railway Share destructive to the Snark.* It is in administration that the difficulty of the application of laws in this country always lies. As had been pointed out in more serious matters, there is in India no public spirit. It is a simple matter to pass game laws. It is a difficult thing to enforce them. The measures to which we have referred have not been without effect. In some cases they have been supplemented by the efforts of such bodies as the Nilgiri Game Association. In Kashmir there is said now to be more game in certain localities than there was twenty years ago. In many places, in the Central Provinces for instance, the slaughter of such rapidly disappearing forms of life as the bison has been checked. The principle has been to refer to local conditions in limiting the number of certain species that the sportsman may shoot. Where a species is numerous, the restriction is not so narrow; where scarce, animals are completely protected. That is the right principle, although it is not always intelligently applied. In one Native State, for instance, deer and other ungulata are generally scarce, while the great predaceous beasts are numerous. Yet tigers are protected to such an extent that they cause serious loss to cattle owners, especially as there is little in the way of wild animals to prey on. In other places, where deer, antelope and pig are so numerous as to inflict considerable damage on crops, tigers have been practically exterminated, and there is nothing to keep down the numbers of animals on which they would naturally prey.

In British territory, however, the rules for the preservation of game have generally been intelligently framed. Difficulty is found in enforcing them, particularly in forests which are not visited by European sportsmen, for there the native poacher frequently carries on his depredations without hindrance. Some discrimination has to be exercised with regard to native poachers. There are tribes which from time immemorial have been in the habit of subsisting on the produce of the forest and the products of the chase. To deprive such people of their means of livelihood would scarcely be fair. But it should be seen to that they do not obtain more efficient weapons. If has been asserted that in certain districts the game has in recent years been practically exterminated by aboriginal tribes armed with bows and arrows. But it is difficult to understand how this can be the case, seeing that the people have been using these weapons in the chase for countless ages and that until comparatively recent years game was plentiful. Other causes must have been in operation. We have not mentioned the sanctuaries which have been established with beneficial effect in some localities; as well as rewards instituted for such destructive vermin as wild dogs.

Measures for the Future.

With regard to the protection of birds that are destroyed for their plumage, we think the Government of India have done all that is possible by prohibiting the exportation of feathers. It remains for the Home Government to act in this matter, but there are complications in this direction to which we referred nearly a year ago in reviewing a book by a member of the plumage-trade. In this matter, as in the protection of game, the means lies largely in the hands of the public. So long as there is a demand for feathers for the decoration of women, so long will there be a supply to meet that demand. Women should be satisfied to decorate their hats with artificial flowers and so save the destruction and the torture of countless living creatures.

Game birds are generally protected during the close season, although there are some exceptions. Sportsmen do not spare the florican, which are generally shot during the breeding season and have been almost exterminated in some localities. Perhaps this is largely done through ignorance, but sportsmen should not be ignorant of natural history, and, whatever the reason, the practice is a reprehensible one and should be everywhere discountenanced.

In reserved forests, as we have indicated, big game is now generally protected against Europeans, by limiting the number of each species that may be shot. But it may be doubted whether it is anywhere sufficiently protected against native poachers who lurk over pools of water. The suggestion of Mr. Reginald Gilbert, to which we have already referred to, might be acted upon; that is, to withdraw gun licenses during the hot weather when water is scarce. Short of appointing European game-rangers it is difficult to see what else can be done in the matter. The sale and export of trophies, whether antlers and horns or skins of game animals, might be prohibited. This not to apply to the cast antlers that are gathered in the forests.

With regard to beasts of prey, or at least tigers, the outlook should be wider. Everywhere in British territory rewards are given for the destruction of tigers, as though they were wholly pernicious animals. The authorities do not appear to be aware that the great carnivora have their uses in the economy of nature. Man-eaters should, of course, be destroyed by any and every means possible Cattle killers, where excessively destructive, should not be protected. But the game killing tiger is not of use only in keeping down animals that damage the husbandman's crops. He performs a duty in killing off the weakly of the species on which he preys and so assists the improvement of the race by providing for the destruction of the unfit and the survival of the fittest. The senseless destruction of all birds and beasts of prey in England has done incalculable harm. The balance of nature should be maintained. All species have their appointed place.

> The child, the seed, the grain of corn,
> The acorn on the hill,
> Each for some separate end is born
> In season fit, and still
> Each must in strength arise to work the Almighty will.

Where tigers are not too numerous and destructive they should be afforded a measure of protection; and we would extend this to such comparatively harmless creatures as bears under similar conditions. The shooting of either of these animals over water should be prohibited, except in cases where their destruction is considered necessary for sound reasons. Let it be recognised that the complete elimination of predaceous beasts is more desirable than is that of other animals. Much is in the hands of sportsmen themselves. They can aid local authorities by observance of game laws and exercise of a sporting spirit as well as by enforcing these on others. Experienced sportsmen, who must also be naturalists, generally lose in course of years the desire for destruction; it is to be hoped that this spirit will spread and we are of opinion that something would be accomplished in this direction by carrying out Sir H. Johnston's suggestion for the introduction of natural history as a subject of examinations. There has been during recent years a great increase in nature study of the best kind and in the substitution of the camera for the rifle. This has been exercised more in Africa than in India, where the camera-bearing-hunter does not yet appear to have arrived. Public opinion and public spirit can effect much more than legislation and can render legislation far more effective. Since the above was written the text of the new Act has been received. It appears though limited in scope on the whole satisfactory so far as it goes, as it gives ample scope to local Governments to make provision according to local requirement. It is satisfactory also to see that under section 2 of the Act local authorities can apply it to all animals and birds, irrespective of their being included in the very limited schedule. Some provision might have been made to prevent the sale of skins and horns.

Nomad.

A few months ago the writer formed one of a party who undertook a shooting trip of several months' duration in Nyasaland, which, as most of your readers are aware, is a British Protectorate, situate some few hundred miles south of the Equator, in the lake region of Africa. We had grown somewhat tired of shooting the various kinds of antelope and had turned our attention to buffaloes for some days; but seemingly all to no purpose. "Spoor" was plentiful and fresh, but, somehow or other, we could not get a sight of the animals. Either the wind would shift and disclose our whereabouts, or some of our impetuous black "boys" would get ahead, and by making too much noise disturb a herd before we could approach within seeing distance of them, the result in either case being the same, viz., a wild stampede of the buffaloes, and the thunder of numerous hoofs and crashing and tearing of branches of trees and undergrowth as the startled animals forced a passage through the dense forest. This was particularly trying after we had followed their "spoor" for miles over dense and uneven ground. It must be borne in mind that we were in a tropical country, and all our stalking was done on foot.

However, after several days of fruitless efforts, fortune at last favoured the writer. As was our usual custom, we had set out from camp at daybreak (6 A.M.), my two friends going in one direction and I in another, each with a bodyguard of natives. My trackers soon found fresh "spoor," and it was apparently made by a herd of about 40 animals. We followed this "spoor" for about two hours, and I gathered from my "boys" that the buffaloes were moving at about the same pace as ourselves. My great hope was that they would halt for a rest as the sun got higher and the heat of the day became more trying. Such proved to be the case, for one of my gun-bearers nudged me from behind and pointed to my two native trackers who were lying full length in the grass in front of me and motioning me to do likewise. I at once got down and crawled forward with my double heavy ·476 Westley-Richards rifle. As yet I had not seen our quarry. However, on reaching the native trackers, I found we were on the edge of a small natural clearing in the forest, and on the far side of this open space stood a herd of about 40 buffaloes quietly browsing and resting under the trees, quite unconscious of our presence, and not more than eighty yards away. It was now or, perhaps, never. One or two heads began to go up suspiciously; they may have heard a twig or two snap as I crawled along. I singled out a bull, aimed for the shoulder, and fired. Immediately the entire herd tore off in wild confusion, being taken completely by surprise, and not knowing whence the shot came, but not before I had jumped to my feet and put in a second shot with the left barrel at another beast, just as they were disappearing from view. My "boys" now came running up on hearing the firing, and looked around for results. The shots had told, for there were small pools of blood on the ground and two distinct blood trails, which led us several hundred yards further into some tall grass about six feet high. This we approached cautiously, knowing well the dangerous character of wounded buffaloes. A weird but unmistakable bellow told us that we were close upon one of the animals. I therefore advanced very slowly, fully expecting the beast would charge, and at last came upon him laid on his side, his eyes following our movements with a cruel and sinister expression. But it was evident that the smashing effect of the big-bore rifle had caused him to fall never to rise again and I quickly gave the "boy" the word to dispatch him. The "boys" afterwards followed the other trail and found the cow buffalo quite dead. She had gone about 500 yards, after being struck in the shoulder by the discharge from my left barrel.

One hears from time to time of fatalities occurring in following up wounded buffaloes. In the opinion of the writer, many of these accidents could be avoided by relying on a big-bore rifle. Admittedly, there is a great temptation to use a light weapon of small calibre in a hot country where every extra pound of weight tells against one in getting about; but the heavier weapon can always be carried in reserve by a native, to be used as occasion demands. DOWN FROM THE HILLS?

Then you will probably be wanting durries in getting your house ship-shape for the winter. Be careful what you buy. A durrie is an article that once purchased is expected to last for years. It is therefore worth while getting only the best, for you will remember the quality after the price is long forgotten.

THE TURF.

DONCASTER.

THE perfect organisation of the Great Northern and kindred lines is a thing of which the nation may be proud, and with such a perfect system it is not surprising that the thousands of holiday folk who witnessed the St. Leger last Wednesday were sent home with such surprising celerity, after having fulfilled the yearly obligation, ardent as pilgrims to Mecca. There were plenty left, however, to witness the race for the Portland Plate next day. Although famous for big fields and sensational finishes, this year it did not supply such a plethora of runners as usual; but wagering took a wide range. Nomenoe, who ran Questa II. to a head at Sandown, headed the list at 5 to 1, with Clonbern, Wethers Well, Mahsud and Cigar most fancied of the others. Results:—

A glorious, mellow, autumn day on Saturday made amends for the wretchedly cold, dismal weather we had previously experienced, and while thankful for the change, one could not but regret that it had not come at the beginning instead of the end of the week. The card for Doncaster's final stage was a weak one, but the beauty of the day proved a strong temptation to many sportsmen, who, halting between two opinions decided to see the week out, and the attendance must like Tuesday's have almost proved a record for Cup day. In fact, the results all through the week must have been most satisfactory to the executive, who will now be able to resume their copious contributions towards the local rates. Results :—

ALEXANDRA PARK.

Some very good racing in delightfully fine weather entertained a huge gathering at Alexandra Park on Monday. The course yielded the best galloping known for a considerable time, and in several cases the finishes were very close and exciting. In the Harringay Plate, indeed, there was the unusual spectacle of a dead-heat repeated in the so-called decider.

Myriad was the original favourite by a fractional point from Admiral Byng, while Hayden and Farinaceous were best backed of the others, and Tinto was quoted at 10 to 1.

In the first running Myriad appeared to have all his opponents in check in the final furlong till Tinto got up within a few strides of the winning post and made a dead-heat. Long odds were laid on Myriad in the next heat, and again he had the best of the game till close home, the result being another dead-heat. The stakes were then divided. Results :—

—essential to good sport.

The most accurate and reliable of cartridges may not always suffice to ensure good sport, but good sport is out of the question without them.

Eley Cartridges do all that the best cartridges can do in this direction, with a trustworthiness which has won for them a measure of success greater probably than any other cartridges in the world.

Two 'Eley Loaded' Cartridges:

Eley 'Acme'
A bright orange 2-inch deep-shell Cartridge, loaded with Eley (42-gr.) Smokeless Powder.

Eley 'Eloid'
A light maroon Cartridge. Loaded with Eley (33-gr.) Smokeless. Light recoil; absolutely waterproof.

The above, and other Eley Specialities, may be obtained from Gunmakers and Dealers in Ammunition, everywhere.

A LIQUEUR WHISKY !!!

TREACHER'S

"EXTRA SPECIAL"

Those who desire to use themselves a Faultless Whisky or to offer their guests something out of the ordinary, should purchase this.

It is a matured blend of splendid quality and, unlike most advertised brands, may be fittingly used as an After-Dinner Liqueur, as it is sufficiently delicate in flavour to merit being sipped alone, particularly if served in a thin glass and held for a little time, in order to allow the warmth of the hand to develop the full aroma

Mixed with milk it forms a wholesome, nourishing and delicious drink the last thing at night, and is a panacea for Insomnia.

FOOTBALL ASSOCIATION RULES.

UNRELIABLE as form must be during the early weeks of the season, the second Saturday brought some startling results in the face of what had happened in the previous eleven days. Liverpool, after three victories, lost to Bradford City, who had been beaten by Aston Villa in their one match; Chelsea, after three defeats, scored 4 to 2 against Sheffield United, and Derby County, after drawing with Blackburn Rovers, went to Roker Park yesterday and overcame Sunderland by 2—0. Blackburn Rovers, suffering a reverse from Sheffield Wednesday on the first Monday of the month, have improved out of all knowledge in a style that shows undoubted brilliance and holds out every promise of their maintaining the skill and pace that won them the championship last season. A draw at Derby preceded a 5—0 triumph over Sunderland on Monday, and now 6 goals to 1 against Tottenham Hotspur conveys an idea of the disparity between the strength of some of the teams, all of which rank as first class. Manchester City compare most favourably with the team that so nearly lost their place last April. Wins over Notts County and Manchester United away from home, and now 2 more points gained at the expense of Aston Villa come as a very pleasant change to the anxieties of five months ago. Aston Villa had previously gained five points in three matches and on this, the occasion of their first defeat, they underwent an additional loss that will be regretted by all followers of football and cricket. Durat, the Surrey cricketer and famous half-back, who played for England in 1910 when a member of Woolwich Arsenal and joined the Villa this season, had the misfortune to break his leg.

Sheffield Wednesday are the only other side with three clear victories to their name—a marked change from their beginning last season, when they secured no more than 3 points in their first seven engagements—and these variations of fortune increase the interest in the sides and give to each fixture an additional importance that is perhaps not always reflected in the play. Many of the teams have not got together and injuries have occurred to quite disorganise some sides. On the other hand the loss of Thomson, injured on Monday, caused changes in the Chelsea team that contributed to a very different display to that of Monday, when Liverpool had enough of the game to have won very easily had their inside forwards done anything worthy of their reputation near goal. V. J. Woodward, who had not played since the opening match at Aston Park, returned to the side, and, with Turnbull at centre forward, he made the Chelsea attack and took the leading part in the first success of the team by scoring three of the four goals that proved none too many, seeing that the rather shaky defence lasted twice. Woodward played in the form that makes him one of England's most skilful forwards in recent years. His dribbling and passing were not at once understood by his colleagues, and not until the second half did his beautiful football turn the scale after ends had been changed with the record one all.

Another, and, at the present time, more famous international Simpson, did a lot towards bringing Blackburn Rovers to their present pitch of excellence. Hotspur actually scored first at Ewood Park—but this was indeed a case of flattering to deceive. England's outside right showed the Rovers the way to secure the lead and the whole side settled down to a winning game that the Tottenham men, already regarded as scarcely capable of meeting the demands that must be made on them, could not withstand. Tottenham Hotspur now deplore their reverses, with a record of 12 goals to 3 against them, and the reserves available arouse no confidence of an improvement. Woolwich Arsenal have but little more cause for satisfaction as Bolton Wanderers, who had twice lost to Newcastle United and beaten Chelsea at home, gained a victory at Plumstead, so that of the three London clubs only Chelsea have a victory to their credit.

While the form so far in the Second Division of the League has, in the case of many clubs, been somewhat mixed. Clapton Orient can point to excellent work. They have only taken part in two matches, but by defeating Preston North End and Barnsley, they have already shown that they are a team above the ordinary and are likely to take a very prominent part in this season's competition. Moreover, they are the only side so far to obtain the maximum number of points out of their matches. Hull City being above by reason of two victories and a draw. The Hull team are also in good form, for although they failed to score at Barnley, they got through four times against Blackpool, and at Glossop kicked three goals. Bristol City, Birmingham, and Wolverhampton Wanderers remain the other clubs who have not yet been beaten. Fulham are once more causing disappointment, as after opening in great style with a four goals victory over Leeds City, they have gone down in away matches before Birmingham and Grimsby Town.

Queen's Park Rangers dropped a point in the Southern League, Gillingham preventing them from scoring, and Swindon suffered a second defeat. Plymouth Argyle giving a reproduction of their last season's form in scoring 3 to 1. As Millwall won at Reading and West Ham United at Watford, while Crystal Palace, the only London team playing at home, beat Portsmouth, four of the five Metropolitan clubs have done enough to assure a good representation in the struggle for first honours.

RUGBY RULES.

Bedford vs. London Welsh.—At Bedford in charming weather before an excellent company the home fifteen gained a victory by the surprisingly large margin of two goals and two tries to nothing. The Bedford men, showing excellent form, had much the better of the game in its opening stages, and after Mayes had started the scoring with a try which was not converted, a second try was obtained for them, to which Heard added the goal points. In the second half the Welshmen played in much better style, and indeed had quite their share of the game, but try as they would they could not score themselves, while further tries were added for Bedford by Heard and Stafford.

Devon Albion vs. Redruth.—In the presence of 2,000 people these sides played a drawn game at Devonport, the Albion scoring a penalty goal and Redruth a try. Butcher kicked the goal for the Albion and N. Rich put on the try for Redruth. The feature of the game, which was closely contested throughout, was the fine defensive work on both sides and the splendid kicking. Redruth had the best of the play in the first half, but afterwards there was nothing to choose between the teams.

Neath vs. Pill Harriers.—Playing the better football at all points, Neath, as was only to be expected, gained an easy victory over Pill Harriers on their own ground by three placed goals, one penalty goal, and two tries to nothing. Tries for Neath were obtained by Davies (two), Burnell, Rees and Richards, while Gethin, in addition to converting the tries kicked a penalty goal. Neath were superior all round, their backs being seen in quite their best form.

Gloucester vs. Bream.—Though not at full strength, Gloucester proved altogether too strong for Bream, and in the end they gained a decisive victory by one placed goal, one penalty goal, and seven tries.

Torquay vs. Bath.—A keen and interesting game at Torquay ended in a victory for the home side by two tries to one try.

Swansea vs. District League.—In meeting a team drawn from the District League, Swansea had a very easy task, and in the end they won by the decisive margin of five goals and six tries to one try.

Newport vs. Cwmbran.—Playing on their own ground in the presence of about 2,000 people, Newport gained an easy victory over Cwmbran by one goal and three tries to one try.

Cardiff vs. Penarth.—Visiting Cardiff, Penarth won by a placed goal and a try to one dropped goal and one try—8 points to 7. The form shown came as a great surprise, Penarth being superior to Cardiff, whose forwards were poor, and the backs lacking in combination.

Leicester vs. Bridgend.—Completely outplaying Bridgend Leicester, on their own ground, gained a very easy victory by two placed goals, one dropped goal, one penalty goal, and five tries to one try—32 points to 3.

Northampton vs. Northampton Rugby Union.—In opposing a team drawn from the Northants Rugby Union Northampton had a very simple task, and in the end they won by the overwhelming margin of seven goals and eight tries—59 points—to nothing.

BOXING.

MEHEGAN BEATS MAT WELLS.

In a fifteen-rounds boxing contest at the Ring on the 16th instant Hughie Mehegan, the Australian light-weight champion, beat Matt Wells, the English holder of the Lonsdale belt, Wells being disqualified at the end of the fourteenth round for hitting Mehegan whilst the latter was walking to his corner after the gong.

Mehegan was at that time a good winner, for, after being outboxed in the first half-dozen rounds, he had punished Wells mercilessly, and nothing but a knockout in the fifteenth round could have given the Englishman the contest.

Mehegan is a rugged, two-handed fighter of the crouching type, and at first Wells was glad to go in and mix it. But in the fifth round Wells tried to stand off and box his man. Later on he had to go in and hold in to save himself from punishment.

It was therefore not pretty boxing, but it was a great fight. It was useless to ask for silence: the excitement in the crowd ran to fever heat, and the partisans of the two men simply could not keep quiet.

With both men crouching there was sure to be a lot of head work and, with each trying to get his head on his opponent's chest out of danger, now and then the skull was used as a weapon.

In the first round Mehegan was made to look like a novice, Wells hitting him as he liked, but the Australian seemed to improve on punishment, and although Wells had a lot the best of the second round, Mehegan steadied and surprised the Englishman with the power behind his punches. But Mehegan, with a left and right to the jaw, went down for a count of six seconds.

Still the Australian was not weakened at all, and finished the round in good style, cutting Wells' eye with a right swing.

Matt continued to have the best of it in the third round, but he was evidently not liking it. Wells did not know what to do with a man quite as good at in-fighting as himself and who could hit as hard as a heavy-weight.

The fourth round was a fine one, with Wells boxing well and keeping more out of reach, but each time they came into clinches Mehegan punished his man with heavy body blows and fierce upper-cuts. Wells repeatedly landed on the back of Mehegan's neck, but it did not seem to worry him much.

Wells got one home on the point in the fifth round, but the Australian did not seem to mind it, and in the sixth round Mehegan took the aggressive. In addition to a cut eye Wells' mouth was now cut, and Mehegan repeatedly drove home regular pile-drivers to the body.

From this point onwards Mehegan had the best of the exchanges, and Wells took a lot of gruelling punishment from a terrible right hand, which seemed as good in the close work as in the longer range efforts. Wells looked weak, but got in one good right-hand hook to the jaw shortly before the end of the round.

Again in the eighth round Mehegan punished his man tremendously, and so on through the ninth and tenth he hit with tremendous power, Wells being quite nonplussed and worried by his opponent's tactics. Wells went down in the tenth on one knee, but Mehegan helped him up.

Wells had to hang on in the eleventh and twelfth rounds, but after a pull out of the bottle went in hotly to regain some of his lost points, and made a big rally in the thirteenth meeting.

But it was a flash in the pan only, for the Australian was fresher and stronger in the fourteenth round, and Wells was hanging on for dear life before the end of the round. He knew he was beaten, and as the gong went he dashed after Mehegan as he was walking to his corner and sent him down with a punch on the ear and, although Mr. Corrie tried to restrain him, hit Mehegan again while he was on the ground.

Of course, there was only one thing to do. Wells was properly disqualified, but it made no difference to the result, for Mehegan must have got the decision unless Wells could have knocked his man out in the last round.

ATHLETICS.

A New Sprinting Record.—W. R. Applegarth, the 220yds. amateur champion, who represented Great Britain in the Olympic Games at Stockholm, was in brilliant form at the autumn meeting of the South London Harriers at Kennington Oval on Saturday, when he created a fresh British record for 200yds.

Applegarth won the first heat of the open 100yds. handicap from scratch, in 10-1/5secs.; the qualifying heat of the second round in 10secs., and the final heat of the same event in the same time.

Later on Applegarth turned out and won the preliminary heat of the 200yads. level race, which was run diagonally across the ground, in strings. His time was 20-3/5secs. The final heat took place after an hour's interval, and, refreshed by the nice long rest, Applegarth put in a grand performance. Going at a tremendous pace from start to finish, he won by 3yds. from V. H. A. D'Arcy, also of the Polytechnic Harriers, with D. H. Jacobs (Herne Hill Harriers) third, in the fresh "record" time of 19-2/5secs.

The previous best was 19-4/5secs., by E. H. Pelling, at Stamford Bridge, in 1899; by the late A. R. Downer, on the same track, in 1895; by C. H. Jupp, also at Stamford Bridge; and by G. Jordan, on the Iffley-road track, in 1896. The American amateur record is 19-1/5secs. by R. C. Craig, of Michigan University; and the world's professional record is 19secs., by A. B. Postle, of Australia—both accomplished last year.

CALCUTTA CUP TOURNAMENT.

As a result of yesterday's play in the tournament for the Calcutta Cup on the old course at St. Andrews Mr. F. G. Tulloch and Mr. F. H. W. Vickerman qualified for the final. In the fifth round Mr. Vickerman beat Captain Macallan (plus 1) by 3 and 2, after leading by 1 up at the turn. The match was squared at the tenth, but Mr. Vickerman took the lead again at the short thirteenth and became 2 up at the fourteenth. Mr. Tulloch in the same round beat Colonel Livingston by 4 and 2, against whom he was 1 up at the turn. In the afternoon he disposed of Mr. Walter Blackwell, the last surviving "plus" player, by 3 and 2. Appended are the results:

Fifth Round.

Mr. F. G. Tulloch (4) beat Colonel P. J. C. Livingston (3) by 4 and 2.
Colonel O. Rowe (6) beat Mr. J. P. A. Latham (10) by 3 and 2.
Mr. F. H. W. Vickerman (6) beat Captain A. R. Macallan (plus 1) by 3 and 2.
Mr. Walter Blackwell (plus 1) a bye.

Semi-Final.

Mr. F. G. Tulloch beat Mr. Walter Blackwell by 3 and 2.
Mr. F. H. W. Vickerman beat Colonel O. Rowe by 5 and 4.

Hunting.

OOTACAMUND HOUNDS.

My last of a fortnight ago gave you an account of the Hunt races; since when things have been simmering down towards the close of the season.

Rain has been plentiful, the North-East Monsoon obligingly trying to make amends for the shortage of the South-West rainfall.

On 23rd September the hound puppy show was held at the Kennels, when the following awards were made, Major Symons acting as Judge.

Dog Hounds.—1st Harlequin, walked by Mrs. Dennistoun; 2nd Holder, walked by Mrs. Butler; 3rd Palmer, walked by Mr. Watts.

Bitch Hounds.—1st Playmate, walked by Mr. Cox; 2nd Helen, walked by Mr. Cox; 3rd Heedless, walked by Captain Lambton.

The best couple.—Hotspur and Helen, walked by Mr. Cox.

At the conclusion Her Excellency Lady Hammick gave away the prizes, and the Governor's Staff were "At Home" to their friends. Hounds were, I believe, taken out for a hunt that afternoon.

The next meet was on Saturday, 28th, at Fairlawns, when a fairly large field witnessed a great hunt after all sorts of quarry in addition to the legitimate jack; sambhur, pigs, hares and other fry all jumping up at times to beguile the young hounds.

On Monday, 30th September, meeting at Lake End, the pack were put into Campbell's Copse, whence they forced out a jack, and ran him close, scent lying well after the recent heavy rain, down to the Whins by Municipal Hill, back to the Copse and then another sally as far as Woodstock and round again to starting place where the jack found an earth and safety. Tracks were then made for the more open going of the downs, but the sun had become powerful and dried up the moisture, and scent failed, so after trying some stale lines without success hounds were taken home.

Of Tuesday's hunt, meeting at Beadnell's, I regret I have no information.

A. W. E.

POONA JUNIOR TOURNAMENT.

Semi-Finals.

Two games were played on the 30th ultimo leaving the Bangalore Gymkhana and the 26th Light Cavalry in the final. There was a big gathering of spectators and Colonel Logan Home and officers of the 26th Light Cavalry were "At Home."

34TH POONA HORSE vs. BANGALORE GYMKHANA (+1).

First Chukker.—The Poona Horse got away and Davie opened their account. A run by Bangalore next enabled Conran to score but Poona Horse got away again soon after and McGregor notched a goal.

Second Chukker.—The Poona Horse attacked but were repulsed and Bangalore rushing down Ramsey added to their total.

Third Chukker.—Fast up and down play during the major part of the period: no score.

Fourth Chukker.—More fast and exciting play. Both goals had narrow escapes, but there was no further score.

Fifth Chukker.—The Poona Horse ran down but were stopped and the ball transferred to their end where after two unsuccessful shots Bassett hit a goal. Final score: Bangalore Gymkhana 4 goals, Poona Horse 2 goals. Teams:—

34TH POONA HORSE.		BANGALORE GYMKHANA.
Mr. W. E. D. Campbell	1	Mr. J. R. Ramsey	1
Mr. E. D. McGregor	2	Mr. J. P. Bassett	2
Capt E. St. C. Gray	3	Mr. J. C. Pringle	3
Major J. H. M. Davie	(back)	Capt W. D. Conran	(back)

Umpires:—Mr. E. Corbould-Warren and Captain V. A. Cosker.

26th LIGHT CAVALRY (+1) vs. 3RD SAPPERS AND MINERS.

First Chukker.—The Sappers ran down but were driven back and Chaytor opened the Cavalry account. Up and down play, the Sappers missing more than one opportunity.

Second Chukker.—This was a well contested period. Each team attacked in turn but there was no score.

Third Chukker.—The Cavalry pressed throughout and scored 2 goals.

Fourth Chukker.—Another chukker all in favour of the Cavalry who scored two more goals. Johnson's pony came down but neither horse nor rider was hurt.

Fifth Chukker.—A run by the Cavalry was stopped and Bremner with a fine individual effort scored the Sappers' only goal. Final score: 26 L. C., 6 goals; 3rd Sappers and Miners, 1 goal. Teams:—

26TH LIGHT CAVALRY.		3RD SAPPERS AND MINERS.
Mr. R. H. O'Donnell	1	Mr. J. S. Richardson	1
Mr. H. A. B. Johnson	2	Major A. G. Bremner	2
Capt. H. C. Chaytor	3	Capt. S. Boyd	3
Mr. J. A. Collum	(back).	Capt. E. J. Loring	(back).

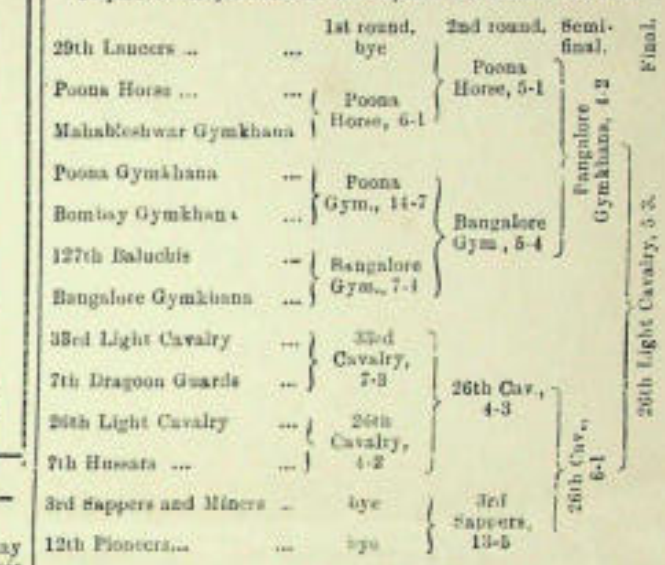
Umpires:—Captain V. A. Cosker and Captain E. St. C. Gray.

Final.

The final was played on Wednesday, the 2nd instant, in the presence of a large gathering. Sir George and Lady Clarke were present and Lady Clarke handed the Cup to the winners at the close of a good game. The ground was in excellent order thanks to the efforts of Major Henderson, whose efforts have met with all the success they deserve. Sir Richard and Lady Lamb were "At Home."

26TH LIGHT CAVALRY vs. BANGALORE GYMKHANA (+1).

First Chukker.—The Bangalore team got away at once and Barrett scored. A scrum in their territory shortly after enabled O'Donnell to put the teams on terms. Chaytor was next prominent and scored two goals. O'Donnell missed a chance for Bangalore just before the close of the period.



Second Chukker.—Bangalore pressed at the start but were repulsed and Johnson got away and scored. Bangalore then resumed the offensive and Conran scored a good goal, midfield play closing the chukker.

Third Chukker.—Midfield play till the 26th got through and Johnson hit a goal. Bangalore made great efforts but were unsuccessful.

Fourth Chukker.—The Cavalry attacked and three runs by Johnson ended fruitlessly. Then the Cavalry were called upon to defend and the chukker ended without score.

Fifth Chukker.—The 26th put in two good runs but neither materialised. They continued to press till the call of time but no score was registered, the 26th Cavalry thus winning the game and the cup by 5 goals to 3. Teams as before.

Umpires:—Major Bremner and Captain McCudden. Results:—

BRAIN-POWER IN GAMES.

"SUSTAINED CONCENTRATION," that was the burden of J. H. Taylor's song a few days ago when he was explaining to me the whys and wherefores of his wonderful round at Baden-Baden, where he accomplished the extraordinary feat of doing a nine-hole round in 28 strokes.

The famous ex-open champion is firmly of the opinion that concentration developed to a very high pitch is the groundwork, so to speak, of any great golfing achievement. During the round one's thoughts must never wander even for the infinitesimal part of a second from the game in progress. Once let the thoughts wander and it is extremely difficult, in fact well-nigh impossible, to "come back."

THE GROUNDWORK OF SUCCESS.

Golf, however, is not the only game in which this quality, shall I call it, of concentration is so absolutely essential. Take any game or sport and it will be found that concentration is invariably the groundwork of success. In cricket concentration is absolutely necessary, whether you are batting, bowling, or fielding. Consider the batsman first. When he has taken guard he glances round to see where the fieldsmen are placed. Quick though that glance be it is a concentrated one, for in that moment is photographed in his mind the position of each man, and the batsman has to retain these positions vividly with the memory that he must not play a ball up in the air anywhere near these fieldsmen.

Taking his stand ready for the delivery of the ball the first rule of batting, "keep your eye on the ball," must be absolutely observed. From the moment the bowler starts his run until the moment that the ball comes in contact with the bat the ball must be watched, as a mouse is watched by a cat. The eye and the mind must never waver for the tiniest atom of time.

We saw a splendid example of this concentration on the part of the batsmen at the Oval in the final Test match between England and Australia last week. In England's second innings several batsmen had been dismissed very cheaply when Mr. Douglas joined Mr. Fry. The pitch was very difficult, the ball coming off at all sorts of heights and paces. A great effort was necessary. Mr. Douglas concentrated his powers on resisting the attack without troubling much about getting runs, while Mr. Fry set himself with a stiff upper lip to score as freely as possible, while taking no risks until the ship had been brought into safe waters.

PROF. SCHMIDT prefers Gonosan (Kawa Santal Riedel) to any other preparation of Sandal wood oil. Although he has used the drug in many cases he has never observed any signs of Nausea, Flatulency, Nephritic pains, Pruritis or Skin Eruptions. The same is the opinion of other leading Specialists. WINCHESTER

THE MOST POWERFUL OF ALL REPEATERS.

To put a strong and dangerous beast to sleep with one shot requires power. No other repeater has this in the measure that the .405 has. It lets loose over three thousand pounds of energy at each shot. What animal could withstand the shocking effect of such power? The rifle holds five such shots, and its repeating mechanism is so sure and quick in action that the cumulative effect of all these shots may be expended on the animal if need be.

The Last Test Match

It was a magnificent duel, the brains of the batsmen matched against the brains of bowlers and fielders, every nerve strained on the part of attackers and defenders. One could almost hear the batsman saying to himself, "Ah! here comes that fast one that swings away. I must leave it alone." Again and again the treacherous nature of the pitch forced the batsman to change his stroke with lightning-like rapidity in order to save his wicket. For one hundred and ten minutes these two men never for a moment allowed their minds to wander from the task in hand. Then when England's position was secure and he had scored over 70 runs Mr. Fry allowed himself the luxury of a "light-hearted" stroke. Instinctively we who had been following the fortunes of the game felt that the end of this glorious innings was close at hand. Mr. Fry had relaxed for a second, and sure enough, with his total at 79, the English captain was caught in the slips form a stroke he would never have allowed himself to make until his task was accomplished.

Take the case of the first-class fieldsman. How often do we read of a batsman falling to "a magnificent catch by Mr. So-and-so." There is one instance of this which will always remain stamped on my mind namely, when Mr. A. O. Jones caught Mr. Noble, the Australian captain, in the Test match at Edgbaston in 1909. Mr. Noble had made a magnificent stroke to leg off George Hirst. Mr. Jones was standing close in, his left hand suddenly shot down close to the ground, and it was an appreciable period of time before batsman, fielders, and spectators realised that an almost miraculous catch had been made.

Mr. A. O. Jones's Wonderful Catch.

The explanation of this wonderful catch was concentration on the part of the fielder. He had noticed exactly the ball that Hirst had delivered. He had noted how the batsman was shaping to play, and almost unconsciously had started before the stroke was made to the position where he expected the ball to come, and he made the catch. An "unconcentrated" fielder would not have been within two yards of the ball, and Mr. Noble would have scored four.

Mr. C. B. Fry is only one of many famous athletes who can confess that lack of concentration has lost him a race. Especially in sprint races it is essential to keep one's mind and whole attention fixed on the winning-tape. If the mind wavers for a moment, almost imperceptibly the runner's stride shortens, and in that fraction of a second the field sweeps by him and the race is lost.

A few years ago a young friend of mine was playing in an important lawn tennis tournament. He had reached the final and, playing with splendid determination, was winning easily, and after gaining the first two sets was leading by three games to love in the final set. His opponent was rather overcome by the heat and turned very faint. However, he rallied and continued the match. The young player allowed his thoughts to wander to his opponent's condition: he lost his grip on the game and was unable to settle down steadily again, and he lost the match. An extraordinary instance of this kind also occurred in the amateur rackets championship in 1907. Mr. Basil Foster was playing Mr. E. B. Noel and was leading by 12—10, having already won the first two games. For some unknown reason he lost his length and was beaten, after appearing to hold the championship firm in his grasp.

Concentration in Football.

In football, whether it be Association or Rugby, the need for concentration is just as great as in other games. Both in defence and attack the player must endeavour to anticipate the movements of his opponents, or if he be in possession of the ball concentrate on outwitting them. The great back player is he who seems in some uncanny manner always to break up the attack by being exactly in the right spot. He seems to know beforehead what the next movement of the oncoming player will be. Such "intelligent anticipation," however, is only achieved by absolutely "living" in the game while it is in progress.

It is not surprising, therefore, to find that really great players of all games as soon as the game in which they are engaged is over are more tired mentally than physically. Their exertions may have taken something out of them, but the real cause of fatigue has been the continued effort of brain and mind to concentrate and think only of the next move in the game.

To excel in any ball game the player must concentrate as deeply and in as sustained a manner as a chess-master or a brilliant card-player.—The Daily Mail.

Poultry.

POULTRY NOTES.

[By P. A. V.]

Eggs are such common things that of the millions of people who every morning eat them probably few look upon them in any other way than as relates to their price and freshness. Not long ago from Kansas city, United States of America, there was consigned to California perhaps the most remarkable cargo of eggs ever despatched to one place and forwarded by one firm. It totalled 2,600,000 eggs and made an entire train of 12 car-loads. However, the above is but a trifle in comparison with the 1,000,000,000 eggs produced annually in that country. One arithmetician, fond of figures, has computed that, if the above were put end to end, they would several times girdle the earth. The same authority says that England consumes 40,000 railway truck-loads of eggs in a year; half of them are produced in that country but the balance come from abroad.

In some places brown shelled-eggs are in favour; in others white is preferred; while generally, as long as they are fresh and of fair size, the color of the shell is not questioned. Many who prefer the brown egg consider it richer than the one whose covering is white. Such is not the case; the shell has no bearing on the contents. The color of the yolk is the best guide. A fairly dark yolk usually indicates a rich egg, a pale one a poor egg.

The flavour of the egg is governed largely by the food given to the hen. When fed largely on meat, the yolk is of a very dark color and strong in flavor; and when the fowls are allowed to run at large amongst rank vegetation, the yolks will also be dark. When milk is largely used in the diet, the yolk is pale and the white watery and less firm than that laid by a hen fed on grain. If fowls are kept in confinement and given a good variety of cereal foods, fresh green vegetables, some meat, grit and pure water and get exercise by scratching for their grain in some loose material, they will lay good quality nourishing, full-flavoured eggs.

There are many uses to which eggs are put to besides being eaten. In many factories they are largely used, as well as in medicine for external and internal purposes. According to some physicians there is not a more delicate, more stimulating or more easily digested food; and they are much used during convalescence, forming the transition from the broth diet to the more substantial fare. Many other medicinal preparation I may be made out of eggs for various illnesses. The white of the egg is also largely used in clarifying liquids and in the preparation of household cements. A London newspaper recently stated that over 40,000,000 of the cheap imported eggs are used annually in the calico print works. Photographers' establishments use millions of dozens and wine-clarifiers 10,000,000 dozens. Book-binders, kid-glovemakers, leather-finishers and other trades also use them in enormous quantities; indeed, the general public have but small knowledge of the magnitude of the quantities wanted for commerical purposes.

Good nests should be made for the sitting hen in a quiet corner. A nest made on earth is best, but, if not convenient, earth can be placed in the box or barrel used, shaped out like a large saucer and lined with soft grass. The hen should be dusted with sulphur or insect powder or, as we now do, sprayed with paramaph the day of sitting, then allowed to dry in the sun and be set in the evening.

Poultry do not bathe in water to clean themselves but roll in loose, dry earth. They enjoy scraping up and throwing the dust into their feathers and then, after wallowing a while, getting up and shaking themselves, when the lice go too. Put sulphur in the dustbath to kill the lice.

Bacteriological studies on eggs carried out in the Kansas State Experimental Station concluded that (1) the bacterial content of eggs undergoes great seasonal changes, generally increasing with the rise in temperature; (2) no definite relation could be traced between the bacterial content of eggs and their hatching qualities; (3) no relation could be found between the age of the fowls and the bacterial content of their eggs; (4) no definite influence of the fattening ration upon the number of eggs infected and upon their hatching qualities could be observed.

THE DURAND TOURNAMENT.

On the 2nd instant the two drawn games were replayed. That between the Connaught Rangers and the Royal West Kents resulted this time in a win for the Connaughts by a goal to nil. The Gordon Highlanders and the North-Western Railway put up another fine game and drew without scoring a second time. The following day these teams took the field for the third time and on this occasion the Highlanders were victorious by a goal to nil. The point was scored in the first half and in spite of all their efforts the Railway were unable to get on terms.

The semi-finals were played on the 5th instant in the presence of a large gathering which included the Viceroy and party. The first game was between the Gordon Highlanders and the Lancashire Fusiliers and a splendid game ended, despite extra time, in a pointless draw. Soon after the start the Fusiliers lost their left wing forward, who got a heavy fall and was unable to continue playing. With ten men they nevertheless played a fine game. There was little to choose between them in the first and second halves, but the Gordons had rather the best of the extra period: still they could not get through.

The second game on Saturday between the Connaught Rangers and the Royal Scots also ended in a pointless draw, play being very level throughout, both goals being visited in turn without result.

Both matches were replayed on Monday evening. The Royal Scots and the Connaught Rangers again drew without score; extra time also proving unproductive. They met once more on Tuesday morning and this time the Royal Scots beat the Rangers by 4 goals to nil. The Scots had the best of the exchanges all through. They opened their account shortly after the start, added another goal before the interval, and two more in the second half.

The other replay on Monday was between the Gordons and the Lancashire Fusiliers. The Lancs pressed at the start but were driven back; then after a spell of up and down play they got away again and Spriggs scored a goal. They continued pressing till at length the Gordons relieved and fast play followed all over the field. The Gordons were attacking when halftime arrived. On crossing over the Lancs ran down and Russel scored their second point. Then the Gordons attacked and a fine shot went just too high. Play ruled up and down for a time, neither side gaining any advantage till at length the Lancs rushed the ball down and netted their third goal. The Highlanders were unable to respond and retired beaten by 3 goals to nil.

BOMBAY ROVERS' TOURNAMENT.

On Saturday, the 28th ultimo, the Colaba Swifts met the G. I. P. Railway, an interesting game ending in a pointless draw. Walker, the railway custodian, saving his side from defeat on several occasions. The match was replayed on Monday, a scrambling game resulting in a win for the Colaba Swifts by 3 goals to nil. The Railway played one short at the start and while thus handicapped the Colaba team scored 2 goals, adding a third before the interval.

On Tuesday, the 1st instant, the Bombay Gymkhana played the Royal Irish Regiment and beat them by a goal to nil. The first half ended without score, though each team had had opportunities. May the Gymkhana goalkeeper gave a capital exhibition and was equal to all demands. In the second half the soldiers attacked hotly but spoiled many chances by erratic shooting and offside. Then the Gymkhana got through and scored in a scrimmage—this being the only goal of the game. Barrett and May kept the Irishmen out and the match ended as stated.

The third round opened on the 2nd instant, Royal Irish Regiment "B" team met the York and Lancaster Regiment. The Irishmen scored a goal soon after the start and attacked throughout the remainder of the first half. In the second period the game was more even, but neither side scored again and the Irishmen thus won by a goal to nil.

The Royal Warwicks met the Loyal North Lancs last Thursday and the match was the best witnessed thus far in the tournament. Play was fast throughout, the Warwicks, who had the best of the first half, scoring two goals through Winspur before the interval. On resuming the North Lancs did most of the attacking; they scored one goal, but Baker and Beech stopped all their efforts to get on terms and the Warwicks thus won by 2 goals to 1.

The Cheshire Regiment and the Bombay Gymkhana took the field on Friday. The game was very level in the first half, the Gymkhana having quite as much of the play as their opponents. The interval arrived without score, but on changing ends the soldiers scored two goals without response, and in spite of plucky play by the Civilians the Cheshires had all the best of it, the Gymkhana being further handicapped by the wind. Barrett and Wilmott worked very hard and times and again broke up dangerous rushes by the soldiers. The Gymkhana forwards were, however, weak and could not score, the Cheshires thus qualifying for the semi-finals by two to nil.

Saturday saw the close of the third round with the game between the Dorsets and the Colaba Swifts. The military team had been expected to win easily, but though they had the best of the game they could only win by 2 goals to 1. They scored half way through the first session, Smooker putting through and Lloyd adding a second point soon after. The Swifts were by no means daunted and playing up vigorously they scored a goal through Broadfoot. Play was well contested during the second half but neither team could score. Results:—

GOLF IN BOMBAY.

ROYAL BOMBAY GOLF CLUB ANNUAL WEEK.

THE annual week began on Monday, the 30th ultimo, under most favourable conditions. The course was in really excellent order, thanks to the untiring energy of the Honorary Secretary, and the weather was all that could be desired.

The first competition—Scratch against Bogey, whose score in the Senior Class was fixed at 40 and in the Junior at 44—was played on Monday and Tuesday.

Seniors.—On the first day Coombs returned an excellent card of 36, thus finishing 4 up on "The Colonel." His card read as follows:—4 4 4 6 4 4 3 3 4 = 36: the Bogey score being 5 4 5 5 5 5 4 3 4 = 40. Gittins also played sound golf and went round in 39 and Hart finished all square. On Tuesday the best score was returned by Cook, who was 2 up. The previous day he had been 3 down and this gave him a total of one down and second place to Coombs. The latter did not show the brilliant form of the first day but finished 2 down and managed to keep his place at the top of the list with a total of 2 up. Gittins and Hart, who were each 4 down in the second round, took third and fourth places respectively.

	1st round.	2nd round.	Result.
E. E. Coombs ...	... 4 up	2 down	2 up.
G. Cook ...	... 3 down	2 up	1 down.
A. Gittins ...	... 1 up	4 down	3 down.

E. T. Bunbury ...	... 8 down	5 down	13 down.

Juniors.—On the first day H. B. Murray headed the list with a score of 43, one up on Bogey, but he could not repeat this on Tuesday and with four down had to be content with fourth place. T. H. Watts, who was all square on the first round, finished 2 up in the second and thus won the competition with a total of 2 up. H. T. Gorrie 1 down in each round was second, tying with P. W. Cresswell with a similar score:—

SECOND COMPETITION.—Medal play over two rounds, prizes for the two best scratch scores and the two best handicap scores in both the Senior and Junior classes.

Seniors.—In the scratch competition Scott, Gittins and Abercrombie headed the list with 41 and in the handicap Scott and Hargreaves were top on the first day. On Thursday, however, Scott took 45 to go round and with 86 could only take sixth place in the scratch list. Abercrombie played a fine round of 38, two up on Bogey and with a total of 79 won the scratch prize. Gittins also played good golf going round in 39 and thus finishing second. Jessop and Lattey tied for the second prize. The handicap first prize was won by Gittins with 41+39=80 + 2=82 and the second prize by Coombe with 84.

HANDICAP FOURSOMES AGAINST BOGEY.—Played on Friday and Saturday last. In the first round Abercrombie and May beat the "Colonel" 2 up with a score of 38, three couples finishing all square. On Saturday the best rounds were made by McMillan and Hutchence, and Lowndes and Owen, both couples ending up all square. Abercrombie and May were 1 down and this with their fine round of the previous day gave them a comfortable win. McMillan and Hutchence taking second place.

THE MURREE TOURNAMENT.

THE final of the tournament between the Royal Sussex Regiment "A" team and the Rifle Brigade "A" team attracted a big crowd of spectators and a really good game was witnessed. The game was strenuously contested throughout. The Sussex drew first blood, but the Rifles equalised not long after and scoring a second goal led at the interval by 2 goals to 1. On resuming, the Sussex equalised and time was called with the score 2 all. In the extra period each team scored a goal and in spite of desperate efforts the match ended in a draw of 3—3.

The game was replayed on the 1st instant and was not so fast nor so exciting as the previous encounter. Neither team was playing up to form but the Sussex had the best of the exchanges, scoring a goal in each half and running out winners by 2 goals to nil. The Cup was presented to the Sussex by Lady Willcocks and the General made a short congratulatory speech. Complete results:—

DOG FAKING.

HOW THE KENNEL CLUB DEALS WITH THE EVIL.

"The most unkindest cut of all."
—"Julius Cæsar," Act III., Sc. 2.

THERE can be no doubt that the atmosphere of the whole canine world is at the present moment contaminated with the odour of faking. It permeates the club at headquarters and the specialist show alike, each constituent, whether cutting, plucking, or singeing, of the subdivision "trimming" being discussed in turn.

There can be no doubt, moreover, that until the special meeting of the Kennel Club on 14th October, the matter will continue to loom large, and form a topic of conversation wherever two or three doggy men are gathered together. Even after that, the club's action is sure to be widely discussed and criticised adversely by those few "experts" who are always anxiously waiting to find fault with Kennel Club authority.

Faking has, of course, existed from time immemorial. It was well known long before dog-showing came into existence, and was extensively practised by the lower class of dealers and those engaged in the nefarious occupation of training animals for dog-fighting and bear-baiting. While there has never been any doubt as to the meaning of the word, there has been some misunderstanding as to the offence itself, so it may be as well to give a definition as drafted by a well-known legal authority. He says:—"Faking proper is the act of wilfully altering the natural appearance of a dog with intent to render the dog, by such alteration, more fitted for successful competition at shows. Provided always the above shall not be taken to apply to the ordinary process of feeding, grooming, and otherwise bona fide making-up for the show."

OUTSTANDING RULES.

The committee of the Kennel Club have, of course, legislated, and sub-committees have been formed from time to time to strengthen the rules, which at present and for some time have been as follows:—

A dog is disqualified if it can be shown:—

1. That any dye, colouring, darkening, bleaching or other matter has been in any way used for the purpose of altering or improving the colouring or markings of a dog.

2. That any preparation, chemical or otherwise, has been used for the purpose of altering or improving the texture of the coat.

3. That any oil, greasy or sticky substance has been used and remains in the coat during the time of exhibition.

4. That any part of a dog's coat or hair has been cut, clipped, singed, or rasped down by any substance.

5. That the new or fast coat has been removed by pulling or plucking in any manner.

6. That any cutting, piercing, breaking by force, or any kind of operation or act which destroys the tissues of the ears or alters their natural form or carriage or shortens the tail or alters the natural formation of the dog has been practised.

Of all these offences, the one most commonly committed, and the most important because of the difficulty of proving it, is the cutting, clipping, etc., of a dog's coat. It is a fraud, moreover, which particularly affects the public, and many a dog-lover has bought some prize-winning terrier at a show, only to find a few months afterwards that it is quite a different dog, and stands no chance of winning a prize unless trimmed in a manner inconsistent with the rules.

CLIPPED POMERANIAN.

What is it, however, that has brought faking into such unpleasant prominence at the present moment? Stated briefly, it is that Dr. Sidney Turner, the chairman of the Kennel Club Committee, refused to give a prize to a Pomeranian on the ground that the hair of its feet and legs had been cut. This was honestly admitted by the exhibitor, who was censured when the matter came before the committee, although it was admitted to be a universal custom among Pomeranian fanciers.

A deputation was subsequently sent from the leading Pomeranian clubs asking for permission to cut the hair on the ears and feet, but after a careful hearing it was refused. Though sorry for the Pomeranian people, one cannot help thinking that had it been granted it would have been the thin end of the wedge, and that other breeds, instead of trying to obtain the desired points by selection, would have sought them through a similar permission.

As a result of the case and the answer to the deputation, the Pomeranian exhibitors are very indignant. They say that ninety per cent. of them desire the alteration, and that their wishes ought to be considered, also that they have been made a scapegoat, and that there are other breeds which are infinitely worse offenders of which no notice has been taken.

TWO COURSES.

Ostensibly there are two courses open, namely, the granting of full liberty to exhibitors to do what they think best, and the enforcement of the present rules. The first is not really feasible, as roughhaired terriers are utility breeds, and their standards have been so drawn — that they should be able to do the work they are meant for. If the coat, a most important point, were allowed to be produced by artificial means, the club would abandon one of its principal objects, namely, the amelioration of the different breeds of dogs. Having acted as they have, it is the duty of the club to see that every exhibitor of a dog that has been clipped or plucked or pulled shall be punished, and they certainly will not shrink from it. There is no doubt that it will be difficult to enforce the rule, but it is useless to make a rule which cannot be enforced, and the club will surely find some means.

It is obvious that a very great deal must depend on the judge, and it is therefore all-important that only men such as Mr. Deane Willis, who have the courage to turn out a dog which they consider over-trimmed should be selected to officiate. If this is done, it would be a big move in the right direction.

At the present moment it is not the best dog that wins in a number of cases, but the best-trimmed dog. It behoves everyone who takes an interest in the welfare of dogs and dog-showing to do their utmost to put a stop to the present state of things, which is manifestly unfair to the novice and the public alike, and which is admitted by everyone to be so.—EL HAKIM in the Express.

INTERCOMMUNICATION OF ANIMALS.

WITH reference to an interesting article by Ernest E. Thompson on "Intercommunication of Wolves" M. Hardy writes as follows:—Mr. Thompson's statements regarding the odours of different animals, and that the odour of the same animal differs under different conditions, are all correct, and what all intelligent hunters have known for generations.

SIGNAL POSTS.

In regard to the amount of information which animals obtain from what he calls "signal posts" many of us would differ. These so-called "signal posts" are some prominent object, either a rock, bush, stump or mound near a game trail, or if in winter on the ice or shore of a pond or stream. No doubt wolves, foxes, dogs and other animals can tell by the scent where animals of their own species have been, whether they were friends or foes; of what sex and whether searching for a mate; but I doubt if they can tell much more by the scent left on these "signal posts." If they can tell where they came from and which way they were travelling, it is by smelling of the track and not by the scent left on the post. Of course the animal last at the post left his track, and as Mr. Thompson states, any animal can tell which way a track leads. Going to the post, he finds the track, and gets his idea of whence the animal came and where he is going from the track and not from the scent on the post.

Animals do not find places entirely by scent, although in many cases the scent helps them locate the exact place more easily. In proof of this, set up a bush which you know to be perfectly clean on the ice near where foxes travel. The first fox which passes will go to it, after that any other fox will follow, but the first fox will go by sight because he expects to find that others have been there. Wolves do the same, and many a one has found the poison and met his death by investigating a "sign post" where no wolves had never been before.

All animals know where animals of their own kind will travel, and one who has hunted any animal a long time will get so that he in a measure partakes of the instinct of the animal he hunts, and can tell very nearly where it will travel and where to look for signs of it. Any good otter hunter canoeing on a strange stream can at once point out many places where otter slides will be found before he lands, and on lakes or ponds can locate them when long distances away. Any good mink hunter can tell you places where every mink will surely visit, even on streams he has never seen before. Those who hunt deer or foxes with hounds know that the runway where they ran fifty years ago, if left just as it formerly was, is the place where they will run to-day. I always judge that animals know as much about their own concerns as men do: and that what a man can find without scent an animal can.

Bears leave signs by biting prominent trees, usually near old roads or game trails. Every bear which passes leaves his mark. I know that they can tell where a bear has lately passed and how high he could reach (unless they cheat by standing on a log, as I have seen done), but I doubt if they find out more except by following the track. Squirrels and some animals of the cat kind leave their signs by scratching trees or logs of rotten wood. Fisher and marten will leave sign on prominent logs and rocks, but I believe that all this communication only tells that the animal has been there, with perhaps the sex and condition. The real communication is in an entirely different way, and one to us as yet unknown.

ANIMALS, TRAPS AND TRAPPERS.

Mr. Thompson speaks of wolves learning about traps and poison, and teaching others. This is correct. Most animals (and in this term I mean to include not only beasts, but birds, fishes, reptiles and also insects) learn to know and shun, and teach others to shun danger. There are exceptions, as in the case of Canada and Franklin's grouse, but this is the general rule. The bear of to-day can only in rare instances be caught in the same way in which he could be fifty years ago in places where he has been trapped. For many years he has known enough to tear down the sides of the house around the steel trap, and in some cases to take hold of the clay and haul the trap out of the house. A bear which is well educated can discount any wolf ever born in the tricks, he can teach a trapper. Many can now be taken only by setting the traps in water with scent, as is practised in setting for foxes. Most fishers know enough to trip a log trap and steal the bait. Any one who tries to trap the common house-rat will find that, although he may have a college education, he has still a good many things to learn. Fish learn to avoid nets. In Solomon's days he found that it was in vain to set the net in the sight of any bird." Where mosquitoes are persistently hunted they learn to alight on dark objects to escape being seen.

Where telegraph lines have been long used, birds have learned to avoid them. As "dead men tell no tales," it is reasonable to suppose that all kinds of animated life (unless we except men) learn by the experience of others. The young ruffed grouse begins life where his parents left off. City nighthawks learn to use gravel roofs, and chimney swifts to use chimneys instead of hollow trees. But all these are only examples of learning from or communication with each other by scent, example or teaching.

MIGRATIONS OF BEARS.

There are ways of communication which are far more wonderful. While birds migrate at regular seasons, and from well-known causes, in their usual spring and fall migrations, many animals and some birds migrate at irregular intervals over great extents of county and from no known cause. Take our black bears for an example. The first notice of one of these migrations is to be found in a book by John Josselyn, entitled "New England Rarities Discovered," published in 1675. In this he says (I have to quote from memory, not having the book at hand) that where he lived at York, Me., the bears sometimes travelled in great companies and crossed the river (probably the Piscataqua River) in large numbers.

The next migration of bears of which I have any sure proof was witnessed by my father some seventy years ago. Early in September a very large number of bears came to the east bank of the Penobscot River, in the town of Orrington, some seven miles below Bangor. The night was so dark that they could not be seen, but they could be heard calling to and answering each other, till just low water, when they took the water and landed on the Hampden side. In the morning it was found by the muddy tracks that a large number had crossed. My father saw three tracks across a single plank in a shipyard. Although a large body of men searched all day, none were seen, as they had kept straight on, travelling west.

Although my father, being a fur-buyer, would have been likely to have learned if there had been other migrations, we heard of none till about thirty years ago, when an old hunting friend of mine, Mr. Henry Clapp, who is quoted in the article on bears in Cassino's "Standard Natural History," told me on his return from a hunt that he set out his traps in the fall, but found few bears, till on going out one morning in November, after it had snowed the night before, it looked as if the country was full of bears. He counted the tracks of nine different bears, all going up one narrow valley. They kept coming for some days, all travelling from east to west, and not making any stop till it came time to den. He had his traps out very early the next spring, but as soon as those near by came out of the dens they at once resumed their march westward. Others followed from the east for a few days, and then there were no bears left in the county. If in either case any of these bears ever returned, it was in such scattered parties that no one was ever aware of it. Although I have bought bear skins by the thousand, and have always inquired of all the hunters, I have never known of any general migration since, although bears, like other animals, often move over small spaces of country in search of food. In both of these cases lack of food did not seem to be the reason for moving.

Migrations of Other Animals.

When I was a small boy, or over fifty years ago, the caribou were often seen in droves of fifty or more on Chemo Bog, only some fourteen miles east of Bangor. In a few years they all left, and not a caribou was left in Maine. For a good many years not a single one was known to be taken. In the falls of 1857, '58 and '59 I spent months in travelling over a large part of northern Maine, but never saw a caribou track, nor heard of one being seen. I heard of a few caribou being taken in 1860 and '61, and in a few years they became quite plenty. When they migrated it was said that they went east. It is quite certain that those coming back in 1860 and '61 come either from the north or north-west.

Lynx were so abundant that several hundred skins were sold in this market every year till about the last of the war, when in a short time all had left, so that not a single skin was offered for several years. Then they returned in such numbers that within a few years after the first came I was buying some 200 yearly. Red squirrels also frequently emigrate from east to west. I once in September counted ten red squirrels in the course of half a day's paddling, which were either swimming or out on leaning maples, or just entering the water and which were all going west. I have also known foxes and rabbits, fisher and marten, almost entirely to leave a large tract of country in a very short time. In most or all of these cases there was no lack of food. I have known foxes in great numbers to appear suddenly. I once bought over 600, all taken within less than six months on a space less than ten miles by twenty. One farmer took sixty-five near his home. When the season closed they were said to be as plentiful as ever.

In the same way some kinds of birds, notably owls, will all at once leave a large extent of country as if by a preconcerted arrangement, and all go in one direction. Some years the snowy owls come down from the north in great numbers all along the line from Maine to Dakota. In other years the hawk owls come, and a few years ago we had a great flight of the great gray owls and a bird which had been so rare that previously I know of the record of but a single one ever being taken in Maine suddenly became abundant. The fact that the snowy and great gray owls, which feed on the same food, did not come in the same year, would indicate that food was not what they emigrated for, and in dissecting at least twenty snowy owls I found that all were in good condition. I have also known ruffed grouse and Canada grouse to migrate in large numbers, and as they subsist on entirely different kinds of food, and both can get all they need anywhere in the State, the lack of food certainly was not the cause of their coming.

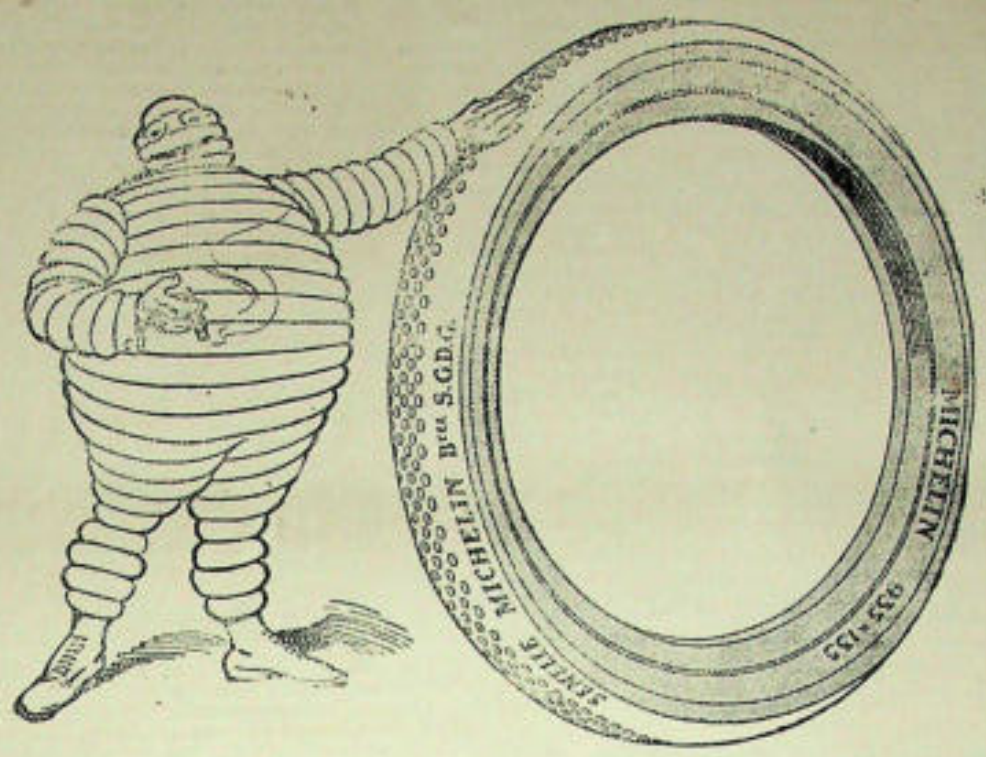
I could also cite numerous instances of fish and insects, like locusts, grasshoppers, ants, caterpillars and others, all moved by a common impulse, moving over great distances and all going in the same direction.

These facts prove that animals of all kinds do by some means communicate over immense distances, both of land and sea, and where there is no possibility that any individual can ever see others of its kind, or see any sign to indicate that such a movement was contemplated. This is not only the case in America, but in all other countries, of which the migrations of lemmings in Europe is a striking example.

Warnings of Danger.

But besides this there is a communicating to move to escape danger or to go to new breeding grounds. Dr. Livingstone, whom every one who has read his writing will acknowledge both a close and scientific observer, and whose statements are reliable, says of antelope: "Have they a guardian spirit over them? I have repeatedly observed when I approached a herd lying beyond an ant-hill with a tree on it, and viewed them with the greatest caution, they very soon showed symptoms of uneasiness. They did not sniff danger in the wind, for I was to the leeward of them, but the almost invariable apprehension of danger which arose, while unconscious of the direction in which it lay, made me wonder whether each had what the ancient physicians thought we all possessed—an archon, or presiding spirit." Those who have watched wild ducks much must have noticed the same thing. Whole flocks will begin to be uneasy and quit feeding when there is no chance to either see, hear or smell the danger.

There is positive proof that when a whale has been struck every whale within the range of a spy-glass will at once turn flukes being in some way notified of danger in a second's time over a great extent of water. I have often seen every porpoise in sight go down as if by one motion when one was killed, and all those which were under water when they rose only gave a single short, sharp puff instead of the three slow long puffs which they unusually give.



It is a matter of record that plover—and in some places ducks—when they have been shot at for years at points where they usually passed in their migrations, have changed their flight lines and made new paths through the air, which every flock followed. It is also well known that sperm whales, from being hunted, left their old grounds and sought new and remote places. Porgies also entirely left the Maine coast for years on account of being netted so persistently. Dr. Nansen tells us that on his voyage in a sealer to the south of Greenland the herds of seals all lay on the outer edge of the pack to escape the ice bears; but when he returned some years later to make his trip of exploration across Greenland, and was working his way in boats through the pack to land on the south end of Greenland, he found that the seals, from being hunted, had changed their grounds and were now on the inner edge of the pack, having concluded that the bears were less dangerous than men.

Now in all the cases cited these animals must have in some way communicated with others not only that there was danger to be avoided, but must have made each other understand the exact direction to be taken to avoid it.

If any one needs further proof that animals can communicate about meeting at a certain point at a long distance off which they have never seen, I will quote from A. Conan Doyle on page 464 of McClure's for March, 1897 (italics mine): "For breeding purposes the seals all come together at a variable spot, which is evidently pre-arranged among them, and as this place may be anywhere within many hundreds of miles of floating ice, it is no easy matter for the fisher to find it. The means by which he sets about it are simple, but ingenious. As the ship makes its way through the loose ice streams, a school of seals is observed travelling through the water. Their direction is carefully taken by compass, and marked on the chart. An hour afterward perhaps another school is seen. This also is marked. When these bearings have been taken several times, the various lines upon the chart are prolonged until they intersect. At this point, or near it, it is likely that the main pack of the seals will be found."

Now here is what seems to be positive proof of great numbers of animals, scattered over vast expanses, all being moved to meet at a certain well-understood point, which very few if any of them have ever seen. As it is an impossibility that any one of this vast multitude could a year beforehand have been notified by any "walking delegate" of the time and place of meeting, and certainly there can be no landmarks or "sign posts" in all this wilderness of moving ice to guide those coming from different directions to a given point, the only other reasonable explanation seems to be that in some way they are influenced by some kind of mental telegraphy to which our nearest approach at present is telegraphing without a wire. If there is such an influence exerted in any way, then another mystery is as to whence it proceeds. Solomon says: "The locusts have no king, yet they go forth in bands." All these various kinds of animal life seem to have no leaders, but they all move at once in one direction as if acting under the influence of one mind. I have stated the simple facts and leave it for others to theorize.

Motoring.

MOTORING MEMS.

London, Friday, 20th September 1912.

People who read newspapers and the lurid accounts of motor accidents which are printed in them are led to believe that all motorists are alike in their wild desire for speed. The sensational portion of the daily Press picks upon a motor accident with avidity on which to let loose its imagination, and the general public eagerly assimilates the harrowing details. The thought naturally grows up in their minds that motorists are an inconsiderate and reckless body, with little care for themselves or other people. How fallacious is this idea would be learnt were the general public more in the habit of traversing our country roads and watching the behaviour of motorists. Anything approaching dangerous driving is a rarity, as can be readily appreciated by the small percentage of accidents which occur. There is no more bitter opponent of inconsiderate driving than the motorist himself, and nobody wishes more to see this happily small class of driver removed from our roads. The average motorist knows too well that a single case of dangerous driving is inflicted upon the majority, and even from his own point of view he desires this class of driver to be suppressed.

There are probably few motorists who can aver that they have never forgotten to disengage the gear when stopping a car and switching off the engine, and many have been the accidents that have been reported as resulting from the starting of the engine whilst the gear is engaged. It is so easy to overlook the gear disengagement and so difficult to suggest a remedy that probably we shall, from time to time, continue to hear of mishaps such as that which befel Commander Tyndale Biscoe, R.N., at Portsmouth, the other day. The car started and pinned the officer against a wall, breaking his leg, but matters might conceivably have been much worse. At one time the fact that the supplementary ignition for starting purposes was falling into disuse suggested that the risk would gradually diminish, but the magneto has been improved to such an extent that it gives an efficient spark at such low revolutions that we cannot now rely, as we used to, for a safeguard upon the inefficiency of the magneto at the slow speed at which it turns when the crankshaft is rotated by hand. It therefore behoves every driver to take the precaution of looking at the position of his gear lever before starting his engine, whilst if he has an engine that is prone to stopping with a charge under compression and a magneto so efficient that a touch to the starting handle will start his engine, he should, as a further safeguard, fit up some connection that would cause a red disc to show near the starting handle when the gear is engaged. Something that is automatic in its action is wanted, because of the proneness of the human element to fault, otherwise the application of the side brake, whenever a car is stopped, should be enough. Of course, in time, the universal adoption of the self-starter will abolish the starting handle entirely, and there is already on the British market a famous American make of car which presents a handleless front to the world.

There are few motorists who have not at one period or another experienced the difficulty of selling a car which is a few years old, and, even if a purchaser can be found, the price usually obtainable is such that it is hardly worth accepting. The reasons for this are not far to seek. Many motorists on purchasing a car run it until it is hopelessly out of date and in a bad state of repair. It then occurs to them that it is about time to sell and purchase a more up-to-date one in preference to spending the large sum of money which would be necessary to renovate the old car. They probably advertise the vehicle, but when prospective purchasers come along and inspect it they are not favourably impressed, its old-fashioned appearance being sufficient to put them off. Motorists find that whilst they themselves become attached to a car and are content to keep plodding along on a seven-year-old, purchasers are not so keen. The impression forced upon us is that motorists would do far better if they were to sell out before their cars have reached the sere and yellow stage, as only by doing this can a fair price be obtained with which to help buy the new car.

WHILST on this subject it is as well to say a few words on the necessity of always carefully looking after a car. It has truly been said that appearance is everything, and a motorist usually stands a poor chance of selling a car if its exterior is in a bad condition, even though the mechanism is still good. Purchasers naturally argue that if the outside shows neglect the mechanism will be even more neglected. At all times during a car's working life endeavours should be made to keep every part effective and retain the exterior appearance. A bent and damaged mudguard, a crushed lamp, a small and unimportant fitting which has become fractured and not replaced, are all fraught with suspicion in the would-be purchaser's mind, and detract more than their face value from the car's price. If the motorist makes a point of immediately replacing anything that goes wrong, he will not only make the car look complete and effective, but it will have a considerably enhanced value over that which would be obtained if the car shows signs of neglect. There is a large market for second-hand cars and one that is steadily growing, but present-day buyers are so au fait with what constitutes a well-kept car that to secure a purchaser the vehicle must show signs of having been carefully handled during its lifetime.

The Story Teller.

HAFZAN'S LOVER.

JEAN CAREW had been see-see shooting, and after a modest lunch, was taking it easy in a grove until such time as the sun should be lower and the air cooler.

Jean's father had been in the Indian Civil Service, and had left a comfortable fortune to his only son.

Young Carew's French mother, as well as his father, had died some years before.

From this mother, who had been a girl from the Midi, Jean had inherited an impulsive romantic nature, which seemed at strange variance with his six feet of sturdy Devonshire body, and fair sunburnt face.

He had spent much of his boyhood in the Punjab, and the dialect he had learnt as a child had never been forgotten.

Neither had he forgotten the arid charms of this Northern Province, with its distant background of blue hills, and the glamour of the East had called to him in manhood with a voice that was not to be denied.

Here at last he was back again in the old familiar Punjab, among the old familiar people, and he had found no disappointment in the realization of his dreams.

The ordinary Englishman would, after tiffin in this pleasant bagh, have found himself a comfortable seat and settled down to a pipe.

Jean was however, as has been indicated, not at all an ordinary Englishman, so he produced a guitar, and sitting in the shade of a great fort like building in the centre of the grove, began to sing to his own accompaniment.

His servant and the coolies who had been acting as beaters drew near fascinated, while Carew in a mellow well-trained voice sung a well known little Punjab melody to a setting of his own.

He rendered the somewhat pessimistic words in the vernacular. Their resigned philosophy appeals strongly to the people, and the song is a favourite in the North.
Rendered into English the lines run:—

In the garden not for long,
Shall we hear the Bul-bul's song;
And the roses in the garden,
They will not blossom long.
Not for long in peace and joy,
Shall the King his throne enjoy;
And friend with friend shall be,
Not for long.

The plaintive air to which Jean had set the verses suited the sentimnt well.

Now it happened that the fort like building was the residence of one Dariya Khan, a local chieftain and landowner.

Dariya Khan had a daughter Hafzan, whose rooms were exactly above where Jean was sitting.

Attracted by the pleasant voice, the girl peeped out, and discovered to her astonishment that the singer was a handsome young Sahib, with fair curly hair and blue eyes.

The sad little song found a responsive echo in the girl's heart.

"He sings truly," she said to herself "to-morrow this Bul-bul will no longer be singing in the garden, and never again shall I hear his voice or see him."

The song having ceased, servant and coolies had moved away to another part of the bagh, and the young Englishman was by himself.

A sudden impulse seized Hafzan to make one small effort to bring the Bul-bul back.

From a necklace round her throat she took eleven beads and wrapped them in a morsel of tinsel; then she attached the tiny packet to the stalk of a rose taken from a bowl on a table, and pulling open the casement a little, she threw out the flower.

The aim was good, and the rose fell right on to the guitar lying across Jean's knees.

He looked up quickly, and was in time to catch a glimpse of a little hand and slender arm, and even the gleam of a pair of dark eyes above. He kissed the rose, and found the bit of twisted tinsel at once, for was he not half a Frenchman.

Counting the beads, he guessed their message instantly, and looked up again for confirmation from the sender. But a fit of shyness had overcome Hafzan on seeing the success of her sudden daring, and a blank closed casement met Jean's expectant eyes.

He had no doubt however, that he was still watched through the slats of the venetian, so he kissed the rose again, and nodded his head emphatically.

Carew's afternoon shoot was much less interesting to him than usual, for his mind was occupied with the coming adventure.

His bungalow was some half a dozen miles off, and he gave up the see-see and made for home earlier than usual.

Meanwhile Hafzan was pondering with considerable trepidation on the probable outcome of her sudden impulse.

She came however, of a fearless stock, and had no thought of drawing back.

Being a warm-hearted little soul, she determined that at all events no harm should come to the young Englishman, if he came that night to meet her.

If she were caught in an escapade of the kind, the worst she was likely to suffer was a sound beating. If on the other hand a man were caught in her rooms she knew her father would have him killed without mercy. Under these circumstances, like the brave child she was, she decided to get down and meet the Englishman in the bagh, so that he at all events would be able to get away.

In a closet were some spare punkah ropes, and she took an early opportunity to tie knots in one of them at short distances apart. The window was only fourteen or fifteen feet from the ground, and she knew she would have little difficulty in getting up and down.

Besides this there was Gulabi, Hafzan's own particular hand-maiden. Gulabi worshipped her little mistress, and was to be completely trusted. They had discussed together many a time Dariya Khan's intentions regarding his daughter's future. Though her father had told her nothing definitely, Hafzan had learnt through Gulabi that plans were forming for an alliance with Adher Mahomed, a middle-aged man singularly devoid of personal beauty.

Gulabi had openly lamented that she knew of no handsome young chief in the vicinity, with whom she could engineer a love affair for her mistress.

Hafzan therefore determined to make her maid an ally, and so told her the whole story. Gulabi was simply delighted. She said that there would not be the least danger, as she would keep guard, and being an excellent mimic, would if necessary imitate her mistress' voice behind the closed door. She would also help Hafzan up, and would take up the rope while the meeting was taking place in the bagh, so that there might be no chance of anyone seeing it hanging from the window.

The moon did not rise until half past eleven, so Jean cantered out in the starlight, and hiding his pony in a thicket, made his way cautiously towards the window a few minutes before eleven.

Just as he was passing under the dense foliage of a mangoe, a hand touched him timidly, and he became aware of a slight and scarcely visible figure.

He turned impulsively, and taking hold of the girl's arm drew gently outside the black shadow of the tree.

"Art thou the lady who threw me the rose?" He asked.

"Yes." Whispered Hafzan.

"Wilt thou not let me see thy face?" For grey muslin shrouded the girl from head to foot, and all Jean could see was that she was very small and slight.

"Alas I have been over bold, but it was so dull up there, and I heard thee sing."

She did not however, resist Jean, when he very gently drew the veil from her head.

Even in the dim starshine, Carew was astounded at the exquisite beauty of the little face. For a long moment he could do nothing but devour her with his eyes.

"Ah how sweet thou art. What is thy name Princess?"

Perhaps no words could have pleased little Hafzan better. She was childishly proud of the line of fierce chieftains from whom she was descended, and loved to think of herself as a princess.

"I am Hafzan, daughter of Dariya Khan, Chieftain of Hazro,"

She answered a little proudly.

Jean dropped on one knee, and kissed the hand he held.

"And I from henceforth, am thy devoted lover and servant Jean Carew."

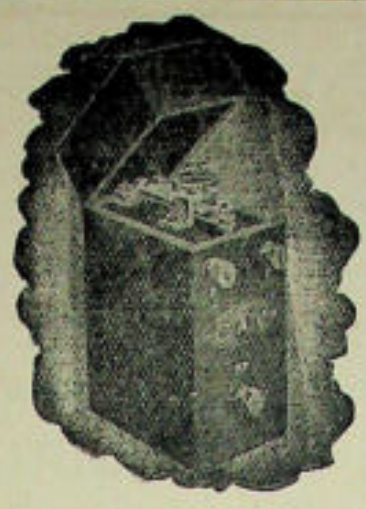
And now, as he stood again and studied the girl closely, with eyes accustomed to the dim light, Jean's heart smote him, for Hafzan seemed so tiny and slight, and such a complete child, for a big man like himself to be meeting clandestinely.

"Alas Hafzan" he said at last "How can I talk to thee as a woman? Surely thou art yet, though so beautiful, but a child."

"I am not a child," she answered shortly, with a stamp of her little foot. "Knowest thou that I am just fifteen, and there is talk of marrying me to Adher Mahomed?"

Then Jean drew Hafzan to sit beside him on a fallen tree, and soon she was prattling artlessly to him of her secluded life, and how Gulabi watched for them, and would help her back into her window.

And now the beams of the rising moon began to penetrate into the bagh, Hafzan jumped to her feet.



"I must return," she said. "Soon the moon will make the garden as light as in the day."

In the increased light, Jean could see the charming face more clearly.

"And if I say good-bye now, when wilt thou meet me again?"

"If thou canst come the day after to-morrow, at the same hour, it will be safe, for my father will be away that night."

"And wilt thou not kiss me, before we part, sweet Hafzan?"

"Ah that I cannot do—I know thee but little,"

"It is not that Hafzan." Jean answered mockingly. "The real reason is that thou art little more than a baby, and therefore dost not know properly how women ought to kiss."

"Know I not?" cried Hafzan impulsively, and suddenly Jean felt two slim arms round his neck, and the sweetest lips in the World trembling on his own.

The kiss given, Hafzan slipped away through the bagh like an antelope, and anxious that she should run no risk of discovery, Carew stole off in the opposite direction, to where he had left his pony, and soon was cantering homewards.

The long hours intervening between their first and second meeting acted as fuel to the hearts of man and girl.

To Hafzan everything connected with the adventure was utterly new and strange. Most of all was she astonished at herself. This new Hafzan stirred by the dawn of love, was pondered over by the troubled little brain. A personality seemed to have invaded her being with impulses and actions beyond control. Most of all, in hot shame, Hafzan wondered how she could have given that kiss, and such a kiss too.

The more however, she thought about the kiss, the more the delicious joy of it swamped the shame of having given it.

Now too this little Punjab girl had thought, which it was impossible to confide to Gulabi.

That shrewd maiden was immensely interested in her mistress' deportment after the fateful meeting. After trying in vain to get Hafzan to confide in her, while noting the while the new and repressed feelings which marked the change from child to woman, she at last summed up her conclusions in one short sentence.

"Wah! Thou art sicklily in love. And so suddenly too."

Jean Carew, though he had dallied with girls both in France and England, had never seen anyone before who had appealed to his nature like this sweet Indian flower. How she differed from the Society girls he had met! Everything she said or did, belonged to her as it were. Her sweet impulsive heart was her only guide. Nothing had been acquired and learnt in dealings with other men.

Then the exquisite beauty of the high-bred little face. It was beauty of a quality quite different to any that he had met with before.

That meeting with Hafzan in the garden made him think of Sheherazade and the Arabian Nights. She was an Eastern princess out of a fairy-tale, and by Heaven, she should be his Princess if she could win her, and save her from Adher Mahomed.

Hafzan had made all sorts of resolutions to be more discreet when she met Jean the second time.

But the new Hafzan possessed her again, when she stole into the gloom of the mangoe, and Jean caught her hand with a glad cry.

In a moment she was in his arms, and was returning his passionate kisses with an abandon equal to his own.

Carew then picked up the slight figure bodily, and carried Hafzan to their old seat on the fallen tree.

There artlessly she told him how ashamed she had felt of being so forward at their first meeting, and how she had resolved not to let Jean kiss her till just when they were parting.

"But when I felt thy hand clasp mine, it was as though I were carried by a whirlwind. Truly I am a most immodest girl. And I have never even spoken to any man before. There must be some devil of badness within me."

Gently Jean set to work to reassure the girl.

"Thou hast given me, my sweet Princess, the greatest of all gifts that woman hath to bestow. And I, darling Hafzan, will wear the precious jewel of thy love in my heart for ever. And this I swear solemnly that never will I love any woman but thee, and never will I marry any but my Princess Hafzan."

The girl of the East, when she loves, loves with a fire and abandon which are unknown among our Western Womanhood.

Hafzan's passion for Carew became her whole life.

Jean determined that he would lose no time in carrying her off.

His idea was to take her away and marry her by the rites of his own Church, and then the marriage being accomplished, he would bring Hafzan boldly back, and ask her father to have a Mahomedan marriage as well.

Their plans were soon made, for with money it is easy to accomplish most things.

One night, Jean met Hafzan as usual in the bagh, but Gulabi accompanied her mistress, and in the thicket were a pony, and a powerful Arab horse. Gulabi had mounted the pony, and Jean was just lifting Hafzan on to the big grey Arab "Saood," when a Punjabi lad came running through the bagh, and cannoned right into them. The boy gave one terrified glance at the little party, and then bolted for the house as hard as he could go.

Jean lost no time in getting up in front of Hafzan, who linked her arms round him. Then they made for the bungalow at a fast canter. They had not gone far before the sound of thudding hoofs was heard in their rear.

Jean however, by this time knew the cross country route to his bungalow so well, that their pursuers had no chance, and they arrived well ahead of Dariya Khan's horsemen.

There was no time to be lost, but Carew was not anxious, for the sixty miles to be covered now were over good roads, and his car was all ready to start.

He wrapped Hafzan tenderly in a great fur-lined coat, in which she was quite lost, and made Gulabi roll herself up in a rug.

The big acetolyne lamps were burning like search lights as Jean drove the car slowly on to the high road. Then he put on speed, and suddenly ahead appeared a dark clump of horsemen.

For a short instant they seemed to be in the midst of plunging snorting horses. Savage oaths rang out, and a couple of futile pistols cracked, and then it was all left far behind.

The lamps showed the long white ribbon of the trunk road between its rows of trees. The car hummed through the night. Jean had won his Princess.

As they swept thus swiftly through the night, a slim hand came from the big fur coat to rest on Jean's knee, for his hands were occupied with the wheel.

The arrival at the City, and the marriage by special license in the Cantonment Church, passed like a hurried dream, and then they were speeding away in the train for Kathgodam, en route for Bhim Tal. The continued excitement and fatigue had by this time worn little Hafzan out. As the train left the station, Jean made her lie down on the bed which had been prepared ready for her. As he drew a rug over her and bent down to bid her good-night, she fell asleep with his kiss on her lips, like the tired out child she was.

Being however, a hardy Punjabi girl, the night's sleep, albeit in a jolting train, restored all her vitality. When Gulabi brought the early cups of coffee, deftly prepared by that invaluable servant Mohammed Din, Hafzan was chattering gaily to Jean, and asking countless questions about this, that and the other.

At Kathgodam ponies were waiting for them, and they rode up the hill in the fresh morning air to the bungalow overlooking Sath Tal, which Jean had engaged.

The days which followed were one long idyll.

Jean found that his little bride, in addition to a brave warm heart, possessed a sharp wit, and keen intelligence.

Hafzan was proud too, and could carry matters with a high hand, when she thought it necessary.

Jean was much amused over the autocratic way she ruled the servants. Just at first they had been inclined to question the authority of this Punjab child. Jean did not see how the subjection of his following was accomplished, but in a very short time he found that she was a little queen in the eyes of the servants, and that her slightest wish was law.

Her haughty little ways were his pride and delight, and he thought grimly that if any of the English women they would meet later on should try to patronize his Native wife, that they were likely to experience a surprise.

Another thing which Carew was most thankful for, was Hafzan's perfect constitution. Slight and small though she was, in the fresh air of the hills, Hafzan soon proved herself as untiring as a boy. She could ride all day, and though not good at walking in the beginning, improved so rapidly that soon she proved herself quite an excellent mountaineer.

While at Bhim Tal, Jean wrote to Dariya Khan, and told him the whole story frankly. How he had run off with Hafzan, as owing to the matrimonial negociations with Adher Mahommed, there appeared to be no other way. That Hafzan was now his honoured wife, by the rites of the English Church, but that it would give both of them much pleasure if they could return to Hazro, and have a Mahomedan celebration in addition.

Jean added that he was a rich man, and that Hafzan would always be able to live in the luxury that her rank entitled her to.

It was a tactful composition, and by the same post there went a happy little scrawl in poetic Persian from Hafzan herself.

Eventually a very dignified and cold reply came from Dariya Khan, in which he regretted the unseemly elopement of his daughter with Carew Sahib, but seeing that the matter was accomplished, he bowed his head to fate, and was willing to receive them.

Cold as the answer was, it filled Hafzan with triumph and pleasure. "I know my father, Jean, he always means more than he sayeth. Believe me, he will welcome us right well. I am so happy to go back among my people openly, and in honour, as thy wife."

"Kiss me Jean many times on the lips. This is indeed a day of joy to me."

"Ah Hafzan, thou hast become bold indeed to ask shamelessly for kisses on the mouth, in broad daylight."

Jean was in a long arm-chair on the verandah, and in one lythe graceful movement, Hafzan was on his knee, with a slender arm round his neck to get her kisses.

"All that is quite true." She said coolly "But you see I am becoming what you call Rapidly Educated."

Jean determined that nothing should be lacking to make their arrival at Hazro a success.

A Colonel of Indian Lancers, whose regiment was quartered in the Hazro district, happened to be a great friend of Carew's.

He explained the whole situation, and the Colonel promised that there should be an imposing escort from his regiment to see the newly married couple into Dariya Khan's village.

Then Jean borrowed a handsome four wheeled phaeton from another pal, and got hold of four beautiful bay ponies to drive in it.

The team were carefully worked together, till they went perfectly. Then on the fateful day, four-in-hand and lancers met them at the nearest station to Hazro, and they proceeded to Hafzan's home in almost Royal State.

The whole village had turned out to meet them, and the sight of the brilliant escort of Lancers, and the beautiful carriage with its handsome ponies and flashing harness, created great applause.

"Truly Dariya Khan's daughter hath married a very great Sahib."

Hafzan looked a vision of loveliness, in brilliant silks and muslins, with neck and arms flashing with jewels.

No veil was over her face now, and she held her haughty little head erect, and gazed fearlessly at her father's motley crowd of retainers, none of whom had ever seen her face before.

A subdued murmur of admiration for her beauty broke from a hundred fierce throats.

Dariya Khan stood outside his house in state, and received them. He looked very grim indeed, until Hafzan springing lightly from the carriage, before Jean could help her, ran swiftly up to her father, and bending gracefully before him, took his hand in both her own, and kissed it.

Then for the first time a smile began to break the grim lines of the Chief's face.

He turned to look steadily at Jean, who had come up with hand half outstretched but a little nervous as to his reception.

Dariya Khan looked Carew up and down for some moments, and at last he gazed steadily and enquiringly into Jean's blue eyes.

They were eyes of such straight forward frankness, and with such a merry glint lurking in their depths, that to gaze into them was fatal to anger. Dariya Khan's smile broadened, and he held out his hand heartily "By Allah, this has been a mad prank of thine Hafzan; but at all events thou hast married a Man."

"JADU."

"WHAT can I use to clean carpets?" asked a correspondent, signing her name very bashfully. "Young Bride."

"Have you tried your husband?" replied the answers editor.

"NEVER hurry, never worry,
Never fret or fume,
And if the devil shows his face,
Just bid him leave the room."
—The Onlooker.

"PA, what's an inscrutable smile?" "It's the kind, my son, your mother had on her face this morning when I told her business might keep me out late to-night."

THE ORIGIN OF PEARLS.

A FEW years ago an English naturalist—Professor Herdman—was sent out to Ceylon for the purpose of reporting on the pearl-fishery and pearl-banks of the island and the possibility of increasing the output of pearls. On his return, the world was informed, with a great flourish of trumpets, that the origin of five pearls had been discovered; each of these precious gems being formed round the larva of a liver-fluke or cestode worm, which had made its way between the valves of the oyster, and which the mollusc took this summary and effectual means of rendering harmless.

Ever since that date we have accepted the cestode theory and considered the matter of the origin of pearls as definitely and finally settled. At least those of us who take an interest in such matters have done so; for it is probable that the man in the street, or, as, we should rather say, the lady in the ball-room, does not care a brass farthing how pearls are made, so long as she gets hold of them.

But naturalists have a nasty way of refusing in many instances to accept the verdicts of their fellows as final; and this incredulous disposition has recently been displayed in regard to the natural method of pearl-making. For at a meeting of the Zoological Society of London, held on 20th February of the present year, Dr. Lyster Jameson expressed the opinion that the evidence in support of Professor Herdman's theory is altogether insufficient, and that the only drawings in his report exhibiting supposed worms in the heart of pearls are capable of an entirely different interpretation. He stated, moreover, that he could not find in any of the pearls of which sections had been made by the learned professor, some twenty-five or more in number, a single case in which a cestode larva formed the core. This opinion, he added, was backed by the examination of between 300 and 400 pearls, coming for the most part from Ceylon, but including samples from the Persian Gulf, the Gulf of Kutch, the Mediterranean, Madagascar and New Caledonia, not one of which, on being dissolved in acid, showed any trace of the larva of a cestode or kindred worm.

On the contrary, the centre of such a pearl, in cases where it consisted of matter other than mother-of-pearl or other normal constituent of the shell of the parent oyster, was nearly always composed of an abnormal kind of shell-substance, analogous to that secreted by the oyster to repair injuries to its shell, which, on account of its opacity, might easily be mistaken for a foreign body.

These repairing substances are sometimes found in association with granular matter, of which the origin is obscure, although there is no apparent reason for regarding them as derived from cestode larvæ, although it is just possible that they may be parasitic in their nature.

When cestode larvæ were present in pearl oysters Dr. Jameson regarded them as representing a diseased condition quite independent of that which gave rise to pearl production.

At the conclusion of his communication Dr. Jameson stated that his observations on the real cause and mechanism which led to the production of pearls in the Ceylon pearl oyster were not yet in a sufficiently advanced state to admit of publication; but he nevertheless maintained that the cause would have to be sought, not in the cases of the pearls themselves, but rather in the pathological conditions under which the tissues of the mollusc produce the membranous bag in which the pearl is formed. Now all this, although we are really not much concerned in what manner pearls really are formed or which of the two disputants is right and which wrong, is really very disturbing, as it tends to discredit scientific opinions and theories generally. It is, indeed, much to be deplored that theories on such matters should be published at all unless they are based on what is practically indisputable fact.

The general public cannot, of course, discriminate between what is good and what is bad science, but when they find that a theory which has been held as settling the question of the origin of pearls is suddenly disputed by a competent naturalist, they are naturally led to ask themselves whether the same sort of thing may not happen in other cases, and whether all that they have been told as to the connection between malaria and mosquitoes and between sleeping sickness and tsetse flies is solid fact.

The moral of all this is that in matters of real public interest naturalists should not speak, much less prophesy, until they know.

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

In the course of a short article upon cotton-gambling and the impending legislation upon this and other forms of gambling, including horse-racing our contemporary the Statesman wrote in its issue of the 11th current:—"Many people have thought that in view of the extent of the evil the Government of Bengal were singularly apathetic and inactive, but we now learn that a Bill to prevent gambling has been in preparation for some time and is now practically ready for submission to the Government of India and the Secretary of State.

"Full details as to the scope of the measure are not yet to hand, but it is, a Statesman representative was informed yesterday, to be a very comprehensive one. It will stop not only cotton-gambling but gambling on horse-racing, on rain, on the opium sale and on any other chance or game that the wit of the astute Marwari can invent to take money from the pockets of the people. Big betting establishments, doing business on horse-racing in England and at the Indian meetings, have sprung up recently in Calcutta both in the European and native quarters, and the Bill, the writer was informed, aims at the suppression of these. The only kind of gambling which is to be permitted is on the Calcutta race-course on race days."

This though in substance perfectly correct is not so in some matters of detail. The subject as our contemporary very justly remarks is a very wide one and legislating upon it is not a matter to be undertaken hastily or without due consideration. The Government of Bengal have not, so far as our information goes, had any opportunity up to the present time of considering how to successfully deal with cotton-gambling and the other betting establishments and there is no Act at present either on the anvil or in the statute book enabling the authorities in this behalf. It is, however, very probable that there will be some Act upon the lines of the Street Betting Act (1906) at Home. The "cotton-gambling" in Calcutta has been held to be "betting" pure and simple, and the cotton "book-makers" who were prosecuted and convicted in the Police Court got off on appeal, because betting—street or course betting—is not at present illegal in India under any existing enactment. What will probably happen now will be that cotton-gambling will be dealt with at once by some short Act and that the far wider question of re-casting the Gambling Act will be subsequently considered. It is too wide a subject to be tackled in a hurry and we regard it as extremely improbable that it will be done in a hurry. It is, however, certain that sooner or later we shall have some Act very closely resembling, even if it is not on identical lines with, the Street Betting Act 1906 in England.

By that Act it is laid down that "any person frequenting or loitering in streets or public places on behalf either of himself or of any other person for the purpose of book-making or betting or wagering or agreeing to bet or wager or paying or receiving or settling bets" shall be liable to a maximum fine of £10; for a second offence to a fine not exceeding £20 and for a third or subsequent offence on conviction to a fine of £50 or six months' imprisonment or on summary conviction to a fine of £30 or three months' imprisonment. The penalties incurred by a third offence are also incurred whenever a book-maker has any betting transaction in a public place with a person under 16 years of age. A constable is authorised under this Act to take into custody without warrant, any person found committing an offence under this Act. Under the Licensing Act 1872 (England) if any licensed person (1) suffers any gaming or any unlawful game to be carried on on his premises, or (2) opens, keeps or uses or suffers his house to be opened, kept or used in contravention of the Betting Act of 1853 he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £10 for the first offence and £20 for any subsequent offence. The expression "gaming" means the playing at any game for money or money's worth. Therefore a licensed person may strictly under the law as it is at Home, be convicted for allowing his own private friends to play cards for money on his licensed premises. Even the playing of dominoes for money or of skittles or "shove halfpenny" for beer is equally illegal. An "unlawful" game is one that has been declared by statute to be unlawful. At Common Law no game is in itself unlawful. The unlawful games now are at Home, "Ace of Hearts, Pharoah, Basset, Hazard, Passage, Roulette," every game of dice excepting back-gammon, and every game of cards which is not a game of mere skill, and in fact all other games of mere chance of which baccarat has been held to be one. The English Betting Act 1853 forbids that any house, office, room, shall be opened, kept or used for the purpose of any person betting with other persons resorting thereto. It forbids the exhibiting or publishing of any placard or hand-bill or advertisement announcing that any house, office, room, or other "place" is opened, kept or used for the purpose of making bets or wagers; and it also forbids any person on behalf of the owner of any such place inviting other persons to resort thereto for the purpose of making bets or wagers. There never has yet been an Act of the Legislature, however, through which it has not been possible to drive a coach and horses, and as everyone knows a good many persons have at various times managed to defy all these English Acts and are still continuing to do so, and though the so-called "clubs" and street betting shops have to a great extent been suppressed and wiped out, there are any number of persons driving an enormous trade in what are known as the S. P. establishments, and they will and they can apparently continue to do so in spite of all these voluminous Acts that they shall not! It is easy therefore to believe that the Provincial or the Imperial Government would not tackle a thing like this without putting their thinking caps on for a very considerable period. Race-course betting and S.P. betting are not likely to be touched, but it is certain or practically so, that all other forms of betting will be wiped out at one fell swoop when and if India gets a new Act.

In common with our contemporaries we deeply regret to have to record a fatal riding accident which occurred on Friday last on the Ballygunge Maidan to Mrs. T. H. Westmacott, the wife of the well-known Calcutta solicitor. Mrs. Westmacott, who was a beginner and had not ever ridden in the Calcutta Paperchases or anywhere else excepting in a riding school, was out on a very quiet hack, the property of Mr. W. K. Dods, a cob that Mrs. Dods had very often ridden, and the rider's hat coming off startled the cob and he broke into a hard canter. Even the quietest horse living will at times take fright and lose his head when he has an inexperienced rider on his back and this is what happened in the present case with the result that the rider's head came into collision with a tree when she was killed on the spot. The mare Mrs. Westmacott was riding was not, as has been stated in accounts of this accident, a "spirited" one but, on the contrary, a particularly quiet and well-behaved one and it was the sheer bad luck of circumstances that something should have upset her and caused her to bolt. The greatest sympathy is felt for Mr. Westmacott, who was a witness of the accident, and an additional note of tragedy is struck in connection with this lamentable affair because it was upon the first anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. Westmacott's wedding day that it occurred.

The Australian papers do not believe that R. Wootton will carry his threat of selling all his horses and shaking the dust of old England off his feet into execution, though they say that he is coming out to Australia for the summer. Wootton, it will be remembered, made a direct accusation against the authorities at home and said that the Stewards of the various meetings were out "gaming" for him and his jockeys, particularly the two young Wootons. This was after Frank Wootton had been put down over Sunspot in the Liverpool Summer Cup and also in the Atlantic Stakes. The Australasian recalls the fact that the "Tinman" was himself always deserving of getting stood down for foul riding and that with him it was "win at all hazards when his money is down." Our contemporary writes:—"Archer backed his mounts heavily, and would stop at nothing to get them home. He was so popular that local stewards did not care to interfere with him, but he came to grief at the hands of the Jockey Club stewards at Goodwood a few months before his death. He was riding a two-year-old called Florentine, in the Prince of Wales' Stakes, and there was a great plunge on his mount, who started at 11 to 10. Archer got Florentine home a neck in front of Timothy, but the stewards disqualified him for boring, and Timothy got the race. Naturally there was a hubbub over the Jockey Club having the audacity to interfere with the popular racing idol of the day, but it passed off, and the soreness over the action of local stewards reporting R. Wootton's jockeys to headquarters is likely to pass off without R. Wootton selling off his horses and joining J. E. Brewer on their station in Australia. Wootton will no doubt visit Australia at the end of the English racing year, but he is now quite a leading trainer in England, and too fond of the excitement of racing to give it up on account of the suspension of two sons, who cannot, through increasing weight, remain jockeys much longer." When Frank Wootton came out to India, the Secretary of the Calcutta Turf Club took a positively avuncular interest in him and even went so far as to caution all the other jockeys not to interfere with him or knock him about! Poor lamb! It was, however, as Neil Angus McTod would say "humorous, varra humorous!"

Mr. Galstaun is, we hear, still the owner of Brogue, but has leased the mare to Lady Jenkins in whose colours she will, we understand, run during the coming cold weather.

Whalley is not coming out to India this season, but Arthur Templeman is coming and also A. Duller, who is the son of the trainer and who occasionally rides for Mr. Sievier.

There is nothing of local interest in Calcutta at the moment save the progress of the training track towards completion and we understand that the Clerk of the Course hopes to have this course ready towards the end of this month or early in November.

The next race meeting of any local interest is the Tollygunge Club Gymkhana on the 2nd November at which there are three flat races and two jumping competitions—one for horses and the other for ponies. It is said that the Stewards of these meetings intend to as much as possible make them of a purely "sport for fun" order, and as has already been announced bookmakers will no longer be permitted to ply their calling and only a five-rupee tote will be allowed. The gate, which has hitherto always been handsome, is likely to suffer, but this cannot in the circumstances be avoided.

Darjeeling opened the Poojah festivities on Saturday last with an extra day's racing. The fields were very poor indeed and the racing entirely uneventful and uninteresting. The weather was fortunately fine, but in spite of this there was a very poor attendance.

The Western India Turf Club have issued the following notice:—"Inquiry into running of certain horses trained by Byramjee Rustomjee. Decision of the Stewards.—The stewards have carefully considered all the evidence both as to the running of the horses and the riding of the jockeys. Taking into consideration the previous enquiry about the running of horses trained by Byramjee Rustomjee and the cautions that have been given him, the stewards are of opinion that the way Byramjee Rustomjee manages his stable is not in the best interests of the owners who train with him or of racing generally and they decide to revoke his permit to train or run horses on the Bombay or Poona courses for six months from 1st November 1912."

The Poona racing season was brought to a conclusion with the Eighth Extra Meeting last Saturday. A programme of eight events was put through and many an upset was served up.

Proceedings opened with a Selling Plate for horses, Lord Carlyon being most fancied in a field of five. He failed to place, however, and Lord Reay secured the verdict by a neck from Not Yet, with Boomey third.

The First Division of the Arab Pony Consolation Plate brought out a field of fourteen, Raspberry and Sweden finding most friends. Sinclair made all the running to the bend, where Raspberry and Sweden came through and the race seemed to lie between this couple in the straight. But nearing home Mubrook came out from nowhere and snatched a victory by a head on the post from Raspberry, Sweden a like distance away. The tote paid Rs. 294 on a win ticket.

The Innovation Steeplechase was the next item. Tokay showed the way the first part of the journey, but pecked badly on landing over the flight opposite the stands the second time round and dropped into the ruck. Redshot II. and Anarchist came away at the finish, the former winning by two lengths. Petty Officer and Jawge fell.

The October Plate—a mile for Arabs—found ten under starter's orders. Rozelmulook and Burgomaster brought them along in turn to the turn where Harry Johnson took command and won easily by two lengths from Rozelmulook, Burgomaster third. This is Harry Johnson's first win this season, though he has been out frequently.

The second Arab Pony Consolation Plate ended in a win for Sharar, another big upset. Mushtarak on his previous victory had a lot of supporters, but was nowhere and Sharar won very easily after a long series of unsuccessful efforts.

Seven came out in the Welter Plate for horses and Solution had most support, but Boomey, who was running for the second time during the afternoon, led from start to finish and beat the favourite a length and a half, with Forfeit third.

A baker's dozen faced the starter in the Matheran Plate, but Berar gave a lot of trouble, got rid of his jockey and eventually took no part in the race. Golden Ducat made all the running, but Solar Star came through at the finish, and Shirsab took third place. This was also an unexpected win.

The Karjat Plate rung down the curtain. Six started and Sinclair made the pace but gave place to Baloz. Harrison, however, pursued the leader all the way home and was only beaten a length, Hoyt having to ride Baloz out to win.

The racing at Poona this season has been most successful and Major J. Hughes and the executive committee are to be congratulated on the results of their hard work. Mr. J. Reynolds as handicapper, Lieutenant-Colonel Forbes as Judge, and Mr. A. O. Gorman as starter, have all carried out their duties with the very best results and the general arrangements could not have been improved upon. Although the totalisator has been better patronised at the later meetings it cannot be said that it is a popular innovation and punters would far rather have the Knights of the Pencil back once more. The form at a glance of the season will be found in the usual place and we append the statistics.

THE Bangalore Autumn Races fixed for the 24th and 26th instant promise well. With the exception of the Horse Steeplechase on the first day and the Ulsoor Plate on the second entries are good, and it is stated that Mr. Reynolds will probably be asked to do the handicapping.

THE Durand Football Tournament came to a conclusion at Simla on the 9th instant, when the Lancashire Fusiliers and the Royal Scots met in the final, the Royal Scots winning a fine game by a goal to nil. Details further on.

AFTER one pointless draw the final of Bombay Rovers' Tournament has been won by the Dorset Regiment, who beat the Royal Irish Regiment by a goal to nil.

THE postponed final of the Madras Rugby Football Tournament was replayed on Saturday, the 12th instant, when the Leicesters and the Madras Gymkhana took the field once more. A large gathering of spectators witnessed a splendid game. Half time arrived without score, but in the second period Madras got over with a try which they failed to convert. The Leicesters tried hard to score and several attempts were made to drop a goal—none of which were successful, and the Gymkhana thus won by 3 points to nil. The military team lost a man soon after the start, one of their forwards having to retire hurt, but the Gymkhana sportingly allowed a substitute to take the place of the injured man.

THE recent domestic tragedy in Jack Johnson's affairs has apparently not interfered with his contract with Mr. H. D. McIntosh, the well-known Australian boxing promoter. Johnson had signed up on the 2nd July last to box Sam Langford in Australia on the 26th December for a consideration of £6,000, and to box Sam McVea within a reasonable time afterwards for £3,000. His expenses were to be paid. Reuter wires that Johnson will leave for Australia on the 25th instant.

THE match between Matt Wells and Freddie Welsh for the English light-weight championship and the Lonsdale Belt is to take place shortly. Wells had a prior engagement with Jack Ward, which was fixed for Monday last, but we have had no news yet as to this result. The winner of the Wells-Welsh fight will probably be matched with the Australian Mehegan, who recently beat Wells on a foul. Needless to say the champion is very anxious to wipe out this defeat.

AL PALZER, one of the numerous American White Hopes, has decided to quit the ring—temporarily at least. His reason for this step is that he cannot reach an amicable agreement with his former manager Tom O'Rourke. Palzer intends to remain on his farm in Iowa until his agreement with O'Rourke expires, when he will come into the lime light once more.

PLAYING against Cook last week end H. W. Stevenson, the English Billiard Champion, made a break of 1,016, a record for an all-round break.

THE football competition for the William Younger Cup between teams representing Lower and Upper Burma was played off at Mandalay last week. Upper Burma won two matches and thus secured the trophy.

THE South African Rugby Football team now touring Great Britain continue their victorious career. On Saturday last they played Monmouthshire at Pontypool and beat them by 16 points to nil.

IN reply to a query re the record standing long jump a contemporary gives it as 11ft. 3ins. put up by Ray C. Ewry in America in 1900. This is not quite correct. Ray Ewry's record is 11ft. 6ins. made at New York on the 4th August 1906.

The match for the World's Sculling Championship was rowed between Putney and Mortlake on Monday last, the 14th instant, the title holder, Ernest Barry, defeating the Canadian challenger, Edward Durnan, by two lengths. Time 22mins. 31secs. The contest also included the English Championship, which Barry thus won for the third time in succession, thereby winning the Sportsman Cup outright. His two previous victories were over Albany and Fogwell. It was Arnst's desire to scull for the Sportsman Cup in the recent race, but Barry did not consent, and as Arnst's challenge was not in order his opponent was within his rights in declining to scull for the trophy.

Edward Durnan, of Toronto, though of considerable experience, had sculled few races of importance when in 1906 he went to Australia and was easily beaten by Geo. Towns for the World's Championship. Prior to that he had claimed a victory over Rogers of Saratoga for the American Championship, while since he has beaten Tom Sullivan, Bill Haines, and W. Hackell. He is 39 years of age, stands 5ft. 11ins., and weighs in condition 11st. 12lb. His sculling methods are unusual, as he appears to scull on the principle of having his blades in the water always and as the result he gets in 30 strokes a minute. No exception can be taken to his watermanship and he is a clean sculler, but there is little length in his stroke and no body swing at all, his position being almost upright when his blade reappears. Barry's record and attainments are well known. Besides his three victories in the English Championship, he has rowed three times for the World's Championship. Beaten in his first race against Arnst on the Zambesi in 1910 he turned the tables on the New Zealander last July and two and a half months later has successfully defended his title. Pierce and Webb are both anxious to meet him. The Sportsman Cup having been won outright the proprietors of that paper are replacing the cup with a new and similar trophy to be governed by the same conditions as those now in existence.

To a discussion as to whether running or rowing entails the harder training which has been going on in a London weekly, that well-known writer "Camisis" contributes the following remarks:—

"I quite agree that a severe training is the first condition of rowing races. With the single exception of running there is no sport which needs such careful preparation, perhaps. And, frankly, I have yet to learn that modern oarsmen are unduly slack in this important respect. The commandments obeyed by any class crew still include severe prohibitions in regard to eating and drinking. Beyond certain limits, they are expected to be practically whelmed in the waters of enjoyment which must never touch the lips. And—to their credit be it said—these commandments are cheerfully obeyed. The necessity for training is acknowledged by most wetbobs of to-day worth their salt. Whether they are equally careful re alternating periods of severe training with periods of undesirable indulgence is quite another matter. If not—well, they are burning the candle at both ends, and are likely to pay the penalty.

"Nor can I agree with the further contention that the majority of modern crews do far too much preliminary work of a harmful nature. My correspondent thinks the perpetual rowing of courses at Henley, for instance, does more harm than good. I admit that rowing a course is always a little trying—even for the most practised oarsman. But it is imperative to row over the course a certain number of times before the actual race; that is to say, row at racing pace, at full pressure, from start to finish, as distinguished from the 'paddling,' and the short bursts at high speed which form the staple of their preparatory work. With men in good training, one of these courses daily does very little harm, if any at all. As regards its effects, let me reproduce the words of a famous oarsman on the very point.

"After the first two minutes one feels as if an 'easy' were the one thing needful, and yet one knows there will be no 'easy' for at least five minutes more. Then one thinks what a fool one is to do this sort of thing when one might be comfortably strolling on the bank. The stress increases and one wishes one had never been born. About this time the cox puts on the rudder, perhaps, and the boat rolls, the men get short, and the coach on the bank shouts breathlessly. But no one heeds the coach at such a time. He is but as a gnat buzzing round a soul in torture. A few minutes and the boat is straight again. One reaches out again more freely. Somehow, one feels better now. Then along the straight wind and strength return, the pain of effort decreases, the boat is certainly travelling better. She does not roll now and out of the tail of one's eye one can see that stroke's oar dips into the water a good foot beyond the swirl of 'two's' blade. That is comforting. Perhaps the course will be a good one after all. One puts in one's best work now. One feels as if one could go on for ever, and the oars rip through the water with the noise-like the tearing of a linen sheet. Then comes the last effort. Only a few more. 'Let her have it!' 'Pick her up!' from the coach—the first words one has heard distinctly him, though he has been vociferating all the time. The stroke quickens, a last desperate effort, then 'easy all,' and a groan of relief from the crew as each man bends exhausted over his oar. A man out of training would suffer severely from such an effort as this, if he could make it at all, which would only be possible from an exceptionally strong man in perfect health. Even so, the reaction would leave him sick and ill for hours, if it did not permanently injure him. But with men in training it is different. These, indeed, are the pleasantest moments in the period of preparation, and those who make little of the delights of rowing, say with some truth that the only time when a rowing man enjoys himself is when he has stopped rowing."

Exactly. A certain amount of training is highly desirable for all athletes (in its generic sense), save, perhaps, cricketers. Do not mistake me. A cricket match requires the exercise of swift, decisive judgment still more than a boat race. And there are many other games in which, for the time, the strain upon the nerve and powers of self-command is greater than in rowing. But that which is peculiar, or almost peculiar, to rowing is the necessity of enforcing discipline for weeks, in some cases, months, before the critical day. It is the great demand upon this quality which leads many to prefer rowing even to cricket, and certainly to most other pastimes.

The Electric Theatre have put on two more fine programmes since our last issue. On Thursday we were initiated into the making of straw hats in a series of very interesting films. Then we had pictures illustrating the marriage ceremony and pageant connected with the marriage of the Maharajah of Kapurthala. An Arabian Tragedy was an exceptionally well mounted dramatic film and the Inner Mind showed us the clearing up of a robbery by means of hynotic influence. The English Gazette and the usual complement of comic pictures filled up the programme. On Saturday another Cowboy drama introduced us to a thrilling race and an exceptional riding performance. The Summer Adventure took us among wolves, automobiles and other wild things, while of the comic pictures "The Return of the Widow Pogson's Husband" was undoubtedly the pick—the humour being provided by the well-known actors of the American Vitagraph Company.

AN EASY WAY TO REMOVE SUPERFLUOUS HAIR.

For the benefit of our lady readers who suffer from the humiliating disfigurement of hair on face, lips or chin, we publish herewith a formula which has the advantage of being simple and inexpensive, as well as marvellously effective. It is not claimed by our informant that one application will permanently destroy the hair roots, but it is claimed, and the claims are borne out by actual tests, that one application completely removes the hair, and its regular use, one or two days apart, will quickly and permanently destroy the hair root itself. If you have hair which you wish permanently removed, ask your chemist to mix 4½ drams Pulverized Sulphide Concentrate with 2½ drams Zinc Oxide, P.B., and 1 dram of Powdered Orris Root, and put in a wide mouth bottle. For use, mix a little of the powder into a paste on a plate by adding a few drops of water. Apply with a narrow knife blade and removed at the end of two minutes with the back of the knife, when the dissolved hair will come with it. Repeat at intervals of two days. Each time the growth will be less, until it entirely disappears. A good non-greasy cream, such as Creme Tokalon may be used after each application.

CAUTION:—This must not be used as a substitute for shaving, as its repeated use completely destroys the hair roots.

Exit summer, or what has had to do duty as such. Last Sunday night, with a great yellow moon and a sky full of stars, the curtain was rung down on one of the most disastrous summers of recent years; and next day, before a motley backcloth of brown and gold, autumn began, the great third act of the pastoral play.

Whatever may have been written and said about the late alleged summer, its death was better than its life. For on Sunday was a pearl among days, with a high blue sky unbroken by clouds and a sun strong enough to take the chill off the strong wind that hustled across the country.

But for the whirling dance of the fallen leaves it might have been springtime. Saturday was blessed with seven hours of pure sunshine, while the sabbath gave us a full nine hours.

Out of gratitude for this boon, the parks and the river did their best to put on an appearance of summer, and at Richmond and Teddington the water was gay with pleasure craft and silk cushions and ladies and sunshades. True, rowing was a risky business owing to the strong east winds, and the river was beaten into wicked little wavelets all day.

But with their pleasure so long deferred, with memories of so many dire week-ends, the river folk snatched at the opportunity of getting into their flannels and making up for lost time.

will be known as the Princess' Hotel, and will cost about £400,000. It will accommodate 1,000 guests. The hotel will not only occupy the site of the theatre but the entire block bounded by Oxford, Winsley, Castle, and Wells Streets with the exception of the sites of Hyam's and Mappin and Webb's shops. The ground belongs to Lord Howard de Walden, from whom a ninety-nine years' lease has been secured. Negotiations for the leaseholds of property adjoining the theatre have been progressing during several months, and are just completed.

The Princess' Theatre was at one time one of the most popular homes of melodrama in London. It was there that "Two Little Orphans" was first produced. Some years ago the lease was secured by Mr. B. F. Keith, owner of a number of leading theatres and music-halls in the United States. It was his plan to open a continuous vaudeville house with performers appearing in constant succession from twelve o'clock noon. This project never matured, and he did not open the theatre, though he has held the lease until the present time. The work of demolishing the present buildings will begin at once, and the new hotel will be completed in about eighteen months.

Perhaps many of your readers, like myself, have never seen a royal pardon in print and so are unfamiliar with its wording. For their amusement I give one below; it was the finishing touch to a dog license farce played at Broadstairs, where earlier in the year the wife of Major-General Browne, was wrongfully convicted of keeping a dog without a license.

When the case was heard on 28th May, before the Cinque Ports magistrates at Margate, Mrs. Browne was unable to produce the license. Later, when it was found, the magistrates said they had no power to remit the fine.

Major-General Browne then appealed to the King, and the pardon, granted under the Royal Seal, states:—

"GEORGE, R.I."

George the Fifth. By the Grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the British Dominions Beyond the Seas, King Defender of the Faith.

To the Justices of the Thanet Division of the Liberties of the Cinque Ports, and to others whom it may concern, GREETING!

WHEREAS Mrs. G. F. Browne was, at the Town Hall, Margate, on the 28th May, 1912, convicted of keeping a dog without a license, and ordered to pay a fine of 2s. 6d. and costs.

NOW KNOW YE, that WE, in consideration of some circumstances humbly represented unto us, WE are graciously pleased to extend our Grace and Mercy unto the said Mrs. G. F. Browne, and to pardon and remit to her the amount of the aforesaid fine.

The question of "Sunday Shows" is for the moment trespassing on the space usually devoted by the papers to "Our Caged Daughters," motor and aviation fatalities and other cheerful reading. A suggestion has been made that picture palaces should be closed on Sundays, or if allowed to open their doors then the theatres and halls should be permitted to do ditto. I don't know so much about the alternative, but I'm certain the barring of the moving picture entertainments would be a mistake. If the objectors had their way and the cinematograph shows were closed on Sundays, would any public advantage be gained? I believe that such a move would have a precisely contrary effect. It is unnecessary to claim extravagant virtues for the picture palace, to pretend that its entertainment is a high form of art, or to suggest that it is not capable of much improvement. But here is, to take it at its lowest, a cheap and harmless form of amusement. On Sundays these places of entertainment in working class districts are crowded with audiences, largely composed of young men and young women. They spend an hour or two in the cinematograph theatre, watching melodrama or farce unfold itself in quick spasms on the screen. They are thus amused and interested in a harmless way. If they were not so occupied, where would they be? Engaged, perhaps, in far more questionable diversion. The strictly Puritanical objection to a Sunday show of this sort is in these days a positive obstacle to the improvement of social conditions for the poorer classes. The cinematograph is an aid to soberness and contentment, and it helps to make a city's Sunday more decent, less demoralising and more endurable than it used to be.

But while cinema showmen are loud in their wail, or fervent in their protest, as the case may be, bitter cry of the theatre manager is being heard in the land. It seems tolerably clear that Managers of provincial and suburban theatres are facing the most serious financial problem they have ever known. They declare that the competition of music halls and picture theatres has cut down the old profits almost to vanishing point; that the poorer sort of touring production, instead of showing a moderate profit, as a fill up between the good shows, is losing money; and that the only terms on which the first-rate play can be had leave very little surplus for the theatre proprietor.

It is well known that but for the profits on the drink bars some of the smaller provincial theatres would have to close.

The question has now arisen: Shall there be two performances a night in the theatres concerned, as in the music-halls?

The theatre management must get larger receipts somehow. And managers say that most of the lighter pieces, and many melodramas as they stand, can easily be run through in 100 to 110 minutes, and that if they take longer they can be cut without injury.

In fact, there are already experiments in that direction, and the abbreviated melodrama is a success in some provincial theatres.

Will the two-shows-a-night idea spread, and will it avert the bankruptcy that has overtaken some provincial managers and threatens others?

Mr. Granville Barker, the young man of 35, "newest" of our "new" dramatists, whom even Mr. Bernard Shaw allows to be "brainy," theatre revolutionary, who in the memorable Court Theatre season made the stage no longer stagy, has again startled the playgoing world.

His production at the Savoy of "The Winter's Tale" is the topic of the day. It is something quite "different" from any other Shakespearean production that has ever been attempted. The Times terms it "Post-Impressionist Shakespeare; other descriptions are "Barkerised Shakespeare" and "Shakespeare done in the way of the new German art." The critics are divided, though in the main they find Mr. Barker's method of producing Shakespeare too freakish, too discordant, too whimsical.

Mr. Barker has dispensed with scenery in the general sense of the term; he calls it "decoration." The critics make great play with Mr. Norman Wilkinson's Palace scene with its "box of bricks" architecture and the shepherd's cottage, which is said to resemble nothing so much as pictorial advertisements of Garden City houses. "Not again these curtains falling in folds, with forests and landscapes suggested by a few brave dashes of distorted form and unnatural colour," pleads one of them. The stage is on the Elizabethan plan, with an apron over the space usually occupied by the orchestra, and two side doors—in the foreground, through which courtiers and messengers make their entrances and exits. Searchlights, thrown on to the stage from the dress circle, are used instead of footlights.

The Times summarises the production in the following passage:—

> The costumes are after Beardsley, and still more after Bakst; the bustles and caftans, and deep skirted tunics of the courtiers come from the Russian ballet, and the bizarre smocks and fal-lals of the merry-makers at the sheep-shearing come from the Chelsea Arts Club Ball. . . . . The old shepherd inhabits a model bungalow from the Ideal Home Exhibition, with Voysey windows. Leontes reclines upon a seat which is frankly Art Nouveau.
> Squads of supers have symmetrical automaton-like movements, which show the influence of "Sumuru." Yes, there is no other word for it save the word that in popular usage denotes a special kind of artistic assault on conventionalism; it is Post-Impressionist Shakespeare.

Whatever opposing critics may say, Mr. Granville Barker has given London a new sensation. To see the Savoy "Winter's Tale" is at any rate an experience, and judging by the applications received at the box-office since the opening the production will at any rate prove to be what is termed a success of curiosity.

AUTUMN SPORT IN THE HIMALAYAS.

In no part of the world can a more bracing and perfect climate be found than in the Kumaon and Garhwal Himalayas, at altitudes of 6,000 feet and upwards, from the middle of October till the end of December. The glorious champagne air and bright sunshine enable one to resist fatigue, and if not in hard condition at first setting out on a shikar trip one very soon gets in training, as the exercise amid the magnificent scenery and invigorating atmosphere of these grand mountains rapidly braces one up and puts one's muscles, heart and lungs in fettle.

Who can ever forget the first view of the snowy range? The climb up to the pass may have been fatiguing, but on reaching the ridge the superb panorama unfolded well repaid the exertion. Few can look upon them unmoved, those gigantic snow-clad heights and intervening forest-clad mountains. Dame Nature was generous indeed when she established such mighty bulwarks along India's northern boundary.

Sport from elephant back is pleasant for a few days in the winter, but there is not the same fr dom about it as Himalayan shikar, for you more or less dependent upon the elephant you and the mahout who drives it. Every sporter his liking, certainly; but give me mountair with its wild surroundings, keen air, free and one's own limbs to depend on in game. There are days which stand ou sportsman's memory, which, with the assistance of a shikar diary, can be recalled as if yesterday. Such a day was 29th November 1901.

My little tent, 7½ feet square, is pitched on a small flat at about 9,000 feet above sea-level. A way to the north, Mount Trisul (23,400 feet), his summit, only a few miles distant in a direct line, stands well above his immediate neighbours. It is bitterly cold, as the morning sun has not yet reached our camp, but breakfast alongside a big log-fire warms one up. At 8 o'clock we make a start. My old shikari shoulders my rifle and cartridge bag, a local shikari carries a useful canvas bag containing lunch and tea-making utensils, and four other jungly-looking men and my Himalayan-bred setter, "Ranger," complete the party. I shoulder my Purdey 12-bore gun. We are going to beat a long ravine, which leads up to a grassy ridge and terminates in a pass. Our way lies across terraced fields for about a quarter of a mile, till we arrive at a clump of spruce trees at the entrance to the ravine, up which a zigzag path leads. Two beaters on each side plunge into the ringall brakes, which clothe the sides of the nullah, and start well ahead. Then onward we go, "Ranger" working thirty or forty yards to my front. Before we have proceeded a furlong the old dog comes to a point below some rhododendron bushes. Drawing on, he flushes a woodcock, which offers an easy shot as it flaps lazily away. "Bang!" and poor Scolopax drops a few yards in front of the dog and is brought to hand at once. "Ranger" has a tender mouth, and though he was bred and trained in Garhwal has been shot over five seasons in Devonshire, and knows his business. He is a big, old-fashioned dog of the orange-and-white breed. Further on, three hen monal get up and come whistling down the nullah. One plumps down almost at my feet to my right barrel and another is missed.

The reports of the gun disturb two full-plumaged cock monal, and while I am reloading they come sailing majestically overhead. Can any other game-bird in the world compare to a cock monal in his native wilds! See him with the sun lighting up his beautiful plumage—a splendid, rainbow-tinted bird. A sturdy and plucky fellow, too, who cares for neither soft nor chilled shot unless hit well forward, and will carry on gamely though peppered all over the body, even with No. 4 shot, and at 25 yards and less. For this reason, after considerable experience with Nos. 4, 5 and 6 shot I now consider No. 6 to be the best size for these powerful birds. You are more likely to hit them well forward with No. 6 as it makes a superior pattern in most guns to Nos. 5 and 4. No. 6 is, I am convinced, the best all-round size for Himalayan game-birds.

Now there is a commotion in the ringalls (mountain bamboo), and one of the beaters sings out that there are Koklass pheasants just ahead. I order the old dog to "hie in there," and presently a rustling and whirring of wings is heard as a brace of Koklass flutter up clear of the cover and come dashing down the ravine, the hen bird leading. These graceful birds get into their stride quicker than partridges, but their pace is not deceptive, as they always appear to be travelling as fast as they really are, and instinctively, after some practice, one swings one's gun ahead. "Bang!" Down comes the hen; and "Bang!" again. Down comes the cock. Another hen rises while I am reloading and dashes like greased lightning over my head. These birds can travel, and no mistake! The second cock bird is sure to be not far off, as Koklass are nearly always found in pairs, and in another minute he is forced to rise; but, contrary to expectations, he flies about 60 yards up the ravine, alighting in the ringalls on the opposite side. But the clever old dog has marked him, and, after giving a knowing look round at his master, rushes off to turn the artful bird out. I remain where I am standing, as I feel sure the Koklass will fly downwards this time and offer a sporting shot. But I am wrong again, as after being well hustled by the dog, the old cock flutters up into a spruce tree, and crurtles out his "Kokuk, kokuk, kokuk." But the beaters on my left get beyond the tree, and a big stick thrown up into the branches induces the bird to leave, and with a hoarse and angry "Quark, quar, quar, quar," he comes hurtling down the nullah. I miss him clean with my right barrel, but manage to drop him with my left after he has passed. He is a runner, but "Ranger" very soon has him, and in another minute all three birds are slung on the game-cord with the woodcock, a "clove-hitch" slipped over the hocks of each keeping them secure.

On we go some distance without seeing another bird, when suddenly two monal rise just ahead of the beaters on my left. The first, a young cock, drops to my right barrel, but the other is unharmed by my left, and goes whistling away downwards. Further on I miss a grand old cock monal with both barrels and immediately afterwards miss a Koklass. "Bang, Bang!" Damn! However, my next shot is successful and brings a young cock Koklass down. The bird crashes into a rock and knocks half the feathers off its breast.

We are only a few hundred yards from the top of the ravine now and on our right is a clump of fine old spruce trees. The beaters work through this and rouse several monal. I have the good fortune to drop a brace, right and left—a hen and a this season's cock, the latter being similar in plumage except for a few black feathers on to the hen his breast.

We soon arrive at two small cairns on the pass, about 10,600 feet, and I at once notice some likely looking cover on the south side, which I decide to beat. No sooner have we arrived below the cover than "Ranger" stands beautifully below a thicket of scrub. Presently he flushes a peura (jungle partridge), which is shot, and the report alarms four or five monal. I down one of these, but it is a runner and leads the old dog a fine chase down among some boulders and into a ringall brake below. He puts up several more monal but sticks to the wounded hen and brings it backs at a gallop.

We are now on a sheep-path, which leads up to a knoll from where there is a magnificent view. "Ranger" is working ahead on right, and presently puts up a solitary cock monal, which flies up into the top branches of a tall holly oak. I send a man up on each side to oust him from his perch, and, getting into a good position below some bushes, await the bird's coming. I can see the old fellow turning his head to right and left as the men approach the tree, and presently, with a loud fluttering of wings, accompanied by a succession of shrill piping whistles, the grand bird comes sailing overhead. My right barrel staggers him and my left brings him down with a thump on to a bunch of yellow grass. He is a splendid bird, over 5lb. in weight. We are close to the top of the knoll when a hen Koklass rises with a loud croak. I miss her with the right and lay her out with the left barel. The cock gets away while I am reloading.

It is now past noon and time for lunch. The morning's bag is laid out in the shade—six monals, five Koklass, a peura, and a woodcock. How grand the snows look in the noonday sun—a glistening white mass against the bluest of skies! From where I sit I can spy out several of my favourite shikar camps. There is where I killed the big surrow, below that sugar-loaf rock; the camp close to where I bagged the big bear; and another where I had the fortune to come upon a fine old sambur stag.

The afternoon is occupied in beating a few ravines lower down the hill, but though a few monal are flushed no shots are obtained, as the birds all rise out of shot. Close to camp, however, three or four pairs of peura are flushed and out of five shots I manage to bag a brace.

After tea, by the camp fire, I watched the shadows of the intervening ranges creeping upwards towards the snows, carrying the gloom right up to the feet of the white mountains. Suddenly all is changed. The snows rapidly turn a lovely golden pink, which shows up gloriously against a steely blue sky, and for some moments they remain bathed in splendour. Then the roseate hue fades out, quickly but gradually, from east to west, and in a short space of time the great peaks look cold and pale grey. It almost makes one shiver to watch them now. But in another minute a beautiful afterglow lights them up again in a pale golden tint for a few moments, and then the great lamp is turned off and the snow peaks loom ghostly and more indistinct until only their irregular outline is to be seen.

But later, sitting by the camp fire after dinner, enjoying some Navy-cut tobacco, I watched my old friends take on a new life under the silvery light of the moon. It may be imagination, but I always think that in the clear, rarefied mountain air the moon and stars shine brighter than elsewhere. When viewed from a near distance the snowy ranges look as grand and beautiful under the changed light of the moon as at any time between sunrise and sunset.

Another never-to-be-forgotten day was the 18th October 1901, when my friend M. and I enjoyed a fine day's sport among some beautiful conifer forests. Our camp is at 9,400 feet above sea-level on a flat surrounded by pine and spruce trees. To our front, across a valley, down which a snow-fed river roars along in its impetuous course, are some tremendous precipices, intersected by forest-clad ravines leading up to a hog-backed ridge above which an irregular line of snow peaks stand out sharply in the distance. Nearer, on our right, a splendid cone of over 23,000 feet towers. This great mountain, one of the most beautiful in the mighty range, shows up to perfection when viewed over a foreground of bright green conifers, and in a straight line the summit cannot be more than three or four miles away. Away to our left, more snow peaks show themselves, including Nalkauta, the one that keeps guard over the sacred temple of Badrinath, in the valley below its glaciers. At 8 o'clock we start from camp. M. goes off to stalk some snow-pigeons, and, getting two barrels into the "brown" of them, bags no less than nine-teen. Meanwhile I try some scrub with my setter pup, and two kalij pheasants being roused I manage to bag one of them.

We cross a ravine, in which a mass of pine, spruce, deodar and cypress trees are jumbled together, the result of an avalanche, and climb a spur for about 500 feet. Here we start our first beat. Six wild men form line above us. One gun, M., keeps about 50 yards ahead of the men, and I, the lower gun, am 50 yards further on still. Monal are plentiful and give us some capital shooting. Many of them fly up into trees and are dislodged by the beaters, offering difficult shots as they fly downwards. We see ten times as many monal's as we obtain shots at, and fire at about three times as many as downwards. A few Koklas are flushed and one is shot. My setter pup, "Ranger II.," a nephew of my old dog, who died in 1903, proves that he has a good nose by following a running monal through a tangle of wild rose-bushes. He retrieves the bird in good style.

At noon we have lunch, and I shall not forget a smart shot my friend made just before we sat down to our meal. We had put down our guns, when a fine old cock monal rose about 50 yards higher up the hill. M. snatched up his gun, took a pace to his left, and dropped the bird as he was crossing an open space among the conifers.

Up to now we have 12 monal, one Koklass, one kalij, and M's 19 pigeons on the game-cords. A good deal of our work is snapshotting between the tree-tops. All the forests are evergreen, though occasionally one comes across a few horse-chestnuts, walnuts and sycamores, usually in the ravines. It is glorious up here, at over 10,000 feet altitude, and after lunch we linger awhile to admire the view. M. takes a photo of the bag and one or two of the snow peak, Dunagiri, away to the eastward.

In the afternoon we beat the pine-woods below, where many birds have betaken themselves. We obtain some more sporting shots, some of them being real rocketers, and while looking for a wounded monal my young dog flushes two more Koklass, one of which I manage to bag. At about 4 o'clock we emerge from a clump of pines and find ourselves close to camp. We have 23 pheasants, out of which M. has shot 12. We are more than satisfied with the day's sport. After tea by the log fire we watch the snows go through their wonderful transformation scene again.

I have heard it said Himalayan shikar is not worth the exertion. The walking is, of course, decidedly rough, but, personally, I would sooner shoot game in the glorious autumn weather in the grand old Himalayas than in any other place. Perhaps the hardest work of all is cheer-shooting on the terribly steep, pine-clad slopes these birds inhabit. Cheer (Phasianus wallichi) are, I believe, the only true pheasants found in India. Cock birds measure from 32 to 38 inches or more in length and weigh from 3lb. to 3½lb. Hens are about the size of English hen pheasants. I have never bagged more than ten cheer in a day, and then only after tramping most of the day over very steep, and in some places dangerous, ground. Cheer inhabit such uninviting-looking country that they are perhaps less sought after than other game-birds. Monal, Koklass, and chukore give the best sport. A 12-bore cylinder is the gun for Himalayan game-birds. As I have said, practically all the trees are evergreen, and one wants a powerful gun which gives a wide-killing circle, as frequently one must take shots at 20 yards and nearer. A trusty man, carrying one's rifle, should accompany one, as there is always the 50-to-1 chance of coming across big game. Also, it is sound to carry a few spherical ball cartridges for one's gun.—GARHWALI in Shooting Times.

WINCHESTER

.22 Automatic Rifle

To make your holidays perfectly enjoyable, take along a Winchester .22 Automatic Rifle. No better rifle could be designed for this purpose. It operates by its own recoil and shoots a cartridge that has accuracy and power. For small game, use the new Hollow Point cartridge, which upsets upon striking and delivers a hard, crushing blow. The .22 Automatic is very simple, and just ordinary care will keep it in good order all the time. It is sold by dealers everywhere. Always use Winchester cartridges in Winchester rifles as they are made for each other, and hence will give the best results.

THE .22 AUTOMATIC IS JUST THE RIFLE FOR HOLIDAYS.

Polo 'Players, Horse-Owners and Trainers

Note!—In all cases of Lameness in Horses "EQUINOINT"—the SCIENTIFIC and HUMANE REMEDY is absolutely INDISPENSIBLE. The "EQUINOINT" Treatment has entirely superseded the old-fashioned painful and unnatural practice of FIRING, and the expert opinion of Prominent Horse-owners in all parts of the World is irresistibly in favour of "EQUINOINT" when legs give trouble in any way.

"EQUINOINT" will produce excellent results while the Horse is running out, for he will not bite at it and flies shun it.

THE WORST POSSIBLE CASE OF

SPRUNG TENDON, THOROPINS, WINDGALLS, BOG-SPAVIN, CURBS, SPRUNG HOCK, SPLINTS, OR ANY OTHER BURSAL ENLARGEMENT

will readily yield to this Treatment

"Equinoint" causes NO PAIN and leaves NO BLEMISH.

"Equinoint" cures by ABSORPTION and is EASILY APPLIED.

"Equinoint" removes the Enlargement and YOU CAN WORK THE HORSE ALL THE TIME.

LEICESTER.

That the London brigade was on business bent at Leicester on Tuesday was proved by the crowded state of the specials from town, and with the local folk increasing their patronage the attendance was an uncommonly good one. The afternoon proved a highly profitable one for backers, as with the exception of the failure of Pictonetta in the Gopsall Welter, which went to Cornish, who was almost equally well supported, every favourite proved successful, and the fields may be said to have been fairly routed. Results :—

FOOTBALL
ASSOCIATION RULES.

For the series of defeats which have befallen the London clubs in the First League during the past three weeks there was some slight compensation yesterday in a victory gained by Woolwich Arsenal over Sheffield United at Bramall Lane, but as Tottenham Hotspur and Chelsea both lost, the metropolitan teams, as the result of fourteen games already contested this season, have only two wins and one draw to set against eleven defeats. For the London clubs to fare badly in the First League competition is, of course, no new experience, but they cannot often—if ever—have made such a disastrous commencement as on the present occasion. Tottenham Hotspur find themselves in a very awkward plight. Not only have they lost four games off the reel but of these four encounters three have been decided at White Hart Lane, so the record of the North London team is quite as bad as it reads. That the side needed strengthening was shown only too clearly on the first day of the season, yet alterations tried since that time have failed to bring about any improvement in the fortunes of the club. Yesterday, against Derby County, Weir was tried as right half and Jones as inside left, but unhappily Jones early in the game was injured and directly afterwards Leonard scored for Derby. Hotspur played up fairly well despite this reverse, and in the second half, with the home side awarded a penalty, Collins equalised, but shortly before the close Boomer put on a deciding goal as the result of a very brilliant shot. Altogether Hotspur did not come badly out of the ordeal, but although the margin against the Tottenham men was so narrow it was impossible to escape from the conviction that Derby County were the better side. The season is young yet and the next few weeks may bring better fortune to Hotspur, but on the form displayed up to the present it is difficult to see how the team, unless fresh blood is introduced, can hold their own in first-class company.

While it would not be wise to build great hopes of success for the Arsenal upon the victory gained at Bramall Lane, seeing that Sheffield United had been beaten on the previous Saturday by Chelsea, a win away from home on the part of a London club comes as a refreshing break in the run of disaster. Moreover, the Plumstead team pulled through with a good deal to spare, even admitting that Sheffield United laboured under a disadvantage on the disablement of Smith. The forwards appeared to distinct advantage and not only did Randall score twice before the interval, but McLaughlin had added a third point before any definite success attended the Sheffield men. Chelsea raised great hopes at Newcastle by registering a couple of goals through Fairgray, but although thus faced with a very formidable task Newcastle United never lost their form, and reducing the balance against them before half-time, they were on level terms within a few minutes of the resumption. A further goal by Stewart decided matters as it happened, but Chelsea stuck gamely to their work, and more than once came desperately near equalising. Even as matters went, Chelsea in running Newcastle to the odd goal in five at St. James's Park were far from being disgraced.

Apart from the lack of success attending the London clubs, the feature of the First League competition up to the present has been the strong contrast in the fortunes of Sheffield Wednesday and Manchester City from the experience of twelve months ago. Up to date these two clubs have each won four games off the reel. At a similar period last season neither team could claim a single victory. Indeed, for their first win Manchester City had to wait until the middle of October. Everton, too, began disastrously last September, gaining only one victory in their first five matches, whereas now they have only lost one out of an equal number of contests.

Although they led at half-time by a goal, Clapton Orient were beaten at Hull in the Second Division of the League and so suffered their first defeat of the season. Fortune was against them, as they had both Evans and Hugall injured, but all the same the Hull forwards played a splendid game in the second half and the home team deserved to win. Hull City are now at the head of the competition with three victories in four matches, the other game against Barnsley at Turf Moor being a draw. Playing at home against Bury, Fulham won very comfortably and so improved their position. Bury have now been defeated three times in four matches. Preston North End, although enjoying the advantage of the ground, could do no better than draw with Notts Forest and have yet to win their first match. Three clubs won away from home, Leeds City beating Bradford, who have not yet scored a goal, while Bristol City overcame Stockport County and Birmingham scored two goals to one against Leicester Fosse. Like Hull City, Birmingham are an undefeated side.

First champions of the Southern League Millwall now stand at the head of that competition, a position they have not occupied for many years. It is, indeed, quite a change for the club to show up so prominently, and the improvement has come about steadily since the removal of their headquarters to New Cross. Yesterday they gained their fourth consecutive victory, beating Norwich City, who had dropped only one point in four engagements. Another London club to overcome opponents regarded as likely to do well in the struggle for first honours were Queen's Park Rangers, who just beat Northampton. This further success of the champions when below full strength owing to injuries to three of their most valuable forwards promises a very satisfactory season at Park Royal, and there seems equally good reason to expect the Crystal Palace to enjoy considerable prosperity, as, similarly handicapped, they drew at Exeter. Yesterday's results generally suggest that the most famous clubs of recent years will again take a prominent part in the tournament. Swindon scoring five to none against Southampton and Brighton and Hove Albion winning easily by three goals. Reading, beating the Rovers at Bristol, gained their first win after two defeats, and Gillingham—successful at Brentford—were victorious for the first time, leaving Bristol Rovers the only club with but one point to their name.

RUGBY RULES.

LONDON WELSH vs. CATFORD BRIDGE.—A fairly interesting match at Wandsworth Common was won by the London Welsh by a goal and two tries to two dropped goals. The match was played in fine weather and before a moderate attendance. In point of quality it was not a good exposition of Rugby, and gained most of its interest from the fact that the result was in doubt until quite late. The Catford men, who had an advantage in height, bustled their opponents about, but while their forwards did much good work their backs were weak. In their three-quarter line they had Pantlin, the Irishman, and he did not have a decent chance all through the game. Both sides kicked too much, not going on with their attacking movements in a smooth and proper manner. Early in the game Catford secured the lead, Ell's dropping a capital goal. Shortly before the interval T. Maddocks, after a bout of passing, gained a try for the Welsh, who were one point to the bad at half-time. In the second half Michael obtained a try, but Macintosh put Catford ahead by dropping a goal. The visitors then looked like winning, but the Welsh played strongly. Gwyn Thomas, their full-back, kicked a fine length, and near the end some passing enabled O'Connell to score a try, which Thomas converted. Welsh, 11 points; Catford Bridge, 8 points.

R. M. A. vs. OLD ALLEYNIANS.—The home side had all the best of this match, played at Woolwich under very favourable conditions. Not only were the Academy men very fit, but they played as if they were in good practice. Gord, the captain, who played in the centre, and his wing, Harrison, had an excellent understanding, and were responsible for six of the seven tries scored by the side. Four of these were in the first half against the wind, and the visitors made no response. At the opening of the second half the Old Alleynians scored very quickly as the result of some good passing. Shand getting over, but it was not converted. This was their only successful effort, and the Academy, scoring three more tries, won by six goals and a try to a try. Harrison scored four tries, Gordon two, and Pank one. The first try by Gordon was the result of an intercepted pass, and the fourth, by Harrison, followed a very pretty run by that player and Scobey, one of the half-backs, the ball being passed and repassed between them several times very cleverly. Four of the other tries came from the admirable combination of Gordon and Harrison, and Pank scored easily when the Alleynians' defence had broken down. R. M. A., 33 points; Old Alleynians, 3 points.

ROSSLYN PARK vs. BLACKHEATH.—In this, the opening game of the Rugby football season at Richmond, Blackheath won very decisively by two placed goals and five tries to a try. It was a fairly fast and quite a keen game, with Blackheath much the cleverer side. Their superiority outside the scrum was always very pronounced and they owed nothing to luck for their decisive win. Early in the game A. L. Stokes ran in with a try for Blackheath, but he failed to improve it, while Haslam soon afterwards scored for the Park and also failed with the place kick. The play for the subsequent quarter of an hour was in the Park's favour, but just before the interval Skeet made a clever opening for Hands to run in and A. L. Stokes then placed the goal. After changing ends Blackheath had all the best of the play and Rosslyn Park were quite outplayed and many times they were badly let down by their defence. After Craven had scored another unconverted try for Blackheath, Hands ran in cleverly twice, Thomas, by good play, having a good deal to do with his first try, while Lacey and Smyth also scored tries against the Park, though only one of them was converted. Blackheath, 25 points; Rosslyn Park, 5 points.

GOLF.

THE CALCUTTA CUP.—The final round of the Royal and Ancient Club's Tournament for the Calcutta Cup was decided on the old course at St. Andrews, between F. H. D. Vickerman (5) and F. G. Tulloch (4).

The result was a win for Vickerman by 2 up and 1 to play. Fine weather prevailed, and there was a fairly large number of spectators. Vickerman required one of his two strokes allowance in order to halve the third hole. Tulloch took the lead at the fourth, where his opponent pulled into the whins, but the match was squared on the next green, where Vickerman ran down a 15ft. putt.

The latter took the lead at the sixth, where he laid his full-iron shot dead, but his advantage was only temporary, for, going to the next hole, he was badly bunkered, and took 2 to recover. The match was still "all even" at the turn, but going to the tenth Vickerman was bunkered from his second shot, and Tulloch again took the lead.

Vickerman, however, drew level at the eleventh, without the aid of the second and last of his strokes allowance, and he took the lead at the thirteenth, where Tulloch was bunkered.

Even play followed up to the seventeenth, where Tulloch was stymied. Failing to negotiate the difficulty, he lost the hole and the match.

ATHLETICS.

L.A.C. AUTUMN MEETING.—Except for one or two minor meetings the athletic season of 1912 was brought to a close at Stamford Bridge Grounds last Saturday, when the London Athletic Club held its autumn meeting in the presence of about 2,000 spectators. As usual, the executive provided an attractive programme of events, the chief items being the Amateur Athletic Association's heavy and light-weight tug-of-war championships, and an attack by W. R. Applegarth, of the Polytechnic Harriers, on the furlong record. Despite a rather nasty cross wind Applegarth ran in splendid form and, although not drawn right out to the end, broke the worsted in 21 4-5secs., thus equalling the record, made by C. G. Wood on the same ground in 1887. Before making his attempt on the figures the Polytechnic man won his heat in the open 100yds. handicap from half a yard behind scratch in "evens," and only failed by about six inches to repeat the performance in the second round. In the heavy-weight tug-of-war championship the City Police defeated the K. Division Metropolitan Police by two "straight pulls." A veterans' handicap of 150yds. aroused considerable interest and was well contested. The final resulted in a win for E. J. Wade, of the Ranelagh, who for a man of 54 years ran remarkably well. With the assistance of 24yds start Wade got home in 15 3-5sec. The Polytechnic Harriers easily secured the 400 Metres Relay Race in 41 2-5secs and R. G. Plumb, of the home club, won the open sprint off 7½yds. in good style. Results:—

100 Yards Open Handicap.—Final Heat: R. G. Plumb, L.A.C., 7½yds. start, 1; A. O. Farmer, L.A.C. 6½, 2; W. C. Wells, Poly. H. 4½, 3. A splendid race, won by a foot; similar distance separated second and third. Applegarth qualified but did not compete. Time 10secs. dead.

150 Yards Veterans' Handicap (1½yds. allowed for each year over 35).—Final Heat: E. J. Wade, Ranelagh H. 24, 1; T. Palin, S.E. and C.R.L.A.C., 23, 2; D. Bacan, L.A.C 13½, 3. Won by half a yard; a like distance divided second and third. Time—15 3-5sec.

A LIQUEUR WHISKY !!!

TREACHER'S

"EXTRA SPECIAL"

Those who desire to use themselves a Faultless Whisky or to offer their guests something out of the ordinary, should purchase this.

It is a matured blend of splendid quality and, unlike most advertised brands, may be fittingly used as an After-Dinner Liqueur, as it is sufficiently delicate in flavour to merit being sipped alone, particularly if served in a thin glass and held for a little time, in order to allow the warmth of the hand to develop the full aroma

Mixed with milk it forms a wholesome, nourishing and delicious drink the last thing at night, and is a panacea for Insomnia.

BOXING.

Petty-Officer Curran vs. George Rodel.—Contests between men in the heavy-weight division seldom go but a few rounds, but that in which George Rodel (South Africa and Petty-Officer Curran (Ireland) figured as principals at the Ring last Monday night provided one of the most stubborn bouts seen for some time past. This was their third meeting, Rodel proving successful in both of the previous contests, once on points and again when Curran was disqualified.

It was twenty-five minutes to ten when the principals faced for the first round, The South African, the lighter of the pair, had a pull in reach. Both men were cautious, but midway in the opening round, as the pair rushed into each other, Rodel's head came into collision with Curran's forehead, from which the blood flowed freely. The incident was a pure accident. After a few exchanges Curran sent in two heavy blows to Rodel's head, sending the latter to the ropes. Again the South African's head came into contact with Curran's other eye, and again the blood flowed freely. Curran gave his opponent a warm three minutes in the third round. Curran's eyes gave him some trouble, but he succeeded in scoring heavily to Rodel's head. Curran boxed splendidly during the fifth meeting; twice he succeeded in getting home with a right hook to the chin, Rodel clinching to avoid punishment. Curran rushed his man when facing for the sixth meeting, and scored heavily to the body, but a right uppercut from Rodel steadied him for a second or two.

Round 7 saw Curran score first with the left, and quickly following up with the right once again had Rodel in distress. Both men slowed down during the eighth round. Curran had entirely the best of the exchanges both in the tenth and eleventh rounds, but Rodel's head again came into collision with Curran's chin, causing Curran to remark, "Mind your head." In the fourteenth round both were guilty of clinching, but getting apart Curran led to the cheek but shortly afterwards encountered a heavy jab from Rodel's right. The referee was compelled to caution Rodel during the fifteenth meeting, and in the sixteenth round Rodel again butted Curran and the referee was compelled to disqualify him, Curran being returned the winner.

POULTRY POINTS.

With reference to your recent editorial on "Ostrich Farming," it may interest you to know that the first two ostriches to arrive in Ceylon are now enclosed in a run in a field behind Mr. John Hagenbeck's bungalow the "Dawn Colpetty." They arrived in the island recently after a journey of 12 days from Bombay. They are African birds and about three years old, just in their prime. They had rather a rough voyage but are now gradually picking up. Mr. Hagenbeck is keeping close observation on them to see how the Colombo climate affects them. If they do well, Mr. Hagenbeck's intention is to start a syndicate to run an ostrich farm or else get Government to take it up, being fully convinced that there is a lot of money to be made from the sale of the feathers, the prices for which, according to his latest information, are advancing. The ostriches are African birds and while in Bombay the female laid eleven eggs. In a chat with a Press representative Mr. Hagenbeck said he had ordered the incubators from England. He could not expect any eggs just yet, because the birds were not used to the climate. But he thought Ceylon ought to suit them. If they did not improve in Colombo, he intended sending them upcountry to see how they would do there. Ostriches were paying well in Australia, America and Madagascar.

Good but we here in India would be more glad to know how ostriches do in this country. Is there none in this "land of regrets"—bird fancier or other—none even among the little and the lowly—who would earn the pioneer fame and name by importing a few birds for purposes of trial? And what of the grand boss—the Agricultural Research Institute, Pusa, and its far-famed poultry expert?

Thusly, D. F. Lawrie in an Australian Exchange:—

HAVE YOU

Built scratching sheds for your fowls?
Scalded, scrubbed, disinfected and repaired your brooders?
Adopted the system of frequently cleaning your fowl-houses and destroying vermin?
Eradicated all poultry ticks?
Adopted the wise plan of handling and examining each bird at least once a fortnight to ascertain its condition and to look for vermin or for early signs of disease?

I trust that for their own sake the majority of my readers will be able to respond to this cannonade of questions in the affirmative; if not, well, the sooner the better.

The following are points to remember in poultry-breeding:—
Breed only the most profitable kinds.
House your birds properly; erect sanitary houses, dry and well-ventilated but free from draughts; keep the houses clean and free from vermin.
Feed your birds intelligently; next to housing, the question of proper foods and methods of feeding ranks in importance.

Here are some more:—
The good layer converts her food into eggs; the drone into flesh.
Hens will lay as well without the attention of a male as with one.
An ounce of prevention is worth several pounds of cure when it comes to poultry disease.
Green food is good the whole year round. Remember it reduces the grain account. After the first laying season, a hen's value as a layer lessens and, after the second year, she may be fruitful but will not be profitable to keep.

Cross-bred fowls are the progeny of two distinct pure breeds mated together and not the mongrel, the result of thoughtless and indiscriminate breeding, says a writer. In crossing fowls, the idea is or should be to produce fowls which will combine the qualities of both parents. It must therefore be borne in mind from the commencement what the aim is, either to produce table chickens or layers, although of course, many crosses will produce chickens suitable to a certain degree for both purposes. The list of possible crosses is far too lengthy to mention in detail, but a few of the best crosses for general purposes may here be given: Leghorn-Orpington; Minorca-Orpington; Leghorn-Rock; Leghorn-Wyandotte; Houdan-Orpington; Leghorn or Minorca and Langshan; Faverrolles-Orpington; Sussex-Orpington; and Sussex-Houdon.

So much has been said that is true and untrue about the 200-egg strain of this or that variety and so many persons are honestly mistaken and a few of them wilfully so, says a writer in Poultry (America), that he has been forced to indite an article upon the subject. Characteristically enough he begins. At the beginning, I think, the Americans owe the true American fancier a compliment, for he has differed with his English cousins in this; utility, right down usefulness, has been his first aim and then fancy points afterwards. Not so with our English fancier. See the English type of Langshan, for example. They practically ruined the useful qualities of that bird, while here the breed enjoys its share of popularity and is truly a very useful fowl. The tendency among all breeders of to-day is to produce a fowl that is not only beautiful but useful, one that will eclipse the common scrub, one that will by merit alone force itself upon the farms. The beginning is very promising and I shall revert to the point later.

BOMBAY ROVERS TOURNAMENT.

The first of the semi-final games was played on the 8th instant when the Royal Warwicks met the Royal Irish Regiment. Everyone expected the Harwood League champions to qualify for the final but to the general surprise they were beaten. The Irishmen scored a goal at the start and in spite of all their efforts the Warwicks were unable to get on terms. They had several chances which they failed to take advantage of. Both teams played in good form but the display of the Irishmen was excellent and on the day they were the better team. On Tuesday the 9th instant the Dorsets and the Cheshires took the field and here again another surprise was served up. The Cheshires had been expected to win but the Dorsets were the superior side on the evening's play and were ultimately victorious by three goals to one. The game was well contested and a fine exhibition of football was witnessed. The Dorsets drew first blood but not long after the Cheshires equalised. Play settled down thereafter, but the Dorsets got the lead once more before the interval and in the second half they again added to their score without response.

The Dorsets and the Royal Irish met in the final on the Couperage last Thursday before a large crowd. It was a good game, but the Royal Irish were, if anything, the better side and should have won by a couple of goals. They failed to score, however, and the Dorsets being unable to get through likewise, the game ended in a pointless draw.

The match was replayed on Friday and this time the Dorsets were victorious by a goal to nil. The Royal Irish did not reproduce their form of the previous evening while their opponents were a much improved team. It was an exciting game. The first half was unproductive but soon after resuming the Dorsets got through and Feeney was beaten. They played a defensive game thereafter and all the efforts of the Royal Irish failed, the Dorsets thus winning as stated. The cup and other prizes were given away at the close of the game by Mrs. Vaughan. The Leslie Challenge Shield for the spinning competition was won by the Loyal North Lancs who beat the Bombay Gymkhana by 10 points to 5 in the final. Teams:—

ROYAL IRISH REGIMENT.—Feeney, goal; Dea and Wise, backs; Daily, Lyons and Taylor, half-backs; Payne, Brady, Stockler, Slater and Carr, forwards.

DORSETS.—Barlett, goal; Gough and Emberson, backs; Dann, Parsons and Nicholas half-backs; White, Austin, Holness, Smocker and Raynor, forwards.

Referee.—Sergt. Tilley.

DURAND TOURNAMENT.

FINAL.

ROYAL SCOTS vs. LANCASHIRE FUSILIERS.—These teams met in the final on Wednesday, the 9th instant, in the presence of a very large gathering. The Lancashire Fusiliers got away at the start and immediately tested the Scots' custodians. Then the Scots attacked, play in midfield following. Each team next pressed in turn and the defence was kept busy. The Fusiliers forced two corners, but neither was improved upon. Just before the interval the Scots rushed away and a good shot just went wide, half time arriving without score. On crossing over the Scots attacked vigorously, but the Fusiliers cleared and play was transferred to the other end where it looked as if they would get through, but the Scots' backs were equal to the occasion and several efforts on the part of the Lancashires were unsuccessful. A run by the Scots followed culminating in a goal. They were nearly through again shortly after and then the Fusiliers attacked but they lost a couple of chances and were unable to get on terms, the Royal Scots thus winning by a goal to nil. After the game H.E. the Commander-in-Chief made a short congratulatory speech and Lady Creagh distributed the prizes which were:—The Durand Challenge Cup to the winning team; the Simla Cup to the winning team, and also a cup presented by the Hon. Sir T. R. Wynne, K.C.I.E., to be the absolute property of the winning team; a silver medal to each member of the winning team and a cup to the captain; a cup, value Rs. 150, to be the property of the second team, and a bronze medal to each member of the second team.

KENNEL NOTES.

NAINI TAL DOG SHOW.

The Naini Tal First Championship Dog Show, which took place on the 21st September, was in spite of the counter-attraction at Simla, a great success. There were 29 classes and 87 dogs. The following officiated as Judges:—Captain C. L. Dunn, I.M.S., L. M. Medley, Esq., W. E. Betting, Esq., H. G. Richardson, Esq. The duties of Honorary Secretary were performed by Hunter J. Phillips, Esq., who was undoubtedly responsible in a great measure for the success of the show.

The prizes consisted of over 60 very handsome cups, and by way of encouragement for next year's show the Hon'ble Mr. Douglas M. Straight has very sportingly offered two cups of the value of £5 each for the best sporting dog and wire fox terrier respectively. The result of the show is that owners are now agitating for the early formation of a U. P. Kennel Club which will no doubt meet with hearty and substantial support.

DARJEELING SHOW.

The entries for this show are, it is understood, quite good, and so far as can be foreseen at present the function promises to turn out a success, although a record number of entries does not necessarily spur the success of a show. The chief factor to be considered in all Dog Shows is undoubtedly the Judge, for without a competent and experienced fancier to carry out these onerous duties it is absolutely impossible for any show to turn out a success.

It is understood that in the absence of Mr. Horace Johnstone, who has had to proceed home on medical certificate, Mr. L. M. Medley will perform the duties of Judge at this show.

KENNEL WHISPERINGS.

Mr. Inglis Harvey has just imported that grand young Irish Terrier Manager and he will probably render a good account of himself at the forthcoming Darjeeling Show where it is understood he has been entered.

The Smooth Fox Terrier Nitram Lightweight the dog that was placed over Champion Avon Ozendale at the last Calcutta Kennel Club Show died some time ago from an attack of pneumonia. He never struck one as being a faster and was a dog of many faults. Indeed at the ring the Judge's selection could not be followed by Fox Terrier fanciers, as he was never in the same strat with dogs of the stamp of Champion Avon Ozendale.

Mr. J. Dinshaw Banjee, the owner of Willowlane Merry Prince which is perhaps the best all-round Bull Terrier in India, has succeeded in rearing a grand litter of promising youngsters which are being carefully prepared for the forthcoming Calcutta Kennel Club Seventh Championship Show.

Mr. J. Redding, owner of the Redirister Kennels, is importing a brace of Smooth Fox Terriers from the Northop Kennels. It is to be hoped that the specimens that are now being sent out are a more classy pair than previous importations from these kennels. The same fancier is also getting out a noted Irish Terrier, already a big winner at home, so with any luck this dog should make a name for himself in India at our forthcoming shows.

Miss Larkin, of Masoorie, who owns a very select kennel of Wire, Fox and Scottish Terriers, is breaking up her kennel and proceeding home. Fanciers interested have a good opportunity of picking up something out of the ordinary.

Major Martin has got together a very strong kennel of terriers and it is believed that he intends to send some representatives of his kennel to the next Calcutta show. The last time this fancier exhibited at Calcutta must still be fresh in the minds of most local fanciers, as he made a tremendous sweep with his string of Irish and Scottish Terriers. Since then he has added Fox Terriers to his kennel so some keen competition may be looked for.

Mr. Kennedy of Simla scored several wins with his classy Wire Fox Terrier Tariff which is no doubt a good all-round dog of the correct type.

The Durbar Kennel entries for the Darjeeling Show have been cancelled.

FORTHCOMING SHOWS.

Arrangements for the Calcutta Kennel Club Seventh Championship Show are already in hand. Mr. L. M. Medley will, it is believed, undertake the duties of Honourary Secretary. The show will probably take place during the first week in February next.

After the Darjeeling show the next fixture will no doubt be Lahore which will take place during Xmas week, Calcutta will follow, then Lucknow, finishing up with Bombay.

THE DALMATIAN.

Considering the suitability of the Dalmatian to India and the fact that he responds readily to training it is surprising that so few of these fine animals are seen in this country.

Buffon I think named the Dalmatian the Bengal Harrier, and Youatt was equally as bad when he classed him with the Great Dane. The Dalmatian is a dog of ancient lineage and with as straight a record as almost any dog. He was the hound that came from Dalmatia, and there is little reason to doubt that he was of the same class of hound that the Pointer emanated from. Even to this day they have very much in common in appearance, habits and disposition, and the Dalmatian is by no means a bad shooting dog, providing proper attention is paid to his training.

The Dalmatian is primarily a dog that should be able to run all day long, and that not over springy pasture land but on hard roads and paved thoroughfares; therefore he should be as nearly perfect in legs, feet, shoulders and running symmetry as possible. Then, when you have got a dog that can run, the spots should count, but not the spotting first. Spotting is well enough if we merely consider the Dalmatian as a dog about the premises, but the moment we undertake to judge him as a coach or sporting dog than the principal requirement is the conformation that will enable him to run and get over the ground. Really it is a very difficult thing to do justice in a Dalmatian class, or at least to give satisfaction, for if it is a judge who goes for sporting because it is easier than conformation plus sporting, the owner of a well-made dog feels aggrieved, and, vice versâ, the man who must have a dog that can run has a disgruntled exhibitor in the owner of the bad-shouldered, nicely marked dog who has won a whole lot of prizes elsewhere. It is really one of those breeds when the judge should practise the art of self-defence and resort to point judging; then if he does not do the dog well it is the dog's fault and not his.

The Dalmatian takes naturally to horses and is never happier than when running either in advance or underneath the carriage and close behind the horses.

Probably the most absurd statement regarding the development of the Dalmatian, and repeated in one of our latest dog books, is that he is a production of a cross with the bull terrier, or that the bull terrier has been used to improve the Dalmatian. How a dog that was so thoroughly established in 1800 could be improved by a dog not even known until 1825 or thereabouts is somewhat beyond comprehension. By a vivid stretch of imagination one might hold that the mottling sometimes seen on the skin of the bull terrier was caused by a cross with the Dalmatian, but the bull terrier to help in building up the Dalmatian is ridiculous.

The standard given is that of the English Dalmatian Club; but in order to assist the novice who contemplates taking up the fancy it may be said that the Dalmatian should be built very much upon the lines of a good pointer, but with more substance than gives the idea that the dog is a strongly built one and capable of travelling easily at a moderately fast pace for a distance. A writer has said "heavy in bone," as if one were speaking of a mastiff. You do not say heavy in bone with regard to a pointer, but good in bone, meaning that the dog must not look light in that respect; and so with this dog. The head is rather difficult to describe, but the idea can be best conveyed by stating that it must not be that of a good pointer, but more akin to what might be called weak in head in a pointer, with less squareness and lip. The eye should be smaller and the expression brighter than that of the pointer, with the ears higher on the head. The standard calls for spotted ears, but many typical specimens have black ears. Of course they should be of a size to suit the dog and not appear large and heavy. The carriage of the tail should not be too much curled. The number of spots on a dog has nothing to do with the case; what does count, is sharpness of outline, the evenness with which they are distributed and their regularity as to size.

Descriptive Particulars.

The Dalmatian in many particulars much resembles the pointer, more specially in size, build and outline, though the markings peculiar to this breed are a very important feature and highly valued.

General Appearance.—The Dalmatian should represent a strong, muscular and active dog, symmetrical in outline and free from coarseness and lumber; capable of great endurance, combined with a fair amount of speed.

Head—Should be of fair length, the skull flat, rather broad between the ears, and moderately well defined at the temples, i.e., exhibiting a moderate amount of stop and not in one straight line from the nose to the occiput bone, as required in a bull terrier. It should be entirely free from wrinkle.

Muzzle—Should be strong and powerful; the lips clean fitting the jaw moderately close.

Eyes—Should be set moderately well apart and of medium size, round, bright and sparkling, with an intelligent expression, their colour greatly depending on the markings of the dog. In the black-spotted variety the eyes should be dark (black or dark brown); in the liver-spotted variety they should be light (yellow or light brown).

Rim round the eyes—In the black-spotted variety should be black, in the liver-spotted variety, brown—never flesh coloured in either.

Ears—Should be set on rather high, of moderate size, rather wide at the base and gradually tapering to a rounded point. They should be carried close to the head, be thin and fine in texture.

Nose—In the black-spotted variety should always be black, in the liver-spotted variety, always brown.

Neck and Shoulders.—The neck should be fairly long, nicely arched, light and tapering, and entirely free from throatiness. The shoulders should be moderately oblique, clean and muscular, noting speed.

Body, Back, Chest and Loins.—The chest should not be too wide but very deep and capacious, ribs moderately well sprung, never rounded like barrel hoops (which would indicate want of speed), the back powerful; loin strong, muscular and slightly arched.

Legs and Feet—Are of great importance. The forelegs should be perfectly straight, strong and heavy in bone; elbows close to the body. Feet feet round, compact, with well-arched toes (cat foot), and round, tough, elastic pads. In the hind legs the muscles should be clean though well defined; hocks well let down.

Nails—In the black-spotted variety, black and white.

Tail—Should not be too long, strong at the insertion and gradually tapering toward the end, free from coarseness. It should not be inserted too low down, but carried with a slight curve upward, and never curled. It should be spotted, the more profusely the better.

Coat—Should be short, hard, dense, and fine, sleek and glossy in appearance, but neither woolly nor silky.

Colour and Markings.—These are most important points. The ground colour in both varieties should be pure white, very decided and not intermixed. The colour of the spots in the black-spotted variety should be black, the deeper and richer the black the better; in the liver-spotted variety they should be brown. The spots should not intermingle but be as round and well defined as possible the more distinct the better; in size they should be from that of a four-anna bit to a rupee. The spots on head, face, legs, tail and extremities to be smaller than those on the body.

Weight.—Dogs 55lbs., bitches 50lbs.

ECONOMIC ZOOLOGY—A NEGLECTED INDUSTRY.

The now well-known and we believe successful experiment of Sir William Ingram of Illustrated London News fame, who also possesses "Tucker's Valley," an important old-established estate in the north-west corner of Trinidad, West Indies, to introduce and acclimatize Birds of Paradise into Little Tobago, West Indies, coupled with repeated articles or suggestions in the columns of our contemporaries from time to time, on the advisability of transferring birds or animals of economic value from one part of the world to another, have caused us to publish the following remarks. Whilst in the Tobago experiment the initiative is due to Sir William Ingram, the actual and difficult task of transporting the birds, each in a separate cage, for they are very quarrelsome, was carried out by Mr. Wilfred Frost, of London, and we would say that provided we have the man experienced in the ways of tropical (or other) birds and animals, and willing to devote the great care and attention to them that they need, there is practically no bird or animal of economic value, that cannot be brought to London in the same way as Wickham brought the first Hevea rubber plants from the Tapajos plateau up the Amazon to Kew, and the species then sent on to elsewhere as supplies are called for and desired. The only query is, who can and will undertake such work? The Zoological Society, as at present constituted, we do not believe could or would do so. Under Mr. Bartlett in days gone by it could have done so, and although many have the idea that originally it was intended that the Society should undertake such work, on lines similar to Kew with economic plants, in return for certain privileges it enjoys, we could contend that the present secretary and council are not interested in, or at least have shown no signs of carrying out such work, and that a new society will have to be formed of members who have had long experience and a careful training in the tropics. Unless therefore a considerable amount of new blood be introduced into the present Council, we must look elsewhere than to those who run the "Zoo" for the introduction and acclimatization of animals into centres where they do not already exist or are there only in small numbers, and we are publishing these notes, in the hope and belief that many who are anxious to see our tropical colonies and dependencies flourish will come in and assist in the matter with their influence and advice.

We have discussed the question of economic zoology with many of our visitors from the tropics and all agree that it is a science or industry, whichever you choose to call it, that has been shamefully neglected, and that many centres are the poorer for this neglect. Whilst not blaming existing ostrich farmers for keeping that flourishing industry to themselves as much as possible, steps ought long ago to have been taken to spread the industry, for we are repeatedly receiving inquiries from India, etc., for books on ostrich farming, or addresses of those able to supply birds and eggs, showing how anxious many are to start such farms. This is the class of work that the Zoological or similar society should undertake; but have they ever done so?

The prize of 10,000 francs offered by a French firm for the first Garcero or osprey farm established in French territory, where the feathers could be collected as is done with ostriches, without harming, and much less killing the birds, is an example that should be followed by this country. What has the Zoological Society done to encourage such an industry? Up to now the "Zoo" itself (i.e., the Zoological Gardens) has been the chief sign of the Society's existence, except for occasional reports of meetings. Of any sense of duty to the nation at large from an economic point of view, or any signs of the Society arranging to develop trade through the agency and help of their able members in all parts of the world, no hint or sign has, as yet, been vouchsafed so far as we can trace. We do not wish to infer that this is due to unwillingness on the part of members, or at least on the part of the bulk of them, but the Council seem so occupied in "setting their house (or houses) in order" that they have no time nor thought left for anything outside; that is, the majority on the Council have not. We believe, however, that if some of the members had their way things would be very different.

In the important review published by Mr. Douglas Dewar, I.C.S., in the Indian Forester in 1910 (p. 709) on our book "Aigrettes and Birdskins,"* that gentleman expresses his perfect willingness to see osprey farms established in India, and further states that Mr. Frank Finn long ago suggested such a thing. Both these gentlemen, therefore, are in favour of establishing osprey farms in the same way as has been so successfully done with ostrich farms, and yet in the first place the ostriches were quite wild, and the feathers far less valuable than they are to-day. On osprey farms the birds could be bred in semi-captivity until, in the second or third generation, they would become sufficiently domesticated to be allowed almost complete freedom, provided steps were taken to prevent the birds being frightened sufficiently to drive them away. None of those so far as we are aware who have been so busy preaching against the exportation of feathers from India, can claim to have had the experience, or to have published works on Indian and other bird-life, that can in any way approach those of Messrs. Dewar and Finn. Everyone, therefore, who wishes to see India developed in all ways possible will agree with us, that since both osprey and ostrich farms can be established in India to everyone's advantage, including the birds, which would then run far less chance of being exterminated than they do now, the sooner steps are taken to carry out this recommendation the better for all. Meanwhile it is interesting to note that according to the Times of Ceylon, Mr. John Hagenbeck, the Hamburg naturalist, hopes to introduce ostrich farming into Ceylon, on lines similar to those of his brother Carl, who has been a successful breeder of ostriches at Stellingen, Germany, for the last three years, that, too, in spite of a somewhat unfavourable climate, it being damp and foggy at times in that district.

It was Mr. Finn, we believe, who recommended that the vicuna should be domesticated like sheep, camels, llamas, or goats, and their wool regularly collected by shearing the live animal, and shipped to Europe or America. Here we have an animal that at present is rapidly becoming scarce, yet easily bred and propagated under suitable conditions and of considerable economic value on account of the length, warmth, softness and lightness of its wool. The wool, we believe, at present is mainly if not entirely obtained by clubbing the animal to kill it, a method as brutal to the vicuna as it is wasteful from the point of view of economics. It would probably be found that vicunas and ostriches could often be bred, and would do well together on the same farm. Chinchillas in Chili, and many, possibly most, of the animals whose furs are so highly prized, could surely be bred in fenced-in-or otherwise confined areas in a similar manner, and their numbers thereby greatly increased so as to ensure supplies for trade purposes. Another example of what could be done in this way would be the breeding and rearing of horses where possible on cocoa-nut estates as outlined in our leading article last month.

Peacock-tail feathers, known to the trade as "eyes," when there was such a rage for them in Paris a little while back, sold we believe at 1s. to 1s. 6d. each. Think what a profit this would mean to the breeder of peafowls in India when even a penny a feather leaves a profit. So long as the present mischievous notification, in force throughout British India, prevents the export of feathers, peacock or otherwise, for trade purposes other than for fishing-tackle making, such an industry is unfortunately debarred to India, although the birds are classified as domesticated and the flesh makes excellent eating. If only the extremists and ultra-humanitarians (to use Mr. Lewis Harcourt's own phrase in the House of Commons on 27th June, in discussing experimenting on animals re beri-beri) could recognize that the feathers and even the skins of the birds could be used without causing any cruelty, or without fear of extermination (on the contrary their numbers would probably greatly increase, as is the case with all animals and birds bred for the use of mankind), if this was only recognized and the restrictions removed, it is not difficult to realize what benefits would accrue to the thrifty inhabitants of India, and to the millinery trade of this country.

If, therefore, it could be arranged for the heads of the India, and the Colonial Office, the more far-seeing members of the Zoological Society and others, to come together and discuss the matter, we feel certain that the science and practice of economic zoology could be, and would be, raised to the same level of utility as economic botany, and the results prove as beneficial to the species of avi-fauna utilized in the tropics and elsewhere, as their skins, fur, feathers, wool, etc., would prove useful to the arts and crafts of this and other countries. We hope and believe we shall hear more of the matter.—Tropical Life.

EMERGENCY DEVICES FOR HORSEMEN.

The value of a little ingenuity in the moment of emergency by the man who is endued with a slightly inventive turn of mind is nowhere more appreciated than in the field whether with hounds or without; and knowledge of the way to turn accessible means to prompt account may often be the means of avoiding the loss of a run or, it may well happen, of escaping more serious misfortune. We are moved to this reflection by recalling the sight of a horseman "stranded" by a broken stirrup leather, a mishap of comparatively small account when the horse is one with a good mouth, but disabling when it occurs to the rider of a determined puller, who cannot afford to dispense with any advantage over the headstrong brute. A broken leather looks irreparable, but it is really a mishap that can be repaired—for the time—with the least possible difficulty and delay. In nineteen cases out of twenty the leather "goes" at the hole in use; we have seen leathers break at the eye of the stirrup, but that is not usual, if only because the place is more under the rider's notice and the increasing weakness arrests attention in time to anticipate breakage. It often happens that the stirrup is used at its shortest and thus it is inconvenient to use the next hole: in that case the dodge is to push the buckle under the saddle-bar, pass the free end through the eye of the stirrup and make a single knot in the leather itself, allowing for the stretching which comes from the tightening knot as the weight draws it. A broken girth may be repaired in a few moments to serve for the day, if not actually rotten: if a penknife and a bootlace are available the broken ends may be overlaid eight inches and holes pierced to lace them securely together: failing the bootlace, or string, cut, about two inches above the fracture, in each half of the girth a longitudinal hole in length about two-thirds the width of the girth; pass the buckle end of each half through the hole in the other half and draw together; and you have an unsightly but sufficiently reliable girth, long enough to reach the tugs. Care should be taken, of course, that the repaired girth should lie well over the sound one to avoid as far as may be the risk of galling. A broken bit is fortunately a rare accident, but we have known it occur: the best thing to do under these circumstances is to fasten the rein, the middle, round the lower jaw, not tightly, but with such security that it cannot slip down, and steer the horse with that. The dodge is a risky one to try with a puller, but with an animal whose mouth is only reasonably good it answers perfectly. A broken rein can be repaired for the time being by cutting a longitudinal slit and passing the free end (made by unbuckling or cutting) through the slit as through a noose about the bit ring. A broken girth-tug is a troublesome mishap, but if the rider be wearing a silk neck-kerchief he has means of temporary repair to his hand: take the girth off the sound tug and with the help of the silk kerchief, passed through the buckles, make it into a surcingle over the saddle-flaps. The knots and buckles come at spots not the most comfortable for the rider's thighs, but necessity knows no law and must dispense with comfort.

There is ample scope for ingenuity when horse or pony gets wedged on his back in a ditch a fall which we have all seen more or less frequently. The pony in this situation may be hauled out by main force, with stirrup leathers looped above the fetlocks, but there is a better dodge for recovering either horse or pony if there be a few feet of ditch at the tail end. Noose round each foreleg a stirrup leather and to each add another stirrup leather to give plenty of hold; then let two or three men haul on each, in such wise that they shall pull the animal on to his quarters, as it were into a sitting position; another couple of men being ready with two leathers buckled together pass theirs under his neck as near the withers as they can place it; and the horse can be pulled over his own tail on to his feet. He will come over much more easily than might be expected. This is a particularly useful method to employ if the rider is underneath his mount, as he can be drawn out with much less risk of injury than attends the attempt to drag the horse out by main force. Should the rider be lying under the quarters it is necessary to reverse the method and haul the horse's quarters over his head; in doing this there is danger of breaking the animal's neck; but if the choice lies between that risk and injury to the rider there can be no hesitation. The neck of a horse will stand rougher handling than might be supposed; we have seen a sixteen hand hunter hauled out of a shallow well by cart ropes knotted loosely round his neck and he was brought to the surface none the worse of the experience. When this drastic method is adopted the fastening should come under the jaws, so that the "bearing" may fall about six inches behind the ears. The tail of the horse has immense strength in it and may be used as a handle for securing rope without risk of injury, when necessary; it may not be generally known that in old days in England, and till a later date in Ireland, it was the custom to attach the harrow to the tail of the horse by way of "resting" him; sometimes as a regular practice. When we consider the size and strength of the bones and tissues that compose this continuation of the spine the reasonableness of the method appears; though possibly the ardent member of the R.S.P.C.A. might think it furnished ground for protest. When circumstances require leverage at the rear end of horse or pony it is far better to use the tail than to put strain on the legs; in the one case no damage is likely to result, in the other—well we all know what may follow ill-advised treatment of legs.

It is noticeable that when a horse falls at a jump he rarely comes down otherwise than to the right; and as the rider has the reins in his left hand he receives certain physical encouragement to fall to the left; hence we have the explanation of the frequency with which the man falls clear: it does sometimes happen that the horse turns a somersault and comes down on the rider, and when he is at all blown he is only too likely to remain lying upon him. If such a thing as a stout bamboo, post or length of rail happen to be at hand this should be used at once to thrust under the prostrate horse as near the man as possible and employed as a lever to relieve the sufferer of the weight; if the post be long enough a single man can do much to give the necessary relief while others are coming to aid. If possible the horse should be rolled and not dragged off the man; but in either case the risk of broken bones is serious enough. When a fall occurs in such wise that the fallen rider's head is in danger from the horse's hoofs the obvious thing to do is to strip off one's own saddle at once and place about his head; a fractured skull has been avoided on several occasions by timely application of this preventive. The great thing in cases of emergency is readiness in making use of means at hand; but there are some dodges which every horseman should know and have at his finger-ends for employment on the instant, either in the interests of horse, a fellow or himself.

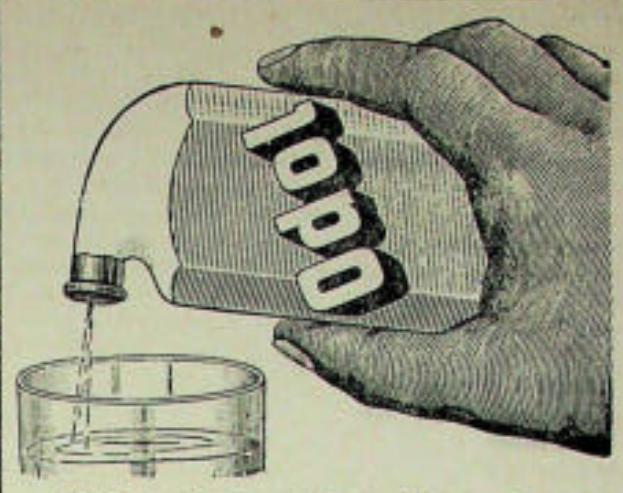
Sporting & Athletic Notes.



WITH reference to the suit in which the W.I.T.C. sued the Secretary of State for India to recover difference between the rate of taxation imposed upon the Poona race-course up to 1908 and the rate imposed since that date, the said sum amounting to Rs. 32,699-4-7, and in which suit the W.I.T.C. were successful; and with reference to a recent announcement in the press that the Commissioner of Police had a scheme cut and dried for "enhancing" the taxation upon the various "sporting clubs" on the Calcutta maidan, it may be pointed out and we do so upon very good authority that there is so far no scheme before the Bengal Government and that there is no present intention to in any way interfere with existing arrangements. All "sporting clubs" including the C.T.C. at present pay a ground rent and there has not hitherto been any scheme put forward for any enhancement of such rent. It is possible that the rents paid for the locations allotted to the various "sporting clubs" may be raised, but it is not correct to say that the Commissioner of Police has already formulated a scheme of taxation. The matter in the first place would hardly rest with the Commissioner of Police and no "enhancement" of either rent or taxes could be brought in without the sanction of the Local Government. No scheme or suggestions have so far been sent up to the Government of Bengal and the announcement in the press was therefore probably as much news to the Government of Bengal as it was to most other people. In this connection and with reference to the notes published in our last issue upon a leaderette in a contemporary stating that a new Gambling Act was practically ready and also with reference to an Associated Press Telegram stating that this new Bill would be considered at a meeting of the Executive Council of Bengal on the 22nd it may be as well to state that no new Bill is ready or even yet considered. All that is about to happen, and this is an open secret and has been so for some time past, is that the present Acts being found inoperative so far as the suppression of cotton-gambling is concerned, and the recent prosecutions having failed, it is probable that as a preliminary to an Act consolidating the Indian Gambling Act, a short Bill may be introduced at an early session of the Legislative Council of the Government of Bengal in November specially dealing with cotton-gambling but with nothing else. The consolidation and amendment of the Gambling Act upon the lines of the Street Betting Act (1906) England is possibly in contemplation, but this will not as is hinted by the Associated Press will be undertaken on the 22nd instant and it is obviously absurd to suggest that it would be, for, as we ventured to point out in our notes in the last issue of this paper, the subject is too wide a one to be tackled in the off-hand manner that has been suggested, and in any case the Bill would in the first place have to be drafted and in the next brought before the Legislative Council. This would be in due course sent up to India and from that Government to the Secretary of State from whom it would come back to Bengal through the self-same channels through which it had travelled upwards! The Street Betting Act at home stopped, or practically stopped what are known as "bucket-shops" and more or less confined betting upon horse racing to race-courses and was and is in no way an Act suppressing bookmakers. It is possible that the Gambling Act in India when consolidated and amended may put a stop to betting establishments and bookmakers not licensed by the C.T.C., but it will go no further than this. The new legislation will not, however, interfere so far as our information goes with what is known as S. P. business and in any case will not be of the crack brained faddist ants-every thing order! Bengal may thank her lucky stars that she has a ruler who is a level-headed man of the world, who does not see matters through a narrow angled lens and who does not consider that all sport connected with the noble animal is but the ante-room to a torrid place not mentioned in polite conversation. Nothing is in the least bit likely to be done in haste and therefore all the recent announcements may be characterised as somewhat premature and unauthorised. Any scheme submitted by the Commissioner of Police for an enhancement of the rates paid by sporting clubs in the Calcutta maidan has not the remotest connection with any Act either on the anvil or in existence dealing with the so-called gambling evil.

IN the case of the W.I.T.C. vs. the Secretary of State for India the detailed facts were shortly as follows:—Mr. Cecil Grey, Secretary, on behalf of himself and other members of the Western India Turf Club sued the Secretary of State for India, members of the Poona Cantonment Committee, and the Cantonment Magistrate of Poona, for Rs. 32,699-4-7, being the excess of taxation for three and a half years levied by the defendants on plantiff's property consisting of the Race Course and the buildings standing thereon. Up to October, 1908, the W.I.T.C. properties in Poona were taxed at the rate of Rs. 201-8-4 a year, but then the Cantonment Magistrate raised the tax to Rs. 9,544-2-6 a year.

The Judge found that the enhancement was illegal and gave a decree in favour of the plaintiffs for the full amount of the claim, with costs, against the Secretary of State, but made the plaintiff liable for the costs of the second and third defendants.

The suit had been in contemplation, so we are given to understand, for some time past, but has only now been brought to judgment. So far no notice of appeal has been lodged and upon the disclosed facts it seems to be improbable that the matter will be carried farther.

BYRAMJEE, who has had his license to train withdrawn by the Stewards of the W.I.T.C., was one of the best known and cleverest trainers on the Poona and Bombay courses and amongst his patrons was the Military Secretary to the Governor of Bombay. The deletion of Byramjee's string temporarily will create a distinct void in racing circles both in the Bombay Presidency and in Calcutta, where he was almost equally well known, for he was always a familiar figure at the cold weather gatherings. Amongst the owners Byramjee trained for were Mr. R. R. S., Kelso, Garda and Forage and the principal units in the string were Macann, Lithosian, Langton, Paul Pry, Beckmesser, Hilarity, Pincher, Bright Metal, Lumination, Lady Erna, The Loaf, Chobham, Bombastic, Chivalry, Leo Grand, Mauveron, Encourage and Russley Rose. All these horses and ponies will have to temporarily find a new trainer, but we have not yet heard to whom they are to be transferred. It is not our intention to pass any comment upon the justice or otherwise of the action of the Stewards of the W.I.T.C., but we presume that drastic measures such as these would not have been adopted without full consideration. It has been public property of course for some time past that the Stewards contemplated taking strong measures towards certain stables but no direct accusations were made. During the last Bombay Meeting the air was thick with rumours that the hatchet was about to descend upon certain persons and it will be remembered by all who attended that function that there was a case in which, however, the Stewards felt that they need not sufficient evidence to proceed further. Whether their present action is the outcome of what was then alleged to have happened we are not in a position to say.

Odol does more than cleanse and beautify the teeth; it preserves them from decay; it refreshes the whole mouth to the point of exhilaration, keeps the gums healthy and free from tenderness, and delightfully perfumes the breath.

AT the autumn meeting in Singapore a jockey named Ross was expelled and fined for what they called "careless riding" and the report in the Singapore Free Press gives us the following somewhat entertaining comment upon the occurrence:—

"It was unhappy that the afternoon was marred by a shocking bit of riding by Ross. Generally this boy is supposed to be one of the best we have here. Yesterday he gave an exhibition which would have disgraced an apprentice, who was so young that he fancied he was given a mount for his own benefit and not to try and win properly for his masters. One acquits Ross of any wrong intention as regards the win, but it is impossible to acquit him of very bad riding in which he apparently put his personal feelings before the duty he owed to his employers. He had the race won on The Nun from the beginning of the straight, he had it won all up the straight, yet he deliberately allowed Tom Thumb to get on terms and even then made no serious attempt as far as could be seen to get The Nun going, to beat the challenger. There was a stewards' enquiry with a result that Ross was fined $100 for grossly careless riding and the general opinion, as expressed by all who saw the race, was that he got off absurdly lightly."

As an achievement in damming with faint praise this is distinctly above the average mark. The Stewards, however, considered the case amply met by a fine. Amongst horses running at this meeting was an American bred one named Riversdale, presumably Mr. Galstaun's old friend who used to race over hurdles when he was up here. The Governor's Cup was won by Mr. Amber's Crown Derby ridden by Ross, to whom our Singapore contemporary gave such a dose of pepper and the race resulted in a tremendous contest, Crown Derby winning a neck from Mr. Kole's Helen of Troy. The local reporter says in giving the detailed report of this race that both jockeys "worked like demons"! They apparently therefore can sometimes be kind!! The value of the Singapore Governor's Cup is $2,000 and the cup presented by H. E. Sir Arthur Young and the distance is 1½ mile. There are no horses coming up to Calcutta this year from Singapore so far as our present information goes.

presumably as unexpected by his own immediate connections as it was by the general public, as he went out at the forlorn odds of 33 to 1 and had not prior to that had a "figure." He had only 6st. 10lb. and was ridden by the apprentice Clout and trained by Goodgames. Balscadden, whose recent victories gave every warrant for his support, was a warm favourite up to the end and Tootles was also well backed, but the favourite was never prominent according to the received reports and Tootles was well beaten some way from home by this flying descendant of a great stayer (Musket). Warlingham won early this season the Hertfordshire Handicap, 1 mile 3 furlongs, beating Imperious and a fair horse in Tweedledum, who is owned by Mr. Sievier. He then ran second in the Netheravon Handicap, 1 mile 5 furlongs to Sea Water, who only beat him a head and was then and there ticketted a good stayer by the cognoscente. At Goodwood he also ran well, finishing a close third in the Goodwood Plate, 2 miles 3 furlongs to Irish Marine and Windthorpe, the weights being 8st. 11lb., 6st. 13lb. and 7st. 3lb. respectively. Last year the Cesarewitch was won by Willonyx, 4 years, from Martingale II, 3 years and Papavero, 4 years and a three-year-old has not won since 1909 when Submit was successful and prior to that not since 1901 Balsarroch's year.

The starting gate is still a subject for comment and criticism in England where owing to a variety of causes—chiefly the ignorance and prejudice of trainers and the obstinacy of certain jockeys—it does not always work successfully. A London paper recently reproduced a photograph showing the field for the Melbourne Cup lined up at the tapes, the whole lot standing alert but almost as steady as troop horses on parade, and the sporting notes of the paper asks why it is that there are so many unequal starts in England. He writes:—

"What is the matter with so many of our horses to make them disorderly at the post? Is there something in the blood antagonistic to the system of mechanical starting? Are they properly schooled at the gate? These questions will occur to every impartial racegoer who looks at a picture of the Melbourne Cup start which appears on page 11. It does not show the actual send-off, but obviously that is very imminent—the button is about to be pressed. Perhaps no start in this country is more closely watched than that for the Great Metropolitan at Epsom, which takes place in front of the stands under the eyes of thousands, and one can imagine the astonishment there would be if Mr. Willoughby got nineteen horses lined up as they are in this Melbourne Cup without at once releasing the tapes. He would be sarcastically asked what he was waiting for.

"Striking features of this picture are the close packing of the horses and their keen alertness. Observe the pricked ears, the eyes fixed on the tapes. They irresistibly suggest a line of soldiers standing to attention waiting for the sharply uttered word of command. Christmas Daisy used to stand like that. He was oblivious to everything but the tapes, and these he watched with the concentration of a hundred yards' record breaker listening for the pistol to crack. When they flew up he flew off—with two Cambridgeshires. Of all the quick beginners the Turf has known he probably was the fastest, a phenomenon, a creature who sort of hurled himself into space. I am not likening every one of the Melbourne Cup nineteen to Christmas Daisy—that would be silly—but there is something very striking about their alertness and the close and even line. Enemies of the standing start find their chief argument in its alleged opposition to nature. Not much evidence of this is discernible in the picture, and I do not suppose it will be contended that nature in the racehorse 'down under' differs much from nature in the purely British thoroughbred.

"What may be and probably is different is the temperament of the horses out there as compared with ours. Formerly the Australian was altogether a more sober and sedate beast than his British brother, and this characteristic still survives to an extent, though the influence of the excitable Galopin blood becomes greater every year. Then there is the question of schooling horses at the gate. This I should say is much more thoroughly carried out 'down under' than it is by our trainers as a body. Many of them are conscientious enough in this respect, but others appear to think a little elementary instruction sufficient for their young horses at home, leaving them to improve from public experience, and it needs no pointing out what this means in the way of fractiousness at the post. No doubt there are bad starts in Australia. We get some excellent ones over here, but unfortunately far too many unequal ones. This picture of the Melbourne Cup line suggests that by temperament and training, plus a firm handling of jockeys, the 'down under' horse makes a bigger success of the gate than has so far been achieved with it in this country. I say this as a staunch upholder of the system."

The General Manager of the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway has notified owners of race horses that their trainers may now break journey at Waltair Station on the East Coast to rest their strings when travelling between Bangalore and Calcutta twice a year. This has hitherto been a strenuous journey for the animals and the boon is likely to be widely appreciated by others besides owners of racers.

In our last issue we stated that Brogue had been leased by Mr. Galstaun to Lady Jenkins in whose colours the mare would run during the coming cold weather. A correspondent writes to point out that, our information is incorrect as Brogue is now the property of Mr. Mathuradass Goculdass of Bombay, having been purchased for £2,500.

F. Wootton has again been in trouble. He was reported by the Stewards of the Birmingham meeting for crossing in the Guernsey Welter on the 30th ultimo. The Stewards of the Jockey Club decided that though they found upon the evidence that Wootton did not keep a straight course, they did not consider they would be justified in taking further action.

How much longer will it be ere all true sporting spirit utterly dies out! In practically every athletic contest in these days, whether it be international or merely local in character, how seldom do we find the defeated taking their gruel in the fine old crusted spirit all English-speaking people were once so justly proud of! Win, tie or wrangle is the motto. If you win, display an elation and a dung-hill crowing over your adversary; explain in boresome "interviews" to press reporters "How I won" and pose and "swank" wholesale. If you lose, clutch wildly at any and every trivial excuse in the course of your miserable explanations as to "Why I lost" and so on throughout the piece.

We have got quite used to American methods in these matters; now Australia is going to give us a taste of her capabilities. Mr. Middleton, the coach of the Australian eight, interviewed on his return from the Olympic Games, declared that the Leander crew was lucky at Stockholm, the Australians being beaten by two turns in the course involving the loss of a length and a half. He says that under level conditions the Australians would win nine times out of ten. Leander were aware of this, and therefore refused the Daily Mail suggestion of a third race.

Mr. Middleton states that no Henley crew excepting Leander surpassed an ordinary Sydney maiden eight.

He accuses Leander of lack of sportsmanship in instigating the original arrangement whereby they would only row one race on the final day, whereas the Australians were allotted two races. He complains that Leander did not congratulate the Australians at the termination of the Henley race, and contrasts this with the cordiality of the defeated Canadians on the same occasion and with the Australian cheers for Leander at Stockholm. He ridicules the Leander men's "swank," pink socks, turned-up trousers, and affected speech. Mr. Middleton declares that he will not retract any of these criticisms.

It is a dire threat, no doubt, but most of us will survive it. But how petulant, ill-bred and lacking in the very quality of sportsmanship which he finds missing in the Olympic victors and the Leander crew is the splenetic attack of this person. Leander has always stood for all that is best in amateur sport. The crew, as a rule, consists of the finest oarsmen produced by Oxford and Cambridge, so that no apology is really needed for them. Of course men of the Middleton type could hardly be expected, perhaps, to understand and appreciate English gentlemen; but they are expected to be approximately accurate as to their facts. Good breeding is not essential to the setting out of a correct statement.

Let us look at the facts and Mr. Middleton's statements. First of all he declares that the Australians were only beaten at Stockholm owing to the two turns in the course, which involved a loss of a length and a half. Now, it is a well-known fact that the Stockholm course had been very carefully measured by professional engineers on the ice, and, according to their certificate, there was a difference between the two stations of eleven centimetres; that is, a matter of three or four inches.

At Henley, on 6th July the Australians defeated Leander in the final for the Grand Challenge Cup. On 18th July Leander defeated the Australians in the second round of the Olympic eights at Stockholm. Now, at Henley the Australians were trained to the very minute and were absolutely at the top of their form. Leander, on the contrary, were not up to "concert pitch." They were more intent on the Olympic Regatta. This is proved by the fact that before the regatta at Stockholm, Leander put in some tremendously hard work; while the Australians, feeling overtrained, eased up considerably and did very little work.

Mr. Middleton states that Leander refused the Daily Mail's suggestion to row a third race over the Thames championship course because they feared defeat. This is a very ungenerous statement to make. The Australian crew had come over to Europe on a trip, and a few days more or less made no difference. The Leander men, for the most part, are engaged in business. They had already given up much time both to row at Henley and to represent their country in the Olympic Games. It was impossible for the eight, or, at any rate, some members of it, to devote any more more time to rowing then.

Then follows yet another accusation—namely, that Leander instigated the original arrangement whereby they would row only one race on the final day, whereas the Australians were allotted two. As a matter of fact, Leander rowed two races on the final day, defeating Berlin and New College.

Mr. Middleton's ridicule of Leander men's "swank" pink socks, turned-up trousers, and affected speech is puerile. As far as the socks are concerned, it may be that Mr. Middleton is not aware that pink is the Leander colour.

The following is the draw for the Barton Cup Polo Tournament which commenced at Jubbulpore on Monday—5th Fusiliers vs. the R. F. A. and the 12th Cavalry vs. the 14th Hussars; on Tuesday the 32nd Lancers vs. the Saugor Gymkhana, and the 22nd Punjabis vs. the Cavalry School.

In Monday's games the Northumberland Fusiliers (represented by Mr. Vachell, Captain Herbert, Captain Cruddas and Captain Sandilands) beat the R. F. A. (Mr. Russell, Captain Gascoigne, Mr. Fitzgibbon and Mr. Pease Watkin) by six goals to three. In the second game the 12th Cavalry (Mr. Wilson, Captain Fell, Captain Henry and Mr. Gough) beat the 14th Hussars (Mr. Ambler, Mr. Fetherstonhaugh, Captain Bruce and Mr. Hunter-Jones) by five goals to one.

The Calcutta Cricket Club will hold its annual general meeting at the Calcutta Turf Club on the 5th November at 9-30 P.M. for the purpose of receiving and passing the annual report and audited accounts for the past season, to elect officers and a general committee for the coming season and to transact any other business that may be brought forward.

Members willing to serve on the General Committee are requested to notify Mr. C. M. Pope, the Honorary Secretary.

The Grand Final of the "Country Life" Polo Tournament was played at Poona on the 16th instant when the 26th Light Cavalry beat the 3rd Sappers and Miners by 8 goals to 1. Details will be found further on.

At the annual sports meeting recently held by St. Joseph's College, Darjeeling, a youth named Brewin is credited with doing the 100 yards in level time—a feat which has been accomplished at North Point before: 10secs. for the 100 is the Indian record which stands to the credit of Mr. N. G. Pritchard in 1898 and Mr. R. H. Leadon in 1911. The time put up by Brewin brings him into line with the above fine sprinters. We trust we shall see him at the Bengal Presidency Athletic Association meeting next February when, if he can reproduce this form, he should annex the 100 yards amateur championship. Brewin also won the 220 yards the same day in 24-2/5secs. On his 100 form this is poor timing.

Lance-Corporal Gates of the Royal Fusiliers now stationed at Jubbulpore has accepted the challenge of Sergeant Houston of the Black Watch for a fifteen round contest for the Heavy Weight Championship of India. The fight is to take place some time in December and a purse of Rs. 1,000 has been put up for the contest.

Jack Johnson, the coloured Boxing Champion, is once more in trouble. He is now charged with abducting a white girl in Chicago and in consequence his fight with Sam Langford, which was to have taken place in Australia on Boxing Day, has been called off. Something always appears to come in the way of a meeting between Johnson and the three other coloured heavy-weights—Langford, Jeannette and McVea.

Jack Ward, the English light weight boxer, who was to meet Matt Wells, holder of the light weight Lonsdale belt, at the Ring on the 14th instant, was matched with Waldemar Holberg, the Dane in a fifteen-round contest at Birmingham the week the last mail left. The fight only lasted one round. Ward was much the taller, but the opening was sensational, as with tiger-like attitude Holberg at once dashed into his opponent, and Ward in the first half-minute was down for six seconds. Not letting his opponent recover again, Holberg sent in some hard swinging blows, and the Gloucester man went to the boards again for eight seconds. He was fairly staggered, and with another hard right Ward rolled over after less than two minutes of the round had elapsed, and was counted out. There was a talk of Holberg and Freddy Welsh meeting, but the men failed to come to terms regarding the division of the purse and the projected contest had to be abandoned. Welsh and Matt Wells will fight for the Light Weight Championship and the Lonsdale belt at the National Sporting Club on the 11th November. The contest is to be twenty rounds for £100 aside and a purse of £750, to be split £500 to the winner, £200 to the loser and £25 each for training expenses.

We publish further on the awards at the First Darjeeling Dog Show held last Saturday. Next week we hope to give our readers some notes on the Show. It was very well arranged and for a first show very successful in every way. Calcutta exhibitors were conspicuous in the winning list. Mrs. Robertson's Irish Terrier Easter Gift scored his third win in the open class, entitling the dog to Championship honours. Mr. Paul was a big winner with his bull dogs, Messrs. Barlow and Dinshaw Bamjee scored in the bull terrier classes. Mrs. McCully and Mr. V. L. Rees with their dachshunds, Mrs. Tredaway and Messrs. Reade and Napper won several prizes with their fox terriers. There were good classes, especially the Airedales and Dachshunds. Mrs. Tredaway's bitch scored well: entered in 8 classes she won 5 firsts, 3 seconds, 1 third and the Special for best bred in India.

A billiard tournament has been in progress at the Sports Club, Calcutta, during the past six weeks and was brought to a conclusion on the 16th instant. There were sixty-two competitors and the final brought together Mr. J. R. Abden —15 and Mr. J. Reef —50. The game was 250 up. Reef led till he reached 200 when his opponent caught and passed him. When Abden had scored 228 his opponent was still 9 points behind but he ran out in his next visit to the table with an unfinished break of 36. Mr. Reef won the first prize—a handsome silver cup, Mr. Abden also received a silver cup and won the medal for the highest break—his effort being 43. The billiard cue for the competitor beaten by the least number of points was won by Mr. A. G. Willcocks.

A team of cricketers from Allahabad propose to visit Calcutta during Christmas Week and are fixed to play Ballygunge on the 22nd and 24th December. They will, of course, meet the Calcutta C. C. and probably one or two other local clubs. A visit is

A most entertaining programme of seven items was presented at the Electric Theatre on Saturday last. The English Gazette contained several interesting English and continental items, including the race for the St. Leger, Autumn manœuvres in East Anglia and scenes at a big fire in Brandenberg. The best of the dramas was entitled "The Fighting Dervishes of the Desert" and was a really excellent film. The pictures were taken in natural surroundings in Egypt and introduced all the local atmosphere and many interesting and exciting episodes. "The Mender of Nets" and "The Deputy's Peril" were also very fine films, while of the comic items "Some Mothers-in-law" was screamingly funny and cleverly worked out.

ACID STOMACHS ARE DANGEROUS.

NINE-TENTHS OF ALL STOMACH TROUBLE SAID TO BE DUE TO ACIDITY.

A PHYSICIAN'S ADVICE ON CAUSE AND CURE.

A famous physician whose successful researches into the cause and cure of stomach and intestinal diseases have earned for him an international reputation, said in the course of a recent lecture that nearly all intestinal troubles, as well as many diseases of the vital organs, were directly traceable to a deranged condition of the stomach, which in turn was due nine times out of ten to excessive acidity, which not only irritated and inflamed the delicate lining of the stomach, but also set up gastritis and stomach ulcers. It is interesting to note that he condemns the use of patent medicines as well as of medical treatment for the stomach, stating that he and his colleagues have secured remarkable results by the use of ordinary bisurated magnesia, which, by neutralising the acidity of the food, removes the source of the trouble. He contends that it is as foolish to treat the stomach itself as it would be for a man who stepped on a tack to rub liniment on the foot without first removing the tack. Remove the tack and the foot will heal itself—neutralise the acid and stomach troubles will disappear. Irritating medicines and medical treatments are useless, so long as the contents of the stomach remain acid; remove the acidity, and there will be no need for medicine—the inflamed lining of the stomach will then heal itself. Sufferers from acidity should get a small bottle of bisurated magnesia from their chemist, and take half a teaspoonful in a quarter of a glass of hot or cold water after meals, repeating in fifteen minutes, if necessary, this being the dose which the doctor has found most efficacious in all cases.

London Week by Week.

Friday, 4th October 1912.

Monday was "Roberts' Day," and on every hand we were reminded of the fact that he was 80 years of age. It is an ungrateful world, with a short memory, and the stability of popular idols is in inverse ratio to their claim to be idolised; but the Englishman who does not acknowledge his country's debt to Lord Roberts, whom we all call "Bobs," is an exceptional specimen of perverted ignorance. One of the greatest soldiers of his time, Lord Roberts has proved himself again and again on the victorious field of battle. We have forgotten the Sikh war by now. He won his spurs in it. The Indian Mutiny is a gruesome memory or tradition. He won there the cross "For valour." The present generation understands dimly that he did great work at Kabul and Candahar. Men who served with him still speak of these achievements with an enthusiastic admiration which time has never dulled. But the most forgetful of the new men, grown up since "Bobs" became old, remember South Africa. The memory of the black week, of the national call for the country's greatest soldier, of the setting forth of an old man, as years go, on his most critical campaign, with his only son lying dead on the field which he was to convert from defeat to triumph—the memory of these things is permanent. The invincible patriotism which then enabled Lord Roberts to trample on personal feeling in order to deliver his country from great disaster, the military genius which pulled us through, the charm and greatness of character which exacted from a new army that intense devotion which other armies had given him in the past—these are a part of the man's titles of honour.

Last Sunday was Michaelmas Day, and though, by reason of the domestic upheavel consequent on the advent of builders and decorators, the bird sacred to the day did not figure on my camp table in the second bedroom (dining room pro tem), I thought of him and mused on the fact that geese are distinctly "off"; the decline and fall of a good old English custom has to be chronicled I fear. Once upon a time, when England was still Merrie England, the festival of St. Michael of All Angels was a sad day for the goose. Nicely garnished with parsely and plumped out to a fictitious rotundity with sage and onions, he was the centre of the picture, more important may be than St. Michael himself.

But how are the mighty fallen! Last Sabbath in how few homes did the ssintly bird grace the table! Both at Smithfield and Leadenhall markets one heard the same sorrowful story: "Michaelmas is not what it was." For, said the merchants, no more geese were sold on Friday and Saturday than was the case during the previous week.

The appearance of the goose at table on Michaelmas Day is a reminder, if one be necessary, that the festival of St. Michael falls upon the third quarter day of the year. Among the rural tenantry it was once the custom to give one's landlord "a goode stubble goose," in addition to the rent, with the object of softening that autocrat's heart, ensuring the renewal of the lease.

> And when the tenants come to pay their quarter's rent,
> They bring some fowl at midsummer, a dish of fish in Lent,
> At Christmas a capon, at Michaelmas a goose,
> And somewhat else at New Year's Tide, for fear their lease fly loose.

But the modern English landlord and his truculent agent are persons devoid of all sentiment, with souls that cannot rise above drains and "fair wear and tear." The brave bird, all brown and smoking, with odorous onion and fragrant herbs, touches them not; nor does the sport of the wishbone move them to mirth; and the man who tries the effect of sending a

"goode stubble goose" to the gas company or the Metropolitan Water Board in expectation of leniency is going to have a rude shock.

Discussing the subject of the municipal theatre with the Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, Sir George Alexander said he believed the time was ripe for just such an enterprise. On the monetary side of the question, I don't believe there would be the slightest difficulty. The ratepayers would not object to an extra penny or so in the pound for such a purpose. Look how willingly they subscribe to the upkeep of municipal bands. Then I believe wealthy men would come forward in aid of an enterprise which they felt would not be bungled. Look at the eagerness with which at present they found public libraries and art galleries. They seem actually to be searching for outlets for their benevolence.

A municipal theatre, he said, would be a great boon to the "artistic actors—men and women to whom their art is everything."

There are many such; but as things now stand it is really impossible for any actor or actress who makes a hit to steer clear of the commercial side of the profession. They simply are compelled to do it themselves, or have someone else undertake it for them. In the municipal theatre they would find just the niche suited to them, and for which they are suited. It is true that they might be making a financial sacrifice, but this would be more than compensated for by the artistic freedom they would possess. After all, actors are at least as public-spirited as members of other professions, and are there not, for example, many great lawyers who are ready to take a governmental position the emoluments of which are far inferior to the sums they could make as free lances? I am perfectly sure that many famous actors and actresses would be willing from time to time to give their services free to the municipal theatres.

In the past Tristan Bernard has twice provided Mr. Cyril Maude with a character that has at once suited his accomplishments admirably and won a great deal of popularity—the name-part in "Toddles" and the bogus interpreter in the one-act piece, "French as He is Spoke."

And once again Mr. Maude, making a welcome return to the Playhouse, scored heavily last Saturday night in a play by the same author; but it was almost entirely due to Mr. Maude's personality that "The Little Cafe" was so well received. He was given a shadow, and he breathed life and character and individuality and humour into it.

The play, which comes to us from France, is frankly labelled farce, and the English version, although the scene is allowed to remain in Paris, largely conveys the impression of an excellent idea indifferently worked out. The first act promises well. It looks like the foundation of "larks."

Albert Lorilfan, an insignificant waiter at an obscure Parisian cafe, suddenly inherits a large fortune. But it so happens that an adventurer hears of the approaching fortune before the waiter, and he engineers a pretty little scheme with the proprietor of the cafe. Albert is to be engaged at a huge monthly salary for twenty years, under an agreement that he shall forfeit 20,000 francs if he leaves the cafe.

The idea is that when he learns of the big sum that he has inherited he will quickly give up the position and pay forfeit. But Albert persists in hanging on to his job, because he is in love with his employer's pretty daughter. That is the first act.

And in truth, after the promising first act, the play rather falls to pieces. The edifice is scarcely worthy of the foundation. The second act is chiefly concerned with Albert's night revels in a more lively cafe than that in which he works by day, an act which smacks more of musical comedy by reason of its type of humour, and, indeed, its whole atmosphere, than of legitimate farce. And the third act consists mostly of irrelevant episodes before Albert's little love affair—which is in itself almost an "aside"—brings the curtain down on a foregone conclusion.

"The Turning Point," produced last Tuesday night by Sir George Alexander at the St. James' Theatre, is an English version of "La Flambee," a drama by Henry Kistemaeckers, which, despite its author's name, is essentially French in its form and in its sentiment, and therefore particularly difficult to present on a foreign stage.

The French scene is necessarily retained. The characters keep their French names, which, by the way, prove pitfalls to some of the players. But the atmosphere is lost. The incidental humorous scenes are dull, and the method of the acting makes the old-fashioned semi-Sardonesque construction at times perilously tiresome.

"The Turning Point" is a drama of situation. It begins with a long first act of preparation. The characters are elaborately explained, not for their own humanity but to make the big scene of the second act clear to the audience.

We learn that Lieutenant-Colonel Felt is a clever soldier, ambitious, masterful, estranged from his wife, but really in love with her, and that he is deeply in debt to one Julius Glogau, a foreign spy. We learn that Monique Felt is unhappy, and that she has decided to divorce her husband and marry the Deputy Marcel Beaucourt, that she is a good woman, that she has been a pious Catholic, but that misery has weakened her faith.

All this we know at the end of the first hour, but it is told us too slowly. The dialogue lacks bite. The acting drags.

Between Act I. and Act II. Glogau offers to release Felt from his debt if he will betray important military secrets, and in a sudden fit of indignant rage the soldier strangles him.

He goes to his wife, miserable and broken! His career is finished. He has many enemies. The world will never believe the truth. And in his weakness his wife's heart goes out to him, and all her love returns. It is the old, true story of the mother-woman, the theme that Mr. Bernard Shaw uses in his own way in "Candida," and that Mr. Barrie uses in his way in "Peter Pan" and "What Every Woman Knows." In "The Turning Point" it is translated into terms of melodrama, if you will, and is completely, if theatrically, effective.

Sir George Alexander as Felt and Miss Ethel Irving as Monique act the scene with sincerity and perfect intelligence, but they are over-restrained. They are too fearful of ranting. The play demands full-blooded playing.

Monique nerves her husband to save himself, and together they drag the body of the wretched spy back to his own room.

In the last act disaster still threatens. Beaucourt has guessed part of the truth, and Felt is determined to give himself up—even if it breaks his wife's heart. But things are put right in a scene between the two men, by far the best and most actual ten minutes in the play. Felt forces his rival to understand, and then Beaucourt forbids him to confess. The spy is dead. His death is a State secret. The whole thing must be hushed up, and both of them must go on working for France. The two men shake hands in mutual understanding. But Beaucourt will not take the hand of Monique!

Sir George Alexander's performance of Felt, with its deliberate restraint, is clever and moving. Miss Irving is pathetic and winsome as Monique, playing the quieter passages most satisfactorily, and Mr. Godfrey Tearle is strikingly strong and masculine as Beaucourt. Mr. Vivian Reynolds gives a clever little character sketch of the horrid Glogau, and Mr. J. D. Beveridge is appealingly lovable as a non-understanding bishop.

The death last Monday, at Wresham of Sir Robert Eyles Egerton, K.C.S.I., whose passing removes another veteran of the Indian Mutiny. At the time of that momentous outbreak Sir Robert Egerton was the chief magistrate at Lahore. He completed his 85th year on 15th April last.

Educated at the Edinburgh Academy and Exeter College, Oxford, he was appointed to the Indian Civil Service from Haileybury in 1850, and had served for some years as assistant magistrate and settlement officer in the Punjab, and was in charge of the Lahore Settlement from 1854 to 1858. Holding in succession a variety of important positions, he became in 1871 an additional member of the Governor-General's Council, and in 1877 Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab. He received the K.C.S.I. in 1879.

Since his retirement, in 1882, Sir Robert had taken an active part in public life in Denbighshire, having been chairman of Wrexham School Board, member of the Wrexham Board of Guardians and of the Denbighshire Standing Joint Committee, a Justice of the Peace, and Deputy-Lieutenant for the county. He was a keen cyclist until seized with illness about three years ago.

Shikar.

A WEEK'S SHIKAR.

By a Tyro.

Tired of the monotonous routine that is the lot of most of us, I resolved to spend one of the few weeks that remained before the monsoon was due, on a visit to a little place buried in primeval forest, which I had often heard of as possessing the three attributes necessary for a rest cure—beauty, solitude, and a perfect climate. The jungles were said to be too wide and dense for shikar, but arming myself with sketch book and colour box, I was willing to content myself with what the Gods should give in the way of shikar. Before setting out I ran across a friend equally fond of splashing colour, who was greatly excited at the suggestion that he should accompany me, for, as he put it, he had never seen the inside of a jungle, or Indian forest.

A day or two later we set off from the little station which was the nearest point on the railway from our destination, I on a pony, B on his bicycle. The train with the delightful inconsequence of the Indian species, had arrived two hours late, and it was half-past five before we set off on our long ride. At 8 o'clock we found ourselves descending a seemingly endless unmetalled but stony road. The sky had clouded and it was dark as pitch. Our maps had foolishly been sent on, but since I had given strict orders—against accident—that a lamp was to be sent out 5 miles to meet us, we came with some misgiving to the conclusion that we had somehow got on the wrong road, and turned back. At 9 we found another turning and at 11 we were still progressing along this road. Silent and black forest surrounded us. We had seen no sign of a habitation since we had left the station, and we resolved to camp at the first clearing. Our one water bottle had been exhausted about seven: so had the one stick of chocolate. The pony more fortunate had discovered some water in a nala.

We were almost too hungry and thirsty and dispirited to give attention to the wonderful phenomenon that was going on about us. Myriads of fire flies were flashing in every tree as if at the word of command a million tiny elves simultaneously waved their fairy lamps; or as if the great heart of each tree were pulsating with light; so every leaf flashed and was dark, and flashed again. But, alas! man cannot live on poetic effusions.

At our clearing we hobbled the pony, and composed ourselves as best we could in the ditch. Two hours later we were feeling cold and damp and suddenly wondered why we had not lit a fire. We soon had a fine blaze; and B who had been seeing tigers and panthers in every bush in the intervals of fitful sleep felt decidedly comforted. The rest of the night we spent in such sleep as the hard earth would allow us; and with the first streak of dawn we were moving back on our tracks. An hour later we heard a dog bark. Never before had the yap of the wretched "pi" been welcome to us. Now it brought us to a village and a plantain leaf of fresh milk; and men to show us the road. At 9 we came to the little bungalow at the head of the gorge. A thick mist driving up the valley shut out the landscape; but after the close heat of the plains, the chill air itself was landscape enough for our weary senses. Hot tea and some food completed our restoration. On sending for the local shikari we found to our disappointment that another man had been on the spot about a fortnight before and had scoured the jungles without result. However the air had cleared by this time and revealed some of the beauty that lay ready for our brushes, and we prepared to be content with that, if necessary. We set out at dawn next morning to climb the opposite hill and explore the clearings, where according to our shikari, in the monsoon bison and sambur grazed like domestic cattle. He gave out little hope of seeing anything yet, though the fact that a heavy storm had occurred a few days previously, and covered the open glades with light green, was in our favour. We had been climbing for perhaps half an hour, when suddenly a faint low fell on our ears. The shikari stopped and whispered "gaur," and as we stood another "moo," familiar farm-yard sound, set all doubt at rest. I had never been near bison before, and a pleasant tingling passed down my spinal column. Looking back at B who was some little way behind, I could see very similar sensations shining in his face, and hurriedly signalling to him to come along slowly, I followed the shikari. Some big rocks separated us from the glade on our right, and silently we crept behind them. The shikari climbed one of them and hurriedly descended, trembling with excitement and unable to utter a word. I went up myself and a wonderful sight met my eyes as I peered over. We were on the side of the hill, which rose scantily clothed with jungle, on our left; on our right the hill fell sheer away covered with dense evergreen forest to the valley below, where range after range of hills was dimly visible through the mist. In the little glade before us grazed a herd of bison looking like gigantic Scotch cattle as they stood in the driving mist. Two cows looked up and took stock of me, and turned to graze again, unconcerned. As I lay fascinated, trying to make out a bull, a noble beast turned and looked at me. I know now that it was comparatively a small trophy, but as the grand head looked me straight in the eyes I felt for a moment like a lurking assassin. But the fever of the hunt came on me and taking a bead on his forehead I fired. To my amazement he turned and dashed towards the rest of the herd, who crashed with one accord into the forest below. I learnt later that one ought to aim almost at the muffle of a well-raised head, and my bullet must have passed harmlessly through the mass of bone that supports the horns. As I walked disconsolately on to the glade, waiting for B to come up, I felt my arm clutched convulsively, and the shikari pointed to a little clearing on the edge of the khud. Two tigers were stalking, belly to ground, through the grass, obviously hoping to get into the thick cover before we noticed them. I thought them too far to risk a shot, but was carried away by the shikari's excitement, and pulled the trigger, only to find that in my astonishment I had not recharged my rifle. As I raised it again, the first tiger was disappearing, and no result followed my attempt at the second. They had obviously been lying among the rocks on my right watching the bison, and were startled by my first shot. They went down into the dense jungle over the khud, where a beat was impossible. B now came up and was naturally very disappointed to hear what he had missed. But we were not altogether displeased with our first experience in jungles which we expected to find blank.

After a blank day, on the third morning we set off at dawn, again in a thick mist, for the same hill. We decided to keep together as B had been able to borrow only a small bore rifle, which it was inadvisable to use without support against such game as we hoped to meet, and as we neared the heavy forest, the shikari suddenly stopped in a doubtful manner, and finally pointed into a clearing separated by some thin shrub jungle from our path. B was in front, and as I could see from his manner, could make out nothing. But when I came up, I could just decipher through the scrub four black legs with their white stockings. There was no time to be lost, so as B could still see nothing, I carefully picked my way into the scrub, and after going about 20 yards I made out a great bull grazing alone. Profiting by my first experience, I drew a bead this time behind the shoulder. He was not more than 40 yards distant, though in the mist he seemed further, and dropped without a sound. He proved an old bull with broad flattened horns, and a magnificent specimen. He was 6 feet 2 inches in height; the head measurements I give below. Horns each 29½ inches; spread (between widest part) 38½ inches; tip to tip across forehead 76 inches.

We got khubber that day of another herd of bison in the opposite direction, and we set off before dawn next morning. We had walked about two miles and things were beginning to become visible when we heard a sudden crackling under a tree by the path. None of us cared to investigate the darkness so we pushed on to our bison. We arrived at the clearing in time to see three cows slowly moving into the forest, and on our way back we discovered fresh bear tracks leading from the tree (a fig tree) where we had been startled earlier in the morning. They were leading in the direction of a bear walk which the shikari had pointed out to us before. At the end of a grassy glade between bare rocky hills the ground was suddenly washed away, and dipped straight down into the plains below. The forest grew thick from this spot downwards and there was only one place from which it was possible to climb down. We found fresh droppings here, and resolved to wait for Mr. Bruin at this little gateway on the following morning. We had been sitting under a tree about ten yards from the opening for about half an hour, and I had just whispered to B that I thought we had come too late, when he came bustling round the corner on our left like a pompous old gentleman afraid of missing his train. He had got within eight or ten yards of us before he spotted us, and he whisked round and scuttled back round the corner in a most comical manner. I saw B's rifle come up and waited in vain for the shot. As the bear disappeared I got up and ran to the corner. He was making across the rocks opposite, and I raised my gun to fire when I heard B's rifle ring out, and the bear fell. He got up and staggered a few yards, but a second shot gave him his quietus. He was a fine big beast; but colonies of gigantic ticks spoilt the look of his coat. I found B had been sitting with rifle locked when the bear took him by surprise. But all's well that ends well.

We were now not a little elated, though we did not fall in with the shikari's suggestion that we should offer a goat in thanks to the local deity. Three days yet remained to us, and we resolved to make another attempt to catch the second bison herd before they retired to cover. Fortune continued to smile, for as we reached the clearing in the dim light of the following morning we saw five or six black rocks about 300 yards from us which seemed unfamiliar. After careful investigation we decided that one moved; and doubling ourselves as low as we could into the long grass we worked our way towards them. About 120 yards from the nearest we subsided into the grass and I attempted to pick out the bull with the glasses. I was still undetermined when a loud low from a cow on the hill side showed us that we were spotted. The animal nearest to us raised his head and looked towards us. There was now light enough to dispel any doubt as to his being the lord of the herd. With head high in the air he came slowly and majestically straight towards us to discover what strange insects these were cowering in the grass. He halted at about 80 or 90 yards, showing his head only above the long grass and——. As I fired he turned and galloped toward the cows giving us his broadside as he did so. Two more shots failed to stop him, and he disappeared over the brow of the hill. We raced after him, but on reaching the crest of the hill we could see nothing but the cows lined up at the edge of the clearing. Suddenly what had at first appeared to be a rock rose and turned staggeringly towards us. A bullet knocked him on his knees, but he got up again, and lumbered down the hill against us, when I discovered to my dismay that my magazine was empty. My spare gun was far below and I very naturally turned and fled. I found B struggling with the refractory bolt of his borrowed weapon; and hastily jamming in a spare cartridge into my own rifle, I turned. The bull had stumbled on to his knees again and a bullet in the brain ended his troubles and ours. He was a typical herd bull with rounded horns, and though the horns were very fair the breadth of the sweep was 33 inches, considerably less than in the case of the old bull.

It was B's great ambition to shoot a panther, and as we had been unable to get a kill during the week, we decided to sit up on the last evening in a little clearing not far from where we had got the big bull, and where we had found fresh panther "pugs." We agreed that B should take a panther and I anything else that should come. It was about 6 o'clock and clouds had obscured the sun, when we heard a curious repeated call coming toward us through the jungle. It sounded not unlike a village buffalo with a very sore throat, and we made up our minds that it was a bison coming out to graze, though it seemed highly improbable that a bull would advertize his approach in that way. As we watched for something to appear, to our amazement, we suddenly became aware of a tiger standing and looking down the glade. After a casual inspection he came forward and walked steadily over the grass, straight toward our goat, which with its head turned the other way went on grazing serenely. Our machan had been thickly concealed on the right with a lacing of leafy boughs; and as we observed all this behind our right shoulders neither of us dare move a muscle, nor attempt to get a rifle through this screen. But I was confident that he (or rather she as we discovered) would come on, and the head of my rifle was sighted on the first space in the leafy screen. Three yards further would have brought her to her doom, when she halted. For a full half minute she gazed at the goat and then deciding that all was not well, turned off into the jungle opposite and disappeared. Though we thought at first that this was only a diplomatic move and that she would return later from another direction we were disappointed. Presently the call began again, growing fainter and fainter until it was answered by a gruffer note, and was silent. There was no doubt I think that this was the lady of the pair that I had seen on the first day, and that she had strayed away from her mate. It was the first time that either of us had seen a tiger at close quarters in his natural surroundings. I shall never forget the impression—the fierce lordly face, the perfect coat of bright yellow velvet standing out against the vivid green of the young grass. B's leave expired next day, but I could not resist the temptation to sit up again. I saw no tiger, but was rewarded by one of the most interesting sights of the week. While it was still quite light, a herd of bison came out to graze, fathers, mothers, sons, daughters and infants. They were greatly puzzled by my "tie," a young buffalo, and one young bull, coming so close under my machan that I could almost have hit him with my rifle, emitted the most weird snorts and bellows in his attempt to frighten off the intruder. They remained grazing, though obviously a little uncomfortable, for about half an hour when with a sudden gust of wind there fell a heavy clap of thunder. Whether the gust brought them an overpowering whiff of man, and settled their doubts, or the thunder warned them to seek shelter, I know not, but they instantly ran together and crashed into the jungle. And the rain came, and the night fell, and I picked my way home by the light of incessant thunder flashes, wet to the skin, with chattering teeth.

THE TURF.

NEWBURY.

WITH so many folk making late holiday, the attendance on Friday was not so strong, nor were fields so large as anticipated, at Newbury, where the Autumn Cup was the chief item in the bill. For various reasons which enter into the fortune of racing, the race fizzled out to a great extent, and failed signally to be the "key to the Cesarewitch," as it proved last year. Many fancied candidates were absent, and Darling's stable was represented by Tullibardine in preference to Preferment. The colt, a bit high on the leg, and running in a hood, looked cool and comfortable, with plenty of muscle in the right place; while Balscadden was good to know by his "varmint" head, and he also was as fit as possible. Excuses were made for the latter's Doncaster running by his unluckily striking of a patch of new soft ground, and also that he had not, perhaps, quite recovered from his Manchester exertions. Results :—

While the North of Ireland was celebrating Ulster Day and signing the Covenant, many enthusiastic Hibernians came over to see Sleipner perform in the Highclere Nursery. Irishmen are nothing if not enthusiastic, and nothing if not optimistic. Mr. Cogan's colt was entitled to the confidence reposed in him. He was estimated about 20lbs. superior to Happy Fanny, who won the Devonshire Nursery at Derby in such great style when carrying a 10lb. penalty. Despite the magnitude of the field, he was backed with the utmost confidence. It rarely occurs that such a pronounced two-year-old favourite is beaten at Newbury, but the Irish colt failed to give 21lb. to Light Brigade. There was no element of luck about the latter's victory. He had been well galloped with Drawbridge, and came out from the distance in great style, to win by three-parts of a length. He is a son of that promising young sire Picton, and his victory would provide Mr. Lionel Dugdale some compensation for the defeat of Hector. Results :—

A LIQUEUR WHISKY !!!

TREACHER'S

"EXTRA SPECIAL"

Those who desire to use themselves a Faultless Whisky or to offer their guests something out of the ordinary, should purchase this.

It is a matured blend of splendid quality and, unlike most advertised brands, may be fittingly used as an After-Dinner Liqueur, as it is sufficiently delicate in flavour to merit being sipped alone, particularly if served in a thin glass and held for a little time, in order to allow the warmth of the hand to develop the full aroma

Mixed with milk it forms a wholesome, nourishing and delicious drink the last thing at night, and is a panacea for Insomnia.

PRICE.

Extra Special Liqueur ... ... per dozen Rs. 36-0

BIRMINGHAM.

It was a pleasing and somewhat novel experience for Sir Thomas Dewar to win two races in one afternoon with animals of his own breeding; but two of the get of Forfarshire caught the judge's eye at Bromford Bridge on Monday, when Forge and Irish Demon gave Jellies a couple of winning rides, albeit, it was only by the margin of a short head in each case that they pulled through. It was an afternoon of sensationally close finishes, heads and short heads predominating, while we had another sensation in the reporting of Frank Wootton by the local Stewards to the Stewards of the Jockey Club, the trouble being the outcome of a complaint laid by Mr. A. P. Cunliffe for crossing Mr. Wigans's Jota in the Guernsey Welter. Results:—

NEWMARKET.

Everything, from a backer's point of view, was made to blossom as the rose at the opening of the 1st October Meeting, on Tuesday, when favourite after favourite won, almost to the consternation of the layers. In addition to this happy experience—for backers—the conditions could scarcely be improved upon, for the weather took a most delightful turn, the sun shining brilliantly, which helped to put the track in capital order after the overnight rain, and jockeys unanimously agreed that the Rowley Mile had seldom provided better galloping. Results:—

The magnificent performance of Prince Palatine in the Jockey Club Stakes relieved yesterday's sport of any monotony. The rivalry between him and Stedfast excites so much interest that it was not surprising to find the attendance was the best of the three days, notwithstanding that the weather was a deal colder, and that a heavy downpour of rain at noon made the outlook anything but promising. All the week the galloping has been of the very best. Had it been otherwise Mix Up would hardly have lasted home in the Thursday Nursery, as speed rather than stamina has always been his strong point; while it would have been nothing in Prince Palatine's favour, having regard for the fact that he was asked to carry such a hunting burden as 10st. 7lb. FOOTBALL ASSOCIATION RULES.

No victory rewarded any of the London clubs in the First League on Saturday, but inasmuch as all three teams succeeded in escaping defeat, the afternoon's work, after such a series of disasters as had befallen the metropolitan elevens during the three preceding weeks of the season, was distinctly satisfactory. Although a goal behind when half-time arrived at Stamford Bridge, Chelsea managed to halve the points with Oldham Athletic—the conquerors of Newcastle United only a fortnight ago, and similarly placed at the interval, Woolwich Arsenal at Plumstead drew level with Newcastle United, while Tottenham Hotspur at Roker Park finished at two goals all with Sunderland. In holding their own with Sunderland, Hotspur, accomplished nothing of great note, seeing that, like themselves, the Wearside team could not boast a single victory. Still, remembering that only a fortnight ago in their one previous out engagement, Tottenham lost by 6 to 1, the supporters of the North London club might well be pleased with yesterday's performance. Thanks to Bliss, Hotspur at one point were ahead. Later on they stood a goal to the bad, and it was left for Middlemiss to save his side from defeat.

For their encounter with Newcastle United, Woolwich Arsenal had hoped to place in the field the same eleven that won so handsomely against Sheffield United at Bramall Lane. Unfortunately, neither Randall nor Winship could turn out and thus a fresh left wing had to be tried, Burrell of Leyton being given the post of outside left Flanaghan as his partner. The Arsenal looked to have seriously jeopardised their chances of escaping defeat when Common failed to turn a penalty to account and Stewart just afterwards scoring for Newcastle, the Londoners crossed over a goal behind, the game being far advanced when McLaughlin made the game one goal all. It is rather suggestive of the poverty of London First League football this season that the Arsenal with four points out of a possible twelve, possess a better record than either Chelsea or Tottenham. Although very hard pressed by Oldham Athletic at times, Chelsea rendered a thoroughly creditable account of themselves. For quite a lengthy period they were a goal behind, Davies having scored for Oldham, but at last their perseverance was rewarded by an equalising goal from Turnbull.

Manchester City, whose successful work has been quite the feature of the past month, followed up their previous achievements with a victory over Bolton Wanderers, and can now claim a record of five consecutive wins. In the course of five matches they have only had one goal registered against them. Sheffield Wednesday met with a check in their triumphant career, Manchester United at Owlerton scoring the only goal of the first half, and as the outcome of some eventful football subsequently drawing the match at three goals all. In meeting Notts County at Ewood Park, Blackburn Rovers looked to have before them the easiest task before any First League club. Notts, however, led at the interval, and only by 2 to 1 did the Rovers get home. Contrary to expectation Aston Villa beat Everton at Goodison Park on a capital performance on the part of the famous Birmingham club—and Middlesbrough effected the great surprise of the afternoon by defeating Derby County at Derby. At Bradford, Sheffield United, who have furnished the London clubs with their only wins, went down before Bradford City, while West Bromwich Albion followed up their great achievement at Aston Park with a good win against Liverpool.

Clapton Orient, who the week before had sustained their first reverse, returned to winning form on Saturday, beating Glossop. Only one goal divided the sides at the finish, but all through the Orient played the cleverer football, and only the fine work in defence of Causer, Hampton and Cuffe prevented them gaining a much more decisive victory. The Orient team entered upon the game at some disadvantage as with Hugall and Bower, their professional goalkeepers, injured, the services of an amateur, L. O. Grapes, of Shepherd's Bush, had to be enlisted. With the forwards and halves controlling the game Grapes did not have much opportunity of showing his skill, and he did the little he had to do well. There can be no question that the Orient possess one of the most evenly-balanced teams in the Second Division of the League, and it is to be hoped that they will not, as in the past two seasons, spoil a brilliant start with a disappointing finish. Fulham suffered another reverse in an Argyle won well and Swindon just prevailed at Reading, while Northampton overcame Brentford, last season's form is likely to be repeated in the struggle for first honours. For the most part, however, yesterday's results showed the teams on remarkably level terms, half the games ending with the records even, while three teams won by only an odd goal. Two of these narrow victories were gained away from home, Portsmouth, who beat Southampton, sharing this distinction with Swindon. Crystal Palace and West Ham United drew in the one match played in the London district, the attendance being the largest at Sydenham this season.

out-match, going down before Blackpool. When engaged at home Fulham have played football of a high order and won all their three matches at Craven Cottage, but they seem quite unable to reproduce their best form on opponents' grounds.

Millwall received their first check in the Southern League failing to win at Gillingham, but they retain the lead—a point ahead of all rivals. Queen's Park Rangers also drew, the Stoke club preventing the champions from scoring, and these two London clubs remain unbeaten. As Plymouth

RUGBY RULES.

RICHMOND VS. OLD ALLEYNIANS.—With a decisive win over the Old Alleynians on the Athletic Ground, Richmond made an encouraging opening of their season, and their victory by a placed goal and two tries to nil was quite deserved. For a time after the start the Old Alleynians displayed grand defence, but for all their good tackling, Brown and Jackson ran in with tries for Richmond. Butcher failed rather badly with each place kick. Still, Richmond had a balance of two tries in their favour at half-time. After crossing over the Old Alleynians did quite a lot of pressing and were several times nearly in, but they could not quite finish off their attacks, while the Richmond defence was very sound. It was quite a good struggle through the second half, but towards the end Richmond secured the upper hand again. Their backs, of whom Oglethorpe and Goodman were generally conspicuous, made several capital runs. One of them ended with Butcher getting over with a try and Brown kicked a goal. Richmond, 11 points; Old Alleynians, nil.

ROSSLYN PARK VS. OLD BLUES.—At the Old Deer Park, Richmond, a keen but by no means skilful game was won by Rosslyn Park by two goals and two tries to one goal and two tries—16 points to 11. The Old Blues started well, their backs combining smartly and scoring twice in less than ten minutes. The two wing men—Dodd on the right and Cousenson on the left—got in, and Cockerell improved the second try. Then the Park forwards found their form, and, hustling the Old Blues completely off their game, scored three times before the interval, when they led by 13 points to 5. The tries were gained by Neild, Burton and Pailthorpe and H. Smith improved the first two. The second half was very keenly contested, but there was even less skill than in the first part of the game. Pailthorpe, after a forward rush, scored another unconverted try for the Park, and Pennington, after just missing on two occasions, dashed over with a try for the Old Blues just at the close. Rosslyn Park won because of their superiority. Rosslyn Park, 16 points: Old Blues, 11 points.

LONDON SCOTTISH VS. UNITED SERVICES.—A fairly interesting game at Richmond ended in a victory for the Scottish by 3 goals and 1 try to 1 try. Gilray, the Scotch International three-quarters, showed quite his best form. He did many things, gained a try for himself, and was mainly responsible for a second. The Scottish owed their victory largely to the superiority of their forwards, who should before long make themselves into a fine pack. They controlled the scrummage, generally had the ball, and were clever in their dribbling. Up to the interval there was little to choose between the sides. Quite easily Scottish gained their first try, the result of a combined dribble. Horne scoring and Robertson placing the goal. After a period of even play Royle gained a good try for the Services, who were 2 points to the bad at the interval. Afterwards the Scottish kept the game for the most part in their opponents' half. With a really fine run, Gilray raced right through and Robertson placed another goal. Then Kinross, in a forward rush, added another try, and in the last minute Gilray cleared the way for Murray to score, Robertson kicking his third goal. Scottish, 18 points; Services, 3 points.

"COUNTRY LIFE" CUP TOURNAMENT.

THE cup presented by Country Life for competition among regimental polo teams in the Southern Army has been won by the 26th K. G. O. Light Cavalry. The contests in the various divisions had left in the 26th Light Cavalry, the 3rd Sappers and Miners, the Golconda Gymkhana and the Combined R. A. and R. E. team from Bangalore. The two latter teams had to withdraw, being unable to remain on in Poona till the rain permitted the game being played, the Quetta and Mhow divisions were unable to reach the finals owing to the conditions of their grounds and were not represented, so that the final was contested by the 3rd Sappers and Miners and the 26th Light Cavalry. The match was played on the 16th instant after a postponement of over a week owing to bad weather, and an interesting game was witnessed by a small gathering. The Cavalry won by 8 goals to 1, but a reference will be made to the Indian Polo Association to decide whether they are entitled to the cup.

26TH LIGHT CAVALRY (+1) VS. 3RD SAPPERS AND MINERS.

First Chukker.—The Sappers were first to attack, but two attempts to score were unsuccessful, and play being transferred Chaytor hit a goal for the 26th, who pressed for the rest of the chukker.

Second Chukker.—The Cavalry attacked and Chaytor scored. A demonstration by the Sappers in their opponents' territory led to nothing, and after a spell of up and down play O'Donnell got away and hit a goal.

Third Chukker.—The Sappers ran down and Bremner was nearly through, Collum clearing just in time. A run by the 26th was stopped by Bond, and after some give and take play the 26th attached again and scored twice.

BORNYVAL the proved and standard anti-neuralgic. It is rapid and reliable in action in constitutional neuralgia, insomnia, alcoholic excesses, difficult respiration, twitching of the skin and Diabetes, etc. In bottle of 24 Capsules.

Winchester cartridges are made for all calibers and makes of rifles, revolvers and pistols, and are sold by dealers everywhere. They will surely satisfy you.

BE SURE TO CALL FOR THE RED W BRAND.

Fourth Chukker.—The Sappers made a determined attack but were repulsed, Johnson and Collum saving their flags on more than one occasion. The Sappers then got a free hit but failed to score and their subsequent efforts were also abortive.

Fifth Chukker.—A run by the 26th was stopped, but Chaytor returned with the ball and scored. Fast play followed and both goals were visited. O'Donnell added another point to the Cavalry score soon after. The Sappers then pressed and Bremner was unlucky to be stopped in two runs.

Sixth Chukker.—Fast play, Bremner eventually getting away to score the Sappers' only goal. The 26th did not add to their total and the game ended with the score: 26th Cavalry 8 goals, 3rd Sappers and Miners 1 goal. Teams:—

Athletics.

WHY AMERICANS WIN.

A few weeks ago a movement was set afoot in England for the quick improvement of British athletics with a view to preventing the recurrence of such humiliation as we suffered at the Olympic Games at Stockholm. It has now been brought home to us that we do not specialise in athletics sufficiently, and that because the Americans do so they are beating us. After many conversations with the right people, and some close investigation into circumstances and things, I am convinced that the British hope is not one that is to be satisfied in two or three years by the expenditure of a few thousands of pounds. The case is much too big and serious for that.

I know why the Americans succeeded, better than any man who has never been to America and inquired into the subject, and their specialisation has had only a little to do with it.

The chief reason is that the Americans for a whole generation past have made such an effective study of the means for procuring physical fitness and have carried out their systems and methods with such enthusiasm that to-day they are the fittest people alive, and they are bent on making themselves more so. To make their human machine the most efficient possible is their constant ideal.

A NATION OF ATHLETES.

At the present moment their efforts in this direction are more serious and determined than ever before. Every American is by disposition something of an athlete, even if his age and circumstances make it but a little. He tries to retain something of his early agility, and even in gymnasiums and swimming baths you will find such a large proportion of middle-aged persons as proves the point without any further evidence. America wins not because she picks out a few men from a mass of crude, unfit human stuff and trains them up like racehorses, but because an enormous proportion of her young men, tens and scores of thousands of them, are already trained and coached are first-class athletes and can be brought on to the championship standard with a very little trouble.

America is an athletic nation now as we are not. The words "athlete" and "athletics" are as commonly in use as "cricket" and "football" are at home. People ask whether a certain young man is an athlete in the same way that they might inquire if he had any sisters. The spirit of athleticism runs right through the people now; and it will take a generation and hundreds of thousands of pounds to make us the match of them. At heart the British people generally are not athletic. Pure athletics are hardly ever thought of anywhere except at the schools. We are all for watching games.

The state of athletic America is indicated by great emblems of a peculiarly interesting kind. In every big city there is an athletic club, which is not merely an association but is a great institution with a magnificent club-house in the heart of the town. In New York and Chicago these athletic clubs have risen to the topmost heights of magnificence and effectiveness, and the Chicago Athletic Club in Michigan Avenue overlooking the great lake is the finest of its kind, and, as many declare, the finest clubhouse in the world. In its model and system it is something like the Royal Automobile Club in London; but it is that fine piece multiplied by a hundred; and yet while there is the effect of magnificence and luxury it is done without the glitter of gilt or any soft carpets or silken curtains. It is white marble everywhere.

A WONDERFUL CLUB.

This club contains means for the practice of every form of athletics. The great swimming bath is the most beautiful I have ever seen, with great wide white marble spaces at the sides, where the bathers sit in chairs or recline on easy couches, while on one side of the bath there is a restaurant. The man crawls out from the water when the waiter calls to him that his steak is on the table, and, with a sheet around him—or perhaps not—he takes his food. When money is wanted for any improvements in this club it is forthcoming at once. Last year some members thought that the swimming bath and its adjuncts might be bettered. The work was done at once at a cost of £8,000. There are racquets courts, indoor golf schools—three of them—fencing schools, gymnasiums, boxing rings, bowling alleys, and all the rest of it in this wonderful establishment, everything big and all perfect; and particularly did I notice when wandering through it with an increasing perception of what athletics are in America that there is a great hall with a wide oval running track, fourteen laps to the mile. The surface is of padded leather, and it is banked up high at all the corners. Of course the club has all the comforts and conveniences of a first-class social club—has them in the utmost abundance.

This club has 5,000 members and a waiting list of 1,200. It has an entrance fee of £40 and an annual subscription of £10. Considering what is given for the money and the charges that are made by clubs in America generally, this is very cheap, and is meant as an encouragement to the young. The building and equipment of the clubhouse cost £200,000 originally; an enormous amount has been spent on it since. The income of the club last year was £260,000.

There was a net profit on the working last year of over £13,000, and the net worth of the club at that time was £210,000. So it pays, this great Temple of Athletics, which is what it really is.

LUXURY AS A STIMULUS.

Yes, yes, there will be many in Britain to say, but how much good does all this kind of thing do to the young men and their athletics? This is chiefly a grand social club for men to waste their time at, may be said. Luxury, say these critics, makes no limb; marble does not lead to muscle. I do not know. We in England take all our sports and things of that kind a little sadly, by which I do not mean too seriously. A little luxury is stimulating, after all. That is the essence of the principle of the New York and Chicago athletic clubs. Here there is a great refined atmosphere of athletics which quickens the soul of every man towards the games, towards the improvement of his physical fitness if he is a middle-aged man, towards the increase of his agility and skill if he is a young one. The athletic champion is a hero here, as he is nowhere in England. This is the temple, and the people who enter it, even if they only eat and read the papers or flop into the bath now and then, feel the sense of athletics rising in them. Mr. Martin Delaney, the physical and athletic director of the club, told me how hundreds of the members, busy men engaged in the city, came to him constantly in periods for a kind of athletic clean-up. He would first of all telephone to their doctors for some facts, then put them on diets and through regular daily exercises and make new men of them, as is done at some of the schools for physical culture. All this is done at the Athletic Club.

This temple has an enormous influence; I am sure of it. I am just glancing through the annual report, and a sentence catches my eye—"Athletics: A manifestly greater interest is being taken in this department by the members. The attendance in the gymnasium, by participation in mild and beneficial exercises under the direction of our capable athletic director, has increased over the previous year two hundred.

These temples are features of the new athletic America. There is much to be done before we catch up the United States.—Daily Mail.

Poultry.

POULTRY POINTS.

(BY P.A.V.)

THE breed that succeeds in finding a place in the affections of the utilitarian poultry-rearer is the one that possesses hardiness, egg-production and market quality. Ornamental breeds may do for the showroom but they will exist in limited numbers only; while the less gaudy but useful breeds will be scattered far and wide over the country as producers of eggs and chicks. There is no reason why the useful bird should not be beautiful also but its beauty should not take precedence.

A PURE bred broody hen not required for sitting might be allowed to sit on dummy eggs for a few days with advantage. A hen that is allowed to rear at least one brood per year gives a larger supply of eggs than the birds which are not allowed to sit.

DARKNESS and warmth encourage broodiness. Broody hens are in a state of fever, the temperature sometimes rising to 104°! Some dip the hens in cold water, some shut them up in a dark place without food or water,—which is cruel, and some use the more barbarous method of putting a quill through the nostrils, so that the pain will not allow the bird to set. The best plan for a broody hen of good stock would appear to be to let her rest a few days on dummy eggs, then deprive her of all litter, shut her up in a small bare run, feed on hard grain as much as she will eat, give plenty of water and let the house have plenty of light.

SOME fanciers feed on a very much reduced ration of hard grain, in fact almost starve the bird. This may injure the bird, anyway it will keep her from laying for three weeks or more. Broody hens must not be allowed to accumulate in the hen-house where a male bird is running with the hens, because the eggs being fertile, if not removed soon after being laid, the germ will be started in growth by the broodies and, when the egg is removed from under the hen and thus taken from the heat, the germ dies and the egg will not keep.

THE two most important things in the poultry business are proper breeding and proper feeding. The attention given these two factors will in the main gauge the success or failure that one will achieve. Neglect or ignorance of the fundamental rules of either of these important items will prevent a poultryman from getting the best results, if it does not actually foster complete failure.

THERE are certain points by which the average poultryman may quickly recognise good birds when selecting his breeders. A good layer will generally be the last bird to go to roost at night and the first off in the morning. A long body is usually an excellent indication of a good layer. If such a bird has a broad low fluff she is undoubtedly one of the best to choose as a breeder and will surely improve the egg yield. A good breeder should have a large, broad chest, indicating large crop capacity, so essential to good egg production. A bright eye, bright red comb, legs set well apart, general good health and plenty of activity are all sure indications that a hen will produce "the goods." Close study of the individual birds will soon enable one to pick his best layers without the aid of trap nests or other contrivance.

GIVING food beyond the needs of the birds is a common cause of illness in chicks and of adult stock. In the past it was a universal fault of the farmer to supply his flock a ration that was lacking in protein and the fault of to-day is in the giving of too highly stimulating foods, foods rich in protein, hoping to get rapid growth, early maturity and winter eggs. The fault of the present as well as that of the past only leads to upset digestion, diseased livers, broken-down hens and chicks.

Too early feeding of baby chicks does more harm than delayed feeding. If chicks were not fed until six hours old there would be fewer cases of bowel disease in the first two weeks of the chick's life. It is time and money in your pockets to keep these small chicks quiet until the third day. The baby chick is not hungry, as it may seem to you, but is only working its muscles and getting acquainted with material things. The baby chick has a full ration of the yolk of the egg that it has absorbed just before breaking the shell. This yolk is all the food needed for two or three days and is all the animal food needed in a week. Hundred-day old chicks have been known to die because of too early feeding. The heavy use of chick grit is bad for the health of the baby chicks. To avoid illness in the little chicks, you need to keep them slightly short of food. Feed well but do not overdo the matter.

Hens maintain health and are business bringers when not restricted to any single grain or article of food. Fowls do best when given the variety of food that the free-range hen gets in mid summer. Overfeeding of fat-forming foods makes the birds sluggish, out of condition and a loss in the matter of income. Too high use of beef, or fish, or scrap irritates the digestion, increases the activity of the bowels and ends in loose discharges from the intestines. The condition of the bowels is a false index to whether constipation or diarrhoea mean serious trouble ahead.

At times, in face of the best method of feeding you can follow, you will get hens and chicks out of condition through feed. Little drugging and simple plans of feeding will often prove helpful. Good results follow the use of epsom salts to sweep out the contents of the intestines and sulphocarbolate of zinc to sweeten up the secretions that follow. Get you stock on a diet that is made up of well-balanced mash, a well mixed scratch feed and plenty of green food. Do not repeat your mistakes!

FADS AND FALLACIES ABOUT DOGS.

ALTHOUGH the dog is very much legislated for now-a-days and is generally kept under surroundings far different to those of a hundred years ago, he is undoubtedly better for the care bestowed upon him and the interest taken in his behalf. He is seldom treated badly now, though our police court reports every now and then go to prove that cases of cruelty to dogs are not altogether unknown. In most cases, however, the punishment dealt upon the offender is sufficiently stern to prevent a repetition of the offence. And all our tendencies towards the dog have of recent years been to behave to him more kindly than was our wont. An old wooden cask turned on end and placed in the back yard was once good enough for his dormitory, now he must have a properly constructed kennel with wooden floors and benching, a corrugated iron roof, and all other appliances for his comfort. That is if he is not even more coddly kept in the house or in the empty stall next the pony in the stable.

With the increased and still increasing value of the dog, more is known about him in every way; his health is a matter of consideration, and when he seems out of sorts a veterinary surgeon is called in, or his owner in other ways seeks to have his favourite made well. Then most of the idiotic fallacies with regard to him have gradually been removed. The man of average intelligence does not now believe that the shortening of his dog's tail gives increased strength to the back and loins; nor does he consider that a similar operation by which a sinew is drawn out from the stern, and called "worming," is a specific against distemper and rabies. But such ideas were quite recently prevalent amongst numbers of people. Some believed that the tail of the mail pug was curled over the right or left side of the back, as the case might be, whilst the caudal appendage of the female was always carried on the opposite side, and so the sex might be determined by the carriage of the stern. The choicest puppy of the newly-born litter could always be told by holding the little creature up by the tail. The best was supposed to stretch its legs in a peculiar way, and not to cry out; whilst the worst of the lot would just yell, and do nothing else.

Then other clever dog fanciers would select as the most valuable puppy that which the dam was fondest of. To prove this the youngsters were taken from their bed and placed in another part of the room; then the dam was let go, and her favourite, and, therefore, the best (?) puppy was that which she first took up in her mouth and returned to its old bed. Other fallacious ideas were that the puppy earliest born was the best, and that the one which first opened its eyes would be the champion, and so on, and so on. In my young days the terrier which had not a black roof to its mouth was supposed to be of plebeian parentage and ill-bred, whilst a similar slur was cast upon that which had dew claws on its hind legs. A truly pedigreed water spaniel was thought only to be perfect when his toes were joined by a web like that of a duck or other water fowl, but whether this was a local or general idea I can scarcely tell. Some thirty years ago I was the owner of an old-fashioned, intelligent-looking liver-coloured spaniel—not a show dog, but a worker, and as sensible and clever as they could be made. Dash was following at my heels one day when a fine old fellow—a good sportsman in his day—came up to me. He was nearly ninety at that time, and died just after. "Eh! Mr. L.," he said, "you've a grand auld dog thear; I'll be bound it's web-footed. My father had yan just like it and his was!" The poor man seemed quite disappointed when Dash's feet were examined and found to be exactly like those of any ordinary dog. But I could not persuade him that no strain or variety of the dog spaniel or otherwise, had "webbed feet." A much more modern fad was that all St. Bernards should have double dew claws on both their hind legs, it being considered by some persons that these deformities or excrescences—they are both—prevent the great dog from sinking in the snow when searching for lost travellers on the mountains of Switzerland. This idea, I fancy, is even still in vogue, and I know that in the earlier tabulated descriptions of the St. Bernard from five to ten points were allowed for dew claws on the hind legs. Instead of being useful to these dogs when engaged in their errands of mercy, a more commonsense idea is that they are much in the way. In the earlier days of the popularity of the St. Bernard it was always interesting to observe the judge "looking for dew claws," and it need scarcely be said here that the exhibitor who had a dog which possessed them considered they were much in the dog's favour, whilst the owner whose dog did not bear the excrescences believed they were deformities and his opponent should be handicapped accordingly. Wiser counsels now prevail and our St. Bernard club of to-day does not allow points for dew claws. And why at a time when such things were believed to be a sign of bad breeding in other dogs it should have been considered consistent with purity and blue blood in the St. Bernard is more than anyone can understand.

For what reason the ears of pug and Dalmatian dogs were cropped in the old days is not quite apparent, though, with regard to the former, it has been said that the operation was performed for appearance alone, viz., to make the head seem more like a clenched fist than would be the case when the ears were on. The operation was conducive to deafness, and certainly did not add to the beauty of the creatures. Possibly the Dalmatian was originally deprived of his ears to make him match certain of his master's carriage horses, which at one period were by the edicts of cruel fashion, treated in a similar manner. The barbarity of either custom need scarcely be dilated upon here, and in the case of the dog cannot have led to anything but mischievous results, for, running at the horse's heels under his master's carriage, he could not avoid having mud and filth splashed or kicked into his ears, which would engender disease and deafness. Possibly the latter may account for the fallacy that the Dalmatian was one of the most stupid of the canine race—he was often very hard of hearing. That these dogs were originally cropped to prevent them having canker in the ear, as has been suggested, is one of the most grievous fallacies. Canker is internal, and more likely to appear in a dog with cropped ears, than not, but of course the ears being cropped there can be no outer sores which are produced by shaking the head and so flapping the ears and by scratching with the hind feet. Bull terriers were doubtless cropped because in fighting dogs, which they originally were, the removal of the ears prevented an antagonist seizing them and thereby attacking a vulnerable part. When the show dog was made distinct from the fighting dog, a so-called "fashionable crop" was introduced to the former, the ears being in part cut off and treated "artistically and skilfully" to make them stand smartly erect—almost like a blunted needle at the points. A similar operation was performed on black and tan, or Manchester terriers, upon English white terriers, and to a less extent upon Yorkshire terriers and upon Irish terriers. This barbarity continued in operation until 1895, when, following a conviction for cropping, the Kennel Club suddenly came to the conclusion—which the Irish terrier club had, to its credit, done years before—that the operation was useless and cruel, and they framed a rule which has led to its discontinuance. No greater fallacy ever existed than the belief that cropping the ears of dogs was to their advantage, either as a beauty mark or as a preventive of disease. The poor shepherd or farmer, generations ago, had some excuse for shortening the tail of the dog which assisted him with his flocks and herds, for by so doing he became exempt from taxation, so far as that identical animal was concerned. Hence we have a reason for the once common name of "cur" as applied to the sheepdog—a corruption of the word curtail, which, in this connection, "is a dog lawed or mutilated according to the Forest Laws and is, therefore, prevented from coursing." May be therefrom we have the origin of the still existent docking of our terriers—not to keep them from coursing, for when used for this purpose, their tails are left entire, but the countryman tried to escape the stringent tax by operating upon the dog which he kept to keep down vermin in a similar manner to that he employed upon his shepherd's dog. Perhaps some day, our humanitarians will succeed in causing a general discontinuance even of this custom, which, though comparatively painless when performed in the right way and at the proper time, has been ruled to be illegal.

There are other silly notions as to dogs, notably where their howling is believed to be prophetic of death in the family to which the dog belongs. Then it must not be forgotten that until very lately it was commonly believed that dogs were more liable to madness at a certain period of the year than at any other. This was supposed to be between the end of July and September, when Sirius, the dog star, rises and sets with the sun. These were the so-called "dog days," when local magnates who considered the canine breed obnoxious would order a muzzling order within their jurisdiction until the supposed dangerous period had passed by. Such matters are, however, better ordained to-day, for the muzzling of dogs is only ordered when a case of madness has been known to occur, and instead of being discontinued by a certain sign in the constellation is not withdrawn until all danger of the spread of the disease has passed away.

Judges:—Colonel Molesworth, Mr. Geo. Hennessy, Captain Worgan, Commandant, His Excellency the Governor's Body Guard, Mr. K. Campbell, Mr. R. A. Turnbull, M.R.C.V.S. (Lond), Honorary Veterinary Surgeon.

Executive Committee.—Captain K. Robertson, A.D.C., Mr. F. C. E. Paul, Captain J. D. Byrne, R.G.A., Mr. J. Oswald Little and Mr. A. A. Price, Honorary Secretary and Treasurer.

Appended are the awards:—

Class 1.—Bhutea Ponies (open) shown in hand. Mr. A. Shannon's B. P., 1; Babu H. L. Ghose's Kabur, 2; Major Gwyther's Kali, 3.

Class 2.—Tea Garden Bhutea Ponies, property of planters and ridden on garden for at least three months: Mr. A. Shannon's B. P., 1; Mr. J. O. Little's Sikkim Pioneer, 2; Mr. G. Dominy's No Trumps, 3.

Class 3.—Tea Garden Ponies other than Bhuteas, property of planters and ridden on garden for at least three months: Colonel Grant Gordon's Toby, 1; Colonel Grant Gordon's Joey, 2; Mr. R. D. Mackie's Betty, 3.

Class 4.—Bhutea hacks owned by natives and licensed for hire. To be shown in saddle: Labsing's Luckfar, 1; Palman's Peter, 2; Mahacheen's Tashi, 3.

Class 5.—Open class for Bhutea Ponies shown in saddle (Cup presented by Messrs. Kellner and Company): Mr. A. Shannon's B. P., 1; Major Gwyther's Kali, 2; Mr. J. O. Little's Sikkim Pioneer, 3.

Class 6.—Open class for English and Australian Ponies 14 hands and under: Captain Williams' Mrs. Golly, 1; Mr. A. A. Price's Squish, 2; Mrs. Lang's Kitchil, 3.

Class 7.—Open class for English and Australian Ponies over 14 hands and not more than 14-2. (Cup presented by Messrs. Garrard and Co.) Light-weights: Captain Robertson's Cherry Merry, 1; The Maharaja of Cooch Behar's Danilo, 2; Captain Robertson's Lola, 3. Heavy-weights: Mr. Champion's Carbon, 1; the Governor of Bengal's Muski, 2; Prince Hitendra of Cooch Behar's Akrabad, 3.

Class 8.—Thoroughbreds. (Cup presented by the Raja of Kakina): Mr. Shillingford's Water Lily, 1.

Class 9.—N. S. M. R. Chargers to be ridden in regimental saddlery. (Cup presented by D.-H. Ry. Co., Ld.): Mr. E. E. Dyball's Tiger, 1.

Class 12.—Ladies' Hacks to be ridden in the ring by ladies. (Cup presented by the Staff of the Governor of Bengal): Captain Robertson's Cherry Merry ridden by Miss Hay Webb, 1.

Class 13.—Children's Ponies ridden by children under 12. (Prize presented by the Governor of Bengal): Gerald Benson's Jess, 1; Ethel Eliot's Daisy, 2.

Class 14.—Donkeys ridden by children under 14. (Prize presented by the Governor of Bengal): Margaret Robertson's Blackie, 1; Baby Hartley's Black, 2; Teddy Dyball's Gang-lote, 3.

Class 15.—Jumping Competition for Ponies 14-2 and under. (Cup presented by Mr. George Hennessy): Captain Robertson's Lola, 1; Captain Liddell's Spec, 2.

Special for Best Bhutea Pony in the Show.—Cup presented by the Members of the Governor's Executive Council): Mr. Shannon's B. P.

Special for Best Horse or Pony other than Bhutea.—(Cup presented by Mr. F. J. Monahan, I.C.S.): Mrs. Champion's Carbon.

THE DARJEELING DOG SHOW.

Saturday, 9th October 1912.

The following is a list of the awards:—

Great Danes.—(Dogs and Bitches).—1. Capt. C. Herbert's Lord Romeo (Dog).

Great Danes. (Dogs and Bitches).—1. Prince Jitendra's Napoleon.

Bull Mastiffs. (Dogs and Bitches).—1. Mr. T. W. Davenport's Jack.

St. Bernards. (Dogs and Bitches).—Raja of Rungpore's Cæsar.

Greyhounds. (Dogs and Bitches).—Prince Jitendra's Queen—Prince Jitendra's John—Raja of Kakina's Bobby.

Kangaroo Hounds (Dogs and Bitches).—1. Raja of Rungpore's Danger.

Deer Hounds (Dogs and Bitches).—1. Capt. Byrne's Rob.

Borzois (Dogs and Bitches).—a. Raja of Rungpore's Raja—Raja of Rungpore's Volda. 1. Mr. Hennessey's Don.

Fox hounds (Dogs and Bitches).—a. Prince Jitendra's Mousme. a. Prince Jitendra's Melody.

Dachshunds (Dogs).—1. Mrs. Colin McCully's Waldham.

Dachshunds (Bitches).—1. Mr. V. L. Rees' Red Pearl. 2. Mrs. Stuart's Waldine.

Dachshunds (Dogs and Bitches).—1. Mr. V. L. Rees' Red Pearl. Mrs. Stuart's Waldine.

Dachshunds (Dogs and Bitches).—1. Mrs. W. E. Lang's Powder Puff; 2. Mr. V. L. Rees' Lady Diana.

Setters, Pointers, Retrievers (Dogs and Bitches).—a. Capt. G. W. Byrne's Nigger Setter a. Capt. G. W. Byrne's kaffir Setter. a. Raja of Rungpore's Tell Prince Setter, 1 Major A. B. Fry's Hero Retriever.

Spaniels.—Major A. Guyther's Nurscombe Betty.

Fox Terriers.—Mrs. Ivor G. Tredaway's Hardwicke B. E. S.

Fox Terriers (Limit).—1. Mrs. Ivor G. Tredaway's "Hardwicke B. E. S." 2. Mr. F. Read's "Sprite."

Fox Terriers (Novice).—Mrs. C. Stuart's "Denkie." Recommended—Mr. S. E. Ansell's "Gyl."

Fox Terriers (Puppy).—Mrs. E. H. Napper's "Patricia."

Fox Terriers (Bitches).—Open—Mrs. Champain's "Victorine II."

Fox Terriers (Dogs and Bitches).—Limit—1.—Mrs. E. H. Napper's "Collar of Calcutta." Very highly recommended—Mr. P. C. E. Paul's "Luap Sylvan Bella."

Fox Terriers (Puppy).—1. Mrs. A. M. Robinson's Beyenar.

Irish Terriers—(Dogs).—Open—1. Mrs. A. M. Robertson's Easter Gift. 2. Mr. U. H. Everett's Red Michael.

Irish Terriers (Dogs and Bitches)—Limit.—1. Capt. A. M. Power's "Whistling Rufus."

Irish Terriers (Dogs and Bitches)—Novice.—1.—Capt. A. M. Power's "Whistling Rufus."

Scottish Terriers (Dogs and Bitches)—Open.—1. Miss A. Sell's "Pitcher."

Scottish Terriers—(Bitches)—Open.—1. Mr. A. W. Hadrill's "Jean."

Scottish Terriers—(Dogs and Bitches)—Limit.—1. Mr. A. W. Hadrill's "Jean."

Scottish Terriers—(Dogs and Bitches)—Novice.—1. Miss W. Mark's "Jock." 2. Miss A. Sell's "Pitcher."

Scottish Terriers—(Dogs and Bitches)—Puppy.—1. Mr. J. B. Williams' "Crowdie."

Toy Terriers—(Dogs and Bitches)—Open.—1. Miss M. Paar's "Lady Susie."

Japanese—(Dogs and Bitches)—Open.—1. Mrs. Vaughan's Fuji.

Airedales—(Dogs)—Open.—1. Mr. K. L. Mackenzie's Birchill Bosun.

Airedales—(Bitches)—Open.—1. Mr. F. Murdock's "Morton Duchess."

Airedales—(Dogs and Bitches) Limit.—1. Mr. K. L. Mackenzie's "Morton Duchess." 2. Mr. G. Hennessy's Nicholas I.

Airedales—(Dogs and Bitches)—Novice.—1. Mr. K. L. Mackenzie's "Birchill Bosun." 2. Mr. F. Murdock's Morton Duchess. 3. Mr. G. G. Dey's Birch Hill Bubble."

Airedales—(Dogs and Bitches)—Puppy.—1. Mr. F. Murdock's "Morton Duchess." 2. Mr. G. G. Dey's "Birch Hill Bubble." 3. Major W. A. Light's "Master."

Miniature Bulldogs.—(Dogs and Bitches)—Open—Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Luap Lord Bobs.

Bulldogs.—(Dogs)—Open—Mr. Brewer's Lord Esther.

(Bitches)—Open.—Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Ch. Luap Rival Princess.

(Dogs and Bitches)—Limit.—Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Luap Baroness Bur.

(Novice).—Mr. Brewer's Lord Esther.

(Puppy).—Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Luap Rivalstone Earle.

Bull Terriers.—(Dogs and Bitches)—Open—Mr. C. Barlow's Brendon Jollyboy.

(Limit).—1. Mr. C. Barlow's Tuscanny Queen. 2. Miss C. Duke's Loon.

Boston Terriers.—(Dogs and Bitches)—Open—Mr. Mackinnon's Banzai.

Pekingese.—(Dogs and Bitches)—Open—Mr. Polwhel's Weefi of Cornwall.

Lhassa Terriers.—(Dogs and Bitches)—Open—1. Mrs. Ottewill's Jimmie. 2. Mrs. P. C. E. Paul's Luap Pansy. 3. Miss O. Smith's Dorma.

Maltese Terriers.—(Dogs and Bitches)—Open—Mrs. Vernon Wood's Polly.

Australian Terriers.—(Dogs and Bitches)—Open—Major R. H. Hayes' Maisie.

Pugs.—(Dogs and Bitches)—Open—Mr. Edwards' Goo Goo.

Any Variety.—(Open)—1. Capt. J. D. Byrne's Rof 2. Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Ch. Luap Rival Princess, 3. Mr. G. Hennessy's Don.

(Limit).—1. Mr. G. Hennessy's Don. 2. Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Luap Baroness Bur.

(Novice).—1. Mr. G. Hennessy's Don. 2. Mr. V. L. Rees' Red Pearl. 3. Mrs. Vaughan's Fuji.

Any Variety Junior.—1. Mr. V. L. Rees' Red Pearl. 2. Miss C. Duke's Loon. 3. Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Luap Lord Bobs.

(Puppy).—1. Mrs. E. H. Napper's Patricia. 2. Mr. G. B. Williams' Crowdie. 3. Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Luap Rivalstone Earle.

(Sporting).—1. Mr. G. Hennessy's Don. 2. Mr. Dinshaw Bamjee's Willowdene Merry Prince, 3. Mrs. Ivor G. Tredaway's Hardwick B. E. S.

(Open).—Non-Sporting—1. Capt. C. Hebert's Lord Romeo. 2. Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Luap Ch. Rival Princess. 3. Mrs. Edwards' Goo Goo.

Any Variety Terriers.—(Open)—1. Mrs. Ivor G. Treadaway's Hardwick B. E. S. 2. Mrs. Champain's Victorine II. 3. Mr. F. Read's Sprite.

Any Variety other than Terriers.—(Open)—1. Capt. C. Hebert's Lord Romeo. 2. Mr. G. Hennessy's Don. 3. Mr. Polwhele's Weefi of Cornwall.

Any Variety Toys.—(Open)—1. Mr. Polwhele's Weefi of Cornwall. 2. Mrs. Edward's Goo Goo. 3. Mrs. Vaughan's Fuji.

Any Variety.—(The Property of a Lady)—Open—1. Mrs. Robertson's Easter Gift. 2. Mrs. Ivor G. Tredaway's Hardwick B. E. S. 3. Mrs. Polwhele's Weefi of Cornwall.

Any Variety the Property of C. K. C. Members.—(Open)—Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Ch. Luap Rival Princess. 2. Mrs. Ivor G. Tredaway's Hardwick B. E. S. 3. Mrs. C. McCully's Waldman.

Any Variety the Property of I. K. A. Members.—(Open)—1. Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Ch. Luap Rival Princess. 2. Mrs. Ivor G. Tredaway's Hardwick B. E. S. 3. Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Luap Baroness Bur.

Any Variety Bred in India.—(Open)—1. Mrs. Ivor G. Tredaway's Hardwick B. E. S. 2. Mr. F. Read's Sprite. 3. Major A. Gwyther's Nurscombe Betty.

Any Variety Imported.—(Open)—1. Capt. J. D. Byrne's Rob. 2. Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Ch. Luap Rival Princess. 3. Mrs. Polwhele's Weefi of Cornwall.

Any Variety Bred by Exhibitor.—(Open)—1. Mrs. Ivor G. Tredaway's Hardwick B. E. S. 2. Mr. F. Murdock's Morton Duchess. 3. Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Luap Rivalstone Earl.

Any Variety Brace.—(Open)—Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Ch. Luap Rival Princess—Luap Baroness Bur.

Any Variety Team.—(Open)—Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Ch. Luap Rival Princess; Luap Baroness Bur; Luap Colonel Shemus.

Any Variety over 30lbs. Weight.—(Open)—1. Capt. C. Hebert's Lord Romeo. 2. Capt. G. W. Byrne's Rob. 3. Mr. P. C. E. Paul's Ch. Luap Rival Princess.

Any Variety under 30lbs. Weight.—(Open)—1. Mrs. Polwhele's Weefi of Cornwall. 2. Mrs. Edwards' Goo Goo. 3. Mrs. Vaughan's Fuji.

Any Variety Litter.—(Open)—Major W. A. Light's Litter of Airedale Terriers.

SPECIAL PRIZES.

Best Dog in Show: Capt. Hebert's Romeo.
Best Opposite Sex: Mr. Paul's Ch. Rival Princess.
Best Imported: Capt. Byrne's Rob.
Best Dog Bred in India: Mrs. Tredaway's Hardwick B.E.S.
Best Property of a Lady: Mrs. Robertson's Easter Gift.

MOTORING MEMS.

LONDON, Friday 4th October 1912.

INVENTORS in all parts of the world are trying to produce a substitute for the expensive and troublesome pneumatic tyres for motor-cars, and the patentees of a new wheel now being exhibited in London claim to have solved the problem.

The new motor-car wheel has a solid rubber tyre, and the road shocks are absorbed by springs between the tyre and the wheel rim.

It is claimed that not only is the expense of tyre upkeep reduced to one-third, but that the resilience of the wheel is equal to that of one shod with a pneumatic tyre.

Mr. J. A. Conally, managing director of the Airless Resilient, Wheel Company, Limited, of Marylebone Lane, described the invention to a press man lately.

"I think," he said, "there can be little doubt that the tyre problem—the greatest which motorists have had to contend with—is now settled, for the new wheel has all the good qualities of the pneumatic tyre, with none of its disadvantages.

"The tyre being solid cannot be punctured, and the springs absorb all shocks so well that passengers in a car fitted with this wheel cannot tell the difference from ordinary tyres.

"Each wheel is guaranteed to run 10,000 miles, so there cannot be much doubt about the economy effected in their use."

Although the new wheel has only recently been brought forward for use on private motor-cars, it is arousing keen interest among motorists, as the difficulty of maintaining the present types of pneumatic tyre in good repair, combined with the expense, is one of the chief factors in the costliness of motoring.

THAT paraffin can be used successfully as a rival to petrol as a motor fuel has been established by an exhaustive series of tests carried out under the official observation of the Royal Automobile Club.

The results of these tests, which were announced yesterday, are of the utmost importance, proving that paraffin costing 8½d. a gallon can now be substituted for petrol costing 1s. 6d. a gallon, not only without diminishing the efficiency of the motor vehicle, but obtaining slightly better results.

The tests were carried out with a 27-h.p. car fitted with a Stewart Morris paraffin carburetter which was run for a distance of 2,000 miles. The official certificate for the test shows astonishing results.

One thousand miles of the trial were run on the road, and one thousand miles on Brooklands motor track. The consumption of paraffin was carefully tested, and proved to be fully as economical in quantity as petrol, while it costs less than half the price. The results are shown by the following table:—

Speed. Miles per hour.	Consumption. Miles per gallon.
14·9	23·81
20·1	26·69
25·2	27·19
30·45	23·94
35·8	17·45

The same type of car, consuming petrol, was run from Land's End to John o' Groat's recently, and was found to consume a trifle less than one gallon of petrol for every twenty miles covered.

During the 2,000 miles of the paraffin trials the car consumed 94·29 gallons of paraffin. The cost of this quantity of paraffin at 8½d. a gallon is £3 6s. 8½d., while a like amount of petrol at 1s. 6d. a gallon would have cost £7 1s. 3½d., so that by using paraffin the fuel bill was reduced by more than half.

Petrol was used to start the engine, 1·81 gallon being consumed during the whole of the trial.

On the Brooklands test hill the car maintained a speed of 11·16 miles per hour, although the total weight of the car and occupants was 3,557lbs.

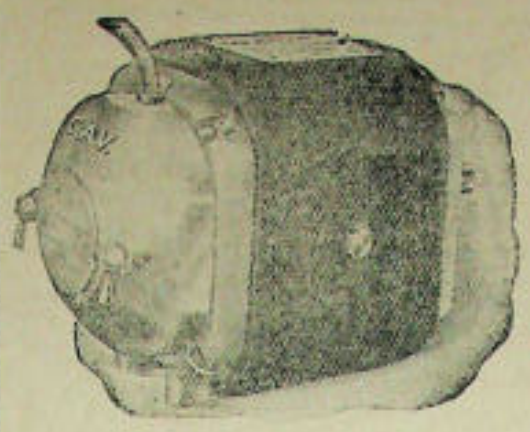
The car was entered for trial by the Stewart Precision Carburetter Company, Limited.

A MOTOR-CAR wheel has been produced which does away with the terrors of tyre changing, which has long been the ordeal most dreaded by motorists.

There have been many inventions, such as the detachable wheel, which minimise the inconvenience attendant on a punctured tyre, but the new wheel enables a motorist to dispense with these heavy accessories and replace a punctured tyre with almost as much ease as he puts on his collar and tie in the morning.

The new wheel, which is produced by the Spencer-Moulton Company, Limited, has a detachable flange. The flanges are the rims which keep the tyre in position on the outer surface of the wheel, and by having the outer flange detachable tyres can be slipped on and off with the greatest ease.

"Taking off and putting on a new tyre can be accomplished in a few minutes," says the manager of the Spencer-Moulton Company. "The flange is removed by undoing eight nuts, and when replaced holds the tyre in position as firmly as the old fixed flanges."



IT is stated that a large British Company is being formed to manufacture and sell a low-priced all-British motor-car on the lines discussed at the "Express" luncheon at the Ritz Hotel last week.

The car, which is intended to compete with the cheap American car, now so popular in this market and in the Colonies, will be sold, fully equipped, at a price which will compare favourably with that of the American cars.

Details regarding the new company are not yet available for publication, but the process of formation is well advanced and a definite plan of campaign, both for manufacturing and selling, has been decided on.

The company will have the support of a number of men whose names are well known in the British motor-car industry.

The last word in dynamo car lighting by the firm who had the first word on the subject.

We had the first word in electric car lighting when we originated specially designed lamps for car use nearly ten years ago. Determined to maintain the lead we have designed and perfected after the most searching tests, quite regardless of expense, the new dynamo lighting outfit. It effectually represents the last word in car-lighting systems.

The whole system is characterised by extreme simplicity, exceptional lightness and compactness. This is supplemented by a great increase in efficiency and reliability. Complete, the plant is a tribute to British ingenuity, skill, and workmanship.

In spite of its manifold advantages, the dynamo complete can be supplied from

PETS AT THE LONDON ZOO.

THE London Zoological Society receives a large number of animals that either were destined from the first for Regent's Park, and became pets of their owners, so to speak, by accident, or were intended to be kept as pets and for some reason became unmanageable in private hands. Nearly all young animals, in a degree almost precisely proportioned to their intelligence, are ready to become attached to their owners or keepers. The little elephant from the Federated Malay States became deeply attached to the keeper who fetched him from Kuala Lumpur, although it had to submit to painful surgical treatment twice a day, as a large wound, the result of the little animal's falling down a tin mine, had to be cleaned out and dressed with a smarting lotion. The African rhinoceros, which came with the King's African collection last year was inseparable from its native keeper, screamed loudly when it was left alone, and for some days refused to take even its favourite sugar-cane from strange hands. The vicugna now in the Gardens is quite unsafe even with its regular keeper. It was obtained as a young animal in Patagonia, and was thoroughly friendly and familiar with its owner, and recognized him with obvious pleasure when he came to see it in the Zoological Gardens after more than a year's absence. The warthog, known as "Major," the death of which was a great loss two or three years ago, was another unsafe animal that continued to welcome its original owner on his infrequent visits.

The ferocity of adult animals has no relation to the possibility of their being affectionate pets when they are quite young. The cubs and kittens of all the carnivora are gentle and friendly, but they grow up rather quickly, and as other persons do not take the same view of them as their original owners, they frequently find their way to the Gardens. Recently one of the Society's officials was rung up at 4 in the morning, and told that the speaker wished to present a lion. The official was reasonably polite, and said he would be glad to hear details at any time after 9 o'clock next morning, and then rang off. Five minutes later he was again rung out of bed, and told by another person of the same proposed gift. Perhaps a little less politely, he again suggested that office hours were more suitable for such messages. The ringing, however, continued; the owner had arrived by the boat train at a London hotel, had gone off to bed, and had left a large young lion with the hall porter, telling him it was for the "Zoo." Young tigers are always welcome; lions rather less so, and leopards and bears that have grown too big for their owners, but which have been brought to this country at considerable cost, are offered to the Society in inconvenient numbers. The smaller carnivora such as coatis, racoons, civets, and the various tribes of ichneumons and mongoose-like animals are sent to the Gardens very frequently, and almost always with similar histories. They have been pets, but have suddenly become obnoxious, either by biting severely, or very frequently by suddenly developing an offensive odour—a usual sign of maturity.

The commoner kinds of monkeys, small baboons, and cockatoos and various kinds of parrots are the most frequent gifts that come as discarded pets. They are not always too welcome. Frequently they are not in the best condition, or have developed some unpleasant habit, but the chief trouble is that they seldom live well. However, careful the keepers may be, they have not time to give each animal the individual petting and attention that it has been accustomed to receive. If it is kept alone it very often mopes and dies; if it is placed with others it is usually bullied and not allowed to have its fair share of food.

GONOSAN (CAPSULES) of purest Sandal wood oil and Kawa will be found invaluable for inducing relief, and assisting nature in healing the most painful of all diseases. It is readily taken and causes no untoward effects. The only quick and safe remedy. Procurable at all Druggists and General Stores.

ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

FROM time immemorial the ant and the bee have been held up as the most praiseworthy exponents of animal industry, and there is no doubt that each of them is well-entitled to the honour. At the same time there are many other creatures whose energy is justly entitled to man's admiration, and some of them might certainly be included in the same category as the two first mentioned. The wasp is a good case in point, for although that creature has come under the ban of condemnation by reason of its often mischievous behaviour, it is, according to its own lights and if it is to be judged with absolute impartiality, just as industrious as the bee. The latter certainly works more days in the year, but then the wasp has no choice in this matter seeing that it has been ordained by Nature not to begin its annual labour until some months later than its rival. But once the wasp sets to work it puts in an even longer day than the bee. It is abroad long before the sun has risen, and it does not go to bed until dark.

The various degrees of selfishness and unselfishness which enter into the life-work of every creature afford an endless theme of interest for those who care to study the subject. The British cuckoo is probably as selfish a worker as could be found in the whole world and this is the more curious seeing that there are other species of the same genus whose characteristics are of an exactly opposite kind. The British cuckoo is not quite so lazy as it was once declared to be by the schoolboy, who defined it as being "a bird what doesn't lay its own eggs"; but everyone knows that beyond the accomplishment of that necessary effort towards the continuation of its race, it has no further interest in the matter. No other bird in the world is quite so lazy as this, but there are many others which dispense as far as possible with the execution of what would seem to be their first duty in life. In some species the labour of nest-building is left entirely to the female, while in others even the feeding of the offspring is wholly neglected by the male. Though said to be an exemplary bird in his native land, the average cock pheasant of our woods takes practically no interest in domestic matters once his consort begins to sit, though it must be said in justice to this ordinarily lazy bird that he has been discovered on very rare occasions assisting in the process of incubation. The cock partridge on the other hand makes it his duty to assist his mate on all possible occasions. Not only does he assist in the hatching—he is invariably to be seen sitting on the nest with the hen bird just previous to the appearance of the young—but he also displays the most assiduous care and anxiety for his family's welfare throughout the stage of their infancy and adolescence. So much is this the case that if any accident should cause the death of the hen partridge, her widower will take upon himself the whole of the parental duties, and often brings matters to a successful issue. The male pigeon is an equally devoted husband and father, taking it in turns with his mate to brood over the eggs, and doing his full share of protecting and feeding the young afterwards.

It is sometimes difficult, perhaps, to draw the line between industry and idleness in the case of certain creatures, for even the most painstaking efforts would occasionally seem to be quite unproductive. A water vole, for example, will spend the best part of a morning biting off the rushes on the river bank, and, so far as one can see, his labour is entirely in vain. You may watch him ever so intently, and yet be unable to discover that he eats or makes any other use of the product of his industry. The heap remains as he left it until it decays, and yet you can hardly believe that his object was solely destructive, or that he was merely endeavouring to kill time. The rook again, affords a good example of what one may call wasted energy. He and his mate will spend weeks in building a nest, simply, as it seems, for the fun of pulling it to pieces afterwards, for that is what often happens. And what a prodigious amount of trouble the bird takes in collecting material that is never destined to play any part in his architectural schemes. Frequently for every stick that is used in the nest two more are dropped on the ground beneath, and it is very rarely that the rook thinks it worth while to pick up that which he has taken so much pains to collect, possibly from a long distance. Most birds waste a great deal of their nesting material, and some seem to use far more than they really need. There is a great deal of difference between the nests of individuals of the same species, particularly in the case of the tits, the nests of some being often twice the size of those built by others.

The pluck that some creatures exhibit in their industrial undertakings is truly remarkable, and can only be likened to the wonderful perseverance of the primitive savage who with a flint tool first worked out the stem of a tree into a serviceable boat. The beaver cheerfully sets to work to fell a tree that will take him weeks to gnaw through, and the woodpecker labours incessantly for weeks on end to bore a hole in the unyielding trunk of some massive oak. It is quite a mistake to suppose that this bird always chooses for its operations a tree that is rotten towards its core. The hardest tree in the world must yield to the adamantine strength of the woodpecker's bill and the determined energy of its owner. But even the woodpecker's industry is perhaps not equal to that of the sparrow and many other birds which never rest more than a few minutes in the course of the day from the almost endless task of feeding their clamorous offspring.

BALUCHISTAN NATURAL HISTORY SOCIETY.

Proceedings of a meeting of the Baluchistan Natural History Society held in the Sandeman Library on 26th September 1912.

Present.—Mrs. Archer (in the Chair), Mr. A. Anderson, Miss Cubbon, K. B. Ardeshir, D. Marker. Honorary Secretary—Mr. J. W. N. Cumming.

In opening the meeting Mrs. Archer expressed regret that General and Mrs. Scott and Colonel Archer who had intended to be present at the meeting were unavoidably detained at the last moment.

Read list of donations made to the McMahon Museum since the last meeting, the objects themselves being passed round for inspection.

Of these the only objects of importance were a Belestama indicum from Sibi presented by Mr. C. J. Shaw and some snake (?) eggs from Mach presented by Mr. E. Wood.

With reference to the latter the Honorary Secretary remarked that a few of the eggs had been placed in sand in the hope that they would hatch out and enable him to identify them; but that so far nothing had come of the experiment.

Read letters from Lieutenant-Colonel H. Delme Radcliffe and Captain and Miss Cubbon thanking the Society for electing them Members.

The election of new Members being the next item on the agenda Mr. Cumming proposed the name of Malik Naraindass. This proposal was seconded by K. B. Ardeshir Marker and duly carried.

The Story Teller.

THE ANCHOR DROPPED.

Shall never forget the time when old Joe Squirks was "carpeted;" it was as good as a play, with a "star" performer in every part and free alcoholic drinks all over the auditorium. I would not have missed it for worlds, and was very pleased to be allowed to leave the council chamber without my complete evidence being required by the stewards.

Nothing is more sacred to me, in a general way, than truth, and I often wish that I could afford to speak it oftener. But if, by doing so, one may get a dear friend into trouble, the best plan is in my opinion to play for safety, and to mention, with a yawn, that you might have known something of the matter under investigation if you had not been asleep at the time.

That is what I did on the memorable occasion in question—played for safety with the long rest.

"What do you know about it?" said Rhadamanthus II. to me, with inflated jaws. "If you can testify to the real facts you need not try to imagine what did not occur. If you backed the winner, you are not expected to show us the money; but neither need you give a harrowing recital of your losses." He looked at me severely, not as though he intended to press upon me a douceur.

In times of the greatest stress and storm, when some men are induced to try prussic acid or razors as a remedy my spirit rises with a buoyancy that has often surprised people who have only seen me at home. What was Rhadamanthus II., to me, forsooth, or I to him, compared with the professional rehabilitation of Joseph Squirks, the trainer? So up spake I, with unfaltering mien, before the Stewards, using burning words, with suitable dramatic gesture, to the following effect:—

"My lords and gentlemen, you have wisely asked for the truth from me, and you shall have it, for there is nothing I can spare so well. The fact is, then, in regard to this last race, that old Pigtail could not go. The poor old chap did his best, but, like me, my lords and gentlemen"—I tapped my delicate chest twice on each side so that there could be no mistake as to my identity—"the unfortunate old 'boiler' played his trump card years ago, and the only thing he is capable of winning now is the whip. Besides, he suffers from heart disease, and when he begins to grunt his jockey dare not punish him."

"And did he grunt in this last race?" asked a simple Steward who had not been racing long and did not look like lasting much longer.

"Did he grunt!" I repeated with withering emphasis; "did he not! Why, he made the welkin ring at the far side of the course after his jockey hit him the first time. Did he grunt! Why, I assure you, my lords and gentlemen"—here I became extremely confidential—"when he began to do so in earnest some ploughmen a few fields away deserted their posts, and fled in terror to the nearest alehouse, where, if you will come with me in a convival mood, I shall be pleased to show them to you, all dead drunk.

It was natural that my impassioned eloquence should produce some sort of an impression on the minds of the presiding judges. They looked at each other as if wondering where they had met last. The simple Steward seemed to be especially affected, and in one of his eyes, if not in both, were signs of moisture. "If I were only nearer to him" such was my inward comment—"I might touch him for at least five, and he would be none the wiser." What glorious opportunities are lost to us by want of contiguity!

The case as against Squirks was dismissed, there being no ugly evidence (only ugly witnesses), and that eminent trainer left the court with a very red face, but without any new stain upon his character. He did not appear to be joyful for some time after his escape. We did not expect him to recover his moral tone—for an obvious reason—but we thought that he might have celebrated his good luck by a series of mild festivities which we should have all enjoyed heartily at his expense.

But no; Mr. Squirks was adamant—he would not move in the desired direction with us. His customary libidinous propensities had left him, showing how severe the recent shock had been. He seemed to be mumbling to himself prayerfully, and to catch his breath now and then in short gasps, as if he had fallen from a great height and was not certain of touching bottom while he lived.

"It's all right, old man," said I, tapping him on the shoulder; "the myrmidons of justice have done with you for the present. They won't try you a second time; at least, not to-day. Don't grieve for what cannot be undone, and seek to make atonement for your wicked past." I shook my finger at him with a terrible expression. "I backed Pigtail."

"Well, well," he said, in a weak voice, "when we throw out our little nets we have no idea what big fish we are going to catch. And poor old Pigtail, too!—how silly for you to back him when you ought to know that, with his heart disease, he cannot win when the public lay two to one on him in a large field of runners, as they did on this occasion. The excitement would be too much for him."

"Good old Pigtail!" I replied, fervently. "He is a wonderful champion to take about the country for the in-and-out game. If you had another or two of his sort, Joseph, you might become wealthy before you were warned off, if you packed it together in a hurry."

"I don't like 'em with heart disease," he remarked, innocently; "I'd rather have one with a pipe in his throat. One you can take out to clean once in twenty-four hours, or the hole grows up—but as for the other, well, there"—he waved his arms pathetically—"how are you to back an old crock like mine, whose heart is all wrong when the punters lay two to one on him before you have time to strike a blow on your own behalf?"

I could have said more, of course; it is always easy to say more when it would be prudent to say less or nothing, and few people are reticent by nature when they have lost their money at the races, or at the card table, or down the sink. How was it possible to express my real convictions to Mr. Squirks concerning the running of Pigtail, having regard to the facts: (1) That he is a person of hasty temper who does not look to see how big a man is before he prods him viciously on the nose; (2) That my own nose, in consequence of its generous tints, offers too glorious a mark for a sportsman on the warpath; and (3) That my instincts, softened by a long era of peace, lead me to do anything but fight even when my cause is just, and when it is my odds in reason on me if I can only get in the first blow on a vital part.

Appreciating the gravity of the situation, however, I moved away from the irate Squirks, and sought to circulate freely amongst my friends in the paddock. There was a sense of security in being near to those who did not carry a too ready fist. Verily, I would as soon have a man's fingers in my pocket as in my face. So, wishing to back the next winner, I went to look at the horses saddled, and could not help smiling when quite by chance I saw the ancient Pigtail being led away on his homeward route.

How strange it is that I cannot even smile with any luck! My play of feature had been observed by Joseph Squirks—possibly by others for my afternoon smile is a broad one; but it was Joseph who spoke. There was a note of gruffness in his voice that caused my sensitive frame to quiver slightly. He said—

"Come, now, I suppose you think you know something about this last race. Out with it like a man." He closed his right fist like a club. "Don't suggest there as if the lolly paddock belonged to you, and you were about to turn us all out unless we paid over again. Do you wish to suggest that in the last race I was dropping the anchor, and—"

"No no," I hastily interpolated—"you mistake my meaning, Joseph; you allow your vivid fancy to run away with you. I did not insinuate for a moment that you were dropping the anchor; only that the anchor had been dropped."

He seemed to be greatly mollified by this sophistical explanation of an ordinary occurrence, and took me on one side in a friendly manner, or I should not have gone with him. Then, shaking the collar off my beautiful fur-lined overcoat as an indication of how he could shake me if necessity arose, he said: "Well, now, my lad, and what do you know? What do you think you've seen?"

"It's like this, dear boy," I replied, genially, resuming the sables. "When I come to the races I bring two eyes with me, if not much money, my ambition being to see what is going on even if I am unable to grasp anything. You follow me of course?"

He nodded.

"Thus, when I have two sovereigns on a horse, I watch the performance of that animal with all the intensity of my nature. If he whisks his tail while going to the post or afterwards I note the fact, and wonder what he is doing it for. And, dear Joseph, I had two of the best on Pigtail."

"Well, I can't give it to you back," he said.

"No, you can't give it to me back; it would be impossible for me to touch the money if you held out a sovereign in each hand, such is my nobility of soul. But why, oh Joseph," I continued, with rising eloquence—"why did you step across the course after the horses had gone to the post and put a thick curb round the jaws of good old Pigtail?"

He uttered an awful cry, and fled into the night. . . . .

Note by Author.—Pigtail ran in a double bridle without a curb when his worthy owner backed him with enthusiasm. When prohibitive odds were laid on him by other people he ran (very badly) with a curb; for he was a funny old horse that took a lot of holding, even if Mr. Squirks had backed something else.

THE EXTERMINATION OF ELEPHANTS.

Two profusely illustrated articles in the National Geographic Magazine (Washington) for August 1912 cannot fail to give rise to serious reflections as to how long it will be—if matters are allowed to go on as at present—before all the big elephants in Africa are killed off and the supply of ivory for the use of the world in general practically stopped. It may be said that young elephants will be left and that from these a new supply will eventually be forthcoming. But even if this prove to be the case, the new supply will not be for the present generation, for the elephant is a slow grower, and young ones of the present day, even if they are allowed to attain maturity, would probably take at least half a century before they developed such enormous tusks as those which come into the Zanzibar market from Uganda and other parts of East Africa.

In the first of the two articles referred to Mr. Carl E. Akeley tells us that in August 1909 he left New York, accompanied by his wife, to secure, if possible, for the American Museum of Natural History a series of elephants for the purpose of forming a group in that institution; such group to include at least one large, big-tusked bull. Serious work was commenced on the Guasingishu plateau, where a cow and calves were certain to be secured, while it was hoped that a big bull might also be found on the plateau or in the forests of Mount Elgon, where but comparatively few years ago such animals were to be met with in numbers, as is evident from the scarred trees, abandoned native pitfalls and decaying bones. The hunter's hopes were, however, doomed to be disappointed, for we are told that more than a hundred elephants were inspected without a single big bull being seen. After ascending Mount Elgon, with the same ill-fortune as regards elephants, tracks were made for Uganda; but during the whole of a fortnight's journey not a single elephant was seen. A month was then devoted in the region of the Victoria Nile; this being a noted district for big elephants, where many splendid tuskers have been shot in the past, although really good ones are now few and far between.

The party succeeded, indeed, in killing a couple of enormous bulls, but they had comparatively small tusks, weighing only from 75 to 80lbs. each.

Returning southwards a visit was paid to Mount Kenia, where evidence of the presence of elephants up to a height of 14,500 feet or more—that is to say, practically the height of Mount Blanc—was obtained. Here the leader of the party was laid up for several months as the result of an unfortunate encounter with a bull elephant ; and in consequence of this hunting was not resumed till January 1911, when operations were undertaken in the district between Lake Albert, the Victoria Nile and Masnide.

Better luck attended this part of the expedition, for although one large herd was seen from which all good tuskers had been killed off, two others, numbering about one hundred each, were subsequently met with, among which were bulls with good ivory. From these or other herds Mr. Akeley obtained a couple of bulls with tusks weighing 100lbs. or more. The best bull obtained for the group was "a young adult standing 11 feet 3 inches at the shoulders, with tusks of 100 and 102lbs. respectively. These are young ivory, and there can be no doubt that if this elephant had lived fifty years longer, they would have attained a weight of 200lbs. each. Such tusks are not abnormal; they are simply those of a good healthy bull who has been intelligent and lucky enough to keep his life until his ivory was full grown." One splendid old bull in Uganda was so well protected by a herd of aggressive cows, that he had survived all attempts at his destruction. Such old bulls are, however, very rare, for when a bull has developed tusks of 50lbs., which it does at quite an early age, perhaps five-and-twenty years, he becomes the target of every hunter, native or white, who sets eyes upon him. Accordingly, it is only the more crafty or timid individuals that, seeking the protection of large herds, or clinging to the more inaccessible regions such as dense forests, that manage to survive to a ripe old age and develop a full growth of ivory.

The enormous destruction of such tusker bulls is pictorially illustrated in a second article, by Mrs. H. R. Childs, on Zanzibar and its trade. In this is depicted an enormous heap of ivory, which included 967 tusks, with a total weight of 58,000lbs. The author states that "much good ivory still comes to Zanzibar, but the world's supply lessens yearly while the demand for it increases month by month."

That large ivory will practically cease to enter the market before very many years are over, seems a practical certainty.

But there is another factor in the case which will probably ere long hasten the impending extermination of the African elephant, at all events in accessible localities. We mean the destruction caused to forests and cultivated grounds by herds, like the one referred to above, from which all bulls with sizable tusks have been killed off.

"The amount of damage," writes Mr. Akeley, "that a herd of five hundred elephants can do to forests and native cultivation is enormous . . . . . The average value of ivory in this herd would not have exceeded twenty dollars per head, not enough to cover the damage done by them in one year."

As the country becomes more and more opened up and cultivation increases, while the value of the forests becomes augmented, it is unlikely that such damage will be submitted to by the proprietors, and elephants with little or no ivory will become objects of persecution.

Everything is therefore against the survival of Elephas Africanus in the more settled parts of the country for another generation.

Sporting & Athletic Notes.

With reference to a paragraph that recently appeared in this column stating that Brogue had been leased to Lady Jenkins and would run in her ladyship's colours at the cold weather meetings, we learn that our information was not correct and that Brogue is now the property of Mr. Mathuradass Goculdass, the well-known Bombay owner, having been purchased by him for £2,500 from Mr. Galstaun. Our information, however, came from Bombay and from what we deemed to be an absolutely reliable source. Our regret is twofold, as we should have liked to have seen her sporting ladyship's colours carried by so good a one in the big races of the coming season. We, however, wish the mare's new owner all luck and after his bad fortune with Last Call, which horse we hear is not likely to be of much further use upon the turf, Mr. Goculdass' many racing friends and admirers would rejoice if he could this year achieve the darling ambition of his heart and capture the Viceroy's Cup. There is, however, no blinking the fact that the opposition this year is formidable and with such horses as Saxonite, Gunboat, Mayfowl, Vavasor, Lawn Sand, Aborigine, etc., etc., to take the list no further, it will not be an easy race for anyone to win. The Priory II., who ran so well over hurdles in the recent monsoon meetings, is still, we understand, Lady Jenkins' property, as he was only leased to Mr. L. P. E. Pugh for the autumn, may we hope he will be seen out in the premier steeplechase at Tollygunge in the cold weather and after the good form he has shown recently there is no just cause or impediment why he should not do well. The little difficulty about his refusing seems to have been overcome and as he has run over fences at Ireland and is a naturally fine jumper, there is no reason why, if he faces the local obstacles kindly, he should not be well up to the front amongst the by no means strong lot of jumpers that are usually all out at the steeplechase meeting. We hope that we may be found to be true prophets.

The prospectus of the Sixth Tollygunge Club Meeting, which is to be run on the 16th November, has been issued and would seem to amply suffice for the needs of the occasion. There are four flat races, two of which are closed, one to the C.L.H. and the other to our friends of the Black Watch, and the odd event is a handicap steeplechase for the amateur class of horses, i.e., animals that have not won Rs. 500 or over. The President of the Club, Mr. R. H. A. Gresson, presents a cup for a 7-furlong handicap for furlongs, and there is a closed handicap five-furlong race for horses that have never won a flat race, hurdle race or steeplechase value Rs. 500 or over. We are glad to note in the General Conditions of both these November Prospectuses of the Club Meetings that the irksome conditions regarding penalties and allowances where riders are concerned have been greatly simplified and the only condition now attaching to riders is the following :—

"In all races except those with special conditions G.R's who have never ridden a winner under C.T.C. or other recognised rules of racing (events closed to the Calcutta Light Horse excepted) allowed 7lb."

This is a very sensible and acceptable reform, as under the old conditions of multifarious allowances a whole handicap stood to be turned topsyturvy and much confusion and delay was often caused. One person above all others who will greet the new condition with joy is the long-suffering Clerk of the Scales whose duties are now greatly simplified by this 7lb. all round "apprentice" allowance!

The Tollygunge Club course is, we understand, in very good order, thanks to the unremitting care of the Secretary and also to the personal interest taken in it by Mr. Curtis Hayward. The sensible plan of getting the top-dressing on early and letting the grass grow through it to hold it in its place has been adopted on this course and the result has always been eminently satisfactory, as even in the driest weather the going is almost invariably better than it is upon any of the other local courses.

Mr. C. Bower Ismay's bay colt Craganour by Desmond out of Veneration II., who has just won the Middle Park Plate, got home twice early in the season, securing upon one occasion the New Stakes at Ascot, beating Shogun and Diadamenos and twelve others and the 6-furlong Exeter Stakes at Newmarket, in which he defeated Cabaret and Catmint, who were the placed ones behind him, without much difficulty. He also ran up in the Molecomb Stakes at Goodwood to Rock Flint, who only beat him a head and Craganour was badly drawn. He is stated to be a really good colt and he is bred to stay, as Desmond gives him St. Simon and L'Abbesse de Jouarre, who was by Trappist by Hermit and out of Festive who is bred upon the best possible staying lines, being by Carnival, who goes back to Gladiator and Buckthorn out of Piercy, who is by Atherston out of Fair Agnes, who was by Voltigeur out of Little Agnes out of Miss Agnes by Birdcatcher out of Agnes. Desmond like those good horses Florizel II., Diamond Jubile, Persimmon is inbred to Blacklock, as he gets a lot of this great staying strain on both sides of the house. They say that Craganour favours his sire considerably and is a very fine stamp of colt with a lot to like about him. He will probably settle down to be winter favourite for next year's Derby.

A Calcutta racing man who has been Home for the season, sends us out a few items of news of interest to local and Indian turfites generally, and amongst those whom our friend has met in the course of his tour of the meetings have been Colonel Beaver, Mr. Bates and Mr. Boteler, all of whom he encountered at Hurst Park and who were looking very fit and well. They are all due back in India about the first week in November. Mr. Galstaun, who had just arrived back, has, so our correspondent writes, give the ring fits on more than one occasion and has done very well, winning more in one bet at home than he could the whole season through in India. He is reputed to be one of the biggest bettors in the ring and has a few useful horses scattered about with no fewer than three trainers—Hogg, Hallick, and Morris. Mr. Galstaun is said to have had a good win on Prince Rupert at Doncaster. Mr. Creet is also constantly to be seen at the meetings and has a good one in Runnymede, who is expected to win at the back-end. Mr. Wadia of Bombay is also a constantly met habitue and his horse Fiz Yama has done him well and has won him a couple of races. Colin Barrett usually rides for him and also has had a good few rides for Morris and Schwind's stables. Mr. R. J. Farquharson has not been in luck's way recently and has nothing that is of much use at present. Mr. O. M. D. Bell is established as a trainer at Epsom, but has not yet been very successful in getting anything good. He has, so our correspondent says, recently sold a few "for India," but he does not mention what they are. They are, we hear, however, coming out to Ramshaw's stable. Duller, who is coming out, is the jockey who came into prominence by riding two dead-heats recently with Wootton at Alexandra Park. He is said to be considerably above what is called useful and will, so they say, be about the best light weight we shall have out here this season in Calcutta. Our dapper friend H. N. Bond has been out and about everywhere and has done himself particularly well, having had a very successful time betting. He has been up in the air in more ways than one, as he took a little trip with Spencer in a biplane and the only contretemps was that when he was motoring himself back to town from Brooklands he was lagged for exceeding the speed limit and fined one pound of the red gold! He returns to India by the same boat as Colin Barrett and will be here in Calcutta very shortly where his many friends will be undoubtedly glad to welcome back so entertaining a personality! Colin Barrett, so we hear, may start as a trainer at home next autumn. Duller comes out with Barrett and will ride the light weights for Ramshaw's stable, so we understand. Whalley has, of course, gone quite to the top of the tree and is riding in great form. He is not coming out to India, as he has more profitable fish to fry at home and they cannot spare him, as he will be wanted to ride some of the trials on Mr. Leopold's and other prominent owner's two-year-olds. Robbins is another jockey known in India, who has done well this season and he is booked for a retainer from Lord Derby next season. The experience Colin Barrett has gained at home this season has done him a power of good and he is stated to be riding a good 7lb. to 10lb. better race than he did before. He has done well on Morris', Schwind's and on occasional rides on Mr. Sievier's horses and may be said to have firmly established himself. He will as usual have the first call on all those in Ramshaw's stable and we expect tosee him go close to heading the winning list in India this season.

When Sea Lad was winning all those races recently at the Calcutta Monsoon Meetings some doubts were expressed as to whether he was clean-bred, as there was no reliable record of how he was bred. Thanks to the kindness of Mr. L. A. Lamb, who referred to Mr. White on whose station the little horse was bred, we are now able to give the following tabulated result of the researches which firmly establish Sea Lad's right to be considered eligible for inclusion in the equine Debrett :—

The Indian Cavalry Polo Tournament, Tent-Pegging and Races will be held at Delhi commencing on the second Monday in February 1913.

The Barton Cup Polo Tournament at Jubbulpore ended on the 26th instant in a win for the 22nd Punjabis, who beat the 12th Cavalry in the final by 4 goals to 3.

The Meerut Polo Tournament opened on Saturday afternoon last when the 3rd Skinners' Horse met and defeated the Inniskilling Dragoons "B" team by 8 goals to nil. On Monday four more games were played with the following results :—King's Dragoon Guards beat 18th K. G. O. Lancers (+ 2 goals) by 9 goals to 3. 8th Hussars beat the 13th Hussars "C" team (+ 5 goals) by 17 goals to 6. 3rd Skinners' Horse beat 13th Hussars "B" team (+ 1 goal) by 7 goals to 2. 13th Hussars "A" team beat Inniskilling Dragoons "A" team by 6 goals to 4. Details will appear in our next issue.

We much regret to record the death in Scotland on the 22nd instant, of Mr. Jas. Douglas, Managing Director of Messrs. Cook and Company, Limited. Mr. Douglas was very well known in Calcutta and is deeply regretted by many friends.

Jim Corbett, the famous boxer known to every sportsman as "Pompadour Jim," is reported to be lying in a critical condition at Philadelphia.

He has been operated upon for appendicitis, and though hopes are entertained that he will ultimately recover, his friends are filled with anxiety.

Since retiring from the ring Corbett, who is forty-five years old, has been engaged on the music-halls, both in the United States and England.

His family were well-to-do, and he himself was originally a bank clerk in San Francisco. A chance "spar" in the gymnasium in the Western city gave such signs of latent talent that the proprietor persuaded Corbett to take to boxing as a profession. Personally, he wanted to devote his time to baseball.

While the present generation of the followers of boxing will probably only remember Corbett through his great struggle with Bob Fitzsimmons, and his two meetings with Jim Jeffries, what really brought him before the sporting world was his sensational contest with John L. Sullivan.

Corbett's quickness on his feet, and the "dancing" tactics he adopted on that occasion, completely nonplussed the great John L., who, for the first time after securing the world's championship title, had to put up with defeat.

In the year before he defeated Sullivan Corbett had fought a sixty-one rounds draw with the coloured boxer, Peter Jackson; and he subsequently defeated the Englishman Charlie Mitchell, in four rounds.

The return contest between Carpentier and Klaus will take place at Monte Carlo some time next April. Articles have been signed for a 20-round contest. The men will meet at the middle weight limit and a purse of £5,000 has been put up. It will be remembered that the two met at Dieppe last June when Klaus met in the 19th round, Carpentier's seconds throwing up the sponge.

Marcel Thomas met the Dixie Kid in a 15-round contest for the welter weight championship of the world in Paris on the 5th instant, and spectators were given a big surprise. The negro was expected to win hands down and for the first seven rounds he completely outclassed his opponent, and would have won in a few rounds if he had taken the matter seriously. When he did try to get to work properly he found that he began to tire quickly and Thomas sticking it out had the best of the remaining rounds. He was all over his opponent and the Dixie Kid failing to bring off a knock out, Thomas was given the verdict on points.

At Maddison Square Garden, New York, on the 23rd ultimo Eddie McGoorty of Milwaukee knocked out Jack Harrison, the English welter weight, in the first round of a contest scheduled to go ten. At the start McGoorty twice sent the Englishman reeling across the ring with smashing lefts. Harrison planted a solid right on McGoorty's face but was then sent staggering with a hard left and next dropped for a count of 9 with a right upper cut. He got up but went down for a count of 4 with the same sort of punch. Once again he got up but was sent down for the full count with a crashing left upper cut on his chin that stretched him senseless on the mat.

A contest between Jim Driscoll and Owen Moran is once more on the tapis. Mr. Bettinson has offered a purse and Moran has accepted: it only remains for Driscoll to say yes. When approached some little time back he was unable to fix anything up till his return from the States whither he was going on the 21st September. But it is now stated that Driscoll is not at all well and there is a grave possibility of an operation being necessary so that the proposed fight is as far off as ever.

Billy Papke, ex-middle weight champion of the world, was recently suspended by the New York Boxing Commission for failing to appear in his match with Mantell in New York. The French Federation were asked to sustain this suspension but replied that it was impossible to enforce this as the Papke-Carpentier contest was at hand and too much money had already been disbursed by the promoters. The contest will therefore, take place and Papke's suspension was to be maintained with regard only to engagements contracted after the date of suspension. Papke was seen on his arrival in Paris and stated that the matter amounted to very little and that had he been in New York to defend himself such steps would not have been taken by the Commission. He had failed to appear to fight Mantell, but he was under no contract, having promised to appear if he could. This was so well understood that the organisers arranged in advance for another man to fight if he did not turn up.

The victorious career of the South African Rugby team met with a check when they played Newport at Newport on the 25th instant, the visitors being beaten by 9 points to 3. On Saturday last the South Africans met Blackheath and defeated the Heathens by 12 to 5.

The next Amateur Golf Championship of India has been fixed to take place over the Tollygunge Club links from the 29th December to 1st January next. There will be an open handicap at Barrackpore between 21st December and 1st January for the Asian Challenge Bowl.

The annual Hockey Tournament for the cup presented by Mr. E. R. Parsons, Deputy Inspector-General of Police, to be played for by Police teams in the First Range, has this year been won by Jhansi who beat Etah in the final at Agra by 3 goals to nil. Sixteen teams entered, though five of these had subsequently to scratch. Some good hockey was witnessed and Jhansi were undoubtedly the best team in the tournament.

H. H. the Raja of Dhar this year presented a challenge shield for competition among the cricketing teams of Central India and by his special desire the trophy was called the "Daly Shield." The tournament was played on the knock out system and ten teams entered, two of them having subsequently to withdraw. The final brought together the 14th Hussars and the Central India Agency Sports Club at Indore on the 17th and 18th instant, the C. I. A. Club winning easily by an innings and 8 runs and thus winning the Shield.

With regard to the new Hockey rules, "Forward" writes to the Pioneer as follows:—"The alteration of Rules 19 and 20 which deal with corner and penalty corner hits will surely be viewed by most players in this country as a decided step backwards. Whatever may be the opinion of players at home, and I believe that there is a fairly general opinion in England, that there will be an appreciable increase of risk to the goal-keeper—the alteration of the rules out here will introduce a real element of danger into the game. The pace of grounds, whether grass or 'pat,' in India allows of the ball being hit in from the corner at a much greater pace than on the comparatively slow grounds at home; the attacking side therefore is much more likely to get in a shot before the defenders can reach the edge of the circle—especially so in the case of a penalty corner. When the ball is stopped dead and then hit, it can be sent towards the goal at a terrific pace, as any player who has succeeded in stopping a shot with some unprotected part of his body can bear witness, how much more then is a ball taken at a half volley, for presumably so long as the ball has been checked in its flight by one player another may take a flying hit at it, likely to deal out destruction amongst the ranks of the defenders. No umpire could give such a hit as an undercut, and if it could be stopped under the heading of dangerous play why change the rule and give a player an opportunity of doing damage.

"I believe it has been suggested several times that a committee should be formed in India, empowered to make such alterations in the rules as might be considered necessary. Owing to the necessarily unrepresentativeness such a committee would have and the continual changes of stations this idea has never matured, and each year the changes in the rules at home, whether for good or bad, are accepted in this country without any attempt of dissent or suggestions for modifications to suit the game as played in India. If the committee of each tournament were to include in their conditions a proviso that all teams entering must accept and play under, in that tournament, such modifications of the hockey rules as they considered necessary for the good of the game, a big step would be achieved in eliminating some of the dangers of the game, peculiar to this country. Rules requiring the opposing teams to be wrapped up in cotton wool would be impossible as no self-respecting team would enter, but surely no sporting team would refuse to accept a slight modification of the rules for India."

The Maharajah Cup Hockey Tournament at Ranchi was won by St. Paul's Parish "A" team who beat the Roman Parish team in the final by 3 goals to 1, after a fast and interesting game. The Rev. Whitley, Sadhu and some others formerly well known in Beighton Cup Tournaments in Calcutta, were assisting the winners.

A very successful week was held in Shillong during the Poojah holidays. There was a large influx of holiday makers into the station, the weather was most delightful throughout and an excellent programme was put through. Dances, "at homes" and social fixtures of the kind there were any number, but our readers are probably more interested in the details of the sporting events. There were days of racing, results of which appear further on. Good sport was witnessed and we must not forget to mention the big improvements on the course and in the paddock. The polo tournament fell through as regards outside teams, but three local teams were put together. Major Rushton's team beat Captain Hutchison's team by a goal to nil and will meet Mr. Henderson's in the final. A Horse Show was engineered and was most successful. Mrs. C. Holder was "at home" during the afternoon and an enjoyable time was spent. Results were :—Hacks (to be ridden) 1 Captain Hutchison's Bareface, 2 Mrs. Hodgson's Boy. Harness Horses and Ponies (to be driven) 1 Mrs. Shoobridge's Lassie, 2. Mrs. Bonham Carter's Stockdale. Polo Ponies.—Major Rushton's Miss Mac. Jumping.—1 Mrs. Phillimore's Caprice, 2 Mrs Bonham Carter's Stockdale. All Horses and Ponies.—Mr. C. H. Holder's Dulcimer. Two cricket matches were played. In the first the Military beat the Civil : and in the other Shillong beat a Ballygunge team by four wickets. The tennis is still in progress. The Ladies' Golf Competition for the Bachelors' Challenge Cup, by medal play 18 holes against Bogey, was won by a Calcutta visitor, Mrs. Leslie, with a score of 114—22=92, with Mrs. Reid of Shillong second with 113—15=98. The Fuller Golf Cup for men was won by Mr. Kerwood, who played two excellent rounds and won easily.

The Annual General Meeting of the Calcutta Golf Club, Limited, will be held at the Pavilion on the maidan on Tuesday next, the 5th November, at 5-45 p.m., to receive and consider the accounts for the past year and to elect office-bearers and transact any other business which may be brought forward. The Club Tiffin and Opening Day competitions are fixed for Saturday next.

The Cawnpore Banking Company, Limited, will open a branch of the Bank at Lucknow on the 1st November.

The Lawn Tennis Tournament at Darjeeling was brought to a successful conclusion on Saturday morning last when the various finals were played off, resulting as follows :—

Men's Singles.—Goldsmith beat Kitson.

Men's Doubles.—Veitch and Sawday beat Kenworthy and Vivian.

Mixed Doubles.—Miss Graham and Field beat Captain and Mrs. Kitson.

Ladies' Doubles.—Mrs. Oswald Smith and Mrs. O'Malley beat Mrs. Patridge and Miss Rendell.

The Hockey Tournament for the Dewar Challenge Shield at Karachi drew fourteen entries this year and the final last week brought together the Y.M.C.A. and combined "C" and "D" Companies team of the York and Lancaster Regiment. Their first meeting ended in a draw—one all, but in the replay the Y.M.C.A. won by 5 goals to nil. The soldiers had quite as much of the game as their opponents but failed to take advantage of chances of scoring.

The management of the Electric Theatre in Corporation Street are indeed to be congratulated on the really excellent pictures they are showing nowadays. The popularity of this house of entertainment grows every week and the patronage extended by the public must be most gratifying to the proprietors. Last Friday we witnessed a splendid programme. There were two of those first class cowboy films—a drama entitled "A Story of the West" and a comic item in which a troupe of most delightful "cow-girls" prove themselves more than a match for a motor car proprietor up against whom one of them had a grudge. "War on the Plains" again brought before us pictures of battle and exciting adventure with Settlers and Indians as the principal actors. But possibly the best film of all was Brown's Day Off. Brown gets a holiday on the excuse of his mother-in-law's death and skips from home on his "lonely," goes down to Margate by boat, where he meets with a "glad-eyed" young person with whom he has a capital time. But Brown's wife discovers her husband's fraud, rushes down to the seaside by train and following her hubby without being seen gets a number of snapshots of him in the midst his escapades. When Brown returns home in the evening complaining of a tiring day in office his wife produces the photos and the truant has a lively time !

On Saturday another fine programme was put on. The English Gazette contained many interesting items, including the recent manœuvres in England, a boat race between eights representing Paris and Berlin, swimming races in Paris, etc. "The Convalescent" was an interesting dramatic love story with an unexpected ending. The war drama "When California was Won" introduced some exciting episodes, while "Heaven's Messenger" was an excellent film, beautifully coloured and relating a pretty little Dutch story. A series of remarkable photographs of the Scorpion and its habits were most interesting and instructive, but the two comic pictures were again the best of the programme. "The Gossip" shows how a story gets exaggerated while being passed on by its narrators, and "A Gay time at Washington" tells the tale of a spree at the seaside that had dire consequences. No notice of the Electric Theatre would be complete without mention of the Bantleman brothers who provide much good music during the performance.

ACID STOMACHS ARE DANGEROUS.

NINE-TENTHS OF ALL STOMACH TROUBLE SAID TO BE DUE TO ACIDITY.

A PHYSICIAN'S ADVICE ON CAUSE AND CURE.

A famous physician whose successful researches into the cause and cure of stomach and intestinal diseases have earned for him an international reputation, said in the course of a recent lecture that nearly all intestinal troubles, as well as many diseases of the vital organs, were directly traceable to a deranged condition of the stomach, which in turn was due nine times out of ten to excessive acidity, which not only irritated and inflamed the delicate lining of the stomach, but also set up gastritis and stomach ulcers. It is interesting to note that he condemns the use of patent medicines as well as of medical treatment for the stomach, stating that he and his colleagues have secured remarkable results by the use of ordinary bisorated magnesia, which, by neutralising the acidity of the food, removes the source of the trouble. He contends that it is as foolish to treat the stomach itself as it would be for a man who stepped on a tack to rub liniment on the foot without first removing the tack. Remove the tack and the foot will heal itself—neutralise the acid and stomach troubles will disappear. Irritating medicines and medical treatments are useless, so long as the contents of the stomach remain acid ; remove the acidity, and there will be no need for medicine—the inflamed lining of the stomach will then heal itself. Sufferers from acidity should get a small bottle of bisorated magnesia from their chemist, and take half a teaspoonful in a quarter of a glass of hot or cold water after meals, repeating in fifteen minutes, if necessary, this being the dose which the doctor has found most efficacious in all cases.

London Week by Week.

Friday, 11th October 1912.

A man named Isaacs was, perhaps, unfortunate in being the first bird fancier to be prosecuted under the Protection of Birds Act, 1911. But he has the moral satisfaction of suffering, so far as he may be said to have suffered, in an excellent cause. He was prosecuted and fined at Bow Street this week for cruelty to a goldfinch, linnets, and a thrush, under the terms of the new Act, the case against him being that some of the birds in his shop were found in small and dirty cages, without sufficient food or water, while six hedge-sparrows were "wild and frightened," and some of the birds had broken feathers. Perhaps Isaacs was not more culpable than a large percentage of those who keep birds in captivity for sale. But his conviction will be a useful lesson. He himself declared that "when this case is reported hundreds and thousands of birds will be killed because it will not be safe to keep them." If we could believe that, we should be exceedingly glad. If every shop in which birds and beasts are kept captive could be shut up, that would be an excellent, if drastic, reform. The piteous sight of dogs in cages, of cats drugged into a comatose quiet, of song birds beating their wings against bars, is common in every city—common and, to the humane, hideous. There is no good reason or excuse for the captivity of song birds, at all events. The perverted sense which can enjoy the notes of thrush or blackbird singing a threnody of captive bars finds its only parallel in the perverted palate which longs for a lark on toast. Ignorance and thoughtlessness are responsible for more inexcusable cruelty to animals than all the malice prepense, and the Protection of Birds Act has made a good beginning in putting a stop to some of it.

One of the most costly exhibits will be that of Mr. Henry J. Crocker, of San Francisco, who is showing 135 rare stamps representing a hundred different countries. Every sheet is worth £1,000, while in one case that sum would not purchase a page containing a solitary stamp, a two-cent stamp of Hawaii, dated 1851. The Hawaiian stamps of this period are among the rarest in the world, and Mr. Crocker has sent over as many as seventeen of them, the value of which is £20,000.

Dr. Achillito Chiesa, of Milan, who has the world's best collection of the stamps of the Italian States before the union in 1860, will exhibit some of the rarest of them. Baron Anthony de Worms will show his famous Ceylon collection. An interesting general collection will be that of Countess Apponyi, and one or more specimens of the most fashionable stamp in the world—the Post Office Mauritius twopenny stamp of 1847, which change hands at £2,000 each—will be on view.

And writing of stamps. The widespread and entirely adverse criticism of the first postage stamps of the reign of King George led the Junior Philatelic Society last January to inaugurate an interesting public contest among artists. Prizes were offered for the best designs suggested for an improved British stamp, and the contest aroused very considerable interest. The fact that arrangements have been made to exhibit the result of this contest at the Jubilee International Stamp Exhibition, which opens at the Royal Horticultural Hall next Monday, gives a peculiar interest to a surprise which the Post Office department has sprung upon the public. To-day there is on sale a new penny postage stamp, from which the poor British lion has been banished. The design is entirely changed. The head is from a medal by Mr. Bertram Mackennal, and the frame has been designed by the same artist. Both head and frame are superior for stamp-printing to those with which we have lately become familiar.

The Daily Citizen, which made its first appearance on Tuesday, is an interesting experiment in journalism and an important venture in the interests of Labour; for it aims to combine the special features of a Labour journal with those of a general newspaper.

The new journal is to be not merely a propagandist organ, say the promoters, but a newspaper of the same quality as those whose chief purpose is the dissemination of general news.

The main news of the day is to be printed on the first page, with a Parliamentary sketch, the Parliamentary report (supplied by a special staff) following on the next page. Sport is to be fully reported. There will be dramatic and musical criticisms, a daily cartoon, and a daily instalment of a serial story.

The literary articles are to be an important feature. Mr. Hall Caine will contribute one to the first number on "The Use of Force in Politics." Other contributors to the page will be Mr. Bernard Shaw and Mr. Jerome K. Jerome. An adequate service of general and foreign news is to be given apart from that which is of special concern to Labour. How long will this paper last? It will be short lived if it follows on the lines of most "Labour" efforts.

Melba returned to her faithful Albert Hall audience on Saturday, after a long absence, and there were grandiose floral tributes. She revealed no new aspect of her gifts, but if these are sufficient to assemble such an enormous gathering of music-loving Londoners what can remain to be desired?

Donizetti and Gounod were the chief of the famous names figuring on the programme. First came the harrowing monologue of the demented Lucia di Lammermoor, then the gay carol of the ingenuous Marguerite over the gems of Mephistopheles. Between came an example of modern English art in the form of Mr. Landon Ronald's "Only the Song of a Bird." All these things and others were sung without blemish or flaw.

There were other performers. M. Eugene Ysaye essayed the hazardous experiment of infusing into various violin solos by Vieuxtemps, Saint-Saens, and others, worn threadbare by years of scraping at all the music schools in the world, a new interest by means of his exquisite skill; Mr. Edmund Burke sang well, and Mr. Backhaus played the piano. The gaiety of the concert was added to by the presentation to the diva of a "Teddy kangaroo," six feet high.

Men and women, according to Mr. Hubert Henry Davies, are divided into doormats and boots. The doormats have a genius for giving and giving way. The boots have a genius for receiving and slighting. That is the theme of Mr. Davies' new comedy "Doormats," just produced at Wyndham's Theatre.

Noel is an artist. Leila, his wife, is a pretty, vain gadabout. She is extravagant, and Noel has to paint potboilers. She is flighty, and flirts with Captain Harding. Mr. Davies never lets us know whether she loves Noel or the soldier. Really she loves neither, for only people with souls can love, and Leila is a worthless, cheap boot, for all the polish and the fashionable heels.

The comedy is thin, because Leila is so rubbishy. Its success is the success of ingenious artifice, clever business, and "bright" lines. It is hardly ever human. Noel is an ass. Leila is a cat. Harding is a conceited bore.

There remain Aunt Josephine and Uncle Rufus, and Aunt Josephine is a dear. She is a doormat, too, but she enjoys being trodden upon by Uncle Rufus' thick boots. She is quite clever and intelligent. He is a retired Indian judge and monstrously dense. Mr. Davies apparently wants us to believe that it is good for Aunt Josephine and Uncle Rufus and the world that she should be trodden upon, but the Victorian era ended long ago, and we know better now.

Still, all the limitations of "Doormats" are easily forgiven for Aunt Josephine's sake. She is real, anyhow, and the character is acted with exquisite feeling and perfect art by Miss Nina Boucicault. It is amazing and deplorable that this accomplished actress is seen so rarely.

Pompous red-faced Uncle Rufus, too, as played by Mr. Alfred Bishop, is a joy. He might have walked straight on the stage at Wyndham's from the East India Club.

But even the charm and the art of Mr. Gerald du Maurier, Mr. Dawson Milward, and Miss Marie Lohr could not make Noel and Harding and Leila interesting. In the end Leila determines not to bolt, but to stay at home with her husband, and one felt nothing but sympathy for him.

It should be added that the part of a servant was unusually well played by a pretty young lady whose name, for some strange reason, Mr. du Maurier did not print on the programme.

Everyone will wish Miss Ethel Warwick well in her new venture at the Queen's. She is a keen, accomplished actress, with real vitality and intelligence. But many will be inclined to question her wisdom in opening her season with such an entirely theatrical piece of work as "Zaza." Nothing gets old so quickly as theatrical passion; it must be served up with the latest novelties and tricks, or it does not for a moment create the illusion of reality, as it never had any real life of its own. However, Miss Ethel Warwick has chosen to appear in "Zaza," and she certainly worked with tremendous energy to put some semblance of life into the poor old tattered thing. Everyone knows that Zaza is a singer at a cafe chantant: how she loves Bernard Dufrene with all the passion of her nature, and wins him. She is happy with him for six months, and then her singing partner, Cascart, tells her that Bernard is married.

In a fury of jealousy Zaza rushes off to Paris to find his home and make him choose between her and his wife. She forces her way into his house, and then Madame Dufrene does not come in but his little girl—Toto, who talks with Zaza, and the result of the talk is that Zaza goes quietly away weeping and beaten. She goes back to her own little home in the woods, and when Bernard comes she tries to be merry again and fails; and it all comes out after a terrific scene, and Bernard leaves her apparently for ever. But two years elapse. During those two years Zaza has become the rage of Paris, the world is at her feet. Bernard waits for her, whispers that he has just arrived from America, whispers that he is a free man now; takes her in his arms, and all ends happily——. True love, and triumphant; a most preposterous story.

* * * * * *

There are two great scenes. The first is where the little child comes into the drawing-room and defeats the furious Zaza. The second is where Zaza and Bernard break off their friendship. Miss Warwick was at her best in the scene with the child. She expressed the girl's tenderness with such feeling that one almost forgot the outrageous staginess of the child's talk. Her second scene lacked intensity. She relied too much on actual volume of sound to express the girl's fierce emotion, and not enough upon concentration. She reached the top of her scale too soon, and her performance had no crescendo and no climax. Where Zaza was just jolly and vulgar, Miss Warwick's cleverness and vitality stood her in good stead, and her opening scene in the dressing-room was piquant and charming. Mr. Guy Standing made Bernard Dufrene a very impressive lover; just the kind of figure that Bernard ought to be: and he showed great power in the breaking-off scene. Miss Kate Kearney played Zaza's tipsy aunt with a great relish for the part's humour, which consisted largely of stealing towards any bottle of spirits which was within range, and her efforts were greatly appreciated. Mr. Saintsbury made Cascart a nice, fantastic creature, and Mr. Asheton Tongue played the usual amorous Duke just as that horrible old man should be played. Miss Warwick was given a very warm welcome, and it is to be hoped that such a delightful young actress as she is will choose for her next production a fresher, better play, worthier of her calibre.

"Arabella," at the Court Theatre, is not likely to have a long run. Mr. Malloch proceeds through two dreary acts to a third act, which contains a really brilliant situation, and which he manages quickly to spoil through loquacity. What he says is sound and earnest; but its soundness and earnestness are of no avail. The situation is that the three men who are chiefly interested in Arabella—her husband, her lover, and a well-meaning friend—meet in the rooms she has taken, after she has left her husband and her lover. Being men of the world, they cannot think that the comfort and elegance of her surroundings are due to any other cause than that which club gossip is kind enough to give. Each comes with the idea of saving her: the lover to marry her, the husband who has divorced her to remarry her, the friend to take legal care of her. The conversation between the men before Arabella arrives is pointed and witty, and Arabella's entry is extremely amusing. But all too soon Mr. Malloch switches off from drama: he makes poor Arabella lose her sense of humour, and deliver an oration on Woman's Rights, very earnest and sound, but tedious and not very original.

The more one was in sympathy with the sentiments expressed the greater was the irritation caused by their untimely expression. The situation was far too good to spoil; especially as Miss Octavia Kenmore was dealing with it beautifully in her own peculiar way; and it was the first opportunity she had had of showing the queer piquancy of her personality. Miss Kenmore's method, too, is intensely individual and intensely interesting. At times you feel she goes her own way too much, and she has certain gestures which she uses too often for them to keep their effect; but her own way and these gestures have a peculiar fascination because of the strange power of her personality. Mr. George Owen was a disappointment. There were clever moments in his playing of the husband; but they did not compensate for his distressing fidgettiness or for his deplorable make-up. Mr. Leigh Lovel played the family friend very well—the scene with the husband in the last act especially—but the character was nebulous. As a whole, the play had plenty of ideas, but only one dramatic moment: and one dramatic moment is not enough to save a three-act play from dulness.

Dumas is the prince of story tellers and, if he is given a chance, will hold an audience by the mere glamour of romantic incident. At the New Princes Theatre last Wednesday night when "Monte Cristo" was produced by Walter and Frederick Melville it was proved that there are still many in London who can be enchanted by the tale of the Count's tragic life.

What a sigh of satisfaction there was when at the end of Act II. Mr. Lauderdale Maitland faced the audience and spoke: "One! My vengeance is begun!" "Every one knew that the last words in Act IV would be Three! My vengeance is complete!" And so they were.

There could be no doubt about the enjoyment of the audience. They broke into spontaneous applause even at unexpected moments, and at the fall of the curtain both Mr. Lauderdale Maitland and Mr. Melville had to make speeches ere the house consented to depart.

The mounting and costumes are picturesque. Miss Frances Dillon gave an attractive rendering of Mercedes in a small but difficult part.

Mr. T. T. Macmillan's Caderouse was well done, while Mr. Lauderdale Maitland as the Count of Monte Cristo showed himself capable of histrionic ability of a remarkable order, his best work perhaps being put in the scene at the inn where he impersonates first an abbe and next the Jew.

Miss Pollie Marsh gave a clever study of the grasping old crone the wife of Caderouse.

MR. SELOUS IN AFTER-DINNER MOOD.

On the 7th October, Mr. Selous, hunter, explorer and writer on sport, was dined at the Authors' Club, when a distinguished gathering of sportsmen and sporting scribes slew an excellent banquet and indulged in some interesting after-dinner speechifying.

The health of "Our guest" was proposed by the Chairman, Mr. Charles Garvice, and, in the course of his reply, Mr. Selous said he would refer to big game hunting in the abstract. There were still living in the world some races of low culture, such as the Eskimos and the pigmies of the great equatorial forests of Africa, who were big game hunters of necessity. They still had to rely on the hunting and killing of wild animals for food and raiment. Among civilised people big game hunting was not a necessity, but the passion for it had been handed down from our remote ancestors. That passion must now be restrained, both in savages and civilised men, otherwise, owing to the great power of modern fire-arms and the facilities with which one could get about all over the world, all those beautiful and wonderful forms of wild life which still existed on the earth would soon be absolutely exterminated.

He would explain how it was that the passion for big game hunting had been handed down from our remote ancestors. In the late Pliocene and early Pleistocene periods man, who was able to communicate with his fellows by intelligible speech and to make rude weapons and implements of stone, was first evolved upon the earth. There was no doubt that those primitive savages must have been big game hunters by necessity. In Europe, at any rate, they were entirely dependent upon the results of their hunting for their food and clothing, and they had also to protect themselves and their women and children from the attacks of the more powerful carnivora of that time, such as the sabre-toothed tigers and the great cave bears.

No doubt at that time of the world's history the strongest and most skilful hunters were the most esteemed citizens, and became the leaders of the little wandering communities in which they lived. Besides that they probably got hold of most of the eligible females—(laughter)—and, therefore, had the greatest number of descendants. (Renewed laughter.) That accounted for the strength of the hunting instinct in the human breast.

Really he grieved to think of the Christabels of these ancient days and what they must have thought and said of the tyrant man. (Laughter.) He imagined that when there were more than one suitor for the hand of one maiden the weaker went to the wall and the stronger man walked her off to a cave in which there were neither writing materials nor windows. (Laughter.) He had no doubt that if coinage had been in circulation in those days the sporting instincts of our ancestors would have led matters to be settled by the arbitrament of the toss-up, but as a matter of fact the strongest man got the best of the females. (Laughter.) That free and easy hunting life endured for thousands and thousands of years, and during that time the hunting instinct became so firmly implanted in the human breast that all the centuries that had since elapsed and all the civilisations that had arisen and decayed had not been sufficient to eradicate it.

If he were asked how it was that he left England when he was only 19 and went straight to the interior of Africa to hunt elephants, and made his living by elephant hunting for a good many years, he would say that it was simply because he was the lineal descendant of a prehistoric man. That man was, no doubt, somewhat peculiar. They would not want to walk down Bond Street with him. (Laughter.) His dress would not be be very suitable. (Laughter.) Probably he was a beetle-eyed, bow-legged man, and probably also as dirty and hairy as a lodging-house door-mat, but still, no doubt, he was a hardy, active, sharp-eyed fellow. Possibly he was a pal of the Neanderthal man. They knew what a stir the discovery of his skull made in Germany among ethnologists fifty years ago.

Big game had undoubtedly had a big influence on the spirit of Europeans all over the world in more recent times. In the time of Louis XIV., when Canada belonged to France, it was the famous "coureurs des bois" who first penetrated the forests of Eastern Canada and first saw the waters of the great lakes, and who penetrated far beyond that across the great prairies, and were the first to see the snowy peaks of the Rocky Mountains.

Farther south, pioneers of British blood were doing the same work. No names were more honoured in the United States to-day than Daniel Boone and David Crockett, who were the first to see the beautiful land of Kentucky. It was on their report that bands of colonists were got together who ultimately settled in that country, and now great cities had arisen on the plains which Boone and Crockett saw covered with shaggy bison. (Cheers.)

In Africa, too, he might fairly say that big-game hunting had had a good deal to do with the opening up of the country. Speke and Grant were both notable big game hunters, and they were the first white men who travelled through the splendid young Colonies of British East Africa and Uganda. Had not Samuel Baker, also essentially a big game hunter, heard of the enormous wealth of animal life in Africa, he would probably never have given his splendid energies to the opening up of that continent.

If they went further south they found that British Central Africa was explored by big game hunters before it was taken over by the British Government. In Rhodesia it was quite possible that if Cecil Rhodes had not got full and accurate information about the country and its general suitability for European occupation that wonderful little pioneer expedition which added a rich province to the British Empire would never have taken place. (Cheers.)

He was often told that missionaries had done more pioneer work for the Empire than big-game hunters. Far be it from him to say one single word of disparagement of those splendid pioneer missionaries of Africa—(cheers)—but what he would say was that all the best missionaries, from Moffat and Livingstone downwards, were great big game hunters. (Cheers.)

He was once acquainted with a very fine old pioneer missionary, who was not only, to use the picturesque phraseology of young England, a top hole proselytiser—(laughter)—but a most energetic and active big game hunter. This good man was accustomed to inspan his yoke of bullocks every Monday morning early, and trek away to the haunts of big game, which at that time were not far from his station. He spent the week in shooting game, partially drying the meat in the sun. On the Saturday evening late this good man returned to his station, and on the following morning all the meat was hung over the beams of the great shed which served him as a church—in his reports it was called a cathedral. (Laughter.) When it was time for service the natives of the district were notified by three shots from a big elephant gun, and they then commenced to concentrate upon the cathedral from every point. It was really perfectly wonderful to see the enormous congregations which this good man brought together, and the number of converts that he was able to make, especially when it was remembered that he spoke in an African native dialect, which he only understood very imperfectly. (Laughter.) When the service was over every one of his congregation was presented with a large piece of meat. Ever since that time Mr. Selous had believed that there was something in a meat diet which stimulated the perspective faculties, and possibly increased the power of faith, because these natives, with this mixed diet of meat and spiritual doctrine, accepted all the most abstruse and difficult doctrines and dogmas of the Christian Church without the slightest difficulty, and there were even some amongst them who were able to swallow the Athanasian Creed without a smile. (Laughter.)

ALASKA A SPORTSMAN'S PARADISE.

Roscoe Fawcett, who some time since returned from a fortnight's tour of Alaska, has the following to say of that country as a sportsman's paradise, and the information he furnishes about the game and fish there, the climate and the people who now inhabit that land, is well worth reading. He says:

The word Alaska means "Great Country," but if you ask the average man the significance he will likely shrug his shoulders, draw a mental picture of the terrific hardships endured by the pioneers who joined the mad rush for the gold of the Klondyke, and say, "None of that ice-bound stuff for me."

As a matter of fact, not one of Uncle Sam's possessions is so little understood and so ill appreciated. The old days when fortunes in gold were torn from the hills and squandered in a single night over the roulette wheel have changed. Lawlessness is gone. The dog sleigh has given way to the steel rail, and there lies within four days' travel of Portland, Oregon, a country which is a fairyland of agreeable surprises.

Alaska is a hunter's paradise. It has the scenery of the Himalayas or the Andes distanced. The climate along the sea-coast as far north as Skagway, at least, is almost as equable as that of Oregon. In the 1,000-mile stretch from Seattle to Skagway the temperature seldom approaches the zero mark in the dead of winter. And, as for accessibility and comfort—if the American public knew just how easy it is to reach this new land of experiences, of new thrills, of history, of new beauties and new splendours. I venture the prediction that there would ensue a rush of the wealthier tourists that would resemble the scramble in the early days when the man who drove a pig or steer over the trail to the interior was rewarded with a fabulous sum.

Alaska—that is, the historic coast towns of Ketchikan, Metahathla, Wrangel, Juneau, Sitka, Treadwell, Skagway, and Seward, can be personally interviewed in three days' sailing aboard one of the palatial vessels of the Alaska steamship fleet out of Seattle. The ocean voyage, too, is remarkable in that the 1,000-mile trip lies along the inside route guarded by countless thousands of islands. Only three times is the open water encountered—then the longest stretch is thirty-seven miles. Through waters deep and wonderfully phosphorescent at night, between towering snow-capped peaks glittering with myriad colours, past softly wooded slopes, under the shadow of wonderful glaciers, rivers of ice that slowly but inexorably grind onward into the ocean—all this and more the tourist finds to ponder over as he watches the festive whale rise to view his disturber and smiles as the sportive porpoise crosses the bow of the ship in challenge for a race.

To the sportsman seeking a hunting ground the North offers wonderful opportunities, easily the most attractive field in North America. The game laws, however, are generally misconstrued. For one thing, the only place where a guide is compulsory is on the Kenai Peninsula. Non-residents are required to pay a license fee of 50 dollars, and 100 dollars if aliens. The forests abound in caribou, deer, mountain goats and sheep, and smaller game, and the great inland lakes are prolific of fish.

One does not have to go farther than two days from Seattle to secure excellent sport. All along the south-eastern coast, from Ketchikan to Skagway, fishing and hunting are excellent. Halibut-fishing furnishes a most unique day's sport, although the big fish, weighing close to 300 pounds, have to be killed with a club before finally landed.

At Ketchikan king salmon, weighing 70 and 75 pounds, have been caught with trolls. Our Portland party, consisting of Mr. and Mrs. D. H. Wilson, Mrs. J. R. Elliott and two daughters, and several others, stepped off at Ketchikan en route south to get a look at the royal members of the salmon family going up the fresh-water creeks to spawn. The sight was alone worth the trip north. Ketchikan was found to be a favourite summer resort for eastern hunters and fishermen.

As the arduous trip from Seattle to Nome, 2,500 miles through the Aleutian Peninsula and in the storm-tossed Behring Sea, strictly an ocean trip, is too strenuous and unsatisfactory for the tourist, Skagway is the main objective point on the pleasure-seeker's itinerary. Skagway stands on historic grounds; in fact, "The Home of the North Wind," as the word signifies, is a most historic city. It guards the entrances to the two famous passes through the mountains into the gold-studded interior, White Pass and Chilkoot.

In the gold-rush days of 1897 thousands of maddened fortune-seekers thronged into this wide-open city. The scramble caught the country completely unprepared, and the privations endured by thousands in the terrific 110-mile hike up the steep passes to White Horse, the head of river navigation, were frightful. White Horse stands about 460 miles by river from Dawson, while Fairbanks and all other interior towns are arranged along the Yukon and its tributaries further down-stream.

But no more will the lion-hearted prospector be forced to brave the dangers and hardships of the awful passes, for science has flung a railroad from Skagway to White Horse, the famous White Pass and Yukon route, one of the most remarkable railroad engineering projects in the world.

Construction on this famous road was begun in 1898, and it is said that close to 7,000,000 dollars was expended by the English corporation in overcoming the obstacles of Nature. The international boundary lie twenty miles from Skagway at White Pass, an almost entirely obliterated resting haven for the old Klondykers.

What Alaska needs is another gold boom. Slowly but surely the prospectors are leaving the interior, and the inland towns are consequently gradually going down grade.

In area Alaska covers a gross of 590,804 square miles, or nearly twice the size of the German Empire, and thirteen times the extent of New York State. The coastline is 26,000 miles long. Alaska contains 21,000,000 acres of coal lands, and Government engineers have estimated that the coal in Alaska is sufficient to sustain the people of the United States, at the present rate of consumption, for 5,300 years.

The territory has no vote in Congress, but is represented by a delegate. Fifteen newspapers are published. Alaska does not tolerate open gambling. That was closed down in 1906. Nome, on the extreme west, is 6,000 miles from New York, and six hours behind in time.

Only one-fifth of the flower-carpeted domain has been explored as yet, so its possibilities have not yet been realised. The territory has already paid the people of the United States in products dividends approximating 6,300 per cent. on the original price of 7,200,000 dollars. It is worth to-day not millions but billions.—American Field.

PURGEN

"THE LAXATIVE OF THE FUTURE."

The Head Court Physician to the KING and QUEEN of ITALY states:—
"I have tried PURGEON repeatedly on patients suffering from diseases of the chest, when I wanted to use a mild purgative, and I have always been satisfied by its mild and non-irritating action. In my opinion this remedy is THE LAXATIVE of the FUTURE."
Dr. ANTONIO MACCIORANI.

PURGEN acts surely, gently and uniformly, without causing any irritation or pain, and its effect does not wear off by prolonged use. PURGEN is not absorbed by the system. It has no action on the liver or kidneys, and it does not produce flatulence, nausea, depression or other disagreeable symptoms usually associated with aperient medicines. PURGEN is an especially valuable medicine for the delicate, for invalids and for children. Made up in small tablets of agreeable flavour and sold in boxes only.

Sold in Three Strengths:—
"INFANT" (for young children); "ADULT" (for grown-ups); "STRONG" (for invalids and chronic constipation).

English Price: 1/- per Box.

ELEY CARTRIDGES

—essential to good sport.

The most accurate and reliable of cartridges may not always suffice to ensure good sport, but good sport is out of the question without them.

Eley Cartridges do all that the best cartridges can do in this direction, with a trustworthiness which has won for them a measure of success greater probably than any other cartridges in the world.

Two 'Eley Loaded' Cartridges:

Eley 'Acme'
A bright orange 2-inch deep-shell Cartridge, loaded with Eley (42-gr.) Smokeless Powder.

Eley 'Elold'
A light maroon Cartridge. Loaded with Eley (33-gr.) Smokeless. Light recoil; absolutely waterproof.

The above, and other Eley Specialities, may be obtained from Gunmakers and Dealers in Ammunition, everywhere.

WINCHESTER

.35 Caliber Repeating Rifle

It takes a strong shot to bowl over a large and courageous beast. Such a shot as the .35 Winchester delivers will knock down any animal, however large and tenacious of life. It shoots a 250-grain bullet with such power that at 100 yards it has an effective energy of 2,000 foot pounds. An animal receiving the force of this impact crumples and drops as though struck by a thunder bolt. The .35 Winchester has a box magazine, like military rifles, holding five cartridges, all of which may be shot with great rapidity. For a serviceable rifle of great power and ease of action, get a .35 Winchester. No rifle surpasses it for successfully hunting big game.

IT IS SOLD BY DEALERS EVERYWHERE

MEERUT AUTUMN MEETING.

THE TURF.

NEWMARKET.

FROM a weather point of view, the best conditions of the week were experienced on Friday, the concluding day of the First October fixture. The sun's rays had a delightful warmth that rendered heavy topcoats an encumbrance, while the conditions were as dry under foot as they were bright overhead. A moiety of the winners were well backed, though the victories of such unconsidered outsiders as Flower of the West and Peep must have left the exchanges well in favour of the books. Results:—

NOTTINGHAM.

Some very welcome improvements have been made in the stand arrangements at Nottingham, notably a causeway running in front of the members' enclosure, as at Kempton and Leicester giving access to the paddock and Tattersall's ring, which obviates the long detour at the back formerly necessary. A glorious autumn day helped to attract a very good attendance, the townfolk mustering strongly. There was a fairly good Tattersall's, despite the settlings, but the members' enclosure has held a larger company. Results :—

FOOTBALL
ASSOCIATION RULES.

A MEMORABLE achievement was that of the Irish Amateurs at Belfast on Saturday. They had pitted against them an eleven which included ten of the men who, representing England in the Olympic Games at Stockholm last summer, carried off the international championship, and yet the Irishmen gained a victory by 3 goals to 2. The superiority displayed by the home side, moreover, was more marked than the final score would suggest, for, well into the second-half, the Irish Amateurs led by 3 to 0. A penalty kick enabled Hoare to reduce the margin against the visitors and, just on time, the same player registered a second point, the defeat which had threatened to be so severe being thus reduced to one of the odd goal in five. Three years ago at Leeds the Irishmen occasioned some surprise—after losing the first three games with England's amateurs—by drawing at 4 goals all, and in the following season at Belfast they won by the same margin as yesterday—3 goals to 2. The recent development in Irish amateur football which these victories demonstrate is matter for much congratulation.

Nothing quite so sensational in connection with First League football has occurred for a long time as the play in the match between Aston Villa and Sheffield at Wednesday at Birmingham on Saturday. The Sheffield team, although only with difficulty escaping a reverse on the previous Saturday from Manchester United, entered into the contest not only an unbeaten side, but one with four victories to their credit. So completely, however, did their defence break down before the brilliant attack of the Villa that they had six goals registered against them before the interval and four afterwards, thus in the end being compelled to admit defeat by 10 to 0. Hampton, the Villa's centre-forward, enjoyed the rare distinction of kicking five goals himself, Bache and Stevenson getting two apiece, and Halse one—the first of the long series. Curiously enough, on the afternoon of this remarkable piece of work, the scoring generally proved so meagre that the other nine games in the First League did not average two goals apiece, five of the clubs taking part in these nine encounters failing to register a single point, and ten having to rest content with a goal apiece.

The dismal forebodings as to the fate of London's First League clubs occasioned by the repeated failures of Tottenham Hotspur, Woolwich Arsenal and Chelsea during the first three weeks of the season will now give way to quite hopeful expectations. A week ago though no victory by a Metropolitan team in the Senior Division was recorded, no defeat was sustained, and yesterday, while Chelsea beat Sunderland at Stamford Bridge, Woolwich Arsenal held their own at Oldham and Tottenham Hotspur at Middlesbrough, after being a goal behind for more than an hour, managed to equalise just before the close. Chelsea were perhaps a little fortunate, in leading at half-time, for Sunderland had rather the best of the play up to that time, and it was only a minute before the interval that Whittingham scored, but the Stamford Bridge men on crossing over showed themselves distinctly the more formidable side. Hotspur did well to keep the scoring down to one goal in face of the superior nature of Middlesbrough's attack, but their own forward play still left a lot to be desired. The Arsenal, too, owed much to their backs and Crawford. In halving the points at Oldham it may be noted they accomplished more than Newcastle United could achieve on the same ground, the visit of the Newcastle team three weeks ago yielding Oldham Athletic a victory by 1 to 0.

So far from adding to their list of victories at the expense of Northampton, Millwall on Saturday had to acknowledge their first defeat this season. As a consequence they have to yield place to both Queen's Park Rangers and Swindon, the Rangers securing a handsome win at the expense of Brentford, and Swindon, on their own ground, proving too strong for Norwich. Millwall, however, stand third on the list, as Coventry City just lost to Merthyr Town. Defeat also overtook three prominent clubs in Plymouth Argyle, and Brighton and Hove as well as Norwich City, while on the other hand three of the four clubs standing at the bottom of the Southern League table were rewarded with victory. Altogether, the day's matches yielded some very refreshing results.

Hull City and Clapton Orient, the leading clubs in the Second Division of the League, won their matches and though neither showed much superiority over the opposing team, they played well enough to suggest that for the time being they are the best balanced elevens in the competition. While Clapton Orient continued to display much excellent football, Fulham, except on their own ground, cannot do anything right, and yesterday they suffered another reverse away, going down before Barnsley. Preston North End, in beating Birmingham, gained their first victory of the season, and Bury, who accompanied the North End into the lower division at the end of last winter failed again.

IRELAND vs. ENGLAND.—Over 8,000 delighted spectators saw the Irish Amateurs defeat England by the odd goal in five at Cliftonville, Belfast, on Saturday. It was a hard-fought game, and a thrilling finish was provided. Ireland came out of the ordeal top dog, and he would indeed be a poor sportsman who would say that the wearers of the green shirts did not deserve to win.

This was Ireland's second victory in seven games, only one of which was drawn.

Play opened briskly, and after five minutes, a mistake in the centre gave Seymour possession on the right. That player crossed to McDonnell, who, travelling at top speed, slashed the ball into the net for Ireland's first goal.

Thus encouraged, the Irish brigade played like demons, and Brebner and company were given a lively time. Despite the brainy opening movements by Woodward, Ireland held the balance of the play right up to the interval, when they crossed over with the only goal to their credit.

There was no slacking off by the home team on resuming, and the forwards, ably assisted by a capable set of halves, attacked with grim determination. Once England had a good chance to equalise, but Sharpe just failed to utilise Berry's pass.

Back came the Irishmen, and Smith, who took a long pass on the fly, had the luck and satisfaction of seeing the ball go into the net like a bullet from a gun. Another rush and McDonnell placed Ireland three goals ahead.

It was now the real struggle began. The Englishmen rallied, and with the home side tiring perceptibly it was recognised that there was going to be a keen, close finish. Mckenzie handled and Hoare scored the visitors' first goal. Six minutes from time the same player got clean through from Berry's centre, and scored England's second point. Both goals had narrow escapes in the closing minutes, which were very thrilling, but there was no further score.

RUGBY RULES.

SOUTH AFRICANS vs. DEVON.—Journeying on from Bath, where on Thursday, they had beaten Somerset by twenty-four points to three, the South Africans on Saturday appeared at Exeter, where a much more severe task awaited them in a match against Devon, the holders of the County Championship. For this encounter the Colonials made three changes, Immelman taking the place of McCulloch as scrum half, and Francis and Van Vuuren taking the place as forward of Braine and John Luyt. Splendid weather favoured the game, which attracted a crowd of 10,000 people. Ten minutes after the appointed time, Douglas Morkel kicked off and play at once settled down near the Devon line. The Colonial forwards secured possession of the ball, and Immelman got his three-quarters going in fine style. A splendid passing movement ensued, but Richard Luyt, attempting a drop with the left foot, just missed his mark. Later on, the Devon backs, passing cleverly, gained ground, and Butcher, making his mark, relieved the pressure of the home line. Gerhardt Morkel, however, brought up the Devon players, and just afterwards Stegmann was nearly in Mr. Thomas bringing him down in splendid style. Somewhat hard pressed during the first quarter of an hour, Devon played up well, Jago working especially hard and cleverly. On one occasion Campbell nearly let the South Africans in, but still, for the most part, the home side tackled well and used their feet to fine purpose. Taking a penalty kick, Douglas Morkel, in a splendid attempt, hit the post. Not long afterwards, Butcher, charging down Immelman's punt, and collaring Gerhardt Morkel, the South Africans found themselves in some danger. The pressure, however, was relieved, and shortly before the interval, Dobbin scored for the visitors, Douglas Morkel failing to convert. Thus, at half time, the South Africans led by three points to none. Dobblin's try registered just before the interval was the outcome of a splendid piece of work in which Mills and Douglas Morkel shared.

On resuming, the Devon team played up in great form, and, indeed, for some time seemed quite likely to win the match. For fully a quarter of an hour they quite outplayed the South Africans, and on one occasion only a forward pass right on the visitors' line robbed Baker of a certain try. The South Africans continued rather hard pressed for some time the home forwards working together in magnificent fashion. The issue remained in doubt until very near the close, when Stegman finished a fine run with a brilliant try. Douglas Morkel converting, the South Africans won a desperately exciting game by a goal and a try to nothing. South Africans, 8 points; Devon 0 points.

BLACKHEATH vs. OLD MERCHANT TAYLORS.—Playing their first game at home this season Blackheath beat the Old Merchant Taylors at the Rectory field by two goals and two tries to one goal. The Taylors were a weak side. O'Callaghan has left the country, and Will and Ryan were unable to play, the latter because of ill-health and the former in consequence of his studies. Coverdale is still an absentee from Blackheath, and Cumberlege and Thomas, in view of the commencement of the 'Varsity term, have retired from half-back positions, but effective substitutes were found in H. Hands and Rideout who having played together have a good understanding. But what really made Blackheath into a strong team was the return of Maurice Neale to the three-quarter line. He showed better form even than last year, and was largely concerned in three of the four tries scored by Blackheath. In the first half Stokes, Neale, and Hands scored tries for Blackheath, two of which Stone improved. Early in the second half Roe scored for the Taylors, and Cheesman added the goal points, but Goldthorpe put on an unconverted try for the home club. Blackheath, 16 points; Old Merchant Taylors, 5 points.

RICHMOND vs. UNITED SERVICES.—After a good struggle at Richmond the Services fifteen from Portsmouth defeated the home club by a dropped goal and two tries to a dropped goal and one try. The game took place under excellent conditions and there was quite a good attendance. The teams were fairly well matched, and the only point at which the Services were superior was in their dribbling and following up. In the first five minutes the Services scored, Syfret following up his own kick and going on to gain a try, which was not converted. Ten minutes later Barlow, the Richmond half-back, dropped an excellent goal, and later Staples added a try. A few minutes later Gardner dropped a goal for the Services, and then some clever play by MacIlwaine ended in Sturgess gaining a try. In the second half the play went in favour of the Services and Richmond were more than once hardly pressed. The Services' backs, however, were not accurate in their passing, and at last two good openings were thrown away, Wade Gery, by failing to take a good pass, losing a try. Richmond were rarely dangerous, and on the whole the Services deserved their win. Services, 10 points; Richmond, 7 points.

LONDON WELSH vs. OLD WHITGIFTIANS.—The London Welsh for whom H. T. Maddocks failed to turn out, were unexpectedly beaten at Wandsworth by the Old Whitgiftians. The winners showed excellent form after a slow beginning, but before they got going the Welsh had scored twice, Webb and Thomas each obtaining tries, that by Thomas being converted by Richards. By dint of determined play, however, the Old Boys equalised at half-time through an unconverted try by Cartwright and another try by Yates, which Corke improved. A rally on the part of the Welsh three-quarters after the interval was but short lived, and to the end the Whitgiftians settled down to more scoring. Stewart ran over from some neat handling, and Bond registered a difficult goal, but the last try was the best of the match. Old Whitgiftians, 16 points; London Welsh, 8 points.

OLD LEYSIANS vs. LONDON IRISH.—The Old Leysians opened their season at Burntwood Lane, Wandsworth, with a victory over the London Irish by 3 goals and 2 tries to 3 tries. The weather was most brilliant, and the ground was exceedingly fast. So much so, that the Old Boys found the ball too lively for them at the outset, and with the Irishmen playing a fine rushing forward game, the first score of the match went to the visitors. It was a very lucky try, for Leech was apparently saving easily, when he slipped and Pantlin seized the opportunity to score. Bell scored a brilliant try, and Pinkham, after failing to drop a goal, got over on the extreme right, and next Mallinson backing up his backs secured a third try. This last was improved by Mellor and the home side led at half-time by a goal and 2 tries to a try. Quite early in the second portion of the game Bell, taking a loose pass from the centre, raced over and scored between the posts, and within a couple of minutes repeated the performance, Mellor on both occasions improving. Towards the close the visiting forwards, playing up pluckily, scored twice, Simes and Norton securing the tries. In the end the Old Leysians won as stated above, entirely on their merits. Old Leysians, 21 points; London Irish, 9 points.

ROWING

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.—Already much keenness is manifest in the forthcoming races of the term, and during the last few days many coxswainless fours have been at practice, beside several scullers for the Colquhoun Sculls. Jesus are represented by two fours. Straker is stroking number one crew, with Goldsmith, the Blue, at three, while Pattinson, the Colquhoun Sculls winner, is setting the work in the other four. The Blue, R. S. Shove, wields stroke oar in the First Trinity crew, Caius are stroked by Showell Rogers, whilst Queens are led by Arden. Third Trinity, the holders, start work to-morrow, and should be a strong combination. It is reported that Buxton and Tower will row again after an absence of about a year, while the Blues, Lloyd and Le Blanc Smith, are likely to row at three and stroke respectively. Among the scullers at work are J. Avliff, Trinity Hall, A. A. Payne, Corpus, and H. M. Southwell, Clare.

GOLF.

PROFESSIONAL TOURNAMENT FOR £400.—Harry Vardon realized one of the keenest of his golfing ambitions at Sunningdale on Friday by winning the News of the World Tournament for the first time. He beat Ray at the last hole in a match marked by magnificent golf and many and thrilling fluctuations.

The run of the game may be shortly summed up thus; in the morning Vardon played beautifully accurate golf, and, although he had perhaps the turn of the luck on the whole, he fully deserved his lead of 3. In the afternoon he soon became 4 up, and was playing so well that it seemed impossible for him to lose his lead. He went on playing just as well as ever; yet Ray by really overwhelming golf succeeded in squaring the match, and then faltered. It was as if an attacking army should charge up a hill in the teeth of the enemy's fire, successfully gain the crest of the ridge, and then in the hour of victory waver, break, and fly. Ray's putting forsook him just when it seemed that he would win after all; on three greens in succession he gave a stroke away; Vardon got ahead, and, despite a slip or two, kept ahead till the end. It was a wonderful match and the golf, even allowing that the conditions were perfect, was quite exceptionally brilliant. When it is said that the loser's score for 36 holes was approximately 142, no further comment is necessary.

LECTURING at the London Salon of Photography, Mr. Alexander Keighley mentioned that he knew of an Italian mediæval castle which had been sold to an Englishman for £39. Castles in Spain may be had for even less than this.

12TH CAVALRY vs. NORTHUMBERLAND FUSILIERS.

First Chukker.—The opening play was uneventful.

Second Chukker.—The 12th Cavalry asserted themselves and some good combined play resulted in 2 goals, Wilson and Henry being responsible.

Third Chukker.—The Fusiliers showed up and Sandilands scored. The Cavalry then attacked and Wilson hit a goal.

Fourth Chukker.—Each goal was visited in turn and each team missed chances of scoring. At length Wilson got away and scored for the 12th.

Fifth Chukker.—The Fusiliers pressed throughout. Herbert hit a goal and another was added shortly after.

Sixth Chukker.—A run by Wilson but his shot went wide. The Fusiliers were penalised for hitting behind and this enabled Henry to score for the Cavalry. Up and down play closed the game.

Final score: 12th Cavalry, 5 goals; Northumberland Fusiliers, 3 goals. Teams:—

32ND LANCERS vs. 22ND PUNJABIS.

First Chukker.—Up and down play, Webb and Leslie Smith ultimately taking the ball down to draw first blood.

Second Chukker.—The Punjabis continued to press and Furney and Webb added to their score. Then the Lancers got going and Fergusson-Pollock scored their first goal.

Third Chukker.—The Lancers added a second point in this period, Johnston putting through.

Fourth Chukker.—The Punjabis attacked but could not get through and on play being transferred the Lancers equalised.

Fifth Chukker.—Howard scored for the Lancers but Furney at sin put the teams on terms and scoring another goal soon after took the lead.

Sixth Chukker.—Play was fast all over the field, but the period was pointless and the Punjabis thus won a splendid game by 5 goals to 4. Teams:—

32ND LANCERS.		22nd PUNJABIS.
Mr. G. I. Johnston	... 1	Mr. C. Leslie-Smith	... 1
Mr. C. A. Howard	... 2	Capt. W. P. Webb	... 2

Umpires:—Messrs. James and Leonard.

Final

22ND PUNJABIS vs. 12TH CAVALRY.

These teams met in the final on the 26th instant and a very good game was witnessed, the Punjabis winning by 4 goals to 3. There was a large attendance, the 3rd Lancers were "at home" on the ground and the Cup was handed to the winners by Mrs. Geddes.

First Chukker.—Up and down play till Blois Johnson got away and scored for the 22nd. The 12th then pressed, but in spite of a penalty failed to score.

Second Chukker.—A free hit for a foul against the 12th was not turned to account, but the 22nd kept up the attack and Leslie Smith put on their second goal.

Third Chukker.—Up and down play till a foul against the Punjabis enabled the Cavalry to open their account.

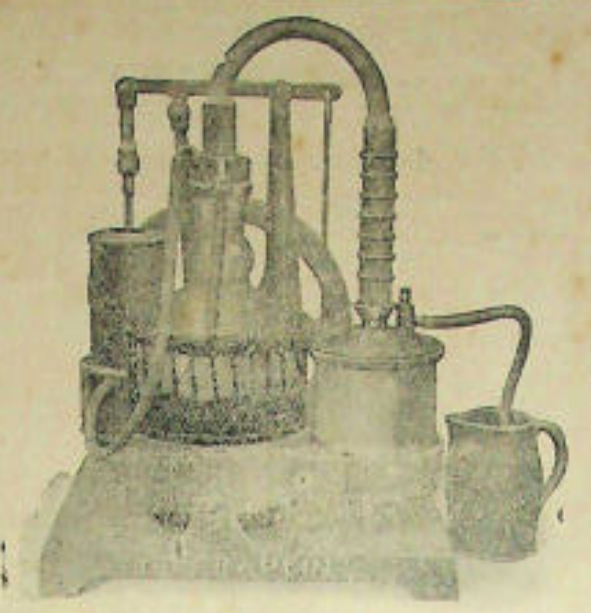
Fourth Chukker.—The 12th got away and Fell equalised, but it was not long before a successful shot by Webb gave the Punjabis the lead once more.

Fifth Chukker.—Play all over the field. No score.

Sixth Chukker.—The 12th rushed down and Fell equalised once more. The 22nd tried hard to score again but without avail and time was called with the score 3 all.

Extra Chukker.—The goals were widened and the game resumed. Each team pressed in turn and there was no score.

Second Extra Chukker.—More visits to each goal but neither team could put the ball through.



Third Extra Chukker.—Scrambling play in which Webb scored and gave the Punjabis the victory by 4 goals to 3. Teams as before.

Umpires:—Mr. Todd and Captain Fergurson Pollock.

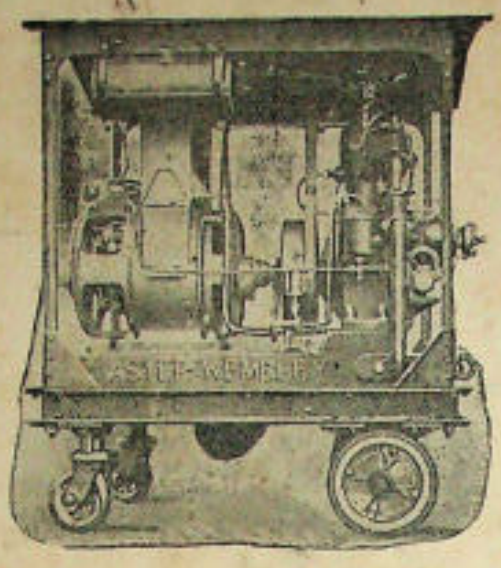
POULTRY POINTS.

[BY P.A.V.]

HERE is a muckle more on Ostrich Farming, though in Australia. According to a recent consular report, ostrich farming in Australia has not made any marked progress during recent years. The number of ostrich farmers has remained almost unchanged and the number of birds has increased to a smaller extent than would be supposed. Yet experiments made during the period in question seem to show that ostrich farming in Australia [I suppose what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander also—P.A.V.] is remunerative, provided that a cheap supply of the essential green food, chiefly lucerne, is available throughout the year and if the stock is improved by the introduction of fresh blood. Since the birds flourish only in the dry inland regions, the question of food often presents serious difficulties during the hot and rainless summer months; but it appears that these can be obviated, at least in New South Wales, by establishing ostrich farms in the region under the great dam of Burrinjuck, where a sufficient supply of green food can be raised under irrigation.

THE Australian ostriches are descended from a comparatively small number of imported birds, the consequent inbreeding



DOCTOR ROSS STRASSBURG introduced Gonosan in the treatment of the most painful of diseases to which mankind is liable. It is better and safer and more effective than other preparations of Copaiba Cubeb, or plain Sandal wood oil. The same is the verdict of other Specialists who have patiently tried it. It is the latest Scientific Remedy and has never known to fail. At all Chemists and dealers.

has therefore reduced the quality of the feathers; and owing to the prohibition of the export of ostriches from South Africa, the expense of importing new stock has become too great for the farmer to incur. The Minister for Agriculture of New South Wales has appointed a Commission to visit South Africa, Morocco, and Egypt to study ostrich culture and to buy a number of good stock birds. By that means, it is expected that ostrich farming will be improved and will soon show a marked expansion. I commend these words to our local Bumble at the Research Institute, Pusa.

FARMERS and others who have a small orchard or kitchen-garden could use this for chicken-rearing. In a kitchen garden, coop the hens on the path and let the chickens run over the gardens and the little chickens will do well and thrive and will clear off many insects and grubs. The garden or yard must be very small, indeed, if one cannot keep a few fowls in it and I especially recommend the provision of a covered run for the fowls to scratch and dust themselves in, more particularly where the fowl's houses are near the dwelling house.

THE Black Leghorn has of late years been brought to the notice of the public in no uncertain manner and neither the public nor the Black Leghorn, says a writer in Feathered Life, has suffered as a result of the boom. Of all the Leghorns, this is the truest to type; black plumage and yellow legs are a difficult combination to obtain, but when obtained, surely, it is as satisfactory and as good looking as the most exacting could desire. And to the beginner, it offers great opportunities, for here is scope for improvement all round and a wide field of action in which coveted honors are not impossible of attainment.

MUCH has been written about Black Leghorns by the various breeders of this variety. And it is most satisfactory to know that Black Leghorns are about the best layers known to the poultry world and keep up a large output of eggs.

History does not apparently relate when the first Blackhorn arrived in England. It is a distinct variety; not "made" and it can be seen in Italy in its primeval state, the cock-bird smothered in white and the pullets all sound as regards body color, with legs to match—or nearly so. And now no show is complete without classes for Blacks!

KENNEL NOTES.

THE DARJEELING SHOW.

THE First Darjeeling Championship Dog Show took place on Saturday, the 19th instant, and was a fair success. In the absence of Mr. Horace Johnstone, who was unable to fulfil his engagement, the duties of judging the exhibits were undertaken by Mr. L. Molley.

One matter which caused considerable dissatisfaction was the unequal way in which the prizes were allotted to some of the classes. As for some of the best and largest classes the poorest cups were awarded, whilst for others with only one or two entries very handsome rewards were given. This is a matter that should be remedied at future shows.

Several dogs had been entered on the understanding that they were judged by Mr. Horace Johnstone, so as this could not be done their representatives did not compete.

There was nothing of particular merit in the Fox-terrier classes, as the Rajah of Pithapuram cancelled his entries. So it was not surprising to find the Championship Cup for the best dog in the show go to the Great Dane, Romo. The Fox-terriers had a good run and will no doubt appear in full force at the forthcoming cold weather shows.

WAR DOGS.

With reference to the note which appeared in our issue of the 19th September last, it now appears that Major Richardson has received the following report from the Officer Commanding the Norfolk Regiment regarding the sentry dog which was presented to the Battalion at Aldershot:—

"I beg to forward a report called for on the value of the dog presented to my company by Major Richardson. The dog, an Airedale terrier, arrived just before brigade training. On three occasions I had the opportunity of using the dog on outpost duties at night. Each time I found the presence of the animal to be of the greatest value. He either remained beside the sentry or went with a patrol. His value consists in the fact that he can and does detect the approach of human beings some considerable time before the eye or ear of the average man can distinguish anything. The result is that the sentry or patrol is fully on the alert, and it is impossible for them to be either ambushed or rushed. He is never allowed to run loose in camp or banks, and no one is allowed to feed the dog except the man in charge of him. I am of opinion that it would be a valuable asset to have four of these dogs attached to every infantry battalion for service in the field. I hope at next company training to make some more extensive trials of his usefulness. I should add that his method of indicating the approach of anyone at night is quite silent. It consists of a low growl and a stiffening of his body, almost like a pointer."

In the face of the foregoing report perhaps Government will be good enough to consider the question of establishing a depôt in India with a view to the carrying out of practical experiments with these dogs on the North-West Frontier. Other countries have long ago recognised the value of the sentry dog; but like everything else in India things move slowly.—with the exception perhaps of the move to Delhi.

THE DANDIE DINMONT TERRIER.

It is surprising considering the popularity the breed enjoys at home and their all-round suitability for this country, that one does not see more Dandies at our shows. An odd one is imported now and again; but no one seems to take any real interest in the furtherance of the importation and breeding of this sporting little dog. But if their full value was only realized by fanciers there would, I am sure, be no lack of specimens.

Mrs. Simpson Shaw, Honorary Secretary, Dandie Dinmont Terrier Club, writing to the Strand regarding present-day show specimens, states:—The palm must certainly be awarded to "Champion Alpin Slitrig." Quite apart from his undeniable beauty he most nearly conforms in all respects to the standard of points adopted at a meeting of "Breeders and Admirers" of this game little aristocrat of the dog world not long after they constituted themselves into a club for the breed, at the Fleece Hotel at Selkirk, on 17th November 1875. How well and thoroughly these gruff old stalwarts did their work is shown by the fact that these "points," as laid down and adopted by them nearly forty years ago, define with great precision, and with hardly any modification since, the standard of type, shape, size, colour, carriage, expression, and so on, which govern, or ought to govern, the decisions of judges to-day. It should be added that, in framing those definitions, the originators had the benefit of all the highest expert advice available at that time as to the working and other qualities of this business little terrier.

Nor was this important duty done hurriedly, for it took the Committee who dealt with the matter the greater part of eleven months of almost continuous labour to lick the standard of points into its final shape.

"Champion Alpin Slitrig" is a mustard, exceptionally low to ground yet sound, with a good length of body, well arched and evenly balanced on correct legs; his head is perfect, his carriage and deportment just what is most wanted, whilst his weight—an ounce within twenty pounds—stamps him as the ideal dandie.

Further he is full of Dandie character and idiosyncrasies so essential and yet so difficult to define or describe.

The Dandie is indeed a dog of long descent, his traditions go back far beyond the days when Sir Walter Scott, in "Guy Mannering," made him famous a hundred years ago. Then he was—as he is now—a game little terrier of masterful character. Profound intelligence, and purposeful business habits, a dux domestic, an ideal "friend of man." He steps out of tradition into history precisely as we find him to-day.

He is a small dog, but a great one, his pluck and staying powers are of the best; in him is embodied the personification of dignity, his very gait shows it. He acknowledges but one master and sticks to him as long as life lasts; other adult members of the household are tolerated, but it is for his master that he lives and moves and has his being. The children he regards as part of his master's belongings to be guarded and protected with the utmost care and solicitude.

He never picks a quarrel and has wonderful forbearance and self-restraint under provocation, until pressed beyond endurance, and then he goes in to win. Having entered upon a quarrel, then he is implacable, and nothing but the death of his enemy—or his own—will terminate the feud. His sense of right and wrong is of the nicest; he is never guilty of anything petty or mean; and, he never forgets.

He is a splendid house-dog, one of the understanding kind, who can readily discriminate between the friend of the family and the vendor of miscellaneous goods, and on a word or sign will enjoy putting undesirables to flight. His master's thoughts he reads like a book; he anticipates his every wish; he shares his joys and sorrows. There is no other dog so easily house-trained, and he is a most particular little gentleman, at the same time enjoying life and all rough and tumble adventures that come in his way.

His appearance is quaint and taking, different quite from that of any other kind of breed. His short legs, long body, massive head, gay tail carriage, and jaunty air make up a most fascinating commanding personality.

In colour he may be either mustard or pepper, and in either case the hair on the top of his head, or topknot as it is called, should be profuse, white, and silky. He is a first-rate water-dog, can kill with the best, and yet a good, well-schooled Dandie in wise hands is always under perfect control.

This breed is probably not so well known as some of the other terrier breeds, but its adherents are steadily growing in numbers. Anyone who becomes possessed of a Dandie and has learned to value his fine qualities remains staunch and true, and seldom or never takes up another variety.

Of late the Dandie has gained many new admirers in America, India, Africa, and Australia, as he becomes readily acclimatized and suits himself easily to new surroundings, and is now to be found leading an active, healthy, useful life under greatly divergent circumstances the world over.

And he carries his nationality with him; he is a border terrier through and through—a real Britisher.

For those fanciers who are interested in the breed and would care to take up the fancy, they could not do better than write to Mrs. T. M. Simpson Shaw, Honorary Secretary, Dandie Dinmont Terrier Club, Alpin Kennels, Aveley, Essex, England.

DARJEELING DOG SHOW.

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

THE First Darjeeling Championship Dog Show held under I.K.A. Rules took place on the 19th instant in the Government House Grounds which were kindly lent by H. E. The Governor. The Show was an undoubted success and it is hoped that in future it will be an annual event. The Executive are to be congratulated on the arrangements. The benching and judging ring were all that could be desired, whilst a shamiana was provided for those who wished a rest from dog gazing.

The prizes were numerous and consisted mostly of silver cups of all sizes. It was a pity that a little more care was not displayed over the allotment of the same, as this was one of the few matters which gave cause for a certain amount of dissatisfaction. Committees of future Shows in India will do well to give more attention to the allotment of prizes. In recent years the Breed Classes appear to have been sacrificed for the benefit of the Variety Classes, as the prizes for the latter classes have almost without exception been of a far greater value than for the Breed Classes. This is a mistake. Every encouragement should be given to improve all breeds, especially those which are at present the least strong.

The judging was in the capable hands of Mr. Molley and his decisions on the whole gave general satisfaction. All exhibitors, of course, could not see "eye to eye" with the judge and there was, of course, a little grumbling, but then a Dog Show is not complete without these necessary adjuncts!! There are always a few disappointed exhibitors who imagine they possess a swan until the judge's decision conveys to them that it is a duck!!

The exhibits were numerous and of good quality. No less than 121 dogs were catalogued and there were few non-starters. The strong classes were Airedales (16) followed by Smooth Fox Terriers and Dachshunds. Mr. Mackenzie, the Honorary Secretary of the Show, entered some fine Airedales and we imagine that the popularity of this breed will continue to increase. It is probably the first time at any show in this country they have been the strongest class.

The Dachshunds were excellent, 4 out of the 7 benched being bred by the late Mrs. Otto Eck, who did so much to encourage this breed in India. The winner in the Open Class (Dogs) was Mrs. McCully's "Waldman," a splendid dog, and put down in the very pink of condition. Mr. V. L. Rees' "Red Pearl" is a nice animal, winning the Open Bitches but failed in the Limit (Dogs and Bitches), being beaten by "Waldman."

Mrs Treadway's Hardwicke B. F. S. if somewhat ancient, certainly held her own. She is a beautiful headed bitch, the right size with good bone and is generally a credit to her breeder. Mr. F. Reed's "Sirius" is a very nice one only shown too light. In the Wires "Victorine II" won the Open Bitches, but gave place to Mrs. E. H. Napper's "Collar of Calcutta" in the Limit (Dogs and Bitches). "Collar" is a nice bodied, good boned dog, splendid hard coat, but fails somewhat on head. Mrs. F. C. E. Paul carried all before her with her Bulldogs and won numerous cups, her champion Leap Rival Princess besides winning in the "Varieties" secured the Special for the best bitch in the show.

Scotch Terriers were not as numerous as one would expect seeing it is a dog that should do very well in the Hills. Irish Terriers were good. Mrs. Robertson's "Easter Gift" secured his third win in an Open Class which should entitle him to the proud and coveted title of "Champion."

The honours for Bull Terriers were fought out by Calcutta Exhibitors, Messrs. Barlow and Samjee, "Brenton Jolliboy" and "Tuscanny Queen" securing the verdict against "Willowdene Merry Prince" and "Bloomsbury Sarah." They were all four most excellent dogs and will doubtless live to fight again.

In the larger breeds Captain Herbert's "Lord Romo," a Great Dane, won the Governor's Cup for the best dog in the Show besides several specials. Captain Byrne's "Rob" a deerhound which was seen in Calcutta last year, secured a Special for the best imported, a well-deserved and popular win. This dog also won "Any Variety Open."

Mr. S. Hennessy's "Don," an Irish Wolfhound, was very successful in the varieties, winning in any Variety "Limit" and "Novice."

It was nice to see a big dog winning the Cup for the best dog in the Show as this honour has of late been carried off by Fox-terriers.

Out of the five Specials three were won by big dogs, viz.:—

Best dog in Show	...	"Lord Romo" (Great Dane).
Best opposite sex	...	"Oh! Rival Princess" (Bulldog).
Best imported	...	"Rob" (Deerhound).
Best bred in India	...	"Hardwicke B. F. S." (Smooth Fox-terrier.
Best property of a Lady	...	"Easter Gift" (Irish Terrier).

It was interesting to note that four out of the above-mentioned winners are over four and a half years of age, whilst "Rob" is probably very little less but his age is unknown.

Their Excellencies visited the Show in the morning and it was a pleasure to witness the keen interest they took in the dogs and judging. Her Excellency Lady Carmichael later in the day graciously distributed the prizes to the winners.

ROLLER-SKATING in the street, we read, has been banned by the Camberwell and Kensington Borough Councils. As a matter of fact, we believe that gutter snipes with the slightest pretension to being in the mode gave it up some time ago.
